House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Tuesday, October 14, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

TREATY WITH AUSTRIA.

SIR GEORGE PERLEY AND SIR EDWARD KEMP APPOINTED PLENIPOTENTIARIES FOR CANADA.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council) laid upon the table of the House an Order in Council of the 6th September, 1919 requesting that His Majesty should appoint Hon. Sir George Halsey Perley, High Commissioner for Canada in London, and Sir Edward Kemp, Minister of Overseas Forces, as commissioners and plenipotentiaries for Canada for the purpose of executing the Austrian Treaty.

CLAIMS AGAINST GERMAN NATIONALS.

BILL TO GIVE EXCHEQUER COURT JURISDICTION TO LIQUIDATE PROPERTY.

Hon. CHARLES J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 30, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

He said: The purpose of the Bill is to add to those matters over which the Exchequer Court has exclusive jurisdiction, questions that may arise in connection with the liquidation under the Peace Treaty of the property of German nationals, and in that connection of such claims as they may have and of claims as may be advanced against them, which latter claims under the terms of the Treaty we are entitled to meet out of the proceeds of the liquidation. The Exchequer Court, under the Bill, is to be the court having jurisdiction to deal with these matters.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COMPENSATION TO POSTMASTERS.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 31 to amend the Civil Service Act, 1918, with respect to the salaries of certain postmasters and assistant postmasters.

He said: Under the statute as it at present stands, subject to some amendments by Order in Council under the War Measures Act, the salaries of certain postmasters in the country are governed by the total revenue of their respective offices. Owing to the receipts derived from the sale of special war tax stamps the total revenue of these offices was largely increased, and as it was considered to be incompatible with the spirit, intent and purpose of the special War Revenue Act to permit the diversion of any portion of this special revenue towards the payment of the salaries of postmasters, an Order in Council was passed on the 8th January, 1918, under the War Measures Act, giving the Postmaster General the power to determine what percentage of the increased revenue should be computed as a part of the salaries of postmasters and assistant postmasters. It is desired to perpetuate by legislation the effect of this Order in Council, and such is the purpose of the Bill.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the second time.

SENATE BILL—FIRST READING.

Bill No. 29 (from the Senate) for the relief of Millie Wettlaufer—Mr. Sheard.

SIR HENRY DRAYTON'S CANDIDATURE IN KINGSTON.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I feel it my duty to bring to your notice a letter which appears over the signature of J. M. Hughes on the first page of the Daily Standard, a newspaper published in the city of Kingston. The letter is very short, and if your honour will permit me to read it, it will be the shortest way to dispose of the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the letter is a matter of sufficient importance to be brought to the attention of the House on the Orders of the Day and a question is to be directed to myself I do not anticipate an immediate answer can be given.

Mr. McKENZIE: I merely wish to base a question to the Minister of Railways on the letter after I have read it. It is addressed to the editor of the Standard and is as follows:

Sir,—I wish to announce that I have retired from the contest for the seat in the House of Commons. My reason for doing so is that it is reported that the Hon. J. D. Reid made the statement to a number of representative citizens that if Sir Henry Drayton was given the seat Kingston would be well looked after and that the Harbour Improvements would be assumed. Being a loyal and true Kingstonian and as I have always worked for the interest of the city I felt that I could not take the responsibility of going on with the contest, and in any way interfering with the material progress of the city. I sincerely hope that Sir Henry Drayton will see to it that work will be started in a very short time and Kingston will become the eastern terminal of the Great Lakes.

I thank the many citizens who assured me of their support and ask them to put their shoulder to the wheel and work for a bigger, better and more prosperous Kingston.

(Signed) J. M. Hughes.

In view of the seriousness of what is implied in that letter, Sir, I wish to ask if the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) undertook to make any promises to the citizens of Kingston as to what would happen if Sir Henry Drayton were not opposed.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I did not see the letter in the Kingston Standard, but I did see it in the Toronto Globe, where the item is headed, "Says it's a bribe to Kingston city. Statement attributed to the Hon. J. D. Reid matter for controversy," and the letter is quoted. The leader of the Opposition will notice that Mr. Hughes in this letter states "it is reported," but he does not give the information as a fact of his own knowledge. I think the best answer I can make to the letter is to quote the last part of the Globe article, which reads thus:

Unionist leaders here say that Hon. Mr. Reid made no promise of anything to Kingston.

And that is correct.

RESIGNATION OF MR. ERNEST LAPOINTE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I give notice, under section 5, chapter XI of the Revised Statutes of Canada, that I do resign my seat in this House as representing the county of Kamouraska.

[Mr. Speaker.]

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD.

On motion of Right Hon. Sir George Foster Bill No. 21 respecting the Canadian Wheat Board was read the third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT, 1918—AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean, Bill No. 18 to amend the Civil Service Act, 1918 was read the third time and passed.

TREATY OF PEACE—SENATE AMENDMENTS.

On the Order: Consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 3, an Act for carrying into effect the Treaty of Peace between His Majesty and certain other Powers (the Prime Minister).

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minster of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the effect of the amendments made by the Senate to this Bill is to extend the provisions of the Bill empowering the Government to take the necessary steps for carrying out and giving effect to the provisions of the Treaty of Peace signed with Germany, so as to make them applicable to the Treaty of Peace which has since been signed with Austria; and, further, to such other treaties with any of the other nations with whom His Majesty is or has been at war as may be signed on behalf of His Majesty acting for Canada.

After careful consideration we have decided to ask this House to concur in the amendments of the Senate in so far as they refer to the Treaty which has been signed with Austria; but not to ask the House to concur in so far as the amendments extend the powers conferred by the Bill to the carrying out of and giving effect to the provisions of such treaties with other nations as may be signed on behalf of His Majesty acting for Canada.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Has the Austrian Treaty been submitted to this House?

Mr. DOHERTY: It has not been submitted to the House. I was going to explain the position with regard to the Austrian Treaty. On the 22nd of September, the following question was put by the hon. membe for St. James (Mr. L. A. Lapointe):

1. Is it the intention of the Government to submit to Parliament, for its consideration, the Treaty of Peace signed between the Allied and Associated Powers and Austria and which was signed on behalf of Canada by Sir Edward Kemp?
2. If so, when?
3. If not, why?

4. Will a copy of this Treaty and all documents appertaining thereto be available to the members of the House?

To which I made the following answer:

The Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Austria, signed at Saint Germain on Sept. 10, 1919, follows in general the lines of the Treaty with Germany, which has already been approved of by Parliament, while in the most important features, namely, the League of Nations Covenant and the labour sections, it is identical therewith. If the authenticated copy of the Treaty with Austria arrives in time, the Government will submit the Treaty to Parliament at the present session; if not, the Government would not feel justified in summoning another special session for the purpose, but will take the responsiblity of advising the ratification of the Treaty in view of the action of Parliament above mentioned. In any case copies will be distributed to members of Parliament as soon as available.

We have not as yet received the authenticated copy of the Treaty as it was actually signed, but we have received a copy of the Treaty as prepared, and also a cable communication, from which it appears that this copy differs in no material point whatever from the document as actually signed. That document, as was stated in answer to the question which I have just read, is entirely on the lines of the German Treaty. The two parts of the Treaty dealing respectively with the Covenant of the League of Nations and the labour sections are in identical terms with similar parts of the German Treaty.

The Austrian Treaty is divided into some fourteen parts; there are fifteen parts in the German Treaty. As I have said, the first part of the Austrian Treaty, the Covenant of the League of Nations, is identical in its terms with the first part of the German Treaty.

Part II of the Treaty with Germany dealt with the boundaries of Germany; Part II of the Treaty with Austria deals with the boundaries of Austria. These parts, therefore, in the respective Treaties are necessarily different, but in each case the boundaries of the respective countries are fixed and have been accepted by the respective countries.

Part III of the Treaty has to do with political clauses affecting conditions within Europe. These clauses in the two Treaties are necessarily different in their details, because the two countries were respectively contiguous to, bounded by, different countries and out of their respective territories such part as was separated from them was allotted to different countries. So that the political clauses as applicable in Europe necessarily differ by reason of these differences of situation; but wherever it is a question concerning the same countries in both Treaties the provisions of these political clauses are identical. It will be readily understood that there are some countries which are affected in the German Treaty and unaffected in the Austrian Treaty, and vice versa, on account of the different relations existing between them and these two countries.

Part V of the Treaty, containing the Military, Naval and Air clauses, proceeds on the same principle as the similar section of the German Treaty. The reduction in number of troops to be allowed Austria, however, is more considerable, the number allowed being very much smaller. I think it is safe to say that in all other respects the principles upon which these restrictions are imposed are identical with the principles of the German Treaty.

Part VI, which has to do with Prisoners of War and Graves, is substantially the same as the corresponding section of the German Treaty. There may be a difference of words, but there is really no difference of effect.

Part VII, which deals with the question of Penalties, is similar in both Treaties, with this exception: In the German Treaty provision is made for the indictment and trial of the German Emperor; that of course does not appear in the Austrian Treaty.

Part VIII, dealing with reparations, proceeds also on the same principles as those laid down in the German Treaty. It defines the similar classes of damages which are to be taken into account in establishing reparations; provides for a similar commission to be appointed to consider the different claims that may be made and to determine the amount that Austria ought to pay and the manner in which the payment shall be made. There are one or two differences in detail. For instance, the commission is to determine what proportion of the entire damage Austria should bear, taking into account the amount determined upon as that which Germany is in a position to pay. Furthermore, there are in the German Treaty provisions for certain specific issues of bonds to be made from time to time by Germany; in the Austrian Treaty the amounts to be so paid from time to time are left to be determined by the commission.

Part IX, which contains the economic clauses, is entirely on the same lines as the corresponding section of the German Treaty. There are some modifications in detail resulting from particular conditions prevailing in Austria, particularly, perhaps, on account of the numerous countries the territories whereof formed part of Austria, but which have become independent by the operation of the Treaty and whose relations in regard to these matters call for being specially dealt with.

The provisions for dealing with property and rights are on similar lines and substantially the same. The provisions with regard to ports, railways and rivers are, with the changes necessary by reason of the different territories concerned, similar to those of the German Treaty. The labour conditions are identical.

Taking the instrument as a whole, the principles and the lines upon which it is drawn being precisely those on which the German Treaty was drawn, while we would be quite disposed, if the Treaty arrives before this session of Parliament is terminated, to submit it to Parliament, it did not seem that it would be necessary or that we would be justified in calling a special session to deal with it, in view of the action of Parliament on the substantially similar Treaty with Germany.

Now, by the effect of the present amendment there is not expressed approval of this Treaty, but in anticipation of its being ratified the power is conferred to do such things as may be necessary to carry it out and give it effect. Of course, to its ratification will be essential the advice of His Majesty's advisers, the Government of this country. Were it not for the action that Parliament has already taken in approving the substantially similar treaty with Germany, it might, perhaps, be suggested that it would be necessary, or at all events desirable, to submit this one separately. But in view of its absolute similarity, that appears to be an unnecessary proceeding which, if it involved an additional special session, would be also a very expensive proceeding. All that the House is asked in this regard is to accept the Government's statement of the similarity existing between the two Treaties and the statement already made that it is on that basis that the Government would take the responsibility of advising the ratification of the Treaty.

With regard to the other Treaties which have not as yet been entered into or signed and concerning the effect of which the Government is, of course, not in a position to make any statement, it seems to us that in so far as the amendment adopted by the Senate confers powers for the carrying out of Treaties which have not yet been signed—treaties which may deal with matters not necessarily dealt with in the German Treaty and matters which it is difficult for us to foresee in any way at the present time—we would not be justified in asking Parliament to deal with such prospective Treaties even so far as to confer powers to be exercised under them, assuming that upon their being entered into they would be found suitable for ratification and would be ratified.

Therefore, as I have said, we purpose asking this House to accept the amendment of the Senate in so far as the Austrian Treaty is concerned, but to decline to accept it in so far as the other treaties referred to are concerned. I beg, in consequence, to move:

1. That the first five amendments made by the Senate to the said Bill be concurred in.

These five amendments are simply putting the word "treaties" in the plural instead of the word "treaty" in the singular.

2. That in the amendment to the preamble all the words after "the plenipotentiaries therein named" be struck out, and that the amendment as amended be concurred in.

3. That the amendment made by the Senate in the title of the Bill be concurred in.

This amendment consists simply in using the word "treaties" in the plural instead of the word "treaty" in the singular.

Mr. VIEN: Is the minister aware of the fact that this Bill as amended by the Senate has not been reprinted nor distributed to the members?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think it is customary to reprint and redistribute Bills that come back from the Senate. We are proceeding in regard to this Bill in the usual way. I asked to have some copies made of the amendments and to have them furnished to the leader of the Opposition, and I hope they have reached him.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have received them.

Mr. ANDREW ROSS McMASTER (Brome): It would appear to me that what the Government asks the House to do this afternoon creates a very unwholesome precedent. By passing the amendments made by the Senate which the Government desires us to pass, we practically, although not in so many words, approve, if we do not ratify the Treaty of Peace with Austria. I would lay it down as a principle, when we are starting, so to speak, our dealings as a nation with other nations, that if the approval or ratification of this House is to be sought on any treaty between Canada and any other power whatsoever, that Treaty should be before the House, so that every member, no matter how humble his position, may have an ample opportunity of considering and studying it. That is a reasonable attitude to take, and as we are at the beginning of what you might call our international history as a nation, we should be careful to see that we start aright. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) has told us that this Treaty of Peace with Austria is on all lines similar to the Treaty of Peace with Germany. We accept his word; but, after all, Germany and Austria are two very different countries. There are many of us who feel that certain of the nations that went to make up the Austrian Empire were not and are not animated with feelings of hostility to Great Britain. Penal clauses which may or may not have their place, but which may have their place in a Treaty of Peace with Germany, may be quite out of keeping in a Treaty of Peace with Austria. For instance, the other day I read in a paper—I do not know whether it was a British paper or not —that the British ambassador at Vienna had been the subject of a most sympathetic and enthusiastic reception when he went to the opera house in that city the other day. I do not know whether such a thing would be possible in Berlin, but I presume it would not be. With all due respect to the Minister of Justice, I do not think it is the right thing for him to ask this House to consent —for that is what this amounts to—to making this treaty with Austria. If our approval or ratification be desirable—and in my humble judgment I believe it to be desirable—then it should be asked for only after a perfectly adequate opportunity is given to the members of this House to consider the treaty.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: As a general principle, I concur entirely in what has been stated by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), that is, if the consideration of this House be at all necessary or recognized, that before we are asked to take any action upon an international document or agreement, this House should have an opportunity of seeing it. I am sure the minister will not, for a moment, say that that is not a sound principle. I do not see how we can justify any other course than to stand by the principle that, before we ratify or concur in so important a document as a Treaty of Peace between ourselves and the Empire of which we form a part and one of the enemy powers with which we have been fighting for the last five years, that document should be laid upon the table of the House, a copy of it put into the hands of every member who has to pass judgment upon it, and after he has had an opportunity of doing so, that he should give an opinion regarding it. That is the only sound principle upon which we can act. The Minister of Justice asks us to forego all that and to take his word for the contents of this document, which he says has been signed and which no doubt has been signed. That is good enough in its way, and no person in this House will, for a moment, contend that the Minister of Justice is concealing anything that is in the document. Nevertheless, that does not mend the situation. If a member of the House, or even a minister of the Crown wants to move the first reading of a Bill, the practice of this House will not permit him to do so until a copy of that Bill is handed to the Speaker. If that be regarded as a good and sound rule in the House of Commons as regards a Bill which, as the very next step, must necessarily be printed and put into the hands of every member, I think it would be regarded as more so in respect to so important a document as a treaty. For that reason, speaking for myself, and for hon. members on this side of the House who may not express their own views, I think we must express ourselves as opposed to the principle involved in the whole of the amendment made by the Senate and also as disapproving the parts of it which the Minister of Justice announces as having been accepted by the Government. It is perfectly constitutional for the Government of Canada to advise His Majesty to approve of this Treaty, without its being submitted to Parliament at all. That principle was laid down in this House when we were discussing the Treaty some weeks ago, and it was laid down from our general knowledge of the constitution of the British Empire. Our friends opposite did not think it proper to accept that doctrine, and insisted that the Treaty should be laid on the Table, and that every hon. member should have an opportunity of reading it and passing judgment upon it. That was a sound democratic idea, and we are not finding fault with it at all. It was a good beginning in a new direction, the turning over of a new leaf in the constitution of the British Empire. At the same time, it was not necessary upon sound principles of constitutional law, because the King upon the advice of his ministers, and as far as the colonies are concerned, upon the advice of his colonial ministers, would have been absolutely within the constitution in giving his assent to the Treaty wthout consulting any one else. If the King chooses, however, to extend to us the courtesy asking the approval of the Dominion Governments, it is quite proper and constitutional for him to approve the Treaty with Austria without troubling this Parliament at all.

There was laid on the Table a week or so ago some correspondence that took place between the British Government and the Canadian Government on this question of what action was necessary by Parliament before the Treaty should be finally ratified and confirmed. One of the despatches, dated London, July 23, 1919, signed by Lord Milner, and addressed, I take it, to the Governor General of Canada, reads in part as follows:

> I have now consulted with Prime Minister and the cabinet with reference to your most secret telegram of July 9. Our view is that early ratification, especially now that Germany has ratified, is of the highest importance. In the British constitution there is nothing which makes it necessary for the King to obtain the consent of Parliament before ratifying Treaty. With perfect constitutional propriety the King can ratify on the advice of his ministers. For a treaty of this far-reaching importance, and one embracing the whole Empire, the King certainly ought only to act at the instance of all his constitutional advisers—the Dominion Ministries as well as that of the United Kingdom.

The cable is long and I shall not tax Hansard with the rest of it. There Lord Milner lays down the principle that it is not necessary for any Parliament, not even for the Parliament of Great Britain, to deal with the Treaty at all, but if there is any sentiment in the Dominions, or if it is regarded as essential by them that the Treaty should be submitted to their Parliaments, the British authorities are willing to give way; but from the constitutional standpoint it is entirely unnecessary. Lord Milner, who no doubt was advised by the law officers of the Crown of Great Britain, lays down the principle that it was not necessary to consult even the Dominion governments, but as a matter of policy and of constitutional usage it was thought better to do so. I am not pretending to tell the Government or the Minister of Justice any law, but am simply reminding them that they believe, I think, that it is absolutely within the power of the King to ratify this Treaty without consulting the Dominion Government at all, not to speak of the Dominion Parliament. In submitting the matter to Parliament the King has done more than the constitution in its original form requires. I submit, therefore, that it is perfectly consistent with constitutional rights and constitutional usage for His Majesty to ratify or concur in the Austrian Treaty without consulting this Parliament at all.

The Prime Minister, however, told us at an early sitting of this Parliament that he had committed himself—I do not know exactly to whom, possibly to the Canadian people—that the Treaty, the Treaty with Germany for that was the only one we were talking about then, would be submitted to Parliament. Very good; he was carrying out his promise in submitting it to Parliament. Now if it was not regular or constitutional to deal with the treaty with Germany except upon the advice of this Parliament, by what reasoning can we waive the submission to Parliament of a treaty with another power, which is to all intents and purposes exactly on all fours with Germany as far as we are concerned? I submit further that Bill No. 3, which the Government submitted to this Parliament, was word for word the same as the British Act implementing the treaty with Germany. We have not changed one word of it except to use the word "Canada" instead of "the United Kingdom" wherever it was necessary. The British Government has not introduced any such legislation as these amendments. They may have introduced another Bill, but I am not aware of it. I submit, to the Government and the Minister of Justice, unless a Bill has been introduced in the British Parliament going beyond the terms of the first Bill, it would not be proper for us to go further than the Mother Country has gone in legislation along that line.

I do not for a moment suppose that we are taking any grave risks in accepting the word of the Minister of Justice as to the contents of this document, but he is a very foolish man who signs a deed, for example, with his eyes closed, and without knowing the terms of the document. I do not think that the minister's business judgment would permit him, however credulous he might be, to sign blindfolded a deed which I might present to him as conveying a lot on Sparks street 40 by 100 feet, with my assurance that there were certain stores and buildings on either side. If in a small transaction, such as the signing of a deed, such uncritical action would be inadvisable, I think it will appeal to the minister himself that it is not proper to ask this House and the Canadian nation to close their eyes to the contents of a treaty with Austria and pass legislation by which we shall undertake all the financial responsibilities that are necessarily involved in the carrying out of that treaty. I do not think we should be asked to assume responsibilities for the rest of our natural lives without very grave consideration, and I submit, as a principle of constitutional law, that the step which we are seeking to take is not a sound one.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queens): I also desire to register my dissent from and protest against the very extraordinary course which the Government are now pursuing. To begin with, it is remarkable that a minister of the Crown should sign a document of the importance of a treaty, and that weeks after its signing this House is to be told: "We cannot obtain a copy of the document itself." Never before has such a thing occurred in the history of the public affairs of Canada. A minister of the Crown is despatched from England—where, I believe, Sir Edward Kemp was—to attend at Versailles, or wherever the signing was to occur, to sign a document in the name and on behalf of Canada. He does so, and we are now solemnly told that the document which he signed cannot be produced. I do not doubt my hon. friend the Minister of Justice as to the nature of that document being correct. I do not for a moment suggest that he has any object in concealing it. I take it for granted that what he has told us of the document is substantially correct, but I entirely concur in what has been said by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), that our being asked to give any sort of assent or approval to a document of this character upon a mere statement of a minister of the Crown is a matter that is absolutely without any precedent, not only in our Canadian affairs, but, I believe, in the public affairs of any other nation in the world. I cannot imagine such an important document being conveyed to the House in the form of a speech. We are told: "You must take our word for it that the document is all right." From my point of view—I do not care to enlarge upon it again—it is of no earthly importance whether or not these treaties are approved by the Dominion of Canada. That point has also been emphasized by the leader of the Opposition. But in the previous discussion the Minister of Justice and those who agreed with him on the subject took the view that the approval of this House was necessary. I think I state my hon. friend's position clearly, and I perceive he nods his satisfaction. Of course, unless the Government felt that approval by Parliament was necessary there would be no possible excuse for a special session at this time. Now, however, they have altered their position. The Minister of Justice on the former occasion—and he is satisfied with my restatement of his position—said that the approval of the German Treaty by this House was imperative, but in respect of the Austrian Treaty he tells us that similar approval is not necessary and that he does not propose to ask that we give our approval. He makes a distinction between the approval of the Treaty and the carrying of it out as proposed by this Bill. I therefore direct attention to the material change in the view of the Government in that relation. When we were dealing with the subject before we were assured, as a cogent reason for assembling this special session, that the approval—I use the word "approval" and not "ratification," which is the act of the King—the approval of this House of the German Treaty was necessary in order to give it effect. Now we have the Austrian Treaty, which my hon. friend tells me is the same in effect, and we are frankly informed that our approval is not necessary. That is one point. The Government seem to be strangely confused over this matter and I am not surprised, for the whole position is a most extraordinary one. My hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, says that the Government only purpose now to take authority to carry out the Treaty; he warns us that we shall not be asked to give approval, and we may save our consciences on that point; he only intends to take authority to "carry out" the Austrian Treaty. But his colleague obtained the assent of the Senate of Canada to a very wide amendment which we have before us. The minister of the Crown representing the Government in the Senate has obtained the approval of that body, not merely to what is now asked in this House in respect of the Austrian Treaty, but he has induced the Senate to accept an amendment which says that the Government of Canada is authorized to carry out not only the German Treaty and the Austrian Treaty, which we have not before us, but any other treaties that in the future may be signed on behalf of Canada. The minister, after his colleague has introduced that in the Senate and obtained their assent to it, now changes his mind and comes to the conclusion that he will leave it out. I am afraid, Sir, the Government are sadly muddled over this business and find it difficult to present it in a way satisfactory to themselves. The very idea that this Parliament is to be asked to give in any way the stamp of approval to a document of the character of a treaty without having that document on the table of the House is a most extraordinary proceeding, and I entirely agree with the hon. member for Brome that in taking such a step we are establishing a very dangerous precedent.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not altogether clear that the Minister of Justice is entitled to reply, but I am sure that the House would in any event concede him that courtesy. I wish, however, to direct the attention of the House to the fact that, while I know that this motion was prepared by a responsible officer, I think an error was committed in not having included in the motion the reasons for the non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. GAUVREAU: They are all mixed up.

Mr. DOHERTY: Mr. Speaker, I beg to move an amendment by inserting the following reasons, namely:

That the treaties referred to in the portion of the amendment to the preamble of the Bill hereinafter proposed to be struck out have not as yet been signed, and the Government is not in a position to put before the House the provisions that the same may contain, even in substance; nor to affirm that the same will be on the lines of that with Germany already approved by the House.

It can go in the second paragraph.

Mr. SPEAKER: As this is in effect a non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate, under our rules it is essential that the reasons for the non-concurrence ought to be included, and therefore the Minister of Justice is desirous to add these words to his motion.

Amendment agreed to and resolution as amended agreed to.

MANUFACTURE AND IMPORTATION OF OLEOMARGARINE.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Guthrie, the House went into Committee on Bill No. 28, to permit the temporary importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in Canada.

Bill considered, reported without amendment, read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT (ELECTROCUTION).

On the Order: House again in Committee on Bill No. 6, to amend the Criminal Code (Electrocution).—Mr. Mowat.

Mr. MOWAT: Before the House goes into Committee again on this Bill, I desire to make a short statement. The Bill as it now is—

[Mr. Fielding.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is not entitled to make any statement upon the calling of the Order, excepting it is to discharge the Order, inasmuch as the Speaker leaves the Chair without the question being put.

Mr. MOWAT: May I be permitted—this Bill having been called from time to time and allowed to stand—to give the reason for it? It is this—

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. gentleman ask that this Order stand?

Mr. MOWAT: I am giving an explanation why it should stand for the time being.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Order stands.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

PROPOSED EXTENSION INTO NON-RAILWAY SECTIONS OF MARITIME PROVINCES.

Further consideration of the following motion of Mr. D. D. McKenzie resumed from October 6:

Whereas on the 16th of March, A.D., 1914, this Honourable House passed the following Resolution which was accepted by the Government,—

"Mr. McKenzie moved that in the opinion of this House the time has arrived for the extension of the Intercolonial Railway of Canada into the non-railway sections of the Maritime Provinces within reasonable range of the said railway." See pages 1736, 1737, 1738, 1739 and 1740 of Hansard for the said year, A.D., 1914.

Be it therefore resolved that, in the opinion of this House, the proposals of the said Resolution of the 16th of March, A.D., 1914, should be carried forward to completion at the earliest possible date.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, from time to time the people of the Maritime Provinces through their representatives in this House have asked the Government for better railway facilities, and it is my desire to support the resolution of the hon. leader of the Opposition for the extension of the Intercolonial railway into the sections mentioned by him, for I believe that such extension would very greatly contribute to the development of trunk line traffic. In New Brunswick and Nova Scotia we have in the Intercolonial railway our only trunk line, and, of course, it cannot be expected that capital will be attracted for the construction of short local lines, which by themselves cannot be operated at a profit. Branch lines are not built with the primary object of securing dividends on local traffic; their real purpose is to act as feeders to trunk lines. The hon. gentlemen who have already taken part in the debate on this resolution have mentioned that the districts referred to would all produce freight from which the trunk line would derive great profits on the long haul. Such railway construction would encourage the fish industry on the Atlantic coast—an encouragement that would be not merely for the benefit of the localities themselves, but would be of national advantage, as it would increase our food production and at the same time provide additional traffic for the Intercolonial portion of our national railways. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Leger) has mentioned a proposed line between Buctouche, in Kent county, and Loggieville, in Northumberland county, which would connect two districts at present isolated for lack of railway communication. It was thought a few years ago that a company might build that line. But, as I have already stated in this House, I have been opposed to the construction of branch lines in the Maritime Provinces by private corporations and unless connected with the Intercolonial for they could not maintain themselves. This proposed line would traverse a fine country in proximity to the best fisheries and would be of great benefit to Canada at large as well as to the Maritime Provinces.

I regret that the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) is not in his seat, as I wish to again bring to his attention the necessity to our national railways of taking over the old branch line called the Caraquet and Gulf Shore railway on the North shore, which I drew more particularly to the attention of the former Minister of Public Works, Hon. Mr. Carvell, in 1917. At that time the Government were taking over a number of branch lines, connecting with the Intercolonial Railway between Moncton and St. John chiefly, but they left out one branch line which would be an excellent feeder for the Intercolonial on the ground that there was a dispute of a few thousand dollars regarding the value of the road. As I stated at the time, I did not make the request with the assurance that there would be an immediate additional revenue derived from its operation in conjunction with the Intercolonial, but looked more particularly to the benefit that such a line would give to the main line between Halifax and Montreal. I pointed out its freight possibilities, and stated that altogether about 1,750 cars of lumber a year would reach Gloucester Junction not for distribution in the neighbourhood, but to be sent through in Montreal, a distance of 533 miles; and in addition, every year we have a large number of carloads of fish to be transported from Bathurst to St. John, 220 miles, or to Halifax, 300 miles, due to the geographical situation. Therefore by reason of the long haul traffic the Intercolonial would receive during the year a revenue of $200,000 to $300,000 as contrasted with only about $80,000 of revenue to the branch line itself. I said at the time that the receipts of that road could be increased very considerably, and that therefore the main line revenue would also be increased two or three times. That fact has to be considered, and in drawing it to the attention of the Government I submit that the interests of our national railways are being neglected by our continued refusal to take over that line. The Government are losing thousands of dollars every year on account of their neglect to take over this line. The acquirement of these branch lines in northern New Brunswick and in Nova Scotia is a matter of great national interest and necessity. The only reason that the minister has ever given for the Government's failure to take over the Caraquet and Gulf Shore railway is that they could not come to an agreement with the owners of that line as to the amount for which it could be bought. I suggested when the matter was up on a previous occasion, and I suggest again, that arbitration should be resorted to. The owners of this line have intimated to the Minister of Railways their willingness to accept the decision of any board of arbitration appointed by the Government to look into this matter; they would have accepted in advance the decision of the former Chief Commissioner of the Board of Railway Commissioners, now the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), I thought at the time that the Minister of Railways would accept that proposal. The owners of this line are willing to-day to accept the finding of any man who has a knowledge of railways whom the Government may select as arbitrator, whether he be a judge of the Exchequer Court or any one else.

The Government are always prepared to accept the principle of arbitration when it comes to dealing with large corporations and when large amounts are involved. They did it in the case of the Canadian Northern, and they are proposing to do it in the case of the Grand Trunk in connection with the proposals which they now place before the House. Why not apply the same principle to the acquirement of small lines? Why not do it in the case of the line which I mention and thus do justice to the section of the community through which this line runs? It may be said that this line is not worth much in its present condition, or was not worth much in the condition that it was in last year or two years ago. I admit that the road was run down, but it is not only the actual physical value of a railroad which is to be considered; one has to take into account also the potential value of the road as a feeder of the trunk line. The districts through which these branch lines run may be so productive as to make the branch lines of considerable value as feeders of the trunk line. If the Intercolonial railway had been owned by a private company, the Caraquet and Gulf Shore line would long ago have been taken over; the owners of the trunk line would have recognized the value of the territory through which this branch line runs and its value as a feeder of the trunk line. I hope that the Minister of Railways and those members of the Government who hear me to-day will take this matter into very serious consideration and that they will decide to take over the Caraquet and Gulf Shore railway and to construct those new lines which have been referred to by hon. members who have preceded me in this debate. To do so would be in the interests of the districts concerned as well as to the advantage of the Canadian National railway.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Speaker,——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is my duty to remind hon. members that the leader of the Opposition is about to exercise his right to close the debate upon this motion and that other members will afterwards be precluded from speaking. If any hon. member, therefore, wishes to speak to this motion, he should do so now.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Government takes so little interest in a resolution which was passed by the House and accepted by the Government some four years ago with regard to the building of lines of railway in parts of Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and possibly Prince Edward Island. No member of the Government seems to think it worth while to say a word about the matter. I was hoping that the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) would be here at some time when this matter was being dealt with, to show that he takes some interest in the development of these very important sections of our country. But although I have postponed the discussion of this motion several times in the hope that the minister would be here, and although I asked him as a special favour on one occasion to be present when the motion was called, I find that neither he nor any other member of the Government thinks it worth while to pay the slightest attention to the interests of these very important sections of Canada.

On the 16th of March, 1914, the House adopted this resolution, moved by myself:

> That in the opinion of this House the time has arrived for the extension of the Intercolonial Railway of Canada into the non-railway section of the Maritime Provinces within reasonable range of the said railway.

That resolution was accepted by the Government at that time. During the war period I did not think it would be proper to embarrass the Government in any way by dealing with these matters. But now that the war is over and the Government appears to have lots of money—millions and hundreds of millions—to spend upon railway projects, I did think that I was only doing justice to the grand old provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in asking that some attention be given to such portions of those provinces as have been without railway facilities. But evidently my appeal has fallen upon deaf ears; the matter has been dealt with as one of such perfunctory character that no member of the Government deigns to take the slightest interest in it. We on this side are accustomed to treatment of that kind. We shall continue, however, to advocate what is in the interests of the various parts of the country which we represent and to hope that the day will come when there will be a Government in charge of the affairs of Canada which will consider it worth while to give some attention to the provinces that I have mentioned.

I did not bring forward this resolution looking for any consideration for those provinces beyond the lines of good business. I have always submitted that the development and extension of those lines would bring splendid business to the main trunk lines of the Intercolonial railway or whatever lines of Government-owned roads may be found extending through this country. I pointed out that the lumber business, the coal business, the trade in plaster-stone and more especially the fishing industry would be developed to such an extent as to make the road a good paying proposition. It was largely for the purpose and with the hope that the line into my particular county of Victoria should be extended along the fishing ports of that county that I brought the matter up. We have in the county of Victoria a long string of fishing ports and towns beginning with a fishing place called North River, North Gut, South Gut, Englishtown, North Shore, South Bay, Ingonish, Neil harbour, Dinwall bay, St. Lawrence, Meat Cove. All of these villages along the coast of the county of Victoria are most magnificent fishing places, but they have no railway, and consequently the fishing trade is really in its infancy and has no opportunity of development. If a railway were run through these fishing villages, there is no limit to the wealth that might be developed. On the Inverness side of the island we have several Acadian villages on a settlement called Cheticamp, with magnificent fishing possibilities. Then there is Margaree harbour and another point called Ste. Rose. Of course, there is a railroad from the Strait of Canso along the south side of the island, which railway I understand the Government intends to take over one of these days. That railway touches many of the harbours along the south side of the island; but the fishermen were never given any opportunity to take advantage of it because it is merely a coal road, that is, it is owned by a coal company; it is equipped only for the carrying of coal, and there was never anything done to connect it with the fishing towns, villages and harbours on the south side of the island of Cape Breton. But when the Government take it over, as I hope they will, there will be an opportunity for them so to equip it that it will be a means of assistance to the fishermen of that side of the island and will enable the fishermen to produce this excellent food for other parts of Canada. On the south side of the island we have a railway extending about thirty or thirty-five miles from the strait of Canso to the St. Peter's canal. That railway is well known to the leader of the Government (Sir George Foster), who has possibly travelled over it. It is a good road so far as it goes, but it should be extended along the south coast of the island of Cape Breton to Louisburg, where it would connect with the railway of the Dominion Iron and Steel.

I am glad now that after many efforts we have the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) in the House listening to part of what I have to say in regard to this railway. I am pleased to tell the minister that it was the intention of the railway company that owns the road from the strait of Canso to St. Peter's to extend it to the harbour of Louisburg along the south coast of the island of Cape Breton, and that it was my pleasure, as a practising barrister, to purchase, on behalf of that company, magnificent terminals for that road on the site of the old town of Louisburg. If he will take in hand the extension of that road he will find owned by that company one of the most magnificent terminal sites on the whole of the Atlantic coast, and he will have the novelty and pleasure of knowing that in the lands which can readily be owned by the Government is the site of the old town and the old wharf that the French people owned when they owned the town of Louisburg. He will also find that foundation of that wharf, good and sound as ever it was, within the land which this company owns. The towns through which this road would run if extended along the south side of the island would be St. Peter's itself, l'Ardoise, Grand River, Forchou, Gabarus, Louisburg, Lorraine, Mainadieu and Mira bay. All of these towns are struggling along endeavouring to make a living at fishing, but they have no railway facilities. As I have pointed out before, it is impossible to give railway facilities to the two sides of this great island of Cape Breton simply by running a line through the middle, because the island, which is about 125 miles long by 90 miles wide, is cut into two parts by an arm of the sea and the St. Peter's canal. One can, therefore, understand that one line of railway running through the centre of that great stretch of country is not going to give proper accommodation, much less can it give good accommodation to the fishing industries along the coast. I am to-day merely supplementing what I said the other day, and I am merely reminding the minister now that he is in the House—I am sure he is a busy man and found it impossible to be here before—that he was sitting in this House when this resolution which I am about to read was accepted. Hon. Mr. Rogers, who was then Minister of Public Works, was leading this House, and he was the man who gave the word that the Government was accepting my resolution, but I clearly remember that the present Minister of Railways, who was then Minister of Customs if I remember correctly, was sitting in the House at that time. The resolution, which was moved by myself and which was accepted by the Government, reads:

> Mr. McKenzie moved that in the opinion of this House the time has arrived for the extension of the Intercolonial Railway of Canada into the non-railway sections of the Maritime Provinces within reasonable range of the said railway.

What I am now moving is this:

Be it therefore resolved that, in the opinion of this House, the proposals of the said Resolution of the 16th of March, A.D., 1914, should be carried forward to completion at the earliest possible date.

The railroad that I am talking about in the county of Victoria was practically started in 1911 along with several other lines of railway in Guysborough, Pictou and Halifax counties and other parts of eastern Nova Scotia: They were dropped with the promise that later on they would be taken up again. I trust that "later on" has arrived and that before long the Government will take such steps as may be necessary to carry out the proposition involved in my present resolution and the resolution which was accepted by the Government on the 16th March, 1914.

I trust I have made my position perfectly clear, also the position of the people of the island of Cape Breton, Guysborough and Inverness counties, of western Nova Scotia, as well as the sections of Quebec and New Brunswick particularly concerned in the scope and purpose of the resolution.

I do hope that the day is not far distant when the minister will be able to gladden the hearts of these old settlers who have been in this country, they and their forefathers, nearly two hundred years, and who have been looking from time to time for the benefits of railway extension. I trust the minister will have the satisfaction of feeling that he is the one who brought this great benefit to this very excellent class of Canadians, who have too long been left out in the cold, without the facilities which have been properly extended to other parts of Canada.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the hon. gentleman rises to a question of personal explanation, the debate is concluded.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

OPIUM AND COCAINE.

*MR. MOWAT:

1. Has the importation of opium derivates and cocaine into Canada during the last four years been abnormal?

2. Is it a fact that in the four fiscal years ending March 31, 1915, and the like period ending March 31, 1919, the following figures are approximately correct?

[Mr. McKenzie.]

	Importations. Quantity.		Amount.
	1915	1919	1915	1919
	Oz.	Oz.	$	$
Cocaine. . .	1,361	29,470	2,224	227,040
Morphine. . .	7,181	125,317	15,602	640,304
Crude Opium	21,818	63,898	105,566	823,512
	30,360	218,685	123,792	1,690,856

3. If not approximately correct, what are the facts?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. The importations of cocaine and morphine for the four year period ending March 31, 1919, are much in excess of those for the four years ending March 31, 1915. With respect to opium, however, the importations during the four years ending March 31, 1919, are not abnormal, as 139,645 pounds of opium were imported in the four year period ending March 31, 1911.

2. Yes, as to cocaine and morphine, but not as respects opium.

3. The importations during the two four-year periods were as follows:

	Quantity		Amount
	1915	1919	1915	1919
	Oz.	Oz.	$	$
Cocaine. . .	1,361	29,470	2,224	227,040
Morphine. . .	7,221	125,317	15,602	640,304
Crude opium	21,818 lb.	63,898 lb.	105,566	823,512

PUBLIC DEBT, EXPENDITURE, ETC.

On the question (Mr. McKenzie) respecting the public debt, annual expenditure, etc.:

Mr. McKENZIE: For some mysterious reason this question was dropped from the Order Paper the other day. It has reappeared, and I should like to get an answer as soon as possible. I notice a mistake in the first paragraph of the question. The year should be 1919 instead of 1917.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall see that the necessary correction is made.

Question stands.

CLASSIFICATION OF HOUSE OF COMMONS OFFICIALS.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (for Mr. Tobin) moved:

For a copy of all papers, correspondence, plans, schedules, drafts of classification, and all other documents respecting the re-classification of the House of Commons permanent employees of all grades, sent by any official of the House of Commons to the Board of Civil Service Commissioners, or to the experts engaged by the said board to re-classify the Civil Service of Canada.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the hon. member ask for a return giving the names of all the permanent employees in the public service?

Mr. ROBB: In the absence of my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Tobin), I moved the resolution just as it appears on the Order Paper.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I hardly like to accept the motion as it is, and I would ask that it stand until to-morrow. I will undertake to get any information that may reasonably be asked for, but I think this is hardly reasonable.

Motion stands.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

For a return showing all the Royal or other commissions to investigate and report on any matter, appointed by the Government since October, 1911, giving the following tabulated particulars in detail:—

(a) Date of Order in Council or other authorization.

(b) Names and post office addresses of commissioner or commissioners.

(c) Purpose for which same was appointed.

(d) Number of days in session.

(e) Outlay on the part of the Government as payment or allowance to the commissioner or commissioners.

(f) All other expenditure for witness fees, travelling expenses, printing, typing and disbursements of every description in the case of each such commission or investigation.

(g) Date of official report.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD.

On motion of Sir George Foster, the House returned to the order of Motions:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I believe it was understood that I would make a statement on the third reading of the Bill that passed to-day with reference to the Canadian Wheat Board's extension of powers. I intended to make some explanation in regard to the charge of 15 cents, which has been the subject of some discussion in the House. As the Bill slipped through without my having made that explanation, possibly the House will receive it now. There was another question as to whether wheat, bran and shorts were limited to maximum prices or not. I shall answer the second question first. An agreement exists between the Canadian Wheat Board and the millers. At the time of the first meeting of the board the millers applied for an advance on the price of flour. They urged the increased cost of consumption, and asked for fifteen cents a barrel in advance.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the date of the first meeting?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The date of the first meeting was about the middle of August.

Mr. McKENZIE: I mean the date at which the millers made that demand?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I understand it was at the first meeting of the Wheat Board. An agreement was made, and still exists, that the price of flour should not be advanced beyond the price which was current at that time. This runs to a maximum of $10.10 on flour milled from Ontario winter wheat, and $10.90 on flour milled from Manitoba hard and spring wheat. These prices are free on board track at Montreal, and the prices in other districts are based on the Montreal price, taking into consideration the railway differential. The statement has been made to me that these maximum prices have not in all cases been conserved, and that at the present time flour is being sold, owing to competition amongst millers, at considerably less than the maximum. As to bran and shorts, the prices agreed upon were $45 and $55 respectively, and no export was allowed except under permit; and for the major part of the time no export has taken place. Of late, however, the supply of bran and shorts seems to be larger than the demand in Canada, and the Wheat Board are giving permits for a certain amount of export to the United States.

With reference to the charge of 15 cents, this is not a tax, as it has been described in the House, and the reason will be apparent when we take into consideration the purpose of the Wheat Board and the two classes of purchase,—one for export by purchasers, say, in the Old Country, and the other for domestic use by purchasers in Canada. The price was fixed at $2.15, based on Fort William, and at the end of the transaction the price over and above that which was obtained, after cost and charges had been deducted, was to be divided amongst the principal sellers. So that the farmer gets at once, as regards the basic price, $2.15 less carrying charges and commissions which are common under all systems of conducting the grain trade. He will receive at the close of the transaction a certain amount, greater or less, from the sum remaining from the total sale of our Canadian wheat at World prices. That portion of the wheat which is sold for domestic use must also bring to the farmer the market price. It does not go across the seas. It is consumed in Canada, and consequently the prices paid by the miller must cover, as nearly as the Wheat Board can estimate it or arrange it, the full market price. So that the price fixed for millers was $2.30; that is the basic price. When the miller buys from the dealer he pays that sum. The sum of $2.15 has already been paid by the dealer to the farmer, and the miller is therefore not allowed to pay the other 15 cents of the $2.30 to the dealer for that would make a profit to the dealer. That 15 cents is returned to the Wheat Board and put into the pool, so to speak, and is therefore a counterpart of the extra price which will be received from the sum of the export grain to the purchasers in Europe. The House can easily see that unless there is something of that kind the farmer does not get the world market price for his wheat. The miller, therefore, having to pay the $2.30, fifteen cents of which goes into the Canadian Wheat Board for the purposes which I have explained, there must be supervision and control to prevent that portion of the wheat, or any considerable part of it, which proceeds from the farmer's hands directly into the hands of the millers from not getting its increase along the line of the world's market or the world's price. As I have stated, it is so arranged that fifteen cents of the $2.30 that the miller pays goes into the fund of the Canadian Wheat Board. Now there are millers who conduct customs milling as well as outright milling—that is they take in grists from the farmers in their localities as well as buy wheat for general milling purposes—and in those cases it is impossible to make a difference between the two. Otherwise there would be imposition and the farmer would not realize the amount which is his due. So that with reference to the customs miller altogether, or the customs miller who carries on customs work along with his general milling, the precaution has to be taken that the fifteen cents over and above the fixed price to the farmer goes into the fund of the Canadian Wheat Board. If the smaller miller simply grists the load that is brought to his mill by the farmer, and for the purposes of that farmer's own consumption, the board, as far as possible are trying to carry out their work so that they shall not interfere with that. But it would be manifestly unfair to allow the custom miller to grist the grain which afterwards in the shape of flour went into the general sale of the country without the payment of the full market price. Such impositions were attempted, and the fifteen cents payment is designed by the board to prevent that imposition. Special committees have been appointed in Ontario and Quebec to carry out the rule of the board with the least possible dissatisfaction and trouble to the small farmer who grists his grain, or gets his grain gristed, for the purpose of home consumption. In carrying out a general rule you may find that it is troublesome to parties who do not intend really to break it; but in this respect the Canadian Wheat Board are doing the best they can to reduce that trouble to a minimum.

In the case of the seller for export, when the fifteen cents is paid into the Canadian Wheat Board a participation ticket is to be given to the producer or seller and that certificate is his warrant after it has been registered by the board for claim to his share of the surplus that may be left. Where the miller does custom milling, and this safeguard is necessary to prevent imposition, a participation ticket or certificate is also given in that case so that the seller or the grister of the grain will ultimately receive, just the same as the original seller for export, his share of what remains in the pool. This is a somewhat lengthy explanation, but I can quite see by the intelligent appreciation of my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) that it has gone right to his heart.

Mr. McMASTER: Do I understand that the farmer—let us say in the Eastern townships where the farmers are very intelligent—who goes to the mill and gets, for instance, ten bushels of wheat ground into flour for his own personal use, pays the fifteen cents, and that he will have a right to a refund from this pool? Am I right in that understanding?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Well, partly right—right in essence, I think. Really it is the miller who has to pay that fifteen cents; he pays a set price and the farmer must get that—the set price for export. He pays fifteen cents over that set price—that is $2.30—and he must see that fifteen cents gets into the fund of the wheat board. In that case, if he exacts payment from the farmer then the farmer gets his participation ticket and has his recourse in the end to the pool. But I want to say one word more: Where it is a bona fide case of small gristing on the part of the farmer the purpose of the committee is to make the thing as easy as possible.

Mr. PROULX: If the miller does not buy wheat from the farmer but only grists it, does he charge that farmer fifteen cents and put it into the pool?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No. He pays a certain amount, which is $2.30 on the basic price. But whatever the basic price is, fifteen cents of it goes into the pool. Then the farmer gets his participation ticket.

Mr. PROULX: But in most cases there is no sale; A farmer goes to the grist mill with a load of wheat and gets it gristed. Then he receives back his flour and the offal less the toll?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. PROULX: In that case would the farmer have to pay fifteen cents per bushel to the miller and would the miller put that sum into the pool ?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The farmer has not, by the order of the board, to pay any fifteen cents. The miller has to pay his price, and of that price he has to see that fifteen cents goes into the pool. Now the miller in many cases, in some cases, is simply a buyer although he grists the farmer's wheat—that is, he takes and mills it and gives a certain amount of flour back. But he retains the bran and the shorts, and these go into the market and in competition. Now it would be manifestly unfair if he should be allowed to do that without the extra payment.

Mr. VIEN: Does the minister contend that the miller is going to pay fifteen cents a bushel to the fund, or to the pool as the minister calls it, without being repaid by the farmer who brings his wheat to be gristed ?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That rests between the farmer and the miller.

Mr. ROBB: The Acting Prime Minister has made a statement which he intended to submit on the third reading, so I presume it is not out of order for me to speak now.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Any debate on the statement of the Acting Prime Minister would be out of order. With the unanimous consent of the House, the hon. member could reply to the statement, but not otherwise.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will be very glad to answer so far as I can any questions that may be asked.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: A debate would not be in order without unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to point out that the minister (Sir George Foster) made a very carefully prepared statement from the point of view that the millers throughout the country are running their business along the same line as is the Government—with a surplus of clerks to do a lot of work that is quite unnecessary—and in answer to my contention that for many years the business of the companies has been carried on satisfactorily to their customers. Notwithstanding the explanation of my right hon. friend, the fact remains that he has made the custom millers the collectors of a tax of from 68 to 75 cents a barrel on the farmer's own product ground for the use of his family. He cannot get away from that. I do not wish to abuse the permission given and to initiate a debate along these lines, but I do wish to point out that the right hon. gentleman made the statement that the millers had asked for an increased price on flour, which was refused by the Wheat Board. That is quite correct so far as it goes. But there was something more connected with it. The millers did ask for an increased price on flour for export, not for the domestic trade, and they pointed out to the board that they had to make a certain profit out of the wheat. Seventy per cent of the product of a bushel of wheat goes into flour, thirty per cent into bran and shorts; and the millers pointed out that it was better in the interests of Canada that we should have a higher price for our export flour so that they would be able to sell bran and shorts to the dairymen of this country at a lower price; but this was refused by the Wheat Board.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My information is that the increased price was asked on all flour.

Mr. ROBB: Well, my understanding is that it was only for export. But nevertheless, in connection with that, it was pointed out that if there was an increased price for flour, there would be a corresponding reduction in the price of bran and shorts.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM.

DOCUMENTS LAID ON THE TABLE BY HON. MR. MEIGHEN.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay on the Table the correspondence that passed in connection with the negotiations resulting in the final understanding as to the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway. The House will observe when the correspondence goes on the Table that it contains four or five cables that passed prior to the letter of 11th July, 1918, which was intended to be an official summary of the negotiations. These preliminary cables were of a confidential character and were so marked, but for the reason that the first cable is referred to by Sir Alfred Smithers in his reply to the official letter of 11th July, it was thought well that these cables should be given to the House as well. Consequently, although of that character, and although indeed following verbal conversations between representatives of the company and the Government, they are none the less now made public.

I also lay on the Table certain memoranda, being in the nature of statements and information relative to the Grand Trunk Railway System. That the House may have an idea at the outset of the character of the data now furnished, I will detail briefly the contents of this document. On the first page is a summary from which hon. members will be easily able to turn to whatever specific information they require. Then follow in order: A historical account of the system; the territory covered and the districts served; the mileage, a table of mileage in Canada and the United States and of subsidiary tracks (with map reference numbers); mileage and local relations of companies (with map reference numbers); balance sheet of the Grand Trunk Railway to December 31st, 1918, in sterling; balance sheet of the Grand Trunk Railway to December 31st, 1918, in dollars; capitalization December 31st, 1917, Grand Trunk Railway in dollars; funded debt Grand Trunk Pacific fixed charges, whose guarantee and months interest due as at December 31st, 1918; Grand Trunk Pacific Railway branch lines company balance sheet; earnings and expenses Grand Trunk Railway six months, 1919; income account Grand Trunk Railway, 1912 to 1918, in dollars; revenues combined Grand Trunk Railway System without Grand Trunk Pacific for 1917; income account Grand Trunk Pacific; traffic statistics Grand Trunk Railway; guarantees by Grand Trunk Railway; dates of maturities short term paper Grand Trunk Railway; deficits Central Vermont and income cost of Atlantic and St. Lawrence Railway; deficits Western American companies; dividends paid; voting power of stocks; maps of the Grand Trunk Railway System in the East and of the Grand Trunk Pacific System. The brief summary thus given is extended in more detail on the next page, but that I do not need to recapitulate now. This information is furnished by the Government officials upon sworn statements and annual reports of the company itself.

I desire to move:

That four hundred copies of the two sets of papers now laid upon the Table be forthwith printed in the English language, that two hundred copies be forthwith printed in the French language, and that Rule 74 in relation thereto be suspended.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbiniere): May I ask the minister if in the traffic statistics now given a distinction is made as to traffic originating in the United States and as to that originating in Canada? If there is no such distinction, can it not be furnished?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that, generally speaking, the distinction that the hon. member asks for can be drawn from the traffic statement.

Mr. JEAN J. DENIS (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, the documents just deposited by the minister are part of the information which I was seeking. I do not think it would be fair for the House to be called upon to examine the resolution in Committee of the Whole before we have been handed printed copies of these documents according to the motion that has just been passed. Moreover, it appears to me that at least twenty-four hours should be given hon. members to become acquainted to a certain extent with the contents of these documents before we begin discussing the motion. I hope we may have the declaration of the minister that we shall not be called upon to discuss this matter until the documents have been printed and we have had at least twenty-four hours within which to consider them.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: This question is not relevant to the motion now before the House. The question could be asked upon the motion for adjournment in connection with an inquiry as to the business which is to be taken up to-morrow; by unanimous consent the answer could be given immediately.

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: As to proceeding with the resolution, it will be realized in a moment that the fundamental features of the resolution can be fully discussed without the mastering of all the detail which is set forth in the data now furnished. At the same time, the House will not be asked to come to a final conclusion as to the terms until there has been opportunity for study of the details. But we would be foolish, I think, to waste time, unless there is other business that the House can do, by discussing such features as are now well known and as have, indeed, been before the country for about twenty months.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Sir George Foster the House adjourned at 5.30 p.m.

Wednesday, October 15, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BOARD OF COMMERCE—VICE-CHAIRMAN'S STATEMENT.

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. Has the Government asked for an explanation or statement from the Board of Commerce regarding the statement alleged to have been made by W. F. O'Connor, vice-chairman of the board, at Hamilton on September 16, published in the Toronto Globe and other papers on September 17, as follows:

"This is not the time for an increase in prices. Prices should go down from now on. In this connection I wish to announce now that all vendors from the farmer who increase the price on milk or anything else will be guilty of an indictable offence punishable by a fine of $1,000 and two years' imprisonment."

2. If so, what explanation or statement has been given?

3. If not, is it the intention of the Government to ask for one?

4. Did W. F. O'Connor, vice-chairman of the Board of Commerce, on or about September 16 issue a ruling, order or injunction regarding the price of milk?

5. If so, did such ruling, order or injunction have the concurrence of the other members of the board?

6. Did this apply to the whole of Canada, or to some particular part or portion thereof?

7. Is same still in force or effect?

8. If not, when was it repealed?

9. If repealed, what is the condition or situaton at present in so far as the ruling, order or injunction of the board applies to the milk producers of any portion or province of the Dominion of Canada?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. The Government has not asked for an explanation or statement as referred to, as this seems to have been simply a warning of the commissioner with an indication of possible penalties for disobeying orders that may be passed by the board.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

4. Mr. O'Connor, the vice-chairman of the Board of Commerce, did on September 16, 1919, issue a ruling regarding the price of milk, in which it was ordered as follows:

"Upon representation and proof made to the board that certain producers and vendors of the above mentioned commodities within the above named province purpose demanding and exacting from their vendees within such province, enhanced prices upon the sale of such commodities, and

"In pursuance and under authority of the provisions of the Combines and Fair Prices Act 1919, and of a certain order of the board made at Winnipeg, Manitoba, the fourteenth day of September, 1919, whereby the commissioner above-named is vested, in addition to his general and other special powers, with power to make, sign and issue for and on behalf of the board this order, in the terms hereof—

"It is ordered that the Wentworth Milk Dealers Association, the members whereof trade principally within the city of Hamilton; the Model Dairy, which trades principally within the city of Guelph; the Toronto Milk and Cream Producers Association, the members whereof trade principally within the city of Toronto; the City Dairy, Limited, and the Farmers' Dairy Company, Limited, which companies, firms or associations trade principally within the said city of Toronto, and all other companies, firms and associations which produce or trade in, or the members whereof produce or trade in either of said commodities, within said province of Ontario, and the officers, directors, members, managers, clerks, servants and employees of any of such or indicated associations, companies or firms, and all persons whomsoever who may produce or sell, whether as principals or as agents, and whether by retail or wholesale or otherwise, within said province either of said commodities, are restrained, enjoined and prohibited from selling or offering for sale and from further continuing to sell or to offer for sale to any association, company or person either of said commodities and from combining or agreeing, any one of them with any other or others of them, to sell or to offer for sale or to further continue to offer for sale, either of said commodities at sale prices greater than those whereat such associations, companies, firms or persons customarily sold or offered for sale said commodities respectively, on the fourteenth day of September 1919, until the further order of this board to be made within forty days after said fourteenth day of September, 1919.

"And it is further ordered that any sale made in contravention of this order shall be deemed one made for an unreasonable and unjust price."

5 and 6. Answered by No. 4.

7. On September 26 the following order was passed, the Chief Commissioner and Mr. O'Connor being present:

"In the matter of milk prices in portions of Ontario.

"Upon reading the order made by the board herein on the sixteenth day of September, 1919, and upon hearing the various parties concerned and it appearing that with regard to the city of Toronto an arrangement has been made, by means of a representative local committee as follows:

That for the period of two months ending 30th November, 1919, the wholesale price of $3.10 per 8 gallon can of milk delivered at the dairy in Toronto may be made, and that the retail distribution price for that period may be thirteen pint tickets for one dollar.

The board therefore orders that said prices shall not be deemed unfair or to include excessive profits, but reserves the right to declare that any higher price shall be excessive.

That after the 30th day of November, 1919, application may be made for a declaration that the price is then unfair at which time may be considered inter alia the then prices of animal feed and other costs entering into milk production.

That the injunction contained in the said recited order be and it is hereby dissolved.

That any person may at any time apply to this board by way of complaint against milk prices elsewhere in Ontario notwithstanding this order or the dissolution of the said injunction."

8 and 9. Answered by No. 7.

AMNESTY TO M.S.A. DEFAULTERS.

*Mr. ETHIER:

1. Since the 18th day of September last, did the Honourable Secretary of State for the Dominion receive a copy of a resolution, adopted by the city of Montreal, on the 8th of September last, concerning an amnesty in favour of those who failed to comply with the Military Service Act?

2. If so, what steps have been taken by the Government in this connection?

3. Does the Government approve or disapprove such resolution?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. A copy of such a resolution was received by the Government. It was in the nature of a request to H. R. H. the Prince of Wales. No action was taken upon it.

2. No steps have been taken by the Government in this connection.

3. The Government neither approves nor disapproves of such resolution.

[Mr. Doherty.]

STATUS OF CANADIANS IN IMPERIAL FORCES.

Mr. DEMERS:

Does the Government intend to take the necessary steps to insure that British subjects naturalized in Canada who, when war was declared, enlisted in their native country, and who returned to Canada after being demobilized, shall receive the same treatment as if they had enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Force?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN: It is understood this matter is receiving the attention of a special Committee of the House.

KING AND QUEEN OF BELGIUM.

*Mr. LAVIGUEUR:

1. Has an invitation to visit Canada been extended by the Government to Their Majesties the King and Queen of Belgium, and their son, Prince Leopold, actually in the United States?

2. If not, is it the intention of the Government to invite the heroic sovereigns, who are now the guests of the American Government, to come to Canada?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: An invitation has been extended to Their Majesties the King and Queen of Belgium, but a formal and definite answer has not yet been received from them.

CAR SHORTAGE.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR:

1. Is the Honourable the Minister of Railways aware of the fact that the lumber trade is suffering from a great scarcity of cars owing to the fact that more than 44,000 Canadian cars are withheld in the United States against 23,350 American cars on the Canadian lines?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to fix at $5 per day the duty now of 70 cents that the railway companies are obliged to pay for every car on their line belonging to other companies?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. According to statement issued by Canadian Railway War Board on October 2, 1919, there was a total of 59,671 Canadian owned freight cars in United States, and a total of 38,069 United States owned freight cars in Canada, the excess of cars in United States being 21,602. Included in the above there were 44,019 Canadian owned box cars in United States and 20,650 United States owned box cars in Canada; the difference in this case being 23,369. We have received very few complaints about shortage of cars for lumber shipments to points within the Dominion, or for export overseas, but it has been found impossible to secure an adequate supply of United States owned cars to take care of shipments of lumber, pulp and paper from Canadian to United States points. It is impracticable to furnish Canadian owned cars freely for such traffic inasmuch as the cars are not promptly returned to Canada, and such action would immediately result in producing a shortage of cars for Canadian internal traffic. The Minister of Railways has taken the matter up with the authorities at Washington and every effort possible has been made to secure a balance of equipment.

2. The standard per diem or car rental charged by one railway to another for the use of freight cars, is at the present time sixty (60c.) cents, per day, per car, this rate being established by the American Railway Association, and we are not aware of any proposal to change the rate, neither would a change in rate materially effect the question referred to.

CANADIAN OFFICIAL RECORD.

Mr. DUFF:

1. When was the Canadian Official Record first published?
2. When did its publication cease?
3. What was the total cost to the country of the Canadian Official Record, including salaries paid?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. October 1, 1918.
2. August 28, 1919.
3. $40,134.36.

DR. A. T. SHILLINGTON.

Mr. DUFF:

1. Was Dr. A. T. Shillington, of Ottawa, engaged in any service overseas during the war?
2. If so, what duties did he perform, and how much per day was he paid?
3. Up to the present time, what amount has been paid to Dr. Shillngton?
4. Has his pay ceased, or is he still on the pay roll?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Yes; proceeded overseas with the 1st Contingent.

2. (a) On the strength of No. 2 Stationary Hospital, France; Assistant Director of Medical Services, Bramshott; Transferred to office of Director of Medical Services, London; Assistant Director of Medical Services, Canadian Training Depot, Shorncliffe; Officer Commanding Kitchener Military Hospital, Brighton; Returned to Canada September 10, 1917.

(b) Pay and allowances of his rank, viz., $6.25 per diem.

3. Up to the present time, the amount paid to Dr. Shillington is $13,379.82, including $1,503,75 War Service Gratuity; and also $2,430 Separation Allowance.

4. Pay ceased December 23, 1917, and this officer is not now on the pay-roll.

DREDGING AT LANORAIE.

Mr. GERVAIS:

What was the cost of the dredging work executed during the summer of 1912 at Lanoraie, county of Berthier?

Hon. Mr. SIFTON: $4,949.40 for dredging and $144 for inspection.

TANLAC PATENT MEDICINE.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

Is it the intention of the Government or the Department of Public Health to order an analysis of the patent medicine called Tanlac, so as to ascertain if it contains 16.4 per cent alcohol?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: An Advisory Board has been appointed by the Government to comply with the requirements of the "Act to amend the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act," Chapter 66, 9-10, George V, passed last session and it is the intention of the Government to ask this board to report on Tanlac.

CANADIAN FISH IN ENGLAND.

Mr. DUFF:

1. Is it a fact that a large quantity of fresh or frozen fish, owned by the Canadian Government, was given away free of charge to the populace of London, England?
2. If so, what was the quantity in pounds so given away?
3. What did said fish cost the Canadian Government?
4. Why was this fish not sold to the highest bidder or bidders, and the proceeds paid over to the Receiver General of Canada?
5. If the said fish could not be sold, why was it not brought back to Canada in steamers containing refrigerator compartments, and distributed free to the Canadian people?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN: This information is not available in Canada, but a cable is being sent overseas for the same.

MR. FRANK YEIGH.

Mr. DUFF:

1. Was Mr. Frank Yeigh, of Toronto, employed by the President of the Privy Council in the Department of Public Information or in some other branch under the minister's direction?
2. If so, what were Mr. Yeigh's duties and salary?
3. Was Mr. Yeigh so employed in February, 1918?
4. While so employed in February, 1918, did Mr. Yeigh attend the Sportman's dinner of the Canadian Camp at New York?
5. How much was paid out of the public treasury for Mr. Yeigh's trip? Has the amount so paid been returned to the public treasury, or has any demand for its return been made?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Mr. Yeigh was employed in the Department of Public Information which is under the President of the Council.

2. Secretary and travelling organizer, War Lecture Bureau, $300 per month.
3. Yes.
4. The Government has no information.
5. Nothing.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. BURNHAM:

1. What is the share of the Canadian Expeditionary Force in the $30,000,000 canteen profits of the British Expeditionary Force now being dispensed by Sir Julian Byng for the benefit of the British soldier?
2. What has become of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, the Y.M.C.A., and other canteen profits arising from all sources in the Canadian Expeditionary Force?
3. What are the amounts of those profits respectively?
4. Has any one been appointed to see that canteens within C. E. F. areas at which the Canadian soldiers made purchases shall hand over their profits for the benefit of the Canadian soldier?

TEMPERANCE LEGISLATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct the attention of the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Doherty) to the fact that two important Bills on the Order Paper, namely, Bill No. 26, an Act to amend the Canada Temperance Act, and Bill No. 27, an Act to amend an Act in aid of provincial legislation prohibiting or restricting the sale or use of intoxicating liquors, were in line for moving forward yesterday. Can the Minister of Justice inform us if there is any good reason why these Bills were not then taken up? We had plenty of time and could very well have devoted it to a consideration of these measures.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I did not happen to be in the House yesterday at the adjournment. Replying to the hon. gentleman's question—I do not know that there is any good reason, except that there are good reasons always for what this Government does and for what it refrains from doing.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM.

RESOLUTION RESPECTING ITS ACQUISITION BY THE GOVERNMENT.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Whereas the present capital stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, consists of the following:—

[Mr. Rowell.]

Four per cent (4%) guaranteed stock	£12,500,000
First preference five per cent (5%) stock	3,420,000
Second preference five per cent (5%) stock	2,53,000
Third preference four per cent (4%) stock	7,168,055
Common stock	23,955,437
	£49,573,492

And whereas the present outstanding debenture stocks of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada consisting of:—

Five per cent (5%) Grand Trunk debenture stock	£ 4,270,375
Five per cent (5%) Great Western debenture stock	2,723,080
Four per cent (4%) Grand Trunk debenture stock	24,624,455
Four per cent (4%) Northern debenture stock	308,215

(herein after called the "present debenture stocks") are entitled to certain voting powers at meetings of shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada;

And whereas it is expedient that His Majesty should acquire the whole of the capital stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada except the four per cent (4%) guaranteed stock above referred to;

It is therefore resolved that it is expedient to provide as follows:—

1. That subject to the provisions of these resolutions His Majesty the King, represented by the Minister of Railways and Canals of Canada, acting under the authority of the Governor in Council (hereinafter called the "Government"), may enter into an agreement (hereinafter called the "said agreement") with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada (hereinafter called the "Grand Trunk") and with such other companies and interests as the Government may think necessary for the acquisition by the Government of the entire capital stock of the Grand Trunk, except the four per cent (4%) guaranteed stock of the Grand Trunk, amounting to £12,500,000, the latter being hereinafter called the "present guaranteed stock."

2. That the said agreement shall contain provisions for the defining of the companies, properties and interests, comprised in the Grand Trunk system, and, including the terms and provisions hereinafter set forth, may contain such other terms and conditions as the parties may agree upon.

3. That as part of the consideration for such acquisition the Government may agree to guarantee the payment of:—

(a) Dividends payable half yearly, at four per cent per annum, upon the present guaranteed stock;

(b) The interest upon the present debenture stocks as and when payable, in accordance with the terms thereof.

These guarantees to take effect upon the date of the appointment of the Committee of Management hereinafter mentioned.

(c) Dividends payable half yearly at four per cent per annum from the date of the appointment of the Committee of Management hereinafter provided for, upon an issue which is hereby authorized by the Grand Trunk under the terms of the said agreement of non-voting capital stock (hereinafter called the "new guaranteed stock"), not exceeding the amount determined by the Board of Arbitrators, as hereinafter set forth.

Provided that concurrently with such guarantee of dividends and interest upon the present guaranteed stock, and the present debenture stock, respectively, the voting powers at meetings of shareholders of the Grand Trunk now vested in or exercisable by the holders of the said stocks respectively shall cease and determine absolutely.

4. That the present guaranteed stock and the new guaranteed stock or any part thereof may be called in or redeemed by the Government, at par, at any time after thirty years from the date of the appointment of the said Committee of Management on six months' notice, by advertisement, to the holders thereof.

5. That the value, if any, of the first, second and their preference stocks and the common or ordinary stock of the Grand Trunk now issued and outstanding to the face values above mentioned (hereinafter together called the "preference and common stock"), shall be determined by a board of three arbitrators, one to be appointed by the Government, one by the Grand Trunk, and the third by the two so appointed, or, failing agreement, by judges to be designated in the said agreement. New guaranteed stock, to an amount not exceeding the value, if any, so determined, carrying a dividend as hereinbefore authorized shall be distributed among the holders of the preference and common stock, upon the transfer to or vesting in the Government of such stock, in proportions which shall be determined by the arbitrators.

6. That as soon as said agreement has been ratified by a majority of the holders of the stocks enumerated in the preamble to these resolutions present in person or by proxy and voting at a special general meeting of such stockholders duly called for the purpose of considering such agreement;

(a) A Committee of Management shall be formed consisting of five persons, two to be appointed by the Grand Trunk, two by the Government, and the fifth by the four so appointed, to insure the operation of the Grand Trunk system (in so far as it is possible so to do), in harmony with the Canadian National railways, the two systems being treated in the public interest as nearly as possible as one system. The committee shall continue to act until the preference and common stocks are transferred to or vested in the Government, when it shall be discharged.

(b) The books, minutes, reports, documents and other records, and all the railways and properties of the companies comprised in the Grand Trunk system, shall at all times be accessible and open to inspection and examination by any person or persons named by the Minister of Railways and Canals of Canada, or by the Board of Arbitrators; and all proper aid and assistance shall, on request, be rendered to such person or persons by the Committee of Management and by the officers and employees of the Grand Trunk and its allied companies, including the making and giving of extracts, copies and statements.

7. That the Government may lend to the said Committee of Managament, upon the notes or other obligations of the Grand Trunk, such sums as the Government may from time to time deem necessary for the carrying on of the operation or improvement of the Grand Trunk system.

8. That the said agreement shall provide, among other necessary and usual provisions for:—

(a) The appointment of the arbitrators, the control of the arbitration proceedings, the administration of oaths, the procuring and admission of evidence, and the making of the award;

(b) The transfer to or vesting in the Government or its nominees of the preference and common stock upon the issue of new guaranteed stock in exchange therefor;

(c) The resignation or vacating the offices of the Board of Directors of the Grand Trunk and of each company comprised in the Grand Trunk system upon the preference and common stock being transferred to or vested in the Government.

(d) The entrusting to the said Committee of Management by the Minister of Railways and Canals as Receiver of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system, on terms to be approved by the Governor in Council, of the exercise of such of his powers as Receiver as the Governor in Council may deem requisite in order that the operation and management of the said Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system may be conducted in harmony with the operation of other railways and properties under the control of the said committee.

(e) The continuation and administration of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada Superannuation and Provident Fund Association, the Grand Trunk Pension Fund, and the Grand Trunk Railway Insurance and Provident Society, in accordance with the terms to be set forth in said agreement.

9. That the Government and the Grand Trunk, and each company comprised in the Grand Trunk system, and all persons interested therein, be hereby respectively authorized to enter into the said agreement upon and subject to the terms herein set forth, and to do and perform all such acts and things as may be deemed necessary to observe, perform and comply fully with the terms and conditions of said agreement.

10. That any orders of the Governor in Council which the Government may deem requisite to vest in the Government, any of the preference or common stocks not transferred to the Government or its nominees under the terms of these resolutions, or requisite to vacate any office of director, or otherwise to carry into effect the terms and provisions of the said agreement may be made and passed with the effect specified in any such Order in Council.

11. That upon the transfer to or vesting in the Government of the preference and common stock as herein provided for, the Government may, by Order in Council, provide for the discharge of the receivership of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system and the termination and withdrawal of the proceedings in the Exchequer Court of Canada relating thereto.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DEVLIN: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister—

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is not debatable. Of course, if hon. members desire that a vote be taken on the motion, that would be quite in order. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The House then divided on the motion of Hon. Mr. Reid, which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. SPEAKER: Under our rule, a vote once given must stand.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee on the resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals) said: Before asking the Committee to pass this resolution which stands in my name, I wish to make a few statements in regard to the railway situation. Let me first say that the statement made by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen), on Friday last, explains fully the negotiations which took place in connection with taking over the Grand Trunk railway. The resolution which is now submitted to the Committee contains the Bill which I will introduce on the passing of the resolution. It may be well for me to state what has led up to the present position and the decision to take over the Grand Trunk Railway system.

The Committee will remember that the Grand Trunk Railway Company, under the management of the late Charles M. Hays, decided in the year 1903 that the Grand Trunk Railway Company, in order that it might be able to compete on an equal basis with the Canadian Pacific railway, must extend their line into the territory of the Great Northwest. Accordingly, they applied to Parliament for and received a charter to build a railway from Winnipeg to the British Columbia coast. The Government of the day decided that they would construct a road from Winnipeg to Moncton and hand it over to the Grand Trunk Railway Company by way of lease. The facts in connection with this transaction have been discussed so often in the House that I do not intend going into any further details except to say this, that on the completion of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and the Transcontinental railway, the Grand Trunk Railway system, or what is known as the old Grand Trunk Railway Company, held themselves responsible for the cost of operation and all liabilities that might be incurred in connection therewith. They refused to take over the Transcontinental between Winnipeg and Moncton, and the Government have been operating that railway since its completion at an annual loss of several millions of dollars.

On the completion of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk Railway Company became responsible for the operation and fixed charges of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Grand Trunk Railway Company on February 1 last refused to continue paying interest on bonds guaranteed by them, and accordingly the road had to go into the hands of a receiver. Let us see what assistance the Government of Canada had given to them up to that date over and above the original agreement that was made in connection with this railway. These are the items:

1 year—1909—	loan	$10,000,000
1913	"	15,000,000
1914	"	6,000,000
1914	further guarantee	16,000,000	of their bonds
1916	loan	8,000,000
1917	"	7,500,000

It will thus be seen that a total of $70,000,000 has been advanced to the Grand Trunk Pacific railway.

Of course, mortgages were taken on the road, but what good was that security if the road was losing money? Was it not better either to take over the road, or make some disposition of it that would stop further enormous yearly losses such as I have mentioned?

Why did the Government advance these loans to the Grand Trunk Pacific? It was because they believed it would be a national calamity to create a financial crisis while the war was on, and that so long as the road was able to meet or nearly to meet operating expenses it was better to defer final action until the war was over or the end in sight. However, when the Government decided that they would not consider any further advances to the Grand Trunk Pacific the whole railway question had to be considered. It was decided that the Grand Trunk Pacific should be operated under the direction of a receiver. The falling of the Grand Trunk Pacific into the hands of a receiver made the Grand Trunk system directly responsible for the securities guaranteed by them in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. It was impossible for the Government to assume the Grand Trunk Pacific liabilities and release the Grand Trunk Company from their obligations. There was no question what would happen if the Grand Trunk were compelled to meet the obligations they had guaranteed—they could not possibly meet them. For this reason the Grand Trunk Railway has been pressing that negotiations be continued until a final decision had been reached.

The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) has already given the final results of the negotiations, and I wish now to refer a little more particularly to the position in which the Government will be placed. When the Grand Trunk system is controlled by and included in the Canadian National Railway system we will have the following mileage owned, operated, and controlled by the Dominion Government: Grand Trunk Railway system, 5,357 miles; Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system, 2,816 miles; Canadian Northern Railway system, about 10,000 miles; Transcontinental Railway system, 1,810 miles; Intercolonial Railway and branch lines attached thereto, 1,800 miles; or a total of 21,783 miles. That is, 22,000 miles, in round numbers, will be owned and operated by the Government of Canada. That constitutes the largest railway system owned or controlled by any one corporation on the American continent.

It has always been practically understood by the people of Canada that if we wish to have a transcontinental system that could be operated economically and on a basis similar or equal to that of its great competitor, the Canadian Pacific Railway system, it was necessary that the Canadian Northern Railway system, being practically a western railway system, should be joined up with the Grand Trunk system, which was an Eastern Canada railway system, and the two together would make a complete and economical system. The Canadian Northern Railway system having all its main lines and branch lines in the four western provinces, and the Grand Trunk system having all its lines and branch lines in Ontario and Quebec, the two together could be operated economically and would assist each other by interchange of traffic. Having taken over the Canadian Northern Railway system the Government was in this position: They had a splendid western railway system with a line from Port Arthur to Montreal and Quebec without any branch lines, feeders or terminals from the great provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and they were unable to gather freight in Eastern Canada to pay its operating charges.

Now let me say what the Government must provide for its present railway system if we do not take over the Grand Trunk railway. The Government, and that means the people of Canada, must spend within the next three, four or five years an amount of at least one hundred million dollars, and any amount between that and two hundred million dollars for providing terminal facilities, branch lines and connections with other roads in the eastern provinces, and when that was done they would still have as competitors not only the Canadian Pacific railway, but also the Grand Trunk railway. Now, if the country must supply at least one hundred million dollars to provide terminals and branch lines and connections for its present system that would not be necessary if we took the Grand Trunk railway over, may I ask is it not in the interest of all concerned that we save spending that hundred million dollars, and save the interest on the same, which would probably be five and one-half million dollars, and save also the extra expense in operation and duplication of lines and terminals?

I notice that some of the newspapers take the position that an additional liability of about twelve million dollars will be added to our railway losses if we take over the Grand Trunk Railway system. They are wrong in coming to that conclusion, and I hope they will correct the error and place the matter properly before the public. It is true the Grand Trunk Railway system have the following interest bearing first-charge stocks:

5%	G. T. Debenture Stock	£ 4,270,375
5%	Great Western "	2,723,080
4%	G. T. "	24,624,455
4%	Northern "	408,215
	Total	£32,026,125

The total interest on this would amount to about seven million dollars per annum.

Honourable members will note that the issues I have mentioned are the original debentures in connection with the building of the Grand Trunk and the taking over of the Great West railways. The Grand Trunk always earned this interest of $7,000,000. In addition to that there is the guaranteed stock, £12,500,000. The interest on this is equal to about two and one-half million dollars. The interest on this has also always been earned and paid, no default ever occurring in these several issues just mentioned.

Therefore the seven millions of dollars that I have mentioned and the two and one-half millions of dollars interest on debenture and guaranteed stock, the Grand Trunk Railway system during the whole time of operation were not only able to pay, but in addition to that they always had an amount over and above this for distribution among shareholders of other later issues of stocks; and they were able to pay, if not all, a portion of the dividends on the additional securities outstanding other than those mentioned, which are as follows:

1st Preference Stock 5%	£3,420,000
2nd Preference Stock 5%	2,530,000
3rd Preference Stock 4%	7,168,055

On these three stocks the profits distributed between them and over and above the fixed charges on the debenture stock and guaranteed stock averaged during the last ten years, prior to the war, an amount equal to about one million dollars per annum. So that I say in taking over the Grand Trunk Railway Company, the Government may become responsible for, in round numbers, some twelve millions of dollars, interest charges, annually. It will not, in my opinion, incur a liability because the Grand Trunk system has always earned those amounts in the past and will be in a better position to do so in the future when joined up with the Canadian Government National system, and in this I am backed up by railway experts. There is in addition the common stock, £23,955,436, on which no dividend or interest has been paid since the issue of same, and therefore I do not consider it of any material value other than for voting purposes.

Railway experts also say they feel that the saving in the cost of operation and the amount that will not now be required to be invested in terminal facilities, and on which interest would have to be paid annually, is one that should very materially assist in making both ends of the several railways meet that will now be connected as one railway system.

As I have now discussed the Canadian Government Railway system's position in connection with this matter, let me say a few words as to what position it puts the Grand Trunk bondholders and stockholders in. There is no doubt in my mind that the Grand Trunk railway would be compelled to carry on its operation without being able to pay one cent of interest on its debenture or any stock, if it had to continue and assume the liability of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system. The losses on that system must necessarily be for a number of years some five or six millions of dollars, and perhaps more. If the Grand Trunk has to pay this amount out of its earnings and maintain the Grand Trunk Pacific, I cannot see how the dividends that have been paid the Grand Trunk railway shareholders for so many years could be continued. However, in addition to that, with the Government owning such a large railway mileage system, a system almost equal to the Canadian Pacific railway, how could the old Grand Trunk railway with its much smaller system compete or expect to live with the competition from these two great companies and with no Western Canada connections? Surely it is to the advantage of the shareholders and debenture holders in England to be able from this time on, without any worry or anxiety, to know they will receive annual dividends they have enjoyed for so many years in the past.

I may say that when the arbitrators are considering the amount we should pay in connection with the taking over of the road they must consider the losses now being made by the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and its undertaking, and if they come to the conclusion that the Grand Trunk Pacific's future is not likely to be better than it is at the present, then it is altogether likely the arbitrators may not agree to pay the amount the Grand Trunk railway has been able to distribute among its shareholders in the past.

May I also add that, in my opinion, the contract for building the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and the Transcontinental railway was an arrangement between the Government of that date and the Grand Trunk Railway system. I was a member of the House at that time, and I remember well that the late Mr. Hays did not want to build the Transcontinental system. He did not want to build the road to British Columbia; he merely wanted connection with the wheat fields of Alberta and Saskatchewan. But the Government of that date insisted on the Transcontinental and British Columbia lines being built, and that was the cause of the Grand Trunk Railway system's failure to carry out to a successful conclusion the scheme originated by Mr. Hays. The arbitrators will no doubt take into consideration the fact of the Grand Trunk railway being the pioneer railway of Canada; and believing as I do that the people of Canada wish to deal generously with the Grand Trunk shareholders, they will not be too severe when making their award.

There is another matter I wish to mention in connection with this great railway undertaking. When these two railway systems are operated as one system it will be absolutely necessary for the Government to select a management and a staff of the best men that can be found no matter where they come from, to operate this whole new complete system; and those who are decided upon must assume this responsibility. Unless they have a free hand, unhampered by political interference, or by interference or pressure from the outside public, they cannot and will not make it a success.

There is only one ending and the people of Canada might as well know it now before we start the operation. The Canadian Pacific railway, its opponent, is one of the best managed railways in the world. It is operated on purely business principles. They will not tolerate interference, nor are they influenced by any individual. They will not allow any employee to remain on their staff unless he works in the interest of the railway, and does not allow himself to be influenced by any one. That is the way the Canadian National railways should be operated; and, so far as I am concerned, I have been carrying out that policy with the system we now have. I am pleased to be able to say that so far I have had very little interference or requests or suggestions, either from any member or from outside, to do other than carry out that policy with regard to our present system. I am afraid sometimes that a little outside influence is being used when I see certain questions on the Order Paper, the answers when given disclosing to our opponents information detrimental to our system. But when we get the Grand Trunk railway and add it to our present system then a policy of absolute confidence in management must be continued. Therefore, I appeal to every member of this House, as well as to every citizen of Canada, to assist the Government in carrying out the operation of this great railway, owned by the people of Canada, on the same basis as that of our Canadian Pacific Railway system.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Canadian Pacific Railway system is a great one. It has done great work for Canada, and the fact of the Government owning and operating a system equal to that of the Canadian Pacific railway should not in any way allow any influence, or advantage to be exercised against the Canadian Pacific Railway. The operation of this system must be put in the hands of men who must carry it out on the same lines as though it were a private corporation. They must compete for traffic. They must prove they are able to satisfy the public, and must not take improper advantage of any powers they might have by being owned and controlled by the Government of Canada. I believe there is plenty of room for the two systems, and plenty of room for them both to be prosperous; and all systems, whether private or Government-owned, will be under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners. No preference in any way will be given to the Government railway systems. There is no doubt the Canadian Pacific Railway are against the Government taking over the Grand Trunk Railway system. They were opposed to the Government taking over the Canadian Northern railway; and much greater will be their opposition to the Government taking over the Grand Trunk system. They fear this may lead eventually to complete public ownership of the railways in Canada. They no doubt realize and know the Government could not do otherwise than take over the Canadian Northern system, no private individual or individuals could take over the Canadian Northern under the conditions. They realize that no private individual or individuals could take over the Grand Trunk Pacific and realize the Grand Trunk railway can do nothing other than join up with the Canadian Government system.

The only other alternative would be to hand all our presently owned Government railways to the Canadian Pacific, and I do not believe for one moment the people of Canada would stand any such suggestion. During the war the three Canadian railways, namely, Canadian Pacific, Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk carried on their operations most harmoniously. Then in addition there was what has been known as the Canadian Railway War Board, which really means co-operation in every way to assist each other, and in the public interest. They have worked so well together that I sincerely hope and trust the good work they have done so harmoniously will continue.

When the House goes into committee all information required by every member of this House will be furnished. I think this matter is one that requires the most serious consideration of the House so that all the facts may be known. For that reason while members of the House expected to get away within a day or two may I hope and trust that they will take a great interest in this matter—discuss it thoroughly—give us the benefit of their advice. I am sure after it has been thoroughly discussed the House will pass the resolution and pass the Bill. Documents containing a large amount of information have already been laid on the Table, and other information necessary will at once be furnished. Let us then join together and do all we can to try and work this railway situation out of the great tangle which it has got into and let us try and make it one of the greatest assets that Canada has.

Mr. VIEN: Did I correctly understand the minister to say that the Grand Trunk Pacific was taken over because the Grand Trunk was in default with respect to the interest on the bonds?

Mr. REID: What I wished to say was that the Grand Trunk railway is taken over because it is found that it is in difficulties on account of the position that it is in with respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Grand Trunk Railway Company guaranteed a large amount of the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. They must pay the interest on those bonds, they are liable for it, but if they had to pay the interest on those bonds it would prevent them from paying dividends to their shareholders because the interest is a first charge on the earnings of the Grand Trunk.

Mr. VIEN: My question was not that. I understood the minister to make a statement in his opening remarks to the effect that the cause of the receivership which was instituted by Order in Council last March was that the interest on the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds was not paid. Did the minister make that statement?

Mr. REID: At the time of the receivership last session, when the Bill was passed, the Grand Trunk Railway Company served notice on the Government that they could not meet the interest that fell due, I think, on February 1, and they not being able to meet the interest as it fell due, the road would of course have gone into the hands of a receiver. An Order in Council was passed putting the road under a receivership.

Mr. VIEN: Even that is not the question. The minister made a statement a minute ago, if I understood him correctly, to the effect that at the time of the receivership the Grand Trunk Railway was in default with respect to the interest upon the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. REID: No, I did not say they were in default. I said they notified us that they could not pay and that they could not continue to operate the Grand Trunk Pacific road. They were not in default at that particular time, but they would have defaulted a few days later if we had not appointed a receiver.

Mr. VIEN: If the minister corrects his statement I am willing to accept it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Are the roads at present owned by the Government now under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission?

Mr. REID: Yes; I think they are.

Mr. CAMPBELL: All of them?

Mr. REID: They are in this way: The Canadian Northern was always under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners and we passed an Order in Council placing the Intercolonial in the same position as the Canadian Northern. Therefore, they are all under the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. VIEN: Would the minister allow me a further question? The minister knows that quite an extensive mileage of the Grand Trunk system is in United States territory. Has the Canadian Government taken any steps to ascertain what the action of the United States Government would be if the Canadian Government became the owner of these lines on American territory? I think it would be an unprecedented thing if a government would allow a foreign government to own railway systems on its territory.

Mr. REID: That is a legal question. Perhaps my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) would answer it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. member (Mr. Vien) knows the answer himself. We are not taking the road. We are at the present time one hundred per cent stockholders of another system that owns and operates roads in the United States. This is simply a repetition of what we have done before, and the American Government presumably would have no more objection to the one course than to the other.

Mr. VIEN: Does the minister say that the Canadian Government is not taking over the Grand Trunk Railway system? Is it not, in effect, state ownership of the Grand Trunk Railway system and will the Canadian Government not in the future be the owner of the Grand Trunk Railway system and its connections on American territory?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I said is precisely right; the hon. member can state it in any way he likes. We are the owners of the stock of the system which owns these roads and controls others through one connection or another just as in the case of the Canadian Northern system we are the owners of the stock of the system which owned and controlled roads in the United States. There is nothing in this case in principle that is not present in the other case, and presumably the American Government would have no more objection to one course than to the other.

Mr. VIEN: Of course, the American Government at the present time is managing all these roads under the Railway Board of the United States. I do not put the question as a catch, but simply to obtain information as to what will be the position of Canada when it becomes the owner of the railway and when the American Government decides to hand over the railway systems of the United States to their former owners. Has the Canadian Government inquired and ascertained whether the American Government will allow the American connections of the Grand Trunk Railway system, or of the Canadian Northern system, to revert to their owners, if the owners are the Canadian Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman did not listen to my reply.

Mr. VIEN: I did.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The American Government have been aware for almost two years that the Canadian Government were the owners of a system which controlled, owned, or operated—or all three together—lines in the United States. They are now the owners of another system; by means of the same process, stock ownership, they do the very same thing. The American Government has not felt concerned about the first case, and I do not see any reason why they would feel concerned about the second, which is absolutely the same.

Mr. VIEN: The reason is very clear and apparent. It is because these connections, such as those of the Canadian Northern system and of the Grand Trunk Railway system, are at present in the hands of the American Government. The American Government is not concerned as long as it does not hand over these railway lines and connections to their private owners, but they will be concerned when the time comes to hand them over. It seems to me that it is a fair question to inquire whether the Canadian Government has ascertained what would be the attitude of the American Government if it took such a step.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is wrong again. The lines of the Canadian Northern system, the stock of which is owned by the Canadian Government, are operated by the system, not by the United States; nor have they ever been operated by the United States.

The hon. gentleman is misinformed on that; the United States Government did not see fit to take them over. But they took over and are still operating certain lines of the Grand Trunk railway. When the American Government hand those lines back, if they do, they will be in just the same position that the Canadian Northern American lines are in now. So I am still unable to see why the American Government would feel concerned as to one situation any more than as to the other in which they were not affected at all.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Would the Minister of Railways be good enough to furnish the House with a statement of the amount of interest that has already been paid by the Government since the Grand Trunk Pacific was taken over by him as receiver, and of the annual amount of interest that will be necessary for the Government to pay from this time forward on that portion of the system?

[Mr. Vien.]

Mr. J. D. REID: I will give that information a little later—I had it here yesterday—but I could not give the exact figures. I think since the first of February something like $2,500,000 has been advanced for interest charges in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Annually?

Mr. J. D. REID: That is since taken over by the receiver.

Mr. FIELDING: Before leaving the question of American mileage, could the hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) tell us from memory what is the mileage of the Canadian Northern in the United States?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are two Canadian Northern lines in the United States, neither of them very long. One is a connecting link south of the Lake of the Woods of the main line from Winnipeg to Port Arthur; the other, known as the Duluth and Western, is all in American territory. Speaking from memory, I do not think the total mileage would be over one hundred miles.

Mr. FIELDING: They are probably small sections running through portions of the United States, but practically not in any degree serving American territory, and the question might not come up so prominently as it would in the case of the Grand Trunk lines, which have quite an expensive mileage in the United States. It may be that the American Government have no definite policy against allowing foreign Government owned railways within their jurisdiction, but if they have any objection, they will certainly have the same objection when they are told that a foreign government owns 100 per cent of the stock. If there be any such objection, I do not think the device of stockholding will satisfy the American Government.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Referring to the same question, is the Government aware that last week the representative of a syndicate was with the officials of the Grand Trunk system bargaining to take over the American lines, namely, the old Central Vermont, the New London line, the steamship line running from New London to New York, all the branch lines in the peninsula of Michigan, and the line running from Chicago to Detroit and Port Huron, subject to the understanding that these lines would be handed over by the American Government to the former owners?

Mr. J. D. REID: I never heard of anything of the kind. Did the hon. member say a representative of the American Government?

Mr. GAUTHIER: No. The representative of a syndicate was in conference with the Grand Trunk authorities in Montreal.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. gentleman must get his information from a source that is not open to us.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I had it from a reliable source.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The policy of the Grand Trunk, as I understand it, has always been to make Portland, Maine, the Atlantic terminus for their traffic. What is the view of the Minister of Railways in regard to that? Does he intend to continue that policy?

Mr. J. D. REID: So far as I am concerned, as I stated a few minutes ago, when we take over the Grand Trunk Railway system we will have one great national system of railways, and we must get the very best men available to manage the system, and they must of course adopt whatever policy they think is best to insure successful operation. I could not express an opinion on the question put by my hon. friend. The manager to be appointed will be the only person in the position to answer such a question.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I asked the question because the Government is making a bargain to take over the road, which ends in Portland, Maine, and if that port is not to be used as the winter terminus the road will be of very little use to us and it should not be purchased. I presume from his answer that the minister does intend to continue the policy that the Grand Trunk management has always pursued and maintain Portland as the Atlantic terminus.

Mr. J. D. REID: I can only say that whatever is the best course in the interests of the railroad will be adopted. I could not give any opinion as to what particular policy will be pursued.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Has the Government a list of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company with the dates when they acquired their holdings? If so, will the Government table that list?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will not disappoint the hon. gentleman by giving any other answer than No. I am informed that the shareholders of the Grand Trunk number about 180,000. The shares are on the market from day to day, and if a list could be given for one day—it could not be obtained even the next day. Personally, I do not know as to the ownership of one single share of Grand Trunk stock.

Mr. VIEN: Personally, the minister may not; but does he know officially?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nor officially.

Mr. DENIS: Is the minister in a position to tell us what is the present market value of Grand Trunk Common Stock and first, second, and third Preferred Stock? If I remember rightly, it used to be quoted on the New York Stock Market, but I have not noticed any quotations for several years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no information as to what the shares are worth. I did hear a figure quoted recently as to the value of the guaranteed shares at somewhere in the neighbourhood of 60 to 70. I do know that Grand Trunk shares were at one time at 12, but I have not any information as to their present value.

Mr. DENIS: When the minister says the "guaranteed shares," he means the 4 per cent Guaranteed Stock, I presume?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. DENIS: Is the minister aware that the Common Stock, which amounts to over £23,000,000 is worthless at the present time as far as the market value is concerned, and that the same remark applies to the first, second and third Preferred Stock?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is, on the market quotations?

Mr. DENIS: I am talking of the actual market quotations of these shares.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was not aware of that. If it is so, however, we will probably pay very little for it.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: It was the same with the Canadian Northern stock.

Mr. VIEN: What, in the opinion of the Government, is the value of these shares which are to be submitted to arbitration? Surely the Government must have made up its mind on that point; it is an important factor in the consideration of this matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government made an offer for the five classes of shares—that is to say, made an offer by way of rental, the corresponding value of which would now be the interest on the stock that would be issued. That offer was, as the hon. gentleman knows, $2,500,000 for three years, $3,000,000 for five years and $?,600,000 thereafter. That was what the Government considered a fair offer as to the rental value; if that were concurred in it would mean that we would pay a sum corresponding to that by way of interest on those five classes of stocks, inclusive of the guaranteed stock. That is the only action the Government have taken in the way of estimating what would be a fair offer. Now that it is submitted to arbitration the Government makes no estimates; that is for the Board of Arbitration.

Mr. CAHILL: Why did the Government change its mind about that original offer? Why does it make a different offer at this time? The arbitration was to include five stocks; now it is including four. There is one stock—which was not a guaranteed stock, only so far as the Grand Trunk shareholders could guarantee it—that the Government are now making a four per cent Dominion Government guaranteed bond amounting to $60,833,000. What induced them to take that out of the original arrangement and to make it a guaranteed stock so far as the Dominion is concerned, thus enhancing the value of stock which had been quoted on the market at 45 and which is now quoted at 60? This represents an advance of fifteen points or an enhancement in the value of the stock in one day to the extent of $9,000,000. In other words, when the Dominion Government guarantees that stock at six per cent it will be worth 80, or $20,000,000 more than its market price. The Government at the outset claimed that they were going to offer only a certain sum for all the five stocks, but now they make $60,000,000 worth of this worthless stock worth from 80 to 85, on account of the Dominion Government's guarantee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member has the ability to crowd more mis-statements into a short speech than any man in the House, I think. In the first place, if I gathered his point, he says that the Government has altered its position in that in the first proposal of 11th July, 1918, it was proposed that the Government would arbitrate the value of the five stocks, namely, the guaranteed stock, the three preference stocks and the common stock. That is my hon. friend's first mis-statement. If he will look at the letter of 11th July, 1918, he will see that the Government offered to treat the guaranteed stock as an obligation just the same as we treat the debenture stock or bonds. That is exactly what we are doing; there is no variation whatsoever. The hon. member's next mis-statement was that the worthless guaranteed stock would be worth 80. Well, what can he be thinking about? The guaranteed stock has a four per cent dividend. That dividend has always been paid; it never has missed in the whole history of the Grand Trunk.

Mr. CAHILL: Was it paid last year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Last year, and every year. The guaranteed stock has always carried its dividend and that dividend has always been paid. That guaranteed stock never was worthless and is not worthless. That is the stock to which I referred in answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Vien) as having been quoted to me—I heard the value of it some days ago, a considerable time before the negotiations reached a conclusion—as 60 to 70. The hon. member says it is that to-day. I assume it would be; I do not know anything about it. This stock has always borne that dividend; that dividend has always been paid. There was no reasonable expectation or fear that it would ever fail to be paid; consequently, the Government, originally, as now, proposed that that be treated merely as a debenture stock. It is on the other four stocks that the arbitration takes place, just as was proposed in the original letter.

Mr. VIEN: What is the object of giving to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk these present guaranteed stocks as well as the new guaranteed stocks, instead of giving them bonds? This is a most unprecedented method of dealing with a case of this kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member asks why we do not propose to give bonds for the arbitrated value instead of stocks?

Mr. VIEN: As well for the present guaranteed stock as for the new guaranteed stock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, the present guaranteed stock is a stock; it is not a bond. We do not change that; there seems to be no reason for changing it. If we did make it a charge on the road—and making it a bond would, I assume, be making it a charge on the road—if that had any effect at all it would add to the value of the bond. We do not want to do anything that is unnecessary; there would be no object in the world in doing it.

Mr. VIEN: In what way would it add to the value of the bond?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that it would; if it did anything, I said, it would do that, because it would, I suppose, give an additional security. But there would be no object in doing that. The Government do not propose to charge this new stock on anything. It will simply be a new non-voting stock and the guarantee of the Government will be given that the four per cent interest will be paid. Nothing else is necessary, consequently nothing else is done.

Mr. CAHILL: I thought that the minister was making an error in his statement. I wish he would be good enough to follow me now, because he has a sort of hazy idea about figures at any time. I quote from one of the letters sent by the minister:

The Government to make annual payment of $2,500,000 for the first three years, $3,000,000 for the succeeding five years, and $3,600,000 annually thereafter; such sums to be distributed by the Grand Trunk management as they might determine, among holders of 4 per cent guaranteed and other stocks.

That was what the Government originally proposed to arbitrate. But now you do not propose to arbitrate that; you propose to give them the four per cent, or $2,500,000 in interest, before you start to arbitrate anything. I wish the minister would answer my question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will, and the hon. member will be sorry he got annoyed so soon. That is not the arbitration proposal at all. The hon. member is quoting a reference to the cash proposal, and if they had accepted the cash proposal there would have been no arbitration. The reference to the arbitration proposal is later on in the letter. I quote from page 8 of the correspondence:

Should such terms not be accepted,—

That is, the cash offer.

—it was suggested—

That is, in the previous cable I referred to.

—that the amounts in question might be submitted to arbitration. These proposals met with no acceptance.

The next paragraph is immaterial. I quote the succeeding one:

We are now prepared—

It reads "not prepared," but that is a misprint; it should be "now prepared."

We are now prepared to abide by the proposals submitted to you in February last as to acquisition or we are prepared on behalf of the Government to submit the entire question of remuneration to a Board of Arbitration on the following general terms:

1. The board to consist of three persons—

And so on.

2. The board to have full power as to the procuring and acceptance of evidence.

3. The award to be by way of annual rental for a term of 999 years—

And so on.

4. Conditions arising or that have arisen out of the war not to be taken into account—

And then:

Should the company desire the guaranteed stock may be treated as an obligation in the same way as the company's bonds.

That is the original proposal. That is now lived up to in the present proposals.

Mr. CAHILL: That practically takes up the $2,500,000?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: On what basis does the Government then purpose to arbitrate the rest of it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We arbitrate the value of the other four stocks.

Mr. CAHILL: But you have changed from the original view that you would give $2,500,000?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. CAHILL: Now you give that outright and start to arbitrate something else?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The arbitration proposal then was this: If you care we will either pay the dividend amounting to $2,500,000 on your guaranteed stock as a bond and arbitrate for the rest, or pay you this amount which means you will get so much for the rest; you will get nothing for it for three years; then you will get $500,000 a year, and thereafter you will get $1,100,000 a year for all time. If you do not care to take that, we will arbitrate on the whole, and that arbitration proposal they have now accepted. There is no mystery about the matter.

Mr. DEVLIN: In other words, do I understand the minister to say that with the exception of the four per cent guaranteed stock, the company is simply leasing the balance of the other stock for 999 years?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, we are not doing that at all. As I explained last Friday, we want to pay an annual amount, that is, if we are called on to pay anything. We thought first of having that annual amount decided as the rental value of the road. Finding that impracticable, we sought another way of submitting virtually the same thing to arbitration, and we say: We will take these stocks, the three preference and the common, and we will pay four per cent on the value of them, but we will become absolute owners of these stocks; we will substitute in their place a new one, a non-voting certificate.

Mr. DEVLIN: No lease about this?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. DEVLIN: Would the Minister of the Interior say that the common stock which is quoted here as being of the value of £23,955,437, is perfectly worthless except for the purposes of voting?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In one sense, it is. It never paid a dividend, but it is always worth something in the market for reasons of which the hon. gentlemen would, I guess, be as good a judge as I. I never could see how it was worth much, and I am quite certain I never owned any. But the hon. gentleman is wrong in saying that it is quoted in the resolution as of the value of £23,955,437. It is not; that is merely the face value of it. I do not think it ever sold for that originally; it sold for very much less, I understand, but it sold for real money.

Mr. DEVLIN: I asked the question simply because the Minister of Railways in making a statement a few minutes ago said that in his opinion the common stock was worthless except for voting purposes.

Mr. J. D. REID: I think I said "of little value except for voting purposes."

Mr. DEVLIN: Perhaps I misunderstood the minister. Then I take it—and I do not think there will be very much dispute about the matter—that the common stock, since it pays no dividend, and is not likely ever to pay any, is practically worthless stock—watered stock, or any other name you like to call it, while it may be very useful along with preference stock for voting purposes, as an asset to Canada it will not be considered as of very great value. Then we are left simply with the first preference 5 per cent, the second preference 5 per cent, and the third preference, 4 per cent. Those are what we are actually going to acquire.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and the common stock. I should point out to hon. members who may possibly be misled by another hon. member who spoke—

Mr. DEVLIN: That is not the Montreal Gazette the minister has in his hand, is it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it is the London Times of the 18th of September, in which quotations are given of Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada Consolidated of 9⅞, 9 15/16, 9¾, and so on. That is the common stock.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does that mean £9 or $9?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am told that the percentage is just the same; it is so much on the hundred of par value, so it is just the same whether you quote it in pounds or in dollars. I am not familiar with the stock market so I have to be informed, but those are the quotations. Then Grand Trunk 4 per cent guaranteed stock quoted as worthless by the hon. member for Pontiac——

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

SITTING SUSPENDED FOR ROYAL ASSENT TO BILLS.

A message was delivered by Colonel Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Deputy of His Excellency, the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate.

And having returned,

The Speaker informed the House that His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give, in His Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following Bills:

An Act to amend The Dominion By-Elections Act, 1919.

An Act to amend The Naturalization Act, 1919.

An Act to amend The Board of Commerce Act.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM.

RESOLUTION RESPECTING ITS ACQUISITION BY THE GOVERNMENT.

Consideration of the resolution (Hon. Mr. Reid) resumed in Committee, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN (resuming): I was referring to certain quotations in The London Times. I find that on September 18 Grand Trunk common stock was quoted at 9⅞, 9 15/16, and so on, that the 4 per cent guaranteed stock was quoted at 49½, 49¾, 50¼, that the 5 per cent first preference stock was quoted at 51, and up as high as 52½. I do not see any quotations for the second preference stock, but there are some quotations of the debenture stock, that is, the bonds. Then I see in The Montreal Star of last night corresponding quotations as follows: 4 per cent guaranteed stock, 61½ on October 13, and 65 on October 14. Apparently there was an appreciation of 3½ points. First preference stock is quoted at 50 and 55, practically what it was quoted in London on September 18. The ordinary common stock is quoted at 9 and 11, so it is a little lower than the quotation in London on September 18.

Mr. McMASTER: Not if it is 11. The London quotation was 9 15/16.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was mistaken in that. The London quotation was 9⅞, 9 15/16, and so on.

Mr. DEVLIN: Is there not a footnote explaining that in view of the intention to purchase by the Canadian Government the Grand Trunk stock has gone on increasing? Several papers have put that in. I would not advise the minister always to purchase stocks upon quotations in newspapers. I do not think my hon. friend would do that. It has been noted in the newspapers, however, that since the Government has taken very active steps to purchase the Grand Trunk the stock has taken on a few points in the London market; but that is no true test of the real value of the stock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thoroughly agree. It is quite possible that these people who think it means a likely added value to the stock in the arbitration award may change their minds. The stock may go down. I want to correct an error I made a short time ago. Inadvertently I stated that the guaranteed stock had always paid its dividend. That is not true with respect to the last two or more years. Prior to that, back even to pre-Confederation days, I think, the stock always paid the full 4 per cent. This 4 per cent guaranteed stock arose originally from the purchase of the Great Western Railway, the stock being given as the purchase price of that railway. It has been added to since for other purposes, and has always paid the dividend up to 1917, with the exception of one-half per cent off in 1915.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Who was that stock guaranteed by?

Mr. MEIGHEN: By the Grand Trunk. That is all the word "guaranteed" means. There was no guarantee, except that the stock took priority over all other stock issues of the Grand Trunk, and they called it a guaranteed stock. In the event of liquidation it was a charge on the assets next to the debenture stock.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister has quoted from the London Times that the guaranteed stock is selling on the market at 61½. On what principle then are we going to pay 100 for it? The resolution provides for the taking over of that guaranteed stock, and our paying interest on it perpetually until the stock is redeemed at par. On what principle can we be justified in paying 100 for stock that is selling on the London market at 61½?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are not paying for it. We are simply guaranteeing to pay the 4 per cent on the guaranteed stock. We do not take that stock. It stays just where it is, but the holders surrender their voting power. It should be explained to the committee that the voting power is an element of value in this stock; I do not know how great an element but it is an element of value prized, I am told, by the holders of this stock. I do not know just what the proportion is, but that stock has a higher proportion of voting power, dollar for dollar, than later issues. The holders of the stock give up that voting power, and the Government then adds its guarantee to the Grand Trunk guarantee which they now have.

Mr. FIELDING: A four per cent stock guaranteed by the Government of Canada is par value stock in the English market under normal conditions. Of course at present, under war finance, conditions are not normal, but this circumstance will have passed shortly. So that when we undertake to pay four per cent on that stock which for two years has paid no dividends we are practically giving it a par value, and people buying it to-day around sixty and advancing it to higher figures are making an excellent speculation and one which is perhaps natural under the circumstances.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They may or may not.

Mr. FIELDING: There is no doubt about it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is value to-day that counts. The stock is not worth par to-day. Perhaps before the war it was, but I understand it was not. Now, we pay for these four stocks just what they are worth. The arbitrators say that these stocks are worth so much. We do not give them cash for that but we give them a new certificate of four per cent, which in the market to-day could not possibly sell for one hundred or near one hundred. So that there is a great advantage to us in that respect; at least I so regard it. As to this stock, it is very likely that the fact of the Government's guarantee upon it will add a little to its value in the market, and to that extent the holders will be advantaged if they choose to sell. But in practical negotiations there is no way by which that can be avoided. It is impracticable for a government to go into the market, however careful or adroitly it may do so, and seek to get hold of this stock. Even if there is a small depreciation of value, in lieu of that we get the surrender of the voting power and thereby the absolute control of the whole proposition.

Mr. FIELDING: The small increase my hon. friend speaks of is surely a mistake. Stock that has not paid any dividend for two years and which has nominally a guarantee, not of the Government but of the Grand Trunk company, is weak stock and of very small value; and when you convert that into stock guaranteed by the Government of Canada at four per cent you are raising it from its present value, whatever it may be, to something equivalent to par. It may be unavoidable. I am not criticising the machinery, but I point out the fact that the value of the stock at least is largely enhanced by the effect of this arrangement.

Mr. McMASTER: Would it not be possible to treat the four per cent guaranteed stock in the same way as the preference stocks are treated—to arbitrate its value, as well as the value of the preference stock, and then to issue new stock to take its place?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should say the Government would rather have preferred that, and that was the original offer in the message of March 5 from the Prime Minister for Mr. Smithers' information across the seas. But in order that we might go one step to meet them, in the letter of July 11, we offered to treat the guaranteed stock as an obligation, and we are living up to that. It was not accepted even then; it was considered anything at all but a concession and consequently we did not succeed in getting anywhere. But now they have come to our terms in that regard and we are living up to the proposal we made.

Mr. DENIS: Are the three preferred voting stocks together with common stock?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, they are all voting stocks, but I think the preferred have an advantage over any others in their voting power.

Mr. DENIS: The minister has said that the dividends have been paid on the guaranteed stock except for the last two years. Have the dividends been paid on the first, second and third preferred stock, and also on the common stock? I should like to have some detailed information, too, about the payment or non-payment of dividends on all these stocks for the last ten years, say.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all found on page 56 of the statement given to the House yesterday. They paid dividends for most of the years; first preference for all but two up to 1917; second preference the same; third preference the same, but the third preference never paid over 3 per cent and one year the second preference paid only 2½ per cent.

Mr. J. D. REID: And there have never been any dividends paid on the common stock.

Mr. DENIS: It is well known that a company which does not pay dividends on its preferred stock that bears four or five per cent interest is liable for the payment of arrear dividends. I am subject to correction, but I believe that is the fact.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think it is cumulative, but even if it were that would be an obligation of the company's. It would go a long way towards robbing other stocks of any value, but I do not think the dividends are cumulative.

Mr. DENIS: I do not see any difference between a company and the Government in a matter of this kind. The Government acquires common stock and first, second, and third preferred stocks. It buys voting stock and says: "The company owes the interest; it has its responsibilities and liabilities but we are not a company." I heard that argument advanced by the minister with regard to the passing of the road through the United States. As I view the matter, when a person owns the whole of the voting stock in a company that person is virtually the company; consequently in this connection the liabilities of the company would be the liabilities of the Government. For this reason I think we are interested to know what will be the responsibilities of the Government in regard to the back dividends.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think there are any responsibilities at all as to unpaid dividends, but I will let the hon. member know definitely either to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How was the Grand Trunk financed? Was the common stock of no value or did it represent money?

Mr. J. D. REID: It represented thirty million dollars.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Or was it like the Canadian Northern stock, which was well known to be watered?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My information is that the proceeds of the common stock sales to the extent of thirty million dollars went into the Grand Trunk.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the Government name a date upon which the value of those stocks should be fixed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Government is now proposing to take over this road and these stocks may acquire a certain value greater than under old conditions when they were not paying any dividend and had practically no commercial value. When we begin to arbitrate some definite date should be fixed for the arbitrators to consider the value of these stocks at that time. In connection with railway right of way matters, the value a man can get for his land will be the value of the land before it was known that the railway would run through it. He is not entitled to any extra value by reason of the fact that the railway crosses his land.

He is not entitled to get any extra value for his land brought to it by reason of the railway and the arbitrators should not take into consideration any value that is brought to this stock by reason of the fact that the Government is taking over the road. What I want to know is if the Government is fixing any date as and when these values shall be considered. I think the Government—although they would not know the names of all the owners—should know as nearly as possible the conditions surrounding the outstanding stocks, bonds, etc., and their present value, or their value on the last day of August, 1919, before possibly it was known to the outside world that these negotiations were taking definite form. In that way we would be protecting ourselves against paying more money for these stocks by reason of the fact that we are talking about taking them over.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There necessarily must be a date fixed as of which the value must be found. Should it be a date later than about the date the hon. gentleman names I think there should be no appreciation owing to the taking over, or probable taking over, of the road by the Government. That can be provided for, and I think, I may say, will be provided for in the agreement. It may be that the date might be fixed as he suggests, about the end of August, in which event there would be no need for such a provision.

Mr. FIELDING: Would that apply also to the four per cent stock?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the Government undertakes to pay the interest on that.

Mr. FIELDING: You are making a fine present to somebody on the London stock market.

Mr. VIEN: Has the Government ascertained the amount that will be involved for urgent repairs to the road in order to put the road and rolling stock in good working order?

Mr. REID: I will try and get some information on that a little later.

Mr. VIEN: Is the Government informing the House that it has not this information in its possession now?

Mr. REID: I will make inquiry and find out if we have any further information in addition to what has already been laid on the Table. I could not say off-hand that we had any official information. Of course the hon. gentleman knows that official reports are sent every year to the Railway Department as to the condition of the road.

Mr. VIEN: The answer of the minister is not an answer to my question. I know that every year every railway company in Canada makes a report to the Department of Railways and Canals on which the railway statistics are compiled; I know that the railway statistics are published; I know that the capital expenditure of every company is therein contained, but the point of my question is this: To the knowledge of the Government, for years the Grand Trunk Railway Company has neglected to a great extent to keep its roadbed and rolling stock in good working order. I refer to the Drayton-Acworth report in which it is stated that $21,000,000, which was paid to the shareholders of the company, was not earned by the company but was paid at the expense of the maintenance of the road and rolling stock. If the information is in the hands of the Government that the road and rolling stock are in poor condition, surely before the Government enters into pourparlers with the officials of the company as to the valuation that is to be put upon the railway, it should ascertain what expenditures it will be obliged to ask Parliament to vote to make up for the deficiency in the maintenance of the road and rolling stock.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman is quite right; the Drayton-Acworth report makes a statement of that kind, and the Government feel that probably some money will have to be expended on the road. On the other hand, the Grand Trunk Railway management assure me that the road is in good condition and that it will not require large expenditures to put it in shape.

Mr. VEIN: They are the sellers.

Mr. REID: I admit that, but evidence will have to be brought before the arbitrators to prove that it is in good condition. The physical condition of the road and equipment must all be examined by experts and evidence to the satisfaction of the arbitrators must be presented as to the physical condition of the road and equipment. That will be the kind of evidence that the arbitrators will want, and of course it will have something to do with their decision as to the value that is put upon the stock.

Mr. VIEN: I quite agree with the minister that in the valuation of the first, second and third preference stock, as well as the common stock, the arbitrators will 5 p.m. have to take into consideration the physical condition of the road; but suppose they come to the conclusion that the stock is worthless, and suppose that they even come to the conclusion that the road does not warrant the expenditure of $60,000,000 on the four per cent guaranteed stock, as well as the undertaking of paying all the liabilities of the company, surely the Government, before entering into an agreement to pay not only the interest on the bonds, but also on the four per cent guaranteed stock, has taken the trouble to acquire information? That is the information that I ask the Government to lay before the House.

Mr. REID: The Government felt justified in taking over the Grand Trunk Railway system and to guarantee the stockholders. They have always paid dividends amounting to a million dollars and more on the guaranteed stock. No matter what may have to be done to improve the condition of the Grand Trunk, if anything, we are perfectly safe in making the agreement for that reason. I think that railway officials will admit that the physical condition of the Grand Trunk is not serious. No doubt the Grand Trunk, as well as all the other railways, is not in the same position as it was prior to the war. All railways had to economize and not maintain their properties in the same condition as they were in prior to the war. But they have been putting the road into condition since. They have been carrying on maintenance equally as well as any of the other railways in Canada since the war, and we are perfectly justified in assuming the guaranteed stock. If the road and the equipment were in a serious condition the arbitrators might not allow anything on the first, second and third preference stock or the common stock.

Mr. VIEN: Then the answer of the minister is that he does not know and he is not in a position to give to the Committee the information I require. If the minister is not in a position to say what expenditure will be involved in putting the railway and rolling stock in good working condition, I will refer the minister to page XCIX of the Drayton-Acworth report, where Mr. Smith in his minority report states:

> My colleagues have recommended that the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company be paid an annuity, which is to be a "moderate but substantial portion of $3,600,000, the average dividend payment for the last ten years." This recommendation is in spite of the facts noted in the report that there are arrears in maintenance, which require the expenditure of $21,000,000, and that the company has charged to capital items which should properly have been charged against income, these facts indicating that there have been some dividends paid which have not been earned.

So the Government is not in a position to tell us what will be required from the Treasury to make good the default of the company to maintain its roadbed and rolling stock in good working order?

Mr. J. D. REID: I can get information from the Grand Trunk management as to the present condition of the system; but this I do know of my own knowledge, that the main line between Toronto and Montreal is being relaid with new ties and new rails, and that roadbed in my opinion is equal to any in Canada. I have travelled over it and seen it myself, so I know what I am talking about.

Mr. VIEN: A few sections only.

Mr. J. D. REID: Toronto to Montreal is the main line. The other parts of the system, I am informed by our own railway officials, in discussing it with them, are in as good condition as any other lines. The company have properly maintained the system in Canada. So far as the portion of the system in the United States is concerned, I suppose we can get information from the Grand Trunk officials, but I have understood in reading the newspapers that the American Government, which is now operating the railroads in the United States, must put them in the same condition as they were when taken over, and at that time the Grand Trunk system there was in good condition. Therefore, knowing that the United States section must be put in good condition, and having the verbal opinions that I have mentioned from our own officials who have travelled over the road, and having travelled over it myself, I am quite satisfied that the Grand Trunk system is in at least fair condition. At all events, as I stated a few minutes ago, the condition of the Grand Trunk System is such that the Government are, in my opinion, perfectly safe in paying the interest on the guaranteed stock. I think if the honourable member consults railway experts they will express the same opinion.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: In regard to the guaranteed stock, the Minister of Railways has several times repeated that the Government is safe in paying the interest on the guaranteed stock. I do not think he intentionally wishes to mislead the House, but the question is not confined to the guaranteed stock alone; it includes the debenture stock, which is much larger than the guaranteed stock. As I understand it, by the contract we are entering into we are pledging ourselves to pay interest on the guaranteeed stock, which is £12,500,000, and on the debenture stock, which is £31,926,125, making altogether £44,426,125, or more than $220,000,000. That is what we are taking over absolutely and agreeing to pay interest on at 4 per cent in some cases and at 5 per cent in other cases. So the minister must not run away with the idea that he is agreeing to pay interest only on the guaranteed stock, as he has said several times to the Committee. Now, is this what we are to understand, that the minister has undertaken to purchase this road and to be responsible for $220,000,000 without having any written report from any engineer as to its physical condition?

Mr. J. D. REID: Perhaps I did not explain myself quite clearly when I mentioned the guaranteed stock. The interest on the debenture stock, $7,000,000, and the $2,500,000 interest on the guaranteed stock the Government have agreed to pay absolutely and in perpetuity. So far as that is concerned, I wish to say that I feel the Government are perfectly justified in assuming that responsibility, for the reasons I gave when I mentioned the guaranteed stock. As to the Government not having any reports, the honourable member knows that we have the Drayton-Acworth report, and even in that report all the Commissioners admit that if we were taking the system over at that time we should pay not only $7,000,000 on the debenture stock, but also an amount not equal perhaps to the $3,600,000 that had been the average amount paid for the previous ten years, but they certainly recommend—I have not the report before me, but if the honourable member will read on he will see that Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth recommended that if we took over the Grand Trunk we should pay them a portion at least of that $3,600,000.

Mr. VIEN: That is what I read.

Mr. J. D. REID: We are guaranteeing only the $7,000,000, and in addition a portion of the $3,600,000, just as Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth recommended.

Mr. VIEN: It is a very big portion of the amount.

Mr. ROBB: A few days ago the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) made the statement to this House and the country that he expected we would have prorogation last week, and now in the last days of the session, after the country had been led to understand that no more legislation would be brought down, the Minister of Railways comes along with a proposition to take over a vast system of railways extending from Chicago, Illinois, through Canada to Portland, Maine. And yet the Minister of Railways, the guardian of the rights of the people so far as railways are concerned, coldly tells the House and the country this afternoon that all his information is based upon newspaper reports so far as the condition of the road in the United States is concerned. I submit that under these circumstances the Minister of Railways could very well lay this legislation over so as to give the House and the country an opportunity to look more carefully into the condition of the road, and in order that the minister himself might send out some of his experts so that next session he would be in a position to give us some better information than that which he now presents based on newspaper reports.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman has quite mis-stated the minister's position. He did not base his information upon newspaper reports.

Mr. VIEN: Verbal evidence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Drayton-Acworth report is before us, the very best expert opinion that could be adduced. That report has been before the House and the country for some three years. There is no reason to believe that, comparatively speaking, there has been any material deterioration of the road since that report was made. Hon. members themselves know of the general condition of the system about as well as they know of any physical fact in Canada. We all travel over the road regularly; we have grown up with it. We have before us, then, as well-founded, as thoroughly considered, as mature and as reliable report as any Parliament ever acted upon. We ourselves know the condition of the road as to Canada—not as experts, but, speaking generally, as ordinary intelligent citizens. As to the United States, we know that the American Government is bound to hand back in the condition in which they got it that part of the line which is in their territory, when they choose to deliver up the possession of the railroads which have been under their administration. It is altogether impossible to assume that the American Government, operating that portion of the line which is in the United States is letting it go back and get into such a condition that it would be unsafe to operate or that its value would be so substantially detracted from as to render undependable for us the fundamental principles and features laid down in the Drayton-Acworth report.

It is true that when it did not appear that there was probability of a conclusion of the negotiations this session, an earlier prorogation was contemplated. But how does that affect the question? It is not contemplated now. We are here; we have as much time as we shall ever have; we have the whole fall before us. There is no reason why any hon. member should hurry himself in the least. The Government are not asking any hon. member to hurry himself. We will take all the time that is necessary to the fullest possible consideration of this question. Of course, if any hon. member or any person is opposed to a project, his first method of opposing it is to say: "Don't do it now; this is the wrong time." There never is a right time for the bringing on of an enterprise, in the opinion of any one who is opposed to it. Then, of course, the Opposition will say: "You are jamming it through; we are in the dying hours of the session." Well, let us be in the living hours. Let us get in the noon-day. There is plenty of time ahead for the fullest consideration. It is not as if the proposal were new; it has been before the whole country since August, 1918—I am pretty sure that I have stated the month correctly. The proposal that is before us for acceptance has, in every substantial feature, been known to this Parliament through two sessions. We are here because the Grand Trunk at this moment has accepted our terms; we are here for the consideration of the matter as a Parliament. There is no surprise. To the best of my memory, not a single criticism has been offered in this House from either side to one single element or paragraph or sentence of the proposal offered to this House on the 11th July, 1918. Certainly Parliament has never been asked to pass unfavourably upon that proposal or upon either alternative suggested in it. It has never been suggested to Parliament or to the Government that the offer then made should be withdrawn or modified in any way. If ever a Parliament, therefore, came to deal with a question having had the amplest opportunity for consideration of it, that is the position of this Parliament at this time on this question. The Government's attitude is to invite—not only to invite, may I say, but to urge—the most studied deliberation of every feature of the proposal. Any information that it is possible for us to bring before Parliament—and we can bring all the necessary information—will be brought before it and the amplest time will be given for the review of that information and to enable hon. members to arrive at a conclusion thereupon.

Mr. VIEN: Yes, but when I put two questions bearing distinctly upon the main question at issue, I get evasive answers. My first question was this: If the American Government does not release the American connections of the Grand Trunk Railway system, where shall we be? Has the Government taken any steps to ascertain what the American Government is going to do? The minister says: "The hon. member knows that this is a private company; there is nothing changed in its ownership; it continues to be the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the American Government is not going to do anything so nasty as to cause us embarrassment." The House is not put in possession of the information that is necessary to an intelligent discussion of the matter now before it. We do not know what the American Government is going to do. If the American Government refuses to hand over the American connections of the Grand Trunk Railway system we shall find ourselves in this position: We shall have made a payment in respect of the full value of the whole system—a system which, as my hon. friend (Mr. Robb) said a moment ago originates in Chicago and ends at Portland—and we shall be left with only the Canadian portion of it. I challenge the minister to quote me a precedent where a foreign Government has been allowed to own or take possession of railway lines within its territory but belonging to another Government. The disguise which the hon. minister tries to put upon the transaction will not fool the American Government. It is childish to pretend that the American Government will think that this line is still the old Grand Trunk Railway system. As soon as the Canadian Government takes over the shares that it now proposes to purchase, what has been known as the Grand Trunk Raiway system will form part of the Canadian National Railway system, owned and operated by the Canadian Government. This is a serious question, and one which has an important bearing upon the value of the road to the Canadian people.

The Government invite questions. They invite us to study the matter, but they fail to give us the information that we require. I imply from the answers given by the minister that members of the Government themselves do not know what is going to be the action of the American Government. All that the minister tells us is that the American Government is not going to do anything nasty.

The other question which I put to the Government was this: What expenditure will the Government find themselves obliged to ask the House to vote in order to make up for the failure of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to maintain properly and keep in a good state of repair its road, equipment, and rolling stock? The Minister of Railways says: I gather from verbal information; I gather from newspaper accounts; I have travelled over the Grand Trunk, and I know that it is in good condition. It is childish to say that any man in this country, even the Minister of Railways, can, by travelling over a section of the Grand Trunk from Montreal to Toronto, tell us what amount will be involved in making up the deficiency in the rolling stock and the maintenance of the roadbed. We all know that this section of the road from Montreal to Toronto, and, indeed, to Chicago, is one of the best sections of the Grand Trunk Railway system, and that the equipment which is used by the Grand Trunk Railway from Montreal to Chicago is the very flower of their equipment. But when a commission of which the present Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) was a member, tells us—and I read the report to the committee—that the Grand Trunk Railway failed to maintain its roadbed and rolling stock in first class condition; when the three commissioners agree on that; when, as early as 1916, when their report was finally concluded, they said that the company were at that time $21,000,000 behind, which should have been put into the maintenance of the roadbed and rolling stock, but which was attributed to dividends, and when negotiations have been going on since then between the Government and the company for the purchase of the system, we know that the Grand Trunk officials would not be likely to advise their company to go into any further expenditure for maintenance of roadbed or rolling stock pending the negotiations. The verbal information that the Minister of Railways has given to the committee is not the kind of information to which the committee is entitled. And when the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) says to the committee: We are ready to give you the information; we invite you to ask for information; I say that it is simply fooling the people of Canada and endeavouring, through the press gallery, to carry to the people the impression that all the information is contained in this little book which was printed yesterday and distributed to-day to the members. In this little book you will find, it is true, a copy of the correspondence and some statistics, but it gives no further information than can be found in the Blue Book on Railway Statistics published last year by the Department of Railways. As to the exact expenditure that the country is now asked to assume and to which we commit the country, there is no information forthcoming, and we get to our queries evasive answers. That, I say, is not the proper way to treat the committee and the people of Canada. If we must carry this through now, if we must study it, we are entitled to more good faith—some further information and clearer answers than those which have been given this afternoon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course, if we stayed here for half a century, hon. gentlemen would have ingenuity enough to ask for something that would keep us here for another half century.

Mr. VIEN: You cannot complain up to now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have been asked this afternoon as I recall the questions, for three things. The first is a list of the 100,000 or 180,000 shareholders of the Grand Trunk; the second is to know what the American Government think of this proposition, and the third is to know how much money we think it will take to put the road into, as I presume the hon. member means, reasonable condition. I have already dealt with the first, and as the suggestion has not been advanced a second time, I presume it is quieted. As to the second, as to what the American Government think of our proposal at some time to operate a road in the United States, I will say another word beyond what I said a moment ago. The hon. member (Mr. Vien) thinks this is wholly unprecedented and that we should have asked the American Government what their attitude was going to be before we ventured to own any stock in the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. VIEN: To own all of the stock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To own all of the stock. I suppose they would be content for us to own a piece, but they would not stand for our owning any more, is that it? Where was it ever known before, he said, that one government operated a railroad in a country under the jurisdiction of another? I told him one instance precisely the same as this, not certainly where the mileage was so great, but exactly the same in kind. We operate now through the Canadian National Railway two lines in the United States. That does not satisfy the hon. member as an instance; he does not, I suppose, accept that as a precedent, so I will give him one or two more. He does not seem to be aware, although he poses as a critic here,—

Mr. VIEN: I am not posing at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not posing?

Mr. VIEN: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, the hon. gentleman put an interpretation to that word that I did not intend. He is really a critic. It is not a matter of pretence; it is a reality.

Mr. VIEN: I am putting questions; I am not criticising.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member says: Where is the precedent for the Government's operating railway lines in another country? I gave him one before; now I will give him a few more. Is he not aware that the American Government are operating not one but several lines in Canada to-day?

[Mr. Vien.]

Mr. VIEN: The American Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. They did not ask us for permission; they did not ask us what we thought of their action; they just went to work and operated them. They are operating the New York Central into the city of Ottawa.

Mr. VIEN: That is a temporary arrangement.

Mr. JACOBS: They have running rights over the line.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member draws a distinction again. I suppose he thinks that the American Government would let us operate a few lines a long time or many lines a short time.

Mr. VIEN: Does the minister contend that the American Government own the railways they are managing now? The American Government have temporarily taken over the management of a few lines with the intention, very often manifested, of handing them back to their private owners afterwards.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman has shifted his ground. A few moments ago it was not the ownership that was worrying him at all. He said: When you own the lines, how are you going to operate them; once you begin operating them, the trouble is going to come." It was the operating he was afraid of. When I show him that the American Government are now operating line after line, the New York Central into Ottawa, the Michigan Central in Ontario, the Great Northern in the West—

Mr. JACOBS: Is it not true that these are merely running rights they have over the lines?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the American Government are actually operating the railways as a Government, not through a company at all. The American Government did not say "by your leave" to this country.

Mr. JACOBS: The lines belong to Canadian railways, do they not and the American Government have running rights?

Mr. MEIGHEN: To what Canadian railway does the New York Central belong?

Mr. JACOBS: I understand they are running over the Grand Trunk.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. What Canadian railway does the Michigan Central belong to, or the Great Northern? Those are American lines operating here just as the Grand Trunk operates in the United States.

Mr. JACOBS: Were those lines built in Canada by American companies?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, the Michigan Central was and the New York Central. What does it matter who built them, the American Government are operating them.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Is it not a fact that these lines are privately-owned lines, only taken over temporarily by the United States Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very good. I am discussing operation now, because that is what the hon. member was on until he shifted off.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then it is ownership that is the trouble? All right. We have owned lines in the United States. Is it not just as harmful to own 100 miles of railway as 1,000?

Mr. JACOBS: It is ten times more harmful to own 1,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. member say that we should ask the American Government's permission when we are getting 1,000 miles, and that when it was a case of a hundred miles it did not matter? What is the difference? If the hon. member had a point at all he should have stuck to operation. It is operation that the American Government and the American people are concerned with. The American Government wants to see the road operated in the interests of their own people. If there is any objection at all that you can conceive of, it would be with respect to operation and not to ownership. Ownership does not matter to them. There is precedent after precedent on their part, and at least one or two precedents on our part. Surely those are enough precedents to satisfy the hon. member. Does he think we should have gone to Washington and suggested to the American Government that it might take exception to our going through with this transaction? I can conceive of nothing —I was going to say, more absurd. At all events, it would be most inexpedient and unwise. If the American Government has any representations to make it will make them.

Mr. VIEN: And you will have paid for the road.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He says we shall have paid for the whole system and will only have a part of it. Does he think the American Government may steal roads over there?

Mr. VEIN: They might pay nothing for them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will they not pay for them if they keep them?

Mr. VIEN: They might pay nothing for them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are not going to steal any roads, so how shall we be paying for the whole road and getting only a part of it? The American Government, presumably, would be just as honest in dealing with a company whose stock was owned by the Dominion Government as in dealing with any other company. Would the hon. member suggest that they would not? If negotiations subsequently take place with the American Government we, as the shareholders of the Grand Trunk, will be in the same position as the present shareholders are to-day. There is no difference in the world. Now, referring to the last question, how much money will it take? In the opinion of the authors of the Drayton-Acworth report it would take the amount the hon. gentleman stated.

Mr. VIEN: In 1916.

Mr. MEIGHEN: At that time. The Grand Trunk Railway asked to be heard before the Government in protest against the finding in that respect, and produced what they believed—and what appeared strong reasons for believing—that it would not take that amount, and that their road was in fair condition. They claim to be fully convinced that that is the case. In order to acertain which is right a thorough investigation will be necessary. We are satisfied that the margin between the two is not very great; there may be some difference. That investigation must precede the Board of Arbitration, and our evidence must go before that board just as it went in the case of the acquisition of the Canadian Northern stock. Our evidence will go before the Board of Arbitration in thorough form. The hon. member says that we cannot form a conclusion ourselves as to the condition the road is in.

Mr. VIEN: That has a bearing on the compensation to be paid, but it does not bear on the amount that the Government will find itself obliged to ask Parliament to vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When we ask Parliament to vote a sum we will give full details.

We are not asking that now. It bears on the compensation to be paid.

Mr. VIEN: But we commit ourselves to come to that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly we do. I said that evidence would be produced to show what would be required. My hon. friend argued that we as members do not know anything about the condition of the road. He said that we could not tell simply by travelling over one line. "We all know," he said, "that the Toronto-Montreal road is good, and is one of the best equipped roads." If we all know that, cannot hon. members who travel over other lines know something about them? Surely we are as competent to judge of one line as another. We are not experts, but we know enough to know that there has been no substantial variation in upkeep from the condition in 1916, and that is sufficient for our purpose. We will go before the Board of Arbitration and endeavour to establish our contention that owing to insufficient upkeep there should be a smaller amount paid for the stock. That is the place to bring forward those details.

Mr. FOURNIER: What amount has been expended on the Grand Trunk for maintenance per mile in 1916, 1917 and 1918, as compared with the Canadian Pacific expenditure?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If that information is not in this memoranda, it will certainly be given.

Mr. McMASTER: I should not like to allow something which the minister has said to give an inaccurate impression to the country. The report of the Royal Commission to inquire into the railways and transportation in Canada, commonly known as the Drayton-Acworth report, has been referred to in most commendatory terms by the Minister of the Interior. I think it is the treasure house of facts upon which a number of us are relying in our study of this question. I gathered from what the minister said that according to this report it would take $21,000,000 to put the Grand Trunk in proper condition in 1916. That is not what the Drayton-Acworth report says, but a very much larger amount. On page xxxiv the commissioners state:

> Putting together revenue and capital expenditure, we find that the Grand Trunk Railway, in the opinion of its own officers, requires over $51,000,000 spent upon it to put it in a position to meet the requirements of its to-day's business.

[Mr. Meighen.]

I make that statement because I think that, quite unwittingly, some hon. members who have discussed this question may have given the impression to the House and the country that a very much smaller amount was required.

Mr. VIEN: What I mentioned, and what I think I said, was that $21,000,000 which should have been used for the maintenance of the road and rolling stock was diverted for dividend purposes. That appears on page 99 of the report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My own recollection is the same as to the figures, and that is the amount we really ought to be discussing at this point. It may take more money for the road's requirements, but that extra money will all be represented in value in the road; that is to say, a terminal may be needed here and something else there, but that is not due to depreciation, but simply to the development of the concern. The figure which the hon. member (Mr. Vien) quoted is the figure that ought to be used when we are arguing on what sum the Drayton-Acworth report finds should be spent in order to bring the road as it is now into a reasonable condition of upkeep. The Drayton-Acworth report says that that sum should have been used on the road in order to keep it up to a reasonable degree of maintenance, instead of being paid out in dividends. That is the amount in question in this connection.

My hon. friend (Mr. Fournier) will find the answer to his question on pages 48 and 49 of the memoranda. If he will look at the bottom of page 49 particularly, he will see that the maintenance of equipment figures are given as follows: 1918, $14,434,-684, as against only $9,380,688 the year before, an increase of about 40 per cent; 1916, $7,329,455; 1915, $6,847,059.

Mr. FOURNIER: Will the minister complete the answer to my question by bringing down the railway statistics showing the Canadian Pacific Railway expenditures per mile?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. FOURNIER: The same expenditures as the Grand Trunk Railway.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can give those figures for I remember seeing them myself.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I must persist in my previous question which the minister seems to treat lightly, that is, as regards the list of shareholders. The minister says that it is very difficult to get that list because the list of to-day may be changed to-morrow. Surely it is easy to obtain the list of shareholders in the books of the company on the 9th of October. I hope the minister will get that list and table it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know how easy it will be. I have never made any inquiry regarding a single shareholder, and I do not think we are in the least concerned as to that.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Public opinion is under the impression,—to use a popular expression,—that there is a "nigger" in the wood-pile, and we want to know who he is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You will have to hunt throught a hundred and eighty thousand sticks in the wood-pile to get at that nigger. Perhaps my hon. friend will mention the name of the individual. If he does we can the more easily find the nigger.

Mr. VIEN: The minister knows his name.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The minister is in a far better position than I am to mention the name.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If my hon. friend depends on me for that information, then the name cannot be mentioned and we are done with that subject.

Mr. McKENZIE: Can the minister tell us the direct obligation of the Grand Trunk Company to the Canadian people by reason of guarantees given by that company in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific? How much money would the Grand Trunk Company owe to the people to-day if we should insist upon their paying up all their obligations? Is it the intention of the Government that the money represented by those obligations shall be a credit in favour of Canada upon the award?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Any indebtedness owing by the Grand Trunk to the Government will certainly be a credit to the Government in the award. Any indebtedness of the Grand Trunk to the Government will have to be paid by the Grand Trunk before any of the shareholders can get anything.

Mr. FIELDING: Do you mean its loans?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, certainly; all indebtedness owing by the Grand Trunk. As to the Grand Trunk's obligations to the Grand Trunk Pacific, that will be treated as an obligation on the part of the Grand Trunk Company and will be a liability the same as any other liability, to be considered by the arbitrators before any award at all is made in respect of this stock. The Grand Trunk Pacific obligations will be considered the same as all other obligations.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister give the exact figures as to how much the Government is claiming from the Grand Trunk to-day on account of these obligations?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The direct obligations of the Grand Trunk to the Government are not very high.

Mr. McKENZIE: Direct and indirect. They guaranteed some bonds which we guaranteed afterwards and which we did not pay, and we fall back upon them for their guarantee. I should like to know how much is involved directly and indirectly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: These figures will be given exactly. I think they can be found in the book, but I will make a note of the question. I understand my honourable friend to ask for the amounts of money paid by the Government directly in respect of which the Grand Trunk was liable ahead of the Government. That is to say, supposing the Grand Trunk Company failed to pay the obligations in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific in regard to which it was liable ahead of any liability we might be under, and we paid the liability, the question is; what is the amount that the Grand Trunk owes us in the result? These figures can be given. But I want my honourable friend to understand this: the Grand Trunk made certain engagements in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific but did not meet them. They were not made by the Government direct. The loans were made by the Grand Trunk in aiding the Grand Trunk Pacific to pay the obligations itself. That is the way in which the main policy was pursued. So that no obligation direct from the Grand Trunk to the Government arises out of that. But the Grand Trunk's obligations in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific aggregated about five million dollars a year two years ago, and will aggregate about seven million dollars a year three years hence.

Mr. VIEN: Do the officials of the Grand Trunk acknowledge that liability?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly. They never disputed their liability on account of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. VIEN: They did not acknowledge it at the time the Drayton-Acworth report was made. They contended that the fact that the Government did not live up to the agreement of 1903 relieved them to a certain extent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They claimed that because of the Canadian Northern running through Northern Ontario, thus raising the cost of labour to them constituted a moral obligation. I do not think they seriously contend that they are relieved of their legal liability in regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. FIELDING: The minister says that the Government will claim in the award the payment of all obligations of the Grand Trunk. I accept the assurance that the Government intend to make that claim, but will the minister make it clear in the resolution that that claim is to be regarded as a set-off?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see how it could be anything else.

Mr. FIELDING: That is the more reason why it should be made clear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is clear already there is no reason why it should be made clearer.

Mr. FIELDING: There is such a thing as making assurance doubly sure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman can show that there is any doubt on the subject it will be made clear. Certainly any obligation of the Grand Trunk to the Government will be taken into account. If the arbitrators were to find that these stocks were worth fifteen million dollars but that the Grand Trunk owed the Government ten million dollars, then the stock would in reality be worth only five million.

Mr. FIELDING: The arbitrators would not be called upon to determine the claim of the Government but only the value of the stocks, unless there is a clear understanding that there is a set-off there will be trouble. It is not clear that the arbitrators are to sit in judgment upon the justice of the Government's claim.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Every claim that is made has to be established before the Board of Arbitrators, who must be convinced that it is a good claim before they consider the determination of the value of the stock.

Mr. FIELDING: Does this contemplate that the arbitrators shall enter into the question of a set-off? They are only called upon to fix the value of the stock. That is the beginning and end of their duties and I do not think they would have any right to enter into the other question. The Government would have to have recourse to some other means of establishing that claim as a set-off.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not agree with the hon. gentleman at all. The Government will claim every dollar that is owed them by the Grand Trunk.

Mr. FIELDING: But that is not before the arbitrators.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes it is, everything is before the arbitrators that affects the value of the stock; the hon. gentleman will agree to that?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is not one thing that affects the value of the stock the debts of the company? Consequently, every debt of the company is before the arbitrators. A debt to the Government is just the same as any other debt and must be before the arbitrators. But let me say to my hon. friend, I will have the point he has raised looked into from the legal standpoint, and if there is any doubt it will be cleared up.

Mr. VIEN: Suppose the arbitrators value this stock at $15,000,000 and they find that the company is indebted to the Government to the extent of $20,000,000 there will be $5,000,000 coming back to the Government. But they could not value and arbitrate upon that if the arbitration is along the lines of the resolution. If the arbitration is along the lines of the resolution they can value the claim of the Government only by way of set-off to the valuation which they put upon the shares. If the claim of the Government is in excess of the value they put on the shares they must have some jurisdiction to give to the Government a further judgment against the company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government can take steps to protect itself without their jurisdiction. In so far as the arbitration is concerned, the most favourable verdict the Government could get would be a declaration that the four stocks were worth nothing. Suppose the four stocks are in the view of the arbitrators worth nothing, the company will still owe us all the money they owed us before and the debt will be the same as it was before.

Mr. VIEN: It may be doubtful if you enter into an agreement that closes the whole of the negotiations that have been taking place between the Government and the Grand Trunk.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman knows better than that, because he is a lawyer. We are arbitrating on the value of the shares. The Government is an entity on the one hand and the company is an entity on the other. The value is one thing and the debts owed to the Government are owed to the Government still. We may not be able to collect them, but we will be just as able to collect them as we are to-day. The company will not be worth one dollar less or one dollar more; it will be just in the same position exactly.

Mr. VIEN: The minister does not wish to convey the suggestion to the committee that this arrangement that is proposed does not close the transaction between the Government and the company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not close them or open them up; it leaves them exactly as they are. We are arbitrating the value of the stock owned by the shareholders and not the value of anything owned by the company.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CAHILL: Does the Government intend to hold the Grand Trunk liable on the Grand Trunk Pacific agreement?

Mr. J. D. REID: The guarantees of the Grand Trunk Company with reference to the Grand Trunk Pacific have been mentioned two or three times to-day. Of course, the Grand Trunk will be held responsible for those guarantees in the arbitration proceedings. That is one of the things that the arbitrators must take into consideration.

Mr. CAHILL: What annual expenditure would it involve on the part of the Grand Trunk to live up to those guarantees?

Mr. J. D. REID: In the papers that have been submitted there is a list of the bonds guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway, showing the total amount of interest liability. I quoted the list this afternoon. If the hon. gentleman will refer to page 51 he will read the following:

Guarantees by the Grand Trunk Railway Company have been made for the Grand Trunk Pacific of $97,301,253—$62,422,000 for principal and interest and $34,879,253 for interest only. Detail of this is in an attached statement. $25,000,000 of the foregoing total of $62,422,000 is guaranteeing loans made by the Dominion Government.

That is the answer.

Mr. CAHILL: How does the Government arrive at the conclusion that the Grand Trunk is able to pay this liability of something like six or seven million dollars interest annually in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific, also to discharge the interest on the debenture stock and on the 4 per cent guaranteed stock, and still leave an equity to be arbitrated? Where does the minister get his figures from?

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. gentleman will remember from the discussions that have taken place from time to time with reference to the loans made to the Grand Trunk Pacific that the Grand Trunk Railway Company has never paid out of earnings of the Grand Trunk Railway system any of the interest on the Grand Trunk Pacific guarantees. The interest on the guaranteed mortgages of the Grand Trunk Pacific have always been paid out of loans from time to time advanced by the Government. So that the old Grand Trunk system always had its full earnings to pay the interest on its debenture stock, its guaranteed stock, and its first, second, and third preference stock; and, as has been shown, it always earned sufficient money to pay the interest, say $7,000,000 in round figures, on the original debenture stock issued for the construction of the old Grand Trunk railway and the purchase of the Great Western railway.

Mr. CAHILL: What does the minister mean by always? The Grand Trunk Railway was incorporated in 1851.

Mr. J. D. REID: From 1851 onward the Grand Trunk Railway system always earned sufficient to pay interest on the debenture stock issued for the construction of the old Grand Trunk railway. Some years later—the date will be found in this sessional paper—the Grand Trunk Railway Company purchased the Great Western line and issued further debenture stock. From the time the company purchased that line it always earned sufficient to pay interest.

Mr. CAHILL: On what?

Mr. J. D. REID: On the debenture stock issued for the purchase of the Great Western. Later the guaranteed stock was issued. Therefore, after having issued that guaranteed stock for other construction and improvements, the company was always able to earn a sufficient amount to pay the $7,000,000 interest on the stocks that I have mentioned and the $2,500,000 interest on the guaranteed stock.

Mr. CAHILL: Since when?

Mr. J. D. REID: Since the guaranteed stock was issued.

Mr. CAHILL: When was that issued?

Mr. J. D. REID: I could not give the date offhand, but it will be found in the sessional paper. I will look it up and inform the hon. member a little later. But I say the Grand Trunk Railway Company was always able to pay that interest and still have a surplus. The company then issued the first, second, and third preference stock, the details of which are set out on page 56 of the sessional paper. The hon. member will see, starting from 1906, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company paid the interest on the guaranteed stock of 4 per cent; on the first preference stock of 5 per cent; on the second preference stock of 5 per cent; and on the third preference stock of 3 per cent, or a total of a little over $4,000,000. If the hon. member will refer to that statement, he will see that between 1906 and 1917 the Grand Trunk Railway Company paid the interest on its guaranteed stock annually, and also the interest on the first preference stock except in 1914 and 1915; and on the second preference stock it also paid the interest with the exception of those two years. On the third preference it paid the interest in 1906 and 1907, and also in 1910, 1911, 1912 and 1913. On the common stock, of course, it never paid any dividends at all. That stock was issued practically at the time the Grand Trunk Railway was built.

Mr. CAHILL: Let us get back to this 4 per cent guaranteed stock. The official reports of the London Stock Exchange show that the Grand Trunk did not pay 4 per cent on the guaranteed bonds all the time during the last ten years. Before that time it paid the interest in various amounts ranging from 2 to 3 per cent. What I want to know is how the Government arrives at the conclusion that this 4 per cent guaranteed stock has a value to-day, if we are to hold the Grand Trunk Railway Company liable for the Grand Trunk Pacific guarantee? In other words, how does the Government figure that there is any equity in this 4 per cent guaranteed stock?

Mr. J. D. REID: The honourable member I think stated that the Stock Exchange reports showed that the Grand Trunk Railway Company had not paid any interest on the guaranteed stock for the last ten years.

Mr. CAHILL: Not all the time.

Mr. J. D. REID: Well, we have the official document submitted to the House showing that the interest on the guaranteed stock was paid from 1906 down to 1916. There is not any doubt whatever about that.

Mr. CAHILL: How about 1914?

Mr. J. D. REID: In 1914 the Grand Trunk Railway Company paid 3½ per cent instead of 4 per cent; in other words, they paid $2,129,166.67 dividends on the guaranteed stock instead of $2,433,333.33, or ½ per cent less. So that, during that ten year period they did pay the full interest with the exception of the ½ per cent in that particular year when the war started.

Now, the Grand Trunk Railway Company is liable in this way: it guaranteed the interest on a certain portion of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway bonds, and, as I understand it, the company agreed that it would not pay any dividends out of its earnings, until this bonded interest had been first paid. In other words, it defaulted in payment of that interest, it could not pay its shareholders any dividends on their stock. That is where of course the company is in a very awkward position. If the company took the earnings that would ordinarily go to the shareholders in order to pay the interest on the guaranteed stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, then of course it would not have anything left for its own shareholders. That is why the company is pressing us to get a settlement so that it can be put in a position to pay dividends to its own shareholders.

Mr. CAHILL: Is it the intention then of the Government to hold the Grand Trunk Company to its undertaking?

Mr. J. D. REID: Certainly. The arbitrators must take into consideration the liabilities of all subsidiary companies of the Grand Trunk Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific is a subsidiary company. We do not release the Grand Trunk in any way from responsibility for the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the arbitrators must take that responsibility into consideration. As I said this afternoon, if the arbitrators consider that the future of the Grand Trunk Pacific does not promise anything better than its present outlook, they may wipe it out and not allow the Grand Trunk Company anything on these first, second and third preference stocks.

Mr. CAHILL: There is the point exactly. Before you undertake to make the Grand Trunk responsible for the Grand Trunk Pacific enterprise, you transfer £12,500,000 of stock into bonds,—or guaranteed stock,—it is the same thing. That is $60,833,000 worth of new security that you issue. This guaranteed stock, by the way, is not a bond; it is not debenture stock or anything that might be regarded as a security of any kind outside of the stock; it is nothing but a first preference stock. By your action under this Bill you proceed to make that $60,000,000 worth of stock equivalent to a bond and you put it in front of your claim. Before you undertake to get anything from the Grand Trunk you give them this $60,000,000 worth of securities which you cannot touch. In other words, you say: You are not able to pay your bills; therefore we will make this $60,000,000 worth of stock equivalent to a bond,—this stock which has not paid any dividends in the last two years, which has not paid four per cent continuously for ten years, and which previous to that time had paid varying dividends of less than four per cent. You make this $60,000,000 worth of stock a four per cent Dominion Government bond. And then, if there is anything left after that of what might be more or less worthless first, second and third preference and common stock, you say that you will make them live up to their Grand Trunk Pacific obligation. But why do you put this $60,000,000 into the treasury of the Grand Trunk before you undertake to make them live up to their guarantees in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Mr. J. D. REID: So far as the debenture stock and this guaranteed stock is concerned, the Grand Trunk have always paid the dividends.

Mr. CAHILL: Not always.

Mr. J. D. REID: Well, as I understand it, they have practically always paid them. During the last ten years anyway, with the exception of the last two war years, the old Grand Trunk has been paying the interest. Now, a large amount of money went into this railway for the first, second and third preference stock, as well as some $30,000,000 for the common stock. The Government agree to pay the dividend on the guaranteed stock, because it has been earned, and more besides. But if the arbitrators should decide not to allow the Grand Trunk any interest on the first, second and third preferred stock and not to allow them anything for the common stock, the Company would certainly be paying a very heavy penalty for entering into the Grand Trunk Pacific arrangement.

Mr. CAHILL: Where do you arrive at the information that the Grand Trunk were able to pay this four per cent, or that they earned this four per cent? On what basis are you offering to pay, or did you offer to pay in the first place the $2,500,000, $3,000,000 and $3,600,000?

Mr. J. D. REID: The basis is this: The interest has actually been paid for so many years; and the Drayton-Acworth report admitted that the company had earned and paid not only the $7,000,000, but also the average of $3,600,000 per annum—$2,500,000 of it on the guaranteed stock and $1,100,000 on the other. That statement in the Drayton-Acworth report is evidence for us, as is the statement of the Grand Trunk that they actually paid the dividends, not from capital but from actual earnings.

Mr. CAHILL: Then I understand the minister to say that the Drayton-Acworth report is the basis upon which he is arguing; that is his starting point. He knows, of course, that the Drayton-Acworth report affirmed that those dividends should not have been paid; that they had been paid out of what should have gone to betterments and improvements; that the road did not earn dividends on the debenture stock and the cost of upkeep and maintenance of way. If that is the case, where does my hon. friend's argument land him?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Drayton-Acworth report says that a portion of this amount that was paid out by way of dividend—not all—should have gone into the road. However, the Grand Trunk Railway Company take issue with that; they say that this statement in the report is not correct. But all of that will have to be brought before the board of arbitrators. If the company can convince the arbitrators that the report is wrong, the arbitrators will, of course, act accordingly. The Government will have their solicitor to take issue with them.

Mr. CAHILL: Where does the minister start from? What is the basis that he is working on? He does not accept the Drayton-Acworth report; he does not accept the Grand Trunk statement. On what information does he come to the conclusion that this $60,000,000 is valuable at all, and that after that is taken into consideration there might be something left to arbitrate? This seems to me to be a most absurd argument.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not think I can explain it more fully than I have; I have tried to explain the situation as well as I could. All I can say is that when the matter comes before the board of arbitrators the Government will take every possible step to put up their case and to secure whatever evidence they can to make the arbitration as fair as possible in the interests of the Government.

Mr. CAHILL: On the same basis as the Canadian Northern arbitration?

Mr. J. D. REID: Personally I feel that the solicitors who acted for the Government on the Canadian Northern arbitration were as good as there are in Canada.

Mr. DENIS: Perhaps I shall be told that the answer has already been given, but it appears to me that the statement of affairs between the Government of Canada and the Grand Trunk Railway system has not yet been established, and that so far all the figures have not been given indicating what is actually due by the Grand Trunk Railway Company to the Dominion of Canada. In my opinion, the indebtedness of the Grand Trunk towards the Dominion of Canada is under three headings: First, the Grand Trunk has guaranteed the obligations of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and as the Grand Trunk Pacific is now the property of the Dominion of Canada——

Mr. J. D. REID: It is not yet.

Mr. DENIS: Well, it is practically the same thing, and for the sake of argument, I take it for granted that it is, and the minister himself brought forward the argument that it is this afternoon when he said that the country would have control of 22,000 miles of railway, for in that mileage he included the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is, after the arbitration.

Mr. DENIS: For the sake of argument, I am taking it for granted that sooner or later the Dominion of Canada will become sole proprietor of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. Starting from that point, I state first that the Grand Trunk Railway has guaranteed the obligations of the Grand Trunk Pacific to the amount of $97,301,253. I find this on page 51—and before going any further, I should like to ask the minister if I am correct in this.

Mr. J. D. REID: I take it for granted that is correct, because those are the official statements that have been handed to me and accordingly have been placed before the House.

Mr. DENIS: Consequently, the first point is established, as to the liability of the Grand Trunk to the Grand Trunk Pacific and thence to the Dominion of Canada; that is, $97,301,253. Second, what is actually due directly by the Grand Trunk Railway to the Dominion of Canada? I do not know that an exact answer has been given this afternoon on this item. Third, what is due by the Grand Trunk Railway indirectly to the Dominion of Canada and on what account? It is only after these three items have been placed before the House that we shall be in a position to say exactly what is actually due by the Grand Trunk Railway to the Dominion of Canada. After these figures have been made available, I shall have something more to say about the matter.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member asks for information as to what the Grand Trunk actually owe the Government, and also what they are liable for as far as the Dominion Government is concerned. I was just looking to see if I have that information here, but if not, I will furnish it. If I cannot look it up before we adjourn this evening, I will have it here to-morrow. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) tells me that the information is to be found on pages 51 and 52, where it says:

> Besides the guarantees to the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk Railway Company have guaranteed the following:—

Then on page 52, we find:

> Grand Trunk Railway Company, outstanding June 25, 1918:—

There is a list showing all their liabilities.

Mr. VIEN: On page 51 are given the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific, but the liabilities of the Grand Trunk in respect of the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific guaranteed by the Government are not given. If I understand the matter aright, there are two classes of debentures of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. There is a class of debentures guaranteeed first by the Grand Trunk and second, by the Government, and there is a class of debentures guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway only.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, but the Grand Trunk Railway Company is not liable for the bonds guaranteed by the Government on the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. VIEN: Is not the Grand Trunk Railway Company guarantor to the Government of the bonds guaranteed by the Government for the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, it is not, it is liable only for what it guaranteed itself. The Grand Trunk Railway system is not liable for the bonds that were guaranteed by the Dominion Government.

Mr. DENIS: Would it be possible to get from the minister an approximate figure as to the liabilities of the Grand Trunk to the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Grand Trunk Railway Company owes the Dominion of Canada some comparatively small amounts, and there are, I believe, counter accounts against that.

Mr. DENIS: Do they run into tens of millions?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. I look over the Grand Trunk accounts and I do not find it so. I do not say that there is no obligation; I think there is; but it is not in large figures at all. The Grand Trunk Railway Company did not borrow from the Government of Canada; it was the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company that borrowed, and the Grand Trunk in respect of those borrowings did not give its guarantee. I think it did in respect of one, and I am sure that will be found in this pamphlet although it is difficult to trace it just at the moment. I find this on page 53:

$15,000,000—4 per cent Government loan, due July 1923, secured by Grand Trunk Pacific debentures and guaranteed Grand Trunk Railway.

That is one. On the same page I find:

$10,000,000—4 per cent Dominion Government loan, due May, 1919, guaranteed by Grand Trunk Railway, secured by Grand Trunk Pacific bonds.

That is guaranteed by the Grand Trunk also, and that, I understand, was not paid.

Mr. VIEN: That is what I mean.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is an outstanding liability by the Grand Trunk to the Government secured on the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. DENIS: Outside of the $97,000,000 owed by the Grand Trunk to the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it would not be right to say that the Grand Trunk owes this money to the Government. The Grand Trunk Pacific owes it to the Government, and it is secured by bonds on the Grand Trunk Pacific. But the Grand Trunk is in the position of an obligor, as a guarantor of that debt, and consequently inability to collect from the Grand Trunk Pacific gives us right of recourse as against the Grand Trunk, and once we choose to exercise that right of recourse the Grand Trunk will then be compellable to pay, and this liability will, of course, necessarily be considered by the Board of Arbitration in deciding whether there is any value in the stock to be arbitrated upon. There are the liabilities of the Grand Trunk on bonds on the road that were initially guaranteed by the Grand Trunk. The first mortgage bonds are guaranteed by the Grand Trunk, the second mortgage bonds by the Government.

Mr. FIELDING: The first mortgage bonds by the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The first mortgage bonds by the Government, the second mortgage bonds by the Grand Trunk, and then those others come after that.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: If the minister will look at page 26, there is an amount of $15,142,633 which is described as "exclusive of Government loan to Grand Trunk Railway." What does that mean?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that is the original loan made about the time of confederation or before.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will that be paid back?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That has never been considered. I think the people of Canada have pretty much come to the conclusion that that sum was a subsidy, although as far as I know it still stands in the position of a loan even legally at the present time. But, as I understand the matter, neither interest nor principal has even been requested from the Grand Trunk Company. That represents all that the Grand Trunk Company has secured in the way of subsidies on its lines.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Has the Grand Trunk admitted its liability in respect of the guarantee of the Grand Trunk Pacific, or is it a matter of dispute as to whether they are legally liable to pay anything in respect of that guarantee?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I could not say that the Grand Trunk has admitted its liability. It has not done so in express documentary form, at all events. At the same time I could not say there is any question about it. If I am asked my opinion I would say there is no question whatever about it. The Grand Trunk liability is absolutely intact.

Mr. CAHILL: About what would that liability amount to?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It all appears in these papers. That information will be found about page 50 and the next two or three pages.

Mr. CAHILL: That is the $97,000,000?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is on page 51. Guarantees by the Grand Trunk Railway Company have been made for the Grand Trunk Pacific of $97,201,253—$62,422,000 for principal and interest, and $34,879,253 for interest only. Detail of this is in an attached statement. Twenty-five million dollars of the foregoing total of $62,422,000 is guaranteeing loans made by the Dominion Government. That $26,000,000 covers the $10,000,000 and the $15,000,000 to which I have just referred. In so far as guarantees in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific are concerned, that would appear to be all.

Mr. CAHILL: Suppose the Government were to hold the Grand Trunk to their obligations in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific, about how much money would it take to settle their obligations?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would take the whole thing to settle it.

Mr. CAHILL: The $97,000,000?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, of course, because that is the liability. But the Grand Trunk will naturally claim: "We have security for that, we have the Grand Trunk Pacific." And, if they are able to show that that security is a commercial asset and affords ample protection, the arbitrators may find that that liability amounts to nothing. But in our opinion, in my opinion certainly, the arbitrators would not likely so find. If the security in the Grand Trunk Pacific was equal to the obligations against it, the Grand Trunk would not have announced themselves two years ago at the end of their tether, nor have stated a few months ago that they could not operate the road any longer.

Mr. CAHILL: If the Grand Trunk were able to pay $30,000,000, would that relieve them of their obligations?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would not to me.

Mr. CAHILL: What I want to get at is this. According to the stock exchange reports the total value of the first, second and third preference and the common stock, on September 11, 1919, was $28,000,000. That is all the assets that is left in the Grand Trunk to arbitrate. My hon. friend claims that $30,000,000 would not offset their obligations. Then why do you guarantee the $27,000,000 worth of what is called guaranteed stock? Why do you guarantee that stock and put it out of your reach if you are going to hold the Grand Trunk to their obligations?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does not my hon. friend see that the $28,000,000—I do not know whether he has figured it rightly—is the value as reflected in the market, and in that reflection the Grand Trunk's liability was taken into account. Does he imagine that anybody who buys Grand Trunk stock pays no attention to Grand Trunk liabilities, including its liabilities to the Grand Trunk Pacific? So if the reflection in the market is a correct reflection—and personally I do not think so—the Government would have to assume the liabilities, including the Grand Trunk Pacific, and pay this besides.

Mr. CAHILL: Certainly not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member shakes his head and smiles as if I did not understand it.

Mr. CAHILL: Quite so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will hear my hon. friend at it.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister said this afternoon he did not understand much about stocks. I can believe that. The total value of these stocks as reflected by the stock exchange is $28,000,000. The minister just stated that he would not consider $30,000,000 a sufficient sum to settle the Grand Trunk's liability to Canada. But there is another asset in the Grand Trunk at the present time, and until this legislation goes through, amounting to $27,000,000 more, and that is the $60,000,000 worth of guaranteed stock quoted in the market at 45. That makes its value $27,000,000. In the last few days it has gone up to 60, which means that my hon. friend has made it possible for some persons to gain $9,000,000 on account of this legislation. My hon. friend takes precautions to make this $60,000,000 worth of stock safe from the actions of the Canadian Government in respect of the Grand Trunk's liability to the Grand Trunk Pacific, and he only leaves himself about $28,000,000, if that is the worth of the stock, to cover the total obligations of the Grand Trunk with respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I do not see how my hon. friend can get away from the fact that he is giving away the assets of the people of Canada when he guarantees payment on a stock that has paid 4 per cent at times, less at other times, and has failed to pay a dividend in the last two years, on the ground that the people who own that stock own something. As a means of getting even with them we are going to guarantee this stock. I cannot understand my hon. friend's process of reasoning.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thoroughly agree that the hon. gentleman does not understand it. It is difficult to tell where to start to disentangle the lot of absurdities that the hon. gentleman puts before the committee.

Mr. CAHILL: You said that last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He says that $28,000,000 is the market value of the three preference stock and the common stock, and $27,000,000 the market value of the guaranteed stock. Now we are arbitrating on what we should pay for these three preference and the common stocks. He says that they are only worth in the market $28,000,000, and the company's liability is $30,000,000 in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I told him a moment ago, and I am sure if he will give his mind a chance he will see it, that those who are estimating the market value of Grand Trunk stock estimate it less because of its Grand Trunk Pacific liabilities. Is not that so? Does my hon. friend mean to suggest that if the Grand Trunk had not its Grand Trunk Pacific entanglements its stock would not be worth more in the market—I will go step by step slowly and give the hon. gentleman every chance—Is not that correct? Of course, it would be worth more. That is to say, it is worth less to-day because of those liabilities. So far as the estimate of the market buyers is concerned, we can afford to pay $27,000,000 for the three preference stocks and the common stock, assume the Grand Trunk liabilities and come out exactly even. Is not that correct? So we have $27,000,000 to come and go upon if their estimate is correct. I would refuse to accept their estimate. I think it is high. But we leave it to the arbitrators; that is all there is to it.

Mr. CAHILL: But before you leave it to them, you take away this $60,000,000 of stock which they might have to pay over to the Dominion Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. CAHILL: They have ninety-seven million dollars of a liability and in order to make them safe you guarantee this stock and convert it into practically Dominion Government bonds and then you only leave them this twenty-eight million dollars of more or less worthless stock to arbitrate upon. You do not mean to say that you are going to take a mortgaged property to meet all this liability. Of course, not. You know better than that. So you virtually make this sixty million dollars a mortgage, or bond, or debenture—whatever you wish to call it—and place this in their hands, and it only leaves $28,000,000 worth of stock to deal with. So that if their obligation is $30,000,000 you know you are $2,000,000 short to start with, but you will arbitrate to see if there is a value still in the $28,000,000 worth of stock. You say that $30,000,000 would be less than you would expect to settle the whole undertaking. There is absolutely no reason in the argument, and I venture to say that when my hon. friend is through with the transaction he will find that he has let the Dominion of Canada in for a vast sum of money, releasing the Grand Trunk Pacific from their obligation as far as this $60,000,000 is concerned. All the Dominion may take is $28,000,000 of more or less worthless stock for an obligation of $97,000,000.

Mr. FOURNIER: If I understood the Minister of Railways correctly this afternoon, he said that in taking over the Grand Trunk we were assuming the bonded debt of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, no. There is no specific assumption of that liability.

Mr. FOURNIER: Is there not $70,000,000 worth of Grand Trunk Pacific bonds which are guaranteed by the old Grand Trunk?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a large amount.

Mr. FOURNIER: Do we not become responsible for the payment of those bonds?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No more than we are to-day.

Mr. FOURNIER: The minister said that for ten years the Grand Trunk had been able to distribute a million dollars a year in dividends. Was not this because the Government paid interest on Grand Trunk Pacific bonds which were guaranteed by the old Grand Trunk?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. FOURNIER: If the Grand Trunk had paid interest due on Grand Trunk Pacific bonds would it have been able to pay dividends to its shareholders?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would not have been able to within the last two or three years. The Grand Trunk Pacific paid its own dividends, but it paid them because we lent them money, on the security of the Grand Trunk Pacific, to do so. Now, the Grand Trunk has its own liabilities in relation to the Grand Trunk Pacific. If, in the minds of the arbitrators, those liabilities are greater than the Grand Trunk Pacific is security for, the award will be reduced accordingly. But we will certainly argue—and I think correctly—that if the Grand Trunk Company is called on to discharge its liabilities to the Grand Trunk Pacific, the fact being that the Grand Trunk Pacific cannot discharge them itself, then they would be in a position to pay dividends on these four stocks.

Mr. FOURNIER: If the Grand Trunk Pacific went into liquidation or failed to earn its fixed charges, would not the old Grand Trunk have to pay about $3,000,000 a year interest on the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds which are not guaranteed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, or more than that.

Mr. FOURNIER: If it paid interest on these bonds would there be any possibility of its paying dividends upon any of its preferred stock?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There would be a possibility, of course.

Mr. FOURNIER: If it did not pay, then what would be the value of the preferred stock?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not be a very good judge of that. One reason that would make it difficult to judge of that would be that the common stock lies there for which $30,000,000 was paid but on which no dividend has ever been paid, and the prospect has never been darker than the last year. But it has always had a value. It would be impossible for me to say that the preferred stock would have no value.

Mr. FOURNIER: My hon. friend must have all the information. Would he read to the Committee the letter written by Sir Alfred Smithers to Sir Robert Borden three years ago in which the statement was made that the Grand Trunk was at the end of its tether?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have read the letter.

Mr. FOURNIER: Will the Government say that it is possible for the Grand Trunk to earn enough to pay a dividend upon its debentures and guaranteed stock and also to pay the interest upon the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds which it has guaranteed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We certainly would not say it could. We will argue that it could not. The Grand Trunk, on the other hand, say: "We ought to be permitted to make a revenue, and we certainly cannot make it unless we are given rates which are reasonable under conditions such as now obtain." In a word, everything depends on rates. It would be possible for them to do it if the rates were higher, but the Government will argue that to keep the rates at a reasonable figure, having regard to all conditions, they could not discharge their obligations to the Grand Trunk Pacific and pay dividends on the preferred stock or any stock. That is our contention.

Mr. FOURNIER: Will the minister say, in view of its commitments in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada is a solvent concern?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, we will argue that they could not pay dividends and discharge all their obligations. But I am sure the Grand Trunk will argue very strenuously that they could. I am not in the position of a judge in the matter; that will be for the arbitrators to decide.

Mr. FOURNIER: If it is not a solvent concern how can either its preferred stock or any stock have any value, and what is there to arbitrate?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the judges find that it is not solvent they will find that the value is nothing; that is all. My hon. friend must see that the long series of questions he has asked rests on the answer to one, and when that answer is given there is not very much object in answering the rest.

Mr. FOURNIER: The minister will pardon me if I put another question. Could not the Government obtain the Grand Trunk by liquidation without paying anything for either preferred or common stock?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is something which, to answer with certainty, would require the gift of prophecy as well as of business judgment. It would depend upon many circumstances. It would depend upon the action of the Railway Commission with regard to rates, and also upon the attitude and intentions of other railway people as to the Grand Trunk. It might well be that there are railroad people in the world—perhaps in Canada—who could save the Grand Trunk from the position by enlarging their own system.

Mr. DENIS: Mr. Chairman, I have tried to find out what was the debt of the Grand Trunk to the Dominion of Canada, and although the exact figures have not been given I do not desire to reproach any one in the matter. For the sake of the argument which I I now intend to advance, let us suppose that if the Grand Trunk Railway were ready to pay what it owes directly or indirectly to the Dominion of Canada we might give them their receipt in full for, say, fifty million dollars. I think the minister said awhile ago that it was over $30,000,000. On the other hand, there are responsibilities or guarantees of over $97,000,000. We have to take some figure, so let us say $50,000,000 for the sake of argument. Consequently, I consider from this point of view that the Grand Trunk Railway Company now owes the country $50,000,000. Before the Grand Trunk Railway Company can pay any dividends on its guaranteed, common or preferred stocks, it has to meet its obligations towards the Dominion of Canada. More particularly the Grand Trunk Railway Company cannot pay any interest on what is called the four per cent guaranteed stock, amounting to £12,500,000 until it meets its obligations towards the Dominion of Canada. Consequently, this $50,000,000 debt that we hold, as against the Grand Trunk Railway Company, until this agreement is put through, is a preference over this block of stock amounting to £12,500,000. After the deal has been put through and the Government has passed the agreement that is now under discussion, this amount of £12,500,000 will have preference over the debt of $50,000,000 which is now due by the Grand Trunk to the Dominion of Canada. I am going to explain. We will still have the same debt; the debt will have the same rank in so far as privilege is concerned. But this sum of £12,500,000 will have been guaranteed by the Dominion. Consequently, being guaranteed by the Dominion, it will become a first-class security. It will become equal to if not better than any of the debenture stock of the Grand Trunk; it will be guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So is the debenture stock.

Mr. DENIS: Yes, I was mistaken about that. It will have the same rank as the guaranteed debenture stock, because the debenture stock is going to be guaranteed; otherwise it would have preference over the debenture stock. But I am laying aside the debenture stock for the moment because I am speaking now only of the £12,500,000 of guaranteed stock. Before we put the deal through we have a preference for our debt of $50,000,000 over this amount of £12,500,000. After the deal has been put through this amount of £12,500,000 will be guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada and consequently we will have to assume a debt or responsibility amounting to $60,000,000 which otherwise, perhaps, would never have to be paid by any one. It would otherwise never be met by the Grand Trunk, because they could not meet it. It will take the Grand Trunk Railway Company many years to meet its regular obligations, to pay this $50,000,000 and to pay dividends on this guaranteed stock. Yet now we are taking this guaranteed stock— which is of little value, because there is little expectation of getting any dividend on it until the debt of the Grand Trunk has been paid—and we are making it a gold bond; we are giving it par value. That, in my judgment, is a great obstacle to the transaction. It appears clear in my mind that we are giving to the Grand Trunk in this transaction an advantage which we should not give.

It is an honest opinion to want to buy the Grand Trunk. Of course there is room for discussion as to whether we ought to buy it or not, but for those who want to buy it, it is all right to say that they want to buy the road for what it is worth. But you cannot buy the road for what it is worth and in the meantime guarantee bonds and debentures which, without the guarantee of the Dominion of Canada, would be worth only fifty per cent of their face value. You are taking this property and enhancing its value. The moment you take a property and enhance its value, the additional value which you give to that property has to be paid by somebody. In this particular instance it will be paid by the Dominion of Canada. The Company have bonds that were worth fifty cents on the dollar, and if they are worth fifty centy cents on the dollar it is because they cannot produce any more than fifty cents on the dollar. It is because their fundamental, basic value is fifty cents on the dollar. If you take that property and make it worth one hundred cents on the dollar, then you have to add something else to it, you cannot produce something from nothing. What you are adding in the present instance is the guarantee of the Dominion of Canada, which is worth money. You are making a present to the Grand Trunk Railway Company outside of the fact that you are buying the concern. It is all right to buy the concern if you want to, but you should not buy the concern and make a present to the holders of the debenture stock and the four per cent guaranteed stock.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend has overlooked one important fact in the argument he has made, and it is this: The guaranteed stock is in a real sense a preference stock. It is a prior charge on the assets of the company in a winding up of the company over the first, second, and third preference stocks and the common stock. If the company were liquidated the guaranteed stock would have to be paid in full before a dollar would go to the holders of any of the preference or common stocks. My hon. friend will agree with the further proposition that the first, second and third preference and common stocks are not a charge upon the assets——

Mr. CAHILL: Neither is the guaranteed stock.

Mr. ROWELL:—in the distribution of the property. If they are not a charge upon the assets then they have no value whatever until all the debts are paid and no value until the guaranteed stock is paid. Then take the figures given by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill). He said that at present market quotations the value of the first, second and third preference and common stocks is $28,000,000. With the Grand Trunk in default on its guarantee, with respect to the loan made by the Dominion of Canada of $10,000,000, and with the property of the Grand Trunk Pacific in the hands of a receiver, the market value of these stocks, after all debts are paid, is $27,000,000 or $28,000,000. What is proposed by the Government is simply to arbitrate the value of these stocks which on a market basis, with all liabilities discharged, have a value of $27,000,000 or $28,000,000. Is the Government under these conditions making a bargain that is unfair to the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. CAHILL: Yes.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not think my hon friend really means that; I am quite sure he does not. If the Government of Canada is taking over the property of the Grand Trunk, is it unfair to arbitrate as to whether these stocks have any value or not representing as they do an investment of over $200,000,000.

Mr. CAHILL: I am sure the minister does not wish to mislead the committee. The total issue at par of the first, second and third preference and common stock is only $180,000,000. So the holders could not have paid $200,000,000 for it.

Mr. ROWELL: The first preference stock represents £3,420,000; the second preference stock £2,530,000; the third preference stock £7,148,000; the ordinary or common stock £23,000,000: making a total of £37,000,000. I was in error in the actual amount.

Mr. CAHILL: Oh, yes.

Mr. ROWELL: I had the two figures before me, the preference and the debenture stock. The correct amount is £37,000,000, or $185,000,000 par value of preference and common stocks.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Just a trifling difference of $100,000,000.

Mr. ROWELL: It is near the $200,000,000 par value of that stock.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: But the minister will recollect that the common stock is included in that total, and it was not sold at par.

Mr. ROWELL: I said a moment ago that in my original statement of $200,000,000 I was in error because I had the larger figure of the debenture stock before me. The actual money put into the stock would not be so much as $200,000,000. The par value of the stock is $185,000,000, but it is all stock that was sold, as I understand it; none of it is watered stock.

Mr. VIEN: That is including the water.

Mr. ROWELL: I am informed that it was not watered. True, the common stock did not bring its par value, but it was all sold on the market and represents, according to my information about $100,000,000; I have not the figures here. But the point is, it does represent about $100,000,000 of money actually put in the road by the Grand Trunk Railway shareholders. And the Government is arbitrating with the Grand Trunk the value of the stock, which to-day is quoted on the market, according to the member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill), at $27,000,000 or $28,000,000, and which represented an actual cash investment of about $100,000,000. I submit that on that showing the proposal is not only a reasonable one but an exceedingly fair one from the standpoint of the country. The Grand Trunk think that they have been very harshly dealt with; but from the standpoint of the country I submit it is a complete answer to the remarks of my honourable friend.

Mr. VIEN: The Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) stated a short time ago, in answer to the question which was put to him, that it was the intention of the Government to hold the Grand Trunk Railway Company responsible for all their liabilities in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) subsequently stated that for a few years past the Grand Trunk Company would not have been able to pay any dividend even on the guaranteed stock if all their Grand Trunk Pacific liabilities had been taken into account, nor could they do so now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. VIEN: I gathered that the minister stated, in answer to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier), that if the Grand Trunk Company were called upon to pay the interest on the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds guaranteed by them, as well as their other liabilities, they could not pay any interest on those bonds.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that at all. I understood the question to be: Could the Grand Trunk pay interest on the three preference stocks and the common stock? My answer was: The Government would argue that they could not. On the contrary, the Grand Trunk contend that they could, and they urge that it would be the duty of the institutions that have control to allow such rates as would enable the company to do so. But I stated that the Government would argue that, as to those stocks, the Grand Trunk Company could not pay any interest if they met all their other obligations. I did not presume to say that they could not do so. It will be the Government's contention that they could not; the Grand Trunk contend the opposite; so it is for the arbitrators to decide.

Mr. VIEN: I accept the correction of the Minister of the Interior. But at any rate, if the Grand Trunk Company were called upon to meet all their liabilities in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, it is highly questionable whether they could pay any interest on what is called the four per cent guaranteed preference stock. It is so highly questionable that for the past two years the Grand Trunk have not met the interest obligations on their Grand Trunk Pacific liabilities, nor were they able in 1917 and 1918 to pay any interest on that guaranted preference stock. Therefore I think we may fairly assume that the Grand Trunk Company, if held to account for all their Grand Trunk Pacific liabilities, would not be able at present, any more than they have been able for the past few years, to pay any interest on that guaranteed preference stock. The point raised by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) and further raised by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis), and which has not yet been fully answered, is that the Government, notwithstanding the fact that the guaranteed stock does not pay any dividend, undertake in the agreement to guarantee four per cent on that account. That guarantee, therefore, is a pure gift from the Government to the stockholders. But, moreover, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) said this afternoon—I think I quote him rightly—that the Government do not give up any portion of their claim against the Grand Trunk Company, and that in valuing the first, second and third preference stock, as well as the ordinary or common stock, the arbitrators will be called upon to estimate the value of such stocks in view of the obligations of the Grand Trunk in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Well, it is possible that the claim of the Government against the Grand Trunk Company will more than offset whatever valuation the arbitrators may put on that first, second and third preference stock. They may say that the Grand Trunk Company are indebted to the Government by reason of the obligations undertaken in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific in a larger amount than they are entitled to on the valuation of their stock.

This claim of the Government against the Grand Trunk, if it is greater than the amount that the Grand Trunk are entitled to on the valuation of their stock, should be accounted for by deduction from the other amounts that the Government now undertake to pay them for the guaranteed stock. But the Government sets aside this guaranteed stock, puts it with the bonds of the company, and then proceeds to value the rest of the stock, and that valuation may be much lower than the amount representing the claims of the Government against the Grand Trunk in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific. We do not know at present what will be the claim of the Government against the Grand Trunk in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Last year the Minister of Railways was, by Order in Council, appointed receiver of the Grand Trunk Pacific, but no liquidation took place. We do not know what assets there are to meet the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Government is not in a position to-day to tell by what amount it will be in disbursement in respect of the guarantee of the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Nor is the Government in a position to tell us what will be the claim of the receiver of the Grand Trunk Pacific against the Grand Trunk in respect of their guarantee of the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific—whether in his capacity as receiver or as representing the Government which is guarantor of the bonds. Well then, how can we say what will be the amount of the claim of the Government against the company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Against the Grand Trunk?

Mr. VIEN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What have the expenses of receivership to do with our claim against the Grand Trunk?

Mr. VIEN: The Government is guarantor of certain debentures of the Grand Trunk Pacific. When the Grand Trunk Pacific is fully liquidated, the Government will be able—because the Grand Trunk Pacific is now in its hands through the receivership of the Minister of Railways—to claim from the Grand Trunk a fulfilment of their obligations in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That has nothing to do with the expenses of receivership or the moneys advanced by the receiver for the management of the railway.

Mr. VIEN: I am not speaking of the moneys advanced by the receiver; I am now speaking of the value of the shares, whether guaranteed or preferred, of the Grand Trunk. This value cannot be properly ascertained until we know what amount the Grand Trunk will be called upon to pay in respect of their guarantee of bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The receiver has a claim against the Grand Trunk because the interest on the bonds guaranteed by the Grand Trunk has not been paid for the last two years. Moreover, the receiver has a claim against the Grand Trunk in respect of the capital represented by these bonds, if the assets of the Grand Trunk Pacific are not sufficient to meet the bonds. This has to be settled before we can estimate properly the value of the shares of the Grand Trunk. But the point that the Government does not submit to arbitration is the value of the guaranteed stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The Government guarantees the payment of the capital and the perpetual payment of interest at four per cent on such guaranteed stock, although that stock may be worthless. As my hon. friend (Mr. Denis) says, it may be worth 50 cents on the dollar; it may be worth 40 cents on the dollar—but the Government undertakes to pay 100 cents on the dollar in respect of that stock. The minister shakes his head as a denial; but virtually the Government guarantees the perpetual payment of an interest of four per cent on it, and the reimbursement or possible conversion—

[Mr. Vien.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: How can you guarantee a possible conversion?

Mr. VIEN: I will split hairs with the minister; I will try to discuss on fine points, although my imperfect command of the English language does not permit me to discuss them as finely as he does. I will try, however, as far as it is in my power to do so, to make myself understood.

The Government guarantees the perpetual payment of an interest of four per cent on the guaranteed stock of the Grand Trunk and reserves to itself the right to buy outright by reimbursing the holders of the guaranteed stock to the extent of twenty-five times the annual payment which is to be made in lieu of dividends. That amounts to the same thing—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. VIEN: —because it gives a value to that stock; as has been shown this afternoon, it has already given an enhanced value on the stock exchange. We say it is poor policy; it is a bad deal, it amounts to a pure gift to the holders of the guaranteed stock, to fix a guaranteed payment of dividend in respect of a stock on which there has been no dividend for two years and on which there might never be a dividend in the future if the company is called upon to meet its obligations in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

The President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) said that we must not be harsh with the shareholders of the Grand Trunk because they had put over $200,000,000 into the enterprise. But the tenderness of the President of the Council is extended to only one class of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk; it does not go out to the shareholders of the first, second or third preferred stock; it covers only the holders of the guaranteed stock. But these friends in the ring around the Government—we must protect them; we must guarantee the interest; we must see that they lose nothing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman not see that the preference stocks, on which we do not guarantee anything at all, have risen in value rather more proportionately than the guaranteed stock?

Mr. VIEN: Yes, but the minister said this afternoon in that very respect that those that buy on the stock exchange might regret their action.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. VIEN: That the value on the stock exchange is an inflated value.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say it is inflated. It may go down, as may the advance on the guaranteed stock. That would indicate that it is just the report of the transaction that has had that effect. That is something we cannot prevent. They may lose on the transaction; they may gain; but we do not know now.

Mr. VIEN: That is a distinction on a fine point. The minister says that it may go down in value. That is to all intents and purposes the same as saying that those who buy it at the present time might ultimately regret the transaction. I do not find any difference as to that; but at any rate, even if the first, second and third preferential stocks have augmented in value on the stock exchange, they are in no way guaranteed by the Government; whereas the Government, by the deal which it is asking the House to sanction, guarantees the interest on the guaranteed stock, and that is a pure gift for which there is no reason, because the Government will have no recourse whatever to be reimbursed the balance that may be owing to them after the accounts of the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific have been settled by arbitration. The minister said this afternoon, just a minute before recess: Well, we do not give up any of our claim; if our claim against the Grand Trunk is in excess of the value put on the preferential stock by the arbitrators, we shall have our claim against the Grand Trunk just the same. But the minister surely knows that the Government will be put in the place of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company by the deal that is now proposed. The Government will have recourse against the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and the company will, to all intents and purposes, be the Government itself. Therefore, by putting aside that $60,000,000 worth of that guaranteed stock on which the interest is now guaranteed, we have purely and simply guaranteed a payment which the arbitrators, if that class of stock had been left to arbitration like the preferential stock, might have valued at may be fifty cents on the dollar or under.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend's argument seems to be predicated on a certain view of the position of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Does my hon. friend think that the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific was a gigantic blunder and that it is not worth the cost of building?

Mr. VIEN: No, I never contended that. I approve, as the peope of Canada have several times approved, the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway.

Mr. ROWELL: Then, if my hon. friend admits that the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific was a wise thing in the national interest, and that it is worth the cost of building, what is the use from his standpoint of all this argument about the liability of the Grand Trunk as guarantor of those bonds?

Mr. VIEN: There are two clearly distinct points involved. The advisability of building the Grand Trunk Pacific railway is one thing, and on that point I fully agree with the minister as well as those who fathered that project. The minister himself at that time, I understand, highly approved the project. But there is another point—and this is the second point on which the minister questioned me—the value of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway in respect of the liabilities that are put upon it. In respect of that, I have no opinion to give. I do not know; the Government does not know; the Government is not in a position to tell the committee whether as things stand today the obligations of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway will be met by the assets of that company. A receiver has been in charge for a year, and he has not taken the trouble to liquidate the whole thing. He has not made any reports to this House. He is not in a position to tell the arbitrators that he has a claim against the Grand Trunk, to call upon that company to live up to their obligations and to pay the difference, if the assets are not sufficient to meet the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I am no more in a position to tell that than is the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell). The President of the Council asks me if, in my opinion, the assets of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway are sufficient to meet the liabilities. I cannot say that. It is up to the Minister of Railways, the receiver, who has been in possession of all the books and the details, to tell the committee and the country. But that is not the point at all, and it has no reference to the question which has been raised by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill), the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier).

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman say that the Minister of Railways should sell out the Grand Trunk Pacific and see what could be got for it, in order to find out if it is liable for the liabilities against it?

Mr. VIEN: It is not necessary for the receiver to sell out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then, how will he find out?

Mr. VIEN: An arbitration might be held by the arbitrators.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what we are providing for now.

Mr. VIEN: No, you are not providing for that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Arbitrators?

Mr. VIEN: You are providing for arbitrators who, under the terms of the resolution, will be called upon to value the first, second and third preferential stock and the common stock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. VIEN: I understand the fine point the minister is going to make, but I will ask him to be patient for a minute, and then I will gladly answer his question. The question that has been put to the Government several times and that has not been answered by the Government—and I think before putting other questions the minister should first answer our questions—is: Why is not that guaranteed stock submitted to arbitration the same as the first, second and third preferential stock and the common stock? Why make a distinction between the shareholders of the guaranteed stock and the shareholders of the common stock? Why not submit the whole thing to arbitration? Why give an enhanced value to the shares that may have been collected by a few friends of the Government; just to speculate on? We do not know anything about the matter. It is possible that the valuation put on it by the Government in guaranteeing the payment of the interest on that stock may not be equal to what the arbitrators might give if they had been put in a position and been given jurisdiction to arbitrate on it. I do not see why the Government should give a value and should undertake to pay such an amount when they could do otherwise, when they could submit the whole thing, preferential and guaranteed stock to arbitration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is very free, as he always is, in trying to leave a slur on the members of the Government as endeavouring to make—

Mr. VIEN: It is not a slur; it is a question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not a slur? The hon. gentleman intimated that friends of the Government were owners of guaranteed stock. I have told him that we do not know the owner of a single share of stock.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Give a list of the shareholders then.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do not know the name of a single owner. If the hon gentleman does, we shall be glad to hear from him.

Mr. TOBIN: That is public property

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Surely, it is easy for the Government to get a list of the shareholders or the books of the company at any date and to table that. I do not see why there is an objection to tabling such a list.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just a minute. I will let the hon. gentleman know to-morrow. I have never made an inquiry as to how long it would take to get a list of the shareholders as of any fixed date. I will find that out from the Grand Trunk officers and let my hon. friend know. I have never made inquiry, and I do not think any other member of the Government has ever made any inquiry as to a single owner of stock, guaranteed or otherwise. Now if the hon. gentleman has anything to back up his allegation or his slur the time to do it is now.

Mr. VIEN: I object to the word "slur." We can surely say what we have in our minds without being accused of casting slurs. I say that it is at least suspicious to see the Government make a distinction in that respect without any apparent reason. We have tried to obtain the reason and have asked the Government why the distinction was made, but have not received a satisfactory answer. So we say there is something suspicious, and when any member of this Parliament finds something suspicious he has a right to speak of it without being accused of casting slurs on anybody.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In using the word "slur" I used a word that was not quite equal to the occasion. The offence of the hon. member was much worse than I denominated it. I told this House this afternoon the reason, and the only reason, why in the arrangement that has been come to we undertook to pay the interest on the guaranteed stock, and all I can do now is to repeat that reason. The Government offered to value, by arbitration, all the five stocks. That is what the Government was anxious to do, but we could make no progress whatever. In the meantime we were being called on to assume obligations, and the situation was getting more and more difficult. We then offered, in July, 1918, to treat the next stock in order, namely, the guaranteed stock, as an obligation. Had the arbitration been on the basis of the whole five stocks the award would have been applied on the guaranteed stock first, because it had prior claim—prior claim in respect of dividends, prior claim in respect of its capital, and prior claim in the event of liquidation. So in order to meet the company, and in the hope that we could make some progress, we offered to take the first call standing next to the debentures as a liability. That offer stood from the eleventh day of July, 1918, until the tenth day of October, 1919, without acceptance. It stood without much show of acceptance until about the 1st of October, 1919, or at all events until the month of September, 1919, without progress being made. Now the company has come to our terms. That is the reason and the only reason for our action. We would have preferred the other way, to arbitrate all the stocks, but we were not able to get that. But because we were not able to get that, and because we were anxious to make some progress in this matter, for it is of great importance, is surely no reason why an hon. member who knows nothing about it, and who has not the faintest reason in the world to back up his slur or allegation, should stand up here and tell us we are endeavouring to make money for the friends of the Government. I say again, if he has in the back of his head the thought of any friend of this Government or any body else that we are trying to make money for, now is the time to produce the evidence, and we will give him a chance to do it every day until this discussion closes. If he fails to produce the evidence before the end of this discussion, I hope he will arrive at the same opinion of his conduct as the rest of the House now has

Mr. VIEN: It is for my electors and the public to judge, in view of the action of the Government in refusing to answer the question that we put this afternoon. The minister has made a subtle distinction. He has taken the sidetracts, probably some of those belonging to the Minister of Railways, and has not answered the question why this guaranteed stock has been treated differently from the preference stocks. He has stated that he could not obtain better terms. That is no reason. If in the opinion of the Government the Grand Trunk officials were not reasonable, the Government could call them to account for their liabilities in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific. But there is nothing to show that the Government called the Grand Trunk to account for their liabilities in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific. There is nothing to show that the Government tried to compel them in any way. The answer of the minister amounts to this: We had to put it that way because the shareholders of the company would not agree to anything else; we have thrown ourselves into the hands of the shareholders. That is the only reason the minister gave, and I do not think it is satisfactory.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend (Mr. Vien) has not put the case as the Minister of the Interior put it. My hon. friend wholly ignores the statement made this afternoon both by the Minister of Railways and the Minister of the Interior. My hon. friend knows that the Government made a cash offer in the proposal of July, 1918, to pay $2,500,000 for the first three years, $3,-000,,000 for the succeeding five years, and $2,600,000 annually thereafter. Now the offer of $2,500,000 was the minimum sum which the Government believed the system was worth to the people of Canada. It was the minimum amount which they were prepared to pay to start with, and they were prepared to increase the amount in succeeding years to the figures I have mentioned. The Government would have liked the Grand Trunk to accept the proposal. We would have preferred the cash offer to arbitration. But what does that $2,500,000 mean? It is just the amount of the interest on the guaranteed stock. By guaranteeing the interest on the stock we are not adding one dollar to the amount the Government was prepared to pay in cash as the minimum amount.

Mr. McMASTER: Only in the event of the arbitrators finding the other stocks are worth nothing.

Mr. ROWELL: No, quite apart from the arbitration. We offered $2,500,000 in cash for three years, $3,000,000 for the succeeding five years, and $3,600,000 annually thereafter. The minimum amount which the Government was prepared to pay was $2,500,000. Now, that is the amount of the interest on the guaranteed stock, and not a member on the other side of the House from the day that proposal was laid before it has ever suggested that that was too high a price.

Mr. VIEN: It never came before the House.

Mr. ROWELL: It has always been before the House.

Mr. VIEN: It has never been before us.

Mr. ROWELL: The proposal was read by the Acting Prime Minister last session.

Mr. VIEN: Yes, in connection with the receivership of the Grand Trunk Pacific, but the matter could not then be taken up in the shape the minister suggests.

Mr. ROWELL: If my hon. friend thought it was too great a sum he should have objected.

Mr. McKENZIE: That offer was not accepted by the company, and it never came in business shape before this House; so how could we discuss it?

Mr. ROWELL: It was stated in the House that that was the offer made to the Grand Trunk. If my hon. friend or any of my hon. friends on the other side thought the Government of Canada was offering too much it was their duty to point that out and to urge that the Government should withdraw from the negotiations on the ground that they had made too high an offer. But not an hon. member suggested that; there was no suggestion of it whatever. What the Government has done now is simply to guarantee the interest on that stock, which only amounts to the minimum offer, and we are arbitrating as to the balance.

My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior has given the House the reason we have agreed to this. We could not get on with arbitration without putting in that proviso. That proviso was in the letter of July of 1918, and my hon. friend will see it there. From 1918 up to this time no one has suggested that this should not be done. That proviso is as follows:

> Should the company desire, the guaranteed stock may be treated as an obligation in the same way as the company's bonds.

It has been before the House and the country for more than a year and no one has suggested that there was any objection to the Government making this agreement.

Now I desire to refer again to the Grand Trunk Pacific. My hon. friend's whole argument falls absolutely to the ground unless he considers the Grand Trunk Pacific a gigantic blunder and a venture that should never have been started.

Mr DEVLIN: It should never have been degraded.

Mr. ROWELL: The Grand Trunk Pacific is from Winnipeg to the Pacific Coast, and if that railway should have been built, then the Grand Trunk will argue—and I think with great force—that it is worth at least the amount of money put into it, and that therefore the Grand Trunk's obligations or guarantee upon it should not greatly depreciate the value of their stock. That will be their argument.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why not clean up all the obligation and business in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific first, and then we will know where we are?

Mr. ROWELL: You can clean it up if you want to liquidate the Grand Trunk Pacific and sell it under the hammer.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the President of the Council say that we are going to have perpetual receivership?

Mr. ROWELL: Certainly not.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why not bring it to an end now?

Mr. ROWELL: How can you bring it to an end now? You can do it only in one way, by liquidating it, or you can continue it until this arbitration is concluded and the property taken over. Do the leader of the Opposition and the men who stand behind him want to see the Grand Trunk Pacific, which Sir Wilfrid Laurier considered one of his crowning achievements, sold at auction?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. ROWELL: That is what your argument leads to.

Mr. McKENZIE: Not at all. The President of the Council as a member of the Government put it in the hands of the receiver and we say that was a disgraceful and unbusinesslike thing to do. But once it is in the hands of the receiver it must be dealt with in a businesslike way.

Mr. ROWELL: I shall take up both of the hon. gentleman's points. The Grand Trunk Pacific was in default. They said they could not operate the roadway any longer for lack of funds. What could the Government of Canada do,--continue to pay millions of dollars of the people's money for the benefit of private stockholders? The people would not stand for any such policy any longer. We pursued it too long. And when the Grand Trunk Pacific took this position, the Government of Canada took the proper course of putting a receiver in possession, and if the Government had not done so and made clear to the Grand Trunk Railway and its shareholders that they were no longer going to pay out the money of the country for the benefit of private stockholders we would not have had the agreement that is before us tonight. The Government took a firm stand that it was bound to see the interests of the people of this country protected in connection with railway matters, and for that reason it has been possible to conclude the satisfactory agreement that has been reached with the Grand Trunk. My hon. friends must face the issue. Either the Grand Trunk Pacific was a proper undertaking, or—I repeat—it was a gigantic national blunder and should not have been built. If it should have been built then it should be worth to the people of Canada what it cost.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is not an argument.

Mr. ROWELL: You must support one or other of these contentions. If it should have been built, then it should be worth to the people what it cost. Now, my hon. friend said that I supported its building. I did.

Mr. VIEN: So did I.

Mr. ROWELL: We both believed it should have been built. But I do not believe that the Canadian Northern should have been allowed to parallel it by means of guarantees and grants made by this Government and the provincial governments.

An hon. MEMBER: That is another question.

Mr. ROWELL: Both governments are responsible for the Canadian Northern, and three transcontinental railways built by Government assistance under private ownership are largely responsible for the trouble in connection with our railway situation at the present time. It is nothing short of a national crime to see railways paralieling each other for hundreds of miles in some sections of the country. We have built away beyond our population and capacity to provide traffic to make them pay at the present time. Only by the development of the country and the increased traffic due to settlement and colonization will the railways be brought into the position of earning properties, and so I say to my hon. friend that to suggest that we should liquidate the Grand Trunk Pacific and to ascertain, when it is liquidated, the amount of obligations, is to suggest that one of the crowning achievements of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's political career, as he always claimed, should be discredited and the railway sold on the market. That is not in the national interest, which will be best served by our acquiring the Grand Trunk railway, which carries with it the Grand Trunk Pacific, and unifying the whole into a national system as this agreement proposes should be done, and as the Minister of Railways and the Minister of the Interior have outlined to-day. That is what the people of the country want. That is what is needed if the present system of railways is either to be made efficient or to be brought within the region of a paying transportation proposition.

Mr. TOBIN: Do I understand the minister to say that the people want what he says?

Mr. ROWELL: That is what the people want.

Mr. TOBIN: Then I am very much surprised.

Mr. ROWELL: I know there are two classes of people opposed to this proposal, and one is the other great transportation system of this country.

Mr. TOBIN: Who is that?

Mr. ROWELL: The Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. TOBIN: The Canadian Pacific Railway don't bother about it.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not know whether it bothers or comforts my hon. friend. Possibly it may comfort more than bother him.

Mr. TOBIN: They are not worrying about it.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not blame the Canadian Pacific Railway for being opposed to the proposition; they are within their rights in being opposed to it. But I do not agree with their opposition. The men interested in the Canadian Pacific railway know that public ownership of national railways in this country cannot be made a success unless we have the Grand Trunk associated with our Government system of railways to provide feeders in the east for it, and a national system—whether you call it public ownership or a Government investment in the railways—would not prove satisfactory without the addition of the Grand Trunk system. Naturally the Canadian Pacific Railway is opposed. I find no fault with their opposition, but it is no reason why the Government should not do what it believes to be in the interests of the country because one large corporation is opposed. There are others opposed to it because they are opposed to the principle of public ownership. The principle of public ownership does not necessarily enter into the consideration of this proposal.

Mr. VIEN: Not at all.

Mr. ROWELL: I believe that quite apart from the principle of public ownership it is in the national interest, if we are to make our present railway properties paying and satisfactory, that we should acquire the Grand Trunk railway. I do not think that those who are opposed to public ownership should let that opposition carry them to the extent of imperilling the country's existing railway investments. Personally, I believe in the public ownership of this great system of railways, and therefore I support it on that ground as well as on the ground that it is in the national interest to acquire the road. Others may support it solely on the ground that it is in the national interest that we should take over the road, but I support it on both grounds. This agreement is in the public interest and as far as I have been able to ascertain the trend of public opinion, the people of the country strongly and cordially support it. I know there are a group in Montreal who are opposed to it. There are interests there opposed to it, but I am quite sure that west of Ottawa river three-fourths of the people are in favour of it, and I imagine that if you got a little east of the city of Montreal you would find three-fourths of the people of the east in favour of it also.

[Mr. Tobin.]

Mr. VIEN: I might answer the Minister with his own words. He says that they did not want to protect certain shareholders by advancing the Grand Trunk Pacific further amounts of money. Why does he now propose to protect a class of shareholders? The question I put to the Government is this: Why is the Government not submitting to arbitration the valuation of the guaranteed stock as well as the valuation of the other stock? The minister did not answer that question.

Mr. ROWELL: I can only answer it in the way that my colleague has already answered it—because we could not get an agreement with the Grand Trunk to do so. The only way we could get an agreement was in this way. We believed that the road was well worth our paying that money. We had already made a cash offer in excess of that amount; therefore, we did not feel that we should block an arbitration, especially in view of the fact that we had already offered something in excess of the amount for the road.

Mr. CAHILL: Why not expropriate it?

Mr. ROWELL: We could not expropriate the Grand Trunk system. We cannot expropriate railways in the United States. We could not get control of that road except by negotiation. If ever a government has worked hard, if ever a Minister of Railways and those associated with him have worked hard to acquire this road on a basis that is fair to the people of Canada, the Government, the minister, and those associated with him, have done so in this case.

Mr. DEVLIN: I would like, before asking a question of the Minister of Railways, to refer my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council to a letter signed by Alfred Smithers, dated July 22, 1918, and following a letter written by the Minister of the Interior to the said Alfred Smithers, the first being the letter referred to by my hon. friend in connection with the offer made by the Government to purchase the Grand Trunk railway during negotiations carried on in London by the Minister of the Interior. Mr. Smithers writes to Sir Robert Borden in this way:

London, July 22, 1918.

Dear Sir Robert Borden,—

I received a letter from Mr. Meighen dated July 11, which was not, however, delivered here till July 15. I acknowledged the letter to Mr. Meighen immediately, and said I would submit it to my board for consideration. This I did at the meeting of the board on Friday, July 19.

A question has been raised as to what really are the terms offered in view of the offer made in the last paragraph but one of the letter.

It is quite apparent that when the Minister of the Interior had made his offer to the Grand Trunk Railway Company they did not quite grasp what the offer was. That is followed by another letter written by the same Mr. Smithers, addressed to Sir Robert Borden, and dated August 2. It is as follows:

Dear Sir Robert Borden,—

I received a letter from Mr. Meighen dated July 11, on July 15th. I acknowledged the letter to Mr. Meighen immediately, and said I would submit it to my board for consideration. This I did at the meeting of the board on Friday, July 19. A question was then raised as to the interpretation of the last paragraph but one of Mr. Meighen's letter. As Mr. Meighen had left for Canada, I asked you for an explanation which I have received in a letter from you dated the 29th July.

It was therefore apparent that the Grand Trunk Railway Company did not really understand what the Minister of the Interior was referring to as the terms of the Canadian Government. I think that it may be said as an added remark of congratulation to the Minister of the Interior that he was apparently putting it all over the Grand Trunk Railway Company in London. Then, coming down to the resolution in question, there is one thing that is bothering me at the present moment. I am not going to put this question to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) because it has not a legal bearing; I am going to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid)—if he is not overworked—because it is a question of fact. Why is it that apart from the guarantee by the Government of the debenture stocks and the four per cent guaranteed stock, he is now preparing new stock to be called the new guaranteed stock? What is the object of that?

Mr. REID: I was going to say to my hon. friend that this is really a legal question. However, even if I am not a lawyer, I may perhaps be able to give an answer that will explain it. The new stock that is to be issued is to replace the first, second, and third preference and common stocks. For whatever award is made with respect to these different stocks, new stock will be issued and these other stocks will disappear.

Mr. DEVLIN: Then I understand the minister to say that the arrangement of the Government is simply to continue guaranteeing the guaranteed stock, drop the first, second and third preference and common stocks, and issue new guaranteed stock?

Mr. REID: No, to issue new non-voting stock. First, second and third preference and common stocks would come into the possession of the Dominion Government, and then new guaranteed stock of a non-voting character would be issued to the amount of the award.

Mr. DEVLIN: How will that new guaranteed stock be allotted?

Mr. REID: The arbitrators will decide the value of the holding of each stockholder.

Mr. DEVLIN: The arbitrators decide the value, but how will the new stock be allotted?

Mr. REID: The board of arbitrators will allot it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is provided for in the letter of the 9th of October that finally closed the arrangement, subject to Parliament. It was intended to arrive, if possible at some arrangement prior to the arbitration; that is to say, to leave it in some way to the holders of these stocks, but fuller consideration convinced the officers of the company that it would likely be very difficult, if not impracticable, for the holders in any reasonable time to agree on the apportionment, and so finally they asked that it be submitted to the arbitrators under the belief that the shareholders would agree to submit their respective and, in part conflicting, claims to the board and thereby finally determine the whole question.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not quite satisfied with the argument of the President of the Privy Council with respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific. His argument is that if it was good policy, proper and right, to build the Grand Trunk Pacific, it must be worth whatever claims are against it, whatever claims have been saddled upon it.

Now, that is an absolutely groundless and almost a ridiculous argument. The minister (Mr. Rowell), with his usual facility for stirring up enthusiasm to carry him over a difficulty, made an effort to arouse his friends and the press of the country by saying: "Then this railway, having been built, it is all right and we must stand by it." That is no argument. This is a cold-blooded proposition in dollars and cents as to whether or not the Grand Trunk Pacific is worth in money the claims standing against it, and it must be ascertained entirely apart from sentiment. I do not see where there is room for sentiment here; it is a business proposition. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company is an entity, and it is certainly closely allied with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, for they were practically together in the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway from Winnipeg to the coast. Therefore the obligation of the one is practically the obligation of the other. The Government had nothing to do with those companies beyond assisting them in building that railway. The Grand Trunk Company have fallen down in the business they undertook to carry out; they have not been able to meet the obligations which fell to them by reason of the bonds and other securities which they floated in this country. They have, purely as a corporation, borrowed large amounts of money from the Government, with no sentiment about the transaction at all. Now they have arrived at the stage where they should pay back that money. The people of Canada, through the Government, lent the company hundreds of thousands of dollars, and also, through the Government, endorsed bonds which they must ultimately pay unless they are discharged in some other way. To say that instead of insisting upon dealing with this matter on business principles, it is sufficient to come to this Parliament and state: "Why, the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier thought this would be a great enterprise, and it would be a reflection upon his good name if this company failed to meet their obligation," is not business. I say to the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) and to this Government that it is not in the power of a company like the Grand Trunk to come to this Government and dictate terms. The Grand Trunk are obligated to this Government to the full amount of the indebtedness of the Grand Trunk Pacific. They are not able to pay it. They evidently have obligations of their own that they are not able to meet. Are we, then, to be told that the Grand Trunk, crippled in that way and on the verge of receivership, as we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite, can come and dictate terms to this Government, and in effect say: "You must guarantee certain preference stocks, you must do this, you must do that, you must do the other thing; otherwise we won't deal with you at all"? And they argue with the Government: "Why, what did you do with the Canadian Northern? You knew the Canadian Northern had stock to the tune of $60,000,000 which was not worth a dollar, but you gave them $10,800,000 for it. You must do the same thing for us." That is the line of argument that is put forward. And the President of the Council, who presides over the wisdom of the Government in Council, comes here and is in entire contradiction with the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen). The latter gentleman tells us: Yes, we are going to figure down to the last cent every dollar that the Grand Trunk Pacific owes this country, and we are going to see to it that it is the first slice that comes off the award. That is the position taken, and that is the business position, if followed up. But immediately after that comes a pathetic speech from the President of the Council, in which he brings in the late lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and in an appeal to the sympathies of the people, he says: The poor Grand Trunk Pacific, like the man who was going down from Jerusalem to Jericho, fell among thieves, and we must help them along and not ask them to pay anything. Now, which of those hon. gentlemen is expressing the views of the Government? The Minister of the Interior encourages us by saying that we will have a big balance against this road, and we will not be so very badly off because the company will have to pay us our bill. But, according to the President of the Council, we are not going to get a cent, because we have got the railroad, and the railroad is worth all its obligations.

Now, I say to the Government, and particularly to the President of the Council, the first thing is to clean up the private transactions between the Grand Trunk railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and the Government. Let the Grand Trunk Railway Company pay the money that they owe us.

Mr. J. D. REID: Then you want to put them into liquidation?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not afraid of liquidation. The Grand Trunk would not be the first railway that has gone into liquidation. When railway companies become top heavy through overtaxing themselves with bonds and stocks, the proper place for them is liquidation;—let them be shaved down to proper running weight; then we will know where they are at. The difficulty with this Government is that all a railway company has to do is to load itself down with debt, sell everything that can be sold, get the money and put it somewhere, and then when it is in a helpless and hopeless condition come to the Government and threaten: "If you don't take us under your wing, we will go into liquidation." To which the Government respond: "Oh, no; anything under the heavens rather than that! Come under our shelter."

And the company avails itself of the proffered refuge absolutely regardless of the condition it is in. That practice has been established by this Government, and advantage has been taken of it, and that is the trouble. Every railroad in the United States that is worth talking about as a railroad has gone through a receiver's hands. There are railroads in Canada that have gone through the same experience, because they got into trouble; and I assure the Minister of Railways that he will not get a black eye from our people by allowing any concern that is not able to carry on to go into the hands of a receiver in order that its affairs may be investigated and settled. We have an appropriate Act on our statute book for that purpose, and we have a regularly established practice in our courts for dealing with such matters. But the Government has no such equipment, because it was never intended that it should be put in the position of exercising the functions of receivership.

I come back to the same point again, that if we want to deal with this matter in a clean, business way, let us settle our accounts between the Grand Trunk Company, the Government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. Let us know exactly where we are at, and then we will know what is the obligation of the Grand Trunk to us. After we have done that, if it is good business to buy the road,—that is another matter. But to leave this hiatus about the Grand Trunk Pacific simply means that we will not know where we are at in regard to it. The receiver, (Mr. Reid) will not give us any light about it—apparently he does not know anything about it. Nobody can state how much the Grand Trunk owes us by reason of the obligations of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I hope that the ministers will recognize that that is the proper system to pursue: Do first things first, and clean up as you go. And let me tell my good friend the President of the Council, that I have just as much regard for the memory of my late revered chief as he has, but I submit to him that I cannot allow the business of this country to suffer by reason of the fact that the name of my late honoured chief might in a remote business way be connected with something that did not pan out as well as he expected.

Mr. J. D. REID: The leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) urges that we clean up the matter of the Grand Trunk Pacific before we deal with the Grand Trunk. He, therefore, urges delay. The Grand Trunk Railway Company owe $10,000,000 in respect of certain debentures that were guaranteed by the Dominion Government; the hon. member contends that the Government should sue the Grand Trunk for that $10,000,000 and make them pay. He urges that we take action against the Grand Trunk Railway Company for default on the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific. What that really means is this: Do not buy this road; force it into liquidation, make it go under the hammer or compel it to enter into other arrangements. And what would that mean? My hon. friend is really advocating to-night that the Government delay any action in this matter and thus put the Grand Trunk in such a position that it will be taken over and owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. No one could put up a stronger argument than he has to show that he wants the Grand Trunk to go into the hands of the Canadian Pacific. If we let the Canadian Pacific Railway Company get the Grand Trunk, there will be no future for the Canadian National railway. If the Canadian Pacific owned or controlled the Grand Trunk either directly or indirectly, what chance would the Canadian National railway system have in competition with such a system? If we do not want to continue the operation of the Canadian National railway, then let the Grand Trunk go into liquidation and let the whole system, Canadian National, Grand Trunk and all, go over to the Canadian Pacific.

Now, the offer made by this Government to the Grand Trunk has been before the people of Canada for a year or more, and outside of a few newspapers in eastern Canada, the press and the public are in favour of the Government taking over the Grand Trunk and of our having just two complete railway systems in Canada. I believe that it is in the interest of Canada that we should have two railway systems, and two only. Let us either say, therefore, that we are going to have a complete railway system owned and operated by the Government—and let us say that by adopting this resolution and proceeding along the lines which it sets forth—or that the whole system, Canadian National and Grand Trunk, should be allowed to come under the control of the Canadian Pacific, directly or indirectly. Let us come out in the open; let us have a decision one way or the other, and let the public know of it.

Mr. VIEN: The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) did not appear to think that this question was one of such urgency when he stated on Wednesday last that he thought that the House might close on Saturday of that week. The Minister of Railways himself has not been in much of a hurry; although for almost a year he has been receiver for the Grand Trunk Pacific, he has taken no particular steps in connection with obtaining a valuation of the assets and liabilities of that road. If the Government could not agree with the Grand Trunk Pacific as to a valuation of its assets and liabilities, the matter could have been referred to arbitration. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) said a moment ago that the whole thing is to come up in the arbitration proceedings. But this is done after $60,000,000 worth of stock has been put aside to be released from the valuation of the arbitrators. We do not even know what are the liabilities of the Grand Trunk. It is not necessary to liquidate by means of an auction sale or by putting the road under the hammer; the amount of the liabilities and assets could be ascertained by arbitration. The receiver of the Grand Trunk Pacific had over eight months in which to do that, but he has not done it. So, if there is any hurry now it is entirely due to the action of the receiver himself.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member says that a week or two ago we were in no hurry. He knows that the Grand Trunk Railway Company have for a year or more been urging that we settle this matter either by arbitration or otherwise. Sir Alfred Smithers has been here for two months. We did not believe that there was any chance of his accepting our offer until a few days ago; but when he did accept our terms, what were we to do then? Were we then to say: We will not bring it up this session; we will wait until next year? Surely hon. members will agree with me, that it was the duty of the Government, having accepted the terms, not to delay, not to pigeon-hole the matter for several months, but to submit it at once to his House for its consideration. We are here to legislate in the interest of the country, and I believe, for reasons which I explained a few minutes ago, it would be suicidal for the Government to hold off for several months. Therefore, having accepted and acknowledged the letter of acceptance, the first thing we did was to submit the matter to Parliament, and I believe it is not in the interest of our great railway system nor in the interest of the country to keep public opinion in an unsettled condition as to the settlement of this great railway proposition. For that reason, I say that we, of course, had to reconsider the question of the House closing at an early date.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: May I ask the Minister of Railways a question? The answer to this question is one in which the people of the ports of Saint John and Halifax are personally and deeply interested. If the Minister of Railways is not prepared to give an answer this evening, I do not ask for one now; but when the Bill is under discussion, I should like a statement from the minister if he cannot give an answer now. My question is this: Is it proposed by the Government to utilize the ocean terminals of the Grand Trunk at Portland, Maine, in the shipping and receipt of ocean freight?

Mr. J. D. REID: Of course, when we are on the Bill, I shall be glad to discuss that matter, but I might say this evening that the ports of Saint John and Halifax have been and are being still further developed for our own Canadian ocean terminals, and the Government intend using those ports to their fullest capacity. There is no doubt about that. We have now the Transcontinental which was originally built for that purpose right into Saint John. But Portland is a portion of the Grand Trunk system and the hon. member will understand that a large portion of the Grand Trunk is in the United States. There is the Central Vermont and other portions of that line, so that Portland will have to be used to a certain extent for portions of the Grand Trunk railway system. But I want to impress upon the hon. member that there is no intention of not carrying out the policy of the Government in the past of developing and keeping our traffic in our own Canadian ports so far as it is possible to do that.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: The Minister of Railways will understand that our people in the East feel that ocean freight gathered by the Grand Trunk Pacific in the West and other points should be shipped through Canadian ports, and that ocean freight destined for points on the Grand Trunk Pacific in the West should be received at Canadian ports.

Mr. J. D. REID: Certainly that is so.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: Not only have we in the city of St. John very fine terminals, but the Government is spending enormous sums of money there in developing the port and in providing additional terminals.

We would say that we would be able to handle at the ocean terminals in St. John and Halifax all the freight that is carried from one part of Canada to the ports that I have mentioned.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) stated that we could not expropriate the Grand Trunk railway because we could not expropriate a line in the United States. I quite agree with him, but I would go further. I believe that Canada cannot operate railroads in the United States. The reason for this is, in my opinion, that if we operate railroads in the United States, we become subject to American railway laws. I think everybody will agree on that point. When we say that Canada owns and operates railroads in the United States, that means that His Majesty the King owns and operates railroads in the United States. Now, certainly my hon. friend is too loyal to contend that the King could become subject to the American law, and I believe this reason is very serious.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I discussed this point at some length this afternoon. Even although the Government of Canada as a government owned the road, there would surely be no more objection to the road being owned and operated directly by the Government than there is now to the American Government operating roads directly in Canada.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: If my hon. friend will allow me, I do not believe that the American Government now owns any roads which are operated in Canada except roads such as the New York Central and the Delaware and Hudson which are privately owned roads, only operated temporarily, if I am not mistaken, by the Government of the United States.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that. The hon. gentleman was talking of operation. That is all that he mentioned in his first statement. Does he say that it is all right for the Government to operate a road in another country providing that it does not own the road? The nonsense of that will appear to him at once

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I do not believe that Canada can operate any railroads in a foreign country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then the foreign country cannot operate any railroads in Canada, but it is doing that every day, and so are we in that country.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Temporarily.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Temporarily, it is true.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Privately-owned railways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It may be temporarily or it may not, but I do not see any more objection to the United States operating a road in this country for ten years than to their operating it for one year. I do not see where the legal phase is in any way altered; it is all the same in the one case as it is in the other. As to the advisability of it, that is a matter for them to decide. Direct operation by Government in its most objectionable form from the standpoint of the hon. gentleman takes place now. The United States Government directly operates railroads in Canada in at least four different instances.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Not owned by the United States Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman argue that it is all right for the Government to operate roads in a foreign country providing that it does not own them?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will have to let the hon. gentleman's answer expose his own fallacy, because it really becomes so patent an absurdity that nothing more can be said on it. In this case, the Government does not propose directly to operate the line. The Government will only be stockholders of a company which operates. It will be said that that is only a change of method. That is all it is, but it is a very important change, for this reason, that if there is any breach of law in operation of the country operated through, then the action lies against the corporate entity, and the fact that the Government owns the stock does not affect the matter in one way or the other. The corrective agent will be applied against the corporated entity, the Grand Trunk Railway Company or the Canadian National Railway Company, and not against the King in the right of Canada.

While it is only a change of form, from the point of view of any possible legal, constitutional or international objection it is a very important change, very important indeed. I do not see the slightest objection to the Government operating the line directly. I cannot see that there could be any objection to operating for three years, that would not be quite as valid to operating for one year. Consequently, if there would be no objection to operating directly, then in multiplied form there could be no objection to operating merely when we are holders of stock in a company which operates, and that company stands there to answer all the claims and obey all the obligations resting on them under American law.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: If I understand my hon. friend rightly, Canada by this agreement does not become the proprietor of the roads belonging to the Grand Trunk that are in the United States.

Mr. MEIGHEN: She becomes the owner or controller, or whatever else the Grand Trunk now is in relation to those roads. That is to say, we become the stockholders in the company, which, after we become stockholders has just the same ownership or control over these American lines as it had before we become stockholders. There will be no change in that respect whatever.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: On page 51 of the Memoranda I notice a long list of railways, such as the Atlantic and St. Lawrence, the Buffalo and Lake Huron, the Central Vermont, the Southern New England Railway, and others. I presume that some of these railways are altogether in the United States. When we become the owners of all the stock of the Grand Trunk we will then be in a position to appoint the directors. Shall we be able to appoint Canadian directors?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that we shall be able to appoint directors at all in every case.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will you not maintain these incorporated companies?

Mr. MEIGHEN: All I can say is this: At the present I know of no reason for changing the policy with regard to these roads that has hitherto been pursued by the Grand Trunk. There would be no reason apparent to me for changing the policy The Grand Trunk now either owns the stock of these roads or has leases of them—perpetual leases, I think, where there are leases. Now whatever policy the Grand Trunk pursues with relation to these roads now, I see no reason for changing that policy merely because we become the stock holders of the Grand Trunk. That is all I can say. It would be, of course, for the new Grand Trunk directorate, after the discharge of the Committee of Management, to say what is the best policy to pursue in relation to these American interests.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: There is another question. We have been talking all this evening about the guarantee given by the Grand Trunk in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific, but the Grand Trunk has also guaranteed the bonds of all this long list of railways. What will happen to those guarantees when we assume control of the Grand Trunk system? Shall we have to implement those guarantees which the Grand Trunk has given to the stockholders or bondholders of these roads?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We shall not have to do anything. The Grand Trunk will have to do then just what it has to do now.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That will be the Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government will be the owners of the stock. The company will be under exactly the same obligations it has always been under. Hon. gentlemen must remember that the Grand Trunk is not guaranteeing the 5 per cent on the capital stock of the Atlantic and St. Lawrence Railway, for instance; that is the rental the Grand Trunk pays for that road. Of course, if we are going to run the road we shall have to pay the rental, and that same argument applies to each of these other companies. The Grand Trunk will be under the same obligations after we are stockholders as they are now while 180,000 people are stockholders, but that does not say that the obligations are onerous. The obligations were entered into for the advantage accruing to the system, the Grand Trunk acquiring these subsidiary roads by leasehold, stock control or stock ownership.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister speaks about us owning the stock, and says that a company is an entity, but owns nothing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that.

Mr. McKENZIE: The physical assets, at all events, of the Grand Trunk Railway will remain the property of the Grand Trunk.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it the intention that the Grand Trunk, for instance, to mention only that company, will remain in perpetuity under its present name and not lose its identity under the ownership of the Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot say that any fixed determination of policy has been come to, but I would say that it was entirely probable, after the acquirement is completed, that the road would be merged in the Canadian National system and thereby lose its name.

Mr. McKENZIE: What would become of this stock on which we are guaranteeing the interest if the company disappears altogether? Suppose, for instance, the company is wound up and goes out of existence?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The company does not need to become extinct to have the system merged. For instance, the Canadian Northern system owned, I think, twenty-nine separate companies, all of which were distinct entities and had stock issues. They were creations of the Canadian Northern, and became a part of the system. The stock issues still remain. The Grand Trunk stock may still be outstanding; that is to say, the non-voting certificates, as it is better to call them, may still be outstanding, although the system as a system is merged in the Canadian National railway system, and run as part of that system. That answers the question fully. These non-voting certificates, or as you may call it, this non-voting stock, will be held by the owners of the present stock, and they will cash their dividends just as Victory Loan certificates are cashed, while the Grand Trunk will be merged with the Canadian National railway and be known as such.

Mr. McKENZIE: I can see no utility or purpose in having so many different companies and so many names when we own the property. The Intercolonial, for instance, which is a Government property nearly fifty years old, has no incorporation of any kind. It has no stock and never had any stock. It is owned by the Government, but it is no more owned by the Government than is the Canadian Northern. The Canadian Northern is also owned by the Government except for a few outstanding shares here and there. I think the man in the street would prefer that we should own the Canadian Northern as we own the Intercolonial, and that if we are going to own the Grand Trunk we should own it in the same way as we do the Intercolonial. If we are going to own the Grand Trunk let us own it in unison with the other properties we have. There is no use in having a number of different names and a variety of stocks and bonds and debentures. If we are going to own the whole road the simpler way would be for the Government to own all these properties and deal with them, so far as book-keping and management is concerned, just as we deal with the Intercolonial.

However, that is a matter of detail. The member for Royal (Mr. H. H. McLean) asked the Minister of Railways something about the policy of the Government in regard to the port of Portland and the ports of St. John and Halifax. The minister will remember that when the scheme of building the Transcontinental railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific was being considered, a part of the bargain, so far as the people were concerned, was that any freight that was not routed by the owner was to be routed by the Government. The present Government was not in power then, but the principles of governments do not die and obligations of one government must necessarily be carried on by the other; it is the King's business, which must be carried on. I would remind the Minister of Railways that it is an outstanding policy of the Government of this country that all freights originating in Canada which are not routed by the owner must go by Canadian ports. It is desirable to know if the Government is going to stand by that principle. Of course, there was no written agreement between the Canadian people and the Government, but that was announced as the policy of the Canadian Government, and I never heard that this Government had in any way departed from the policy established by their predecessors. Now that there is talk of acquiring an American outlet for Canadian products, it would be interesting to know if it is the intention to depart from that policy.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not know that I can give any more complete answer than I gave to the hon. member for Royal. When we build our Canadian ports we certainly intend to use them. We have made a short connection to St. John by taking over, I think, the St. John Valley line; and we all know that the shortest rail and ocean route between Liverpool and Canada is via Halifax. The Government will use its own ports and give them preference.

Mr. TURGEON: Is the minister prepared to tell the people that all the traffic collected on the new Grand Trunk line from Western United States and Western Canada, having reached Montreal, will be forwarded direct to St. John and Halifax instead of being diverted from Montreal to Portland? The people of Canada, and more particularly the people of the Maritime Provinces, are interested to know what will be done in the future.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not know that I can add anything to what I have said. We will use our own road to St. John and Halifax. The Government are not changing the policy laid down since we came into power in 1911. We are developing the ports of Halifax and St. John and we shall certainly use them.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I have made a cursory examination of the memorandum distributed and I fail to see any statement showing the total amount of subsidies or assistance given by the Canadian Government to the Grand Trunk Railway.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is on Page 26.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am afraid we shall be very late if we attempt to pass the resolution to-night, and I would suggest to the leader of the Government that we report progress.

Mr. DOHERTY: Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

Mr. J. D. REID: I beg to lay on the table of the House some maps showing the location of the Grand Trunk System.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there any possibility of distributing these maps?

Mr. J. D. REID: There are a good many of them but I do not think there are sufficient to provide one for each member. There are a dozen or more, some with regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific and the others with regard to the Grand Trunk. If more are required I shall be glad to get them.

On the motion of hon. Mr. Doherty the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Thursday, October 16, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION.

*Mr. ANDREWS:

What action, if any, does the Government propose taking regarding the adoption of Proportional Representation?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As has been intimated by the Prime Minister, it is proposed to call a Speaker's conference to deal with the question of proportional representation.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

EXPORT OF NICKEL.

Mr. PEDLOW:

1. Was there an investigation, ordered by the Dominion Government, by a representative of the Government, regarding the export of nickel during the years 1916, 1917 or 1918?
2. If so, by whom?
3. What was the finding?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. On the outbreak of war in 1914, the Government ordered a full investigation with respect to the export of nickel and the putting in force of an effective system of control which would ensure that Canadian nickel did not reach our alien enemies.

2. G. A. Bell, Deputy Minister, Department of Railways and Canals.

3. A system of control was established, approved by the Imperial authorities, which enabled the Canadian Government to direct and control the output of nickel, and to establish beyond doubt the purpose for which every pound of nickel was used.

RETAIL DISTRIBUTION OF SUGAR.

*Mr. PEDLOW:

1. Has the Government been officially notified by the Secretary of the Board of Trade of the city of Winnipeg that the retail merchants of Winnipeg, because of an order of "The Board of Commerce" limiting the gross profit to retail merchants to one cent per pound on sugar, had decided to cease handling sugar?
2. Has the Board of Trade of Winnipeg requested the Dominion Government to take over the retail distribution of sugar in that city and district?
3. If so, what method of distribution of this commodity has the Government decided to adopt?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. No.
2. No.
3. Not necessary.

DYNAMITERS—LORD ATHOLSTAN'S RESIDENCE.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Did the Government promise a reward in connection with outrage committed at the residence of Lord Atholstan at Cartierville on August 9, 1917?
2. Has the reward been paid? If so, to whom?
3. Did the Minister of Justice receive a request for permission to take legal procedures against the Government for the recovery of damages amounting to $5,000?
4. Has such request been refused?
5. If so, for what reason?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes.
2. No.
3. No such request was received by the Minister of Justice.

4 and 5. Answered by No. 3.

GUELPH NOVITIATE INQUIRY.

Mr. TURGEON:

What is the total cost of the investigation into the charges preferred against the Jesuit College of Guelph, Ontario, on the alleged evasion of the Military Service Act by the directors of said college?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: Amount paid to date by Department of Justice, $440.97. Some accounts remain to be adjusted.

MONTREAL POST OFFICE—RETURNED SOLDIERS.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Is it true that about a thousand returned soldiers employed chiefly at the Post Office of Montreal have been discharged?
2. If so, for what reason?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. No, but the services of 140 temporary employees who were taken on in the Montreal Post Office to replace members of the regular staff on summer holidays have been dispensed with, as the summer holidays have been completed and the regular staff has returned to duty. The services of these temporary men were, therefore, no longer required. 115 of them were returned soldiers.

2. Answered by No. 1.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY—MONTREAL BOARD OF TRADE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ascertain from the Government if it has received any communication from the Council of the Montreal Board of Trade suggesting that the Government defer the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway; and, if so, what answer has been made?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways): Mr. Speaker, as Minister of Railways I have not received any communication from the Montreal Board of Trade. If I had, I would have answered that the resolution is now before the House and that we intend asking the House to pass the Bill founded on it at the present session.

Mr. JACOBS: The question I put secondarily was whether the Government had made any answer to the council of the Montreal Board of Trade.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): Two or three communications have been received conveying the sentiments of the Board of Trade with reference to the question under discussion, which I have acknowledged—simply that and nothing more.

WERNER HORN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Restigouche and Madawaska): Is the Government aware that a self-confessed German agent named Werner Horn, who boasted that he blew up the C.P.R. bridge across the St. Croix river in the province of New Brunswick in February, 1915, was brought to New York yesterday by two Canadian officers, who will take him into Canada for trial? If so, where will he be tried, and when?

Hon. CHARLES J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I was not aware of the exact stage the proceedings had reached.

Proceedings have been pending for some time for the extradition of the person referred to. Their progress was delayed by the fact that he was convicted of different offences committed in the United States and underwent sentence there. Whether the statement referred to by the hon. member is accurate or not I am not aware, but I shall make inquiries.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. AIME MIVILLE DECHENE (Montmagny): In some parts of Quebec, Mr. Speaker, we have asked for an improvement in the Railway Mail Service, and I understand from the official reports that the matter is delayed on account of the proposal to increase the rates received by the railway companies for transporting the mails. Is the Government about to settle that increase and so improve the service required?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The matter is under the consideration of the Government.

Mr. DECHENE: May I ask further when the matter is going to be settled?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: After it has been duly considered.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM.

RESOLUTION RESPECTING ITS ACQUISITION BY THE GOVERNMENT.

House again in Committee (from October 15) to consider resolution providing for acquisition by the Government of Canada of the Grand Trunk railway system. (For resolution see page 1059 of Unrevised Hansard.) Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Late Minister of Finance): It had been my intention to speak upon the motion for the second reading of the Bill which will be brought in after this resolution has been adopted, because it appeared to me that the policy of the Government would then be brought under formal and deliberate review. But as the debate upon this resolution has taken a general character, it has occurred to me that I can say what I desire to say upon the question at the present time. At the outset I desire to say that the policy of the Government in acquiring the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada has my hearty and unqualified support. It does not appear to me that the Government could properly take any other course, if they are to have due regard to their duty respecting the existing railway situation in Canada, and the transportation needs and requirements of this country. This matter cannot be discussed without reference to the general railway situation of this country. It is not my intention to detain the House at any length by going into details of the finances of the several railroad systems of Canada. Those matters were so fully discussed during the past few years that it would seem to me that I would be trespassing unduly upon the indulgence of this House if I attempted to go into details. I think the House is sufficiently acquainted with the position of the several transcontinental railway systems of this country, and my observations will, therefore, be of a general character with regard to the policy which has now been disclosed by the Government in their proposed acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway system.

There are certain salient features of the railway situation to which attention may be usefully directed in arriving at a wise conclusion as to the action which should be taken at this time with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. In the first place, I think every one in this House would be disposed to agree with the general proposition that Canada has been seriously over-built with respect to transcontinental railways. That is abundantly evident in the duplication of extensive and expensive lines which have been constructed during the past fifteen or more years. One has only to consider the situation from Winnipeg west to the Pacific coast, or for that matter, from Toronto to Montreal in which three lines parallel each other for great distances, almost within a stone's throw of each other, to reach the conclusion without doubt or hesitation that there has been most serious duplication in the construction of Canada's transcontinental railway systems. It is idle to inquire what political party, if any, is responsible for that state of affairs. It is also idle to inquire what share of responsibility should be borne by political parties, and I have said in this House before that a share of the blame, if blame is to be imputed, rests upon both political parties in this country. This is, however, to be said for the action which was taken. It was a period of great expansion in Canada, and, at least, a majority of the people, were practically consenting parties to the railway policy which was adopted during the past twenty years, and any one who did not seriously object to the policy which was adopted by previous governments at the time that policy was adopted, can hardly be heard now to complain as to the serious existing situation, because the situation is a serious one.

I think this committee will agree with me that, having regard to the momentous questions which have been before Canada during the war and which now are before Canada as a result of the war, we might better not waste discussion in seeking to impute degrees of blame for any national situation which may exist. The proper course for us as public men to consider is: What is the existing situation? Does it require remedy, and, if so, what is the appropriate remedy? That is the problem before the House and the country.

I have said that Canada's transcontinental railway systems have been built on too extensive a scale. Let us consider what the situation was fifteen years ago, or let us say, at the beginning of the present century, nearly nineteen years ago. Canada was then served by one splendid transcontinental system, admirably managed, the Canadian Pacific railway, which was the only transcontinental system at that time. Then we had the old Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, one of the pioneer roads which had much to do with the development of old Canada. Its lines were principally in Central Canada with most important connections to Chicago and to points in the Eastern States. Then we had in Manitoba and in the two provinces immediately to the west the Canadian Northern railway system with its several branches. It must not be forgotten in connection with the Canadian Northern railway that it opened up immense territory which otherwise might not and probably would not have been opened up to-day. I think myself that the construction of the Canadian Northern railway through the Canadian Northwest was the means of immensely increasing the productive capacity of those three Prairie Provinces. One has only to consider the quantity of grain carried by the Canadian Northern railway, to agree with the statement which I have made. That was the situation which confronted Canada fifteen or twenty years ago. My view is—and I put this forward not at all dogmatically, I hope I may never be accused of that in this House—that it would have been wise if the Canadian Northern railway with its extensive connections in the Canadian Northwest should have been joined up with the Grand Trunk railway system in Central Canada. Then we should have had two transcontinental railway systems, the Canadian Pacific, which already existed, and which has been widely extended, and the Grand Trunk—Canadian Northern system, which then would have had the lines of the Grand Trunk in the East with their connections, as I have mentioned, in the United States, and the Canadian Northern Railway system in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. But that was not done. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system was gone on with under the agreement which was entered into between the Government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company in 1903. The eastern division of the National Transcontinental, that is the line between Moncton and Winnipeg, was also gone on with. Now it is only fair to say that those proposals were before the people of Canada, and the Government which brought them forward in 1904 and 1908 was supported by public opinion. The result was the building of the National Transcontinental from Moncton to Winnipeg at a cost of $160,000,000 or $170,000,000, and the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific from Winnipeg through to the coast, in competition with the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific. It also resulted at a later date in the extension of the Canadian Northern Railway system easterly.

I submit that the seriousness of the existing railway situation in Canada is due to the fact that the Grand Trunk Pacific railway was extended through from Winnipeg to the coast, and that the Canadian Northern was extended through Ontario and Quebec to the east. That has resulted in an enormous additional expenditure of capital, and in great and most wasteful duplication of lines, to the detriment of the entire country, because freight rates have an undoubted relation to the cost of operation of railways, which includes, of course, their fixed charges.

The serious railway situation which I have mentioned was by far the most important problem in this country before the war broke out. The war during its course of four and more years overshadowed that issue, but it is only natural that the railway problem, which, next to the war, was the most serious question before Canada, should again take its proper place in importance before this House. The result is that we find ourselves to-day discussing this important transaction; the acquisition by the Government of the Grand Trunk Railway system of Canada. In 1911, it will be remembered, the Government of the day, the late Liberal Government, introduced legislation guaranteeing the bonds of the Canadian Northern Railway Company to the amount of $35,000,000, covering the line, roughly speaking, from Montreal to Port Arthur. So far as I am aware, there was no strong opposition on the part of the Conservative party to that guarantee, so it would appear that both political parties consented to the giving of that guarantee, which really determined the character of the Canadian Northern railway as a transcontinental system.

When the Conservative Government took office in 1911 we found, therefore, this situation: The Eastern division of the National Transcontinental railway, that is the section between Moncton and Winnipeg, partially completed, and the Canadian Northern Railway line between Montreal and Port Arthur partially completed and being financed or about to be financed from the proceeds of the bonds which, as I have stated, were to be guaranteed by the Dominion Government. The Grand Trunk Pacific was uncompleted. That was the railway situation when the Conservative Government came into power in 1911. I desire to say on behalf of myself, and I think also on behalf of my late colleagues in the Government, that it was the desire of us all to deal as fairly as possible with the railway situation. I think that was the right course and the course which was in the national interest. I know for myself that the money that was needed to complete the Grand Trunk Pacific railway was found and found not unwillingly. In 1909 the Liberal Government had given a guarantee of $10,000,000 in order to secure funds to enable the Grand Trunk Pacific to go forward with its enterprise. In 1913, the second year after the Conservative Government came into power, we appropriated a further sum of $15,000,000, and in 1916 a further sum of $16,000,000. In 1916 we also set aside $8,000,000 in the Estimates in order that the Grand Trunk Pacific railway might be enabled to carry on. We also placed an estimate of $7,500,000 in the Estimates of 1917 and again in 1918. The point, therefore, I am making is that so far as the Grand Trunk Pacific is concerned the policy of the Dominion Government was that it should be completed in accordance with the original plans and specifications. Now that was done. We also finished the National Transcontinental from Moncton to Winnipeg. With regard to the Canadian Northern, we found an uncompleted situation. First an additional subsidy was granted, and afterwards there was a guarantee of $45,000,000 of bonds, and later a loan—I am speaking from memory—of $15,000,000.

With regard to the obligation of the Grand Trunk Pacific to take over the Eastern division of the National Transcontinental from Moncton to Winnipeg and pay a rental after seven years of three per cent upon the total cost, it was apparent to me, and I think the Government, that it would be quite impossible for the Grand Trunk Pacific, no matter if successful beyond the utmost expectations which could then be formed of it, to pay such a rental, because the cost for various reasons had been so much larger than was originally contemplated. The Government therefore took the position that whatever loss there might be in connection with the Eastern division of the National Transcontinental would fall upon the Government and the people of Canada.

That brings me down to 1916. We were then in the midst of the war. There were heavy demands upon the national Treasury and there had been so many applications made to the Dominion Government on behalf of the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific that it was determined the Government could not continue to pay out these large sums and allow these systems to remain in private hands. That was the decision come to by the Government, and that decision, I am sure, was strongly supported by public opinion throughout this country. After a very full statement to the House we decided that a commission would be appointed to investigate the entire railway situation in Canada, and to make such recommendations as they might deem proper.

That commission, as the House knows, consisted of three very eminent gentlemen—Sir Henry Drayton, who was then chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, Mr. Smith, president of the New York Central Railway company, and Mr. Acworth, a distinguished financial and railway authority of Great Britain. The report which they brought in is an historic document, and I believe its recommendations have on the whole met with acceptance throughout the country. It is true that the report I refer to was a majority report; Mr. Smith dissented. What they recommended was precisely what it appears to me they were bound to recommend, having regard to the financial condition of these railway companies and to the necessity of keeping our railway systems in such physical and financial condition as would enable them to discharge their duties to the Canadian community. They recommended practically the taking over the Canadian Northern Railway, of the Grand Trunk Railway and of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. They recommended that these railways should be joined up with the Intercolonial Railway, that old link which bound together the Maritime Provinces and Quebec and Ontario. They further recommended that a commission should be appointed of competent men entirely free from political influence who should administer the affairs of that national railway system. The result of their recommendation if carried out would be two transcontinental railway systems in Canada. That, I submit, would have been a desirable thing if it had been accomplished, by the method which I mentioned, in 1904. They aimed at two systems.

It was not proposed that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should be taken over, and personally I am opposed to the taking over of that company because I believe it is rendering a most admirable service to the people of this country. It is a railway of which we are all proud. Its management is of the highest character and quality, and its achievements both before and during the war have commanded the admiration not only of the people of Canada but of the whole world. The Dominion Government, feeling that the recommendations of the Drayton-Acworth report were sound, proceeded to carry them into effect. It could not be done at once. As a result, the Canadian Northern Railway Company was taken over and it is being operated through a Board of Directors; and there is associated in its management the Intercolonial Railway of Canada. The policy of acquiring the Canadian Northern and joining it up with the Intercolonial was the following out of the recommendations of the Drayton-Acworth report.

Now we come to a later stage. We had furnished the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company with some seven and a half or eight million dollars per year to enable it to carry on its operations, and there came a time when the Government considered that public opinion in this country would not sustain it in advancing further large sums—seven millions, eight millions or ten millions, which would have been required during the past year to carry on the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, the ownership of whose stock was in the Grand Trunk Railway Company and whose securities were guaranteed in large part by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. It is within the memory of the House, because it is comparatively recent, that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, being unable to go on, was placed in receivership by the Government of Canada. That occurred in February or March last. During the preceding summer the Grand Trunk Railway Company had made an application to the Dominion Government for assistance. It was clear that the Grand Trunk Railway Company was in a serious position by reason of its being involved in guarantees, to so large an extent, of the securities of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. I think the indirect liability of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company was in the neighbourhood of $100,000,000. On the other hand—and it is very pertinent to the discussion of this question—it is to be borne in mind that the Dominion Government has direct and indirect liabilities in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to an amount of some $140,000,000 or more—say $145,000,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the placing in receivership of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway in my judgment, made inevitable the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway of Canada. The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, in order to continue conducting its operations, would have been obliged to make good its guarantee upon the securities of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company which were outstanding. Ten million dollars of these securities issued in 1909 were guaranteed by the Dominion Government. The Grand Trunk, like any other transcontinental railway system, would have been obliged to make needed extensions and improvements of a capital character in order that its system might be properly and adequately maintained. It would appear, therefore, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company, with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in receivership, must inevitably seek assistance from the Dominion Government and as I have pointed out, in 1908, although the Grand Trunk Pacific was not then in receivership, application had been made for assistance and the question was then raised in the correspondence between the Prime Minister and Mr. Alfred Smithers as to the liability of the Grand Trunk upon the Grand Trunk Pacific's securities. It was an obvious situation, and I shall not dwell upon it because it seems perfectly clear. The Grand Trunk was so involved with the Grand Trunk Pacific that it would be exceedingly difficult for it to continue to maintain its efficient condition and equipment and take care of its liabilities in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific's securities.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the hon. member pardon me? I should like him to tell the committee what was the character of the assistance asked for by the Grand Trunk on that occasion.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am speaking from memory—it was, I think, in order to enable them to meet certain maturities upon their own obligations which were about to become due in London.

Mr. McKENZIE: How much money did they ask for?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry I am unable to give the hon. gentleman that information, but I have no doubt it can be given to him by the Government. It was not a very considerable sum in terms of railway finance, but still it was a substantial amount. Now, just let me recapitulate the different steps which have brought about this situation, inevitable if the Government is to discharge its duty in regard to the serious railway condition that exists in this country and in regard to the transportation needs and requirements of Canada. The necessity for further assistance to the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company became evident.

The Dominion Government, in giving its guarantee in 1914 of the securities of the Canadian Northern Railway system to the extent of $45,000,000, insisted upon receiving $40,000,000 of the common stock of the company. They took the view that if they were to be called upon to give such a large guarantee of the securities they must obtain a substantial interest in the road. They obtained, with the amount of stock which they had received the year before, in respect of the subsidy they granted, a total sum of $40,000,000 out of the $100,000,000 of the capital stock of the company. That gave the Dominion Government an interest in the Canadian Northern Railway system. Then, the further loans which were made to the Canadian Northern Railway and to the Grand Trunk Pacific brought about the commission to inquire into the railway situation in Canada. The result was the Drayton-Acworth report under which the Government has since acted, and under which, Mr. Chairman, it is acting in bringing down the resolution now before the House.

I desire to dwell for a moment upon certain financial aspects of this transaction and indeed relating to the taking over of any railway system. It is often put forward that the Dominion Government in taking over a railway system is increasing the public debt by the amount of the securities which have been issued and are outstanding of such railway company. Well, one can understand what is in the minds of persons putting forth that view. They say: "If you acquire a railway company which has very large obligations to be met, you increase the national debt of Canada by the amount of those obligations." I think it must be perfectly clear to the House—and I desire to dwell upon this point a little—that in taking over any railway company the liability assumed is a marginal liability. It is not a liability to the full extent of the securities outstanding of such system. Let me take a simple case. Suppose the Dominion Government were taking over the Canadian Pacific railway to-morrow, does anybody suppose that we should be in the least degree anxious about the outstanding debenture indebtedness of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? It would be said: "True, you are taking over the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and there is this outstanding liability, but on the other side you have the assets of this splendid system; you have net revenues which are adequate to pay the interest upon all the outstanding securities and give you a large surplus besides." That is so obvious that I do not propose to labour it.

But that is not the case in regard to the Canadian Northern Railway system; it is not the case in regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific and it is not the case in regard to the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. But the point I am making is that the liability which the Dominion Government will assume in taking over the Grand Trunk is a marginal liability. Each year there will have to be found the amount of the deficit, if any, between the net railway returns and the amount which the Government is obligated to pay under the award of the arbitrators. If, for example, the Grand Trunk railway should show in any year a surplus of $3,000,000 and the award of the arbitrators obligated the Dominion Government to pay $3,000,000 a year, of course, there need be no anxiety in regard to the liability in respect to the securities of the company because the net revenues are adequate to take care of the fixed and operating charges.

There is no man in this House who is more sensible of the serious financial position of this country at this time, immediately succeeding the greatest war in history in which from the very beginning Canada has been a belligerent, than I am. I do not in the least degree desire to minimize the importance of this question or to put forward the view that it merits only light consideration. It is an exceedingly important transaction meriting the very best deliberation that this House can give to it. I submit that it is an urgent and immediate question and that the Government would have been derelict in its duty if it had delayed bringing down this resolution to the House.

This is not a new question; it has been to the fore ever since the Drayton-Acworth report. It has been almost immediately before Parliament ever since the Prime Minister made his offer to the Grand Trunk Railway Company in England in 1918. The correspondence is now before the House. As Finance Minister and Acting Prime Minister I announced during last session that we should acquire the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. It seemed to me inevitable, just as it seems inevitable now. I see no other course, if, as I say, we are to deal with the railway situation, and it must be dealt with if we are to meet the transportation needs of this country. A large railway system is very different from a private business. Communities depend upon the operation of the railway and its general efficiency. There is no question that in this country, largely on account of the size of the country and its peculiar physical formation, that is so concerned with the Government as the question of transportation. The Government therefore was in this position: In 1918, the Prime Minister made his offer on behalf of the Government to Mr. Alfred Smithers, President of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. That was the offer of the Dominion of Canada. The Prime Minister said: "We will take over the Grand Trunk railway system." What was then in view was a lease for 999 years. He said: "We will pay $2,500,000 for the first three years; we will pay $3,000,000 for the next five years and we will pay $3,600,000 per year thereafter." That was the offer made by the Government of Canada through its Prime Minister. However, the Grand Trunk Railway Company did not accept that offer, and just here I desire to say that it is a little difficult for me to understand some of the criticisms which have emanated from London in respect to the attitude of the Government towards the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The offer of the Prime Minister was in the alternative. He said: "We offer you $2,500,000 a year for three years; we offer you $3,000,000 a year for five years and we offer you $3,600,000 a year thereafter. In the alternative we offer you arbitration." Now we hear from some of the London press that they are very glad the Government has taken a different attitude in the matter. Arbitration was open to the Grand Trunk Railway Company from the first. There has been no change in the Government's policy. Once Sir Alfred Smithers, President of the Grand Trunk Railway Company said: "I accept your offer, Mr. Prime Minister"; it became the bounden duty of this Government to bring the matter before this House as they have done.

It may be unfortunate that this is at what we thought would be the close of the session, but I would submit that that is not the fault of the Government.

The Grand Trunk Railway Company had not hitherto given its consent, although negotiations had been proceeding. Once Sir Alfred Smithers, on behalf of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, gave his consent there was nothing for the Government to do, in pursuance of their public duty, but to bring the matter before this House and ask the House to endorse the policy which it had adopted as long ago as 1918, namely, to acquire the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada. So that I do not believe any just complaint can be made for bringing in this legislation at this time. I have no doubt the Government would very much rather, having regard to many considerations which I need not mention, postpone the consideration of this matter until another session; but I would submit that they would be derelict in their duty if they did so. Further than that—and I am speaking now to myself as well as to my fellow members of this House—I believe that Parliament would be derelict in its duty if it were unwilling to sit whatever time may be necessary to consider and deal with this matter now that the Grand Trunk Railway Company has said: We do accept the offer of the Prime Minister.

Now let me deal with one other objection that has been brought. I have not followed them all, but there is one objection which has been brought, and which, on the face of it, seems to be important. It is said: You have guaranteed the guaranteed stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. Now, if you will look—I have looked at it only hurriedly before coming in—at the letter of the Minister of the Interior written to Sir Alfred Smithers in London, you will find that the offer was $2,500,000 yearly for the first three years—$3,000,000 for the next five years, and thereafter $3,600,000, to be disposed of, I think, as the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company might see fit, among the holders of the guaranteed stock, the preference stocks, and the common stock. Very good. Now, the point I make here—and it seems to me it settles the matter absolutely as far as that objection is concerned—is this: That the $2,500,000, the $3,000,000, and the $3,600,000, the amount that was offered by the Government was more than sufficient to take care of the interest upon the guaranteed stock. That being so, that stock was clearly guaranteed—if the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company desired to apply it in respect of that stock. They have always treated that stock like debenture stock or bonds, as though it were an obligation of the company instead of a stock in the ordinary sense—that is to say, shareholders' stock, guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company; they have always regarded that as an outstanding liability of the company rather than as representing a participation by shareholders in the ordinary sense. Well now, if—and I just repeat this to fasten it in the minds of the House—the offer was sufficient to take care of that interest upon the guaranteed stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, why do we bother if that company now say to us: "We would like you to guarantee that stock"—because the offer of the Government is a continuing offer and could have been accepted in its terms by the Grand Trunk if they desired to do so.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have covered a good deal of ground. What I desire to point out is that mistakes have been made in the past in the railway policy of this country, and that as a result of those mistakes action has had to be taken from time to time by the Government, including this present action. I should not like to leave my statement just at that. This is a difficult country to administer. We have a sparse population, scattered over a territory as large as the United States, as large as Europe. We have very large stretches of territory that are not productive. Our railway policy has had to be conceived and carried out under considerable difficulties. We had it from the very beginning. The Intercolonial railway had to span very considerable distances in order to carry out the scheme of Confederation by linking up the Maritime Provinces with old Canada. No one supposed that the Intercolonial Railway would be from the beginning a commercial success. The Government had to lose a certain amount of money on the operation of the Intercolonial railway in order that Confederation might be possible, to join up the maritime portions of Canada with Quebec and Ontario. When the Canadian Pacific railway was projected very large subsidies had to be given in land, and otherwise, in order that the Northwest Territories and British Columbia might be joined up with Ontario and Quebec. There is a great gap of a thousand miles of wilderness between Ontario and Manitoba, and there is the great barrier of the Rocky mountains between the Prairie Provinces and British Columbia. Now these had to be overcome. Not only that; it was vital to this country that immigration should be got in and railways cannot wait on population. The Governments of this country in the past have had to build in advance of immigration in order that the land might be accessible to the incoming immigrants. I think we should bear these matters in mind and should rather prepare ourselves for this result, inevitable I think; that the Government, if there had only been two transcontinental railway systems instead of three, might have had to provide considerable assistance until the increase in population would come and with it the earning power which would enable these railways to carry on with profit, or at least without serious loss. Any money that was spent by the Government of Canada in liquidating deficits in operation of the Intercolonial railway, any subsidies that were granted to the Canadian Pacific or to the Canadian Northern or Grand Trunk Pacific railway might be regarded properly by this country as sums of money which the nation had to spend, having regard to its future welfare, in order to overcome the geographical and physical difficulties with which we have been face to face in Canada. Now what is the trend of my argument? It is this: That the liability upon the Canadian Northern system, the Grand Trunk system, and the Intercolonial system is a marginal liability. It is not correct to say that the Government assumes all the indebtedness of all these lines; it is correct to say that the Government will have to meet whatever deficit there may be on the operation of them. Now to put the past aside, and recognizing the futility of recriminations as to the degree of responsibility for the railway situation, is not this the position? What is the wise thing to do in this situation? We must enable these railway companies to maintain their physical position —their roadway, their plant, and equipment—if they are to minister to the needs of this country.

And just in that connection let me say this: Canada's railways played a very splendid part in this war, and on the credit side of our railway situation—I have spoken of the other side—I think we should place this fact, that the railway systems of Canada, with their fine equipment and capable staffs, enabled us to play a much greater part in the war than would otherwise have been possible. I think we should put that on the credit side of the account.

Now, the liability we will assume is a marginal liability. I think it may be reasonably heavy for many years to come, but considerable will depend upon freight rates, upon volume of traffic, and upon efficiency of administration. Personally—and I am always disposed to take a hopeful and optimistic view of our future, because I believe in the Canadian people and in the wonderful resources of this country—I have always been disposed to look optimistically upon the railway situation of the Dominion. The country will be able to bear whatever marginal loss there may be in the operation of these roads, which are not on a profitable basis as is the Canadian Pacific railway, until such time as they are placed on a paying basis. It may be a considerable time, I do not desire to place a false view before the House, but however long that marginal loss continues it will have to be borne by the country as a penalty for mistakes which we have made in the past, and in the general interest of the efficiency of the Dominion's transportation systems.

Personally, I would like to look with pride upon the establishment of a national transcontinental railway system in honourable competition with the Canadian Pacific railway, to which I have already paid my tribute. And it seems to me that if we can keep the railways we have taken over out of politics, if we can keep their administration clean and in the hands of the most efficient administrators, we shall get that condition of affairs which will go a long way towards solving this problem. I have this to say, however, that I regard it as absolutely vital that there should be no interference of a political character. And further than that, I think there should be no influence of a quasi-political character—I mean sectional influence. Speaking with the freedom of a private member—for I have been promoted—if I were giving advice to the Government I would say: When you are considering your final commission that is to administer all the railways taken over under a national system, you must choose only the best operating men you can engage, and not bother very much whether you get a man to represent British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, and each of the Maritime Provinces; because every man, no matter how honest he may be, is bound to be under the influence of his section, and he will use his influence almost unconsciously to have extensions made that should not be made, to order rolling stock that should not be ordered, and to have contracts given that should not be given in his home section. My advice therefore would be that when you get all these railways in hand you appoint officials of the highest efficiency and reputation. Their standing with the Government and the country will depend absolutely upon the efficiency with which they administer these roads, and therefore they should not be hampered in any way.

I must apologize to the House, Mr. Chairman, for taking so much of its time, but the matter is important, and my excuse, if not my justification, is that for many years I had much to do with the railway policy of the Government and was brought in contact with the problems which were involved in that policy, and although I say it myself, I regarded my duties with a very high sense of responsibility. I feel a continuing responsibility with regard to this matter, and I desire to say that the course which has been adopted by the Government appears to me to be the proper and inevitable course, and that in the resolution which they have placed before the House they have, as I stated at the outset, my entire and cordial sympathy and support.

Mr. DEVLIN: Would the ex-Minister of Finance allow me to ask him a question? It was urged in March of this year that the then Finance Minister was opposed to the granting of any further loans to the Grand Trunk railway or to the Grand Trunk Pacific railway out of which the Grand Trunk Railway Company mignt pay the interest upon the obligations of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Am I right or am I wrong?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If I understand my hon. friend correctly, he asks me if I was opposed to the Dominion Government continuing its subsidies to the Grand Trunk Pacific. I was opposed to that course, because I thought, as I then stated, that public opinion was decidedly against it.

Mr. DEVLIN: Then I want to follow up that answer with this other question. Is not the whole substance of this resolution to give power to the Government to loan money to the Grand Trunk Railway Company out of which they may pay their operating expenses and the interest due upon the Grand Trunk Pacific, and, further, to guarantee the debenture stock and the new stock, to be called guaranteed stock, and nothing else; that there is no acquisition of any property at all, it is simply a loan?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend has for years been so much in the habit of addressing his questions to me that it is difficult for him to get over it. But I am very glad to give him my own view, which is not necessarily the view of the Government at all, because, as I have said, I am now a private member of this House. The Government upon acquiring the Grand Trunk railway's stock will administer the road, will make good any deficits on its operation, and will provide for the taking out from receivership of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. Now, my hon. friend asked me if I was in favour of making further grants to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. I said that I was not. I pointed out before that the Grand Trunk Railway Company owned the stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and were therefore the proprietor. I was unwilling that the Government of Canada in 1914 should guarantee $45,000,000 of stock of the Canadian Northern without getting $40,000,000 or as much more as we could—although that was all we were able to get—of common stock. I was unwilling that the Government after 1916 should make any further advances to the Canadian Northern railway while it remained in private hands; but I was not unwilling that the Government should take the railway over and make whatever advances might be necessary to carry it on. I take the same view in regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific. I would assist the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, provided its stock, owned by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, would become the property of the Government together with the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. That would mean that the Government of Canada has taken the place of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the people of this country putting it on no other basis, will consent to this Government continuing to make large advances to privately owned railways; but they will agree to make whatever advances are absolutely necessary to railways that are owned by the Government.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING: Mr. Chairman, in the last part of the very moderate and very interesting speech of my hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) he gave us a very pretty picture of a condition which he expects to arise in relation to the management of the public affairs of this country. He gave us the picture of a condition in which the biggest interests of the people of Canada, the subjects of most consequence to them, should be taken absolutely out of their own control. He says that in order to make this great enterprise successful you must keep it out of politics; and he expects that to be accomplished. Does my hon. friend not know as well as I do that politics in its proper sense means the business of the people of this country? When you provide that the great business of the people of this country is going to be taken out of politics, that means that you are going to take it out of the control of the people and to put it into the hands of irresponsible parties.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Would my hon. friend think it advisable in connection with a commission or board administering the Government-owned railways of Canada, the Minister of Railways or the Minister of Finance, or both, should ex-officio have a seat or seats upon that board?

Mr. FIELDING: I have not attempted to define how that business might be carried on. I am not objecting to the happy condition which my hon. friend describes. I am afraid it is a mere vision and cannot be realized. Unless we are to abolish democracy, unless we are to set up that kind of autocracy which, for the last five years, we have been trying to destroy, I am afraid we have to accept this principle: That the affairs of the people of Canada have to be managed by the people of Canada through their representatives. Every attempt that is made to take these things away from the people and to create so-called independent commissions with which the people shall have nothing to do, is doomed to failure. Democracy has its perils, and one of them is that the people may not always act wisely. I am not opposing the view expressed by my hon. friend that these railways should be kept out of politics, but I am very much afraid that that happy condition is only a vision and is not likely to be realized as early as he expects and as he and I both wish.

Many thousands of the people of Canada of all shades of politics are to-day asking this question: Why should the Government of Canada, in the closing days of a special session, called for another purpose, endeavour to stampede the House of Commons into the adoption of one of the most important measures that has ever been submitted to the Canadian Parliament? I have been asked that question in this city to-day by prominent Conservatives, and I know it is being asked throughout the country. To that very natural and proper question no sufficient answer has been given by the ministers; no sufficient answer has been given even in the very persuasive speech delivered to-day by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). Even if this scheme of purchase as presented to the House had a larger merit than some of us may see in it; even if its merit were such as to be somewhat beyond debate, I would still hold that it is utterly inadvisable for the Government of Canada to thrust it through the House of Commons and the Parliament of Canada to-day under the circumstances under which we are meeting. We have a special session of this Parliament of Canada called for a special purpose. Many a man has come to Ottawa with his projects to promote, momentous, perhaps, in their own way, and he has been told by ministers and members whose good offices he has sought that it is of no use; that this is not a time for those things, that this is a special session called for the purpose of dealing with the Peace Treaty; that we must deal with the Peace Treaty, and that he can take away his project and wait for another year. That has been properly enough told to many a man who has come to Ottawa endeavouring to promote schemes. Suddenly we discover that the special purpose for which we are called this session is to be departed from. Only last week the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), acting as leader of the House in the absence of the Prime Minister, declared that the business of the House was virtually ended and that we might expect prorogation on the following Saturday, only four days after he made that statement. In the expectation of that, in the belief that the end of the session had come, members went away; some members left for Europe; members have scattered throughout the Dominion, and many of them are not likely to come back. When attention was called to this fact yesterday, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) said: Well, what of that; we are here now. But my hon. friend was wrong. We are not here now; we are not half here now. We had a vote yesterday. There are 235 members of this House, and yesterday on this, the first stage of this matter of paramount importance, we had a vote of 58 to 38, or 96 members, or less than one-half of the House. The minister says: We are here. We are not here, and the country will understand that this measure is being railroaded through the House when one-half of the House is not here. No matter if the scheme were a more meritorious one than it is, there is absolutely no justification for the Government's trying to put it through in this way. The ex-Minister of Finance told us to-day: "This is not a new case; we have had this matter before us for a long time," and in all his remarks he rather assumed that the Parliament of Canada had passed on this matter and had made an offer to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Nothing of the kind occurred. The ministers had some correspondence with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and in due course that correspondence was brought down and buried within the blue books that we have in such abundance in this House. Beyond the fact that there were some negotiations with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, nineteen out of twenty men in Canada to-day could not tell you anything about the matter. It never came before the House of Commons; it could not have come before the House of Commons properly, and if any one had attempted, on the strength of that correspondence, to bring the matter before the House of Commons and to found a debate upon it, the Government would have said very properly: What is the use; we made a suggestion to the company; the company did not accept it; there is the end of the matter; there is nothing to propose; when we have anything to propose that will be the time to bring it before the House. Therefore, as far as the House of Commons is concerned, this is a new matter which comes before us now practically for the first time.

I have said that even if this proposal were as meritorious as we would all like it to be, there would still be strong reasons against proceeding with it now. But the reason is all the stronger against proceeding with it now when we find that this procedure which we are taking has already become the foundation for gigantic stock speculation in the London market. How that comes about I do not pretend to know. I am offering no suggestion on that point; it is the fact I present, and it is a fact that by this proposed action we are giving to a property—I am speaking, not of the railway property, but of certain stocks—a value which up to the time of this legislation being introduced had very small value. Apparently, there were people on the other side of the Atlantic who understood that if we did not understand it here.

We are dealing with six classes of stocks. The first of those, the most important of those, is comprised in what are called debenture stocks, and which are set forth in the resolution. There is a 5 per cent Grand Trunk debenture stock, a 5 per cent Great Western debenture stock, a 4 per cent Grand Trunk debenture stock, and a 4 per cent Northern debenture stock, amounting in all to £31,926,125. Those are virtually a first charge on the revenues and properties of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and they are treated for the purpose of this discussion as having a substantial value. I am going to assume that that is correct; that when we get those stocks we shall be getting something of substantial value. It is not necessary to make any particular admission of the value, but I do not wish to debate that point at present. Then we come to another class of stocks. There are the first preference, second preference, third preference and the common stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, amounting to about £37,000,000, and on the value of those stocks there is to be an arbitration. I do not know that we could do otherwise than have an arbitration on the value of those stocks, but I must confess that the House and the country has reason to be alarmed at arbitration of that character. We had an arbitration in regard to the Canadian Northern, and while I do not want to enter into that question broadly, there are one or two facts which we must have in mind.

We had the report of the Drayton-Acworth Commission, of which the present Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) was a member, which stated that the common stock of the Canadian Northern Railway was worth nothing, and yet in due course honourable arbitrators—I do not question for a moment their good intentions—were able to make the people of Canada pay between $10,000,000 and $11,000,000 for that stock, which according to the present Minister of Finance was absolutely worthless. It was worse than watered stock. Sometimes watered stock implies that there was a little spirit in the glass first and then water is poured in until the spirit becomes very thin and diluted. That may be the case with some of the Grand Trunk stocks, but in the case of the Canadian Northern there was no whisky at the bottom of the glass. It was all water. There was nothing being derived from that stock which went into the treasury of the Canadian Northern Railway. It was a bonused stock, distributed according to the practice of the day, and I am not finding any fault with that. It was a stock that did not represent any money. It did not have any value. It was a basket of waste paper, and for that basket of waste paper under a system of arbitration the people of Canada paid $10,000,000 or $11,000,000 of hard cash. There is no getting away from those facts; they are beyond dispute.

Now if a common stock which never had any money in it could be converted by arbitration into $10,000,000 or $11,000,000 of money of the people of Canada, there is a little danger that for this stock of the Grand Trunk mentioned in these proposals, which had some money value originally, and some of which has at times paid dividends, I think there is a strong probability that under arbitration again we may have to pay a very large sum of money. I am going to make the suggestion to the Government, although I am afraid they will not accept it, that in the Bill they bring forward they should provide that the arbitration award should have no effect until it has been brought down and submitted to the House of Commons of Canada. So much concerning these classes of stock.

I come now to the remaining one, to which frequent reference has been made—the 4 per cent guaranteed stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, amounting to £12,500,000. This word "guaranteed" is apt to be a bit confusing. When we speak in our public affairs of a guaranteed stock, we usually mean a stock guaranteed by the Dominion Government, by a Provincial Government, or possibly by a municipal government. The word "guaranteed" implies something of that sort. But in this case it has to be remembered that the word "guaranteed" has no such meaning. The 4 per cent guaranteed stock of £12,500,000 is simply a preferred stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. It does not bear that name but that is what it means. It has nothing behind it but the promise of the Grand Trunk Company to pay dividends on it if the dividends are earned and the prior claims satisfied. Now that stock has some value. It was quoted in the London market not very long ago—I am so informed; I have not been able to prove that statement by reference, but I believe it is correct—at 45. Forty-five cents on the dollar was the quoted value of that stock. Now if the Government desire to acquire that stock, a fair and reasonable arrangement would be for them to acquire it at about the value, or a little more than the value, as quoted in the market. Surely that is reasonable. I would have no desire in the transactions between the Government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company to have any squeezing process. I realize that the Grand Trunk has rendered great service in times past in Canada. More than that. One of the cries against the Laurier Government, and I only make this passing allusion, in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific, was that we were giving a bonanza, a big prize, to the Grand Trunk Company. The fact is the Grand Trunk Pacific had the hardest contract ever given in Canada. The interest of Canada was so protected in the contract that the Grand Trunk Pacific never had a chance to make any money except that which they could earn, and the business of the country unfortunately did not enable them to earn it. But we held them to their bargain, and I think it was a very severe bargain, indeed. For these reasons, as well as because of the general record of the Grand Trunk in bygone years, I should like them dealt with fairly and generously, but I say that in regard to this four per cent guaranteed stock it would have been a fair and just and liberal arrangement if the Government of Canada in their purchase scheme had provided that the stock should be acquired at, say, something more than its market value. It was quoted only a few weeks ago at 45, so I am informed, and rose in a few days three points higher. Now if when the market value was 45 the Government had said: "We will take that stock at 50 or 55, anything around that figure" that would be a generous allowance, keeping in view the market value; that would have been a generous policy and would have been a fair business transaction such as would be carried on between private parties. Perhaps the Grand Trunk would not have accepted it. Then I would have given them an option. I would have said: "If you do not care to surrender the stock on these terms—its market value, plus a little premium—you can keep your stock and we will have an accounting from year to year, and when the road earns enough to pay dividends on that stock, you will get dividends, and when it does not, you will not get anything for it." That would have been a fair business arrangement, and I do not see how such a proposal could have been rejected. But that is not what the Government have done. They have taken this stock that was worth 45 a few weeks ago and are sending it up until it is nearly equivalent to par value. They are going to give a clean gift of $15,000,000, $20,000,000, perhaps $30,000,000, at the expense of the people of Canada, not to the old Grand Trunk shareholders, I am afraid, but to the people who have got possession of that stock in recent transactions and are going to make a profit out of the deal. I have said that the stock was quoted at about 45, and I am taking that from the statement that was made. I looked up the market quotations quite recently. There are two papers published in London especially devoted to Canadian affairs. One is called the Canadian Gazette, which has been publishing for many years, and the other is called Canada. Naturally they both devote much attention to securities in which Canada is interested. I find in the Canadian Gazette of September 18, when the quotation by the way was 48¼, this paragraph:

> There has been a sharp burst in Grand Trunk issues on the notification that the matter in dispute is likely to be submitted to arbitration.

We did not know that here. We had no intimation in this House that this matter was likely to be submitted to arbitration until the 10th of October, but on the 18th of September the stock market in London had a tip from somebody that this thing was going to mature. All we knew was that there was talk, as there had been for a year, about arbitration. But somebody in London knew that that talk had a meaning, that the thing was going to mature. Turning to the other paper, Canada, on September 20, says:

> Grand Trunk issues are strong on the issue of statements that the terms of the Government purchase are to be submitted to arbitration.

The quotation at this time was 48¾, and in the other paper it is given at 48¼. That was after the first "burst," to quote from the extract, of interest consequent upon this story. According to recent reports it is now worth 70, and I predict it will go to 90. Who is going to make the money out of it? If we take 45 as the fair market value and make an allowance for the probable increase we will see that somebody is going to make a great fortune at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada. This stock, worth 45 a few weeks ago and later 48 in the London market, is by this arrangement going to be made approach in value to par.

My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance knows as well as I do that not very long ago a four per cent stock in the London market, guaranteed by the Government of Canada, was worth more than par. In my own experience as Minister of Finance we issued a loan bearing only two and-a-half per cent interest at a price which made our net cost about $2.83. There were three per cent and three and-a-half per cent loans in those days. In war times money advanced. A four per cent loan to-day, guaranteed by the Government of Canada, would not be worth par, but the day is not far distant when it will be.

I am going to assume that to-day with the Government guarantee, it is worth, let us say, ninety. That is a fair estimate. I do not think the ex-Minister of Finance will say that it is not a fair estimate that the stock, if not to-day, will so soon as it is know that this transaction has been consummated, be worth ninety. That is to say, there will ere long be an advance of forty-five points on that stock and that advance of forty-five points will mean that some one has made in that transaction a profit of twenty-seven and a half million dollars, which the people of Canada and no one else will pay. I say that that is not good business. I say it is unsound finance; it is bad management which will put money into the hands of the stockholders of the Grand Trunk. It is going to put millions into the hands of some one at present unknown, who apparently somewhere got the tip and has been acquiring stock in the London money market. If any hon. minister of the Government or any member of the House can say that it is a fair business transaction to take a thing worth forty-five cents and by a stroke of the pen convert it into a value of ninety cents and make us pay the difference, then all I can say is that my conceptions of sound finance are entirely mistaken. Well, then, suppose you lay aside that question.

I have already said that even if we should feel that this arrangement was more meritorious than I have described it—if we could feel that there was no criticism of the agreement on its merits, we would still have reason to complain that at this late stage of the session it is utterly improper to introduce this legislation. What possible justification can there be? Urgency there is none. The Grand Trunk, in all this transaction, does not appear to have been anxious to have its property taken over. If I have read the correspondence correctly, the Government from beginning to end seems to have been trying to invent a ground for taking it over. Once the negotiations were opened for taking it over the Grand Trunk people would naturally desire to get the best price they could, and no blame can be ascribed to them. But no reason of urgency has been shown why this transaction should be undertaken now. Suppose the letter of Mr. Smithers had been written ten days later and we had had to wait until another session, what possible harm could have ensued? What interest could have suffered? Wherein would the people of Canada have been injured? Wherein, indeed, would the Grand Trunk or anybody else have suffered? But for some strange reason the Government seem determined to push this matter through in the face of what I do not hesitate to say is a strong opposition on the part of independent public opinion. I know there are members listening to me, sitting on both sides of the House, who cordially agree with me. I am facing hon. gentlemen who I am sure agree with everything I am saying but who are influenced by party considerations. I am throwing no stones on that score. I used to be a party man years ago, and I shall not quarrel with hon. gentlemen on that score, but I do know that if we could get at the independent thought of the members we should find a strong opinion that this Bill ought not to be passed during the present session. There are various reasons, one of which is the gravity of the financial situation. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance, in his speech today, has said very frankly that the situation is one of great gravity. Indeed, he has stated the same thing in public in another place even more forcibly, and I shall give him the benefit of his more forcible statement. On a recent occasion—where or when is of no consequence—the hon. gentleman said:

> I do not want to magnify the seriousness of the position of Canada. In my War Budget speech I aimed to give the exact facts to the House and to the public. I aimed to scrupulously point out the facts as I saw them, without any holding back of the unpleasant side of the situation. I said that an obligation had been incurred which would be a burden for generations to come, but I nevertheless struck, as I have always done during the war, an optimistic note, because I believe that, notwithstanding the heavy burdens which we have incurred, with the policy of retrenchment—

I wonder if this resolution to-day is a policy of retrenchment.

> —which I am sure will be enforced on this country as upon other countries, and it will be a political issue in the next year or two—that this country can carry on, but it can only carry on if careful regard is had to its financial position. Just look at it from several standpoints. The national debt of this country before the war was something over $300,000,000—I think $335,000,000. I estimated in the Budget speech of this year—and I do not think there is any room for doubt about the matter—that by the end of this year our net national debt will reach nearly $2,000,000,000, which is six times as much as it was before the war. Then you have the question of our revenue meeting our expenditure. I would like to say that the limit of taxation is reached, but it is going to be quite a problem to adjust our revenue to meet our ordinary expenditures. I look forward to deficits for some years. I can hardly see how you are going to avoid them. Now just by comparison try and realize what is the difference in our situation. The interest on our national debt, which is a fixed charge upon the revenue of the country, I think was under $13,000,000 in 1914. I estimated in the Budget speech for this year it would reach $115,000,000.

That is a clear picture of the situation financially. It is not a vision like the ex-Finance Minister's statement about taking the railway out of politics. This is a stern reality which we have to face every day. Our net debt, as the hon. gentleman describes it, is six times what it was before the war. Think of what that means: Six times what we had accumulated during a half century of confederation. Nay, more than that. Some of our debt as it existed before the war had come down to us from the time of the provinces before Confederation. During that half century we had built great transcontinental railways. We had constructed great canals and expended millions on terminals. We had deepened our rivers and altogether had carried out a policy which was liberal and generous with regard to the public works of our country, and after fifty years of that record we had a total net debt of $330,000,000, which we considered a vast sum, and it was. But here we are faced with the statement of my hon. friend, which is only too true, that in five years we have accumulated this debt—years not of development of our country, but years of dreadful war. I am finding no fault with the expenditures in that respect. It was a noble cause, and whatever others may say, I will defend the expenditure of moneys for the conduct of the war. In five years, however, we have multiplied by six times what was the debt of Canada after a half century of confederation. Surely that fact will strikingly disclose in all its gravity the situation that confronts us. Is it right, then, is it reasonable that in the presence of a situation such as that we should plunge into this new enterprise in the thoughtless way in which we are doing? The ex-Minister of Finance warned the public that this was going to be a political issue. I quote his own words. This question is going to be a political one, and well it may be, if at a time like this, in the face of this record, we are going to adopt a tremendous policy and do a thing which is without precedent in the history of the country.

Never was an enterprise of such magnitude brought before us under such conditions. Never before was the Parliament of Canada—denuded of one-half of its members—asked to carry through by a stampeding process a measure of such vast importance to the country. The people will not understand why it is done. I do not need to discuss the principle of public ownership. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance said he did not think it was necessary to discuss that aspect of the subject. In my own province we had public ownership to a considerable extent in connection with the Intercolonial railway for many years. Without agreeing with the criticisms which are so freely offered regarding the Intercolonial, I think I can admit that the operation of that road as a government enterprise cannot be cited as a shining example of the success of public ownership. That much I am willing to admit. And yet I do not hesitate to say that if at any time I had been asked to agree to the transfer of the Intercolonial to a private company, I am inclined to think I would have opposed it. We had got so accustomed to the Intercolonial being treated as a Government concern that we should not think of anything else and yet I am inclined to think that Government ownership in that respect, did not make for as much development as would have occurred if we had private ownership. Government ownership cannot do some things that private ownership can do. Government ownership of the Intercolonial was marked by very little development. The things that great corporations like the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk were able to do to encourage trade and traffic were not done by the Government. Yet I frankly admit that to the extent that this road was a term of Confederation, we never had any serious proposition to give it up and if we had been asked to give it up I suppose I would have voted for the old-time conditions. I would have said: "This is a part of the Confederation pact; let us keep it."

Now we are asked to go into this enterprise of Government ownership in a much larger way. I have an open mind on the question. I would like to see Government ownership become successful. But I am frank enough to say that I view it with a great deal of doubt and much gravity. I am afraid that democracy has its troubles and that sometimes democracy is not able to manage as well as independent corporations. The people as a democracy cannot always do everything as well as can perhaps a smaller body. I do not know whether that is good democratic doctrine or not but that is how it strikes me. I think our own experience is that there are many things in regard to which the more directly the control is placed in the hands of the people the less satisfactory their management is likely to be.

There are many people who believe in public ownership. Surely, if public ownership has anything like the merit that it is claimed attaches to it, we have abundant opportunity to-day to give it a trial. We have the Canadian Northern now added to the Intercolonial and we have the Grand Trunk Pacific already practically in the hands of the Government. We have about 14,000 miles of railway to-day operated by the Government. Surely that gives us abundant opportunity to test public ownership. The gravest and most serious men in Canada to-day are not supporting public ownership. They are in doubt—honestly in doubt—as to the wisdom of it and not without some good reason. These men to-day are afraid that if we go into this very large scheme of public ownership which is proposed by this resolution we shall be adding to the difficulties which are already grave enough.

I do not attack the principle of public ownership. I do not condemn the Government for taking over the Canadian Northern; I do not condemn them for taking possession of the Grand Trunk Pacific when they had notice that in four days the road would cease operating, but surely with 14,000 miles of railway now in the hands of the Government, it has a good opportunity of giving the thing a test. It is being tested elsewhere and not with great success. Public ownership was popular in the United States three years ago. To-day public ownership is discredited in the United States by the most responsible men. I doubt if the United States to-day could be induced to accept public ownership as they were willing to but a few months ago. I do not ask the House to condemn public ownership. I do not even ask—apart from the particular transaction that I have been obliged to criticize—the House to pass judgment upon the merits of the scheme, but I know that the most sober minded men in this House, some of whom are sitting on the opposite side, feel that this is a grave and dangerous experiment. I submit that there is no urgency which requires us to put this thing through to-day; that there is no excuse for railroading it through to-day, and that it will be the part of wisdom, over which the Government themselves will later on rejoice, if they agree that this matter should not be proceeded with during the present session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, there is this to be said as to the speech of the hon. member (Mr. Fielding), who has just sat down, that it leaves no doubt as to the attitude of His Majesty's loyal Opposition, or of what is called the Liberal party of Canada to-day, on the proposition now before this House for the acquirement of the Grand Trunk Railway Company's lines. They are opposed to it, because, first of all, they do not believe in the purpose of this legislation; they do not believe in the acquirement of the Grand Trunk lines and the adding of those lines to the Canadian National railway system. They are opposed to it on every ground that the ingenuity of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's can devise. According to them, there is nothing right about it; the object is wrong, the method is wrong, the plan is wrong, the principle is wrong, the time is wrong; everything about it is wrong.

And what grounds do they give for their professed belief? First of all, is it in the interest of Canada that the Grand Trunk system should be added to the Canadian National lines? Is that wrong in itself? Is that not an object to be desired under present conditions? Is that not an object to be desired aside from the proclivities of any hon. member as to the principle of government ownership?

The hon. member (Mr. Fielding) is opposed to any addition to the present Canadian National railway system. He knows, and every member knows, that the Canadian National system as it stands to-day is an incomplete, inchoate system, a system cut in the middle, a system which cannot itself succeed, and which, if left to itself as it stands, must make a failure of government ownership in this country. Consequently any hon. member who does not seek to add to the system, round it out and complete it, seeks the failure of government ownership. That indeed is the primary, the real object of the hon. gentleman.

He says we are going about it the wrong way; he says that, first of all, we try to stampede it through Parliament. That was about the first verb he used. What is the meaning of "stampede"? What are the ear-marks of a stampede? What is the evidence of a stampede in the introduction of this legislation? Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to answer me or to suggest what he has in his mind? Has any hon. member seen any evidence of stampeding or railroading the project through? We heard talk of stampeding and railroading things through years ago. I know of no railroading through or stampeding in this case. He said we had anticipated the close of the session. That does not close the session. The session is still on. He says that we are not enough of us here, yet only yesterday when a catch vote was brought on at a time when there could be no discussion, when it was never anticipated and no notice given, 38 on one side and 58 on the other were here and voted upon the question. This week many hon. members are absent taking part in the provincial elections in Ontario, and yesterday many hon. members were attending the ploughing matches. But we are not going to end this thing this week. We will be here next week and we will be here the next week after, if hon. members want it. Hon. gentlemen are not absolved from the discharge of their duty to remain here, take part in this discussion, and come to an intelligent conclusion upon the question. Can the hon. gentleman suggest any condition more auspicious, fairer, better fitted for deliberation? Can he suggest any other occasion when we will have more time than now; can he suggest any other occasion when it will burden the convenience of hon. gentlemen less than it does now; can he suggest any single constituent part of a situation that would be more favourable for the consideration of this measure than that which is now presented.

Well if he cannot, what excuse does he give this Parliament and this country for endeavouring to throw out the impression that there is a railroading process on, that there is a stampeding going on in the House of Commons of Canada? He knows there is no stampeding, he knows there is no railroading, and no hon. member knows it better than he.

Now he tells us there has been stock-jobbing somewhere across the Atlantic ocean with regard to the stocks of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I did not hear him read any evidence of stock-jobbing; I presume he got the report from the hon. member behind him who talked—

Mr. FIELDING: I did not use the expression "stock-jobbing." However, it is not important. There have been transactions reported in the public press which I mentioned and quoted the price up to 70.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman used words—

Mr. FIELDING: Anyhow the word is not wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the word is not wrong I do not know what the purpose of the interruption was. The hon. gentleman says there have been transactions in this stock. I do not know what the transactions have been, I do not know what his evidence is that the guaranteed stock has gone to 70. I read yesterday in the Montreal Star—which is not going to put an aspect on this transaction too favourable from the Government side—that the stock was 55. Those were market quotations, there was nothing else quoted by the hon. member, and he gave the stock, I think, at 48 some time in the month of February—a tremendous advance? He says that evidences something wrong, that somebody on the inside has made, or is going to make, some $20,000,000. Now let me inquire. The hon. gentleman told us there was a report in a London paper—some tip had been given there that had reached nowhere else. He made that statement—no one here he said knew anything about it, but that a tip had been published in London on September 18 that this stock was going to be valued by arbitration, and that as a consequence the stock went up—there was a "burst," as he called it, in London. Now I want to tell the hon. member that the very same report that had been published in London on that date was published in the following papers in Canada; in the Montreal Gazette, in the Toronto Globe, in the Toronto World, and in other Canadian papers—simply a press report given out by nobody, published here and open to everybody here just the same as over there. What evidence is there in that that somebody over there—where alone and in New York, as I understand it the stock can be bought—some one over there made a great deal of money out of this transaction? No Government transaction can take place, having to do with acquirement by the Government, but the psychological effect of it is some advance in the stocks of the company concerned. Anything else is an impossibility, and if we understand human nature we know why it is an impossibility. Why, when the hon. member himself—and he was one of the leading men in that great drama that took place in 1903—when the hon. gentleman projected the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway and it became known that there was a government transaction on for the building of that line, a government transaction with the Grand Trunk, the stock of the Grand Trunk railway advanced on the markets of New York and London, but did the hon. gentleman tell the House that was evidence of stock-jobbing, that was evidence of some tip being given in order that friends of the Government could make money?

Mr. FIELDING: Excuse me, I made no reference to "friends of the Government." I quoted statements from newspapers. I made no statement from my own knowledge; I quoted the statement from the Canadian Gazette of London and Canada of London; I made no allusion to "friends of the Government—"

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. gentleman did make an allusion to "friends of the Government."

Mr. FIELDING: I made no allusion to "friends of the Government."

Mr. MEIGHEN: —but in view of what was said last night in the House, the ordinary listener would take it to mean that the hon. gentleman this afternoon was lending colour to the assertion made last night, "that friends of the Government had made a profit out of this transaction."

Mr. FIELDING: I made no such statement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nothing whatever was known in London because it was not known here. It was not even expected here ten days ago, otherwise the leader of the Government would not have intimated there was a probability we would prorogue Parliament this week.

5 p.m.

That surely is satisfactory evidence that it was not known even to members of the Government. But on the 10th of October finally there was an understanding arrived at that we could not have predicted, that had been waited for patiently and steadily for over a year. It was arrived at then and then it became our immediate duty to submit the matter to Parliament. The hon. member talks about stock-jobbing and says there is going to be a great fortune made out of the stocks of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. He says he predicts that the stock which is now 40, although it was quoted in Montreal, yesterday at all events, at 55, will go to 90 and it will go to 90 in time, he says, by reason of the impression produced by the Government's guarantee, and he says that certainly there will be great money made by somebody who has acquired these stocks. Well, the stock may go to 90, but it will not go to 90 by reason of the Government's guarantee; under normal conditions it would be over 90 at any time. It was over 90 many a time. Before the war took place it was over 100. It was over 110, it went up three points, at the time of the transaction of the Government in 1903; other stocks went up far more. I have here a table furnished me by the Grand Trunk Company as to what happened to the stock in 1903. The First Preference Stock rose from 112 in 1902 to 115 in 1903; it would not rise so much unless it was considered safe in any event. The Second Preference Stock rose from 98⅛ in 1902 to 103⅛ in 1903. The Third Preference Stock rose from 47½ in 1902 to 55⅝ in 1903. The common stock rose from 16⅝ to 22⅝ or an increase of over 35 per cent. That was the effect of the hon. gentleman's transaction, but I would be sorry to look back and think there was any member, even of the Conservative Opposition at that time, who would stand up in Parliament and suggest that because of an inevitable advance in stock owing to a Government transaction there was corruption over in London or any wrongdoing going on.

Now I want to give the hon. member another fact or so while we are on this question. He complains of the acquirement of the guaranteed stock, or rather he complains that the Government undertakes to see the interest on the guaranteed stock paid—interest that has failed the last two years owing to the war, failed in 1917 largely because of the McAdoo award and the fact that the increase in rates guaranteed by the Railway Commission did not come into effect until the McAdoo award had been in effect for some time and in effect until the conditions had obtained for many months that warranted the increase. War conditions, at all events, were the cause of the abnormal state of affairs in 1917 and 1918, and both in the United States and Great Britain the Governments of those countries came to the railroads and said: "In so far as you are injured by war conditions we will make it up;" and in England they even went to the extent of paying the average pre-war dividends to the roads no matter what they might be earning under war conditions. We have not done anything approaching that but it is only fair that if the Grand Trunk is to be acquired it should be acquired under such conditions as obtained aside from the war, and anything that is done that merely maintains those conditions cannot be said to be unfair either to the country or to the Grand Trunk. But conditions now are not precisely as they were before the war, not because of the war itself, but because of the Grand Trunk Pacific obligations. The Grand Trunk Pacific obligations are now maturing upon the Grand Trunk. They are very severe on the Grand Trunk because the Grand Trunk Pacific does not pay, and cannot pay. We may possibly not be in our graves before it does, but for myself I am getting rather apprehensive that we will. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) claims that the bargain of 1903 was, as it turned out, a very severe one on the Grand Trunk Railway. So it was—the only people it was more severe on were the people of Canada. Severe it was, because fundamentally unsound from the beginning, built on an insecure foundation, and badly reasoned out. It has resulted in disaster to the Grand Trunk, and even in greater disaster to the people of this country. But notwithstanding that, the very existence of it enhanced at the time the value of stocks of the Grand Trunk in the London market.

He says that we should have gone about acquiring this guaranteed stock in another way, and he has a substitute method. I am going to discuss that in a minute. I stated yesterday as a plan and very evident fact that the reason we had undertaken to guarantee dividends on the guaranteed stock was because it was only by that method we were able to arrive at a result at all. It is true we might have waited longer—we might have waited for a greater disaster; but we thought it was in the interests of our own people that we should go that far, that it was no more than fair to the Grand Trunk Company, and was not unfair to the people of Canada, that we should offer to treat the guaranteed stock,—which was next to the bonds and which had always under anything like normal conditions received full dividends,—as bonds and undertake to pay the interest thereon. We made that concession in the hope that we could arrive at some result to the negotiations. We failed for the time being, but ultimately after fifteen or sixteen months, they conceded our terms. That is the only reason why that was done. This is a concession made to the company, as to the fairness of which the people of Canada do not and cannot complain.

Now, the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) says we should have done this: We should have offered the holders of this guaranteed stock to take it at a fair value—he suggests at 5 points over the market when he says 50; at that time it was 45—and pay cash for it. Well, if we paid cash we would have to sell 5 per cent bonds at about 95, or 4 per cent bonds at about 80, in order to get the money. "But," I ask "how are you going to make them do it?" "Oh," he says, "you cannot; but you can do this: If they would not agree, you could say to them, 'Just retain your stock as it is, and then we will keep an account of the operations of the Grand Trunk railway while in our hands, and if it pays a dividend we will pay you; if it does not, we will not."

Just let us examine that suggestion—and I take it that is the best suggestion the hon. gentleman can make—as the alternative that was open to us. We might have done that. But is that alternative as good as the course we adopted? "You people who own £12,500,000, or $60,000,000 of guaranteed stock, keep it in your pockets; we will operate the Grand Trunk railway and let you have the rights you now have and account to you for the operation of the railway." The first thing that follows from that suggestion is that we would have to operate the Grand Trunk railway as a separate entity, we could not merge it with the Canadian National Railways, for once we merged it with the Canadian National Railways we would merge the earning powers of the two systems. Perhaps, too, we might dismantle some sections of the Grand Trunk railway and use other sections for the purpose of the Canadian National Railways. We want to merge the two systems, for without that we do not gain our purpose at all. But once we merge the Grand Trunk Railway with the Canadian National Railways we cannot account to its shareholders on any fair basis for the earnings of their system. Is not that clear to the hon. member? If we are going to allow the shareholders to hold their stock, and the dividends to be governed by the earnings of their railway, we must operate it as a distinct and separate entity, and therefore we cannot merge it with the Canadian National Railways. The hon. gentleman smiles. I wonder that he does not see that such a course would be wholly impossible. Suppose he said to these guaranteed stockholders: "We have no dividends this year; it is true we took up your line between certain points as we did not want duplicate tracks, and consequently we lost your revenue on that particular line; it is true we gave the use of your Toronto terminals to the Canadian National Railways; but we had to do it to get advantage of efficient operation and as a result we have no dividends for you." Would not that be a nice answer to give to those shareholders? But that is just the position we would be in if we accepted the suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Fielding).

But further than that, the holders of this guaranteed stock have a voting power and a measure of control over the Grand Trunk Company. If we told them that they were to simply sit back and expect nothing from us, does he think they would give up that voting power? Does any one suggest they are going to give up something for nothing? Is it not worth while to get them to give up that voting power? Does the hon. gentleman suggest that the Government of Canada should become a partner with about 50,000 stockholders over in England in the operation of the Grand Trunk railway in Canada? Are we going to share control of that road with them, and have to account to them for all we do? Such a thing is a monstrosity; it does not appeal for a moment to any business man. So the substitute plan suggested by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) is impracticable, unbusinesslike, wholly unsound and absolutely impossible as a course to be pursued by the people of this country. Perhaps another hon. gentleman would come forward with some other suggestion to see if he could better the plan put forward by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding).

We would have preferred to have had everything made the subject of arbitration, but we could not secure that result. We told the Grand Trunk representatives to accept one offer or the other. We allowed them to wait. We told Parliament that we had made an alternative offer, and every hon. member understood that that was a continuing offer, for no other inference could possibly be drawn from the speech of the hon. member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White) who was then Minister of Finance. Further, Parliament understood from the date that that letter of the 11th of July, 1918, was read, and long before that date, that negotiations were going on; and ever since the writing of that letter that negotiations were continuing, with intermissions at times it is true, but that the negotiations had never been closed with the Grand Trunk Company. Why, in the early part of this session the Prime Minister told this House that negotiations with the company were going on. Last session, more than once, members of the Government told the House that negotiations were continuing. Hon. members opposite knew quite well that those negotiations were continuing and that a basic foundation offer had been made the company on the part of this Government, which offer was the basis of the negotiations. If they objected to that offer, if they thought it was unjust to Canada, what was their duty? The letter was read in this House and they knew every line of it. Their duty was to move a resolution asking the Government to withdraw the proposals made to the Grand Trunk Company. Does any hon. member suggest that that course was not open to the Opposition? Well, I heard one hon. member say last night that such a course was out of order. I know a little about the rules of procedure, and I am certain that no hon. member knows so very little as to think for even a minute that such a motion would be out of order. He could have moved such a resolution any day of the week ever since that letter was read. It was open to any hon. gentleman opposite to have moved in this House that the duty of the Government was to withdraw those proposals, or either of them, as being unfair to Canada and over-generous to the Grand Trunk Company. But that was not done. They say: "We would have been told by the Government that the negotiations were closed when our offer was not accepted." How do they know they would have told any such thing? We never told the House or the Country any such thing; on the contrary, we had been constantly telling them the negotiations were on. Even if they had secured a statement from the Government that the negotiations were closed, would not the resolution have been worth while then? There was no reason in the world for hon. gentlemen opposite,—if they objected to any phase of the offer made to the Grand Trunk,—not having moved this House and asked Parliament whether the Government were taking the right and the just course in making the offer they did to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Having sat here through two sessions and come to this hour with that offer unobjected to on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, and unobjected to by the press of this country, with no evidence whatever of objection on the part of the people, what position are hon. gentlemen opposite in to come now to Parliament and say: "Your proposals having been accepted, it is your duty now to back down."

Mr. DEVLIN: Would the minister permit me to call his attention to the fact that the letter of which he speaks is not under consideration at the present moment, because the company did not accept the conditions offered by the Government? The sole question is contained in the resolution which comprises an absolutely new proposal, not at all contained in the letter, not one word.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am glad I have got the hon. gentleman to that point, because it shows that he realizes that as long as we are proceeding on the basis of the letter, we are not only justified in proceeding, but bound in honour to proceed.

Mr. DEVLIN: But we are not proceeding on the basis of the letter at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the hon. member's question indicates clearly that he realizes that if we were proceeding on the basis of the letter, we would be bound in honour so to proceed.

Mr. DEVLIN: No, I am not agreeing to the terms of the letter, nor am I considering the terms of the letter; I am considering simply the resolution which is now before the House. They are two totally different things.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was giving the hon. gentleman credit for an intelligence that perhaps his comment did not warrant. It must be clear to a gentleman like the hon. member for Wright that upon the acceptance of an offer that stood open and known to the world as well as to this Parliament for fifteen months, the duty of the Government is to do its constitutional part, to stand up to its offer and to go through with the transaction.

Mr. DEVLIN: If the minister will allow me, in order that I may understand his intelligence, the question as contained in the letter was the purchase by the Government of the Grand Trunk railway with all its branch lines, and the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, the acquiring of the assets and the assuming of the obligations of both companies. The question with which we have to deal now is simply the guaranteeing of certain stocks, the guaranteeing of the four per cent stock, the debenture stock, and the fulfilment of certain conditions as to assuming the pensions under the Grand Trunk Railway system and under the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system, and further by clause 7 of the resolution, a loan by the Government to the company; but we are not acquiring any of the assets of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Under section 7 we are simply guaranteeing stocks and undertaking to advance a loan.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid the hon. gentleman is further behind in understanding what is going on than I thought. In the first place, the letter of July 11, 1918, does not look to the acquisition of the Grand Trunk properties at all; it looks to the leasing of the Grand Trunk properties for 999 years at a rental to be determined in one of two years—not an acquisition of the property——

Mr. DEVLIN: That is playing upon words.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —in one of two ways the leasing of the property for that length of time.

Mr. DEVLIN: Perpetually.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The intention being that an annual sum would be paid to the shareholders of the company, such as would be fair, whether arrived at on a cash basis or by arbitration. The present method looks to the same end, but by a different and more complete plan, more complete because it provides for the acquisition, not the leasing, but the absolute ownership of everything the Grand Trunk has, by means of the ownership of all the stocks of the Grand Trunk, because that means ownership of the property.

Mr. DEVLIN: But is not the Government bound, the moment it assumes that stock, to hand it back, except the stock that is called in at the end of thirty years?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hand it back! We will never hand it back in this world. I do not know what the hon. gentleman has in mind. What would we hand the stock back for? We get the stock and we own it. There is a difference only in method. The present method is more complete, more definite, more advantageous to the country in every way than the method suggested in the letter of July 11, 1918. We get everything by this method. The hon. member said: You are not abiding by your letter of July 11, 1918; you are departing from it, and the point under discussion was the guaranteeing of the dividend on the guaranteed stock. I answer him that in the letter of July 11, 1918, we undertook to guarantee the dividends on the guaranteed stock.

Mr. DEVLIN: Yes, that is an obligation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member agrees to that. So that in that respect we are upon exactly the proposal contained in the letter of July 11, 1918, and, therefore, why should there be any opposition from hon. gentlemen opposite when they did not show any opposition to that proposal for fifteen months during which it was before the country?

Mr. DEVLIN: Is the minister serious in saying that because in the letter of July 11, 1918, there is a clause by which the Government is prepared to treat the 4 per cent guaranteed stock as an obligation of the company, because of that one thing, with all the other elements different, the letter of the 11th July is simply carrying out, so to speak the terms that are now before Parliament? My hon. friend is not serious.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know if I have caught my hon. friend's point, but I am sincere in saying that in respect of that feature of the letter, there is no change whatever. Whatever may be wrong in it now—I do not say that there is anything wrong; I believe there is nothing wrong in it; I believe it is fair and reasonable—was wrong in it then. If it was objectionable then, it is objectionable now. Then, what is the objection to it now if it was not objected to then? I think I have made my point as clear as any words can make it.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister say to this committee that his proposition of July 11, 1918, was accepted by the company, and that that is the matter we are discussing?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, it was accepted. The form of it is changed.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is not the point. Were the exact terms of the letter accepted, and is that what we are discussing now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not a lease; it is better in every respect for the Government of Canada.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is a different proposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not different; there is no substantial difference at all.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it the same?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We get into a far better position, and therefore there is all the more reason for accepting it, and it would be all the more disgraceful if we retired from it. Because it is better for us is surely not a reason why we should retire from it. Would the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) have us say to the Grand Trunk: We made you an offer in the month of July, 1918; we let it stand open until now; now you come forward and accept it and give us a little better terms. If you had accepted it before, we would have taken it, but as you did not accept it before, and now that you give us a little better terms, we will not accept it.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is neither law nor business. The moment the Grand Trunk people refused the offer of July 11, 1918, that was the end of the transaction, and we were not bound by it any longer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not contend that we were bound.

Mr. McKENZIE: Then, why is the minister saying that we should take it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because we left the offer open. We could have retreated or withdrawn from it at any minute.

Mr. McKENZIE: It was closed. We made an offer; it was not accepted; that is the end of it; it is not open any longer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not open unless we leave it open.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is not open. We made them an offer; that is all we could do about the matter. The company refused it; that is the end of it in law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is, unless they know that we are keeping it open, and they knew it by the negotiations. The hon. gentleman knew that, and I will tell him why. In the speech of the Minister of Finance of that day, he made it clear that the position of the Government at that time was represented in the letter of July 11, and that was months afterwards. Therefore, the hon. gentleman knew that the offer was open.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have stated my position and my position is right; that is the end of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is more Scotch finality than Scotch logic in the hon. member

Mr. DEVLIN: Now that that point is settled, will the minister allow me to revert to my question of a moment ago, in answer to which he said: We are not going to transfer any of the stock that the Government is going to acquire. Did I understand him to say that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is right.

Mr. DEVLIN: Then what is meant by clause 5 of the resolution:

> That the value, if any, of the first, second and third preference stocks and the common or ordinary stock of the Grand Trunk now issued and outstanding to the face values above mentioned (hereafter together called the "preference and common stock"), shall be determined by a board of three arbitrators, one to be appointed by the Government, one by the Grand Trunk, and the third by the two so appointed, or, failing agreement, by judges to be designated in the said agreement. No guaranteed stock, to an amount not exceeding the value, if any, so determined, carrying a dividend as hereinbefore authorized shall be distributed among the holders of the preference and common stock, upon the transfer to or vesting in the Government of such stock, in proportions which shall be determined by the arbitrators.

Then by a subsequent clause the Government may call in at par, after thirty years and upon six months' notice, any of the stock it desires. The purpose of the Government in taking over this stock is simply to turn it into a new form of stock to be called the new guaranteed stock, which the Government intends to guarantee and then transfer it to the holders of the common, first, second and third preference stocks.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection at all to the hon. gentleman asking me a question but he should not make so long a speech as to half empty the House before I get through with mine.

Mr. DEVLIN: Thank you, I will come back.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What the hon. member asked me first was whether we were going to transfer to somebody else the stock that we acquired.

Mr. DEVLIN: No. The minister said a moment ago that the Government was not going to transfer any of the stock that they acquired.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is absolutely true. We acquire the voting stock, the controlling stock that makes us the owners of the whole Grand Trunk system. We keep that right here in the possession of the people of Canada. The holders of that stock, if they are awarded anything by the arbitration receive from us new non-voting certificates, or non-voting stock. But, surely, issuing a new stock is not transferring the old stock. The new stock is a different one altogether. We only issue a 4 per cent stock, which to-day would sell in the neighbourhood of 70, and we issue it only for the value of the stock we acquire. The difference is clear profit to the people of Canada. I hope the hon. member understands that. He surely sees that the issue of the new non-voting stock to men who were the holders of the controlling interest-bearing stock is not transferring the old controlling interest-bearing stock—far from it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: How is it proposed to get the holders of the guaranteed stock to release their voting power?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They must do that before the transaction is binding upon the Government. The guaranted stockholders must themselves surrender that power, and until they do so the guarantee of the Government does not go into effect.

Mr. CAMPBELL: There is a great number of them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and it is a difficult matter. The voting power is an element of value highly prized, I am advised, by the holders of that stock, and the same is true of all the stocks in connection with the road. In lieu of surrendering this voting power they get the guarantee of the Government only for their 4 per cent dividend.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What would be the situation if some of them refused to surrender their voting power?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Until that is done the agreement would not take effect. As I apprehend the legal position, it must all be surrendered before the agreement can take effect. We could not agree that we would go ahead and guarantee in respect of those who surrender their voting power and leave others in partial control of the road.

Mr. CAMPBELL: One man might hold up the whole deal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He might, I could not say: but I do not think it is probable.

Mr. JACOBS: Is provision made for any delay?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not yet, but that will be a subject to be taken care of in the agreement itself. Hon. gentlemen will see from the very pertinent query of my hon. friend (Mr. Campbell) that it is important that some special inducement be given to the holders of the stock who have this special element of value in it, the voting power, in order that the transaction will not be impeded or wholly destroyed by the obstinacy of some shareholders. Any voting power that is now resident in the holders of the debenture stock must also be given up. They in turn get perhaps a slight accretion to their stock, because it also is guaranteed. So the transaction is fair in every respect. Those men who inevitably get a little accretion of value to their stock have to give up in lieu thereof all the control they heretofore exercised in connection with the enterprise. That control is much more highly valued in the Mother Country than it is in Canada.

Now I come to another phase of the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding). He is afraid, he says, of arbitration. Well, what plan does he suggest to get at the value when we cannot agree upon it? He is afraid of arbitration. Arbitration is not only the method employed in the past in similar transactions, one of which he referred to, but it is the method embedded in the legislation of this country everywhere in the case of acquirement of land or property. It is universally and historically recognized as the best, fairest and the only way for determining disputed claims. Why is he afraid of an arbitration in connection with the Grand Trunk? What is the special reason attending the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway that makes arbitration unsuited for the solution of the problem?

Mr. JACOBS: Why not liquidation instead?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Liquidation? Well, the leader of the Opposition told us yesterday that it was a shameful and disgraceful thing to let the Grand Trunk Pacific go into a receivership. If that was disgraceful, what would he say of letting the Grand Trunk go into a receivership?

Mr. McKENZIE: I said the methods by which it was done were disgraceful, not the letting it go into a receivership. If my hon. friend will read my statement he will see I said I was not afraid of a receivership.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have repeated exactly what he said, that letting the Grand Trunk go into a receivership was disgraceful.

Mr. McKENZIE: Not at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend (Mr. Jacobs) says, why not let the Grand Trunk go into a receivership? Well, if hon. gentlemen will take that stand, and we know exactly where they are at, it is worth discussing. Why not let the Grand Trunk go into a receivership? Does the hon. gentleman know what would almost inevitably result if it did?

Mr. JACOBS: It would save us many millions of dollars.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would for us at the moment, and perhaps make many millions for the Canadian Pacific Railway. That would be one very probable result.

Mr. JACOBS: We would acquire the company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why would not the Canadian Pacific acquire it?

Mr. JACOBS: We could acquire it better.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We can pay more for it than they?

Mr. JACOBS: We are the Government of the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We would acquire it by main force?

Mr. JACOBS: No, by law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is main force. Before discussing that further I said a moment ago that I quoted the leader of the Opposition correctly, when he said that letting the Grand Trunk Pacific go into a receivership was disgraceful. Here is what he said:

> Mr. Rowell: That is what your argument leads to.
> Mr. McKenzie: Not at all. The President of the Council as a member of the Government put it in the hands of the receiver and we say that was a disgraceful and unbusinesslike thing to do. But once it is in the hands of the receiver it must be dealt with in a business-like way.

There is nothing about method there. The hon. gentleman said that putting it in the hands of the receiver was a disgraceful and unbusinesslike thing to do.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the hon. gentleman will read further he will see that I said the Government had not the machinery to deal with such a matter and that it should have gone into the courts where there was proper provision for it. The whole drift of my statement was that the Government should not appoint the receiver.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government was the principal creditor and consequently it was the proper thing that a member of the Government should be apointed receiver.

Mr. McKENZIE: The receiver was appointed under the War Measures Act. At least, we were told so a thousand times by the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, but it went through the courts, and the whole transaction and administration of the Grand Trunk Pacific is done through the Exchequer Court just the same as any other receivership.

Mr. McKENZIE: The receiver was appointed by the Government themselves, which is absolutely without precedent in the history of any country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that the Government of Canada, which was not only the majority creditor but by far the greatest creditor of the Grand Trunk Pacific, should have sat by and let some one else be appointed receiver, responsible for the operation and management of the Grand Trunk Pacific? What kind of Premier would he make who would allow that to be done?

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the hon. minister think that he can play on conditions of that kind? Supposing there are two creditors of any concern in Canada—and we have an Insolvent Act to-day—one of them with a claim of $10,000 and the other $100. Does my hon. friend mean to say that the creditor with the claim of $10,000 can appoint himself receiver?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, but I say the courts would appoint him receiver ahead of the other whose claim was $100.

Mr. McKENZIE: The court would appoint him receiver, certainly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In this case, the right receiver is the Government of Canada, is it not?

Mr. McKENZIE: Not at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Again I compliment the obstinacy of the leader of the Opposition. Now, I was going on to the statement of the hon. member (Mr. Jacobs). His idea is that we should have let the Grand Trunk proceed into liquidation.

Mr. JACOBS: I was merely asking the simple question why it was not done in that way. I shall express my own views later without the assistance of the minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will answer my question. I shall answer him first: I am not in favour of that proposition. Is he in favour of it or not?

Mr. JACOBS: I will express my opinion in regard to that later on. I am trying to marshall my arguments.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So that the House has very little information as to where the hon. gentleman stands on the question of a receivership for the Grand Trunk.

Mr. JACOBS: And I do not think that the House has any information as to the minister's position either.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I stated my position; I said I am opposed to it. What more does he want?

Mr. JACOBS: Because the minister is afraid of the Canadian Pacific Railway acquiring the road?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is one powerful reason.

Mr. JACOBS: That was not the reason that actuated my hon. friend when he took over the Canadian Northern.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was one powerful reason there as well. Is that frank enough?

Mr. JACOBS: I beg your pardon, I meant to say the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no danger of the Canadian Pacific Railway acquiring the Grand Trunk Pacific alone. The hon. gentleman knows more about the business acumen of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company than to think that they would acquire a limping, halting, utterly bankrupt institution like the Grand Trunk Pacific and leave the Grand Trunk free of obligations.

Mr. JACOBS: Inasmuch as the minister, as I understand, used to act as solicitor for the Canadian Pacific railway he would know more about their methods than I do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On no occasion in the world have I ever acted as solicitor for the Canadian Pacific railway. I am afraid there are very few more holes for the hon. gentlemen to fall into. Now my hon. friend evidently has in the back of his head exactly the practical business objections to a receivership of the Grand Trunk railway. The same objections obtained in the case of the Canadian Northern, but they obtain with greater force in the case of the Grand Trunk. The policy of standing by and letting the wreck proceed was a policy of drifting the whole institution into the mouth of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Now, it is said that this is too favourable for the Grand Trunk's shareholders. Well, it will appeal to any one of ordinary forethought and independent opinion that if this was a very favourable proposition for the Grand Trunk Company they would not have waited sixteen months to accept it. I should like hon. members to read the comments of the president of the Grand Trunk,—comments dictated by and undoubtedly in accordance with the sentiments of the Grand Trunk directors and shareholders—on the offer made by the Government on the 11th July. Did they think it was a favourable offer? Throughout Great Britain the cry of confiscation was raised, and at a meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk—indeed at more than one,—the epithets hurled at the Government of Canada for their parsimony, unfairness and lack of generosity to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk were far from complimentary to this country. They were, in my opinion, wholly unjustified. But whatever may be the ideas of hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to the generosity of the offer, now that it is accepted, they are very, very antithetical to the opinions of the Grand Trunk Company,—president, directors and shareholders alike. The company waited eighteen months before giving even an intimation that there was a probability of acceptance. One condition after the other was tried, and does any one suggest for a moment that indications were that the transaction was closed? I recall myself an editorial in the Toronto Globe—and in newspaper after newspaper throughout the country the same thing was urged—calling upon the Government to stand firm by its offer. The Government were called upon not to move. They were told: "All you have to do is to stand firm; your offer is fair; stand right to it and the Grand Trunk will have to come to terms." Did that indicate that everything was closed? Never for one day was there any intimation given or impression left that negotiations with the Grand Trunk were closed or that any offer made by the Government was modified or withdrawn. The country knew, and has known since July, 1918,—yes, and before—that negotiations were proceeding and that the Grand Trunk turned them over time and again, and that there was no modification in the position of the Government. The hope was universally expressed that there would be no modification, and the hope of the people of Canada is realized to-day; and——

Mr. JACOBS: Can the minister tell me if the Grand Trunk was ever in negotiation with the Canadian Pacific Railway looking to the acquisition by that company of the Grand Trunk?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know of no negotiations. It would not likely be through the instrumentality of a member of the Government, nor would such negotiations be even known to a member of the Government. That is not the way in which great companies negotiate. They do not negotiate through the medium of a competitor.

Mr. JACOBS: I am asking my hon. friend if he has any personal knowledge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no personal knowledge. It would be wholly improbable, indeed, wholly inconceivable that I should have.

Mr. JACOBS: As a purchaser the minister, I should think, would have obtained some information as to whether this company was being offered to another concern.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Canadian Pacific Railway never vouchsafed me any information on the subject. I do not know whether they favoured my hon. friend with information.

Mr. JACOBS: Mr. Smithers did not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now, the hon. member for Queen's and Shelburne (Mr. Fielding) is very distrustful of arbitration, and in the course of his remarks to-day he made some reference to the procedure of the Government in referring the Canadian Northern outstanding shares to arbitration some two years ago. He told us that the Drayton-Acworth report found these shares to be valueless and he said that we should not have paid anything for them.

The Drayton-Acworth report recommended the Government to submit the value of these shares to arbitration. The Government pursued the recommendation of the Drayton-Acworth report. In any event would the hon. member suggest to this House that the Government would be justified in taking the report of officers appointed and paid by themselves upon evidence respecting which the Canadian Northern had no right and no duty to appear and show the value of the shares; in other words, to take an ex parte report, as far as the shareholders were concerned, and, acting upon that report, to declare that there was no value in these shares? To do so would be to put the Government of Canada in a position that they never could defend to the shareholders, to the country, or to the world at large. When a man's property is taken a fundamental principle of British justice is that he shall have a tribunal before which he may go and prove the value of his property if he can. There was no such tribunal until the board of arbitration was appointed. The Drayton-Acworth commission was no such tribunal. The shareholders cut no figure and had no place before that commission. It was not within the purview of the commission to hear the shareholders as to the value of their shares and they did not hear them. Consequently it would have been a flagrant and gross injustice on the part of the Government to have declared no value and to have expropriated by brute force the property of their citizens. Instead of doing that they appointed a board of arbitration and a board of high standing. My hon. friend does not for a moment impugn the high standing and probity of any member of that commission through whose examination and determination the amount to be paid was arrived at.

The same thing will be done in this case. The same procedure is proposed in this resolution. It is honourable procedure; it is British procedure; it is fairness; it is justice and it is no more.

If these resolutions and the Bill are passed this country will have a real system; it will have a rounded system; it will have a complete system; it will have a system one-half giving its tribute to the other half, ane gathering traffic in one part of Canada which will be transported over the road of the other and the other gathering traffic in the other part of Canada for interchange.

It will save this country in capital investment $100,000,000 in five years. The interest on this that will be saved, at even the present rates, will be far more than sufficient to take care of the obligations in all probability that we will be under as a result of the award of the board of arbitration. With respect to the money that will be saved to Canada by amalgamation, the money that otherwise we must invest in additions to the present Canadian railway system, the money that will be invested in duplication and consequently wasted, the money that will be saved by reason of the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway, this country will save in annual interest more than will be sufficient to pay the award of the arbitration and the interest on the guaranteed stock and besides in all human probability, it will possibly save the country some millions more. Is that not a good transaction? Is that not fair business? Is it not right and proper that economies and amalgamations should be made? Is it not right and proper that duplicate capital investment should be avoided? Is it not right and proper that an inchoate system should be made complete? Is not arbitration the proper way? That is in a nutshell the proposal of this resolution and with the utmost confidence I commend it to the consideration of the House at this session of Parliament. This is just as valid, just as good a session as any other; it is a session in which every hon. member who draws his indemnity from the country should feel it his duty to give a reasonable proportion of his time to the public business. At this session it is only right and just that hon. members should give their attention to this question and devote to it all necessary time to enable them to come to a just conclusion.

Mr. FIELDING: I commend the lecture of my hon. friend respecting absentees to the men who should occupy the seats behind him. There are one or two points in the observations of my hon. friend to which I should make a passing allusion. First in regard to arbitration. The point I made concerning arbitration was that when a stock, known to be not worth any money, was capable of being adjudged for the reasons presented by an honourable board of arbitration as worth $10,000,000 or $11,000,000 we had some reason for anxiety as to what might be the outcome of an arbitration in respect to these voluminous stocks of the Grand Trunk Railway Company which had some money value at some time. Therefore I suggested that the House ought not to be left in doubt as to the extent of the obligations and the risk we are assuming under those obligations and that the award of the arbitrators should be subject to the approval of the House of Commons of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman suggest that it should be subject to the approval of the shareholders?

Mr. FIELDING: They are not bound to accept it if they do not want to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But they are.

Mr. FIELDING: I would not force it on the shareholders. I would not force the shareholders to take any value for it that they did not want to take.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then what is the good of arbitration?

Mr. FIELDING: Well, my hon. friend can answer; he is proposing arbitration. What is the good of the whole proceeding in view of the understanding which has been arrived at?

Mr. MEIGHEN: An arbitration held under such conditions that the result is binding on nobody has no sense at all, but an arbitration on the principle that the result binds both is an arbitration that is final and has some object in view.

Mr. FIELDING: My answer is that the people of Canada, through their representatives, will say that Parliament should be called upon to vote for any necessary sum of money with a full knowledge of what that sum is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the shareholders should not be given the right to say whether they would accept it or not?

Mr. FIELDING: I have no objection to the shareholders standing out for a different report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then you will have no arbitration.

Mr. FIELDING: With reference to the 4 per cent guaranteed stock, if my hon. friend wants to buy anything and he finds what the market value is he will be doing no injustice to anybody if he gets it at that value. The market value of that stock in London was 45. There would be no injustice to anybody if you had arranged with a broker and he had bought that stock at 45, 46 or 47.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was considered and found to be absolutely impossible.

Mr. FIELDING: There was nothing impossible about it at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The dealing in the stock of the Grand Trunk during the last five years has been almost infinitesimal. I have that from the officers of the Grand Trunk themselves. Because of the market conditions in Great Britain to-day it is impracticable. The proportion of these stocks that has been dealt in during the last five years is negligible. The ratio to the whole amount of the stock is very small and these stocks are owned not by thousands but hundreds of thousands of people.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend has reached the conclusion that in order to induce these people to part with their stock we must pay them $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 more than the market value.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do not.

Mr. FIELDING: We are going to convert the stock into a stock guaranteed by the Government of Canada and paying four per cent. In normal times a four per cent government guaranteed stock is worth par. I do not think it would be worth that at this moment. Even with the guarantee of the Government of Canada I have estimated it at something less than 85 or even 90. I assumed it might go to 90 not long after this thing is consummated, but suppose we take it at 85, the difference between the 40 quoted a few days ago and the 90 or 85, say, that the stock should be worth at no distant date will be 40 points.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Without the impression produced by the Government's guarantee at all that stock stood at 106¼ not long ago.

Mr. FIELDING: How long ago?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was at 101⅛ in 1904 and in 1902 it was at 106¾.

Mr. FIELDING: What has that to do with the question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In 1906 the first preference stock stood at 123. It is a matter of the rate of interest.

Mr. FIELDING: It is a matter of market value. Here is stock which the Government desire to secure quoted on the money market at 45, later on at 48, and hon. gentlemen opposite, by this legislation, are causing it now to reach a value of 85 or 90. Does my hon. friend say that the guaranteed four per cent bonds of Canada are not worth 85? Will he say that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the stock has sold for that at all.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. gentleman thinks it may reach 85?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Without the guarantee at all it was worth that much. Then if money comes down in value—

Mr. FIELDING: If it was worth that much before the guarantee it will be worth more after the guarantee.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: It depends on the rate of interest.

Mr. FIELDING: The rate of interest now is exceedingly high, but I am allowing for that. I say that to-day in all probability the stock will be worth 85 or 90; you are going to raise it to that value when you put your government guarantee on it, and you are converting a thing worth 45 a little while ago into 85 and the difference of 40 points on that stock amounts to $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 at least. The Government of Canada are arranging to pay that amount additional to somebody. My fear is it is not going to be paid to the old Grand Trunk stockholders but other people may get hold of it. However, that is none of our business.

My hon. friend, and it is not a new thing on his part, went out of his way to say that I had suggested corruption on the part of the Government in this transaction. It is easy to raise a man of straw for the purpose of knocking him down; it is not the first time my hon. friend has adopted that method. I made no suggestion of corruption, I made no charge that anybody on the inside had given any information; I read from the London papers a statement that in consequence of an announcement that it was the intention of the Government to put this thing through, the stocks were advancing on the London market. My statement is on record to speak for itself. I submit that if hon. gentlemen opposite wanted to buy this railway in a businesslike way, they could have got it at a fair market value, and if they could not they could have left it in the possession of the stockholders. But, says my hon. friend, "that would have been ridiculous, that would have prevented the merging with the Canadian National railways, you could not do such a thing." Does my hon. friend not know that the great railway companies of Canada to-day have subsidiary companies and that every one of those companies, even though they are merged in a common system, have to keep a separate account and keep separate stockholders? What is to prevent the Grand Trunk, although merged in the National Railway system of the country, from keeping a separate account and determining what the earnings of that company would be, just as much as do the subsidiaries to the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is an easy matter when you have a small road to merge it because you do not in any way detract from the earning power of that road, but where you have a great system, and where it probably will be necessary to dismantle lines, you do detract from the earning power—

Mr. FIELDING: It is a matter of common notoriety in our railway circles that you have to take certain sections of the road and keep separate accounts as to their earnings. For example, the Minister of Railways has entered into an agreement with a railway company down in New Brunswick which is going to be practically merged with the government system and going to be operated by the Government, and he has got to account separate and apart for the earnings of that company. If my hon. friend says it is utterly impossible, that the thing cannot be done, I must express my amazement, that one who has had such a long experience in railway matters as the hon. gentleman has, should make such a statement.

There is only one point more. My hon. friend finds it exceedingly difficult to discuss any question without introducing a little party politics. I have not made any allusion to party politics, and I have not sought to make any party capital. My hon. friend could not talk about this matter without bringing in the story of the original transaction with the Grand Trunk Pacific —" an utterly unsound and rotten proposition." He did not use the word " rotten," I forget what his term was; at all events, he denounced it. I am not going to spend any time at this hour, six o'clock, in defending that transaction, but the hon. gentleman can read the speech of his colleague, the President of the Privy Council, who yesday declared it was one of the greatest triumphs in the life of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and for which he would be remembered.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CAHILL: Would the minister in charge inform the committee what, exclusive of the arbitration award, will be the total obligations to be assumed by the Dominion when the transaction is completed?

Mr. J. D. REID: That information will be found in this sessional paper. We will assume the interest on the debenture stock, amounting roughly to $7,000,000 annually, and the interest on the guaranteed stock, amounting to about $2,500,000 annually. Of course, we can credit against that the revenue of the Grand Trunk, which has been in the past, and we believe will be in the future, sufficient to pay the two amounts I have stated as well as any additional amount that might be awarded by the arbitrators.

Mr. CAHILL: I mean the total bond obligations against the undertaking?

Mr. J. D. REID: We do not assume any bonds at all; they are a charge against the road.

Mr. CAHILL: That is what I mean, the bonds against the road.

Mr. J. D. REID: But those bonds continue in perpetuity, so the only liability we assume is the interest on them.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: But the interest falls due.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes. We assume that, but we do not assume the principal. For instance, the bonds on the Grand Trunk Pacific fall due in a certain number of years, but these other bonds of which we have been speaking are in perpetuity.

Mr. CAHILL: But, Mr. Chairman, there is a statement in this book giving the total amount of liabilities, and it is useless for the minister to quibble in that way. Can he tell me the amount of obligations the country will assume, without taking into account the amount the arbitrators may award?

Mr. J. D. REID: The only amounts that we assume or are liable for are interest—

Mr. CAHILL: Interest on how much?

Mr. J. D. REID: We assume the interest on the debenture stocks as set out in the resolution:

Five per cent (5%) Grand Trunk debenture stock..	£ 4,270,375
Five per cent (5%) Great Western debenture stock..	2,723,080
Four per cent (4%) Grand Trunk debenture stock..	24,624,455
Four per cent (4%) Northern debenture stock..	308,215
	£31,926,125

Those figures will also be found on page 37 of the sessional paper. We assume the interest on those debenture stocks amounting to $7,000,000 annually. We also assume the interest on £12,500,000, or $2,500,000 per annum.

Mr. CAHILL: Will the country also assume this item of unsecured notes payable amounting to $35,000,000, and equipment trust notes amounting to $6,000,000?

Mr. J. D. REID: The equipment bonds are against the equipment—cars, engines, etc. We do not assume them; they are liable themselves.

Mr. CAHILL: Who is "liable themselves"? The equipment is not going to pay out any money. The company will naturally have to pay interest on the equipment and pay off the bonds. The equipment is not the company itself.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. CAHILL: I think the minister is getting ready to answer me, Mr. Chairman. I notice that $504,000,000 in one place and $707,000,000 in another place are given as the liabilities that are being assumed. I want to know whether the Government understands that that is the total obligation to be assumed by the country?

Mr. J. D. REID: I must repeat that the only liability the country assumes is to pay in perpetuity the interest of $7,000,000 on the debenture stock and of $2,500,000 on the other stock. The other liabilities take care of themselves. For instance, the mortgage on the equipment; we are not assuming any liability in regard to that other than is covered by the equipment bonds. The interest, of course, becomes due on that mortgage, but we are not making the Government liable for the principal.

Mr. CAHILL: I think the minister will agree with me that the new company or the old company is liable for all the amounts set out here as chargeable to the company. In that connection there is an item of something like $210,000,000 in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific. If we deduct from that the amount owing to the Dominion we arrive at one basis of ascertaining how much greater obligations the country is assuming in taking over this undertaking. We know that we are not getting it for nothing; we are assuming obligations. What is the sum total of the obligations as figured by the Government?

Mr. J. D. REID: That information is given on page 37 of this sessional paper. It shows the assets and liabilities, but we are only assuming the interest on those liabilities. While it shows a total of $124,000,000 of guaranteed stock and 4 per cent first, second and third preference stock, that is to be the subject of arbitration. Whatever amount the arbitrators decide, if any, as the interest on that stock, we of course will assume. The funded debt I have just mentioned to the hon. member, we assume a liability of $7,000,000 on that. While it shows $155,000,000 as the total amount of that funded debt, yet we do not agree to pay that amount in any number of years hereafter, we only agree to pay the interest on it in perpetuity. Then, of course, we do the same in regard to the guaranteed stock. As to the equipment notes and these other items, they are loans against the equipment.

We shall have to pay interest on the equipment bonds, but that is not any permanent liability. I do not know how to explain to the hon. member in any more detail than is shown on this statement which was made out by auditors and which to me is as plain as it can be made and easily understood.

Mr. CAHILL: As clear as mud. If it is so plain to the minister, how does he get $7,000,000 interest on $155,000,000 worth of bonds? The President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) speaks about $200,000,000 being spent in the first, second and third preference common stocks, and in these letters from the company we find they have spent less than $100,000,000. I am endeavouring to bring these wild statements down to something concrete. I should like from the Government a statement as to what they estimate from their own figures as the amount of the total liability on which interest will have to be paid, call it in perpetuity or what you will.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. gentleman wants to know what the principal is on which interest will have to be paid. If he will turn to page 38 he will find that the total stock, preference, common and guaranteed, amounts to $241,257,658.27, of which $60,833,332.51 is guaranteed stock. On the latter we shall have to pay in perpetuity interest at the rate of 4 per cent, and the arbitrators will decide as to the value of the balance of the $241,257,658.27. That is, they will decide the value of the first, second and third preference and the common stock, and on whatever valuation they place on those stocks the Government will pay 4 per cent interest. That disposes, so far as I can explain the matter, of the $241,257,658.27. Then we come to the funded debt $155,373,806.20. That is the original debenture issue for the construction of the Grand Trunk and the purchase of the Great Western and the Northern railway forty or fifty years ago. We shall pay on that interest which in round figures amounts to $7,000,000 per annum. Those two amounts represent the capital on which we shall have to pay interest, we shall not have to pay interest on any other capital in connection with the Grand Trunk railway. In addition to that there is a large amount of money in equipment, and bonds have been issued against equipment. That is a part of the operation of the road and interest will have to be paid on the equipment bonds, together with the principal that falls due from year to year. That is explained in the statement, and I do not know that I could give it in any more detail nor explain it any better than it is explained here.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That is not included in the arbitration?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, it is included. The arbitrators will have to take into consideration the physical condition of the road, equipment of all kinds, in fact, everything owned and controlled by the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The equipment is worth so much money less the amount that is against it. That is the way in which the equipment must be taken into consideration, just the same as any other liquid assets the company might have.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister is endeavouring to be clear, but he is not very clear to the committee. To begin with, we all understand that the country pays interest on the guaranteed stock. It also pays interest, whatever happens, on the debenture stock of which there are four kinds. We stop there. The rest, my hon. friend says, is to be settled by arbitration. Supposing the arbitration is held, and the arbitrators, let us say for the sake of argument, give the company $1,000,000 for the balance, and we pay that $1,000,000. Do we then become owners of the road without any mortgages or any claims of any kind, either on the road or on the common stock, excepting the interest to which I have referred in regard to the guaranteed stock and the debenture stock?

Mr. J. D. REID: To me, the matter is plain, and I think it has been explained many times in this House.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: My question can be answered by "yes" or "no."

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not know that you can answer it exactly by "yes" or "no." The hon. member has, I understand, asked this question: Supposing the arbitrators decide to give an award of $1,000,000 over and above the $7,000,000 and the $2,500,000, what happens then? What happens is this? The first, second and third preference and the common stocks must all be handed over to the Dominion Government; they are our property. In return we issue non-voting stock to the amount that will give $1,000,000 per annum rental. We shall then have all of those stocks, and we shall be the owners of the road, being the sole shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: But have we a clear title?

Mr. J. D. REID: Certainly we have a clear title, to this extent, that we are the owners of the stock subject to the payment of the interest in perpetuity.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What about the equipment?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Grand Trunk Railway Company owns the equipment, and we are the owners of the Grand Trunk Railway Company; therefore, we own the equipment.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: But the equipment is mortgaged.

Mr. J. D. REID: Of course, we take the equipment subject to whatever may be against it.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Then we shall have very heavy liabilities in addition to the $1,000,000 that we shall have to meet when we begin to operate the road. The minister has the blue-book on his desk. Last night, I endeavoured to get some explanation about the contents of page 51, and I failed to get it. I should like to know from the Minister of Railways whether the stocks of the various subsidiary companies mentioned on page 51 will be transferred to the Government on the settlement by the arbitrators.

Mr. J. D. REID: The stocks of those subsidiary companies are now owned by the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: On lease?

Mr. J. D. REID: Some may be lease-owned, but as regards whatever interest in those companies rests at present in the Grand Trunk Railway Company, when we take the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, we shall stand in the same position as that company does now. Therefore, we become owners in that way.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: In some of these companies, the Grand Trunk Railway Company has guaranteed the principal and the interest on certain bonds. Will the Grand Trunk Railway Company, after the Government gets possession of it, be liable for the guarantees that have been given by that company on those bonds?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Grand Trunk Railway Company are liable to-day; they will be liable in the future just the same.

When we become the stockholders of the Grand Trunk we shall become liable.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How much will that liability amount to?

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member will find the figures for each road on page 34 of the memoranda. I do not think the total is given.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: It is not, and I should like to have that information.

Mr. J. D. REID: I will get that.

Mr. JACOBS: I have a clipping before me containing some figures which I should like the minister to confirm. The clipping reads:

> In the proposed deal the Government pledges itself to pay 4 per cent on all Grand Trunk debentures, 4 per cent on all guaranteed stock and 4 per cent on the arbitrated value of all other Grand Trunk securities.

Is that correct?

Mr. J. D. REID: Interest on the debenture stock and 4 per cent on the guaranteed stock.

Mr. JACOBS: It goes on:

> The first item means an annual interest charge of about $6,000,000; the second a charge of approximately $2,250,000. The third is a variable quantity. The nominal value of the unguaranteed Grand Trunk securities is about $170,000,000. Figuring on the basis of average stock market quotations for the securities, this value is reduced to less than one-quarter, requiring about $1,350,000 in interest charges. That makes a total of annual obligations in addition to running the road, of about $9,600,000. Subtract the net earnings of the Grand Trunk under company ownership and you have an annual loss of $6,600,000.
> If the Government fails to operate the road as economically as the company, this loss will grow. But even on the basis of the Government's own figures and hopes, the Canadian tax-payers are buying, not a profit, but another white elephant for the hungry herd fattening on their diminishing treasury.

Mr. J. D. REID: Who wrote that out for you?

Mr. JACOBS: It has been handed to me. I fancy it was in the Montreal Star, which is usually a pretty good Government supporter, but they balk at this. There are limits beyond which a newspaper supporting the Government cannot go.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should like the hon. member to ridicule that as it ought to be ridiculed. The idea of a man making a guess at what the arbitrators will award, without anything to go on, and taking that figure to be absolutely found and established, and then proceeding to argue what the deficit will be! More simpering nonsense can scarcely be conceived, although I have read some in the press that compares with it almost identically. What is the value of reading that out to the Committee? There is nobody here so unintelligent and dense as to be influenced for a second by rubbish of that sort.

Mr. JACOBS: From what I can gather, the minister is not in agreement with the article I have read.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should think not.

Mr. J. D. REID: Nor anybody else.

Mr. CAHILL: From my reading of these figures, I come to the conclusion that we are undertaking to pay interest on a total capitalization of $470,000,000 in connection with this transaction. Am I nearly correct?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the hon. gentleman is wrong.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the correct figure?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman has been told it at least seven times, and three or four times this evening since eight o'clock.

Mr. CAHILL: I am asking the question again because I did not get it answered. You do not mean to say that you are going to pay interest on the $707,000,000. You say yourself you are going to arbitrate, and if you arbitrate you are taking into account the whole $707,000,000. I am trying to make a deduction to arrive at what will not be arbitrated upon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The resolution that has been before the hon. gentleman for two days, indeed, since last Friday, sets out definitely in figures that a child could read the exact debenture stock and the rate of interest on it which we undertake to pay, also the exact guaranteed stock with the rate of interest. That is all there is to it. There is no deduction necessary. It is all there in black and white.

Mr. CAHILL: Where is it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is in the resolution, and in the letter read in the House last Friday.

Mr. CAHILL: I do not see any mention of it in the resolution at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the top of page 10 of to-day's Orders of the Day my hon. friend will find the debenture stocks, and on page 9 the present capital stocks. The letter that was read in the House last Friday says that we pay four per cent on the guaranteed stock, and interest on the various debenture stocks set out at the top of page 10. There are no deductions to be made. Why ask this question fifty times over?

Mr. CAHILL: For the simple reason that there is no person in the Government with sufficient intelligence to answer the question as it should be answered. If the minister, who apparently does not wish to commit the Government as to the extent to which they are being obligated in this transaction, would look at page 39 of his own memoranda he will find that there are notes secured and unsecured amounting to $35,000,000. That is not mentioned in the resolution at all. Then there are the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds mentioned in the resolution, so if the minister has read the resolution and the list of other obligations he must know what should be deducted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When the hon. gentleman says "obligations," I hope he means obligations. The obligations I have already told him, and if I stood here six months I could not tell him any more plainly. It was just as plain as if I had told him that two and three are five. There are other debts of the company, and we take the assets subject to those debts. They are all set out on that page. We do not assume those obligations. The 4 per cent interest on the guaranteed stock becomes our obligation. We take the stock of the Grand Trunk. The company's properties are subject to certain obligations, which are all set out there.

Mr. CAHILL: What do they amount to?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The figures are there. Cannot the hon. gentleman read? Do I have to read them over to him?

Mr. CAHILL: Cannot you total them up?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is all made up here, but if the hon. gentleman says he cannot read I will read it for him. It is in English, not in Italian or Greek.

Mr. CAHILL: Nor in code.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman might be more familiar with it if it was in code. These are the figures.

Grand Trunk 5% debenture stock	$ 20,782,491.38
Grand Trunk 4% debenture stock	119,839,012.69
Great Western 5% debenture stock	13,252,322.48
Northern 4% debenture stock. ..	1,499,979.65
Total debenture stock..	$155,373,806.20

That is the debenture stock upon which we oblige ourselves to pay the interest. Let us proceed. On the same page we find 4 per cent guaranteed stock $60,833,332.51. That is the guaranteed stock on which we pay interest. That is all we oblige ourselves to do. Then there are other debts which the company holds its property subject to, and when we are stockholders the company will hold its property subject to them the same as now. The hon. gentleman wants to know what these debts are. Well, I shall read them to him; they are in English:

Second mtge. equipment bonds 6%..	$ 1,814,779.97
Northern third mtge. 6%.. ..	70,566.67
Canada Atlantic 4% bonds..	16,000,091.77
Wellington, Grey & Bruce bonds..	295,893.34
Matured bonds unpaid..	3,406.67
	$18,184,738.42

Then there are other liabilities of the company. They follow in order and I may read them if the hon. gentleman thinks it sounds better for me to read them than for him to read them himself. There are current liabilities, reserves and advances to controlled companies. I do not think reserves and advances to controlled companies could be described as liabilities, but the current liabilities are:

Interest on capital account accrued..	$ 3,123,755.42
Sundry outstanding accounts	15,409,985.97
Wages unpaid at Dec. 1918. ..	3,132,851.84
Overdraft at bank..	1,134,881.12

Against those, all the assets on the other side of the balance sheet are the property of the company. What, then, is the difficulty?

Mr. CAHILL: Does the minister say that we are assuming a capital of $500,000,000 on which we must pay interest?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; not at all.

Mr. CAHILL: Then what is the amount? Surely that can be answered. I also want to know what amount is being assumed on account of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what I can do. I am afraid I must give it up.

Mr. CAHILL: Surely some member of the Government can answer the question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have answered it.

Mr. J. R. WILSON: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cahill) is somewhat confused. He seems to view the matter as an outright purchase. If I understand the subject, we are assuming a liability of interest on a certain amount of securities which to all intents and purposes will be a rental. But there are these last-named securities mentioned by the minister. I understand that that will stand as a claim against the stock that is still held by the Grand Trunk Pacific. That is what I understand.

Mr. CAHILL: Ask the minister if that is what he understands.

Mr. TOBIN: He will not answer.

Mr. CAHILL: The hon. member (Mr. J. R. Wilson) states his view of the situation. Perhaps the minister will enlighten him.

Mr. J. D. REID: The whole matter is very plain, and it has been explained so many times that I do not think there is anything that I can add. The Minister of the Interior explained the situation with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway. The Grand Trunk Pacific is a subsidiary of the Grand Trunk, and when we take over the system we shall assume the liabilities in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific. When we take over the Grand Trunk railway we shall assume the interest on all the bonds.

Mr. CAHILL: Amounting to how much?

Mr. REID: I would have to look it up, but it is probably $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 per annum. Until the war the Grand Trunk Pacific was able to meet operating expenses; the loss has been practically on interest only. During the last two or three years, owing to the war, there has been some loss also on account of operating expenses. The loss on the Grand Trunk Pacific has been, in round numbers, $7,000,000 during the last few years, and that was practically on interest.

Mr. CAHILL: What capital amount does that represent? Surely you can tell us that. It is absurd to think that we are undertaking an enterprise of this kind and no one can tell us what obligations we are assuming. The Government is afraid to say that we are assuming obligations for fear that it might interfere with our credit. I am not asking them to say that. But what capital amount are we assuming?

Mr. MEIGHEN: On page 38 it is given exactly in several items.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the amount?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have told the hon. gentleman half a dozen times that you cannot lump these figures all together unless you want to deceive the House. Whether the hon. gentleman wants me to do that I do not know. Certain of these obligations we assume and agree to pay; the rest we do not. I have read both. I told the Committee what we agreed to pay and what the Grand Trunk Company had to, which we had not assumed at all. The totals are: Capital stock, $60,833,332.51. The interest upon that at 4 per cent we guarantee to pay. Funded debt, $155,373,806.20. The interest on most of that is at 4 per cent and some at 5 per cent, which we agree to pay.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the total?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am giving it to you now, but I will venture the prediction that the hon. gentleman will want it at least six times more before we are sure. I have stated what we agree to pay.

Now, the property is subject to the list of obligations, that I read in detail and that amount to $18,184,738.42, of the nature of bonds, etc., on properties they acquired. Then it is subject to other obligations amounting to $5,344,,207.54 in the nature of trust notes on equipment; other obligations in the nature of short-term loans amounting to $35,548,235.08, and other obligations in the nature of current liabilities. The property is not subject to these last. They belong to another distinct class again that we do not assume in any way but which the fixed assets must be liable for before there is any equity. These current liabilities amount to $22,801,474.35. To say that we must pay interest on all of that is merely to talk humbug, because on the other side of the balance sheet are current assets enough to discharge these obligations. Surely the hon. gentleman understands a balance sheet. It has been before him. There are current assets in the nature of sundry outstanding accounts amounting to $43,838,831.44 which, as the hon. gentleman knows, stand off against the current liabilities. There are outstanding traffic accounts, amounting to $1,581,852.15 and materials and supplies on hand, $6,407,195.57, all standing against current liabilities. Then there are "advances to controlled companies", and so on,—that appears on both sides and these items are not liabilities,—"Traders sidings bearing interest", and so on;—the assets and liabilities are there. they stand against each other. What is important is: What are the assets upon which we assume liability? What is funded against the property? I have given to the hon. gentleman the actual figures three or four times tonight.

Mr. CAHILL: What about the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have given him the Grand Trunk Pacific. We find a balance sheet showing exactly the same thing in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific, page 42. As I have explained what a balance sheet means in regard to the Grand Trunk I need not add that it means exactly the same thing in regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister is not proposing that we shall assume interest payments on our own loans to the Grand Trunk Pacific? What is the amount of our loans to be deducted from the obligations of the Grand Trunk Pacific that we assume?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Our loans are all set out on page 42 and the figures are just as plain as my words could be. The Grand Trunk Pacific is subject to all these liabilities. It has certain assets. In my opinion the assets are not at all equal to the liabilities but I am not responsible for that. So far did the liabilities exceed the assets on the Grand Trunk Pacific as a going concern that last year's deficit, including fixed charges, was over $10,000,000. There is something in the nature of a monument. I would call it a monumental folly.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I presume the Government intends to hold the Governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta liable for their guarantees of bonds?

Mr. MEIGHEN: These governments are liable in relation to certain guarantees. The Dominion Government has not relieved them. I do not know that the matter of their liability is a serious one as far as the provinces are concerned, for the reason that the Government, although it does not assume the liability as an obligation of the Crown, it does, as a matter of practice take care of the road as a going concern. Consequently, I think these provinces are justified in believing that their position is improved by the Government taking over the road.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Have they paid any interest?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. The Grand Trunk Pacific paid its own liabilities because the Government of Canada has lent it the money with which to pay. Consequently, the provinces have not been called upon to pay.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I understand the Grand Trunk Pacific defaulted some time ago. Have the provinces not been called upon since then?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) informs me that since the Grand Trunk Pacific went into the hands of a receiver the two Governments have had to pay the maturing interest.

Mr. J. D. REID: The governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta have had to take care of the interest.

Mr. FOURNIER: I asked the Minister yesterday how much the Grand Trunk had expended per mile of road for maintenance in comparison with the Canadian Pacific during the years 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918. Is he able to give me the information?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I have the information here. It will be remembered that yesterday the complaint was made that the road had not been maintained, and comparative figures were asked for as to maintenance payments made by the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific in various years per mile of road. These are the figures:

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT OF ANNUAL EXPENDITURES PER MILE OF ROAD FOR MAINTENANCE OF C.P.R. AND G.T.R.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Now these figures would show that adding the two classes of maintenance together the Grand Trunk would be better than the Canadian Pacific for every year back to 1908. I do not want any one to gather from that that there was any failure to maintain on the part of the Canadian Pacific. I do not know how to account for it, but these are the official figures given.

Mr. FOURNIER: I have asked several questions of members of the Government but the answers given by them are so confusing I have come to the conclusion that they do not know any more about railway affairs than I do. I propose to deal with the question in regard to the Canadian National railways and our national debt.

The railway situation in Canada since the beginning of the war has changed rapidly, and instead of an era of private initiative and private profit in railway enterprise, such as we witnessed before 1914, we have entered upon a period in which government activity in this direction is regarded by some as the panacea for all our ills in transportation. The Government on October 1, 1917, took over the Canadian Northern Railway through the purchase of 600,000 shares of the stock then outstanding at a price of $10,000,000. When this transaction took place the amount of the company's liabilities was such as to increase our funded debt by $327,000,000. In the summer of 1918 negotiations were carried on by some members of the Government with the Grand Trunk Railway Company in London, looking towards the acquisition of this line and its subsidiary the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, but such conferences were fruitless of results and left the whole matter in a very unsatisfactory condition. On March 4, 1919, the Grand Trunk Pacific Company notified the Government that on account of insufficient funds it could not continue to operate beyond March 10, and upon receipt of this letter an Order in Council was passed on March 7 appointing the Minister of Railways as receiver of the Grand Trunk Pacific in order to keep the line in operation. Hon. gentlemen may remain in their seats, take a sheet of paper and pencil and figure the matter out, and I challenge any of them to say that my statement is incorrect.

First of all, let us look into the condition of the Grand Trunk's finances and its bonded debt obligations. Some of these have matured, but those that are outstanding constitute a heavy burden. Changing the pounds to dollars at the rate of one pound to five dollars these obligations are listed as follows:

1. Grand Trunk railway perpetual debentures, five per cent	$ 21,351,875
2. Grand Trunk railway perpetual consolidated debentures, four per cent	123,122,275

Hon. gentlemen will notice that additional amounts of these has been pledged for security of No. 9-10, and I will enumerate them later on.

3. Grand Trunk second equipment, six per cent		$ 1,865,000
4. Great Western perpetual debentures, five per cent		13,615,400
5. Northern Railway of Canada, 3rd preferred debentures, six per cent		72,500,000
6. Northern Railway of Canada, perpetual debentures, four per cent		1,541,075
7. Canada Atlantic, first mortgage, four per cent		16,438,450
8. Grand Trunk railway equipments, four and a half per cent, Series A	$2,167,000
Series B	2,016,000
Series C	1,572,000
Total for the Grand Trunk railway equipment, four and a half per cent		5,755,000
9. Grand Trunk railway five and a half per cent secured notes unmatured		12,050,000
10. Wellington, Grey and Bruce bonds		312,000

There are also the following issues:

11. Matured bonds not presented for payment	$ 3,500
12. Collateral Car Trust, five per cent, due Whipple Car Co., guaranteed by Grand Trunk railway	225,000
13. New England Elevator Company, first mortgage, 3½ per cent, guaranteed by Grand Trunk	250,000
14. Montreal Warehouse first mortgage, four per cent guaranteed by Grand Trunk railway	1,000,000
Total	$208,312,875

This is exclusive of the Grand Trunk Pacific securities which are $97,301,252. If we add these two together we get a total of $305,614,127 as the amount of the Grand Trunk Railway Company's bonded obligations for its own system and the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Let us look now into the large sums that are essential to put the property into good operating condition and bring these facilities to standard requirements. Maintenance has been neglected very much. Despite the fact that the Minister of the Interior has cited figures in regard to the expenditure of the Grand Trunk Railway Company for maintenance per mile of road, I must say this to him, that in 1915-16 the Grand Trunk Railway spent only $1,335 per year per mile for maintenance while the Canadian Pacific Railway spent $5,061 per mile. These figures are taken from the Railway Statistics of 1915-16, page 92.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is wrong.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is right?

Mr. FOURNIER: I invite my hon. friend to look at page 92 of the Railway Statistics of 1915-16.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Published by whom? By the Railway Department?

Mr. FOURNIER: Yes, published by the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All right.

Mr. MICHAUD: From whom did the minister get his information as to the cost per mile?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The figures were handed to me by the Deputy Minister of Railways.

Mr. J. D. REID: Taken from the official records in the department.

Mr. FOURNIER: I take issue with my hon. friend. Then, if we refer to the statement of President Kelley submittted in 1917 to the Railway Inquiry Commission, we find that he declared that a sum of about $21,000,000 and odd would be necessary to bring the railway up to par. My hon. friend will find it in the report of the Railway Commission at page 33. If this amount had been provided by the Grand Trunk Railway in the ordinary course of operation it would have been a charge against revenue. If the Government has to do it it will form part of its capital expenditure. The Commission in 1917 reported that the existing plant was inadequate for traffic requirements and that a capital expenditure of $30,150,500 was necessary to make the requisite additions. My hon. friend will find that in the report of the Railway Inquiry Commission at page 34. If we add these two amounts together we have $51,500,000 added to the above amount of the Grand Trunk Railways bonded obligations for itself and its subsidiary, or a total of $356,945,972 as the amount for which the Government would have to become responsible if it had taken over the Grand Trunk Railway at the end of 1916. With the additional sum required for the rolling stock now, it will represent an expenditure fully one half more than the programme would have cost before the war, and should the method of arbitration proposed be adopted as in the case of the Canadian Northern Railway, the amount will have to be increased and the Dominion Government will have to assume capital obligations to the extent of $400,000,000. I know, Mr. Chairman, that it is rather tedious to have to deal with figures, but I aver they are correct.

Let us now look into the annual capital charges which must be borne by the Government when it acquires the road. Changing the pound to dollars at the rate of one pound sterling to five dollars, we have:

1	For the Grand Trunk perpetual debentures 5%..	$1,067,594
2	For the Grand Trunk perpetual consolidated debentures 4%..	4,924,891
3	Grand Trunk second annual equipment bonds 6%..	111,870
4	Great Western perpetual debentures 5%..	680,770
5	Northern Railway of Canada 3rd preferred debentures 6%..	4,350
6	Northern Railway of Canada perpetual debentures 4%.. ..	61,643
7	Canada Atlantic First Mortgage 4%..	657,538
8	Grand Trunk equipment bonds 4½%..	258,975
9	Grand Trunk Railway secured notes unmatured 5½%..	687,500
10	Wellington, Gray and Bruce bonds..	12,855

The interest on these bonds varies, but I am giving the interest paid in 1917 as contained in the report of the Grand Trunk Railway Company for that year at page 10.

11	On matured bonds. (There is no interest paid on them.)
12	Collateral car trust 5%..	11,250
13	New England Elevator Co. First Mortgage 3¾%..	9,375
14	Montreal Warehouse First Mortgage 4%..	40,000

There is also annual interest sanctioned but unexercised amounting to $500,513. These figures are taken from the Grand Trunk Annual Report for 1917, at page 11. This makes in all a total of $9,029,184, to which we must add:

(a) Rental due for leased lines (Annual Report of the Grand Trunk Railway Company for 1917, page 32)..	$ 776,030
(b) Interest on $15,000,000 First Mortgage 4%..	600,000
(c) Interest on Grand Trunk Pacific bonds guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway as follows:—

1	4% Series A Second Mortgage Bonds, due 1955	$ 408,240
	4% Series B Second Mortgage Bonds, due 1955	398,520
2	Dominion Government Loans 1909-1913 at 4%..	1,000,000
3	5% Secured notes..	486,000
4	4% Perpetual debenture stock ($34,874,252.86) Interest charges..	1,395,170
5	4% Lake Superior Branch bonds interest..	301,320
	Total..	$14,394,404

Item (b) above is taken from Moodie's Analysis of Steam Railroad Investments, 1917, page 1243. This amount of $14,394,404 of annual interest and rental charges is not all. The Grand Trunk has guaranteed interest upon Central Vermont Railway First Mortgage 4 per cent Bonds ($10,732,000 outstanding) to an amount not to exceed 30 per cent of the gross earnings from the interchange of traffic between the two railroads. These figures are taken from Moodie's Analysis of Steam Railroad Investments, 1917, page 48. This would probably give a variable amount from year to year, but no mention is made of it in the financial statement of the parent company. Then, there are dividends upon £12,500,000 guaranteed stock, which at the rate of 4 per cent will net $2,500,000. These figures are taken from the Grand Trunk Railway Company's report, 1917, page 27. Adding this to the foregoing figures, $14,394,404, we get $16,894,404 as the annual fixed charges to be met by the Grand Trunk Railway, exclusive of the guarantee to the Central Vermont Railway and the dividends to be paid upon the three classes of preferred stock.

If the Government acquires the Grand Trunk railway the annual charges of the latter would have to be assumed by the former, and if the Government takes the road on the basis of a yearly rental payment, the amount of this would increase the above figure by a sum which would make the obligation on account of this railway at least $20,000,000. (Hansard March 20, 1919. Page 692).

It would be interesting to find out what is the earning power of the company. The income account for the years 1911-17 shows that, after the payment of operating expenses, interest on bonds and debentures, rental of leased lines and a dividend of 4 per cent on the guaranteed stock together with a 5 per cent rate on the first and second preferred stock and a nominal rate of return on the third preferred stock (excepting the years 1914-15, when no dividend was declared on any of the preferred stock), the surplus in any case was very small, and during this period, there have been at least two years of deficits. The largest surplus was in the year 1917, which was £26,279 sterling. This means that the revenue of the company are but little more than enough to pay the expenses of operation, and the fixed charges of capital. It is to be remembered also that maintenance expenses for line and equipment are greatly in arrears; that no depreciation fund has been set aside to take care of equipment, and that nothing has been done to establish a fund as a reserve for contingencies. According to former President Chamberlin, 5 per cent of the cost of the equipment should have been set aside annually for replacement of this capital and for the Grand Trunk. This would have necessitated an annual contribution out of the operating revenue equal to about $3,000,000. Were even this outlay provided for, it is evident that the surplus of the year 1917 would be converted into a heavy deficit. Moreover, if the operating ratio of the Grand Trunk railway under Government management should increase, as is the case with the Canadian Northern railway since it came under the Government, it is not difficult to foresee that in the near future the disbursements from the Dominion treasury will have to make good inevitable deficits in operation

Turning now to the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific, I will give the great outstanding facts concerning the finances of that company. It is well enough for hon. gentlemen to say that these things are known by everybody. I have come to the conclusion that very few people know about the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. Its contract with the Dominion Government required the latter to guarantee its bonds for the prairie section to an amount not exceeding $13,000 per mile and for the mountain section, to an amount equal to three-fourths of the entire cost of that section. The bonds guaranteed by the Government were secured by a first mortgage covering the undertaking from Winnipeg to Prince Rupert, and the company's bonds, guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, were secured by a second mortgage. It was thought that the proceeds of those two bond issues would be ample to complete the Grand Trunk Pacific, and under the agreement the latter was then to lease and operate the National Transcontinental which had been built by the Government, on payment of a rental (after the first seven years) equal to 3 per cent of the cost of construction. Because of the company's lack of funds in 1909 the Dominion Government, on the guarantee of the Grand Trunk, advanced the Grand Trunk Pacific $10,000,000 at 4 per cent. But even the proceeds of this loan, which the Government bought at par, proved insufficient. That is from the report of the Railway Inquiry Commission, page 23. In 1913, the Government made a further loan guaranteed by the Grand Trunk to the extent of $15,000,000 at 4 per cent. As in 1909, the Government bought the bonds at par, as per report of the Railway Inquiry Commission, page 18. Then came a change in the Grand Trunk policy when it declared that its financial position would not permit it to guarantee any further loans by the Government to the Grand Trunk Pacific; but as the latter was still unfinished, the Government came to its rescue and guaranteed a further issue not exceeding $16,000,000 of the company's 4 per cent bonds without Grand Trunk Railway security. Part of these were sold, and another part, $7,500,000, was issued and pledged to the Government as security for a cash loan of $6,000,000, as per report of the Railway Inquiry Commission, page 19. The company also issued $9,720,000 of 5 per cent loan guaranteed by the Grand Trunk railway and further secured by a deposit of $14,580,000 worth of debenture stock.

In 1916, the Government voted an $8,000,000 loan to the Grand Trunk Pacific railway on a mortgage. This was to pay the interest on the company's securities which had been guaranteed by the Government, and the deficit in operating expenses of the Grand Trunk necessitated that the latter should not be called on to make up anything for the operating expenses for its subsidiary, as per Hansard, March 20, 1919, page 686.

In each of the years 1917 and 1918, Parliament voted $7,500,000 to make up the operating deficit and to pay the interest on bonds which had been guaranteed both by the Government and the Grand Trunk. These loans of 1916, 1917 and 1918 are secured by a blanket mortgage on the Grand Trunk Pacific, but were not guaranteed by the parent company. It would seem from that, as I have said, and from the fact that the Grand Trunk has requested the Government to continue this yearly, that the Grand Trunk directors virtually desire to wash their hands of the Grand Trunk Pacific and to let the Government care for it, as per Hansard March 20, 1919, page 687.

Here is a tabular arrangement showing the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the nature of guarantees under which they were issued:

I.
3 per cent. first mortgage bonds (due 1962), bought by the government		$ 33,048,000.00
3 per cent. first mortgage bonds (due 1962) outstanding		34,992,000.00
4 per cent. sterling bonds (due 1962) outstanding		8,440,848.00
4 per cent. bonds, issued and pledged to government in 1914 as security for a cash loan of $6,000,000		7,500,000.00
		$ 83,980,848.00
Government loans to Grand Trunk Pacific on Grand Trunk Railway guarantee:—
1909	$10,000,000 at 4 per cent
1913	15,000,000 at 4 per cent
		25,0000,000.00
Government loans to Grand Trunk Pacific, secured by Grand Trunk Pacific mortgage:— 1914	$16,000,000
1916	8,000,000
1917	7,500,000
1918	7,500,000
		$ 39,000,000.00
Total guarantees of Dominion government and loans by the government to the Grand Trunk Pacific (i.e., total interests of the government in the Grand Trunk Pacific		$147,980,848.00
II. Saskatchewan government guarantees:—
4 per cent. bonds, due 1939	$11,347,848.00
4½ per cent. terminal bonds, due 1943	1,882,240.00
		13,230,088.00
III. Alberta government guarantees:—
4 per cent bonds, due 1939	$ 2,430,000.00
4 per cent. coal branch bonds, due 1942	1,159,596.00
		3,589,596.00
IV. Grand Trunk Railway guarantees for Grand Trunk Pacific:—
4 per cent. Series A second mortgage bonds, due 1955	$10,206,000.00
4 per cent. Series B second mortgage bonds, due 1955	9,963,000.00
Dominion government loans to Grand Trunk Pacific on Grand Trunk Railway guarantee:— 1909. $10,000,000 at 4 per cent., due 1919
1913. $15,000,000 at 4 per cent., due 1923
	$25,000,000.00
5 per cent secured notes (secured by pledge of 4 per cent. debentures), due 1925	9,720,000.00
4 per cent. perpetual debenture stock	34,879,252.86
4 per cent. Lake Superior branch bonds	7,533,000.00
		$ 97,301,252.86

Summarizing these, we find:—
Dominion government guarantees of Grand Trunk Pacific securities..	$147,980,848.00
Less amount of these guaranteed by Grand Trunk Railway..	25,000,000.00
Net amount of Dominion government guarantees..		$122,980,848.00
Saskatchewan guarantees of Grand Trunk Pacific securities..		13,230,088.00
Alberta guarantees of Grand Trunk Pacific securities.. ..		3,589,596.00
Grand Trunk Railway guarantees of Grand Trunk Pacific securities..		97,301,252.86
Total guarantees of Grand Trunk Pacific securities..		$237,101,784.86

By taking over the Grand Trunk, the Government assumes a capital obligation of about $400,000,000 and annual charges of $20,000,000. In acquiring the Grand Trunk Pacific its capital obligation would be increased by about $300,000,000, and its expenses by at least $8,000,000. This means that by such a proposed course of government ownership, the enormous debt of Canada would be increased by one third of its present amount. When we take these facts into consideration, in connection with the annual deficit of at least $20,000,000 in the case of the Canadian Northern, which has been acquired by the assumption of $434,312,747 of liabilities, including a bonded debt of $327,000,000, and the deficit in operating expenses of the Canadian Government railways, amounting in 1916 to $6,000,000 and over, without the payment of any interest on capital, it can easily be seen that the drain upon the Dominion treasury will soon make heavy calls upon the taxpayers of this country.

The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) stated to Parliament on April 3, 1919, that if the Government should exercise its right of foreclosure on the Grand Trunk Pacific on the basis of its first mortgage, and offer the road for sale, it could buy it at a much lower price than is represented by all the securities which have been issued in respect of it (Annual Report to Department of Railways and Canals, 1917, p. 6). He acknowledged then that if the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Railway on behalf of the Grand Trunk Pacific were fully taken into account, the value of the Grand Trunk shares, that is, the shareholders' equity in the property, would be practically nil (Hansard, March 20, 1919, p. 701). The Government, therefore, has come to the conclusion that the value of the assets in these cases is not a determining factor in the proposed change from private to public ownership. In other words, the Government encourages the allegation that it is a case for generosity, and not for exacting the full pound of flesh. I may add that the full pound of flesh will be exacted from Canadians.

The ex-Minister of Finance also said that if the Government should take over the Grand Trunk, and the same thing applies to the Grand Trunk Pacific, it would take it on the same basis as the Canadian Northern, that is, it would still be a corporation with power to issue securities when necessary. As a corporation, its object would be to finance itself as much as possible. In this way, it seems, the Government is endeavouring to make the people think that they will not be obligated to the extent I have shown, but that all the financial strain will rest upon the existing corporation, which is in control of the properties. This confusing of the issue is wholly derogatory to democratic government, which rests upon full and accurate publicity. Does the Canadian Northern still do all its financing by the issuance of its securities and their sale in New York and London? I pause for an answer.

Mr. J. D. REID: It does part of its financing, selling equipment bonds, for instance, in New York or any other market it wishes.

Mr. FOURNIER: Far from it, and the Government knows it well. Then, why should this blind be held out, as a consequence of which many of the electorate are deceived? I have not argued either for or against public ownership, but have sought to give the figures and the financial status of the railways in an unprejudiced manner, and the people of this country can draw their own conclusions.

It is regrettable that the Government has seen fit to bring down this railway legislation. Sir, we met here to approve of the Peace Treaty, and we have approved of it, even the Austrian Treaty which we have not seen and which was never presented to us. However ridiculous this session has been regarding the Peace Treaty, we wanted to finish with the war junkers, and work again once more in peace and harmony. To me this session appears like a hopeless joke. It was only planned to fool the people with another railway deal. Just as soon as a glimmer of light was beginning to penetrate the war gloom, and at the very time when the country needs wise discernment and patriotic endeavour in its counsels, more so than at any other time since Confederation, the Government sees fit to force Parliament to grant them a blank cheque to crowd huge financial obligations on this country, on top of our enormous debt which now runs into the billions.

Sir, this is not the first time that the Government has outraged decency. It is not the first time that this beautiful Unionist aggregation, with its majority, has sacrificed Canada's interest to enrich speculators and rescue imprudent backers of that Bolshivish financial clique of Toronto. It is not the first time that the Canadian people have been swayed by the sophistries of this unscrupulous Government.

It is not very long ago that we had to listen to stock arguments of all hon. gentlemen on your right, Sir, telling us about the glorious memories of Vimy, Courcelette, Ypres, and Passchendaele, the bravery of Canadians on the battlefields and their gallant fights for freedom. "The last man; the last dollar"—this was the war-cry. The soldiers have come back, and no more a sound shall we hear from those sweet lutes. Ofttimes have we heard even the ex-Minister of Finance, whom we delight to hear, as we heard him this afternoon, mention the soldiers. But that nightingale also has been silenced. He went up to the soldiers' committee and told them that there was no more money for the boys. But, Sir, there is money for the Toronto clique. This legislation may go through or not by means of the gag-machine; it matters not. We know very well that this Government will never put railway legislation through without applying the gag rule. But, Sir, when the next Budget is made public the people of Canada will realize in a shocking way that we are navigating troubled waters and that the currents on which we are drifting sweep over more debts and deficits to the rocks of calamity and disaster. Hon. gentlemen opposite may have shaken hands to carry on the war to a successful end. That was a noble cause, but if they have formed a sort of family compact to drive Canada to the rocks of bankruptcy to enrich speculators, then, I say to those hon. gentlemen that individual greed should not govern this country any longer. I crave your pardon, Mr. Chairman, if I have trespassed unduly on the time of the committee, but I have endeavoured to express in my humble way my opinions on this subject.

Mr. DENIS: With the indulgence of the members of the Cabinet, there are two or three more questions which I shall ask, and then I hope I shall be through. The first point I should like to have elucidated is this: Taking the present net earnings of the Grand Trunk railway and the interest which we shall have to pay upon the debenture stock and guaranteed stock, which amounts to between $9,000,000 and $10,000,000, what is the deficit, subtracting the net income for the year 1917-18 from the interest which we shall have to pay upon the debenture stock and guaranteed stock? Is my question clear?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is clear, but why does the hon. gentleman pick out two of the worst years in the company's history? Would it not be fair to pick out ten?

Mr. DENIS: I am taking only the last two years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, because they were war years when no railway in the world made anything. Then, again, they were the years in which the McAdoo award took effect, and in this country the increase in rates did not take effect until much later. The hon. gentleman will hardly argue that it was fair to any invested capital, be it Canadian or foreign, to assume that it would stay in such an abnormal condition as that, or that any country would be justified in allowing it to do so. If the hon. gentleman takes, as the Drayton-Acworth report asks should be done, ten years, and even includes in them certain war years, then there will be more than sufficient to pay all obligations, all debts, interest on guaranteed stock, and more besides.

Mr. DENIS: Can the minister inform me why the Grand Trunk Railway has altogether suspended the payment of dividends on the guaranteed stock and debenture stock for the last two years, as appears in this booklet?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They did not. They paid interest on debenture stock. Guaranteed interest was not paid in 1917-18 for the reasons I have given, because there was no money to pay it with. There was a small surplus but they did not declare dividends for very clear reasons which I have given. The hon. gentleman should not assume that any company was a failure merely because it had paid no interest on certain portions of its capital stock last year and the year before. If so there would be scarcely a sound railway in the world; there would not be one in the United States or in England, as I am informed. There would be in Canada, on account of the tremendous land assets and the very strong position of the Canadian Pacific railway, a position very largely due to the extraordinary generous treatment received at the hands of this Dominion.

Mr. DENIS: I do not want the inference to be drawn that the company would be insolvent for that reason. I suppose the failure to pay interest must be attributed to the decrease in the earnings and the increase in the runing expenses.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. I think the hon. gentleman will find that the earnings were the greatest then that they ever had and that the amount of traffic was the highest. The amount of service rendered this country was the greatest that the Grand Trunk ever rendered. But owing chiefly to the McAdoo award as to the wages applying in Canada by virtue of our law, and to the increased cost of operation generally, due to increased cost of supply, the entire earnings of the company were eaten into except to the extent of a small surplus.

Mr. DENIS: Is the minister taking any stock in the Drayton-Acworth report, which says that in 1917 the sum of $21,000,000. was necessary to put the road in good condition and for improvements generally?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. The Drayton-Acworth report would not say that because it was published in 1916.

Mr. DENIS: Well, whenever it was published.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member wants to know if I am taking any stock in the report in that respect?

Mr. DENIS: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Our contention will be that the report is right. The Grand Trunk, however, strenuously contend that it is wrong, and brings considerable evidence forward to that effect. They certainly have not convinced Sir Henry Drayton, who was largely responsible for the report. As to where the exact line lies, I am not competent to say. The arbitration board will have to determine that.

Mr. DENIS: The Minister of the Interior said a moment ago that we did not in any way assume the liabilities of the company. This is absolutely right. But, on the other hand, I think his statement calls for explanation. I shall express my view of the situation and should like to be corrected if I am wrong. Technically speaking the Dominion of Canada is not by any means assuming the liabilities of the company, but it is making an investment to the amount of $216,000,000 by becoming responsible in perpetuity for the payment of the interest on the debenture stock and the guaranteed stock, which together represent a capitalization of $216,000,000. Now, in the agreement we say that we are going to pay forever the interest on this sum.

For the sake of argument we may say that we are making an investment of $216,000,000. Besides that we shall be making an investment to the extent of the amount of the award of the arbitrators. If the award is for $10,000,000 we shall invest that sum because we shall give stock for it. By making ourselves responsible in perpetuity for the payment of the interest on the debenture stock and the guaranteed stock we are making an investment of $216,000,000. If the award is $10,000,000 our investment in the Grand Trunk railway will be $226,000,000 and it is so much of an investment that, suppose through some calamity the Grand Trunk railway system should disappear from the face of the earth, we would be losing $226,000,000. If the physical property should disappear we would owe the shareholders the interest forever just the same as we owe the interest on the mortgage on a house after the house has been burned. There is no getting out of it that we are making an investment of over $200,000,000.

Of course, there are on the other side, assets which we must take account of as the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) said this afternoon. We are not assuming the other liabilities of the company, but by becoming the most interested party in this concern, we are practically assuming the other liabilities because we could not afford to let the road go into liquidation or insolvency. Let us suppose that the $22,000,000 current liabilities, as they appear at page 39 of the booklet, should not be paid, and that the holders of these securities should ask the company to be put into liquidation and into the hands of a receiver; the Government could not afford to let the company go into the hands of a receiver because, if it should be sold far below its value, the Government would be in danger of losing the $226,000,000 which it has invested. Consequently, we are in the same position as the man who would take a second mortgage of $5,000 on a $10,000 house. He might very well say, "I am not interested in the first mortgage; I have nothing to do with it." That is true. He is not assuming any responibility as to the first mortgage, but in reality he is responsible for the first mortgage if he wants to save his own second mortgage. We are not assuming the other liabilities of the company but because our interest goes with these liabilities, because we have to secure the interests of the company and because we have to save the company, we make ourselves responsible practically for the whole of the liabilities of the company. That is my point of view and if I am mistaken I should like to be corrected.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The speech of the hon. gentleman convinces me that he very clearly understands the situation. I do not say that he expresses it quite correctly, but I believe that in his own head it is just as clear as it can be in the mind of any hon. member. While it is not quite correct to say as he says that we are making an investment of $216,000,000 because we are agreeing to pay the interest on that amount already invested, still the very statement of that shows that he understands just what we are doing. We are agreeing to pay interest on that money which is already invested. That differs from investing it in this very important feature that we do not have to find the money and we could not find it to-day without an expenditure of considerably more than that amount. It is much more advantageous to us than if we had to find $216,000,000 and invest it. If we had to find and invest it on a four per cent basis, it would cost us more than $216,000,000. It might cost us about $250,000,000. While the hon. member evinces a clear understanding of the situation he does not put it in a correct way, but I know that he understands clearly that as I am stating it to him now I am putting it in the correct way. As to what he says about other obligations—obligations standing against the properties of the Grand Trunk Railway Company which we are taking over—his conception in that regard is quite correct. They do not become an obligation of the Government, but the Grand Trunk would have to take care of them in order to protect its own interests, and the Government is the stockholder of the Grand Trunk. What the hon. member has in mind is quite right. That is the position of the Grand Trunk has been in all these years. It is the position that every road in the world is in. There is not a road in the world that owns its properties subject to nothing. Against properties taken over there are perpetual obligations. We are going to be in that position when we take over the Grand Trunk. It is a pleasure to answer any question put by my hon. friend because there is some result in the answer.

Mr. CRONYN: From the discussion last night I got the impression, which perhaps was an entirely wrong one, that the market price of the stocks of the Grand Trunk might play some part in fixing the value which the Government would be called upon to acknowledge by way of new guaranteed stock. Reading over the report in Hansard, I am not certain that the inference is correctly drawn, but I believe that certain other hon. gentlemen in the House are under the same impression, and I thought it would be well to have it set right by a direct statement from the minister. To my mind the market prices of these stocks to-day, or six months, or a year from to-day, can have nothing whatever to do with the value of the property. I presume—I may be quite wrong—that the board of arbitration will inquire into the physical assets of this corporation, its right of way, terminal facilities, equipment and so forth, will set up against these various obligations that may exist in one form or another, and will strike a balance on this basis: After these obligations are met what is the equity to be assigned to the various preference and common stocks? It is well known that for years Grand Trunk stock on the London market has been a speculative counter. The market has been rigged more than once more or less on current newspaper information, and it would be easy, particularly when there is such a large number of shareholders, to cause a violent fluctuation in any one class of these stocks. So that, to my mind, it would be entirely misleading should the idea go abroad that the market price of the stocks has anything to do with their value.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The view expressed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cronyn) is almost identically my own. The market value, in my judgment, if it is to be considered a factor at all—that is a subject for evidence—would be a very minor matter before the arbitration tribunal. It is quite true, as the hon. gentleman says, that market value on the stock exchange is a very poor guide as to what the real value is, because the quotations are influenced by speculative considerations so very largely that it would seem to me it would be next to valueless evidence as to what the stocks were really worth. While that is my opinion, the answer would not be complete unless I added that according to the resolution and according to the letters both of July 18th and October 10th, the arbitration tribunal necessarily must be itself the judge as to what evidence is and as to what weight is to be attached to evidence when admitted. That is to say the arbitration tribunal is the judge as to what kind of evidence can be admitted to prove value. It would have power to wholly strike out all evidence as to market value, and if it decides that the evidence can be admitted it is the sole judge as to what weight can be given to it. So, while in my opinion, the arbitration tribunal should give very little, if any, weight at all to it, and perhaps should not admit it, that is altogether for it to say—the matter is in its hands, and rightly so.

Mr. DENIS: Will there be an appeal from the award of the arbitrators?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There will be if the award is not unanimous, but only on a question of law. If the other side claims that the arbitrators adopted a wrong legal principle in coming to their conclusion, then they have an appeal to the Supreme Court in the event of the award not being unanimous.

Mr. DENIS: If the arbitrators are unanimous there is no appeal either on a question of law or on a question of fact?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. McKENZIE: Notwithstanding the view expressed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cronyn) I find it very difficult to understand how an arbitrator, whose duty it is to place a value on stock, can shut his eyes to the market value of the stock which he is arbitrating; I think the evidence that any lawyer representing the owner of the stock would hasten to submit to arbitration would be the market value of the stock. He would put on the stand brokers who were handling the stock and prove that for the last month, or for the last year, this stock was selling on the open market in the hands and under the judgment of financiers, in London for instance, at a certain figure. I profess, Mr. Chairman, to have the ordinary common sense of the ordinary man, and with that some training as a lawyer, and I must submit to the Government that I feel now, with what information I possess, that I would be obliged to take cognizance of evidence as to what the market value of the stock was, just the same as if I were arbitrating the value of a lot of land in a field. The owner of the field could come and say: "You have to arbitrate this lot. I have sold twenty-five lots just alongside of this in this very field, and for each of them I have received $5,000; I can sell this for $5,000 and sell lots all around it for the same amount." I might not think that the lot was worth $5,000 but I could not, as an arbitrator or as a judge, shut my eyes to the fact that this was the market value of the man's land; I think I would have to give cognizance to it, and if I did not I do not think my award would stand. For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I think it would be very dangerous ground for the Canadian people to take, or for the Government to take, in calculating what the award would be, to imagine they can separate the market value of the stock from its intrinsic value. I do not think we can calculate on that at all, and if anything depends upon it I would certainly think that we must govern ourselves to a very great extent by what this stock is. A great many people handle stocks not for the interest that it brings at all but just for the purpose of speculation—buying stock and selling it, turning it over; making a business of that. It is only a comparatively small number of people who buy stock and put it in their safe, say nothing further about it, and wait from year to year for dividends. There are such people but they are not the ones who are usually found making a business of handling stocks. The man who makes a business of handling stocks cares very little about the intrinsic value if he thinks it is a taking stock in the market; that he can turn it over and make a profit of it, and when that is going on from day to day the opportunity is presented of making money. So while it is true that the Minister of the Interior professes to agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cronyn), I submit that, even for the minister, it would be hard sledding and difficult arguing to show that an arbitrator is to take no account whatever of the market value of the stock which he has to arbitrate. I do fear, Mr. Chairman, that the man in the street, of whom we talk so often, does not very well understand the situation that we are in in respect to this property that we are taking over. I submit, Sir, that the man in the street thinks that when we buy the stocks which are set forth in the resolution we are buying the property; that is the way the transaction appeals to the ordinary man. There is a string of stocks given in the resolution in two different lots. One total is £49,573,492, and another aggregation is £31,226,125. The ordinary man thinks that when we dispose of that stock—that is, when we satisfy the owner of it and buy it out absolutely and take that stock over—we own the road.

That is the way it appeared to me in the first instance—I thought that was so. But it has come out from the reading of this little blue book which the Government has put in the hands of members, that that is only a small part of the obligations which we have to pay in order to own this road. That has been made perfectly clear by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) who spoke a moment ago in connection with these two mortgages. A man can buy a house, or buy what we call the reversionary interest or equity in a house, from a mortgagor—a man who has mortgaged his house, which is worth $15,000 for $10,000. The man buys it for $5,000 but there is a $10,000 mortgage on it. Surely he does not for a moment make himself believe that he owns that house? He owns it to the extent of $5,000, but he must clear off the $10,000 mortgage before he becomes the owner.

If you apply that principle to this railroad, it will be found that we buy the stock, and that that stock gives us certain rights. But the stock is nothing at all without the road-bed, the rails and the rolling stock; those are the things of value. The stock has no value at all except as the road-bed and the equipment and the earnings of the road give it value. We find that every physical asset in connection with the road is mortgaged to the hilt to the extent of millions of dollars. Now, if we are to own the road we have to clear off those mortgages. Very few of us have given very much attention to that point I imagine. Speaking for myself, I had not until to-day understood it; my attention having been called to a great many other things I did not have time to closely read this pamphlet. I did think that when we bought the stock we owned the road. But it is well for hon. gentlemen to consider that that stock only begins to give us some interest in the road, and that if we are to consider, as the representatives of the Canadian people, the kind of transaction we are entering into, we must know the extent of the mortgages on the railway that we are buying. We do not care about the stock; we want the road-bed and the equipment that will be of service in giving us a revenue. We are just as much bound to inquire as to what we will have to pay to clear off this equipment as we are to inquire how much we shall pay for the stock, because the holders of those mortgages, bills of sale, and other liens against this equipment can get judgment whenever they want to, and under the sheriff's execution can take possession, in which event we must go to the rescue or lose the use of that equipment and, through it, the use of the railway. So we must bear in mind that whatever amount stands against the equipment we are liable for and must pay when demanded if we are to save the property that we are buying.

A good deal has been made of the assets. It is said that we have the assets against the liabilities which appear, for instance, on page 38 of this Sessional Paper. I would bring to the notice of the Government that I regard some of these assets as very questionable. For instance, "Sundry outstanding accounts $43,838,831.44." It is supposed that we are getting something there in the way of assets worth that amount of money, nearly $44,000,000. I would not care to have the contract of collecting these sundry accounts that are possibly forty years old and have been carried along in this way to make a showing, and are now passed over to us as a good asset. This company, Mr. Chairman, has been in dire distress for many years. If the company had an asset to its credit of $43,000,000 surely an effort would have been made to collect it and apply it to the financing of the company. Instead of that, the company comes begging to the Government for money. I would bring to the notice, particularly of financial members, that I doubt very much whether this asset of nearly $44,000,000 is of any value. Many of the other assets that we are asked to consider seriously are of the same age. We are told that there are outstanding calls on capital stock not collected. If the company goes to pieces and the road is sold I would not like to have to try to collect those calls. And yet they are set out seriously as an asset that the Canadian people can collect.

I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that this is a very much bigger transaction than hon. gentlemen are disposed to regard it, and that we should give it our most earnest consideration. Perhaps it has been too often asked, but I do not think it would be unreasonable in view of what has been said about this transaction to ask the Government if they have looked it up—that is, apart from the stocks altogether, for I can understand that they cannot say exactly how much they have to pay for the stocks, as part of them are to be arbitrated—but the claims against the physical assets of the road are laid down in black and white, and the Government ought to know exactly how much they are. I think they should tell the committee and the people how much exactly these outstanding claims against the material assets of the company amount to in dollars.

Mr. ROWELL: I must confess to a feeling of surprise at the principle my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) has laid down with reference to the ownership of property. I have always been under the impression that I owned a house, but I have never held it free from mortgage since I bought it. Notwithstanding that I have never had any doubt about my ownership, nor has anybody else so far as I am aware.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does not my hon. friend know, as a lawyer, that the legal estate in that house is absolutely in the mortgagee?

Mr. ROWELL: I know that, technically, the legal estate goes to the mortgagee.

Mr. McKENZIE: Absolutely.

Mr. ROWELL: But that does not change the fact as to who is the real owner of the property. The mortgagee has only his claim upon the house, which may be paid when it becomes due. Therefore all that my hon. friend has said amounts to this, that we are buying a property which according to this statement represents an investment in road and equipment of $434,990,999; that there are certain charges and obligations upon that property; and that in acquiring the stock of the company we get the benefit of the equity, that is, the difference between the value of the assets and of the liabilities. That is perfectly true, and no one has said anything to the contrary. There is not a railway on this continent, I do not think there is a railway in Great Britain, that is not in exactly the same situation. I do not know of any railway that has not bond issues outstanding. The Canadian Pacific Railway has such issues. It is the regular method of financing a road. The result is that there are of course these obligations outstanding against the road; but, as my hon. friends, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) pointed out so clearly yesterday, in valuing the stock the arbitrators must take into consideration the obligations of the company as well as its assets, because the stock has no value until all obligations are discharged.

If the company were liquidated, all these claims must be paid before the stockholders would receive a dollar. Therefore, in estimating the value of the stock, the arbitrators must take into consideration all the outstanding obligations, and they would find a value in the stock only if they reached the conclusion that, after considering the value of the assets, putting opposite them the value of the liabilities, there was still an equity in the road which would be represented by the stock in the road, and they would fix the value of that equity. That seems to be a perfectly clear position as has already been outlined by my colleagues. That is the situation in this case. The arbitrators are to determine, after considering the assets and the liabilities, what value attaches to those stocks which give us control of the road, and they must consider every one of the items which are set out in this schedule. My hon. friend has referred to one particular item, and he has questioned whether that asset is worth a hundred cents on the dollar. I do not know the details of that item, but what I say to my hon. friend is that the arbitrators must go into that; they must look into those assets and those liabilities, and evidence will be submitted by the Government with reference to this. The agreement will provide that the Government shall have full access to all the books of the company, and to all its accounts, in order that the Government may prepare its case. In addition, during the period that intervenes between the execution of the agreement and the making of the award, the management of the company will be in the hands of a committee of management, two of the members of which will be appointed by the Government and two by the Grand Trunk, these four to appoint a fifth. Therefore, the Government will have the fullest opportunity to investigate the value of all these assets, every item in the schedule, to investigate all the liabilities, to check them up, to ascertain if they have been fully disclosed and to lay all this information before the arbitrators in order that they may find the value of the stock. Then a further provision has been inserted in the letter, and will be embodied in the agreement to protect the Government against any possible liability cropping up after the award is made. While the Government will have an opportunity of some months to investigate all the books, to check up every liability, to see that everything is fully disclosed, yet, even after the award is made, if they find within three months, when they are in full possession of the road, any liability which has not been disclosed—the matter is referred back to the Board of Arbitrators, which is kept in existence for that period—for reconsideration, and it will be their duty to modify their award in so far as they feel that this liability calls for a modification. Therefore, the Government has protected the situation on every point to meet the case which my hon. friend has suggested.

Just one word with reference to the evidence which would go before the arbitrators. My hon. friend has said that he thinks the arbitrators would be bound, I judge from his observations, to determine value on the market value.

Mr. McKENZIE: I said that would be evidence.

Mr. ROWELL: I think it is open to argument that it is evidence that can be submitted to the arbitrators. Personally I do not question that. I think it is open to the arbitrators, as the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) has said, to receive any evidence which they believe will enable them to ascertain value. But I point out to my hon. friend, in addition to the considerations presented by the Minister of the Interior, why that evidence would be unreliable, why that evidence would not be good evidence on which to base an award. The price at which you can sell 100 shares or 200 shares or 500 shares of stock on a market is absolutely no criterion as to the price at which you can sell $100,000,000 in shares. You may have a market that will absorb a few shares; but if you commence to put tens of thousands of shares on the market, you completely demoralize it, and the price sinks down, as any one who knows anything of the conditions of a stock market will realize.

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend knows that you can glut any market of anything.

Mr. ROWELL: If you are selling a few shares of stock, say 100 shares, then I will concede to my hon. friend that the selling price on the stock market might be a very important consideration; but when you are selling shares involving nearly $200,000,000, you have a wholly different proposition. The price at which 10, or 100, or 1,000 shares might be sold on the market is no criterion of the market price of this larger block in case you put it on the market. What I would submit to my hon. friend is that the real evidence as to the value of the shares will depend upon two considerations; first, the value of the assets as against the liabilities, and second, the earnings of the company. Because it is only out of the earnings, present or prospective, that dividends can be paid. Therefore, the question of earnings would be the most important consideration which the arbitrators would be called upon to take into account in determining the value of the stock, plus the value of the assets and the liabilities. As my hon. friend has mentioned, the arbitrators would be the judges of the evidence to be admitted to enable them to arrive at a determination of value.

Just one or two other observations and I am through, not in answer to my hon. friend, but in answer to an observation of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding).

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand the President of the Council stood up to answer my question. His speech is very nice, but I should like an answer.

Mr. ROWELL: I understood my hon. friend had finished.

Mr. McKENZIE: I had finished, but I had finished by asking a question.

Mr. ROWELL: I was going to answer an observation of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's.

Mr. McKENZIE: And come back to my question?

Mr. ROWELL: I thought I had answered my hon. friend's question.

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend must have forgotten what I said, or I must have been very stupid. What I asked my hon. friend was: How much money have we to pay to get a clear title to the physical assets of the road that we are going to buy?

Mr. ROWELL: If the Government wanted to clear off the obligations existing, so as to have a road wholly free from any obligations, and that no railway in this country possesses——

Mr. McKENZIE: The Intercolonial is absolutely free. Put this road in the position of the Intercolonial.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend will find the obligations set out on pages 38 and 39.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not paid for adding up those obligations, as the minister is.

Mr. ROWELL: I am under the impression that my hon. friend is better paid than the minister. I think if my hon. friend will undertake that addition, the compensation will be equal to the work, and he will find all the obligations set out on those pages.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is the best answer the minister will give?

Mr. ROWELL: I cannot give any more. The liabilities are all set out on those pages.

Mr. McKENZIE: Any ordinary man looking over these figures cannot be sure he has got them right, because things are so mixed up that there is danger of making a mistake, but if we can get the information from a member of the Government we can assume that it is right.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend is just as capable as I am of reading English, and perhaps some other language in addition. Take the 4 per cent guaranteed stock, for instance. There is no necessity for our ever redeeming that. All we have to do is to pay the 4 per cent on it, but if we desired to redeem it we would have to pay such a price as the holders would be prepared to accept. We are entitled to redeem this stock at par at any time after a period of thirty years.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is not what I was speaking of. Take the first item on page 39, for instance, second mortgage equipment bonds. That is against the equipment, I suppose. What would it amount to if we had to pay off that?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend will see that the first item of $241,257,000 we do not have to pay. We will have to pay, of course, 4 per cent on whatever amount the arbitrators fix for the first, second and third preference and the common stocks. That is all we will have to pay on these items. The funded debt of $155,000,000 is a permanent obligation. If we wished to retire it, and the parties were prepared to accept par for it, we would have to pay $155,000,000. It may be they would be prepared to take less than par; I cannot say. It is a funded obligation perpetual in its character, bearing a certain rate of interest. Nobody could say what we could get it for at the present time, but there is a provision in the agreement whereby we can retire it at par at the end of thirty years, or any time thereafter if we wish to do so. Then the next item, second mortgage equipment bonds, Northern third mortgage, Canada Atlantic bonds, and so on, amounting to $18,000,000 odd—we could redeem those in accordance with the terms of the securities. The next is an advance by the Canadian Government. That is an obligation of the company to us. The other obligations we could retire in accordance with the terms set out on the face of the securities. I cannot add them together without taking into consideration the character of each. You cannot give a total in that sense, because the nature of the obligation is different, as the Minister of the Interior so clearly pointed out this afternoon; but all the information is contained there.

[Mr. Rowell.]

Coming now to the observation of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) he said he believed the people of this country were against the Government going on with this proposal. I notice in to-day's issue of the Toronto Globe a short editorial entitled "Liberalism and Public Ownership," and my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) and possibly some other members on the other side may be interested in hearing what the Globe says.

Mr. McKENZIE: It has no effect on me.

Mr. ROWELL: The editorial says:

> The general feeling of opposition to public ownership in Quebec, which is largely responsible for the opposition of the Liberal party to the acquisition of the Grand Trunk, is utterly at variance with the feeling of Liberals in Ontario and the western provinces. The people of Ontario, irrespective of party lines, are strongly in favour of the coupling up of the Grand Trunk with the Canadian National system.

I believe that fairly represents the opinion of the people of Ontario and Western Canada.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is the opinion of one man sitting behind a curtain at a little desk in the Globe office. We do not know who he is at all.

Mr. ROWELL: Quite so, but as the paper supports my hon. friends on the other side of the House it is an indication of the feeling in Ontario. This is the feeling in Ontario and Western Canada—I do not profess to speak for the feeling of the province of Quebec——

Mr. McKENZIE: The Globe does not always speak for Ontario, I am sorry to say.

Mr. ROWELL: No, sometimes it is right, and sometimes it is wrong. In this case I believe it is right.

Mr. TOBIN: What about the Montreal Star?

Mr. ROWELL: The editorial proceeds:

> The country has on its hands a great mileage of unprofitable railways on the borders of settlement which may not in our time earn interest upon the capital invested. The only hope of preventing a continuous drain of the national revenue for the payment of railway deficits is by the incorporation in the National railway system of a road such as the Grand Trunk, which taps the rich traffic-producing areas of Quebec and Ontario, and has an established long haul traffic between the seaboard and the interior of the United States and Canada.

I believe that statement fairly represents the feeling of the great majority of the people of Ontario and Western Canada, irrespective of party. Liberals and Conservatives alike recognize the national necessity of acquiring this road, and are prepared to support the policy of the Government in acquiring it. There are only three possible alternatives. First, the liquidation of the road. The Grand Trunk could go into a receiver's hands as the Grand Trunk Pacific has, that is a possibility, because the Grand Trunk has admitted it cannot continue to discharge its obligations in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I do not believe the people of Canada are prepared for that or desire to see it brought about. Second, there is the possibility of the road going into the hands of the Canadian Pacific. I do not believe the people of Canada are prepared to have their whole railway system in the hands of one corporation, no matter how efficient that corporation may be.

Mr. McCREA: Why not?

Mr. ROWELL: The people of Canada are not prepared to have the whole transportation system of this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific in the hands of any one corporation and be subjected to the control that that corporation might exercise over the people by controlling all our transportation system. The third course is government ownership, the taking over of this road by the Government. Those are the only three courses open, and the last one is the one in the national interest and I believe has the support of an overwhelming majority of the people of this country.

Mr. McKENZIE: I asked, with the very best intentions and with a sincere desire for information to be enlightened, as to how much we have to pay in order to put this new road, if we are going to acquire it, in the same position as the Intercolonial. I mention the Intercolonial because there is no difficulty in understanding the situation there. The road is owned by the Government and there is no claim of any kind against it. My hon. friend (Mr. Rowell) made a very clever speech, as he always can make, but, as we say in common parlance in Nova Scotia, kept away from the pig as far as he could. On page 39, if I can trust my knowledge of figures, I find that we have to pay $504,629,211.93. We have to pay that anyhow before we have the road clear.

Mr. ROWELL: No, my hon. friend will see that included in that figure is all the preference and common stock. There is $116,000,000 of the common stock alone, and the first, second and third preference, amount in all to about $63,000,000 or $64,000,000. So that you commence with $184,000,000 taken off. We do not have to pay that. All we will have to pay is whatever the arbitrators may fix as the value of that $184,000,000 or $185,000,000 of stock. You take that off to start with.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And then take off the current liabilities and the advances to controlled companies. All these things are balanced on the other side. They are just cross entries. Even in the case of the Intercolonial there are current liabilities, but there are current assets against them. The same is true here. There are current liabilities of some $22,000,000, and on the other side current assets of some $51,000,000. So that we do not have to pay out of the Treasury of Canada that $22,000,000. If we wanted to clear the road off, which we could not likely do as the bonds are perpetual, we would have to pay the $35,000,000 odd, the $5,000,000, the $173,000,000 and the $60,000,000.

Mr. CAHILL: What is this item of $43,000,000? Would that include the claim of the Grand Trunk against the Grand Trunk Pacific on account of advances?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Scarcely, because it is an asset.

Mr. CAHILL: I am referring to the claim of the Grand Trunk against the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what the details of that $43,000,000 are but I presume it would include any claim provided it was not a set-off. It will also include cash on hand and amounts owing for other than traffic. In a word, the company's gross earnings in a year would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $60,000,000. At any single time there are tremendous current assets. A detailed statement could be given of the $43,838,000 current assets, showing just what they are. Perhaps it is in the book, but if it is not the statement can be secured.

Mr. CAHILL: That is very important. It is quite an item, and if that $43,000,000 is merely an offset against the Grand Trunk Pacific it would not be considered as an asset in connection with the assets of the Grand Trunk, because there would be no possibility of collecting it. Another item is outstanding traffic accounts, $1,500,000. That would be freight receipts not in yet; but the $43,000,000 could not be current traffic items. It is a large amount. If it means Grand Trunk Pacific obligations it is of very little value in this transaction, and when you talk about liabilities you must take into account the Grand Trunk Pacific liabilities.

Mr. McKENZIE: From the amount of $504,629,211.93, which I mentioned as appearing on page 39, the minister says there is something to be deducted. But on page 51 of the blue-book there appear obligations that must be paid off. I read from the book:

Besides the guarantees to the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk Railway Company have guaranteed the following:—

Atlantic and St. Lawrence railroad—5% on Capital Stock of $5,484,000 as rental.

Buffalo and Lake Huron railway—£70,000 or $340,666 rental, £42,500 or $206,833 of which takes precedence to Grand Trunk railway 1st mortgage bonds, and balance after 2nd mortgage bonds.

Central Vermont—The Grand Trunk railway guarantee the interest on the bonds by traffic contract up to an amount equal to 30% of the gross receipts from interchange business.

Southern New England railway—Under construction. Information at hand is very incomplete. In May, 1916, the Central Vermont railway got authority to issue $30,000,000 of bonds, bearing guarantee of Grand Trunk Railway Company, but what portion, if any, of this issue was made, it cannot be said.

Detroit, Grand Haven and Milwaukee railway—The Grand Trunk Railway Company guarantees, principal and interest of all the 6% bonds (consolidated and equipment) of which $4,763,000 are held by the public. The rest are owned by the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Grand Trunk Western railway—The Grand Trunk Railway Company have guaranteed unconditionally the interest on the $14,999,720 1st mortgage 4% bonds of this company, and have assumed all the $3,872,000 5% bonds of the Grand Trunk Junction railway, of which they have exchanged £606,000 or $2,949,200 worth for Grand Trunk railway 4% consolidated debenture stock, which leaves $922,800 worth in the hands of the public.

Pontiac, Oxford and Northern railroad—The Grand Trunk railway have assumed the $400,000 of 6% 1st mortgage bonds, due July 1, 1916, of this company. It will be noted these have matured and stand unpaid. The interest of these still appears in the income account of company, so it is assumed these securities are standing in statu quo pending settlement.

Detroit and Toledo Shore Line railroad—Jointly and severally with the Toledo, St. Louis and Western railroad the Grand Trunk Western railway have guaranteed the $3,000,000 of 4% 1st mortgage bonds of this company for principal and interest. This is not a direct guarantee of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but might affect them as such, through their ownership of all stock, part of bonds, and guarantee of all bonds of the Grand Trunk Western railway.

Chicago, Detroit and Canada G.T.R. Junction railway—The Grand Trunk Railway Company guarantee, under a lease of this road, interest on bonds of this road, but they (the G.T.R.Co.) own all these bonds; also guarantee interest of 4% on the $1,095,000 capital stock issue, but the Grand Trunk railway own $522,315 of this stock, which leaves $572,685 of the stock in the hands of the public, carrying the Grand Trunk railway's guarantee for 4% interest. Fixed rentals for roads leased, which do not imply guarantees are not included above.

There is a long string of guarantees running up into the hundreds of millions of dollars which are claims against this property that we are going to buy and which, I think, we should very well consider and know something about before rushing into this great bargain which the President of the Council tells us we must hasten to grasp.

I must point out to the committee the language of the president of this company as to their financial standing. We must not shut our eyes to the estimate which this company put on their own standing a short time ago. If we have railways that are not paying in the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern and the Intercolonial, I do not know that we are going to better our position very much by taking another road which does not pay. This is a letter written to the Prime Minister of Canada by the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company bearing date the 13th August, 1918:

Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada,
Dashwood House, 9 New Broad Street,
London, E.C. 2, 13th August, 1918.

Dear Sir Robert Borden.—In reply to your letter of the 9th instant I need not say that my colleagues and myself are very disappointed at the expression of your opinion that neither of our offers is likely to be accepted; offers which were only made in the expectation that the Government would assist us in meeting payments falling due in October.

I should be obliged if you would kindly tell me before you leave for Canada what in your view can be done to meet the serious position in the company's finances which will arise at the end of September, which has been fully explained to you and which must be dealt with in the beginning of that month.

Yours faithfully,
Alfred W. Smithers.

The Right Hon. Sir Robert L. Borden, Savoy Hotel, Strand, W.C.

This is the great bonanza that we are told the Canadian people are going to get—a company which was on the verge of bankruptcy a year ago and, as far as I know, is on the verge of bankruptcy to-day, a company which is not making any money. And we are told, forsooth, that this is the saviour of the systems that we have on hand. As reasonable men representing the Canadian people we have a right to get all possible information that we can in connection with this matter before we bind the Canadian people to the bargain. I am sorry to say that an effort is being made on the part of the Government to frighten hon. members on this side of the House, if they make any criticism, by directing this discussion into political lines altogether. We are to be frightened away from saying anything. "Oh, you are against public ownership!" Whether I am for or against public ownership I have the duty, standing here representing a portion of the people, of ascertaining what this business is and whether it is good or bad business. I am not now expressing any opinion on public ownership. Then they say: "Oh, you are for the Canadian Pacific; we know where you are; you are representing the big interests and you want to monopolize the whole thing for the Canadian Pacific." Nothing of the kind. That does not detract from any honest opinion that should be expressed on the floor of the House. Public ownership I suppose is good enough in its way but is it not wise for the people in anything they undertake to profit by the experience of their neighbours and by their own experience?

We have on hand now the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental, the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. As my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) said this afternoon, that is certainly a sufficient mileage with which to experiment and to get some knowledge as to whether public ownership is a good thing or not. I have no opinion to offer on the subject just now, but it seems to me that my duty to my people is to get for them the very best service available at the least possible cost. That is my conception of my duty to my constituents—the best public service at the least possible cost, not by paying high rates or exorbitant amounts for the mere whim of saying we own a railway. It will not keep the pot boiling for one minute, it will not bring any consolation or happiness to any home in Canada to say that we own a railway. I think that the principle I have laid down —the best possible service for the least possible money—is the principle to be followed.

After asking for certain information I do not propose at this stage to detain the Committee any longer. I would ask the Government, before we reach a further stage, to give us the result of the last railway year of the Intercolonial. I understand that the railway year and the financial year are two distinct things. I believe that the railway year is the calendar year whereas the financial year begins on the first day of April. Therefore, I would ask for the result of the last railway year of the Transcontinental, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific, including the portion of the railway year when we had it ourselves under receivership. It should not take long to get that information. It is information which will enable hon. gentlemen to know what sort of a business we are launching upon and what sort of a business we have been doing for at least one year. This would include what we have expended in betterments, the ordinary working of the roads and the earnings of the roads, and would show exactly how we stand on these operations. If that information is given I will have no occasion, as far as I am concerned, to detain the progress of the Committee any further.

Mr. J. D. REID: The information that the hon. gentleman asks for I will have for him to-morrow, but I hardly think it would be fair to take the last season's operations in connection with the Intercolonial, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern and use them as arguments as indicating the position of any of these railways in normal times. During last year all of the railways were subjected to very high operating costs owing to the McAdoo award. The increased cost of labour was very high. It was not only the labour; it was fuel and every item that one could mention in connection with the operation of railways, and the cost was very much higher than in normal times.

And the freight rates were not increased. In fact, if I remember rightly, part of the time, I think it was last year, as a result of the McAdoo award and other causes, the cost of operating the roads was increased, whereas the freight rates were not increased at all. It would hardly be fair to take the cost of the operation of those roads for the past year and on that basis judge what is likely to happen in the case of the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Northern, and the Grand Trunk Pacific in the future. So far as the Intercolonial is concerned, prior to the war it was doing very well. The same condition was true of the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern, but for reasons I have stated conditions last year were abnormal and it should not be taken as a fair year in discussing this matter.

With reference to the Grand Trunk railway I want to emphasize this point: I have taken the matter up with the president of that company personally and have had him state in writing the condition of the Grand Trunk Railway system. That letter is as follows:

Montreal, October 16, 1919.

Replying to your inquiry of this morning: the Grand Trunk Railway system, including both Canadian and American lines, is in excellent physical condition, in respect to track, bridges, and buildings, and will, in the immediate future, require only normal expenditures for its maintenance. The same remarks apply to the condition of its motive power and equipment. The condition of the Grand Trunk Railway system in these respects will compare favourably with that of any railroad, either in Canada or the United States, having the same character and density of traffic.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) Howard G. Kelly.

Mr. McKENZIE: Did my hon. friend expect him to say anything else when he was selling the road?

Mr. J. D. REID: This statement is in writing over his own signature, and he will have to prove it before the arbitrators. In addition to that, I may say that our own Canadian National railway experts have been travelling over the Grand Trunk and they report in verbal conversations to me that the system is really in good condition and would compare with any of our own systems. It must be remembered that the Intercolonial ran down during the last four or five years for the reason that we could not get rails or ties. Neither could we get the men necessary to keep the road in the condition in which it was prior to the war.

Mr. McKENZIE: So much the worse for government ownership.

Mr. J. D. REID: However, we kept the Intercolonial in as good a state as the other roads, which could not get rails either.

With reference to the information that the hon. gentleman has asked for, I can get it for him in a very short time in the morning, and I therefore wish to ask 11 p.m. if he entertains any objection to the committee reporting the resolution so that the Bill may be introduced forthwith. The measure has to go through its first and second readings and then be considered in committee when the matter, of course, can come up for discussion again, but by the acceptance of my suggestion the proceedings can be advanced. That will not interfere with the getting of any information which has been requested; there is no desire at all to hurry the Bill; I merely make the suggestion with a view of advancing the proceedings.

Mr. McKENZIE: I may say to the minister that I usually have a great deal of trouble in getting any information after I have allowed him to cross the bridge.

Mr. J. D. REID: Not intentionally, I hope.

Mr. McKENZIE: I allowed the Bill to go through the other day with the promise of the leader of the Government that I would get certain information from the Minister of Railways. I got some of that information, but only about five per cent of what I was looking for. Now I am afraid, if I put myself in the same position again and allow the resolution to pass there will not be very much rush in the minister's office to get the information sought.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Bill will have to be considered in committee and we shall be exactly in the same position, as regards discussion, that we now are, because the measure contains the same clauses that are in the resolution. I think I can assure the hon. gentleman that I will send a messenger down by twelve o'clock to-morrow with the information he has asked for this evening. Moreover, I will not ask that the Bill be reported from committee until the hon. gentleman is perfectly satisfied that all the information he has asked for, or that he may want at that time, is given to him.

Mr. PELLETIER: In rising to speak on this important question, I wish to state at the outset that I shall be very brief, and that I shall speak upon my own personal responsibility and not assume to voice the views of the Liberal party as a party. A few months ago the House of Commons was the scene of many interesting incidents during the discussion of the Bill by which the Canadian Northern railway was to become national property. That Bill was discussed at length and the Government saw fit to apply the closure in order to put it through. I sincerely hope that we shall not have the same experience this year, though this measure is no better than the one I referred to, and is absolutely along the same lines. It calls for the taking over by the Canadian Government of a certain amount of stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, together with the outstanding and other liabilities that the Government proposes to create for the benefit of those who feel they can no longer operate the railroad without being compelled to show a deficit. In other words, this measure provides for the granting to certain individuals, as in the case of the Canadian Northern, of certain sums of money for the supposed value of stocks in an enterprise which is on the verge of bankruptcy. That is to say, the Government seemingly has contracted for the rescuing of all the unfortunate railway companies in Canada by taking them over and compelling the country at large to pay a bonus to their shareholders. In the case of the Canadian Northern, the legislation enacted made provision for the granting of a certain sum of money to the shareholders; it amounted, through appraisal by arbitrators, to the sum of $8,000,000—whereas in this case, lest the shareholders be prodigal, the gratuity is to be given in the form of a pension. The Government will pay four per cent on the value specified by the arbitrators. Mr. Chairman, we need not worry; those people will not be fleeced, and they will realize that the Grand Trunk's remains will be worth more than its living body was.

The resolution under discussion specifies that the Government shall pay interest at four per cent on £12,500,000 of guaranteed bonds; and the same rate of interest on £31,000,000 of debentures.

Further, the arbitrators who will determine the value of the stock to be bought will force the people to pay another sum of about $90,000,000, which means a total of about $210,000,000 on which we will have to pay interest at the rate of 4 per cent for 30 years, with the understanding that after that period everything will be paid at par value. This means $8,400,000 of interest to be added to the ordinary amount of interest that we have to pay on our consolidated debt.

There will be an annual deficit on all the lines, for it is a recognized fact that a government cannot operate a railroad without loss; and when the country is overloaded with debts of all kinds is it conceivable that the Government would throw this additional enormous responsibility upon the shoulders of the people? Why is the Government contemplating buying the Grand Trunk as it did the Canadian Northern? Because the Grand Trunk cannot be operated at a profit; because, as the Grand Trunk Pacific did a few months ago, the company will throw up its hands and say: "Take the railway; we can no longer operate it without loss, we can do nothing with it." In the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific the liabilities were already the Government's and there was no risk on the part of the company in throwing up its hands; but in this case it is quite different. There are financiers who want to get something for their stocks, and that explains the different mode of procedure. For over a year negotiations have been going on in England, and people, knowing how those negotiations would end, have been buying stock in order to receive a pension from the Government, as I stated a few minutes ago.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that all discussion is absolutely useless, the Government having decided to put the Bill through on account of so many of its friends being interested, and that notwithstanding all opposition the measure will carry. However, as the responsibility that will be thrown upon the shoulders of the people will be felt for generations, I wish most earnestly to protest against such squandering of public funds. The country has not the means to rescue companies unable to pay dividends on their watered stock. Our national debt is large enough to-day to teach us to be prudent and economical, and we should not consider the nationalization of our railways at the present time.

The nationalization of public utilities is a dangerous move for three reasons: First, because it is a step towards Socialism; second, because it is a guarantee of inefficiency; third, because it is ruinous to the country. We cannot turn around without meeting some one propounding the utterly foolish possibilities of Socialism. The state of war between capital and labour—which the National Industrial Conference will not change into peace—opens a wide path to all excesses of Socialism. We already have in this country a party having in its platform the nationalization of all the natural sources of wealth and the public ownership of all public utilities. That means more than the Government is doing at present, but the actual movement of the Government is the beginning of the realization of that most dangerous policy. All the revolutionary movements that the world witnesses to-day are fomented by the fervent advocates of public ownership and nationalization. I understand perfectly, Mr. Chairman, that this Government does not intend to go that far—at least I hope so. I realize that the taking over of the Grand Trunk is only a particular detail in a carefully laid plan to relieve a certain number of financiers in straits and anxious to get rid of a non-paying business. Unfortunately the method adopted by my hon. friends to your right, Mr. Chairman, is precisely an encouragement to the socialistic platforms elaborated by certain organizations.

The nationalization of railways in this country will serve as a precedent for further steps in that direction, and if carried out as planned, efforts will be made to nationalize the telegraph and telephone systems; then will follow the mining lands; water powers will become the state's property—and perhaps after that achievement the advocates of public ownership will try to bring the farming lands, as the largest source of wealth, under the control of the state. Evidently this will not be done within a year's time, but in these matters when it begins nobody knows when and where it will end. The Government started the movement by the nationalization of the Canadian Northern, notwithstanding the opposition from my side of the House. That transaction was asolutely detrimental to the best interests of Canada, and future generations will have to bear the whole weight of that piece of political railroading. A second stone will be added to our socialistic edifice by the taking over of the Grand Trunk. With those two as precedents all our social reformers, our public ownership advocates, and our nationalizers of natural sources of wealth and public utilities will set to work and make a propaganda that will at some future date open the eyes of the Government.

And what is the practical result of this nationalization? Inefficiency, patronage increase, and a heavier burden on the people's shoulders. We have had national railways for many years. The Government has operated its own railways, and the service cannot be compared with that given by private companies. Other countries have national railways and, generally, those railways are from every point of view the worst. In France, there are six different railway companies, and of the six the state-owned lines are the worst. The service is bad and the relations between passengers and employees are absolutely uncordial, for the railway employees being civil servants, know that the complaints of an ordinary client will fall on deaf ears. In Italy the railways are generally state-owned and the service is absolutely inadequate. In Germany the railways are state property, but up to the time of the Peace Treaty the whole service was under military rule, and you may imagine, Mr. Chairman, the respect and kindness shown by the military officers to the civilian passengers. On all except international lines passengers are treated like animals, locked in their respective compartments, and the doors thrown open only at destination. In Belgium, where the state railways are administered with the greatest care, the service is not up to the standard and a deficit is shown at the end of the fiscal year. And those countries are old, their population is dense, the amount of traffic per mile is much greater than in Canada, yet everywhere the service is bad and the practical results are indicated by deficits.

But it is not necessary to go abroad to see how state railways are administered. Let us consider our own roads. I know that on the Intercolonial Railway, which is owned and operated by the Canadian Government, complaints are filed by the hundred to which no satisfactory answers are given. Let me state one instance, Mr. Chairman, where a carload of butter left a certain station and when it reached destination a certain number of boxes had disappeared; a claim was filed, the ordinary official red tape began to work, and the claimant never received a satisfactory answer. This is not an extraordinary occurrence, but it happens every day.

It is only natural; it is inherent in every Government-owned and operated public service; it is the case in every country in the world, and it would be childish to think that it could be better in Canada where the patronage evil is perhaps worse than anywhere else and the political red tape more intricate. To have good service on a railroad or on any public utility, to make it pay, to avoid leakage and graft, to have efficiency and competence, the private company's administration is required, because the private company has a direct interest in the revenues of the public utility. Under the Government's administration, it is the "don't-give-a-damn" habit with the necessary results.

Finally the nationalization of railways is ruinous to the country. Even if the taking over of these roads was done on sound business principles, it would be ruinous in the end on account of the deficit that every fiscal year would bring about. But when the roads are taken over under conditions such as those under which the Canadian Northern was taken over and those under which the Grand Trunk will be taken over, it is more than ruinous, it is almost criminal.

Let us review briefly the overwhelmning liabilities of the country. Our debt is actually $1,900,000,000. Our estimated revenue for the current year will be $282,000,000. We shall have to pay $115,000,000 in interest, and there will be about $40,000,000 in pensions and many other permanent necessary expenses. The Budget for the current year amounts to $610,000,000. We may admit that war expenses will not be as heavy next year, but interest, pensions, cost of administration, and the usual railway deficits will amount to more than our revenues. The Grand Trunk will cost about $200,000,000, and the 4 per cent interest to be paid upon that amount will still further increase the amount of interest to be paid. The report of the Department of Railways and Canals for last year shows that the total Canadian National railway expenditure was $70,113,667.61 while the total revenue amounted to $27,240,956.87. If I understand these figures, they show a deficit of $42,872,710.74. Yet we heard the Minister of Railways say just a few minutes ago that the Intercolonial had done nicely prior to 1914. Can we expect that the coming year's operations will be more successful? Can we expect that the Grand Trunk lines, which a private company has not been able to operate successfully, will bring a revenue to the Government? Can we expect that the railway deficit will decrease by our acquiring non-paying lines? Surely no one expects that result. On the contrary, we all know that the deficits will be larger and that we shall have a poorer service. What can be done to solve the problems with which we are confronted to-day? The Government is giving millions to individuals residing abroad for a railroad on the verge of bankruptcy.

During the war the Government said that there was and would be nothing too good for our soldiers; that their sacrifices would be appreciated; that they and their dependents would be properly taken care of. Now that the war is over, they come to the Government and say: Make good your promises; we need a certain sum of money to re-establish ourselves and our families. What shall we do? Shall we refuse their request on the ground that the Canadian people have too heavy a load of debts to carry? Shall we tell them that we would be glad to grant them what they want, but that the finances of the country could not permit such an outlay of funds? We may give them this answer; but they will say that if we can find millions of dollars to rescue failing railway companies which have received enormous grants from the Government in order to enable them to pay dividends to their shareholders, we may find a few millions to repay the services of men who have offered their lives and blood for the country's good name and liberty.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say just one thing. The Government is forcing upon the people of Canada a liability that will overburden them for years to come; it will use a majority that represents neither the majority nor the mind of the people, and this will aggravate the unrest actually existing; it is bound to increase the cost of living by increasing the burden of taxation and crippling considerably the operation of an important railroad. For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I most earnestly protest against the taking over of the road; and considering that it is against the interests of the people, I shall take pleasure in voting against the adoption of this resolution and the passage of the Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: I want to have a distinct understanding from the minister as to when we may expect the information for which I am asking, and I would like to add to what I have already stated that I think it would be well to put in concise form the real obligations of the road under consideration, apart from the stock altogether, that is, the obligations that appear on pages 38 and 39, and also on pages 51 and 52 of the blue-book which was put into the hands of hon. members yesterday. What is the real amount in dollars and cents of the obligations we are assuming in connection with the other liabilities against the road, should this transaction go through? The minister will remember and will find in Hansard the other question that I asked. The minister said that it was not a fair comparison; that those were not favourable years. I am sure that he is submitting his evidence, at all events as far as the hon. gentlemen sitting on your right are concerned, to a favourable and sympathetic jury, and I am sure they will take fully into consideration every element in the facts that can be construed favourably to the minister. Whether the facts are agreeable or disagreeable, whether we are making money or losing money, nothing should be concealed from the House or from the people in regard to the business of the people, particularly as concerns those roads. If the case is bad, we ought to know it; if a patient is sick unto death, it will be well for him to prepare for his eternal rest and know exactly his position. If this country is on the verge of a smash by reason of bad financing, we might as well know it and prepare for the worst. I think it is only fair to let us know just exactly how we stand in connection with the information for which I am asking. If the minister will undertake that at the opening of the House to-morrow we shall have that information, I have not the slightest inclination to interfere with the progress of this Bill. Knowing all the time that I am against it and purpose voting against it at every stand, I do not wish to take up time beyond what is necessary.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member is very clear in what he has just suggested, and I can assure him that I will get all the information and hand it to him before the House meets to-morrow; otherwise I will not ask him to proceed with the matter any further. He is absolutely right that the House is entitled to all information in connection with the operation of the roads that he has mentioned, or any other roads.

The information has all been made public, and it is simply a question of getting it from the records. It would take only a few moments' time. I would ask the hon. member if he has any objection to this: He will remember that I gave notice to-day of an amendment to this resolution, as follows:

That the following proposed amendment be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the proposed resolutions in respect to the acquisition by His Majesty of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada:—

"12. That the Government may make, out of any unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund, any expenditure necessary in the preparation for, and conduct of, the arbitration proceeding herein provided for."

In the resolution as it stands we omitted to make monetary provision for the arbitration proceedings as we went along, and I therefore gave notice of the amendment I have just read. I am advised by the Deputy Speaker that in order to have this amendment embodied in the resolution now before us it will be necessary to move that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again this day, when I will move:

That the order of the House that the House do go into Committee of the Whole to-morrow to consider a certain proposed amendment to the resolutions in respect to the acquisition by His Majesty of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada be rescinded.

If my hon. friend has no objection, I now move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again this day.

Mr. McKENZIE: One very serious objection I have to the proposed amendment is that it provides for moneys being utilized by the Government without having first been voted by Parliament. Now we have always fought against that. We have said that every dollar expended by the Government should appear in the Estimates and receive the sanction of Parliament. The minister will remember that a year or so ago he was obliged to withdraw a resolution of this kind and abandon the idea of getting money out of the consolidated revenue fund without it being specifically voted for the purpose for which it was to be expended. That, I think, is the right principle, that no moneys shall be expended except upon a vote of Parliament. The principle of the proposed amendment is that we should give a free hand to the minister to take money out of the consolidated revenue fund without any specific vote, and I am opposed to that.

Mr. J. D. REID: Under the circumstances I shall not press the matter further, but will found the Bill on the resolution now before the committee.

Resolution to report progress withdrawn.

Resolution for acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway system agreed to, on division, reported, read the first and second time on division, and concurred in.

Mr. J. D. REID thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 33, respecting the acquisition by His Majesty of the Grand Trunk Railway system.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty the House adjourned at 11.35 p. m.

Friday, October 17, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

SENATE BILL—FIRST READING.

Bill No. 32 (from the Senate) for the relief of Arthur LeRoy Eastcott.—Mr. Green.

OPIUM AND DRUG ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Newton W. Rowell (President of the Council), the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution,—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that every person who imports into or exports from Canada any coca leaves, cocaine or any of their salts or preparations, or any opium or its preparations or any opium alkaloids or their salts or preparations, without first obtaining a license therefor from the minister who is presiding over the Department of Health, shall be guilty of an offence, and shall be liable upon summary conviction to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars and costs, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or to both fine and imprisonment, and that these provisions shall be read as one with the Opium and Drug Act, chapter seventeen of the statutes of 1911, and anything in the said Act which is inconsistent with this resolution be repealed.

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps the President of the Council will explain if any material departure is suggested by this resolution from what the law now is, and if any particular thing gave rise to this new legislation.

Mr. ROWELL: As hon. members will recall, we now have an Act which was passed in 1911, which prohibits the importation of opium and drugs of the character mentioned in this resolution, except for scientific or medicinal purposes, and which provides certain penalties if they are imported without reasonable excuse. That Act has been very beneficial in its operation, but conditions have arisen which require further legislation. The United States have adopted very stringent regulations with reference to the importation of these drugs, and they are administering their Acts very strictly. Great Britain has done the same, and Japan and China have also taken strong action in connection with these matters.

It has appeared that the quantities imported into Canada have shown a very marked increase in recent years as the figures given to the House the other day indicate. In view of the situation and in order to exercise greater control over the importation and export of these drugs, in consultation with the Imperial Government, this Government in the month of May last passed Orders in Council prohibiting either the importation or the export of these drugs except under license granted by the Department of Trade and Commerce. By reason of the licenses which were thus provided for, a measure of control over the importation of these drugs has been secured which has proven highly beneficial, and it is the intention when this resolution is adopted, to found a Bill upon it to amend the existing Acts so as to provide that there shall be no importation or export of these drugs except under license to be granted by the proper Governmental authorities. The committee will be interested to learn the effect of requiring a license on the importation of these noxious drugs. The conclusion which the officers of the department have reached is that large quantities of these drugs which have been imported in recent years have not been imported for consumption in Canada, and that these large quantities do not indicate a corresponding increase in consumption, although there may be some increase in consumption. It is suggested that the object of importing through Canada is to get easy access into the United States, because of the strict regulations against importation into that country, and because it is easy to smuggle these drugs across the international boundary line.

I will give the House the figures showing the effects of the control exercised under license. As regards cocaine, for the fiscal year ending 31st of March 1919, 12,333 ounces were imported, whereas for the first three months under license, July August and September of this year, the quantity was only 1,544 ounces. The committee will see what a great reduction that means. As regards morphine, the quantity imported for the fiscal year ended the 31st March, 1919, was 30,087 ounces, whereas during the three months of license the quantity was reduced to 2,695 ounces, or approximately 10,000 ounces per year as compared with over 30,000 ounces. As regards crude opium, the quantity imported for the fiscal year ended the 31st March, 1919, was 34,263 pounds, and for the three months under license, 1,110 pounds, or approximately 4,440 pounds for the year as compared with 34,263 pounds. As regards opium powder, there is not so much of a change because only a small quantity was imported. For the fiscal year ended the 31st March, 1919, the quantity imported was 123 pounds, and for the three months under license, 23 pounds. Not only has the quantity of these drugs imported been, by the requiring of a license, remarkably reduced as the figures disclose; but the measure of control which the license gives over the druggist who imports the drug enables the department to follow the matter up and to require the druggist to show how he has disposed of the drugs imported. Moreover, even with this greatly reduced importation some druggists have not been able to show how their purchases have been disposed of. These cases will be followed up in order to see that any who are violating the law are punished in accordance with the provisions of the law.

At the Dominion Council of Health last week, representing the health departments of all the provinces of Canada, a strong resolution was passed urging the Government to take action in this matter. They went to the extent of urging absolute Governmental control, but that involves a great many considerations which would require careful thought. All we are asking for at the present time is legislation which will continue in effect the existing Orders in Council which were passed under the War Measures

Act and which require a license either to import or to export these particular drugs.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The Government is not in favour of public ownership of drugs?

Mr. ROWELL: If a proper system of handling can be worked out that would not be expensive, there may be a great deal to be said in favour of the Government's absolutely controlling the importation and export of these drugs.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is it true that the use of these drugs has largely increased in Ontario during the past year?

Mr. ROWELL: We have no evidence of that, and my advice from the officers of the Health Department is that there is no ground for concluding that the increased importation is due to any laws recently enacted in Ontario.

Resolution concurred in.

Hon. Newton W. Rowell thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 34, to amend the Opium and Drug Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Maclean the House went into Committee on the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Meat and Canned Foods Act, Chapter twenty-seven of the statutes of 1907, as amended by chapter thirty-three of the statutes of 1917, by providing (a) for the more exact definition of dry lobster meat and dry meat; (b) for a true and correct description of the contents of cans of fish or shell fish including the vernacular name and the minimum weight, to be plainly printed thereon and the name of the place where the same was packed; (c) for the size of cans for canning lobsters, the weight of content thereof, and that no other size is to be used without written permission first obtained; (d) for the correct labelling of all cans of fish or shellfish imported into Canada so as to indicate the kind and quality of their contents, the minimum weight of the contents, the place of origin, and the name and address of the person, firm or corporation by whom they are packed or by whom they are imported, provided that canned fish or canned shell-fish imported into Canada to be exported again need not be so labelled.

Mr. DUFF: Explain.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It will be remembered that a resolution in practically the same form as this was before the committee last session. The purpose of the resolution is to amend two sections of chapter 33 of the Acts of 1917 which prescribe the weight of lobster which can be packed in certain cans. One of the sections as it stands reads as follows:

A one-pound can, fourteen ounces, avoirdupois;
A three-quarter pound can, ten and one-half ounces, avoirdupois;
A half-pound can, seven ounces, avoirdupois;
A quarter-pound can, three and one-half ounces, avoirdupois.

The terms of the section I have just read were the result of a compromise on a Bill introduced in the House in the session of 1917. They did not represent the departmental view, nor the views of those engaged in the canning of lobsters, and it has been demonstrated, to the satisfaction of the department at least, that it is inadvisable to continue this section in its present form. It is stated in the Bill that a pound can shall contain fourteen ounces. The packers object to that, because they feel it gives a wrong impression to the public, and in many instances it has been charged that it permits fraudulent practice upon consumers. The Bill founded on this resolution will provide that lobsters must be packed in bona fide sized cans, 3, 6, 9, 12, or 16 ounces, and that the label on the can shall indicate the net minimum weight of the lobster meat contained in the can.

My investigations lead me to the conclusion that the amendments are desirable, and give only justice to those engaged in the industry. The canning of lobsters is much different from the canning of other fish. For instance, the packer always endeavours to put one or more whole lobsters in the can, with claws and tail, whereas in the case of tinned salmon or herring the contents may represent the meat of any number of fish. About 25 per cent of the cans of lobster packed in Canada represent three ounces of dry meat, and 60 per cent, 6 ounces of meat. The packers' experience extending over a great number of years is that cans containing 3 and 6 ounces best suit the public's needs, and any departure from that will work an injury to the industry, and be of no particular benefit to the public. The Bill before the House last year was referred to a committee, but for some reason which I do not know the committee never reported to the House. I hope the legislation will be accepted this session, and that we shall not be obliged to send the Bill to a committee. I might add that the legislation of 1917 required the adoption of a new size of lobster can. Now, lobster cans are standardized, and are made for that particular business. A lobster can is not made of the same material as a vegetable can, for instance. For the present season it has been impossible for the packers to get cans of the size required by the statute of 1917, and in any event leave will have to be given them for this season to continue to use the same sized cans as they used prior to 1917.

Mr. FIELDING: I think the existing law of 1917, mentioned by my hon. friend was found so embarrassing to the trade that the Government were obliged to make what practically amounted to amendments, by way of regulation, to conform to the custom of the trade. Then last session the matter was brought before the House with the view of enacting practically what is now proposed, or substantially the same thing. A committee had the matter under consideration. There was some difficulty about it, and they had not reached a conclusion when prorogation took place. One of the difficulties has been that under the existing law you use the expression "pound," "half-pound," and so on, and when you say a pound can shall contain only fourteen ounces you are practically saying something which it is not possible to carry out. It was alleged in some cases that you were deceiving the public. I think the general feeling of the committee and of the House will be that we are not so much concerned in the weight of the can, as that it shall be correctly stamped. Here we are getting away from the words "pound" and "half-pound" and adopting the present standards of packing without describing the tins as pound, half-pound, or anything else. The bulk of the trade is export, the market is well established, and the weight of the can is pretty well known. I think this legislation will meet the conditions of the trade, and is in the right direction.

Mr. DUFF: This resolution evidently does not refer to canned lobsters alone. I see it calls "for the correct labelling of all cans of fish or shellfish imported into Canada."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bill will also provide that all cans of fish imported into Canada shall comply with the requirements as regards the description of the contents. That is only right. Another provision will be that the contents of the can shall be stated on the label in respect of fish that is not shellfish.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What is the legal weight of a can of salmon?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think I can give my hon. friend that information just now. I shall endeavour to obtain it for him on the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: We should have that information. This relates to all fish, and if we are going to change the usual weights of salmon—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Oh, no; we are not changing the usual weights. This Bill does not propose any change in the weight of the contents of cans containing fish other than shellfish.

Mr. CAHILL: Will the present size of the can be altered? Will you use the can which in more honest days was reputed to contain a pound of lobster, and stamp on it "12 ounces," or will you alter the size of the can, so that a 12-ounce can shall be smaller than the 16-ounce can?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The purpose is that lobsters shall be put up in five different sizes of cans,—three, six, nine, twelve and sixteen ounces,—and they shall not be packed in cans of other sizes. The Bill also provides that the label must disclose the net weight of lobster meat contained in the cans.

Mr. CAHILL: Is the can now to be used for twelve ounces of lobster to be the same size as the can which has always been used to contain sixteen ounces of meat?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The twelve-ounce can must contain twelve ounces of meat. That must be the net weight of the meat, and if the can is not at present large enough it must be made larger.

Mr. FIELDING: The object, I take it, is to prevent any change in the sizes of cans, because the cans are standardized, and that is not merely a matter of convenience. These cans are of an established standard in the foreign markets. The essence of the Bill, I understand, is that the weight of the contents of the can shall be stamped on the can itself and not merely on the label, because in the trade the foreign dealer likes to put his own label on the cans. Lobsters are usually shipped in cans without labels. The intention is that the dry weight of the meat shall be stamped on the can, and if that is done, I do not see that there can be any injustice. The same standard of cans is retained for convenience, but there can be no attempt to deceive the public if the weight of the meat is correctly stamped on the can.

Mr. CAHILL: But you are using what was always regarded as a pound can. At least that was the case until 1917 when it was reduced to fourteen ounces, and now twelve, and probably next year ten ounces, according to the extent to which we may be able to deceive the buying public. We are going to use a pound can for twelve ounces and, as I understand the Bill, somewhere on the can "twelve ounces" will be stamped. But people who have been for years buying lobster in cans supposed to contain sixteen ounces, will now get the same sized can containing only twelve ounces.

Mr. DUFF: In the past, although people thought they were buying a pound of lobster they were really buying anything from fifteen to eleven ounces. That amount was contained in the same size of can which is now proposed, if I understand the lobster packers correctly. They do not intend to change the size of cans which have been used for forty years in the trade —three, six, nine and twelve ounces—but they intend to make a larger can to contain sixteen ounces.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 35, to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM.

BILL PROVIDING FOR THE ACQUISITION OF THE SYSTEM BY THE GOVERNMENT.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways) moved the second reading of Bill No. 33, respecting the acquisition by His Majesty of the Grand Trunk Railway system.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister explain, please.

Mr. J. D. REID: I promised the leader of the Opposition last evening that I would procure certain information for him. I sent it to him this morning, and so far as I know it is satisfactory. Any further information that may be required I will endeavour to obtain at the earliest possible moment. When I introduced the resolution on which this Bill is founded I made a statement regarding the entire situation, and I do not think that I can add anything now to what I said on that occasion. Any further remarks I may have to make I shall reserve until we are in committee on the Bill, which is practically word for word the same as the resolution. The House is therefore possessed of all the facts.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): This is a proposal to purchase and operate another great railway system consisting of 8,173 miles of railway, of which 1,665 are in United States territory. The total capitalization, according to the blue-book which has been distributed to hon. members, is, on paper, $707,929,817. The Government purpose to guarantee the existing bonds of the Grand Trunk Railway to the amount of over $200,000,000. Whether the system is worth that amount of money or not it is difficult at this stage of the discussion for us to decide. The whole question is a very complicated one. The arbitrators are supposed to settle the value of the stock and to protect the country in this transaction. But the House has very meagre information in regard to the value of the property. When we get the stock it is weighted down with guarantees, liens, mortgages, equipment notes and all kinds of liabilities. In order to show you the difficulty of dealing with this matter, I would like to select just one case out of this blue-book as a sample. If you have the book before you, and if you will turn to page 51, you will find a large number of subsidiary railways listed, the stock of which is guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Let me read:

> Besides the guarantees to the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk Railway Company have guaranteed the following:
> Atlantic and St. Lawrence railroad—5% on capital stock of $5,484,000 as rental.

We are not told in this book whether the guarantee lasts for one year or for more than one year. It may be for years and it may be forever, but there is nothing in the blue-book to indicate how long that guarantee is to last. It is very difficult for me to form an opinion with this information as to the liability in regard to that guarantee. If you turn to page 54 of the blue-book, you find how this railway is losing money. I am speaking of the branch line that I have mentioned, namely, the Atlantic and St. Lawrence railway. On page 54 you will find that in the last seven and a half years this railway has been meeting a large deficit:

Atlantic and St. Lawrence railway.

1910-11	June	$ 646,500
1911-12	"	653,394
1912-13	"	610,688
1913-14	"	432,554
1914-15	"	421,136
1915-16	"	179,067
1916	June to December	266,565
1917	December	1,272,496

Showing that for the last seven and a half years this railway, the Atlantic and St. Lawrence, whose bonds the Grand Trunk Railway Company have guaranteed perpetually, as appears from this book, has been losing money at the rate of over half a million a year. It is difficult for me to estimate what that railway should be valued at as an asset when we purchase it. That is only a sample of a large number of other railways the stocks and bonds of which are guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Company.

I submit that the House should not be asked during the dying hours of the present session, and in the present disturbed financial condition of the country, to deal with such an enormous proposition as that involved in this transaction. Another session is to be called, we are told, within about three months and the whole of the time would be required by members of this House to acquaint themselves with this proposition and to consult the people in regard to it. No interest would suffer by the delay. We want to know whether we are purchasing a solvent or an insolvent concern. The Minister of Railways says that if we enforced the Grand Trunk Pacific guarantees against the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk would have to go into liquidation. That is not a good reason for pushing this forward so rapidly because this is all in our own hands. We can take the other course; we can decide not to enforce the guarantee against the Grand Trunk at the present time and allow the Grand Trunk to go ahead and carry on the business until the country recovers from its present financial difficulties and decides the best course to be taken.

We should also have information in regard to the physical condition of the road. We are told in the report known as the Drayton-Acworth report, made in 1917, that the road was run down at that date; and that it would require the large sum of $51,000,000 to put it in a state of repair. In order that there may be no question about this, I will read from the Drayton-Acworth report, or the "Report of the Royal Commission to Inquire into Railways and Transportation," dated 1917. It says at page 34:

> The $21,000,000 dealt with above represent the money in which the responsible officers of the company estimate to be required to put the existing plant into good normal condition. This is a revenue liability. But the existing plant is quite inadequate for existing traffic and requires large additions, for which new capital must be raised. The estimates of necessary capital expenditure submitted to us are as follows:

Requirements for rolling stock, shops and machinery..	$26,150,000
Requirements for automatic block signals (main line in Canada only)..	3,533,000
Requirements for installing rock ballast crushing plant..	467,500
Total..	$30,150,500

> Putting together revenue and capital expenditure, we find that the Grand Trunk railway, in the opinion of its own officers requires over $51,000,000 spent upon it to put it in a position to meet the requirements of its to-day's business. We see no reason to expect that under existing conditions this necessary money will be provided.

That was the opinion of the present Finance Minister of this country two years ago and we have no reason to believe that the Grand Trunk system is in any better position physically to-day than it was at the time that report was written; in fact, we have reason to believe that it is not in as good a condition as it was three years ago. Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Railways himself has admitted that he has not made any inspection of the road. He tells us he has travelled over the road—I suppose in his private car, smoking his cigar.

Mr. J. D. REID: No, I do not smoke.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Well, then he was not smoking but found that the road was very comfortable and he tells us that it is all right but he did not think it worth while to secure the opinion of his own engineer, or of any other engineer in regard to the physical condition of the road before pledging the country to purchase it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the reckless and haphazard way in which the Government is dealing with these big questions is to say the least of it, alarming. On July 11, the Minister of the Interior made a written offer to the Grand Trunk Company that apparently he did not understand himself; he admits now that the offer was impracticable and had to be withdrawn. One would expect, to say the least, that in a proposition involving $400,000,000 every detail would have been thoroughly studied before a written offer was made to the company. I submit also that some consideration should be given to the financial condition of this country. The people of Canada, at the present time, are doing a good deal of thinking in regard to the future of our financial affairs, and the time has arrived when the Government should also give this question some thought. In 1911 the Consolidated Revenue Fund was turned over to the present administration in very good shape. If you look at the accounts of that year you will find that all commitments were provided for and that a surplus of some thirty millions was in the treasury. In less than two years the present administration had reached and were scraping the bottom of the strong box, and ever since that date they have been piling up huge deficits, very large deficits indeed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the second year of the period to which the hon. gentleman refers we paid off $25,000,000 of the national debt.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Yes, but you did not have a surplus.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We paid the debt instead.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: At the close of the second year, as I understand it, the deficits began to accumulate—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: —and they have been accumulating ever since.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not until the war broke out.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The Canadian Northern Railway expenditure was not for war. Now, Mr. Speaker, the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) himself admits that we have a net debt at the present time of two billions of dollars, or six times as much as it was in 1911. I admit that a very great portion of it is due to the war, but a large part is also due to the reckless extravagance, or something even worse than that. We now have on our hands four great railway systems into which money is being sunk day by day. From the nearest estimate that I can make, we are losing money at the rate of about $100,000 per day on the four existing railway systems. Since the Government took over the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental, the railway rates have increased and the deficits have become larger. I submit, Sir, that we will have the same experience when we acquire the Grand Trunk system. Speaking for myself, while I have an open mind on this question, I am in favour of private ownership and public control. That question was solved, and I think rightly solved, by the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier when they provided for a Railway Board. That board have full power to deal with rates, with the exchange of traffic, with duplications of routes, and with all those questions that arise in connection with our railway management. In this connection I would like to cite the opinion of Mr. A. H. Smith, one of the royal commissioners, who failed, as you remember, to sign the Drayton-Acworth report; he held a different view from his colleagues in regard to that matter, and I am strongly inclined to think that he was right. Mr. Smith is a well-known authority, one of the very highest in America, and this is what he says on this question:

> I am unable to join my colleagues in their recommendations. They propose that practically all of the railways in Canada, except the Canadian Pacific and the American lines, shall be turned over to a corporation to be managed by a board of trustees appointed by Government. They insist that this board is to be permanent and self-perpetuating. I do not know by what means one Parliament can bind its successors to a given policy, especially in so simple a matter as changing the organization of a government board. My friends seem to avoid government ownership and operation, in fact condemn it as inadvisable, but propose a plan which contains so many elements of danger in the direction which is sought to be avoided, that I am unable to join them.
> Their plan would add about a billion dollars to the direct debt of Canada. The interest on this is about forty millions, adding very largely to government expenses. Judging from the experience Canada has had with its government railways, it is fair to assume that this would remain a permanent burden. Operated by private companies, this interest would ultimately be borne by the companies without recourse to the government funds, and at the same cost of service to railway patrons as would obtain under government operation.

Then he goes on to say:

> The recommendation creates a Dominion Railways Company, owned by the Dominion Government, to take over those roads. There are about 7,000 miles in the United States controlled by Canadian companies. The Canadian railways depend for no inconsiderable portion of their revenue on United States traffic. A fundamental defect of the plan, therefore, is in placing the Government in the railroad business, not only in Canada, but also in operating railroads in the United States, subject to both federal and state regulation.
> Through private railway management Canada has obtained about one mile of railroad for each $30,000 of Government aid of guarantees, which is but a fraction of the cost of government railroad undertakings. In some instances, a large proportion of the aid was in land, the value of which produced by the building of the railroad and the settlement thereby made possible. Compared with the total outlay involved in producing railroads by the Government itself, as, for instance, the case of the Intercolonial or the Transcontinental, from three to six times that amount have been used to realize equal results. This shows distinctly the value of enlisting and retaining private enterprise.

That is the opinion of Mr. Smith on this important question. Now as to public ownership, while, as I said before, I am not saying that it is not possible of solution, my objection to it is that as a business proposition our experience is that it does not work out well and that it does not pay. We have our own experience so far in the Intercolonial. We also have the experience of Great Britain and of the United States, and they all point one way, namely, that the operation of railways by the Government means higher rates and larger deficits. The best example that we have is that of the Intercolonial which has now been in operation for some forty years.

The explanation that has been given is that the failure of the Intercolonial railway was due to patronage. But patronage, we are told has been abolished for about eight years, yet the Intercolonial does not seem to be making any more progress than it did before patronage was abolished. With such an able and energetic Minister of Railways as we have at the present time, one would have expected that if it was at all possible to do so, the Administration would have made a financial success of the operation of this railway system. I have held the opinion for some time that the Intercolonial railway has retarded the progress of the country through which it runs, especially the Maritime Provinces. There has been a constant refusal to construct branch lines for the purpose of directing traffic to the main line. When the Canadian Pacific was built the promoters of that system projected branch lines all over the country wherever they were required, in order to feed the main line. But that was never done in the case of the Intercolonial; and in the policy which was followed in that respect both parties were alike. In the old days when Sir John A. Macdonald was in power, his view was that the Government could not afford to project one branch line, because if it did, it would be swamped with applications for the construction

4 p.m. of other branch lines. The same policy prevailed under the late Liberal administration until about 1910, or about the time they were driven out of power, and up to this time the Intercolonial has not embarked to any considerable extent upon the construction of branch lines. But branch lines had to be constructed, and the people in the different localities in New Brunswick and elsewhere where such lines were needed themselves embarked upon the construction of these branches. The consequence is that these lines have been unprofitable. Overhead expenses were large; repair shops had to be provided for each little branch line—and all this could have been avoided had the work been undertaken by the Intercolonial; but it was not done, and now the Government have to take over those lame ducks at a very heavy cost to the country.

I say that for political reasons the Intercolonial failed to build branch lines. The pressure was not sufficient from the Maritime Provinces, and Parliament did not vote the money. Moreover, vessels were not provided on the Atlantic coast to collect traffic. Early in its history the Canadian Pacific embarked upon ship-owning and provided vessels at various places on both coasts for the purpose of collecting traffic for their line. The Intercolonial, on the other hand, could scarcely be induced to furnish the necessary ferryboats. For fifteen or twenty years traffic was carried across the strait of Canso on a scow; and it took the lifetime of a generation to give to Prince Edward Island a decent ferryboat for service between that province and the mainland. Even to-day the Intercolonial has not a single boat on the Atlantic coast, so far as I know, to collect traffic for its main line.

During the forty years of its operation the Intercolonial Railway has not done anything to establish an express company. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company very soon built up an express business, which was carried on with such energy that the fresh fish of the Pacific soon began to compete with the fresh fish of the Atlantic in the Boston market, carried across the country by the Dominion Express Company. During all these forty years we have been paying money to private express companies simply because we have not had the enterprise to establish an express company of our own.

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company built a line of hotels all the way from Quebec to Victoria. There is no more attractive tourist country in Canada than is found in the Maritime Provinces, but although the Intercolonial Railway has been in operation for forty years, it has not been thought worth while to attract tourists by building a hotel.

In addition to this lack of enterprise, we still have the old party system. Patronage, the purchase of constituencies with public money, is known to be as rampant as ever. This Government has been making loud professions in regard to the abolition of patronage and the abolition of all kinds of government favours. But we on this side of the House do not admit that the Government has made very much progress in that direction. We had the case of Kingston a few days ago; but if you want better proof you may consult the Estimates of the last session. We voted $12,000,000 at the last session for building branch railway lines, and every dollar of that amount was for branch lines west of the Great Lakes. Was that apportionment made on business principles? I say that it was not. Was it made on the principle of fair distribution of public money? I say that it was not. The members of the Government sat around a table and counted noses; and they found that they had more support from Western Canada than they had from the Maritime Provinces; consequently the railways went where the most votes were. They put the railways, as they put the soldiers' votes—"where they would do the most good."

I have referred to our experience in Canada in the matter of Government ownership; what was the experience of the United States? In the United States all the railways were put under Government control two or three years ago. What was the result? Freight rates advanced about twenty-five per cent; passenger rates advanced from two to three ceents a mile; and even this increase did not square the account. The United States had to levy hundreds of millions on the ratepayers of that country in order to make the account even.

I find the following statement in a speech delivered by Mr. A. B. Cummins, chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate, delivered on August 5, 1919, and found on page 3870 of the Congressional Record:

> We lost $240,000,000 last year and we lost in the first four or five months of this year $260,000,000 and we are now losing at the rate of $39,000,000 per month.

Let us see what Mr. Cummins has to say with rates in the United States under Government ownership:

> Senator Fletcher: May I ask what the increase is now over the rates as they were before the Government took control?
> Mr. Cummins: It was said at the time to be an increase of 25 per cent, and there is a sense in which that is true, but when the orders of the director general were applied to the actual affairs of transportation it resulted in increasing the rates in some instances less than 25 per cent and in many instances a great deal more than 25 per cent; in some cases as high as 100 per cent and . . . even more than that.

The experience in the United States was that in some cases the rates had to be doubled in order to help meet the deficit that occurred under Government control; and then at the close of the year they had to assess at the rate of $240,000,000 a year in order to square the account.

The proposal which is before us will, if adopted, commit the country to a very serious financial liability. There is no means of knowing how much that liability will be. The purchase price is to be fixed by three men whose names we do not know, and if they agree, their decision is final. If these three men should decide to award the amount of the whole capitalization—which, I admit to be very unlikely—that is to say, $707,000,000, under the Bill now before us, Parliament would be helpless. We would have to pay whatever figure they decide upon.

That proposal, I submit, is an outrage, and the decision, whatever it may be, should be placed before Parliament for approval or disapproval. I am here representing a constituency, and I do not purpose, if I can prevent it, handing over the exercise of my judgment to anybody. There is a danger that the arbitrators might take an erroneous view in regard to a matter of this kind. They might resort to their imaginations, as the arbitrators appear to have done in the case of the claim of Mackenzie and Mann a few years ago. Mackenzie and Mann got $10,000,000 for what everybody knows was not worth one dollar. They got it for what the arbitrators understood to be prospective value. On what principle can you estimate prospective value in a case of this kind? Why treat an insolvent railway company differently from any other insolvent concern? Supposing "A. B." is a land speculator who gets into business difficulties and who finds it necessary to assign to an assignee. The assignee is attempting to wind up the estate, and "A. B." comes forward and says: I own a large number of lots on the outskirts of the city of Ottawa, and in twenty years time those lots will be worth a great deal of money; you ought to make me an allowance of so many thousands or ten of thousands of dollars for the value those lots will have at the expiration of that period. Would the assignee listen to that? Would he give it any consideration? No. But that was the principle on which the arbitrators who dealt with the claim of Mackenzie and Mann gave them $10,000,000. They gave it for prospective profits, the value that they thought this road would have in years to come, I do not know how many years ahead. On that question I should like to put on record the opinion of the present Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) as to the value of the common stock of the Canadian Northern Railway. What he says will be found on page 44 of the report:

A third basis of estimate is the value of the property for sale as a going concern. A purchaser would not consider either original cost or reproduction cost as of much importance. The price he would pay would be based on earning power, present and potential. On this basis he would consider how far the Canadian Northern is at present short of covering its fixed charges, how long it will take to reach equilibrium, how much new capital will have to be spent, how soon a dividend may be expected and at what rate. Calculating on this basis, in the light of the figures set out above, it is evident that no purchaser would offer for the property a sum amounting to the total of its liabilities.

We conclude, therefore, that the shareholders of the company have no equity either on the ground of cash put in, or on the ground of physical reproduction cost, or on the ground of the saleable value of the property as a going concern.

That was the opinion of the present Minister of Finance; yet the Government handled this question in such a way that these speculators got $10,000,000 of the people's money. In such a case as this much depends on the presentation of a case, and if the case in the arbitration that is to take place in regard to the Grand Trunk is presented in the same careless manner that the case was presented to the court in the matter of the claim of Mackenzie and Mann, this country is likely to be victimized; but the Government accepts this verdict without a protest; apparently they were willing that this verdict should be given when they fixed the maximum amount at $10,000,000, having at the same time before them the opinion of the present Minister of Finance that the stock had no value whatever. In my opinion the arbitration that took place on that occasion was a sham arbitration. I do not attack the integrity of the judges that gave the verdict, but, in my opinion, the Government did not furnish the evidence and the case was not presented properly before the court.

We are face to face with this question: Can we shoulder this new liability? The total amount of securities, including the guaranteed stock, the preference stock, the debentures and the common stock, leaving out the Grand Trunk Pacific and all those other guarantees of which I spoke some time ago, will, subject to arbitration, be £81,499,617. Estimating a pound sterling at $4.86, that amounts to $395,988,138.62 or approximately $400,000,000. In addition, there are the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific and those other guarantees. These are alarming figures. The headlong pace at which this country is running into debt is now beyond the comprehension of any ordinary man. During September the net debt of the Dominion increased by $65,000,000, or over $2,000,000 per day, or over $90,000 per hour, or over $1,500 per minute. $1,500 was looked upon as about the price of an ordinary small farm down in Nova Scotia, so one farm is disappearing every minute to meet the deficits of this Administration after they credit all the revenues.

Let me place on record the opinion of one of the Government's friends. I suppose the Government has no more loyal friend than the Montreal Star, which has been a pillar of Union Government from its inception. The Montreal Star said yesterday:

This population cannot bear the burden of debt and deficits, the burden of waste and graft, the burden of political domination by a huge machine which the administration of a great transcontinental traffic system by politicians will thrust upon us.

The Government have been advising the people of this country to produce and save. That is very appropriate advice, and I agree with the Administration in sending it out. Why do they not take this advice themselves? While the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) is, I think, the real father of this measure, I am informed that the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) could properly be described as the stepfather. I understand he is one of the gentlemen who is pushing the purchase of this railway. Take the case of that hon. gentleman. He enters his spacious office one fine morning, his rubber heels sinking into a rich Turkish carpet that cost the country, during the war, $515; hangs up his gold mounted cane and his hat in a mahogany wardrobe that cost the country, during the war, $89.70; sits down in a richly upholstered chair that cost the country, during the war, $51.33; opens his letters at a mahogany table that cost the country, during the war, $189.75, and throws the envelopes into a waste paper basket that cost the country, during the war, $32.50. After his morning's work he stretches himself on a Chesterfield that cost the country, during the war, $111.50. During the hour he was resting the net debt of the country had increased by $90,000, and my hon. friend bestirs himself and makes up his mind that it is time to do something, so when he rises he decides that the Canadian people must be made aware of the impending financial crisis. Accordingly he sends forth the slogan: "Produce and Save." Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of all the circumstances you will understand how difficult it is for the ordinary man to accept that advice from my hon. friend. The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) addressed the Presbyterian Synod in this city a few days ago, but he did not use the same slogan as the Minister of Immigration. He knew it was no use to ask this Government to save, so he changed the language and sent out the motto: "Hard work and the Ten Commandments." I think if the ordinary taxpayer were to visit Ottawa and thoroughly understood how his money is being squandered, he would take an apoplectic fit. Let me call a witness on financial conditions at the present moment, no less a person than the ex-Minister of Finance, the man who knows more about these questions than any other man in Canada. In giving evidence before a committee of this House a few days ago he said:

> Just look at it from several standpoints. The national debt of this country before the war was something over $300,000,000—I think $335,000,000. I estimated in the Budget speech of this year—and I do not think there is any room for doubt about the matter—that by the end of this year our net national debt will reach nearly $2,000,000,000.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member is referring, as I think, to the evidence taken before a special committee of this House which has not yet reported, he is not in order in quoting from that speech.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Perhaps I may summarize it. The net debt of Canada is placed at the enormous sum of $2,000,000,000. We are told that the interest prior to 1914 amounted to only $13,000,000 a year, but that now it will likely reach the sum of $115,000,000 a year. That is a very heavy liability for the people of this country to meet. The ex-Minister of Finance has practically told us that we have not the money, he does not know where we are going to get it, but yet we are asked to embark on this very large expenditure without any explanation where the money is coming from. The ex-Minister of Finance made an eloquent speech in the House yesterday in favour of this legislation, and dealt with every phase of it except the financial one. He did not say a word to the House as where we were to get the large sums of money that will be required to carry out this undertaking. It comes down to this: We have not a dollar for the returned soldiers but we have millions for the financial magnates over in London.

While the Government is refusing to take advice from members on this side of the House and insists on embarking on this very large expenditure, what is being done elsewhere? Mr. Lloyd-George a few days ago absolutely refused to listen to the claims of the Socialists and Radicals—and some of the labour party in England for the nationalization of the coal mines, although they made out just as strong a case, and a much stronger one in my opinion, than has been made for the nationalization of the Grand Trunk railway system. In the United States President Wilson has decided to restore the railways to their former owners, and a Bill was introduced in Congress a few days ago providing for the gradual turning over of the ships built by the United States to private ownership. The result will be that Government will in the end discontinue the management and ownership of tramp vessels.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When did President Wilson announce that his policy was to restore the railways to their owners?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I have not the date, but the announcement was made in the press.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think it was ever made.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I think my hon. friend will find in the Congressional Record that the Government of the United States have decided on that policy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There has been no definite statement.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The step has not yet been taken, but I think the announcement has been made that it will be done shortly. Let me ask what public interest can be served by pushing this Bill through at the present time? Will it reduce passenger rates? Will the farmer get his produce carried to the seaboard more cheaply than at present? Our experience teaches us that he stands to pay a higher rate, and that later on the country will have to meet another large deficit. I take no stock in the visions that are seen by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways with regard to the Canadian Pacific. He seems to see ghosts in that quarter, and to be afraid that if we do not take over the Grand Trunk at the present time it will go into liquidation and be purchased by the Canadian Pacific. Now, there is no evidence that any such a thing will take place. If the Grand Trunk should go into liquidation, and I hope that will not be necessary, but if it should happen, why should the Canadian Pacific get it instead of the people of Canada? Will the Government of Canada be asleep when the railway is put under the hammer, or would they be on deck looking after the interests of the people? If they were on deck they would be pretty strong competitors with all their debts and deficits against even the Canadian Pacific. But we are asked to take it for granted that if anything should happen to the Grand Trunk system it would necessarily fall into the hands of the Canadian Pacific instead of into the hands of the Government. My judgment is that consideration of this matter should be postponed at least until next session, so that members may be allowed to study the proposals and consult their constituents before any further step is taken. In the meantime we should devote our attention to the maintenance of our own credit, and the care for our returned soldiers, and, as I said before, we should consult the people before embarking on such a stupendous venture as this.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has indulged in very considerable criticism of the Government, which is something that we can naturally expect from him upon any occasion on which he cares to contribute to the debates of this House. He has, however, offered very little, either in the form of argument against this proposal or in the submission to the House of any reasons for the adoption of any other course. He spent a great deal of time in a description of the furniture in the office of the Minister of Colonization (Mr. Calder). Indeed, he carefully examined every item of equipment, the only novelty which I observed to escape his attention being the cost of the rubber heels on the boots of that minister. He also told us something about the Ten Commandments and the Presbyterian Synod, but he proffered very little in the way of concrete and practical criticism of the measure now before the House. He made one observation which I think is worthy of attention and which I shall use as a strong argument in support of this measure. He said that the former Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) knew more about this problem than any other man in Canada. I quote his own words, Mr. Speaker, in order that I may make my argument the more effective: "The ex-Minister of Finance knows more about this problem than any other man in Canada." Having said that, he proceeded to quote the ex-minister in regard to the financial obligations of the country. Now, I wish to read to him what the ex-Minister of Finance had to say in regard to this project, and I ask him to accept the opinion of the man who "knows more about this problem that any other man in Canada." The ex-Minister of Finance, knowing better than any other man what the problem is, has this to say regarding the burden which will be placed upon the country by the acquisition of the Grand Trunk system:

> The country will be able to bear whatever marginal loss there may be in the operation of these roads until such time as they are placed on a paying basis.

In other words, if there is a loss the ex-Minister of Finance's expert opinion is that the country will be well able to bear it. Not only did he say that, but he gave his unqualified support to the whole proposal. The hon. member (Mr. Sinclair) I noticed, came out squarely for private ownership and directly in opposition to public ownership, and in support of his position he said that he was in favour of the policy of the late Laurier Government, which he told us had a railway policy of "private ownership and public control." I wonder if the hon. member has forgotten entirely the huge expenditure of the Canadian people's funds in the National Transcontinental. Nearly $200,000,000 was invested in that enterprise, and not only was there not a cent of return from it, but it has been a gigantic loss to the country. That was an investment by the Laurier Government which my hon. friend supported for so many years.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: It was to be operated by the Grand Trunk Company.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend must remember he said "private ownership and public control," and this was the exact reverse,—public ownership and private control. Now, before I proceed to submit my views to the House I desire to refer for a moment to the Drayton-Acworth report. This report recommends that control both of the Grand Trunk Pacific and of the Grand Trunk be assumed by the people of Canada, and my hon. friend advances this report as an argument against this proposal. There is the clear recommendation from that commission that the people of Canada should assume control of the Grand Trunk as well as the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Government is acting upon the advice of that report, the value of which has never been challenged by hon. gentlemen opposite, and which has been repeatedly quoted by them in the debates on this subject. My hon. friend cited the Intercolonial as a hideous example of the failure of public ownership, and I shall have a little to say in connection with that point later on. He chided the Government for encouraging the construction of railways in the West to the detriment of the East, but I would remind the hon. gentleman of the fact that this country spent $126,000,000 capital expenditure in the Intercolonial and $173,000,000, to be exact, in capital expenditure on the National Transcontinental, a total of $300,000,000, all of which practically was expended in the eastern portion of Canada in capital expenditure, whereas the expenditure by this Government and preceding governments in the West have been in the encouragement of construction by private owners, involving no direct charge against the Treasury. I merely cite this to show the unfairness, and I may say the fallacy, of the argument of my hon. friend.

Now, the question before the House concerns the principle of the Bill, and that principle is whether or not this country should embark upon a further degree of public ownership of transportation companies. In other words, it is whether or not we shall take over the Grand Trunk Railway system and merge it with the present National Railway system in one great whole. Government ownership in regard to railways in Canada is, to a certain degree, still in the experimental stage. While it is true that we have had the Intercolonial railway under Government ownership for many years, it cannot be said that that railway was in any sense a system. It was handicapped at Montreal, the western terminus, because of the constant congestion of the Grand Trunk terminal system. The authority for that is the Drayton-Acworth report, and I mention the fact so that I may not be questioned in that regard. The railway ran through the eastern portion of Canada and did not link up the extreme east with the congested manufacturing centres of Ontario, nor did it have the advantage of getting a long haul—which is always the most paying traffic—through to Western Canada. So that the Intercolonial cannot be said to be a fair test of Government ownership. Now, there are two forms of Government ownership: one is such as that which existed in Germany and in Russia before the war, and in some other countries,—a distinctly autocratic government ownership in which the people had very little to say and in regard to which little care was shown as to whether the railways paid or not. In fact, in Germany the roads were very largely military roads. In Canada we are a democratic people, and government ownership of large railway system is still in its experimental stage, and I submit that the system devised by this Government and put into operation in connection with the National Transcontinental railway during the past two years seems to be ideal system of Government ownership.

Thus the Government own and control a system which is directly under the operating influence of an entity, namely, a company organized for that purpose. It is free from any departmental control, it has its own board of directors, its president, its managers, and these are removed from direct political control. I do not wish to harp upon the question of patronage. It is not worth while introducing it. We are dealing with too large issues to get down to that petty question. I repeat that the system introduced by the Government, and this proposition, this extension of government ownership, seems to be the most up-to-date and ideal system yet devised in a democratic country.

That is the first question. Then we are confronted in the second place, not with an abstract hypothetical question. We are faced with a difficult, practical transportation problem and I invite the House—the few members who are present—to consider it as a practical transportation problem. It is not speculative in the least sense; on the contrary, it is an intensely practical question, a question of fact and a question capable of demonstration. I admit that there are debatable points. I admit that there is the question whether we should enter into this project. That is fair ground to take, but I do say this is capable of demonstration one way or the other.

What is the problem? First, we are faced with this condition, that Canada is overbuilt with railways. We are all agreed in that. That has already been cited by preceding speakers. That presents a phase of the problem. It is quite useless for any person in the House or outside of it to constantly harp upon the difficulties attending the details of this scheme. We are faced with an important problem. These railways are there. It is surely useless for us to enter into any violent recrimination as to who is to blame but let me say to hon. gentlemen opposite—and I invite them to give consideration to this in all fairness,—that when they approach this question they cannot possibly point a finger at the Prime Minister of Canada (Sir Robert Borden) and say he is to blame, because in 1903 and in 1904, he, and those who surrounded him strongly opposed the system of railways brought into being by the Government of that day, and which hon. gentlemen opposite then supported. He strongly opposed that system and, indeed, in looking up Hansard very carefully and reading the debates of that day I find—and I submit this to the House in fairness to the right hon. gentleman who is absent—that he said to the House and the country that he would recommend the extension of the Intercolonial railway to the Georgian bay ports, the nationalization of the Canadian Pacific railway along that barren stretch known as the north shore of lake Superior to Port Arthur, and then he said: Extend your railway systems through the productive prairie districts and have only one and not two new transcontinental lines to the Pacific ocean. That is what experts now tell us should have been done. I submit that his was a prophetic vision. It fell upon barren ground it is true, there was no response to it, the people of the country sustained the Government of the day in their projects and undertakings. Not only is the Government of that time responsible but the people of the country at large assumed the responsibility in a subsequent election; so that the people of the country at large are also responsible for the condition in which we find ourselves in connection with this transportation question. Therefore we have the problem of three transcontinental railways where certainly there is only room for two.

The second portion of the problem presents itself to me in this way: We have in Eastern Canada the Grand Trunk Railway system, a splendid system connecting up all the great manufacturing centres of Eastern Canada and supplying a dense traffic but with no outlet for the long haul to the West, nor indeed an outlet to bring western trade to their system in the East. It is, as I say, a great system but it is handicapped in this regard. Then we have the Canadian National railways extending to the West and to some portion of the East, not to the whole but to very little. We are told upon the advice of experts that to place the Canadian National railways in touch with the great traffic centres of Eastern Canada would require a capital expenditure in the neighbourhood of $100,000,000. When I heard that statement I was appalled but if you look into the figures and see what it costs to connect this system up with the great centres one can readily understand and appreciate it. So, you have that problem. The Canadian National railways have considerable connections in the East, the Grand Trunk railway has a splendid system with all its connections but without an outlet to the West. What more reasonable than to say that these great systems should be linked up into one. That is not a new thought; it is not a new idea; it has been before the country for a great period of time. I shall not deal in detail with the matter; I merely want to place the problem before the House.

In the third place we have this fact and let me repeat that all these are facts that are capable of demonstration beyond all question. We have the cost of duplicating eastern connections and terminals. I believe that any hon. member present will readily appreciate the argument. Take Montreal, for instance; I understand that for many years the Grand Trunk terminals in Montreal have been congested and are entirely inadequate to take care of the traffic. We have the Canadian National railways reaching the heart of Montreal, but their terminals are as yet in a very undeveloped state. What is more natural than that these two great systems should develop a joint terminal in Montreal, having one control, one administration, one despatching office, one freight control, one passenger control, one terminal where otherwise they would be obliged to have two terminals, unless they had under the Railway Act, joint running rights to a given terminal, which is usually a most unsatisfactory thing.

The fourth problem is that we have the cost of dual administration. All hon. members should give this very careful thought, because these are facts that are beyond all question. In almost every centre of eastern Canada, if we do not take over the Grand Trunk system, we will have to have a separate passenger office, ticket office, freight office, despatching office and administration office for both systems. Not only have we in that regard the physical cost but the monthly and yearly overhead charges of this expensive dual system. Under the system proposed by the Government and contemplated by this Bill, this duplication will be wiped out and we will have one joint control and administration.

I proceed to examine briefly some of the objections and arguments advanced against this proposition. In the first place, let me point out that the three leading front bench members on the other side have all spoken strongly against the principle of public ownership in connection with this question. The last speaker (Mr. Sinclair) comes forward very clearly and strongly on that point. They suggest that the Grand Trunk Railway system should be allowed to go into liquidation, should be forced into a receiver's hands, that we should say to the Grand Trunk Railway Company: "You have debts that you say you cannot pay and which we know you cannot pay; therefore, we are going to force collection by driving you into the hands of a receiver." Am I unfair in this? I might quote the hon. member who leads the Opposition at this time. He said in his remarks the other day that he was not afraid of liquidation, that we should pare down this system to, as he called it, running weight. He had in view, I suppose, some Olympic sports and he wanted to pare it down to running weight and let it go into the hands of a receiver. He assured the Minister of Railways that he would not get a black eye from the country or from the financial world if he did so. Then in the same speech he also made the statement that to allow the Grand Trunk Pacific to go into the hands of a receiver, as we did some months ago, was "a disgraceful and unbusinesslike act." Now, what are we to think from an argument of that kind?

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member is misquoting me. I said that the method by which that road was put into the hands of a receiver was a disgraceful and unauthorized method. It is not putting the road into the hands of a receiver of which I complain, but the way it was done.

Mr. STEVENS: I accept the hon. gentleman's explanation, but I am quoting from Hansard. The hon. gentleman is reported in Hansard to have said:

> The President of the Council as a member of the Government put it in the hands of a receiver and we say that was a disgraceful and unbusinesslike thing to do.

Then a little later on, in the same speech, he made this statement:

> I am not afraid of liquidation. The Grand Trunk would not be the first railway company that has gone into liquidation.

and so on. Further he says:

> Let them be shaved down to proper running weight; then we will know where they are at. * * * There are railroads in Canada that have gone through the same experience because they got into trouble; and I assure the Minister of Railways that he will not get a black eye from our people by allowing any concern that is not able to carry on to go into the hands of a receiver.

My hon. friend can question that if he wishes—there are his own statements.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not question it at all. I accept the full responsibility of what I said.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: The point I am making is this: The suggestion is that this concern shall be allowed to go into the hands of a receiver. Now let us examine that briefly for a moment. A receivership pre-supposes one of two actions on the part of the receiver—he will either operate the system, carry it on on behalf of the owners of the company and the creditors, or else he will realize upon the system—one or the other. Now it is urged by hon. gentlemen opposite that a receiver should be put in and that the receiver should realize upon the Grand Trunk system and the Government should in some manner come in and try and purchase under this system. Let us examine the method which must be followed in connection with the realizing on this concern. To realize, the receiver must do one of two things: He must sell it as a running concern, or else sell it piecemeal. If he sells it as a running concern the Government is likely to be about the only bidder, because it is not conceivable that any other company would be large enough to make a bid at this time for the Grand Trunk system. Indeed, it is questionable whether even hon. gentlemen opposite would stand by and allow it to be sold to any other private concern under such circumstances. But the Government would likely be a bidder, and in selling it it is unlikely that the receiver, or the courts, would disregard the value of the ownership; and now I am coming to one of the main arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite. They say that this stock is valueless, and they make the statement without having any particular argument to base it upon. They say the stock is valueless. They are trying to lead the country to believe that there is some intention on the part of the Government to make a large fortune for certain of the owners of this road. I say, then, that the receiver, in disposing of this road as a running concern, would have to place a value upon the ownership of the road, which is represented in the stock of the road. Now, then, how would he value this concern? He would take into consideration, first, the physical assets—roadbed, rolling stock, and such things as that. He would next take into consideration the liquid assets—bills receivable, and so forth. In the third place, he would take into consideration leaseholds. The understanding is that there are a number of leases in connection with this transaction, all of which have value. He would take into consideration, in the fourth place, the contracts that have been entered into, and which are in existence at this time, also show the franchise and the good will of the railway. There may be no good will, but it is a factor which a receiver must take into consideration; and in valuing these, or in ascertaining their value, the receiver, or the courts, would be called upon to hear most exhaustive evidence. So that I point out here that in the proposition before us the Government is simply taking cognizance of the usual method of carrying out a business transaction of this kind. They say: We will purchase this road for a certain sum down, represented in security of the original bonds or debenture stock. For the balance, that is, for the so-called capital stock of the company, preference and common, we propose to arbitrate, to ascertain whether there is any value in it. And I submit, Mr. Speaker, that no matter how certain one might be that there was no value in these stocks, we are still bound to give the owners of those stocks, under ordinary procedure of law, under ordinary business procedure, under the ordinary procedure of assignment and receivership—we are bound to give those owners an opportunity to demonstrate that there is the value in the stocks which they claim.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am always willing to learn, and my hon. friend is dealing with a very nice business proposition. Can he tell me of any process by which a receiver is bound to get a fixed amount of money for goods, or chattels, or property that comes into his hands as a receiver, or is there any process by which a court of this country can fix an upset price upon property in the hands of a receiver, or does he know of any case of the kind?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend advances an argument which if it were applicable to this case in ordinary common sense would be very sound. He is quite right to this extent: No receiver is called upon to place a fixed value upon any of the assets which come under his control other than secured assets, and even then, of course, if there is no value there for the secured assets they suffer to that extent, but that is not the point at issue at all. My hon. friend suggests in his question a new ground which has not hitherto been placed before the House, and that new ground is that there is no value in the Grand Trunk Railway system represented in the debenture stocks. Hitherto they have limited their criticism to the contention that there was no value or supposed value in the common and preference stocks. My hon. friend is now carrying the matter back one stage further, and advancing something which hitherto none of the other speakers have advanced, namely, that there is no value or there is not the value represented in the debenture stocks or the guaranteed stocks. Now the Government on the advice of the Drayton-Acworth Commission, on the strength of the valuation made for the Drayton-Acworth Commission by experts in a most exhaustive and detailed manner, is declaring to the Grand Trunk simply that it recognizes what I choose to call, the bonded indebtedness of the company—that is, the debenture stocks and the guaranteed stocks; the Government offers to recognize that, and say, that further than that it will not go. Let me answer my hon. friend further, though, with regard to his observation; the Drayton-Acworth report proposed to offer a sum of $3,600,000—I speak subject to correction if any one can correct me, but I think I am absolutely right,—to be distributed among the holders of the guaranteed stock, the preference stock and the common stock. We do not offer that; we are not authorizing the Government to carry out that at all. We simply go to the extent of two and a half million dollars and we say: Arbitrate for the balance beyond that. Not only is that the case but the Drayton-Acworth report, so commonly relied upon by my hon. friend's opposite for arguments in this case, states this: That after seven years this may be increased by unstated amounts. We are not doing that; we are restricting the terms of this transaction well within the Drayton-Acworth report which has been before the House for so long.

My next point is this: Suppose the road went into the hands of a receiver, and the receiver, finding it impossible to sell the road as a going concern—and I think that would be the condition confronting him—sold the road piece-meal. Would it not be a lamentable thing for Canada that this great railway system—the oldest railway system in Canada, acknowledged to be an excellent system in every respect—should be split up and sold? First to be disposed of would be the paying lines adjacent to other railways. The Canadian National would probably have an opportunity to buy a few of these lines, as would the Canadian Pacific; the American lines would also have their opportunity in respect of that part of the system which is south of the boundary line. Mr. Speaker, that alternative is inconceivable and could not possibly de entertained for a moment.

Again, suppose the road were divided up by the receiver and realized upon in that manner, and the Canadian National Railway Company desired to get some lines under that arrangement. According to my hon. friends opposite, they could not do so. Not only would they have to come to Parliament for authority to buy, but they would not be allowed to purchase until they had subsequently submitted the terms of purchase to the ratification of Parliament—an utterly impracticable method.

I want to turn for a moment to some of the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). The hon. member was careful not to come out clearly against public ownership; I might be permitted, Sir, to describe his attitude as veiled opposition to the principle of public ownership. He said that the Intercolonial was not a shining light; that that line would have been far better developed under private ownership, indeed, all through his remarks, he left the impression upon the House that he himself was opposed to the principle of public ownership. But he went further and advanced a specific argument which I desire to examine into, because it is worthy of examination. The hon. member urged that we limit Canadian public ownership—or to use his own words, "the experiment in Canadian public ownership"—to the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian National and the Intercolonial. Two of these roads are acknowledged to be the lame ducks of the railway systems of Canada. The other has a prospect of being something. But the Grand Trunk Pacific, separated from the Grand Trunk, is acknowledged to be one of the most expensive systems that any company or any government could attempt to take hold of and administer. The adoption of the suggestion of the hon. member would positively ensure the utter failure of government ownership of railways in Canada. Sir, if I were to indulge in a few innuendos; if I were permitted to follow the lead given by hon. gentlemen opposite a few days ago, should I not be justified in suggesting that one might be suspicious that behind the hon. members' advocacy of this particular scheme was the hope and the wish that there should be a complete failure of government ownership in Canada, a complete collapse of the railway systems of Canada which are under Government control? He says that the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian National and the Intercolonial should represent the limit of our public ownership of railways. I can hardly conceive that the hon. member was serious and honest in his suggestion in that regard. Why, these systems are known to be incomplete without this other system, the Grand Trunk.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have great regard for the business ability of my hon. friend, but may I put this to him: He says that these systems which are under Government ownership are not a proper test of the principle of public ownership of railways. Where would he go in Canada, outside of the Canadian Pacific, to find a railroad which he would guarantee to be a success under government ownership?

Mr. STEVENS: I would go to the very thing that we are proposing, the acquisition of the Grand Trunk—not alone, but connected up with and rounding off the other system.

It has been stated that this question was never properly before the House prior to this occasion; that we have never had an opportunity of considering it. I purpose reading to the House, with the indulgence of hon. members, extracts from a statement officially prepared and submitted to the House by the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) on May 15, 1918. In one paragraph of this statement the Prime Minister gives a resume of the history of the railway problem, including certain guarantees, and so on; I shall not weary the House by reading that part of it. Then he goes on to say:

> I come now to the Grand Trunk Pacific. I regard it as inevitable that, for many reasons, that road should be taken over by the Federal Government. It is a national enterprise to which the credit of the Canadian people has been committed, and, in my judgment, it is expedient to sustain it and not permit it to go into liquidation. It is intimately connected with the Grand Trunk Railway system in the East.

He proceeds:

> The House and the country will be glad to know that the prospects of its traffic seem to be improving, and I very sincerely hope that they will improve still more in the early future. That railway cannot be successfully operated without suitable arrangements with the Canadian Northern Railway and with the Grand Trunk Railway in the East. It cannot pay its interest charges, and it is utterly impossible for the Grand Trunk to meet the obligations which it has undertaken in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

I pause simply to emphasize the fact that it was represented officially to the House in May, 1918, that the Grand Trunk Pacific should be taken over and that it could not be operated successfully without having connection with the Grand Trunk. Then the Prime Minister went on to say:

> I think, therefore, it is absolutely inevitable that the Grand Trunk Pacific must be acquired.

He makes a few observations as to the terms of acquisition, and so on, and then continues:

I can only say that the Grand Trunk would no doubt be willing to hand it over to us to-day if we would relieve the Grand Trunk of all its obligations in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific; it would hand over to us the capital stock and be glad to get out of its own obligations in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific. But there are several conditions to be taken into account before any such proposal can be entertained, and so we are at the present time discussing the whole situation with the Grand Trunk management.

Now it seems if we take over the Grand Trunk Pacific, that practically involves the taking over of the Grand Trunk Railway as well. Further than that, while the present condition of the Grand Trunk is not prosperous for many reasons, some of which doubtless it could not control, I believe that it would have reasonable prospects for the future if amalgamated into one system with the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific.

I may say that we have negotiations outstanding with the Grand Trunk Railway.

Then the Prime Minister makes reference to the appointment of a sub-committee of the Council to go into this matter, and to discuss it with the Grand Trunk officials in London. He proceeds:

They have given attentive study to the questions which are involved, and I have some reasonable hope that when Parliament is again summoned, the Government may be in a position to place before it proposals which will involve the constitution into one State-owned system, the chief railways of Canada, except the Canadian Pacific.

That was the official statement submitted to the House by the Prime Minister. Now let us observe what the leader of the Opposition of that day had to say.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does not the hon. member recall that the key-note of that speech made by the Prime Minister was the co-operation of railways and the elimination of railways that did not pay?

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member is in error. The speech was made on the railway situation in Canada, and it presented the whole question of taking over and amalgamating these roads into one system. My hon. friend gives his view of the matter, but I read the speech myself within the last day, and the first step in the transaction was the taking over of the Canadian Northern railway. In reply to that speech by the Prime Minister, the Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, late leader of the Opposition, had some observations to make, among which were these. I invite my hon. friend to listen to this, because he has questioned the accuracy of my remarks.

Mr. McKENZIE: Not at all. I did not.

Mr. STEVENS: This is what his late leader and his predecessor in the office he now holds, stated in his place in the House:

The Government now proposes to launch into a new enterprise, that of acquiring the Grand Trunk railway itself.

Is that not clear enough? Is it not perfectly clear that the question was before the House, and that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the leader of the Opposition of that day, knew perfectly well what was going on? He proceeded:

The Grand Trunk has been in existence about sixty years. It passes through one of the best parts of the American continent, undoubtedly through the best part of Ontario; it ought to be and it is productive. . . . . That the Grand Trunk railway system can be made a profitable enterprise I have no doubt. I do not pretend to be an expert in these matters, but, applying the ordinary principles of common sense:—

And that is exactly what we are inviting to be applied to this transaction.

—looking on the advantages enjoyed by this railway, its splendid location, its line from the great centre of Chicago to the fine harbour of Portland, I think that the Grand Trunk railway system should be productive of good results and profitable returns. For the present I do not condemn the idea of taking this railway over.

I think I am justified in speaking with some warmth in reply to the argument that this matter has not been before the country previously. We have not only the correspondence submitted on two occasions to the House dealing directly with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but the official statement of the Prime Minister specifically referring to the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the acquiescence of the leader of the Opposition of that date. I am quite certain that the bulk of those who were supporting the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier in this matter would not repudiate the stand he took at that time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The legislation was foreshadowed last session.

Mr. STEVENS: I am reminded that the legislation was foreshadowed last session as likely to come before the House. Opposition has been raised to this on a further ground that hon. gentlemen opposite are opposed to arbitration. I do not think that an hon. gentleman opposite who has spoken has not referred to the Canadian Northern arbitration, and they advanced as an argument against the method of procedure proposed in this Bill, the fact that the arbitrators in the Canadian Northern case made an award at all. They say that arbitration should not be resorted to because of that.

The strange and inconsistent part of their argument is that every hon. member who has spoken in that tone has at the same time declared that he does not wish to impugn the honesty, integrity and probity of the arbitration court. If that court were properly formed; if the members of that court were honourable, honest and able men—and no one will question that—what right have we to squeal—perhaps that word is not dignified, but there is no other appropriate term—over the finding of that board of arbitrators?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, my contention was that the case was not properly presented before the court.

Mr. STEVENS: Will my hon. friend say that Mr. Tilley, K.C., known to every lawyer and to every business concern in Canada as the most eminent railway counsel in Canada, was dishonest in his presentation of the case? I will ask the leader of the Opposition this—and he is strictly honest in his good old stubborn, Scotch manner when he chooses to be so, decidedly so—will he say that Mr. Tilley would accept a retainer from a bootblack, or the Government, or any body else, and be false to that retainer and not present the case rightly and fairly so as to bring out the facts? Mr. Tilley would throw out his retainer in five minutes if he thought for one moment that the Government were in any sense going behind his back, or influencing the arbitration board, or in any way evading the bringing out of the proper evidence in that case.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Tilley is, I believe, a good lawyer. I have not the honour of his acquaintance, but I believe he is a fair sample of the noble profession to which he belongs. It is not, however, for a lawyer to furnish the facts; it is for the lawyer to present the facts that are given to him, and our accusation is that he was not given the facts.

Mr. STEVENS: I will take my hon. friend on his own ground. He says that it is not the business of the lawyer to furnish the facts; that it is the business of the lawyer to present his case in the strongest possible light on the basis of the facts that are given to him. Mr. Tilley was given all the facts that were available; he was offered any information that he wanted; anything he was not clear on, he could receive, and I will guarantee this, and I will stake my position in this House on this question, that Mr. Tilley will not say to the hon. gentleman that he was not supplied with the fullest possible information. The hon. gentleman knows—

Mr. McKENZIE: Oh, yes, we know my learned friend is giving evidence himself.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not giving evidence, I am making an argument.

Mr. McKENZIE: No, the hon. member is giving evidence.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. Only one hon. member should have the floor at a time.

Mr. STEVENS: If the hon. gentleman desires to ask a question, that is all right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is not very good at relinquishing the floor himself at times.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not going to put any question.

Mr. STEVENS: The point I wish to reiterate is this. It has been insinuated that the arbitration of the Canadian Northern transaction was not a fair and square arbitration, and we are told that for that reason we should not pass this Bill. I think I have cited the case fairly and squarely. I submit to the House and to hon. gentlemen who have made that argument, this point: that Mr. Tilley, the lawyer in charge, is known throughout the business world and has the highest possible reputation; that Mr. Tilley was placed in possession of all the facts; that he was invited to ask for anything that the did not know or that he was not supplied with, and that he presented those facts with all the force of his ability and experience as an eminent counsel in railway matters. I claim that there is not one scintilla of ground for the argument that that was not a fair and square arbitration.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I was going to say that if my hon. friend has influence enough with the Government to have this evidence printed, we would then be in a better position to discuss this question.

Mr. STEVENS: The evidence has been printed for the last year and a half. It is an immense volume; it has been printed and laid on the Table. My hon. friend, I was going to say, is asleep, but he will pardon me; I do not want to be impertinent to him, so I will put it in this way. My hon. friend is not awake. All the evidence is available.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: When was it laid upon the Table?

Mr. STEVENS: I could not tell the hon. member the date.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does the hon. gentleman make the statement that it has been laid on the Table?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I made inquiry to-day of the minister, and he informed me that it was laid on the Table. It is available at any time, and I will guarantee to procure it for any hon. member who desires it.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member knows that it is impossible to recall the exact date on which a document was laid on the Table, say a year or a year and a half ago. Every particle of the evidence is available, there is no doubt of that. To state that we should not proceed by arbitration; that we should discard that method, upon such flimsy arguments as that, is an inconceivable position for any intelligent person to take.

In what other way, I ask, than by arbitration could we possibly ascertain the value of this stock? What other method is there? It may be said that we should submit it to the courts, but I do not think there is any modus operandi by which it could be submitted to the courts in a direct way. The judge of a competent court, sitting as the chairman of a board of arbitration can hear all the evidence pro and con; all the facts can be submitted to the board.

I should like to refer to another objection which has been raised. It has been suggested that we should buy up the stock in the open market, and that suggestion was made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) who for fifteen years, or at all events a great many years, was Minister of Finance in Canada and who earned quite a reputation for himself in that capacity. He seriously proposes to the House that we should buy up the control of the stock in the open market. Could a more utterly impracticable and impossible way of dealing with this question be suggested? My hon. friend has already complained that there has been an increase in the market value of the stock as the result of an announcement made in the public press. What would be the upward trend of that stock if the Government put itself voluntarily in the position of buying up the stock, and having bought 10 or 20 per cent of it, was then forced to buy the balance at any figure the holders might demand? I cannot conceive of a more impracticable proposal.

I wish to refer briefly to one of the chief arguments that has been advanced, namely, that there has been some stock profiteering in London. Now we are not in possession of the facts. No facts have been submitted to the House. It is simply stated that there has been an increase in the value of this stock in London, and the conclusion is drawn that some one is making money out of it. I am informed by one of the very highest authorities that 85 per cent of the Grand Trunk stock remains in the hands of the original holders, that only a very small amount got on the market, and that there has always been only a very small amount on the market. It was, I think, the most flimsy argument that could be put forward, that we should abandon this whole business because somebody is trafficking or attempting to traffic in the stock on the London market.

It has also been stated that the Government should supply the House with a list of the shareholders. These are not my arguments, Mr. Speaker; I am simply referring to those that have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite. I say it has been seriously stated that until a list of shareholders was submitted to the House we should not go on with this legislation. Now there are over 100,000 shareholders and it is stated, and I believe it, knowing something about the matter myself, that it would take at least five weeks to make a list of these shareholders from the share books. The list would contain thousands of names of estates and companies who are holders of stock, which would mean the writing out of lengthy names and addresses. You can see, Sir, the utter impossibility and futility of this suggestion. The information would not only be perfectly useless, but to cable it across would cost over $6,000, and would detain Parliament for five weeks.

It has also been stated that the shares representing ownership of this system are valueless because interest has not been paid on some of the shares. Is it not logical for me to advance this as an argument—that if that is the case, then the Intercolonial is valueless for the reason that it has never paid any interest on its capital? Is not that a logical argument? But the Intercolonial is not valueless, supposing it to be capitalized, simply because it has not paid interest on its capital. The Intercolonial would not be worth par, that is certain, not having paid any interest or dividend, and the same is true of this stock. The value of the stock does not depend on whether it pays dividends or not. That is a guide to investors in buying stocks on the market, it is true, but it is not a fair estimate of the intrinsic value of the stock. The intrinsic value of a stock consists in the net assets behind the stock. If it is found that there are no assets, that the bonded indebtedness and the liabilities are greater than the assets, then there is no value to the stock; that is clear. I said a moment ago that in estimating the value of a stock representing ownership of a concern you take into consideration not only the physical assets but all the liquid assets as well.

I do not wish to speak at any length on the Intercolonial, but it has been mentioned in this discussion a good deal, and I should like to submit a few facts in connection with it to illustrate a point I desire to make. There has been invested in the Intercolonial $126,000,000 of the people's money, to use a common parliamentary phrase; in other words this line has cost about $75,000 per mile. The Intercolonial has a total deficit from 1876 to 1919 of $9,000,000. Now, in face of that, I do not think the argument can be advanced that the Intercolonial railway is a valueless thing and should be discarded. The wise thing to do is to ascertain why the Intercolonial is not a paying concern. That is exactly what we are doing in connection with the Grand Trunk, in which the Government and the people of Canada are interested to a considerable extent at the present time. We are asking for an inquiry that we may know why these concerns are not paying and whether there is any possible way of putting them on a sound basis.

The inevitable conclusion which I think we must all reach is that we have overbuilt in railway systems in Canada, and the roads have not been properly co-ordinated. That is the reason why different sections have not paid. We on this side of the House believe that we can solve the problem by placing the Grand Trunk system in the East, with all its congested traffic, in connection with those lines which at present enjoy the long haul but have a paucity of traffic.

The Government have been somewhat upbraided in connection with guaranteeing these securities—the Government has guaranteed them, so has the Grand Trunk, and so on. The whole railway problem as presented by hon. gentlemen opposite is complicated by the system of financing. I quite agree, but it behooves hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) to ask themselves who are responsible for that system of financing. Who was it that introduced into the Parliament of Canada the system of guaranteeing the bonds of railways? It was the hon. gentleman who sits beside the leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. He is the man who, when in office, introduced a system of financing railways in Canada by which the Canadian Government guaranteed their bonds. And if we are to-day faced with a perplexing problem—I do not say this with any desire to recriminate—the gentlemen responsible for it are the predecessors of hon. gentlemen opposite, and some of those hon. gentlemen themselves. It was the Government supported by them and the party to whom they still owe allegiance that introduced the system of three transcontinental railways for Canada.

It was the Finance Minister of that government, who held that office for so many years, that introduced into Canada the system of guaranteeing the bonds of these railways; and now, faced with this problem, I think it is only fair and reasonable to ask those hon. gentlemen to join with us in an endeavour to solve this problem, and not simply to offer to the Government captious criticism in connection with the subject. I urge that we face the problem and make every possible effort to solve it, and in my opinion the only way in which we can at all effect a proper solution is, as proposed in the Bill, by the acquisition and control, by the National Railway system of Canada, of the Grand Trunk railway.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester): It is with diffidence, Mr. Speaker, that I rise to contribute to the discussion of the question now before the House, a question which is seriously engaging the minds of the thinking people of Canada. The principle of government ownership and control of railways has been exhaustively discussed and its merits or demerits fully demonstrated in this debate by members who have spoken on both sides of the House. As I have frequently in the past advocated government ownership as far as practicable and to the extent that circumstances warranted, I may be permitted on this occasion to reiterate my views on this principle before I proceed to deal with the subject generally. We have been informed, more particularly by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell), that there is a strong current of opinion in Ontario and in the West in favour of public ownership and control of the railroads in Canada. Well, Sir, if that is the case, I regret to say that this sentiment is evincing itself rather late in the day; for I remember that thirty-five or forty years ago, when we in the Maritime Provinces were endeavouring in every way possible to secure a satisfactory operation of the one small road which we had at the time, the position was vastly different. At that time, in my more vigorous days, I was in favour of public ownership and worked strenuously for many years to influence public opinion,—and particularly public opinion of the West,—in the direction of public ownership of the Intercolonial in the Maritime Provinces, with its prospects of future extension; and our ambition was to see an extension of the road, under government control, from one coast to the other, in order to obviate private ownership with its natural greed, resulting in the imposition of exorbitant rates upon the people. We did our best, but I must say that the difficulty always came from Western Canada and Ontario. Every one in the House, even Liberals from Ontario, opposed every possible attempt to secure an improvement of conditions and every proposal which might give an impetus to the operation of the government roads in the Maritime Provinces. The ministers in charge of railway affairs for some time after Confederation were not heartily in sympathy with the administration of the roads in the Maritime Provinces because they did not believe in government control, and after many years, in 1896, when there was a change of Government, we find that the Intercolonial railway was in a decrepit condition due to wanton neglect. When the late Mr. Blair became Minister of Railways, however, he introduced a new and vigorous policy to provide necessary equipment and a proper roadbed, at whatever cost, in order to make the road a paying proposition in the future. The traffic of the road since that time has consequently increased in volume, but we have always been obliged to resist the opinions, emanating from Ontario, where every newspaper, except the one controlled by my hon. friend the member for South York (Mr. Maclean), who, I am sorry to say, is not in his seat, opposed the principle of public ownership of railways. It was due to the splendid administration of the late Alexander Mackenzie, then Prime Minister of Canada, that there was undertaken the construction of the great railroad which was to connect the east with the west, to unite British Columbia with Ontario and Eastern Canada. He began the construction of that road under government ownership, and when the Conservative Administration assumed the reins of office in 1878 that project was abandoned; and later the government of the day, supported chiefly by the province of Ontario, surrendered what had been built by Alexander Mackenzie as a present to the new Canadian Pacific Company, who were then constructing for their own benefit the railroad of which we hear so much to-day. Had Mackenzie's policy been pursued we would not have handed over to that company millions of acres of land in the West which should have been conserved for the welfare of the people. During all that time, and even since the successors of Mr. Blair were administering the road, public opinion in Western Canada supported attempts to end the public ownership of the Intercolonial. It influenced such men as Mackenzie and Mann to attempt to influence the people to transfer the Intercolonial railway to the Canadian Northern for a certain sum; and it is due to the good judgment of Mr. Graham, the then Minister of Railways, that the proposal was rejected and the Intercolonial has consequently remained the property of the Government. If an extension of public ownership be desirable under the peculiar circumstances of to-day there is but one railroad that would justify its acquisition, and that is the Canadian Pacific railway. The surpluses of the system would be adequate to cover the deficits of the National Railway system which have been occurring year after year. If you seriously consider the principle of public ownership let us see what can be done with the Canadian Pacific railway.

When we talk of public ownership in connection with this Bill I have to say that question should not now be introduced because we are not in a position to accept public ownership of railways in Canada at the present time. The time has slipped away, unfortunately, when public ownership could be considered in Canada. In the early years of the twentieth century, in 1903 and 1904, the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then Prime Minister of Canada, conceived the idea of constructing a great transcontinental railway uniting the Pacific with the Atlantic, as a Government-owned property from Winnipeg to Moncton, benefiting alike the open winter ports at St. John and Halifax, the Maritime Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and the whole of Western Canada. Our hon. friends on the other side of the House have found pleasure in trying to throw cold water upon the construction of the Transcontinental railway linking together the Maritime Provinces with Winnipeg and the Great West. All I have to say to them is that in the future it will prove to be a more productive enterprise than it is at the present time and that we owe this project to the vision of the great Canadian statesman who conceived the idea of linking together the open winter ports of Canada, making Canada independent in her trade and commerce—independent of the ports of Portland, Boston and New York— and bringing by the shortest possible route the immense products of the West to the harbours of the East. Unfortunately, conditions have not exactly responded to the ambition of that great statesman and of the Canadian people at that time. Whose fault is it? If in 1911 the administration of that day had been sustained by the people of Canada reciprocity would have been given very shortly to the people of the West and Canada would have enjoyed the flourishing conditions which that policy would have brought about. I see my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) joking and laughing. I admire my hon. friend perhaps as much as does any hon. member in the House; I admire his talent and ability; I have previously given him credit for all of that; but let the hon. gentleman understand that there is such a thing as public opinion in Canada and that his habit of giving so liberally and so heartily to his friends when he rescues him from trouble may turn against him in the future. We must always consider subjects by themselves.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was wondering with some amusement, I must admit, how the hon. gentleman figured that reciprocity with the United States would increase the traffic on Canadian railways such as the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. TURGEON: Reciprocity was destined to bring great development to the country. The prospect of reciprocity was the cause of bringing thousands of settlers to the western territory and to the province represented by my hon. friend, but with the rejection of reciprocity they went back to the United States, and it stopped the current of immigration of farmers from the American States to Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the contrary, they increased every year up to the war.

Mr. TURGEON: Not the farming element from the United States.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, from the United States.

Mr. TURGEON: Not the farming element coming specially from the northern States, the element that was most needed at that time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They came faster than ever.

Mr. TURGEON: I am convinced as much as the hon. gentleman is that I am right, and he will find that my statement is correct if he refers to the figures of 1911-12. Our hon. friends introduce the question of public or private ownership and they say we are against nationalization. I wish that in the early days of Confederation we had secured the construction of our railroads without sacrificing our money and our land. If the Intercolonial has not yet produced the revenues that were anticipated, we have to consider the conditions under which it was constructed and the condition of the country at that time. They were well known. It was stated in a report by the late Sir Sanford Fleming, the most celebrated engineer that Canada has ever produced, that the railway was not expected to make running expenses for many years to come; that it was designed more particularly to unite the provinces of the East and the West, and especially to promote the prosperity of Ontario, which, although it has been very much against this road, has always had the advantage of sending its manufactured products to the Maritime Provinces and capturing the markets which, prior to Confederation, were controlled by the American trade. If the Intercolonial railway had been given the national support that it should have had from day to day and year to year, we would have better conditions in the Maritime Provinces than we have now. The attitude towards that road was such that when, fifteen or twenty years ago, members from the Maritime Provinces asked to have more branches built in different sections for the development of those districts which were awaiting development and for the benefit of the long haul on the Intercolonial railway, the only line then traversing those provinces, they were blocked, and the Liberal party dared not go forward because they were afraid of public opinion in the West. If the public opinion of the West to-day is so strong for public ownership I am sorry it did not come sooner so that in the first years of Confederation we could have saved our lands and our finances; instead of subsidizing companies with lands and money we could have built our own railways and kept our lands for our settlers.

In connection with this question we have not only to look into the financial condition of the country to-day but we have only to look into the financial condition of the road which we are asked to take over. When two years ago the Government took over the Canadian Northern an attempt was made to brand the Opposition as being opposed to the nationalization of railways. To my mind the enunciation of the principle of nationalization by Government supporters came rather late and was not at all concerned with the taking over of the Canadian Northern then and with the taking over to-day of the Grand Trunk Pacific from Winnipeg to the coast.

It has been said to-day in this debate that it is due more particularly to the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific from Winnipeg to the West that this critical condition of things exists, and that this railway should not have been built. When the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier provided for the construction of a transcontinental railway giving western connections to the Grand Trunk and affording the Prairie Provinces another route to the Pacific coast, there was but one transcontinental traversing Canada. The construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific gave a second transcontinental line from coast to coast, and some development was needed before a great return could be expected by that line. What was the chief reason for the Grand Trunk Pacific getting into a financial condition which led to its falling into the hands of a receiver? The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) has declared with great eloquence that it was due to the duplication of that railroad from Edmonton to the coast. But the late Government refused the request of the Canadian Northern to extend their line from Edmonton to the coast on the ground that sufficient trade had not developed to justify a third line from the West to the Pacific. It was not until 1912, after the present administration came into office, that the money was voted to enable the Canadian Northern to carry out this extension, thereby greatly injuring itself and resulting in the Grand Trunk Pacific going into the hands of a receiver. By this policy the existing railway lines in the mountains in the West were duplicated for a distance of eight hundred miles and more, and this duplication took place in country most difficult and most expensive for railway construction, where the traffic was altogether insufficient to justify such expenditure. The result was to injure both the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. Possibly this deplorable condition might not have taken place but for the fact that public opinion in Canada was not awake to the conditions of railway financing and railway operation. Had public opinion been more alert to the probable results of railroad construction at that time the outcome would not have been so serious. Moreover it would possibly have averted what has been a calamity for the Maritime Provinces, in that owing to the situation which developed the Government refused to build and operate branches in the Maritime Provinces under government ownership, leaving small private companies to provide these facilities. These companies, however, were unable to raise the necessary capital to construct and main tain these branch lines, and later on they had to be taken over by the Government. The lack of additional railway accommodation in the Maritime Provinces is still keenly felt, and when the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. J. H. Sinclair) a few days ago urged upon the Government the extension of branches into their respective districts, no satisfactory answer was forthcoming. So we have still to guess what the future may hold for us in that regard.

The figures have been disclosed and we now know that the acquisition of the Grand Trunk means an addition to our debt of $200,000,000, with an interest charge of over $20,000,000 a year. What is the financial condition of the country to-day? I hold in my hand the answers to questions presented to the Government by the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb). There were two sets of questions placed by that hon. gentleman on the Order Paper. The first of these had reference to the result of the operations of the Canadian National railway for the first seven months of the present year. Let me give these questions and the answers thereto:

Finances of Canadian National Railway.

Mr. Robb:

1. What were the gross earnings of the Canadian National Railway from Jaanuary 1, to August 1, 1919?

2. What were the net earnings for the same period?

3. What is the total interest paying debt of the Canadian National Railway?

4. What is the amount of interest on debt of said railway annually payable?

Hon. Mr. Reid:

1. $50,730,974.94.

2. $9,041,464.62. (Deficit.)

3. $460,225,148.93.

4. $19,073,387.08.

It will be readily seen what a serious financial situation these figures disclose. Now, let me take the other set of questions which my hon. friend (Mr. Robb) put and which were answered as follows:

Financial Obligation of Canada.

Mr. ROBB:

1. What are the amounts which go to make up the difference between $2,907,669,041.50 and $1,670,263.52, stated to be the gross debt and net debt of Canada respectively as stated in answer to question given in Hansard September 25, 1919?

2. What are the amounts of bonded debt due by Canada payable respectively in Canada, United States and Great Britain, on August 31, 1919?

3. What is the amount of interest payable per year on the indebtedness referred to in question two?

4. What is the total amount of the indebtedness of the Canadian National Railway Company on which interest was payable on August 1, 1919?

5. What is the amount of interest payable annually on the indebtedness referred to in question four?

6. What is the amount of floating indebtedness for which the loan of $300,000,000 is now being asked for?

7. What are purposes for which said loan of three hundred million are to be devoted in settlement of?

8. Is the indebtedness of the Canadian National Railway Company included in the statement of gross debt given in answer to question on September 25, 1919?

Sir George Foster:

1. Investments:

Sinking funds	$ 18,667,513 13
Other investments	343,662,592 52
Province accounts	2,296,327 90
Miscellaneous and banking accounts	872,776,916 43
Total assets	$1,237,403,349 98

Canada	$1,513,516,567 76
London	362,703,312 40
New York	135,873,000 00

3. Estimates 1919-20 provide for interest on public debt $102,767,625.94.

4 and 5 relate to the Department of Railways and Canals.

6. $265,000,000.

7. Payment of floating indebtedness as above and to meet expenditures to be made in connection with demobilization (including the authorized war service gratuity to our soldiers, land settlement loans, and other purposes connected with their re-establishment into civil life), for capital outlay upon shipbuilding and other national undertakings forming part of Canada's industrial reconstruction programme, and for the establishment of any necessary credits for the purchase of grain, foodstuffs, timber, and other products, and will be spent wholly in Canada.

8. No.

That shows that to-day the national debt of Canada is over two billion dollars.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is six o'clock, and I understand that there are other matters which the Government desire to bring forward. To preserve the hon. member's rights, I would suggest that he move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. TURGEON: I move the adjournment of the debate, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Hon. C. J. Doherty, the House returned to the order of Motions.

FRASER RIVER SALMON.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) laid on the table of the House copy of a convention between His Majesty the King and The United States of America for the protection, preservation and propagation of the salmon fisheries of the Fraser River system.

He said: I move:

That five hundred copies in the English language and two hundred in the French language of the Convention just laid on the Table be printed forthwith, and that Rule 74 in relation thereto be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that it is the desire of a number of members that the House should not sit this evening. In accordance with that request, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DOHERTY: We will proceed with this; we may proceed with some small Bills that are on the Order Paper.

Mr. McKENZIE: Temperance Act?

Mr. DOHERTY: We may even proceed with the Temperance Act. I am glad to see that the hon. member's zeal still persists.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 6.04 p.m.

Monday, October 20, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH AUSTRIA.

COPIES ORDERED PRINTED.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) laid on the Table a copy of the Treaty of Peace between the allied and associated powers and Austria, signed at St. Germain on September 10, 1919. He then moved:

That 1,000 copies of the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Austria signed at St. Germain on September 10, 1919, laid on the table of the House this day, be printed forthwith in English and 500 copies in French, and that the provisions of rule 74 be waived.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion can only be entertained at this stage by unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION CANNERS, LIMITED.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Some weeks ago I moved for some papers in connection with a contract between the Government and the Dominion Canners. Limited. I should like very much to get these papers before the end of the session, if possible.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: So far as I have been able to ascertain, there are no papers bearing on any contract between this company and the Canadian Government, but I shall be glad to give my hon. friend a more definite answer. I shall inquire, and if there be any such contract I shall bring down any papers that bear on it that are properly subject to be brought down before this House.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Restigouche and Madawaska): Has the Government received a resolution passed by the Board of Trade of St. John, New Brunswick, to the effect that they view with great apprehension the acquisition and operation of the Grand Trunk system by the Government?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is no objection to the hon. member asking whether the resolution has been received, but he should not cite the contents of the resolution. This question might more properly be placed on the Order Paper. There is no objection to the question whether the resolution was received.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have no knowledge of any such petition.

TIME OF VOTING ON SECOND READING OF GRAND TRUNK BILL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. J. DENIS (Joliette): I heard a rumour this morning to the effect that the Government would press for a vote on the second reading of the Grand Trunk Bill tomorrow night. This would be in direct opposition to the declaration of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen), who stated that the fullest opportunity would be given hon. members to discuss this question. Is there any foundation for that rumour?

Mr. GAUVREAU: I hope it is true.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There has been no arrangement made looking in that direction. It has been repeatedly stated that the House shall have all the time it wants to discuss this question. I hope, however, that its wants will be reasonable, because we do want to get away in fair time. We are not going to force the matter to a vote, however, until the House is reasonably ready for it.

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend really wants to get away this time.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 29, (from the Senate), for the relief of Millie Wettlaufer.—Mr. Sheard.

Bill No. 32 (from the Senate), for the relief of Arthur LeRoy Eastcott.—Mr. Green.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

M.S.A. DEFAULTERS IN TEMISCOUATA AND KAMOURASKA.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Is the Minister of Justice aware as to whether or not, in the districts comprising the counties of Temiscouata and Kamouraska, the chief of the Federal Police retains the services of a lawyer from Rivière-du-Loup in his raids against defaulters, and that he pays him $10, which is charged to the said defaulter if the latter pleads guilty, and $21 if he enters a plea of not guilty before the magistrate and is not successful?

2. Could not the chief of the Federal Police procure for himself forms from the Clerk of Peace, without the expensive services of a lawyer?

3. If so, will steps be taken to stop this exploitation of defaulters which forces them to put a useless and expensive defence?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. The minister has learned as a result of inquiries made since this question was propounded that Mr. E. H. Cimon, advocate of Rivière-du-Loup, appeared as representing the prosecution in a number of prosecutions against military service defaulters conducted before Mr. Corriveau, the magistrate at Rivière-du-Loup. There is a question of fact between Mr. Cimon and Mr. Horman, inspector of the Dominion Police, Mr. Cimon claiming that he was instructed by Mr. Horman to appear upon terms that the Government would not be responsible for his charges, while Mr. Horman claims that he gave no instructions to Mr. Cimon, who appeared at the suggestion of the magistrate, but after Mr. Horman had intimated to the magistrate that the Government did not intend to engage counsel or become responsible for any charges of counsel in the prosecutions. The further fact appears to be not in dispute that costs were adjudged to Mr. Cimon in the convictions amounting to $10 in undefended cases and $20 in defended cases, which were recovered from the convicted persons for Mr. Cimon's benefit in the cases in which the latter paid the pecuniary penalties and costs imposed. The department did not authorize Mr. Cimon's enpayement upon any terms and had no knowledge that he was acting or receiving fees until notified by this question. The minister in view of the facts as disclosed has intimated to Mr. Cimon that he should repay the amounts received as illegally exacted.

2. Yes.

3. Certainly.

NATURAL RESOURCES OF PRAIRIE PROVINCES.

Mr. CAMPBELL:

1. Was any definite promise ever made by the Government or any member thereof to transfer the natural resources of Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba to these provinces?

2. If so, was any condition attached to such promise which would affect other provinces by way of re-adjustment of subsidies or otherwise?

3. Is the Government of the opinion that the other provinces have any interest or equity in the resources of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba?

4. If such promise was made is it the intention of the Government to carry out the terms thereof? If so, when?

5. If not, does the Government not think that it would be in the public interest to make a definite statement to this effect and thus put an end to the uncertainty which at present exists?

6. Is the proper development of the natural resources of these provinces not being seriously handicapped and retarded by delay and uncertainty in this connection?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. The policy announced by the Prime Minister was and is to transfer the natural resources of the provinces on such fair terms as can be arranged. The necessity of fair terms and the interests of other provinces arises from the fact that when the provinces in question were created in 1905 a special subsidy in lieu of those resources was granted them.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Answered by No. 1.

[Mr. Doherty.]

4. Yes, as soon as possible.

5. Answered by No. 4.

6. The Government is not aware of such retardation.

GUELPH NOVITIATE—JUDGES' REPORT.

Mr. BOYCE:

1. Has the report of the judges who heard the investigation of the Guelph Novitiate been received by the Government?

2. If so, when will it be laid on the table of the House?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

DAMAGE FROM RIOTS IN ENGLAND.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

Was the Government of Canada assessed for the payment of the damages resulting from the riots at (a) Kinmel Park; (b) Whitley Camp; (c) and other places where riots took place in England?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN: This information is not available in Canada, but a cable is being sent overseas for the desired information.

DOCTORS IN PERMANENT ARMY.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. How many positions are there for doctors in the permanent Canadian army?

2. How many applications are there for the said positions?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1. There are sixteen vacancies for doctors in the permanent Army Medical Corps.

2. There are thirty-two applications for appointment to commissions.

ARREST OF ARTHUR LAPIERRE.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. What are the names of the members of the Dominion Police, who on the 30th of September, 1918, entered the domicile of Arthur Lapierre, Montreal, a conscript bearing the number 3157100, and arrested him?

2. Is the Government aware of the fact that in making this arrest, the police used a revolver against the said Lapierre, who has since died from the wounds inflicted by them?

3. If so, is it the intention of the Government to hold an inquest in this matter?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. No members of the Dominion Police force participated in this arrest.

2. and 3. Answered by No. 1.

CANADIAN DOCTORS—POST GRADUATE COURSE.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. Is it true that a few months before the Armistice was signed, the Government asked the doctors in the Canadian army if they desired to take a post graduate course after the war?

2. If so, how many doctors have signified their desire of taking such a course, and is it the intention of the Government to defray the expenses of the said course?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN: This information is not available in Canada but a cable is being sent overseas for the desired information.

SS. CANADIAN ADVENTURER.

Mr. DUFF:

1. Does the Government own a steamship named the Canadian Adventurer?
2. If so, what is her net, gross, and dead weight tonnage?
3. What are her measurements, giving length, breadth, and depth of hold?
4. What water does she draw forward, when light and when loaded, and what water does she draw aft when light and when loaded?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1, 2, 3 and 4. This vessel is still in the hands of the builders, The Port Shipbuilding Company, Ltd., Port Arthur, Ontario. The information asked for, therefore, is not yet available.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. PROULX:

1. Is Brigadier-General J. G. Langton at present Acting Paymaster General?
2. Has he seen service overseas in the European War?
3. Was he an officer in the Canadian Militia at the time of the South African War?
4. If so, did he see active service in South Africa?
5. When was he appointed Acting Paymaster General?
6. Prior to his appointment had he had any experience in pay duties, or was he ever an officer in the Canadian Army Pay Corps? If so, when?
7. What special qualifications did General Langton have to be given this appointment?
8. Does he administer the Pay Branch only?
9. What pay and allowances, including separation allowance, or salary, was he given on appointment?
10. What pay and allowances, including separation allowance or salary, does he draw at present?

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. TOBIN:

For a copy of all papers, correspondence, plans, schedules, drafts of classification, and all other documents respecting the re-classification of the House of Commons permanent employees of all grades, sent by any official of the House of Commons to the Board of Civil Service Commissioners, or to the experts engaged by the said board to re-classify the Civil Service of Canada.

SHAREHOLDERS OF THE GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT: (Chambly and Verchères) moved:

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

For a return showing the names of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, as they appeared in the books of the said company on the 9th of October, 1919, with the address of each shareholder, the number of shares possessed by each and the date upon which said shares were purchased.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: The information here asked for is the names of all shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. While convinced, as I think every hon. member ought to be, that the list of these shareholders, aggregating an immense number, and all, so far as we know, in England, can be of no possible service; and convinced also that the order will cost the country a great deal, involving an expensive return, nevertheless, if the hon. gentleman desires it, the Government will not oppose the motion. It may pass and the names will be secured as soon as possible.

Motion agreed to.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT.

SENATE AMENDMENT NOT CONCURRED IN.

Consideration of an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 11 to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

Hon. A. L. SIFTON (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That the amendment of the Senate to Bill No. 11 be not concurred in for the reason that it prevents the application of the Bill to the whole of the navigable waters of Canada; and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours therewith.

He said: The amendment consisted in the substitution of "tidal waters" instead of "navigable waters."

Motion agreed to.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN moved the second reading of Bill No. 35 to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: Explain.

Mr. MACLEAN: I have already explained this Bill to the best of my ability, and I do not think the House should press me for further information until we are in committee. The purpose of the Bill is to fix a standard can for the packing of lobsters, the sizes being 3, 6, 9, 12 and 16 ounces. The Bill will provide that when lobsters are sold in Canada they must have a label showing the exact contents of the can; that is, the dry lobster meat and not the gross weight of the contents. The law at present provides that a pound can shall contain 14 ounces and smaller cans are based upon that standard, so that we have 3½, 7½ and 10½ ounces. This is undesirable from the standpoint of the consumer. Those who are engaged in the packing of lobsters also object to it because it subjects them to the charge of possible fraudulent practices on the public.

Mr. McKENZIE: When the resolution was introduced I noticed that the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) said that the weight was to be not printed on the label but stamped in the tin receptacle. I had no time to read this Bill and I do not know whether this provision is in it or not. That statement, coming from the chairman of the committee on fisheries, I took for granted to be so. Now I understand from the minister that there is no provision of that kind and there is nothing to show what the weight of the contents will be. There is a statement as to the quality or kind of shell fish contained in the tin but there is nothing on the label as to weight. Is that correct?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Cans of lobster sold within Canada must contain a label showing the weight of lobster meat regardless of the liquid contained in the tins. If this Bill passes as it is and our lobsters are exported to the United States they will then conform with the American law which requires that the weight of the tin or can must be printed on the label. There is no provision as far as I know requiring that the weight be stamped on the can. I think the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) was in error when he made that statement. I quite recollect his making the statement but at the time I was not sure whether he was right or wrong. I do not think there is any law requiring the weight to be stamped on the can. The great proportion of our lobsters are exported to Europe, largely to the English market, whence they go to various European countries. There is nothing in the British law requiring a label, or the statement of the weight on being imported into England, but when the cans are sold in England they must have a label and the wholesale dealers attend to that in England. If English merchants sell these canned lobsters in France the labels must be in French and that is done in London. If they are sold in Belgium or Greece, the labels must be in the language of the country to which they are shipped. I think there is no way of avoiding that as our export lobsters reaching the London market are largely shipped to European countries.

Mr. McISAAC: If I understand aright, the cans provided for in this Bill are such as have been hitherto used by lobster packers?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. McISAAC: I understand there is no change contemplated in the arrangement which existed prior to 1917. That is the desire of the packers in the province from which I come. They desire that no change shall be made and they favour the arrangement for putting three, six, nine and twelve ounces in the can. As to the other arrangement, they say that fourteen ounces of lobster meat cannot possibly be put into the cans they have. The cans they are now using have become standard, the manufacture of them goes right along and a change in the cans would involve a great amount of expense, new standards and new machinery. If this carries out the arrangement which prevailed hitherto it is, I think, satisfactory to the packers all over the province of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Why does the minister depart from the usual weights of a pound, half pound and quarter pound?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the House that we are not in committee. The minister has already spoken. If, however, he should desire to answer the question it will be in order to do so.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am only too anxious to give my hon. friend the information he desires, but if he is willing to allow us to go into committee I shall endeavour to satisfy him.

Mr. DEVLIN: In past years the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) has been cited in the House as an authority on this very subject. I understand that he knows a great deal about canning and is interested in the canning business. The minister has made the statement that this Bill is acceptable to the great majority of canners. I, for one, for the purpose of information, would like to hear from the hon. member for Northumberland to know just how the canners look upon it.

Mr. LOGGIE: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to say that the proposals before the House are the findings of the packers, or a majority of them. In reply to a question by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie), I would say that the present law enacts that lobsters may be exported without labels, and I understand this legislation does not in any way change that. What is done in this case is that when shell fish are imported into Canada for consumption a label must be put on the can indicating the net contents. But when Canadian lobsters are packed for export it is not necessary under the present law to have the tin stamped, although some packers do that for their own protection. As far as I understand the situation, it is the desire of the packers that the weights prescribed here be made the standard weights irrespective of what you call the can—each containing three, six, nine, twelve and sixteen ounces. These will be known as standard sized cans. I do not know whether or not the packers will make them known to the trade as numbers three, six, nine, twelve and sixteen. I know I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen present are aware that a No. 2 fruit can contains only about twenty ounces or a pound and a quarter. A gallon can is known to the trade as a No. 10, but it does not hold an Imperial gallon.

Mr. COPP: It is very interesting to hear from the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) in regard to the views of the packers on this question. I have no doubt that the view he has expressed coincides exactly with the packers' views in regard to the packing of lobsters, in which my hon. friend is deeply interested. I am not very well informed in regard to this matter, but it might be interesting to the House if the minister (Mr. A. K. Maclean)—or if he cannot do so he might get somebody else to do it for him—would explain whether the partners in this business—I refer to the consuming public—have been considered and how they feel about the question of reducing the weight of canned lobsters.

Bill read second time, and the House went into Committee on the Bill.

On section 1—"Dry lobster meat and dry meat."

Mr. DUFF: It seems to me that "dry lobster meat" is a misnomer; there is no such thing as dry lobster meat. Lobsters are put in a can with pickle and then the can is sealed, consequently, when the can is opened, the meat is not dry. It seems to me that the word "dry" should be left out of this section; it would be sufficient to say "lobster meat."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There probably might be something to be said in favour of my hon. friend's suggestion, but it will do no harm to leave the clause as it is. The word "dry" is used in many other clauses of the Act, and if my hon. friend's suggestion is adopted it will involve the amendment of other sections which are not in this Bill. No harm can be done by leaving the clause as it is. My hon. friend may be literally correct in saying that lobster meat is not dry, but it is necessary to give a definition of lobster meat after it is removed from the liquid contents of the can. In view of the effect it will have upon other clauses in the Act, I hope my hon. friend will not press his amendment at the present time.

Mr. DUFF: I do not think the minister has sufficiently answered the point I raised. There are other fish to which this applies as well as lobsters. For instance, nobody can say that mackerel put up in pickle in a barrel is dry fish. The minister ought to see that the language employed in the Bill is correct; there is no necessity for the term which is now to be found there. Even if the amendment involves changing other clauses let us do it and have the nomenclature right.

Mr. TURGEON: I must confirm what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Duff) has said in reference to "dry lobster meat." If that term is insisted on it will create confusion in the minds of the people of the Maritime Provinces who are accustomed to regard "dry fish" as fish which has undergone the process of being dried.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot appreciate the point which my hon. friend makes. I do not think it at all relevant to this section of the Act, which applies to shell fish, and does not refer to fish dried by any other process in the Maritime Provinces or elsewhere. When the lobster is in cans it is contained in a liquid and in order to determine the weight of the lobster meat free of the liquid, the statute proposes to designate it as "dry lobster meat. When the liquid is drained from that meat it, relatively speaking, is dry lobster meat. It is necessary to use a term which distinguishes between the lobster meat after it has been drained and taken from the liquid and the lobster meat when it is in the can with the liquid—some term which is in contradistinction to the meat in the liquid. I do not see what better term there could be than the one used in the clause, and therefore it had better stand.

Mr. DUFF: Why not have the clause read that one minute after the can has been opened and the meat turned out that meat shall be drained? As the hon. member (Mr. Turgeon) says, there is a term in the fish trade which designates dry fish and another term which designates pickled fish. Dry fish means fish that has been sun-cured or cured by artificial means. The term "dry fish" must appear in other paragraphs of the Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It may appear in other clauses of the Act, but we are now dealing with a section which has reference to shell fish, which must be treated differently from other fish.

Mr. DUFF: The ordinary person who reads this clause where "dry lobster meat" is spoken of, and then notices that the term "dry fish" is used in other sections, will surely be greatly confused unless some change is made in the wording. If the word "dry" were omitted, leaving the designation as "lobster meat," it would cover the point.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—description of contents and minimum weight to be marked on cans.

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister explain how the can is to be marked—whether it is the can itself or the label on the can?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will my hon. friend renew his question when we come to the next clause of the Bill?

Mr. CAHILL: We may never come to it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I hope we will. If we do not, then my hon. friend's question is of no avail.

Mr. DUFF: It surely is possible to leave out the word "dry" in the eighteenth line of this section and have it read, "the minimum weight in avoirdupois of the meat in the can plainly printed in a conspicuous manner."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think my hon. friend's case was much stronger when he was discussing the previous section than it is now. I was about to point out to him that this clause discloses the fallacy in the argument he was making a moment ago.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

The purpose of this clause is to the effect that the weight in avoirdupois of the contents of the can containing fish other than lobster shall be the weight of the contents of the can.

No liquid is added to salmon when it is canned, a little salt may be added, but an oily substance is exuded gradually from the fish, and therefore it would be unfair to say in the case of salmon and many other kinds of fish that the contents should be the exact weight of the fish meat. In the case of lobsters it is absolutely necessary to place in the can some preservative liquid, and the purpose of the legislation is to ensure that the weight expressed on the label shall be the weight of the lobster meat, not as in the can with the liquid, but as dried meat—that is, after opening the can and allowing the liquid to drain away for the space of one minute. For that reason we distinguish between lobster meat in and out of the preservative liquid, and in the latter case we call it dry meat and give it a statutory definition. Therefore, my hon. friend"s point is not so strong in this as in the other case, and rather confirms the position I took when this Bill was before the House last week.

Mr. DUFF: I cannot agree with the minister. It is quite evident that although he has lived in the fish country for a number of years he does not know the way fish are packed or he would not give the committee such information. It is a well known fact that when a fisherman packs fish he allows a certain amount for the pickling——

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I was not talking of the packing of all fish, but of certain kinds of fish.

Mr. DUFF: Certain kinds of fish are fish all the same.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Take the case of salmon. Probably I have seen as many packed as my hon. friend—and I suppose neither of us has seen any.

Mr. DUFF: I have seen a few salmon packed in cans and in barrels. I do not pretend to know much about salmon, but I certainly know more than does the introducer of this Bill. The minister said that when salmon was packed a certain amount of oil exuded after a certain time. I was proceeding to say that there are other fish in the same position as salmon in that regard. The difference between my hon. friend and myself is that I know, and he does not know. For instance, when a fisherman packs a barrel of mackerel, instead of packing 200 pounds he packs 205 pounds to allow for a certain amount of water or pickle. So my hon. friend's argument in relation to salmon is not a good one. He argued that this first clause could not be changed because there were so many other clauses in the Act that would also have to be changed. Now he has taken another tack altogether in regard to the second clause.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, it is my hon. friend who has taken another tack.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the particular effect of the amendment in clause 2? From a hasty comparison of the amendment with the Act I see very little difference.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The language of the Act might be construed as requiring that upon the label upon a can of fish, say salmon, the weight of the contents should be simply the weight of the fish, minus oil or other substance exuded from the fish while it was in the can. That was not considered fair by the department. Let me illustrate. For instance, in the case of a pound can of salmon over 16 ounces is put in as a matter of practice. If the salmon remains in the can a certain time a quantity of oil is exuded from the meat. This amendment will permit the weight of the oil so exuded to be comprised in the weight of the contents of the can. The oil is not lost; it can be used with the fish. But in the case of lobster it is desired to make a distinction, so that one cannot include in the weight of the contents the weight of the liquid. In the case of lobsters liquid is added; whereas in the case of salmon no liquid is added, it comes from the fish, and therefore should be computed as part of the weight of the contents of the can.

Mr. CAHILL: In the case of lobster packed in Canada will the weight have to be stamped on the can or on the label, or on both?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The weight will be printed upon the label on all cans of lobsters for domestic consumption. It will be printed upon the labels of all cans of lobsters shipped to the United States, because their law requires it, and if these sections are agreed to, our law will be in conformity with theirs. There is nothing in the statute which requires that the contents be stamped upon the tin itself. If our lobsters are exported to Europe they usually go to the London market, and the English law requires that when retailed in the United Kingdom the label must contain the contents of the can. But the London importers handle a great deal of our product, which is sold on the European continent, and they put the labels on according to the country to which the fish is going. They, of course, desire to print the labels in the language of the country to which they reship the lobsters.

Mr. COPP: In reference to the last couple of lines of clause 2, "the minimum weight in avoirdupois of the dry meat in the can, plainly printed in a conspicuous manner;" is that in respect of lobster meat, canned for domestic consumption only?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would include other fish beside lobster.

Mr. COPP: As I understand, on what is exported we do not need to have any labels?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. COPP: The clause continues, "and the name of the place where the same was packed." Does that mean the name of the province, the town, or the packer? I think we ought to have that defined. The packer's name must be on the label?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. COPP: And if the fish is packed in any county the name of the particular locality must be stated?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. COPP: It says here, "the name of the place." That might be Nova Scotia or New Brunswick.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That would be a "place," I hope.

Mr. COPP: Yes; but my hon. friend treats it as a joke.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No. What does my hon. friend really want to know?

Mr. COPP: Does "name" refer to the particular locality where the fish was packed, or merely to New Brunswick or Nova Scotia?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: "The name of the place where the same was packed." That would mean that if the fish was packed in Sackville, N.B., that name would be placed on the label.

Mr. COPP: And by So and So?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. COPP: It is not so stated in the amended section. I think it ought to be more clearly defined in that regard.

Mr. McISAAC: I do not think it would be practicable to put on the label of the can for instance "Packed in New Brunswick"; "Packed in Nova Scotia"; "Packed in Prince Edward Island," as the case might be. There are many factories in each of these provinces, and the idea must be that there shall be stamped on the label the name of the locality where the packing is done.

Mr. LOGGIE: Some packers have one head office and a number of branches in different parts of the country. I do not think it is intended that the name of the particular place where the can was packed should be put on the label; all that is required is the name of the chief place of business of the packer. That, I think, is the intent of the law.

Mr. COPP: That would be ridiculous. A man whose chief place of business is in New Brunswick might pack at various places in Nova Scotia. I think that the label should state where the goods were packed and by whom.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The only object of this law, I understand, is to punish packers who do not put the proper weight in the can, and in order to have the proof that a certain man packed a certain can of lobsters, I suggest that the minister amend his Bill so as to require that the name of the packer shall be stated on the label. The name of the place is not worth anything, but the name of the packer is important.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is a clause in the Meat and Canned Foods Act as amended by Chapter 33 of the statutes of 1917, which covers the point. It reads:

> All fish and shellfish canneries shall be inspected as provided by the regulations. All fish and shellfish packed in cans shall be subject to inspection during the whole course of preparation and packing, and all such cans shall be marked with—
> (a) the initials of the Christian names, the full surname and the address, or, in the case of a firm or corporation, the firm or corporation name and address or the name and address of the packer or of the fish dealer obtaining it direct from the packer.

Mr. DUFF: Why would it not be better to provide that the name of the packer and his address shall be stated on the label instead of the name of the place where the same was packed?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think that would be quite as suitable as the clause as it now stands, which provides for the full name of the packer. This clause (b) which I am now amending is intended to cover only the statutory requirements respecting the designation of the contents of the can and the name of the place where packed.

Mr. McKENZIE: It has been suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Loggie) that in the case of a corporation with branches in different places, it should be necessary to state on the label only the name of the place where the head office of the corporation is situated. That does not seem to be satisfactory, but that is the effect of subclause (a) of the section in the original Act. If the head office of a corporation is at Halifax and they have branches at various points throughout Nova Scotia, it would be necessary for them only to state the name of their head office on the label in order to comply with the provisions of this clause.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think so. The section reads: "and the name of the place where the same was packed." If the contents were packed in the county which the leader of the Opposition represents it would not be a compliance with the conditions of the statute to state on the label that the can was packed in Halifax. I do not agree with the interpretation of the member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie). The law requires that the label must state the name of the place where the goods were packed.

4 p.m.

Mr. DUFF: Large packers of lobsters in Nova Scotia may purchase and put up lobsters in fifteen different places; would it be necessary for them to have fifteen different labels on each can? It should be necessary for the firm which has its head office in Halifax to state only the name of the place where the headquarters are located. Certainly they could not state the name of every place from Cape North to Cape Sable where they packed their lobsters.

Mr. McISAAC: If you simply put on the name of the firm which does the packing, you will be face to face with this condition; where a firm has a dozen different packing plants throughout a given province a difficulty might arise. If some of the lobsters turn out to be bad or improperly put up, how can you tell where any particular cans were packed? On the other hand, if you put on the can the name of the place where the lobsters were packed, then if there is any difficulty afterwards, the particular packages can be traced up and investigated. Therefore, I think the two clauses as they stand are necessary.

Mr. DUFF: Does my hon. friend say that if a packer packs lobsters at seven or eight different places he has to use seven or eight different labels?

Mr. McISAAC: He has to put on the name of the firm. I think it is desirable as well that the place where the fish is packed should be shown on the label, so that any shipment can be traced in case of complaint.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think I am right in my contention that a corporation in the province of Nova Scotia need give but one address, even if it packs at different places. Subsection (a) of section 12A of the Act of 1917 says:

> The initials of the Christian names, the full surname, and the address, or, in the case of a firm or corporation, the firm or corporation name and address.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: But the next subsection requires that the label must state the name of the place where the fish is packed. Now that provision is either good or bad. It should either be in or left out. It is an old section, and we have kept it in this Bill.

As Parliament has already decided that these labels shall show the name of the place where the lobsters are packed, I am going to assume that Parliament thought it was doing the right thing, and I do not propose to change that. That is not the purpose of this Bill.

Mr. COPP: I think the minister said this was in the Act of 1917.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes. I do not know whether it was on the statute-book prior to that.

Mr. COPP: Parliament decided in 1917 to make the weight fourteen ounces. You are changing that, so why not change the other?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am asking Parliament to change the weight, and unless I am able to convince Parliament that it should be changed I do not suppose Parliament will do it. I am not prepared to ask Parliament to change the other provision. We have a law requiring packers of food products to state upon the label the name of the place where the packing is done, and if it is inconvenient for the packer who may have half a dozen canneries, he must put up with the inconvenience.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think it would meet the case if we were to insert the words " and packer " after the words " the place " in the twentieth line.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am afraid I have not made myself clear to my hon. friend, or he would not have made that suggestion. The requirements with respect to the label are contained in section 12A of the Act of 1917. That section is divided into subsections (a) and (b). We are not amending (a), which reads as follows: " All shellfish packed in cans," and so on. That is applicable to lobsters, which is the fish we are dealing with. Then subsection (b) says " the initials of the Christian names, the full surname and the address, or, in the case of a firm or corporation, the firm or corporation name and address or the name and address of the packer," and so on. Subsection (b) also requires that the name of the place where the packing is done must be shown.

Mr. DUFF: If the minister will ask my hon. friend (Mr. Loggie), who is helping him steer this Bill through, I think he will find that no packer of lobsters or any other fish has ever put on the label the name of the place where the fish are packed. That is quite right, and I am not finding fault with it. All that goes on the label is the name of the packer and the head office address, not the place where the lobsters are packed. That is what is done in my own business, and in the canning of all kinds of fish. The fish are brought from different localities and the cans are labelled with the name of the firm and the head office address only. I think this Bill was brought down in a hurry without sufficient consideration. I am not opposed to the size of the cans, but if the present law is wrong let us put it right now, so that we shall not have to make further amendments next year.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—contents and size of cans of lobster:

Mr. McKENZIE: Surely we ought to be able to pass a little Act fixing the weight of a can of lobsters, without leaving it open to the packer to bother the minister for an Order in Council. As it is, the packer can go to the minister and get him to pass regulations by Order in Council saying what the weight shall be. No minister wants to be bothered with a thing like that. The weight should be fixed by statute. We have had years of continuous wrestling in this House over the lobster question. My hon. friend (Mr. Loggie) will remember that once we took a whole winter trying to pass legislation as to the weight of lobsters that should be in a can and so forth, but we knocked off just where we began, and were no wiser. There seems to be no finality about lobster regulations or lobster legislation. We ought to fix definitely by statute what the weight shall be, and not leave it open to the packer to come to Ottawa in the midst of the packing season to ascertain what the weight shall be. Are we changing the size of the cans, and providing for new sizes? I understood that the great difficulty was that we were departing from the standard can, and that the legislation of 1917 with respect to the size of the can was a great inconvenience to the trade. Shall we have cans of different sizes from the present ones?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is a little difference in the size, and I shall refer to that point again. My hon. friend suggests that it should not be within the power of the minister to grant permission to pack lobsters in cans of sizes other than those mentioned. The position he takes is very largely a sound one, but as regards the size of cans you cannot compare canned lobsters with any other kind of canned fish I know. You can always fill a can with the required amount of herring or trout, but this is impossible with lobsters. One always desires to have a whole lobster, and you cannot fill a can with nothing but lobster tails or lobster claws. Experience shows that it usually takes two lobsters to fill a three-ounce can, more for the six-ounce can, and, because lobsters sometimes have abnormal claws, a still larger can is required.

Mr. McKENZIE: A sort of profiteering lobster.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes. The experience of the packers indicates that these various sizes are necessary. A lobster packer might buy a certain number of lobsters which might require a size other than that fixed in the statute, and I think it is only fair to leave this power with the minister. My hon. friend is right in saying that no department wishes to have this authority resting with them if they can avoid it, but an injustice might sometimes be done if they did not have it.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not think it is right.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Personally, I think it would be very much better to let the lobster packers use whatever size of can their experience showed to be best, provided they placed the contents upon the label. But the public and Parliament evidently have had a different view, and I am simply trying to express it as practically as possible.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. TURGEON: Is there a sixteen-ounce can?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, but as a matter of fact there are very few 16-ounce cans of lobster in the market because no one will buy them. It is a very expensive fish. Twenty-five per cent of the lobsters canned are contained in 3-ounce cans and 60 per cent in 6-ounce cans, so that it is unlikely that the 16-ounce can will ever be used very much.

Mr. COPP: Has it ever been used?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Years ago it was, when lobsters were cheaper. The 16-ounce can, however, really contains more lobster than the average family requires.

Mr. COPP: The minister is mistaken.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Well, more than they will buy.

Mr. DUFF: Does the minister think it necessary to provide that no other size of can shall be used "without the written permission of the minister"? I think there is a clause in the Fisheries Act which gives the minister power to regulate the sizes of cans, so that there is no necessity for this clause.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It does not refer to shellfish.

Mr. DUFF: Then, how did the department last year pass a regulation fixing the sizes of cans of lobster at 12, 9, 6 and 3 ounces, under that clause of the Fisheries Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They did it under this very section of the Bill before us, under the Act of 1917, which contains the very words to which the hon. member refers.

Mr. DUFF: I think they did it under the Fisheries Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Did the minister not take advantage of the special clause in the Bill and change the weight from 14 ounces, as decided on by the House, to 12 ounces?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That was really the effect.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That is what was done.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The 1917 Act contains this very provision, but the section of that Act did not represent the departmental view nor the view of the House of Commons. The section, as regards the size of can, represented a compromise between the Senate and the House of Commons.

Mr. DUFF: What was the view of the department at that time?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not remember, but it was not the departmental view that the statute should state that a pound can should contain fourteen ounces.

Mr. DUFF: What was the view of the House of Commons?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot say what it was, but I know it was not that expressed in this Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: Section 12-D reads:

> There shall be five sizes of cans for canning lobsters. The cans of each size shall contain not less than three ounces avoirdupois, six ounces avoirdupois, nine ounces avoirdupois, twelve ounces avoirdupois and sixteen ounces avoirdupois respectively, of dry lobster meat.

I submit that the section should stop there, because we have never provided, as the next four lines do, that the minister in the middle of a season should have power to change the weights and sizes of cans entirely. There should be some degree of certainty and stability in the trade, and for that reason I move that all the words after the word "meat" in the 29th line of section D be struck out. These words are:

> No other size of can shall be used for packing lobsters without first obtaining the written permission of the minister, etc.

That means that one packer will get permission to do something, another packer will be allowed to do something else, and there will be endless confusion. If we have a standard can there can be very little difficulty. It is one of two things; the fixing of the size should be left entirely to the minister or not at all.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is immaterial to me; I am quite willing to accept the judgment of the committee but I would prefer the legislation to stand as it is. It would have been better, particularly in the case of lobsters, to have allowed the packers to pack their lobsters just as they saw fit and to place upon the label the contents of the can upon the ground that you cannot treat the packing of this particular shellfish as you would any other kind of fish that I know of unless it should be crabs. Certainly you can fix the size of a can in which is put salmon, herring, codfish, or any other kind of fish which differ from shellfish, but apparently the public and Parliament have got it into their heads that lobsters must be packed in certain sized cans. I think they are wrong but we should try and meet them in so far as it is reasonably practicable. I am not trying to enforce my personal views upon the committee. But, it may happen once in a while that in some locality or another a lobster packer may have brought to his factory a particular size of lobster which cannot be placed properly in any of the cans which are authorized by statute and this provision is only for the purpose of enabling the minister to give him authority to get another can. The lobster packer does not desire to do it. He would like if possible to have only one can because it becomes standardized and he has only one size to buy. If this Bill becomes law cans will only be made of the size stated in the statute and if the canner desires to get a smaller size, or a size other than that which is in the Act, he will find it quite costly to get anything but the standard size. Consequently, packers are not very anxious to come to the department to ask for special permission to use a smaller size.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why should the temptation be there?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is just to meet an exigency which may arise at some time or place. We have many statutes giving the department or officers, powers to vary their general provisions.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Can the minister say what the quantity is in the case of salmon, herring and other fish which are put in cans? He promised to give me that information the other day.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am sorry I have not it here. It is in the statutes of 1907.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I understand the minister to say that there is no such regulation as this varying the ordinary pound and half-pound in the case of salmon, herring and the other fish that are packed. Assuming that such is the case, I want the minister to make it clear to the committee why lobster is different from other kinds of fish.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I thought I had made that clear, but perhaps due to my inability to elucidate the matter the hon. gentleman may not have understood my explanation.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The explanation the minister has given is that there are various sizes of lobsters, that they do not all grow alike; one is a six ounce lobster and another is of a different size. There are as many sizes of lobsters as there are of herring or salmon and he is attempting to fix the regulation according to the weight and size that lobsters grow when they are caught. That is impossible. He would want 500 cans instead of five cans to do that; it cannot be done. I do not suggest that you could put a whole lobster in one can for you cannot do it. It is very seldom that you will get a half-pound lobster to fill a can. You will require two or three lobsters to fill one of these twelve ounce cans. I think the minister is a little astray on this question. If he is, the hon. gentleman sitting beside him will put him right. It is not a question of putting all of a lobster in a can, and there must be some reason why the minister departs from the sixteen, eight, and four ounce cans. I would like to hear it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no reason for departing from it except to have established and fixed in the Act that size of can, for the purpose of canning lobsters, which conforms most exactly with the experience of those engaged in the business. Their opinion has been asked about it and departmental inquiries have been made, the result being that it is believed that cans of the size indicated in the Bill are those which would best meet the requirements of the trade. As I have said already, to-day twenty-five per cent of the lobsters canned are three-ounce cans, sixty per cent are six-ounce cans, the rest being other sizes. There is a great distinction between canning lobster and canning salmon. Very obviously salmon of one class or grade must be packed in the same can. But my hon. friend can easily see that you might have 100 salmon of the same type and put a one-hundredth part of each into the same can; at least, you might have samples of every one of the one hundred put into the same can and you would have a can containing salmon of the same type. The lobster packers inform me that that is not their practice and that it cannot be done. If the lobster packer would desire to place in any one can parts of two or three lobsters, it would be hardly practicable to be filling a can with the claws of one lobster, the tail of another, and so on. It does seem absurd. I think the distinction is quite obvious.

Amendment (Mr. McKenzie) negatived.

Section agreed to and Bill reported

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean for the third reading of the Bill:

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. McKENZIE moved in amendment:

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to Committee of the Whole House with power to amend by striking out from paragraph 12 (d) of section 3 the following words: "No other size of can shall be used for packing lobsters without first obtaining the written permission of the minister. Such written permission shall state the minimum amount of dry lobster meat that is to be packed in each size of can so authorized."

Amendment negatived.

Motion of Mr. Maclean agreed to and Bill read the third time and passed.

OPIUM DRUG ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Rowell, Bill No. 34, to amend the Opium and Drug Act was read a second time, considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM.

BILL PROVIDING FOR THE ACQUISITION OF THE SYSTEM BY THE GOVERNMENT.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Reid for the second reading of Bill No. 33, respecting the acquisition by His Majesty of the Grand Trunk Railway system.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester, N.B.): When the House adjourned on Friday last I had intimated that from the beginning of Confederation I had been in favour of government ownership as far as practicable and to the extent that circumstances warranted, but that unfortunately the opinion prevailing in the country from the earliest years had practically made the application of this principle impossible in Canada. I had stated that if to-day the Government, or any party in Canada, were representing that there is a great wave of public opinion in favour of the nationalization of railways they were certainly making a wrong representation before the people; and that if we wished to give a fair trial to the application of the principle of nationalization of railways under present conditions we should first of all apply it to the Canadian Pacific, which distributes millions of dollars of dividends to its shareholders from year to year. Such a policy under proper administration would guarantee for the future, for some years at least, a sufficient surplus to cover the deficits of the railroads which we are now obliged to control and operate. When six o'clock was called, I had just finished a statement with respect to the national debt of Canada and had pointed out that the annual amount of interest charge on that debt amounts to the high figure of $102,-767,625. To this would have to be added the large sum of $19,073,387 annual interest payable on the debt of the Canadian National Railways, as well as a probable deficit for the year of $18,000,000 of the railways now controlled and operated by the Government. As the deficit on those railways from January 1 to August 1 of the present year already amounts to $9,041,464, I think I am right in my estimate that the deficit for the whole year will reach a total of $18,000,000.

So that at present the annual interest charge which has to be paid amounts to about $180,000,000, exclusive of interest on public works. Now, by the acceptance of this project of the Government to take over the Grand Trunk railway we would have to add to this yearly expenditure a large amount of interest approximating $200,-000,000, besides assuming liability for all necessary expenses involved by the, perhaps, unwise administration of the Grand Trunk, amounting in the course of a year or two to about $30,000,000 for equipment maintenance, as will be seen by reference to the Drayton-Acworth report at page xxxiii, where it is stated:

> Grand Trunk Maintenance Expenditure.
> Further the Grand Trunk Railway has not been and is not being adequately maintained. No depreciation fund has been created for equipment. Mr. Chamberlin's view, as shown by his evidence, is that 5 per cent on the cost of the equipment ought to be annually charged under this head. He says:—
> "Take engines and cars, they are either worn out or out of date in twenty years."
> This item, according to his evidence, would have required an annual sum of $2,750,000. He also states:
> "If we had $25,000,000 now, it would put us in fine shape."

The summary given in tabular form in the report shows that for deferred expenditures there is a total sum required of $21,-181,345.07. The report continues:

> On the single item of "rails" the "cash expenditure required to restore normal conditions" is reported as $5,312,142. The cost of restoring ballast to normal conditions is reported as $2,434,000.
> With reference to the deferred renewals in Canada amounting to over $6,000,000, it appears that they have accumulated during eleven years, 1906-16. During this period, in spite of the requirements of the property, and the claims of public safety, $36,000,000 were paid out in dividends.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to call your attention more particularly to the last sentence as emphasizing the condition of the road:

> During this period, in spite of the requirements of the property, and the claims of public safety, $36,000,000 were paid out in dividends.

That statement is in contradiction to the statement the Minister of Railways made the other day that from knowledge he had apparently acquired while travelling in the flying express between Toronto and Montreal the road was in perfect condition. Therefore we would have to provide, besides the amount I stated for interest, a further sum of from $25,000,000 to $35,000,-000 according to the estimate of 1917, which sum probably would not be sufficient to meet present requirements, because it is well known that in anticipation of disposing of the railway the management have not maintained it in proper condition, and therefore it is not as good as it was at the date when this estimate was prepared.

It is said that the report of the Drayton-Acworth Commission recommends that this railroad should be taken over by the Government. On referring to page xxxv I find this statement:

> We have come to the conclusion, therefore, that the control, not only of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company but also of the Grand Trunk Company of Canada, should be surrendered into the hands of the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, if there is any lack of confidence from this side of the House in the Drayton-Acworth report, it is attributable to the Government and their supporters, for when that commission reported that the stock of the Canadian Northern was of no value whatever the Government appointed another commission, and that commission, in addition to the $10,000,000 which the Government said it was willing to pay for that stock—declared to be valueless by the Drayton-Acworth Commission—awarded a further $800,000 to the holders of that valueless stock.

When this Drayton-Acworth report was submitted to the Government and to Parliament it was submitted simply for consideration. It was not within the scope of the authority of those commissioners to state whether this year or next year the Government should rush into a scheme for the purchase of this railway involving a very heavy expenditure. Rather, the recommendation was made for our consideration to enable us to decide whether under present conditions it would be wise to embark on such an expenditure. In 1917, when this recommendation was made, our minds were concentrated on winning the war and restoring democracy all over the world. To-day we are confronted with another duty. The Government is piling up our financial obligations by millions of dollars, so much so that we have lately heard that great financial expert, the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White)—whom I respect as much as does any other member—say that the financial condition of Canada is serious, and that we are not in a position to assume further liabilities—not even for the payment of bonuses to our returned heroes, who to-day are clamouring for some assistance. But, Sir, if there is one form of expenditure that we should endeavour to assume to-day it is whatever may be necessary to help our returned heroes who risked their lives for us on the bloody fields of Flanders and Belgium. No one need tell me that the soldier who spent many months under fire in the trenches, whether or not he may now seem to be as healthy as he was before, is in as good physical condition as he was before he enlisted. His nervous system has suffered more or less and he requires all the assistance and encouragement and opportunity that we can give to him.

The report of the board of arbitration as to the value of the shares of the Grand Trunk is to be final; the representatives of the people are to have no opportunity of passing judgment upon it. I contend that that report should be submitted to the people, through their representatives in Parliament, for consideration and decision. The day of rule by commissions and Orders in Council should now be passed; we should revert to democratic principles in the administration of our affairs.

It is said that the connection of the Grand Trunk with the Grand Trunk Pacific gives us the reason why the Grand Trunk is to-day in the condition that it is. It is my opinion that the Grand Trunk should be dealt with separately from the Grand Trunk Pacific. I admit that the position of the Grand Trunk Pacific is such that we have had to take it over; it has been put under receivership by the Government. Hon. gentlemen speak of receivership for the Grand Trunk as being a calamity, but they did not hesitate to put the Grand Trunk Pacific under receivership. If it is practicable and desirable to have the Grand Trunk Pacific in receivership, I submit that it would be equally practicable and desirable to place the Grand Trunk, the parent company, in the hands of a receiver, as was the case with the Grand Trunk Pacific.

No doubt appeals will be made on behalf of the thousands of shareholders of the Grand Trunk, many of them people of small means in England and on this continent, who bought the shares on the strength of —I will not say false representations, but hasty representations, in many cases, to say the least, while the Grand Trunk were not looking after the interests of their road as they should have been. I shall always sympathize with holders of stock who were induced by exaggeration to enter into such speculation. But we must remember that our first sympathy is for the three or four hundred thousand returned men who fought our battles overseas and who need every possible assistance from us.

During the period from 1906 to 1916 $36,000,000 was paid by the company in dividends to the shareholders. Had they applied that amount to the improvement and maintenance of the road it would not be in the condition that it is in to-day, and the company, instead of trying to load the railway on the country, would be refusing to part with it. My advice to the company is: Let your shareholders do without dividends for another ten years and during that time direct all your energies to the operation, maintenance and equipment of the road; put into it every dollar that you can raise, and after a while you will be able to commence paying dividends to the shareholders.

There is another reason why I am opposed to the taking over of the Grand Trunk Railway system to-day. If one speaks of the East, or of the West, or on behalf of any particular portion of the East or of the West, that does not mean that he looks at these matters from a narrow or sectional point of view. Our country is one of immense territory stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and naturally the conditions in its various parts are diversified; the products of the different sections vary. It is only by harmonizing the different elements of the country, facilitating the production and distribution of commodities throughout the whole country, taking full advantage of the different strategical positions, so to speak, occupied by different portions of our land, that we can possibly adjust conditions satisfactorily and do what is best for the national good. One of the reasons, then, why I am opposed to this project is that it is against the interests of the Maritime Provinces, more particularly against the interests of the ports of St. John and Halifax. I do not make this assertion from any provincial point of view. I believe, as I have already said, that the ports of St. John and Halifax have been placed where they are on the maritime coast of Canada by the hand of Providence for the well-being and prosperity of the whole of our country. In the words of George Etienne Cartier at the time of Confederation, when he advocated the construction of the line of railways which would have for its purpose the linking together of these different parts of Canada, the presence of these ports on the maritime coast have a tendency to rid Canada of the necessity of being under the whim of the collectors of customs of the United States.

5 p.m.

What reason is there to-day for the taking over of the Grand Trunk? The Transcontinental brings the products of the great Prairie Provinces from Winnipeg, the centre of the grain production of the West, by the shortest route to our national open ports, shortening the distance of carriage by four hundred miles. This line has not been given the fair trial that it should have been given by the Government since 1911; but notwithstanding that neglect it carried the grain of the West last year to the Maritime Provinces four cents a bushel cheaper than it was carried by any other railway. If that road had been given a fair chance we would not to-day be under the necessity of sending out the greater portion of our wheat through American channels.

It is said by some that we have too many railroads in Canada; that we do not need all these transcontinental lines.

We need these three transcontinentals. It may be that the present railway situation is due to different governments of Canada having refused to adopt the principle of the nationalization of railways simultaneously with the construction of the Intercolonial forty years ago. In consequence, the private railroads have all been looking for communication with the great centres of distribution, Saskatoon, Winnipeg, Port Arthur, and so on, which has led to much duplication. Nationalization of the railways years ago would have avoided this duplication. It was in the interests of Canada that the Transcontinental railway should be built, because it brought the maritime ports four hundred miles nearer to Winnipeg.

There is another matter I wish to refer to in connection with this legislation. The ports of Halifax and St. John will be brought into competition with Portland, Maine. We have spent or are spending $40,000,000 on improving the port of Halifax, and $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 in improving the facilities at St. John. In passing I might say that one of the hon. members for Halifax stated when he was on this side of the House that the location of the facilities at Halifax was not the best. However, we are spending these great sums on these two maritime ports, and now we propose to take away their trade and send it to Portland, Maine.

Mr. McKENZIE: No truck or trade with the Yankees.

Mr. TURGEON: No, we must not send our wheat, our horses or our cattle to the United States where we can get a better price, but we are to give Boston, Portland and New York the advantage of our export trade. When the Liberal party had approved of the construction of the National Transcontinental from Winnipeg East, and of the Grand Trunk Pacific from Winnipeg to the Pacific Coast, there was another proposal submitted to Parliament and the people of Canada, for securing the shipment of goods through Canadian ports, thereby building up the business of those ports and of our own railways. A resolution was passed by the Liberal administration in 1906 or 1907 by which importers of goods from Great Britain enjoyed the British preference only in case their importations came through Canadian ports. That was done, first, to develop greater trade with the British Empire, and secondly, to encourage the railroads we were building in Canada. To-day we hear of public opinion in Ontario in favour of the nationalization of the railways, but for years men did not dare mention that principle. It was also from Ontario that the resolution I have spoken of met with the greatest opposition, some two or three Ontario members on the Liberal side going so far as to vote against their leader and against the resolution. In view of such strong opposition to a measure of national interest, what opposition may we not expect to-day to a proposal to divert Canadian trade from our own ports to the ports of the United States? The present outlet of the Grand Trunk is not one of our maritime ports, but Montreal, and thence to Portland. Now trade does not always follow the flag; it follows the streams that are open to it, and if you open the streams of trade from Montreal to Portland, as against Montreal to St. John and Halifax, trade will follow the stream and will be diverted to Portland. That applies not only to the roads west of Montreal, but to the roads east of Montreal. The money that has been spent on improving the ports of Halifax, St. John, and Quebec is apparently a secondary consideration with this Government.

When the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) was speaking the other day, my hon. friend from Royal (Mr. McLean) asked as to the possibility of trade being diverted from St. John to Portland. The minister's answer did not satisfy me, and I put the same question to him in a more concise form. I used as near, as I remember, the words of the resolution of 1906 or 1907. I asked whether ocean traffic collected on the Grand Trunk west of Montreal and designated for ocean ports would continue to go to the ports of Halifax and St. John, and the minister replied that he could not add anything to the explanation he had given to my hon. friend from Royal. What was his answer to that hon. gentleman? He said:

> Of course, when we are on the Bill, I shall be glad to discuss that matter, but I might say this evening that the ports of St. John and Halifax have been and are being still further developed for our own Canadian ocean terminals, and the Government intend using those ports to their fullest capacity. There is no doubt about that. We have now the Transcontinental which was originally built for that purpose right into St. John. But Portland is a portion of the Grand Trunk system and the hon. member will understand that a large portion of the Grand Trunk is in the United States. There is the Central Vermont and other portions of that line, so that Portland will have to be used to a certain extent for portions of the Grand Trunk railway system. But I want to impress upon the hon. member that there is no intention of not carrying out the policy of the Government in the past of developing and keeping our traffic in our own Canadian ports so far as it is possible to do that.

The maritime road was a masterpiece of railroad construction and was a credit to the entire Dominion. It was built for heavy transportation, having more particularly in view the shipment of western products to maritime ports with a minimum of cost. But, I repeat, owing to a disastrous turn of events in 1911, there was a change of administration, with the inauguration of a policy which threatens to rob us of the full benefit of our national ports. The Minister of Railways, who I regret is not present, tersely says: "You have the Transcontinental running from Moncton." The policy of the Government has been to bring all possible traffic from the prairies and from the West via Winnipeg, not to Quebec or Moncton, but to Cochrane, diverting it towards Toronto and giving it to the Grand Trunk, and sending it to the ports of New York, Boston and Portland. It is with considerable apprehension that I view this condition of affairs. Possibly, Mr. Speaker, hon. members may think that I exaggerate, but let me assure my hon. friend, the member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) that there are others in the Maritime Provinces who are equally as concerned as I am over the possibilities of the legislation now before the House. Only last Friday night the St. John Board of Trade passed a resolution in connection with the subject, expressing their opposition to the acquisition by the Government of the Grand Trunk railway in the absence of more reassuring information than they at present have. That resolution reads:

> Resolved, that this council views with grave apprehension the acquirement by the Government of Canada of the Grand Trunk Railway, including that feature which would involve the owning and operating of a railway in a foreign country, and in the absence of fuller information would oppose the plan. The council would, however, welcome any person that the Government might feel disposed to depute to explain to the board the advantages to the country of the action proposed, and in the meantime would maintain an open mind on the subject.

A copy of this resolution was sent to the Government for their information. I regret that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Wigmore) is not in the House. If he were I would ask him if he has not already been deputed to convey to the people whom he represents the views of the Government in regard to the railway situation. At the beginning of the session I drew the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that there was not a representative from New Brunswick in the Cabinet, and expressed the opinion that it was a matter of vital importance to that province that it should have such representation, at least to the extent of one member. Two months have passed since I made that representation, but no one from New Brunswick has been invited to join the Cabinet. And when I learned that this resolution would come before the House I thought that my hon. friend from St. John would be sent by the Government to pacify his constituents and give them every assurance that the interests of the country would not suffer as a result of this great undertaking which is contemplated by the Government. Let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the Board of Trade of St. John is by no means a political body, and certainly it is not Liberal in its sentiments. It is purely and simply a commercial organization, and the consensus of its influence tends, if anything, to the exclusion of Liberalism. When therefore that council in St. John appeals to the Parliament of Canada upon such a vastly important proposition as this, its representations, in my opinion, deserve every possible consideration. Now, the Minister of Railways said the other day that he would give an explanation. Well, Sir, there are some explanations that, strangely enough, do not explain anything, and we are yet to learn from the hon. minister that the commercial value of our own national ports will not in reality depreciate. We have been told that our national debt is so vast as to stagger the imagination and that it will tax our greatest ingenuity to make both ends meet. We are faced with a yearly expenditure on interest aggregating some $175,000,000; yet we are going to undertake, by the acquisition of the Grand Trunk, an enormous annual expenditure.

Now, I appeal to my western friends who have left the Government because of their disagreements with them in regard to tariff questions. The farmers of the West, as well as those of the East, have been expecting a reduction of the tariff from day to day, and from year to year, in order to be able to revive their activities in the further production of food not only for our country but for the countries in Europe. They have claimed that they cannot produce to advantage because of the tariff exactions made upon them. They are clamouring for a reduction in tariff duties. They have been told by the Government to wait for another year or two. They were told last session to wait for the ministerial commission which would be appointed to travel over the country, take evidence and see what could be done in regard to the reduction of the tariff. The session ended the first week of July last, the summer is over but another session was called without regard to the work of this commission. We have been here for two months and the ministerial commission has not started out yet. We have been told to take as much time as we desired for the consideration of this question. We may be here if we wish until November or December but in the meantime the tariff commission remains in Ottawa and the producers of the West will have to wait for another year. How does that situation agree with the demand for tariff reduction from the West? The farmers of the West have no interest in this railway. It is the people of Ontario who want to make further connections between the Grand Trunk and Winnipeg. They want another outlet to the West and they will have to get that outlet either through North Bay or Port Arthur.

The situation is serious. I know that the Grand Trunk Pacific has to be administered in some way or other by the Government. Let us decide at once that we will take over the Grand Trunk Pacific, add it to the Transcontinental and have one national railway. In doing this we will certainly add again to the debt of the country but the country is confronted with a situation, not with a principle. Let some means be devised by the Government so that they can come to an arrangement with the directors of the Grand Trunk to relieve them of their responsibilities in regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific. Let us relieve them from these responsibilities and let the country assume them, take the road over and have one line from the Pacific to the Atlantic. Time will reveal that when the Grand Trunk Pacific was constructed it was constructed in the interests of the country. The requirements of the country demanded it and if the policy in regard to it had been maintained, if we had refused to duplicate that line from Edmonton to the Pacific coast by aiding the Canadian Northern to the extent of 800 miles we would not be confronted with the position that we face to-day. I think this is the best possible solution of the situation. Let some means be devised by which some arrangement would be made to take over the Grand Trunk Pacific and tell the directors of the Grand Trunk that they will have to exercise economy, raise means in all available ways, stop paying dividends to the shareholders that are not earned, and put every dollar of receipts into the maintenance and improvement of their road.

This project, since its introduction a few days ago, has been receiving the earnest consideration of thinking people throughout Canada. As we have seen by the resolution passed by the Board of Trade of St. John, and expressions coming from other directions, the people of Canada are considering the situation and are averse to putting any further financial burden upon the country. There are others who do not partake of the views of the Government but who are offering the Government every possible assistance in taking over the Grand Trunk Pacific and stopping at that in order not to plunge the country into a more serious financial condition than that in which it finds itself to-day. If we go on a few steps farther we may find the situation not only dangerous but disastrous.

My attention has been called to a letter published in the Ottawa Citizen the other day from one whom I consider an authority upon the resources of the country and the way in which they should be developed. In his earnest devotion to Canada he takes second place to none. The fact that he is a Liberal does not mean that he is not a Canadian. His suggestions merit the attention of the Canadian people and more particularly of those who are conversant with his activity, his energy, his success in life and his devotion to his country. I refer to the Hon. Senator Edwards, of Ottawa, who to-day, unfortunately, is not permitted to come to the Senate and explain his views, and suggestions, patriotic as they are and worthy of the commendation of the Canadian people. He expresses my views not only upon the question of the nationalization of railways, but the position of the country and the future of our resources, resources which are immense, but which may be wasted as they have been in some directions in the United States, where they have exhausted their timber resources and to-day have to come to Canada for their supplies. If we pay no more attention to our resources than the Americans have done we will in the future regret the unwise freedom which we have taken in their development without consideration of the future needs of the country. After explaining his views, Senator Edwards arrives at certain conclusions. Let me read his words so that there will be no misapprehension:

> No one should criticise to any extent without offering some alternative to that which is suggested. As I understand, it is the purpose of the Government to take over the old Grand Trunk Railway system and add it to the many miles of existing railway which are already under the administration of the Government of Canada. Now, so far as I am concerned, I see no justification whatever for taking over the Grand Trunk Railway proper. It is a railway having a great portion of its trackage in the United States. It was constructed and is owned by British capital. It is true that the affairs of that railway are complicated by reason of its having undertaken responsibility with regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific. In my judgment the Government should not go beyond making arrangements to relieve the Grand Trunk system of that responsibility. That done, the old Grand Trunk system would be in its former position.

This is what I claim should be done. Let the Government make the best possible arrangement as to the Grand Trunk Pacific, from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast. Let them secure a good transcontinental railway, under Government ownership and control, and then allow the Grand Trunk themselves to do the best they possibly can, and direct their energies into the improvement of their road, and in time they will be able to surmount the difficulties which confront them without forcing Canada into a state which approaches a dangerous crisis, not to say any more. Our resources are well known in England. Let the directors and the shareholders of the Grand Trunk place before the capitalists of England the value of those resources and the necessity for extending temporary assistance. That assistance will then be obtained from the capitalists of England and also from the capitalists of the United States, where the Grand Trunk likewise operates. In the general interests of Canada I cannot support the Bill now before the House. I cannot support the project for taking over the Grand Trunk, because I see no national necessity for it. If it is not a national necessity it must consequently be against the interests of the Maritime Provinces; and it is opposed to the very idea of Confederation which brought together the Canadian East and the Canadian West, and had for its object freedom of trade throughout Canada under every possible circumstances which could have been foreseen fifty years ago. To-day we live on peaceful terms with the United States, and I hope that condition of peace will continue for centuries to come. The United States will undoubtedly do everything possible for the improvement of their own railroads and the development of their trade and their wealth, regardless of the needs of any other country. We also have our own interests to guard, and I foresee the danger in this project of a diversion of Canadian trade to United States seaports. For that reason I regard this policy as not only opposed to the best interests of the Maritime Provinces but highly prejudicial to Canada as a whole. If Canada as a whole is not prosperous, happy, and contented how can any portion of the Dominion be in that desirable state. It might be an advantage to Toronto to centralize the traffic and the offices of a great railway in that city, but that would not necessarily be in the national interests, Toronto does not constitute the whole of Canada. I have every possible respect for Toronto and the press but when that press make representations that are of a deceptive character, we must call upon the people outside of Toronto, and even outside of Ontario, to see that Canadian interests shall be preserved for the East as well as for the West, and that we shall embark upon no policy that will mar the prospect of having a happy, contented, and prosperous nation. For the reasons I have given. I shall vote against the Government's project.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): The question that is under review by the House at the present time is unquestionably, one of the most important—if not the most important—that has come before this Parliament. It is important for several reasons. It is important because it means the incurrence, of a very considerable addition to the public obligations of the country. It is important also, because if this legislation is passed, one of the oldest railroads in Canada shall disappear. Now in any consideration of the question we have, I think, from the very force of circumstances, to take into account what the position of the Grand Trunk is at the present time. It is a matter of certainty that to-day the Grand Trunk railway is in a very difficult—and in reality when one surveys all the circumstances of the case—an almost, if not quite hopeless position. This is due to the obligations incurred by it in the building of the Grand Grand Trunk Pacific in order that it might have a through line to the prairies of the West and an outlet to the Pacific ocean. An argument has been put forth by the directorate and management of the Grand Trunk that it should be relieved of any liability in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific. In the face of all the circumstances I think it is impossible for this Parliament to concede that position for a moment——

Mr. ROWELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: —and the best evidence of this is found in the report of the Royal Commission on Transportation that was appointed a few years ago to investigate the whole railway situation of the Dominion. What is the judgment of this commission in respect to that particular point? Let me illustrate by reading a brief excerpt from the report of the commission. This is taken from a letter which was sent by Mr. W. H. Biggar, K.C., General Counsel for the Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific railway. In that letter Mr. Biggar states:

> The construction by the Grand Trunk interests of a line into the western provinces appears to have been first suggested by Mr. Hays to the late Sir Charles Rivers Wilson, then President of the Grand Trunk, early in 1902. The correspondence between these two officials clearly shows that the chief purpose was the construction of a line to connect the Ontario lines of the Grand Trunk with the western provinces. The general outline of the scheme having received the approval of the directors of the Grand Trunk in London, Mr. Hays, on October 23rd, 1902, submitted it to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then Prime Minister.

This is the statement of the General Counsel of the Grand Trunk railway, and I think clearly establishes the fact that the idea of building this transcontinental line originated in the minds of those who were then associated with the management of the old Grand Trunk railway. And of course, Mr. Speaker, for very natural reasons. The Grand trunk lines were confined to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec so far as Canadian mileage was concerned. The management realized it was handicapped in operating a road within this circumscribed area, and that if the road was to reach a position of strength in the country it was necessary to reach out into the western provinces and get, as it developed, a portion of the profitable business that originated in that portion of the Dominion. Consequently, for very good reasons, they approached the Government of the day with the proposal that this road should be built.

Now, in face of that how can we consider for one moment that the Grand Trunk Railway Company shall be relieved of its liabilities in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific? I dismiss its responsibility for the operation of the National Transcontinental for the reason that the Government a few years ago, when that matter was under consideration, according to the Royal Commission I have referred to, practically relieved the Grand Trunk of any obligation to operate this portion of the system. But when we come to consider the position of the Grand Trunk in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific, we find, according to the statements of this same Royal Commission that investigated our railway situation, that its present liabilities in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific reach $5,000,000 a year, and at the end of 1923 will reach $7,000,000 a year.

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is under a misapprehension. The Grand Trunk was not under any obligation to operate the Transcontinental; it was the Grand Trunk Pacific that was under that obligation.

Hon. Mr. CRERAR: It was a slip of the tongue; I meant the Grand Trunk Pacific but in any event it amounts to the same thing. The existing obligations of the Government in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific amount, according to the statement of the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), a few days ago to probably $145,000,000. We have therefore in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific this situation: that the old Grand Trunk, through its guarantees, is liable for the interest on the moneys invested in that road to the extent of over $100,000,000, and the Canadian Government is interested to the extent of over $140,000,000. The information placed before the House a few days ago in respect to the position of the old Grand Trunk indicates clearly that it is an impossible position as far as the payment of the interest on its investment in the Grand Trunk Pacific is concerned. I will admit that the last two years of railroad operation in Canada have been difficult years, and that it is perhaps unfair to take those as a true index of the business of the Grand Trunk; but even if we take the history of the Grand Trunk back for the last 15 years, we shall find that it has not at any time earned sufficient net revenues to meet its obligations on the Grand Trunk Pacific in addition to its own fixed obligations. Consequently I think we are perfectly safe in arriving at the conclusion that the Grand Trunk Railway Company is in the position where it cannot meet its obligations on behalf of the Grand Trunk Pacific. In fact, it requires no argument to demonstrate that fact, because it has been admitted by the Grand Trunk railway itself.

Now, what is the position of Parliament and the country in respect to this? It seems to me there are only three courses open to us. First, to relieve the Grand Trunk of its obligations in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific, and leave it as it was before this enterprise was undertaken. That, Mr. Speaker, let me say, is a condition that in my judgment will not be tolerated for a moment by the Canadian people. I do not think, in view of the fact of the part that the Grand Trunk Railway Company played in the initiation of this enterprise, that it should be relieved of its responsibility in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific. What, then, is the next course? It is for the Grand Trunk to go into liquidation. There are several reasons why that is not desirable. In the first place, it might seriously damage the financial credit of Canada. We must bear in mind that our country is a developing country, and that for many years we shall have to go outside for assistance to finance our public enterprises. We have a large country with a population of only 8,000,000, but we hope that in 15 or 20 years we shall have a population of at least 15,000,000, and in order to carry on our national development it is necessary that Canada's credit be maintained unimpaired in the markets of the world. And in any case it is perhaps doubtful what would be the outcome of liquidation proceedings so far as the responsibility of the Dominion is concerned. It is doubtful, in my mind at any rate, whether it would relieve us entirely of our liability in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific. What, then, is the other course to be pursued? To my mind it is the course that the Government have proposed in this resolution which we are now considering, and which commends itself to my judgment as the best way out of an extremely difficult situation.

We are not now discussing, Mr. Speaker, the question of whether this country should or should not commit itself to the principle of public ownership of railways. That question has been settled for us—settled, if you like, by the very force of circumstances that have developed in the last few years. We own to-day, independently of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, some 15,000 miles of railway mileage, and we are operating that mileage to-day—operating, it is true, through a company, but nevertheless the people of Canada in fact own and operate these roads. It is not a question, then, of the practicability of Government ownership. It is, in my judgment, a matter of making the best of a bad situation.

What is the position of our Government railways? We have the Intercolonial, the oldest Government line in Canada, running from the Maritime Provinces, to the city of Montreal; then we have the Canadian Northern lines, the National Transcontinental, and the Grand Trunk Pacific. But a study of the situation reveals this fact, that we have two Transcontinental lines, with a large number of branch lines in Western Canada—and I may say, those are located through the best territory in the West—with comparatively little branch mileage in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Now, if we are going to operate to the best advantage the existing mileage that the country possesses, is it not necessary from a sound business point of view to get additional mileage in the province of Ontario and also in the province of Quebec?

When the National Transcontinental was undertaken at the request—or at any rate, at the suggestion—of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, one of the arguments advanced in favour of it was that it would be a complementary system to the old Grand Trunk in Ontario; that the Grand Trunk required these extensions into the Western Provinces, required the transcontinental line, in order that they might more effectively carry on their business. If that argument was sound then—and it was considered sound—is it not equally true to-day that the Canadian people, having the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental, finds it necessary to have the old Grand Trunk as complementary to these systems? I think the question is beyond argument from a practical business point of view.

Some objections have been raised, particularly in a portion of the public press of Canada, to the principle of public ownership. While I recognize that the question has much opposition, I say frankly, Sir, that I believe in the principle of public ownership, and there are strong evidences throughout the world that all democratic peoples are coming to a belief in it. But one of the strongest arguments advanced outside of this House against the public ownership of railways in Canada is that it cannot be made to pay, and the experience of the Intercolonial is cited as evidence of this. I have taken the trouble to make some inquiry into the relative rates of the Intercolonial and Canadian Pacific railways in the past. In the year 1918—my authority for these figures is Mr. Payne, statistician of the Railway Department—the average freight rate on the Canadian Pacific railway was eighteen per cent higher than it was on the Intercolonial, and the average passenger rate was twenty-four per cent higher. I venture the assertion that if the Intercolonial had enjoyed during the past thirty years a parity of rates with those of the Canadian Pacific, we would not have had the deficits that have occurred in connection with the operation of that road.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (resuming): When the House rose at six o'clock I was discussing the experience Canada has had with the Intercolonial railway and had referred to the arguments advanced against public ownership based on our experience with the Intercolonial as a road that had not been profitable. I pointed out that had freight rates on the Intercolonial during the year 1918 been similar to those enjoyed by the Canadian Pacific railway probably an altogether different result would have been obtained. There is, however, this fact to be borne in mind, that the Intercolonial was not built with the expectation of its being a paying railway. It was part of the bargain of Confederation, and when one bears in mind that the Intercolonial has had to compete with cheap water rates during the whole of its career it is not much to be wondered at that deficits have occurred on the road. I submit that it is not fair to cite the Intercolonial's failure to earn profits as evidence of a lack of virtue in the principle of public ownership.

There is another factor in connection with the Intercolonial that we may as well consider. There is no doubt that during its whole history the Intercolonial, up until very recent years at any rate, has been the subject of political management to a very great degree. I adduce these facts in support of my contention that the Intercolonial was never at any time considered seriously as a going business concern. The experience of Great Britain and the United States during the past few years has also been cited as evidence against the virtue of public ownership and the possibility of making public-owned roads pay. That also is not quite fair.

Mr. BURNHAM: Are we not now discussing this matter because private ownership has failed?

Mr. CRERAR: We are. In the case of Great Britain and the United States the public operation of railways has been carried on under conditions of extreme stress during the war period, when operating costs were high, and when the full advantage of systematic operation could not be had; but even in Great Britain such a competent authority as Sidney Webb, who is an economist of repute in the United Kingdom, argues, and I think with considerable force, that government operation of railways there during the past few years has not been a financial failure, and that if everything is fairly and evenly balanced up the railways of Great Britain under government operation have returned a very fair profit. I think it will be admitted by close observers that public operation in the United States during the years of the war has not had a fair trial. Those who argue that public ownership does not pay must surely have overlooked the experience of the railways of the United States during the past decade or more. I find on inquiry that on June 30, 1915, the latest figures I have, although I believe later ones have been published, there were 23,800 miles of railway in the United States exclusive of terminal and switching companies that were in receivership, embracing over 85 carriers. So it is not fair to argue that public ownership does not pay when we have striking evidence of private ownership failing to pay in a country like the United States. But what is the result of private railways going into receiverships in the United States? It is to create a public opinion through the newspapers and every possible public agency that is available in support of a demand for increased rates in order that private companies who have increased their capitalization through stock jobbing and other processes of that kind might earn dividends on an inflated capital value.

We can cite some evidence of public ownership in the Dominion of Canada to show that public ownership can pay its way, and I should like to direct the attention of the House briefly to the experience of the city of Winnipeg in the development of its city light and power. Ten years ago the citizens of Winnipeg were paying to a corporation controlled by Mackenzie and Mann ten cents per kilowatt hour for electric light, and a proportionate charge for electric power to drive the wheels of industry in that city. Efforts were made to get this privately-owned corporation to give the people a fair deal in the price of electric light and power, but without success, and a very strong demand developed among the citizens that the city should undertake the development of its own hydro electric system and the sale of light and power to the citizens at a lower rate than they were then paying. That proposal met with opposition, and with the same kind of opposition that public ownership of railways is meeting in Canada to-day. Financial authorities throughout the country argued that the city in undertaking this expenditure of millions of dollars was committing financial suicide, and that nothing but bankruptcy could eventually result. Nevertheless, when the by-law was submitted to the people it carried by a large majority and the project was undertaken. What has been the result? That enterprise to-day has invested in it more than $7,500,000, which all will agree is a considerable amount for a city of 200,000 people. During the last six years it has returned a profit of over $430,000, after caring for all proper charges in the way of depreciation and maintenance. This was fully established by an independent audit of the books of the city in respect to its light and power. But what else happened? The moment the city turned the switches on to deliver light and power to the city of Winnipeg it reduced the rate from ten cents to three and one-third cents per kilowatt per hour. The people of that city have for the last six or seven years enjoyed that reduced rate, and there has been a revenue, after caring for all charges, as I have just stated, of over $430,000. We have also the case, on a much larger scale, of the hydro-electric in Ontario.

Mr. RICHARDSON: May I inform the hon. gentleman that it also compelled the competitors to reduce their rates from ten cents to three and one-third cents, and the people of Winnipeg were saved two or three million dollars every year.

Mr. CRERAR: I did not mention that fact because I am anxious to get through as quickly as possible. I know that there is a keen desire on the part of hon. gentlemen to get out in order to learn the election returns, and I am indeed grateful to them for giving me an opportunity to conclude my remarks, since I am obliged to leave shortly to catch a train. Of course, the private corporation that previous to that time had been selling light and power at a much higher rate immediately made a reduction to meet the reduced rate of the city.

I am aware that there has been considerable criticism directed against the hydro-electric in Ontario, and I know that supposedly competent financial authorities have criticised the administration of that enterprise, and have stated that it imposes immense financial burdens upon the people of that province. But, Sir, there is no danger of imposing financial burdens upon a province like Ontario in a matter of this kind, if in the sale of the article produced, sufficient revenue accrues to meet interest on investment and provide a sinking fund to retire at their maturity the bonds by which the money is raised. And from what information I can get, that is precisely the situation in Ontario. Let us consider the advantage it has been to that province in the matter of cheap light and power, and the advantage it has proved to the rural parts of Ontario. I have discussed this matter with many farmers of Ontario and they tell me that the introduction of hydro-electric into their municipalities and the consequent sale of electric energy on the farms is very largely changing the character of their agricultural work on the farms. Whereas hitherto the farmer's wife had to drive by hand a washing machine or churn and the other equipment in a farm house, this work is now done by electrical energy and the labour on the farm is correspondingly reduced. This is all accomplished after such provisions have been made as to make the enterprise pay its own way at every step of the journey.

The cases of the city of Winnipeg and of the Hydro in Ontario illustrate a fundamental difference between private ownership and public ownership in the operation of those utilities that are in their very nature natural monopolies. Private ownership is based on the principle of gain; it is an investment for profit. I do not find any fault in proper limitations with that principle, which is perfectly laudable. On the other hand, public ownership is based on the idea of service at cost to the people, and I submit that in the case of great natural monopolies, such as railway transportation or the development of electrical energy, where by the very nature of the thing an individual or small group of individuals cannot carry on the service for themselves, it is in the interests of the State and of its citizens that the principle of public ownership should apply.

Another argument advanced against public ownership and operation of our railways is that it will provide a tremendous leverage to any political party in power to retain itself in office; that through the agency of your public railways an engine will be created whereby an existing party can maintain itself in power irrespective of the popular will. I do not know that public ownership offers any more danger in that respect than what we have suffered from under private ownership of our railways in this country, I think that all impartial students of the history of Canada for the last forty years will come to the conclusion that there has been no more potent influence operating in the public life of the country, operating on the legislation that flows from governments, than our private railway companies. We know the conditions that existed at the time of the Canadian Pacific railway forty years ago. I do not wish to criticise the legislators of those days. We know that the Canadian Pacific railway is a great railway and one that is well managed, but it is well to bear in mind that the people of Canada have been very good to that railway, which has secured altogether in cash subsidies from the provinces and municipalities and governing bodies of Canada over $70,000,000, besides some 26,000,000 acres of rich and valuable land, and also, in British Columbia, some $38,000,000 worth of completed road. Altogether, if you calculate in actual dollars and cents to-day what the Canadian Pacific railway has secured from the country, you will find that the total does not fall far short of $300,000,000 or $325,000,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I am informed that the land grant alone has realized nearly $150,000,000 and that they consider that what they have yet is worth $100,000,000.

Mr. CRERAR: That would depend, of course, on the value placed upon the lands, but I wish to be conservative in my estimates. Here is another aspect of the question: Suppose the Canadian people had built the Canadian Pacific railway; suppose it had not been built by private enterprise. We could have lost some ten or twelve million dollars a year during the whole period of its operation, and so far as the balance sheet of the country is concerned we would not be further behind than we are at the present time. Take the Canadian Northern railway. We all know what a bad influence it exercised on the public life of the country. We know how it lobbied in the Parliaments of Canada, and in some of the provincial legislatures as well, where it wished to extend its lines and get railway bonuses and guarantees and land grants. I know that I am on safe ground when I say that there has been no more unfortunate influence at work in the public life of the country than that of our private railway companies.

In considering this question, I would offer this suggestion to the Government, that in drawing up the agreement with the Grand Trunk railway upon which arbitration proceedings are to be based, they should be exceedingly careful to guard the public interest in every way. This is absolutely essential. The people of the country demand it and will hold the Government to strict account if it fails in this. For instance, the Grand Trunk should not be permitted to advance as an argument in the arbitration proceedings the plea that other railways were built that detracted from its business; nor, in my judgment, should its value be based on the existing values of equipment, buildings, rolling stock and all the other paraphernalia that goes into the operation of a railway. We know that the cost to-day of locomotives, cars, buildings, is almost double what it was prior to the war.

These conditions are not going to continue in this country; it may be four, five, or eight years, but eventually we will get back to something like pre-war conditions in reference to the cost of materials necessary to construct a railway and the equipment necessary to maintain it.

What will the position of the country be if we get this mileage? We will be, as some one said in the debate a few days ago, probably the largest owners of railway mileage on the continent of North America. I believe the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) estimated that we would have something like 21,000 or 22,000 miles of railway, if Parliament approves of the proposal of the Government and as a result the Grand Trunk is acquired.

The problem of operating it is a very great one. We cannot do it if we are, as a people, to face it with fear. If public ownership is to succeed we cannot do it by following timid steps or in a spirit of faltering fear. We have to go at it with determination; we have to go at it just the same as the people of Ontario have done with the Hydro-electric, and just the same as the citizens of Winnipeg have done in regard to public ownership of their light and power. Do you think that any of these people would go back to private ownership? Not for a moment. I am convinced that if we apply the same principles to the operation of our national systems of railways we can achieve the same success.

But there are a few matters to take into consideration with respect to it, and I want to offer a few suggestions in that regard. A survey of the railway situation reveals the fact that in our national system of railways we have considerable duplication. We have roads that were built at a very high cost, and some built without any regard for cost. I personally had the opportunity, when the Grand Trunk Pacific was being built through the mountains in northern British Columbia, to travel over 150 miles of that road when it was under construction, and there appeared not the slightest effort towards economy in the construction. I give that opinion as the result of my own observation. That was to be expected when we consider that the contract was based on a percentage to the contractors of the total cost of the road. Consequently we had to face the fact that we have a road whose capitalization has been increased by costly construction and duplication of lines. On that same Grand Trunk Pacific west of Edmonton you can travel for hundreds of miles and you will find the rails lifted off one track and the trains travelling over the other. That is where the Canadian Northern travels down one side of the river and the Grand Trunk Pacific on the other. There is no more need for it than anything one can imagine. Yet for these hundreds of miles that are to-day idle, and on which I venture to predict rails will never again be placed, there are outstanding capital issues to the extent of $80,000 or $90,000 a mile.

In facing this enterprise we have to face it as a sound business man would confront his position were he in a similar case. What would a practical, sound business man do under those circumstances? If he had been engaged in business and through unfortunate conditions he had secured a lot of equipment that was valueless, he would re-value the whole thing and put it down to a practical business basis. In fact, his bankers would insist upon him doing this if he wished to continue in business. That principle should be applied to the national railways of Canada. We should have a re-valuation of them, we should put them down to a fair basis, to the full value but no more. We are going to have public operation, and it should be given a fair trial. To attempt to obtain returns on a greatly over-capitalized valuation makes the thing difficult if not impossible from the first.

There is one other suggestion. It is absolutely necessary that the management of these roads be above public criticism and public cavil. There is no disguising the fact that there is to-day a widespread impression throughout the country that our Canadian national railways are too close to their old owners—Mackenzie and Mann. I have no reason to have any lack of confidence in the gentlemen who to-day are directing as president and general manager the operation of the road, but nevertheless it is incumbent upon the Government to demonstrate to the people that the Mackenzie and Mann influence is entirely eliminated from the road. That is necessary in order to thoroughly establish public confidence in it.

Another suggestion I would offer is that these roads should be incorporated into one complete system. There should be a very full report published at the end of every year of the operations of the road—just the sort of report that a successful management, or board of directors, would submit to the shareholders of a company, giving the information as fully and completely as possible in respect to the earnings, difficulties encountered in operation and the whole business in connection with that operation during the year. I would suggest again that the success of this enterprise will depend very largely upon the extent public confidence can be created in it, and the making of such a report as I have suggested is one of the steps necessary to create public confidence. I do not see much value in taking the financial reports of our national railway system and discussing them back and forth between the opposing sides of this chamber. I would offer the further suggestion that there should be a small and select body of the best men in this House, appointed as a permanent committee, during the life of a Parliament to consider the reports coming from our national system of railways. What happens in a private company? You have a board of directors elected by the shareholders. They in turn select their management who operate the business for a year. At the end of the year they consider how this operation has been carried on, the whole business of the concern is thoroughly discussed by the shareholders, and very often valuable suggestions are received from them as to the course the business should take the following year. I would suggest the adoption of that principle in this respect; that is I would have this select committee take up with the directors and the management, the whole course of operations during the past year and study the road, its business and its development, and in turn report to the House, and through the House to the country, the result of its deliberations.

The fear has also been expressed, and there is considerable ground for it, that importunities may come to the Government to build branch lines of railway into communities that really do not need them. It might be worth while considering, having every application for an extension of a branch line in connection with the Canadian National railways passed upon by the board of railway commissioners, as to whether the expenditure in connection with it would be justified and whether such was really needed.

I think also the Government should investigate the possibility—when we secure the Grand Trunk, as I presume we will—of electrifying the branch lines of that road in the province of Ontario and also in the province of Quebec. I do not wish to pose as a prophet, but I will venture the prediction that within twenty-five years a very large part of our railways in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and possibly in the Maritime Provinces as well, will be operated through electrical power, and we will not need the immense quantities of coal that to-day have to be imported from the United States in order to develop the necessary motive power to run these railways.

There is one other course that should be followed, and that is the stimulation of national pride in our system of railways. In that regard I was somewhat struck by a statement made the other day by the Minister of Railways in introducing the resolution upon which this Bill is founded. Upon that occasion the hon. gentleman spoke as follows:

> Now, Mr. Chairman, the Canadian Pacific Railway system is a great one. It has done great work for Canada, and the fact of the Government owning and operating a system equal to that of the Canadian Pacific railway should not in any way allow any influence, or advantage to be exercised against the Canadian Pacific railway.

I quite agree with that observation in respect to the use of any unfair means against the Canadian Pacific railway; but I submit that it is not unfair for the Canadian people, who have their own national lines to the extent of 20,000 miles, not because they adopted public ownership as a principle but by the very necessity of circumstances, to use all the force of public opinion possible in support of our own national enterprise in this matter. I would offer this suggestion to the Government: that they could very well patronize our own telegraph system, if they are not doing it now—they could very well patronize our own telegraph system, our own express companies, and our own railways, as far as the business of the country is concerned, to the greatest extent possible. I was rather sorry to see that the train that carried His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales across Canada was made up by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I think it would have been an excellent thing if His Royal Highness had travelled on a train made up by our own National system. I also believe that a larger number of our returned men could have been carried to their homes over our National system of railways than were carried. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has always demonstrated its ability to look after itself, and I have no doubt it will continue to do so. It is well managed and it occupies a strong position. On the other hand, our National railways are starting with a rather severe handicap, and it is the duty of every public-spirited man who desires to see the Government system a success to support it in every possible way.

Let me make one further suggestion. We expect to attract to this country within the next decade a large number of immigrants whom we hope to settle on the land. That statement has been made in this House and it is often discussed in the country. There is need of it. If we are going to overcome the heavy financial burden that this country is now supporting it can only be done by increasing our productive power; and one of the surest means to increase our productive power is by bringing into this country people who are willing to work, who will go upon the land and help to develop our rich-natural resources. When the Government is carrying on its immigration policy I would suggest that it direct these immigrants as far as possible to lands adjacent to our own railways, with a view of building up business for those railways in the future. We have the lands and if we can get people to settle along our national railways will be creating a potential business for these roads in the future that will help to get us out of the difficulties that we have to surmount. There is good reason for hoping that a system of national railways can be made a great influence as a unifying power throughout Canada. Reference is frequently made to the character of our country, to its scattered population, the difficulty that exists, for example, in the people of the western provinces understanding the hopes and aspirations of the people of the Maritime Provinces and of Quebec. The same is true of the western provinces and of Ontario. Unfortunately, we have not a free interchange of newspapers between these portions of the Dominion. May we not entertain the hope that by means of this system of national railways we can create a national spirit of public pride in them that will have a unifying effect among our people and give them something to be proud of from one end of Canada to the other. It is not an impossibility—it is, in fact, a very possible and practical thing.

I do not wish to detain the House any longer, but I would add this: Canada is facing great burdens and the railway situation is admittedly a difficult one. The course that is being taken, while it, perhaps, affords much room for criticism, is, on the whole, the best course that we can follow. When we have our lines completed it will then be for the Canadian people, and for their representatives in Parliament, and for the Government who are entrusted with the administration of the country's laws, to use every legitimate means in their power to make it a success. I believe we can make it a success. I believe we can hand down to posterity an example and a tradition in this respect that will be worthy of the country and worthy of the sacrifices Canada has made in the last four or five years.

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, in 1911 the Government that immediately preceded the present administration cherished the ambition to do better than the Laurier ministry. At that time the press of the country heralded the new Administration as a saviour which would keep Canada faithful to the flag and make the country prosperous. The incoming ministry were pronounced a new broom that would sweep clean; sweep away all that was bad in the previous administration of public affairs, and do better than their predecessors. But what happened? In 1911, when the Borden Government assumed office, our national debt was in the neighbourhood of $100,000,000. Six years afterwards it had mounted to about $336,000,000, and at present it approximates $2,000,000,000. It is true that the war largely increased our public debt and for the addition attributable to that cause there is perhaps not much criticism to be offered. Nevertheless, we notice that although the Government who were returned in 1911 constantly preached economy have overmanned all the departments of the Government and increased by over 15,000 the number of civil employees, notwithstanding their denunciation of the Laurier administration on the very same ground. As to railway matters, when the Borden Government assumed office they blamed the Laurier Administration for the existing railway situation and yet what do we find them doing? After assuming office in 1911 they continued the very same path that the preceding administration had been following.

That is to say, subsidies were lavishly granted to different railway companies, moneys advanced to them, and their bonds guaranteed in different ways. We saw the Canadian Northern people asking favours of the Government just as before, and finally forcing upon the Government the famous deal of 1917; and a year after we saw the stock of that company, which was declared valueless by the Drayton-Acworth Commission, valued by a board of arbitrators at about $10,000,000. This Canadian Northern railway, coupled with the other railways of the Government, according to a recent answer laid before the House in answer to a question put by an hon. member, had a deficit last year of about $9,041,464.62. The Canadian National railways to-day have a total interest paying debt of $460,225,148.93, and the amount of interest payable annually on this debt is $19,073,387.08. In view of this vast national indebtedness settled upon the country by different Administrations, and especially by the consummation of the Canadian Northern deal, is it wise to take another step towards completion of the nationalization of all our railways as now proposed? I say no, Mr. Speaker. The Government would be wise to " stop, look, listen.'

Let us see what certain authorities on railway problems have to say on the subject. Mr. E. W. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific railway, recently stated:

I am not attempting to persuade you to my views, they are not unalterable, but I am not convinced of the expediency nor wisdom of any such policy, because none of the advocates have been able to show ground for the faith that is in them, and before we change from a system which we understand, and which in the case of some companies at least has worked to the distinct advantage of Canada, we should be very sure that an improvement will be made and the results to the people, the owners, such as to warrant the extraordinary obligations they would assume.

It would be a pity, Mr. Speaker, to change from a system we know to a system of which we know very little. The ex-president of the Canadian Pacific railway, Lord Shaughnessy, made this statement not very long ago:

We shall within a short period learn the experience of our neighbours to the south of us in the management of railways in that country, and we may have some experience of our own in that regard. I do not wish to have it understood that I am taking a stand opposed to the nationalization of railways. If the people of this country want it, and if the Government decide that the people want it, this is a democratic country and they must have it. But whenever we start out upon that avenue, we should be very, very sure of our footing, or we may have a serious problem.

Before I go any further, Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw your attention to those words:

If the people of this country want it, and if the Government decide that the people of this country want it.

The election of 1911, if I am not mistaken, was fought on the Navy and Reciprocity issues; there was no question of the nationalization of railways. The election of 1917 was fought on the Win-the-War policy, and nothing else; there was no question then raised as to the practicability of Government ownership. I am not aware that this Government holds any mandate to impose such a policy upon this country. Let us see, for example, what was done. In 1904, when the Laurier Administration proposed a new policy in the way of railway construction, and wanted to launch the famous Grand Trunk Pacific agreement, which is now so much criticised, they went to the people on that very issue, and as a result of the election that policy was sanctioned by a majority of the electors. In 1911 the same administration wanted to go a step further and give to this country reciprocity with the United States. The same procedure was followed, and the result of that election is that to-day we have the present Government administrating the affairs of the country. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it cannot be said that the present policy is as democratic as the policy of the Laurier Administration. But there is one thing we may be sure of, that whether the people have decided that they want nationalization of railways, certainly the Government want it and has decided that the people want it, and we are going to have it at all costs.

Let us see what another authority said on the subject on the nationalization of railways. Sir William Hoy, general manager of South African railways and harbours, stated:

The wide conflict of practical evidence renders it extremely difficult to decide as to the relative advantages and disadvantages of State and private railways. On the whole, it would seem that the problem is one to be determined according to the geographical position and industrial, economic, political and social conditions of the country concerned, rather than according to the merits claimed for either system in other countries. The success or otherwise of State railways is influenced largely by the extent to which the management is freed from political influence. It is thus manifest that the problem is governed by many elements other than the purely economic.

Mr. Speaker, experience shows that politics always do creep into State management, irrespective of the statutory or other safeguards applied thereto, as in the case of Australia and Italy, and that the only managements immune from interference are the autocratic governments of Germany and Austria. The experience of England, France, Italy, and lately that of our neighbours, the United States, should suffice to convince us of the value of Government ownership. That is so true that President Wilson recently, upon his return from Europe after attending the Peace Conference, advocated that the railways which had been taken over and operated during the war under government control, should be handed back to their original owners. We find also that the United States Congress is taking action to avoid the injustice of the government operating railways in competition with privately owned railways; while here we find our own Government planning to build up a great railway system for the avowed purpose of attacking a privately owned railway which, every one will admit, has since its inception been giving most excellent service to the country and is well able to continue doing so.

Is there anything more dangerous and more serious than this tendency to use government powers for the purpose of attacking and injuring private industry? In certain quarters, especially in the western provinces, this policy is finding much favour. The protection of the vested rights was always one of the first principles of Anglo-Saxon legislation. Are we going to embark upon a policy of confiscation?—because, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion that is what this project amounts to. If this policy is followed out as the Government propose it, there is reason to believe that sooner or later, due to the fact that the railway rates will have to be decreased because of competition with the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian Pacific itself will have to be absorbed and come also within the Canadian National Railway system. I am afraid that that may happen if this project is carried out. I do not say that it will happen, but it is a possibility—so many strange things have been done during the last few years that that is quite liable to happen.

The complications which will result from the increase in the expenditures of the Government if this project is carried out places its acceptance beyond the limits of reason; because it is evident that should the Government operate all these railroads, especially the Canadian Pacific, they would not be able to attain anything like the standard of service which this company is now giving to the people of Canada or obtain a revenue which would enable them to pay anything like the dividend which the Canadian Pacific is paying at present to its shareholders.

Experience has taught us that under government control, and partly because of it, the cost of operating railways and telegraphs increases heavily and that in regard to the former there is a reduction in the service offered to the public. The public pays more heavily for what it gets, and very often what it gets is not up to the standard.

In glancing over the report of the Drayton-Acworth Commission I find that it makes the following observation with regard to the Canadian Pacific:

> There was given to the Canadian Pacific at the outset direct aid with a generous hand and the aid was continued up to the point when the company could stand alone. . . . . The people of Canada, in our view, have had good value for their money.

In my opinion the same should have been done with the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk as was done with the Canadian Pacific. The only thing these companies want is to be left alone that they may pursue their own course; let them work out their own salvation. If they cannot do it now, in a few years they will be able to make both ends meet and to pay to their shareholders the amounts to which they are entitled having regard to the capital invested. But the Government, under the pretense of needing this company's railways to complete its system, wants to get control of the Grand Trunk in order, it is said—of course, we have no proof—to promote the interests of a certain faction which is back of the Government.

Let us see what certain newspapers which are friendly to the Government have to say in reference to the matter. In the Gazette of December 2nd last, editorial reference was made to a certain article which appeared in the Globe on a previous occasion. The Globe had stated very frankly and openly its opinion regarding this deal, as follows:

> Canadian speculators, led by a former minister of the Crown, who had a good deal to do with the formation of the Union Government, are seeking to obtain control of large blocks of the common and preference stocks of the Grand Trunk railway in the belief that should the Government determine to take over the railway the value of these stocks will be greatly enhanced and a handsome profit will result from their forethought. A more sinister version of the same story, which may be no more than a slanderous invention, is to the effect that the group of men engaged in the alleged speculation are powerful enough to sway the decision of the Government, and are, therefore, not gambling on a possibility, but investing in a "sure thing."

That is the article that was published in the Gazette of that day, and both the Gazette and the Globe are, or were at that time, friendly to the Government; in fact, they helped to put the Government where it is to-day.

Last spring, if I mistake not, the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario was on the job, urging the Government to take over the Grand Trunk Railway system. If I remember correctly the reports in the press at that time, Sir Adam Beck came to Ottawa and tried to force upon the leader of the Government the policy of the Hydro Electric Commission. But apparently the leader of the Government, Sir Robert Borden, took a strong stand in the matter and did not accede to the suggestion. Nobody thought at that time that the people who were promoting this deal would succeed.

We have another authority on this subject, a man who used to be a minister of the Crown and who expressed himself as entirely opposed to the policy which the Government is following to-day. I refer to the former Minister of Public Works, Hon. F. B. Carvell. He said:

Possibly the present Government may succeed where others have failed, but it is a lamentable fact that Government operation of railways has been one of the most tragic farces in this country that we have ever seen.

Sir Henry Drayton, who, I am told, is Minister of Finance—the newspapers now report that he has been elected—says in the Drayton-Acworth report:

In our judgment it is not in the interests of Canada that the operation of its railways should be in the hands of the Government. We know no country in the world where a democratic State owns and operates its railways, and the railways have not had an injurious influence on politics.

Another expert in political economy, one of our foremost economists, Professor Mavor, has said—and I would like my hon. friend (Mr. Crerar) to note this:

It is possible that only by repeated and costly failure, such as the Manitoba Government telephones, will the public realize that the proper function of Government is not the conduct of industries but the impartial inspection of them under intelligent laws, adapted to the character and conditions of the community and the country.

Another authority in this matter is Mr. Acworth himself, who says that we can expect higher rates under nationalization than under the company system. In his book "The Railway and the Trader," Mr. Acworth supports Professor Hadley in saying:

It is a mistake to expect lower rates or better facilities from Government than from private companies. The actual results are just the reverse. The State is more apt to tax industry than to foster it; and when it attempts to tax industry, it is even less responsible than a private company. State management is more costly than private management, thus much capital is wasted. State management is demoralizing, both to legitimate business and politics.

This is the generally accepted view of economists. It was the view of statesmen up to 1896 who always preferred private ownership operation to government ownership. We may say that the Bill which is before the House is for the purpose of buying outright the Grand Trunk railway system. To me it seems the greatest and most complicated undertaking that has ever been urged on such weak grounds. The railway has a length of about 4,000 miles, its tracks measuring about 6,300 miles. It extends into the United States, to Chicago in the west, and Portland in the east. The capital invested is about $420,000,000.

One of the reasons advanced by the Hydro-Electric Commission for this deal is that it would be in the interests of a great number of municipalities who are responsible for the operation of the Hydro-Electric system. Another argument advanced in favour of the Bill is that it would give the Canadian Northern railway, already under Government control, terminal facilities which otherwise the Government would have to build or acquire. The sponsors of the Bill claim that the Grand Trunk will also serve as a feeder to the National railways in the West.

In order to attain the object of this Bill the Government will have to raise more money on the credit of the people of Canada, whose burdens have already reached nearly the limit. In my humble opinion, not a cent more can be added to their burdens without causing great danger, if not disaster, to the country. We find that in recent years nearly $367,000,000, or one-third of our national debt has been spent on our railways, while the operation of these roads by the Government has produced a deficit of about $13,000,000. Not a cent of interest on capital expenditure has ever been earned by these government roads. Calculating at the rate of 4 per cent we find that the interest on capital expenditure on government railways now approximates $15,000,000 annually, and that it grows from year to year. That to my mind is not very reassuring.

All these questions of terminal facilities and feeders for the Government system can be solved by making arrangements for interchange of traffic between the Government system and the Grand Trunk. The Grand Trunk railway in central Canada may be made a feeder to the National Transcontinental, and the latter a feeder to the Grand Trunk railway. The Grand Trunk terminals can be made available to the Government roads. By these easy business methods the taxpayers can be relieved of assuming this great new obligation. The whole people of this country have their eyes on Ottawa. They are begging and clamouring the Government not to consummate this gigantic deal. We can gauge the feeling of the country at large by the views of the press. The Gazette said recently:

It is the worst news that has come to us since the war. This means that the Grand Trunk railway will be undermined and put on the same level as the Intercolonial railway.

There is no doubt that the operation of a new line of railway by the Government would largely increase our national debt and create additional deficits which the country will ultimately have to pay. In view of the condition in which the Grand Trunk railway is at present, I say we would be making a very bad bargain by taking that road over. We would simply be buying deficits. We would have to assume payment of dividends on $240,000,000 of stock and take care of a funded debt of $179,000,000. It is sheer folly on the part of those who are manipulating this huge deal. The Government is leading the country to ruin and disaster greater than we could have expected from the war.

According to the last statement in the newspapers our national debt increased by $65,000,000 during the last month, as compared with an increase of $25,000,000 for the corresponding period last year. The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) recently stated publicly at a certain investigation that the financial condition of the country was a most serious one, and that the policy of all nations which were belligerents would be towards retrenchment for the next few years. Why, Mr. Speaker, the representatives of the Government stated at this same investigation that there was not enough money for our brave soldiers. There is not enough to increase the members' indemnity. Moneys were voted last session for certain most urgent and necessary works in my own county, costing from $10,000 to $15,000, but the new Minister of Finance has stopped all progress on these works on the pretext that there is not enough money. Yet, in spite of all this, we have enough money to assume the payment of the interest on the huge sum I have just mentioned.

By this legislation Canada will be committed to an expenditure of half a billion dollars; and interest, losses and taxes will cost the country about $25,000,000 yearly. That is to say, the debt of this Dominion, which now stands at about $1,750,000, and will jump soon to $2,000,000,000, will by this transaction be carried to about $3,000,000,000, without taking into consideration other obligations which this country will have to carry, such as public works, pensions, and other war obligations. And who is going to benefit by this huge deal? We know that the shareholders in England or those who have obtained control of their stock will make a nice sum of money, besides getting rid of the payment of interest on a capital of a few hundred millions of dollars invested in an enterprise in Canada with which this country has nothing to do.

In exchange for the physical assets of the road the Government is pledging Canada's security for the payment of interest to the shareholders on a certain portion of the guaranteed preference stock and on the value that will be fixed on the three other stocks. The shareholders will receive their interest whether it is earned or not. Arbitrators will be appointed, Mr. Speaker, to value these stocks, and in order that the Canadian Northern deal may not be repeated, I would suggest that, whatever be the valuation arrived at, the result of the arbitrators' delibertions be made subject to complete investigation by this Parliament, and that their findings shall be of no effect until they have been ratified by the representatives of the people. If such a provision were made I would certainly support it. It is useless to discuss at any length the probable deficits that will ensue, when we compare the cost of operation and fixed charges of the Canadian Pacific railway, which amount to $70, to do $100 worth of business, with the expenses of the Intercolonial and other government railways—operating costs and interests included—amounting to from $200 to $220, to do $100 worth of business. In connection with this statement, I would refer the House to "the Canadian Railway Problem," W. F. Tye, Civil Engineer, 1917. Professor Irving Smart, an ex-professor of McGill estimates at about $50,000,000 the deficits of our Railway system when the Grand Trunk is added to it. A few days ago when we were in committee on the resolution I was astounded to hear the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) make the statement that he was sure that most of the people were in favour of this proposition. He said that they were in favour of the nationalization of railways. He informed us that Ontario and the Western Provinces were favourably disposed to the proposition, but that Quebec and the Eastern Provinces were opposed to it, and he read an article in the Toronto Globe in support of his contention. Well, Sir, let me remind my hon. friend that "he who hears one bell hears only one sound." In my opinion, the great majority of the serious people of this country are opposed to the legislation which is now before us. The Montreal Star, which has hitherto been a strong supporter of the Government, is opposed to it. This is what that newspaper had to say in an editorial of Thursday last:

> The obvious unreadiness of Government speakers at the opening of the debate on the Grand Trunk deal stands in somewhat startling contradiction to the ministerial determination to rush the thing through. It is a bit unusual to hear two ministers bolstering up a vital point of Government policy with arguments which flatly deny each other. It is pleasant, however, to note in these Government transactions a lack of that mutual distrust between buyer and seller which too often marks the ordinary business deal. The Minister of Railways had no information with regard to the amount of expenditure necessary to modernize the road. He did not need any. The management had assured him the road was in good condition. What more could be want?

The article goes on to say:

If the country is let in for this deal, hastily and without a prepared avenue of alternative when the inevitable disaster impends, we shall be led near to national ruin, if not over the brink. This population cannot bear the burden of debt and deficits, the burden of waste and graft, the burden of political domination by the huge machine which the administration of a great transcontinental traffic system by politicians will thrust upon us. But so rigid are party bonds, even under the coalition, that there are apparently none in Ottawa to make a fight for the public welfare in so desperate a difficulty, except for party reasons. But whatever the underlying motive, there is sound common sense back of the Opposition demand for slow progress and careful consideration of every step in this portentous project.

Mr. Speaker, we have a good excuse on this side of the House for our attitude on this subject, when we see a newspaper which has been amicably disposed to the Government, and which indeed has helped it considerably, justifying the Opposition in this House in the stand they have taken, and expressing the opinion that in their action the members on this side are doing the public a good service. When such institutions as the Montreal Board of Trade and La Chambre du Commerce and other important bodies protest against this legislation, I think the Government would be acting very wisely if they proceeded with caution and were exceedingly circumspect before embarking on this huge transaction. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) said the other day that we were opposed to this Bill because it emanated from the Government, just as we would be opposed to any other measure coming from the same source. Let me assure my hon. friend that such is not the case. Our attitude on this question is prompted purely by a desire to serve the public interest; and personally, when I oppose this proposition, I do so because I feel, from the bottom of my heart, that it is fundamentally unsound. It is a bad bargain, and should not be entered into, and we on this side would be derelict in our duty if we did not strenuously oppose it. Whatever may be said, the Opposition must always be the watchdog of the public and must express the conviction of the people.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): Mr. Speaker, the question before the House is involved in Bill No. 33, which is an Act respecting the acquisition by His Majesty of the Grand Trunk railway system. So much has been said in and out of the House on the subject that it would seem idle to go into the figures in connection with this gigantic purchase. And personally I would not care to add anything to what I have already said in the committee stage of the resolution, were it not that I tremble at the very thought of the extent of the increasing debt of the country, the obligations of the country, the credit of the country, the rehabilitation of the country, and of the Acts performed daily, as we see them now, by the present Government. A few weeks ago a very representative body of the citizens of Canada, known as the Great War Veterans Association, approached the Government with the request that their financial condition might be bettered.

There was certain correspondence followed up afterwards by interviews. In citing what I am going to cite now I do not wish it to be understood that I want to stir up one class in this country against another, but I am forced to quote from a letter from the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) dealing with the subject of the War Veterans' demand, in order to have you, Sir, grasp at once the meaning of my words when I say that it is appalling to what a state the finances of this country are coming under the administration of the present Government. On August 27, 1919, in answer to a letter written by Mr. C. G. MacNeil, the Dominion Secretary-Treasurer of the Great War Veterans' Association of Canada, the right hon. the Prime Minister said, amongst other things:

Apart from all this, however, the financial situation of the country is such as to preclude the Government from entertaining any proposal for a larger or further gratuity or bonus. The payments under the Order in Council of December last will run into at least $130,000,000. In addition the expenditure under the provisions of the Land Settlement Act will probably amount to at least $125,000,000 or $130,000,000. Besides this there will be a heavy annual expenditure for some years by the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment in hospital treatment, vocational training, etc.

In the Budget speech delivered by Sir Thomas White on 5th June last, copy of which is sent for your information, it was pointed out that the interest on the national debt for the coming fiscal year will amount to $115,000,000, and that for a century or more we must look forward to providing annually from 35 to 40 million dollars for pensions. In addition to this there is the ordinary expenditure required for the administration of public affairs which usually amounts to $125,000,000 or more.

In addition, inevitable deficits in the operation of our railways and capital expenditure for the most modest extension of railway facilities will run into many millions every year. The country is face to face with a very serious financial situation which will call for rigid economy and careful retrenchment.

I read that letter once, twice; I read it three times; and I wondered where, in view of our falling revenue, in view of the fact that every year we are calling upon the people of Canada to subscribe by way of victory loans an amount to help pay our outstanding obligations, this country's credit was going. When I heard a few hours ago, or a few days ago, the question of the Minister of the Interior "would you have the Grand Trunk go into the hands of a receiver?" I thought, Sir, that I would a thousand times sooner see the Grand Trunk railway go into the hands of a receiver, just as the Grand Trunk Pacific had done, than see my native country go into the hands of a receiver, which will inevitably follow if the statement made in that letter to Mr. MacNeil by the Prime Minister is correct, and if the Administration, in the absence of the Prime Minister, involves this country in added obligations which are not for the winning of the war, which are not for the re-establishing of the status of the country, and which are not at all necessary for the people any more than they have been necessary during the war.

A great deal has been said about public ownership. Some, right away, get up and ask: "Are you in favour of public ownership, or are you against public ownership?" I am speaking for myself alone. I want to say right here, Mr. Speaker, that I do not think it is necessary to say whether one is in favour of or against public ownership to oppose the legislation now before the House. The question is not one of whether we are in favour of public ownership or whether we are opposed to public ownership. The question is: Are we in favour of crippling the finances of the country or are we opposed to it? In order that I may not be accused even by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen), whose habit is to split hairs with a bludgeon, I will say that in view of the experience of this country, in view of the experience in the United States, in view of the experience in Great Britain, I do not believe in the public ownership of railways at the present moment. I believe that any man who compares the financial statements of the Government-owned railways with the financial statements of the Canadian Pacific, a private-owned railway, will not hesitate to say that the private-owned railway has been a greater success than any public-owned railway could be in a country of Canada's extent.

I want to call your attention to what the public are saying before I treat of the financial aspects of the roads. The Canadian Railroader of the 18th October this year came out with a consideration of the nationalization of the Grand Trunk and declared that it would be a blow at our railroad workers and the public generally, and in a very able article Mr. T. Kelly Dickinson brings out these facts:

The purchase of the Grand Trunk Railway will immediately involve Canada in an obligation of nearly half a billion dollars, and in interest charges and loss of tax receipts, from $25,000,000 to $35,000,000 per annum.

That is the exact truth according to the financial statement offered by the Government in this matter; and I ask you, Sir, is this country able at the present moment when it is saying to its returned soldiers: "We cannot find the means to give you one cent more"—is it in a position to assume an obligation of nearly half a billion of dollars, with annual interest charges and loss of taxation to the extent of $30,000,000? It seems to me, Sir—am I prejudiced when I say it?—that that statement coming to us as an appeal from a certain section of people in this country is a correct statement, one which bears upon the facts of the case, and to which we should unhesitatingly reply: "This country is not in such a condition." There is another point in the argument. Let me resume the quotation from Mr. Dickinson's article:

And who will reap the harvest of this prodigious railway absorption? Shareholders in England will be the only beneficiaries of such a deal, as they will be relieved of a capital stock interest of several hundred million dollars invested in this country (which stock interest now carries no obligation on the part of the Dominion), and in exchange will be given Canada's promise to pay, in the shape of bonds having the entire assets of Canada as security.

The Minister of the Interior said here the other day that one of the reasons which tempted him to be in favour of the purchase of the Canadian Northern was the fear that it might fall into the hands of the Canadian Pacific, and that one of the reasons which prompted him in seeing that this road is taken over by the Canadian Government is the fear that it might fall into the hands of the same railway company. But according to the statement I have quoted, the stockholders of the Grand Trunk, who apparently live in England, are to be the beneficiaries and not the people of Canada. The people of Canada are to assume the obligations but the beneficiaries reside in England.

Mr. McCREA: It may be found that some of them are residing in Canada.

Mr. DEVLIN: Some may reside in Canada, but the minister informed us this afternoon that the greatest number, or practically all of them, reside in England. A few days ago the Minister of the Interior made a statement about the difference in the stock. A statement from the London Times was also quoted by the minister, and in that statement the financial editor of the Times says something which seems to bear out the words of Mr. T. Kelly Dickinson, because, quoting from the Ottawa Citizen of October 15, last, I find this:

> The Financial Editor of the Times says the news of the agreement regarding arbitration reached between the Canadian Government and the Grand Trunk railway was received in the city yesterday with undisguised satisfaction. He adds:
> "Much disappointment had been felt over the long delay, and it is undoubtedly a fact that the success of the negotiations will go a long way towards restoring confidence in the city in the Canadian Government's attitude toward British investors, which it must be admitted have been strained by the Government's persistence in adhering to a policy which rendered friendly settlement impossible."

So I would conclude that thought with this one statement: The people of Canada who are to-day harassed by debt are called upon to subscribe further by way of Victory Loan in order, as the Minister of Finance puts it, to clean up our war commitments and to again establish Canada's capacity and standing. If we are to borrow money from the Canadian people to establish Canada's capacity and standing, then it ill becomes the Government to put the Canadian people heavily in debt to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars. In speaking thus I am not dealing with the interest now, I am dealing with the total amount; hundreds of millions of dollars are given out with one hand to stockholders in England and at the same time the other hand is held out to the tax-payers of Canada with the appeal: "Lend us more money, give us more taxes, we must help the Grand Trunk's bondholders in England." Sir Thomas White also fears that the Grand Trunk will fall into the hands of the Canadian Pacific and tells us that the Canadian Pacific is the best-managed railway in America. If the Canadian Pacific is the best-managed railway in America, and if the Government railways are the worst-managed railways in America, would it not be to the advantage of the Canadian people (even if such a contingency were to happen) that the Grand Trunk should fall into the hands of the Canadian Pacific and be well managed rather than fall into the hands of the Canadian Government and be badly administered and impose a debt upon this country?

Now let me inquire for a moment what this Government is assuming. The Minister of the Interior told us that the Government is to acquire the first, second, and third preference stocks and the ordinary or common stock of the system, amounting to a total face value of £37,073,431 which translated into our figures would amount to $185,000,000—I am not giving the exact figures. Then he goes on to say:

> Their actual value will be determined by the Board of Arbitrators.

He does not know their actual value; the Government do not know their actual value; we who are asked to become parties to the agreement do not know their actual value. And when will we know it? We will know it when this Parliament has empowered the Government to make any arrangements that they want to make as to the valuation of these stocks once the arbitrators have set a value upon them—whether face or any other value. Then he continues:

> To pay the award, whatever it may be, there will be issued a new non-voting stock. The new stock will bear interest at four per cent and be redeemable after thirty years at par.
> So far as the debenture stocks are concerned, they are taken over, the Government becoming responsible for the interest. These stocks amount to £31,926,125. The four per cent guaranteed stock of the company is also treated by the Government as an obligation and the interest will be paid thereon by the country.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to fill the pages of Hansard with figures, and therefore I will simply state that we are going to pay annually about $16,000,000 in the way of interest, and besides that we are going to assume untold obligations; and, further, we are going to take from the Grand Trunk —with the results of the Provincial election coming in frequently it is very hard to speak to—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is my hon. friend addressing himself to the Government?

Mr. DEVLIN: No, I am addressing the House generally.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I quite appreciate the difficulty of addressing the House at a time when one is not receiving attention. Would my hon. friend object to continuing until ten o'clock? We will all promise to listen to him attentively, and at that hour we might adjourn.

Mr. DEVLIN: Would not the minister be willing to call it ten o'clock now?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If my hon. friend will promise to be as brief as possible to-morrow.

Mr. DEVLIN: I assure the minister that I know I cannot be too brief for him.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I consent to the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. DEVLIN: Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean the House adjourned at 9.50 p.m.

Tuesday, October 21, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

SIR HENRY DRAYTON INTRODUCED.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a Certificate of the Election and Return of Sir Henry Lumley Drayton, for the Electoral District of Kingston.

The Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I beg to introduce to you, Sir Henry Lumley Drayton, who has been returned for the electoral district of Kingston. Sir Henry has signed the roll and has been sworn in; he now wishes to take his seat.

Mr. SPEAKER: Let the hon. member take his seat.

LOAN OF $25,000,000 TO ROUMANIA.

On the Orders of the day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): I should like to know from the Minister of Finance, whom I welcome to his seat in the House, if he is in a position to inform the House what amount of the loan of $25,000,000 to Roumania has already been advanced. I ask this question because I regard it as one of great importance and urgency in view of the fact that I was informed yesterday by a prominent gentleman who has just returned from Roumania that the "lei" the monetary unit of Roumania,, which in normal times is worth 20 cents, is now fluctuating between half a cent and three cents.

In view of this, does the Government intend to advance any more money to Roumania, if there is any balance of the $25,000,000 not yet advanced?

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): I shall be very happy to look into the question the hon. gentleman raises, and give him an answer later.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE CONGRESS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay and Huntingdon) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called. I wish to enquire from the minister of Trade and Commerce, whether Canada is represented at the International Trade Congress now in session at Atlantic City?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Translation): Would the hon. member be good enough to repeat his question?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if Canada is represented at the International Trade Congress now in session at Atlantic City.

The Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Translation): No, Canada is not represented at that Congress.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Translation): As the hon. minister of Trade and Commerce seems so willing to speak French, may I enquire why Canada is not represented at that Congress?

The Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Translation): Canada has not been invited to attend.

GRAND TRUNK LEGISLATION—HALIFAX BOARD OF TRADE.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): I should like to know from the Government—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In what language is my hon. friend now speaking?

Mr. DUFF: If my hon. friend's English is no better than his French I can understand why he cannot understand me.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister is qualifying his language.

Mr. DUFF: Has the Government received a telegraphic communication from the Board of Trade of Halifax, Nova Scotia, with regard to the Grand Trunk legislation? If so, what is the nature of the communication?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not aware that any communication has been received from the Halifax Board of Trade in respect of this matter.

Mr. P. F. MARTIN (Halifax): I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I received a telegram from that Board of Trade, and the hon. member for Lunenburg would not have asked the question if he had not got the information from me.

Mr. COPP: I beg to differ from the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Martin); I received a communication myself this morning in regard to this matter.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In answering the question I answered for the Government. As far as I am concerned as Acting Prime Minister, I have not received it. Some of my colleagues may have received a telegram. I think that the hon. the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) has received one.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would like to ask the Government further, if they have had nothing direct from the Board of Trade in Halifax, did the representatives who are representing the city and county of Halifax here make any representations to the Government?

Mr. J. D. REID: There is a message in my office—I noticed it this morning—from the Board of Trade, I think, signed by Mr. Saunders, secretary of the Board of Trade, Halifax.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: In English, please.

Mr. J. D. REID: I think the telegram contained a resolution as passed by the Board of Trade. I have no objection to laying it on the Table, but I suppose the hon. member himself (Mr. Copp) received a copy of the same telegram.

SALMON FISHERIES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

APPROVAL OF CONVENTION FOR PRESERVATION BETWEEN HIS MAJESTY AND THE UNITED STATES.

On the motion of Hon. Newton W. Rowell (President of the Privy Council) the House went into committee, on the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

That it is expedient that Parliament do approve of the Convention between His Majesty and the United States of America providing effective measures for the protection, preservation and propagation of the salmon fisheries of the Fraser River system, which was signed at Washington on the second day of September, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, a copy of which has been laid before Parliament, and which was signed on behalf of His Majesty, acting for Canada, by the plenipotentiaries therein named, and that this House do approve of the same.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: The convention which has been concluded between His Majesty and the United States referred to in this resolution relates to the sockeye salmon industry in the province of British Columbia. Hon. members of the House are no doubt aware of the fact that of recent years the number of cases of salmon which it has been possible to secure from the salmon fisheries has undergone a very serious diminution. In one year, with the past ten years, the total number of cases of sockeye salmon packed in British Columbia and Washington exceeded 2,300,000. That was the largest on record. For a number of years, usually the fourth year, the pack ran from 500,000 to 600,000 cases, and up to, as I have said, 2,300,000. In recent years the number has been rapidly declining. Last year was the smallest for a long period, the total number of cases both in the United States and Canada being approximately 67,000, and the estimate for this year is still lower. The estimate on the Canadian side is 10,000 and the American 20,000, coming down to a total of 30,000 from a maximum of 2,300,000 some years ago. The position at present is that the industry is in process of extinction unless action is taken by international agreement between the two governments for its preservation. The object of this convention is to secure the adoption of regulations governing the salmon industry in both countries which will make possible the preservation of this great industry. It is estimated that the industry may provide a catch worth $30,000,000 a year if properly cared for, whereas at the present time it is reduced to a very limited amount indeed.

The first Article of the convention provides for the enactment of regulations which will govern salmon fishing on both sides of the international boundary. These regulations are to determine the times, seasons, and methods of sockeye salmon fishing in the waters specified and also the nets, engines, gear, apparatus, and appliances which may be used therein, the object of the regulations being to ensure the preservation and perpetuation of the industry.

Article No. 2 provides the manner in which the regulations shall be brought into operation and makes provision for the trial and punishment of those who may violate the convention and regulations. Article No. 3 defines the waters which are to be covered by the treaty, namely, the waters in which the sockeye salmon are now being caught. Article No. 4 provides for the appointment of an international fishery commission to study this industry with a view to suggesting further regulations for its protection and preservation. Article No. 5 defines the jurisdiction of this commission, the investigations they shall carry on and the work they shall do. Article No. 6 defines the period during which the regulations shall remain in force. It provides for a period of eight years, and thereafter until terminated by notice as in the Article provided. The object of the eight-year period is that the salmon is what is called a four-year fish. The salmon returns to the spawning beds when it is four years old. It goes out the first year, and returns on the fourth year. It is therefore to cover two periods of four years each that the regulation provides for an eight-year period. Provision is also made by Article 6 for a change in the regulations in case changes are considered desirable by the international commission which may be appointed under Article 4. Article 7 provides the period during which the convention shall remain in force, namely fifteen years, and thereafter until two years from the date on which either of the high contracting parties shall give notice to the other of its desire to terminate this convention. Article No. 8 provides for the ratification of the treaty.

Hon. members will see that the object of the convention is to secure the promulgation and enforcement of regulations drawn up and approved by both countries. The regulations already prepared and approved are printed as an appendix to the convention. One of the most important of these regulations makes provision for a close season when the salmon run is at the peak, so to speak, in order to ensure the arrival on the spawning beds of large numbers of the salmon which would be caught if there were not this close season.

At present there is a close season of some thirty-six hours each week. It is estimated that if we add to the weekly close season this special close season when the run is at its height, approximately fifty per cent of the salmon which are now caught and used in the canneries would be able to ascend to the spawning grounds in the Fraser river. By this means they expect year after year to increase the supply of salmon at the spawning grounds and re-establish the industry on a sound basis. The close season every year is one of the most important provisions of the regulations.

Another very important provision limits the area in which purse seines may be used. In the past, fishing with purse seines has been carried right up in the narrow channels between the island between Vancouver island and the state of Washington and has seriously depleted the supply of salmon; purse seines are now restricted to deep water and cannot be used out of deep water.

The third important provision is a more effective method of opening trap nets during weekly close time so as to assure fish passing through them.

It is considered by the Department of Marine and Fisheries that if these regulations are faithfully lived up to they should be sufficient to ensure the re-establishment of this very important industry on the Pacific coast. If, as a result of the investigations of the international commission which is to be appointed under this treaty, further regulations are necessary, it is to be hoped that the two countries will agree in adopting such regulations so that this most valuable industry may be saved to both countries. It is not possible to preserve the industry unless there is agreement between the United States and Canada so that similar measures may be adopted on both sides of the boundary line to protect the salmon-fishing industry from extinction. That is the object of the convention.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): Before the resolution passes, could the minister tell us what number of licenses have been issued in the salmon fisheries of Canada for the present season and if, in the issuance of those licenses, preference is given to returned soldiers? We have been told that some of these licenses are controlled by aliens. I think it would be interesting to have a statement from the minister as to the proportion of licenses controlled by British subjects, and the proportion controlled by men of foreign birth who are subjects of foreign nations.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would hardly be possible to answer my hon. friend's question without some notice. If he desires an answer I shall endeavour to have the information for him to-morrow. I think, however, I can say to him that all fishery licenses are held by British subjects. During the present year, and last year, whenever possible, salmon-fishing licenses were given to returned men.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): We have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the President of the Privy Council with reference to this great industry on the Pacific coast, and I am sure we will all agree with him that it is necessary that this industry be protected in the future. After reading the Convention between His Majesty King George and the United States Government we realize that this is a step in the right direction for the perpetuation of this important industry. I presume, Mr. Chairman, that this is one of the results of a conference which took place, either in the fall of 1917 or early in the winter of 1918, between commissioners, or plenipotentiaries, appointed by the Government of Canada and also by the Government of the United States. The commissioners for Canada, if I remember correctly, were Sir Douglas Hazen, now Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick; Mr. Desbarats, Deputy Minister of Fisheries; and Mr. W. A. Found, another official of the Fisheries Department. The commissioners for the United States were Mr. Redfield, Secretary of Commerce; Mr. Sweet, assistant Secretary of Commerce, and Dr. Smith, United States Commissioner of Fisheries. I notice, Mr. Chairman, that the commissioners have filed a report with their governments, and this is what they say about the rehabilitation and protection of the salmon of the Fraser river system:

In the light of all the existing conditions, your Commissioners are of the opinion that a Treaty of Convention for the proper regulation and protection of this fishery should forthwith be entered into by the two countries; that commissioners should be appointed, under this Treaty, to thoroughly study the situation and that they should have to assist them two experts, one appointed by the Government of each country, who should conduct continuous investigations into the life history of the sockeyes, hatchery methods, eradication of natural enemies on the spawning grounds and in salt water, and other related subjects; and also that the sockeyes hatchery operations on the Fraser should be inspected by the commissioners so appointed.

Your Commissioners also recommend that the Commission to be appointed cause an examination by competent engineers to be made of the sides of the Fraser river, at Hell's Gate, and at other places where slides into the river that might bar the ascent of salmon are probable, such examination being for the purpose of ascertaining what may be feasible to avert such danger.

It is the judgment of your Commissioners that the hatchery work on the Fraser river system should be extended as rapidly as available supplies of eggs will warrant by the establishing of new hatcheries on spawning areas now being sparsely seeded and that to this end eggs of sockeyes and possibly other species of salmon be made available from water of the United States, as well as from other Canadian waters, for the Fraser river hatcheries to as large an extent as practicable.

It is also important that the two governments arrange to ascertain accurately how long it takes sockeye salmon from the time they enter Juan de Fuca Strait to reach and enter the Fraser river, and as far as possible to pass from point to point along the said strait and the Gulf of Georgia.

And also that the two governments arrange to carry on investigations and experiments with a view to finding some feasible means of overcoming the seal and sea-lion menace to the salmon fisheries in the treaty waters, and if such means be found to put them into operation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, several of the recommendations are covered in this convention, and I presume the other matters suggested will likely be dealt with when these gentlemen are appointed to carry out this agreement. The commissioners made other recommendations to their governments, one being with reference to the removal of the Canadian duty on fresh and fresh frozen fish, not including shellfish. That recommendation is as follows:

In the light of these facts your Commissioners feel constrained to recommend that the Canadian duty on fresh and fresh frozen fish, not including shellfish, be removed and with a view to assuring stability in the industry that the two countries enter into an agreement by which such fish will be admitted customs duty free from either country into the other, and that such arrangement remain in force for fifteen years, and thereafter until two years after the date, when either part hereto shall give notice to the other of the wish to terminate the same

The commissioners also, Mr. Chairman, made some recommendation with regard to the removal of all barriers to the production and movement of fish in Canada and the United States and that recommendation is as follows:

They, therefore, recommend that Article 1 of the Treaty of the 20th October, 1818, be amended so as to make available in either country, to the fishing vessels of the other, the privileges covered by the instructions of the United States Secretary of Commerce to collectors of customs of that country, dated February 21st, 1918, and by the Canadian Order in Council dated March 8th, 1918, in substance as follows:

1. That the fishing vessels of either country may enter, from the high seas, any port of the other and clear from such port back to the high seas and the fishing grounds.

2. That the fishing vessels of either country may dispose of their catches and purchase bait, ice, nets, lines, coal, oil, provisions and all other supplies and outfits in the ports of either country.

3. That the repairing of fishing implements in the ports of either country be allowed to the vessels of the other country.

5. That the fishing vessels of either country may ship their crews and tranship their catches in the ports of the other country.

6. That the fishermen of either country may sell their catches in the ports of the other country, subject to local tariff, if any.

If these recommendations meet with the approval of the two Governments, your Commissioners suggest the propriety of arranging that the amending treaty is signed on the 20th October next (1918). Such would be a most appropriate method of marking the one hundredth anniversary of the original treaty.

It seems to me that something should have been done with regard to the removal of the duty on fresh and frozen fish, and also with regard to the removal of all barriers to the production and improvement of fish both in Canada and the United States. I am therefore rather surprised that the recommendations made to the Government have not been acted upon, and that these matters were not taken into account and the necessary steps taken to deal with them.

I notice that the Pacific halibut fisheries were also reported on—

Mr. ROWELL: If my hon. friend will permit me? I speak subject to correction—I have just had a telephone message sent to the department to make sure—but I think my hon. friend is putting on the record a portion of the report which has not yet been made public. By agreement between the two Governments the portion relating to the salmon fisheries in British Columbia has been made public. I may say to my hon. friend that the other matters of the report are now under negotiation with the Government of the United States. Therefore it would not be proper, as a matter of international courtesy, to put on record matters that have not so far been made public by consent of the two Governments.

Mr. DUFF: Of course, I am willing to agree to almost anything. I would like to know why the other matters were not dealt with at the same time as the salmon fisheries of British Columbia were. It is almost two years since those commissioners met, and something should have been done before now, as this matter of fresh and frozen fish and the other matter I referred to are very important to the fishermen on the Atlantic coast, and it seems to me they should have been discussed at this convention as well as the matter of salmon in the Fraser river. Of course, I will not go any further in view of what the minister (Mr. Rowell) says. There is also another very important matter—the halibut fisheries of the Pacific coast. I believe the commissioners made a favourable report thereon, and it should have been dealt with at the same time as the matter now under discussion.

Mr. FIELDING: Mr. Chairman, I want to offer my congratulations to the Government on the return to sane proceedings in relation to treaties with foreign nations. This is a Canadian treaty dealing with Canadian business, which is very properly submitted for the consideration of this House. It does not give us any knowledge of the affairs of the Czecho-Slovakia, it takes no account of the skull of the Prophet or of the missing Koran. It deals with Canadian affairs and does not contain any manifestation of national swellheadedness; it does not assert any new statues; it does not make any claim to new nationhood—it is just an ordinary common sense treaty of the old-fashioned or common garden variety of treaties such as we have engaged in from time to time. There is not a word in this treaty that it is between Canada as a new nation and the United States; there is not a word asserting our right to make treaties as an independent nation. This is just a treaty between His Majesty the King and the President of the United States—the King representing not Canada alone but the whole British Empire, and inasmuch as the treaty does relate to Canada a gentleman representing Canada—named by the Canadian Government, I presume—has been chosen as one of the parties to it. I take it for granted that Mr. Justice Hazen was chosen not only because of his eminent ability but also because he was Minister of Marine and Fisheries when these negotiations were begun, but I merely want to congratulate the Government on getting back to the sensible, common, old-fashioned way of making our treaties.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think it is too bad that such a compliment should not be acknowledged. I therefore beg as Acting Prime Minister for the time being to thank my hon. friend for the compliment that he has paid to this Government. It has been an exceedingly reciprocal arrangement as between my hon. friend and ourselves. The occasion has enabled him to pay us a great compliment. It has also given him an opportunity to pile another criticism upon the criticisms which he was so very profuse with during the earlier periods of this session. One would have thought that he had said sufficient on that ground. But if it pleases him, it does not hurt us, and as long as it is accompanied with a compliment we thank him for both.

Mr. FIELDING: It is a case where we can agree on reciprocity.

Resolution reported.

Mr. ROWELL: I beg to move that a message be sent to the Senate informing their Honours that this House has passed this resolution, and requesting their Honours to unite with this House by filling up the blank therein with the words "Senate and."

Motion agreed to.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM.

BILL PROVIDING FOR THE ACQUISITION OF THE SYSTEM BY THE GOVERNMENT.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Reid for the second reading of Bill No. 33, respecting the acquisition by His Majesty of the Grand Trunk Railway system.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): (resuming from yesterday) Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned last night I was stating that I was opposed to this Bill for several reasons, one, because under the circumstances I am opposed to public ownership. Another reason was that owing to the maladministration of our national affairs for the last few years I was at a loss to find where we were going to get the money to pay for these added obligations. I said that I was not alone in that opinion, but that it was the opinion of Boards of Trade throughout Canada and of the press and of the people of Canada. Since the House adjourned certain events have occurred—I do not wish to transgress any rule by referring to them—but certain events have occurred at our very door which should lead the Government to stop, look, and listen, before entering into any further large expenditures which are not for the direct or even the indirect welfare of the people. I have said that the press and the people of this country are opposed to this transaction, and I think in view also of the events to which I have alluded it would be well for the Government to consider whether the handwriting is not already upon the wall which should warn them to go very, very slowly in embarking on further gigantic expenditures which will fall upon the people in the way of taxation and will not confer any benefit upon them.

Sir, this is the people's day, be they farmers, labourers, merchants, traders, or members of any other class. This is essentially the people's day, and the people intend to carry on in this country a government for the people and by the people, and before this Government increases taxation they should consider whether the expenditure proposed is in the interests of the people. I want to call attention especially to the fact that it has been pointed out by the financial editor of the London Times that this transaction is viewed with favour by the citizens of London because they are the investors in the Grand Trunk railway, and they are looking to Canada to help them in their investments and are not in any way considering the taxes that this obligation will place upon the people of Canada. To the Government then, I repeat, consider not the investors in England at the present moment, but consider the investors in Canada, who are the taxpayers of this country and who must meet the obligations which the Government is incurring at every step.

I do not want to refer to any past extravagance on the part of the Government. Their history since they took over the reins of power in 1911 is a record of the most extravagant expenditure that this country has ever witnessed. Nor do I wish to go into the details of that expenditure. I do not want to recriminate, but I would urge this upon the Government: Before you impose upon the people of Canada this gigantic obligation, especially at this juncture, when the Acting Prime Minister has said to the returned soldiers in writing that this Government is unable to help them further because Canada is passing through a most serious financial time, when the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has publicly stated that the financial position of this country, whilst not critical, is serious. I appeal to you to consider the words of advice given to the people of Canada through the Prime Minister of this country and not take advantage of the Prime Minister's absence to commit the country to this gigantic undertaking which will not be for the benefit of Canada. I repeat, it would be solely for the benefit of the investors in England.

How much is this going to cost? There has not yet been a clear statement from the Government of what we are called upon to sanction in the way of dollars. We had a report tabled a few days ago entitled "A Memorandum in regard to the Grand Trunk Railway System" showing that the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific have a total mileage in the United States and Canada of 8,138; and total securities with the public amounting to $707,929,817. The financial statement for 1918 shows that the Grand Trunk had a surplus available in that year for dividends of $8,760, and the Grand Trunk Pacific a deficit of $875,640, or with fixed charges and loss on branches, amounting to $9,442,739, a gross deficit of $10,316,379. For the first six months of the present year, the gross revenue of the Grand Trunk was $29,601,321; the expenses were $28,058,018, and the net $1,543,303, an increase of $691,053 over last year. The operating percentage for the six months was 94.78. On the other hand, the statement which has been brought down to the House shows that the interest which this country will have to pay annually will amount to about $16,000,000, or between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000, and current liabilities coming due within three years amount to $75,000,000. Then according to the Drayton-Acworth report (page 36) $30,000,000 is required for immediate repairs. As to indirect liabilities, the ex-Minister of Finance stated in the House the other day that they would amount to $145,000,000. Without wearying the House with any more figures, I want to ask this question: whatever may be the amount of the arbitration award on the preference and common stock—and it may be a terrifically large amount; it certainly will be in the hundreds of millions of dollars—where is the money going to come from to pay for it?

At the present moment the Government are issuing a call to the people of Canada for a loan of $300,000,000 to endeavour to meet current liabilities. This loan is called a Victory Loan, and it is essential and absolutely needed by the Government if the government of this country is to be carried on. But at the very same moment the Government are telling the people: We are going to impose further obligations upon you, and if the current revenue be not sufficient to meet those obligations we must appeal to you again next year for a further loan. I said yesterday; let me repeat it to-day: Where is the money coming from, and where are we going to? I appeal to the judgment and intelligence of hon. gentlemen in this House, who are independent in character, who are not swayed by party affiliations, but who claim to possess some degree of independence: Are you going to allow the people's money to be squandered as it is being squandered, in face of the verdict which we have had throughout Canada, a verdict which has been pronounced by the most important boards of trade, by every class of the community, by the people themselves, and which has been asked for simply by two parties—should I say three parties? I will if I include the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen)—the parties asking for it being the Grand Trunk investors in England and the Canadian Northern railway, which wants to get this road. The Minister of the Interior said in this House within the last few days that one of the reasons which prompted him into deciding upon the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific railway was that they should not fall into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Whether or not the Grand Trunk railway falls into the hands of the Canadian Pacific is a matter of total indifference to me; but if the Canadian Pacific, a privately-owned railway, can carry on their business through the stress of the circumstances of the war and show dividends at the end of the war, then the quicker our other railways are carried on by the Canadian Pacific or similar corporations the better for Canada and for the taxpayers of Canada. If Canada must help her railways let her help them, but do not add to the obligations of the people at a time when Canada is groaning under her heavy indebtedness. Be fair to foreign investors, but do not cripple Canada's credit out of sentiment for foreign investors. Our duty to-day—and it is one preached by the Government and by all economists in the country—is to retrench and to economize. If we are to retrench and to economize let us not get into any further wild railway schemes. Do not cripple the Canadian people because of fear lest the Canadian Pacific acquire the road. While it is true that Canada is rich in resources, as we are told by the Government from time to time, and that she will be able to pay all present indebtedness, if the Government continue emptying our mines, cutting down our timber to the last tree, getting rid of our fisheries, which form the capital of this country, imposing upon our farmers obligations which render life practically impossible for them, imposing upon our labouring classes obligations which are making for them a tremendous problem of how to meet the cost of living, then the Government are getting rid of the wealth of Canada.

My concluding words to the Government are these. If the Government for some purpose, unknown to me or unknown to a great part of financial interests of this country, are bound that they shall expend still more of the money of the Canadian people instead of economizing and retrenching, stop class legislation, stop helping solely manufacturers and railway corporations and railway promotors and railway stockholders, and bonus farmers and labourers who are the taxpayers of this country and who are entitled to cent for cent of their holdings in this country. Let us get rid of class legislation; let us legislate for the people of Canada, that the Government of this country may essentially become a people's government for the benefit of the people.

Mr. JAMES McISAAC (Kings, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words on this question which is of paramount importance to the people of Canada, which is indeed one of the most important matters that has come up for discussion in this Parliament for some time. The debate has taken a very wide range and many things have been said. Some things have been said that have had direct bearing on the question under review, and quite a number of things have been said that seem to have very little connection therewith. I will endeavour, in my brief remarks, to confine myself as nearly as may be to the subject matter of the Bill before the House. I believe that I shall be able to understand the subject better myself and to present my thoughts clearer regarding the question if, with your permission, Sir, I briefly review the history of this railway matter and inquire what are the steps and what are the different changes which have brought about the conditions in which the Grand Trunk Railway Company now finds itself. It is proper too that we should inquire why this legislation is before us; why this company comes to this Parliament seeking aid, and why the Government of Canada are now negotiating with the Grand Trunk Railway Company and are putting this legislation through Parliament in order to meet the request that has been made in this connection.

At the risk of repeating words that have been said probably more than once in this debate, I shall endeavour to give the House a resumé of the history of this question. The original intention of the Grand Trunk Railway Company evidently was to build a western line commencing at Winnipeg and extending through the western provinces in order to compete for the increasing trade in that section of Canada, a trade that was looked after very successfully by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It seemed quite reasonable that the company should desire to extend their lines to secure as large a proportion of trade as possible in the western provinces. But for some reason or other when they approached the Government in 1903 to obtain their charter they were persuaded to consider a more comprehensive scheme than they at first entertained, and instead of simply building a branch westward to the Pacific Coast from Winnipeg they conceived the idea of building eastward as well, from Winnipeg to Quebec and Moncton, thus committing themselves to the construction of a transcontinental line. When this matter was presented to Parliament by the then leader of the Government, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that gentleman certainly painted a most roseate picture of the wonderful things that were to come about as a result of this new undertaking, and the enormous benefit it was to prove to Canada. It was to cost Canada very little to complete another railway from ocean to ocean. In the debates of that time, the Prime Minister on the first reading of the Bill on the 30th July, 1903, is thus recorded in Hansard:

> The sum total of money to be paid by the Government for the construction of that line of railway from Moncton to the Pacific Ocean will be in the neighbourhood of $12,000,000 or $13,000,000 and not a cent more.

Further on he says:

> The surplus of this year will pay for the construction of this line.

On the same date, at page 7695 of Hansard, he made use of these words:

> The cash subsidy which is promised and which is to be given under this contract to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company will not exceed $13,000,000 or thereabout.

That certainly looked exceedingly promising. Canada was to have a complete transcontinental line from coast to coast for practically nothing, but this entrancing picture proved to be not quite in accordance with the facts. It was agreed that the road should be built in two divisions, one from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast and the other from Winnipeg to Moncton, that portion of the line from Winnipeg to Moncton to be known as the National Transcontinental railway and the other portion, extending to the Pacific ocean, as the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. The Government were to build the portion from Winnipeg to Moncton, and the company the other section. The National Transcontinental line, having been built by the Government, was intended to be operated by the company after a few years, and a nominal rental was to be paid. To dispose of this branch of the road which does not enter into the question to any great extent at the moment, it is sufficient to say that it cost this country, according to the Drayton-Acworth report, about $160,000,000; and, further, that the company completely failed to carry out their part of the agreement. They never operated the road, the Government having had to do so from the beginning. It will be interesting to see just how the branch extending from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast fared, whether or not it was a success, and what assistance the company were obliged to seek from the Government. Parenthetically, I may say that another road was subsidized by the Government running west—the Canadian Northern railway. This was a handicap to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and it would almost seem that the Grand Trunk Railway Company deserve some sympathy in view of the difficulties and handicaps with which they had to contend in any endeavour they might make to carry out their contract and build the road from Winnipeg to the Pacific. The proposition that was submitted to them apparently mesmerized them, but it was a Utopian scheme that did not stand the test of practical investigation. It was a railway mirage and the Grand Trunk Railway Company seem to have been lost in a maze of ramifications which completely confused and discomfited them. The Grand Trunk Company were not long engaged in their construction work before they were compelled to come to the Government for assistance.

They continued seeking aid again and again, until, to use the words of the ex-Finance Minister—and I am sure I can refer to no better authority—the Government of Canada were under obligation, in the connection with this Grand Trunk Pacific, to the extent of $145,000,000 directly and indirectly. In addition to that, the parent company, the Grand Trunk railway, are under obligation to the Grand Trunk Pacific to the extent of $100,000,000. That is the history in brief of the financing of this great road. We are not saying that it may not be great, but it has cost Canada a very large sum of money. We are disappointed because it was emphasized when the road was about to be built that it would make practically no demand upon the finances of Canada beyond $13,000,000.

Then, reverting for a moment to the Canadian Northern, it, too, got into financial difficulties and was obliged to come from year to year knocking at the doors of Parliament in order to secure financial aid to carry on its business. There were poured out or loaned from year to year millions and millions of money, till at last the Government of our day decided that no more money should be given to them unless the road should belong to the Government. The time had come when no more risks should be taken by loaning and giving millions of money to a corporation which did not seem to have any near prospect of being able to pay any portion of the money back. The Government had taken over or assumed $40,000,000 of the stock of the road, while the proprietors, or those responsible for the company, had $60,000,000. In 1917 it was decided that no more money should be given to the road unless it became the property of the Government. Legislation to that effect was introduced and passed in 1917. In order that the Government might find out what was the reasonable value of the property or of the $60,000,000 of stock that remained in the company, a board of arbitrators was appointed. While on that I just wish to dwell for a moment on something that took place then. In connection with the legislation of 1917 on this question, the Government had agreed, as I have said, that they would appoint arbitrators to determine the value of the remaining stock. I find that the then leader of the Opposition, the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in discussing this question, placed himself on record, as will be found in Hansard, August 13, 1917, to the effect that he had no objection to arbitrating, but he raised the point that > "No assistance should be given to the Canadian Northern railway unless at the same time it is provided that the Government have power within a reasonable time to acquire the ownership of the entire stock of the company at a price to be fixed by arbitration, not to exceed $30,000,000.

What I wish to establish is that the Opposition, through their leader, made the statement in Parliament on the 13th August, 1917, that they would not object to the award of the arbitrators provided it did not exceed $30,000,000. I wish to mention this because I may take occasion a little later in the course of my remarks to refer to this particular part of the question again.

In connection with the legislation of 1918, reference to which will be found in Hansard of May 15, 1918, page 1996, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), discussing the question and alluding to the matter of the arrangement with the Canadian Northern, stated that:

> By the arbitration agreement subsequently made it was provided that the price should not exceed $10,000,000.

You will observe that this is one-third of the amount of money that the Opposition had stated, through their leader, they would be satisfied the arbitrators should fix. They were willing to go as high as $30,000,000, while here we find that one-third of that amount, or $10,000,000 is the amount awarded by the arbitration. I wish to make that statement at this particular stage because I may have occasion to make some reference to that particular point a little later on.

We know that subsequently to the session of 1918 the Canadian Northern railway became a part of the Canadian National railway system. We will leave that aside for a moment and consider what has happened to the Grand Trunk Pacific.

They went on borrowing money from the Government until, to quote the statement of the ex-Finance Minister who dealt with this question in an excellent manner a few evenings ago, the borrowings from, or the obligations to, the Government, direct and indirect, in connection with the road, amounted to $145,000,000. All will remember that early in the first Parliamentary session of the present year it was made known to the Government that the Grand Trunk Railway Company, who were and are the owners of the stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, would be unable, after the 10th day of March to meet their financial obligations, and that they would be obliged to cease operating that railway. We all know what happened. The Government took immediate action and placed the Grand Trunk Pacific in the hands of a receiver. It must be said that the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern railways, which encountered these financial difficulties, were really not, correctly speaking, transcontinental lines; they were only parts or wings of a great transcontinental railway. It does not appear that the time had come when Canada should have practically three transcontinental railways. The development of trade, and the growth of the country's population had not arrived at the state when Canada could sustain any such plethora of railway mileage. How has it happened that we have come to the stage that the Grand Trunk railway is to be taken over by the Government? Hon. gentlemen opposite have expressed surprise, indeed indignation, that this great and paramount question, this question of such very great importance to Canada, should, as they say, have been sprung upon Parliament without any previous intimation that the Government had any intention of taking over the Grand Trunk. But, Sir, it is a matter of fact that negotiations in this direction had been going on between the Government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company for a year and a half or thereabouts. As early as the 15th May, 1918, when the Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, was making a survey of the general railway situation, he intimated quite positively the existence of the possibility that having taken over the Canadian Northern, and as we have seen the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk itself might also be taken over. While the discussion was going on the position of the Grand Trunk came up in the course of the debate, and no serious objection to that possible consummation was taken by the then leader of the Opposition, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, because he said on that occasion:

> I think that the Grand Trunk Railway system should be productive of good results. For the present I do not condemn the idea of taking this railway over.

The two competing railways in the West—the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific, finding it impossible to successfully continue operations, had to succumb and the Government had no option in the matter but to take them over. These railways have absorbed millions and millions of the people's money, and in order that they might be preserved and utilized for the benefit of Canada there was only one thing to do—the Government were faced, as a matter of necessity, to take these railways over. Now let us see what the facts are with regard to the parent company of the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk. As I have already said, negotiations had been going on with the Grand Trunk. Intimations had been given in the House with respect to the matter from time to time, and numerous questions on the subject had been asked by the Opposition. I remember very well that not only during the present session but last session, hon. gentlemen opposite inquired whether any progress had been made in the Government's negotiations with the Grand Trunk, or whether or not the Government had any announcement to make with regard to the project. Any hon. gentleman who was present on those occasions cannot fail to have a distinct recollection that questions of that kind were asked and from time to time the Government answered, and could only answer that no definite conclusion had been reached and that there was no information to make public. Eventually a stage was reached in the negotiations when the Government practically gained their ultimatum, although the company made various overtures in order to learn whether it was not possible to obtain better terms. The Government, however, considered that the terms they had offered were adequate, just, and reasonable, and that they would not be warranted in making any other proposition than those that had already been placed before the Grand Trunk directors. Then the day arrived when the directors of the Grand Trunk accepted the Government's terms, slightly changed in one respect or another, but not on that account any the less advantageous to the country. Then the Government lost no time in coming down to the House and making known what had been decided, and asking Parliament to ratify that bargain on behalf of the people, in order that the Grand Trunk railway might become a portion of our Government system of railways.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the terms of the agreement have been before the House and are familiar to hon. members. But our friends of the Opposition do not seem to be satisfied with those terms and they proclaim that the bargain is very disadvantageous to Canada. Let us see what the meaning of the whole business is. As I have already stated more than once during the course of my remarks, many millions of dollars had been paid out of this Treasury in a generous attempt to enable the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific to continue in operation. But when the time came that the Government was obliged to take those roads over it found itself in this position: With two outstanding wings, as it were, of a great railway system —not a system, but two portions of a system divided in the centre by the Grand Trunk railway. Then the Government considered it essential in the interests of the country that the Grand Trunk railway should be acquired on the most advantageous and reasonable terms to link up the two outstanding wings, so that we would have a great transcontinental system. And let it be remembered that this course, too, was forced upon the Government in consequence of the Grand Trunk railway being unable to meet its obligations. Therefore it appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that no reasonable objection can be taken to the course which the Government has pursued under the circumstances I have recited.

Why does the Government do this? Because, in the first place, it was forced to it; and, in the second place, in order that the railways which have been already forced upon them may be made of the greatest use to the people of this country—that we may have a great co-ordinated transcontinental system stretching from ocean to ocean, and so be in a position, under public ownership, to compete with the great transcontinental railway operated by the Canadian Pacific railway—a truly marvellous institution. But it appears to me there is no reason why in due time the Government of Canada may not be able to compete on equal terms with, and operate its transportation business just as successfully as the great Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is no reason at all why our Government cannot do that successfully, profitably, for I am confident that the system will pay for all the expenditure that may be made upon it and still show a surplus. This desirable state of things may not come about to-day or to-morrow, it will take some time, but ultimately it is my conviction, Sir, that our national railways will be operated on a paying basis. Therefore, not only is this a good business proposition, but it is a patriotic proposition.

I would like to refer briefly to some of the objections that have been raised to this proposition. To tell the truth, Sir, it appears to me that those objections are most frivolous. I do not think one real, valid and substantial objection has been presented during the course of the debate. It is said that the legislation was sprung upon Parliament. But surely no hon. member would deny that he had some knowledge that these negotiations were proceeding. The proposition was brought to Parliament at the earliest possible moment, that is, when the agreement had been reached. Then it is said that there is no time in the dying days of the session for a proper discussion of this proposal. But, Mr. Speaker, there is no limit to the session. It does not appear to me that it can be said that the session may not continue and every member of the House have every opportunity of discussing this question from every angle and point of view if he is so disposed. Therefore there is nothing in that objection.

I do not see my friend the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) in his seat. I regret his absence, for in his attack on this measure he said, among other things, that he feared what the award of the arbitrators might be regarding the value of the common stock of the Grand Trunk railway, and that he had great fears that a fictitious value, a value altogether erroneous and beyond reason, would be given to that stock. And as evidence of his sincerity he made the statement that when the Canadian Northern railway was acquired the arbitrators of that day valued the stock to be taken over by the Government at $10,000,000, which he thought was in the highest degree extravagant. But, Sir, in the session of 1917 his then leader, the late right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, stated when the matter was under discussion that if that stock went as high in value as $30,000,000, he would find no fault with the valuation. Apparently my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair) did not then disagree with his leader; but subsequently when that very same stock was acquired for the people of Canada for $10,000,000 he holds up his hands in holy horror.

With him it makes all the difference in the world whose ox is gored. It mattered not how great the extravagance might be so long as it was committed by his leader, but when a genuine business proposition was proposed from this side of the House for acquiring the stock at one-third of the price he was willing to sanction, he thought that was something terrible.

The objection has been made that the finances of the country at the present time do not warrant us in undertaking any very large expenditure. We all realize that the country's expenditure is very great, and that our financial position may even be considered serious, but, as the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has said, it is not critical. With proper management, good judgment and good government Canada will be able to meet all her financial obligations. In acquiring the Grand Trunk the Government are not legislating only for to-day, nor for a year, but for the future. Suppose we did not take over the road and connect it up with our National system of railways, but allowed it to go into liquidation, that would be a most unfortunate thing for Canada in more ways than one. Our credit would certainly be injured when the whole world knew that one of our great railway systems had gone into liquidation. The trade of the country would be entirely dislocated, and there is the possibility that the Grand Trunk might be taken over by the great Canadian Pacific Railway Company, because that is the only company that could take it over. Under the circumstances, are not the Government acting wisely? They have decided to take over the road even if it will cost the country something because, as I said before, we are legislating not only for to-day, but for the future time when the great arteries of trade will be loosed after the upheaval caused by the war has subsided, and when the lines of transportation will be extended, and trade becomes rejuvenated and virile. We are simply getting ready for the great expansion and prosperity to which we look forward for our country. After all, what we are called upon to pay immediately is the 4 per cent interest on about $60,000,000 of guaranteed stock and about $155,000,000 of debenture stock. Then stock will be issued for the amount arbitrated for the preferred and common stock. We must not forget that the Grand Trunk is a going concern. It is not stagnant, but it is doing business, and will continue to do more and more business after the Government takes it over and engrafts it on our national system of railways. Until the last two years, when owing to the war very few railways were able to show a surplus, the Grand Trunk were able to meet the interest on their bonds and pay a dividend now and then. I therefore do not think we should be far astray in assuming that the surplus earnings over the cost of operation of the Grand Trunk railway will go a long way towards meeting the interest on the guaranteed and debenture stock.

For the reasons which I have endeavoured to put before the House I am convinced that it is the duty of this Parliament on behalf of the people of Canada to stand behind the Government and carry through this legislation. I am firmly convinced that it will be of the greatest possible advantage to Canada in the years to come.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I have closely followed the discourse of the hon. member for Kings (Mr. McIsaac), and while I have never stood in awe of his great ability I always used to give him credit for a desire to place the facts before this Parliament. Now I am sorry to say I have to change my mind and hold not only my old opinion that my hon. friend does not possess an overwhelming amount of ability, but also that he is not scrupulously particular as to his facts. His account of the railway history of this country reminded me of a gentleman who was compiling a dictionary on fish. His definition of a lobster was "A lobster is a fish, red in colour, and it walks or crawls backward." He showed this definition to a friend who was a better authority on fish than himself, and his friend said "That definition is all right except that this creature is not a fish, is not red in colour, and does not walk backward." I think that the history of the railways of this country as given by my hon. friend from Kings is about as true as that definition of a lobster. It was absolutely wrong from start to finish, and set forth not one scintilla of fact on which you could rely. He made the extraordinary statement that we on this side of the House, and, indeed, the late leader of the Opposition, had said that we were willing to submit the value of the stock of the Canadian Northern to arbitration provided it did not exceed $30,000,000. It is most extraordinary that any hon. member who professes to understand his duties in this House and to represent an intelligent people should stand up here and undertake to say that we made such a proposition. As a matter of fact, the whole opposition was bent upon seeing that the matter should not go to arbitration at all. We relied on the Drayton-Acworth report which said that the stock was not worth one cent, and we contended that it was therefore ridiculous to submit the value of the stock to arbitration. The argument was: What is to be arbitrated? This Government and this country have found a court of capable commissioners whom the Government have appointed to ascertain the value of the different roads in this country, and that competent board have brought down a report in which they say that this stock is not worth one dollar. The hon. member for Kings (Mr. McIsaac), in the face of that report and in the face of the discussion that took place upon it, puts himself on record as saying that my late distinguished leader, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, said that he was willing to submit this matter of straw, old straw at that, to arbitration, provided that the result would not net any more than $30,000,000. That is absolutely absurd, absolutely wrong and absolutely without the slightest foundation in the parliamentary history of this country or of this House. What has happened?

Mr. McISAAC: Will the hon. member permit me a question?

Mr. McKENZIE: I have the floor. What has happened and what is the history of this matter? Hon. gentlemen in this House will remember that in the early stages of that discussion, the Hon. Dr. Pugsley, then member for St. John, who spoke in the House on this question before the hon. member for Kings had a seat in the House, moved a resolution that the matter as it stood then should be submitted to arbitration, and that a proviso should be embodied in the Act that the result of the arbitration was not to exceed $30,000,000. What has happened since then? Millions upon millions of dollars have been lent by the Government to this company. The proposition of the Hon. Mr. Pugsley was made on a discussion on the question before the House of lending $45,000,000 to the Canadian Northern. That proposition of arbitration was not accepted, and the $45,000,000 was lent, all at one slap, or $15,000,000 more than the award of which we were speaking. Millions of dollars were lent after that discussion in regard to the $30,000,000. Yet the hon. member comes here to-day, and he forgets the loan of $45,000,000, the loan of $10,000,000, and the loan of $7,500,000 which were made to that company after that proposition of arbitration was made, and he squares himself with the truth by saying that we said that, upon the same basis as the stock was worth when the last arbitration was made, we were willing to give $30,000,000. Those are the circumstances, and the hon. member forgets entirely to take the slightest notice of the millions and millions of dollars that we lent after that proposition was made. If the hon. gentleman wants to be fair about this thing, he will take an account of the $45,000,000, the $10,000,000 and the $7,500,000 that were paid over to the company after the arbitration proposition was made. If he does that, he will be correct in his history and in the figures that he might submit to the House.

Leaving the speech of the hon. member at that, I do not know that I shall pay any further attention to it just now. The hon. member says that we knew all about this legislation; that we knew that this business was coming up, and that there was nothing of surprise about it. Why should there be, he says. I venture to think that the right hon. gentleman who leads this House (Sir George Foster) understands Parliamentary procedure equally as well as the hon. member for King's (Mr. McIsaac). His education and Parliamentary experience are at least equal to that of the hon. member, and as the leader of the Government and as the Acting Prime Minister just now, I think that he knew more about the business before the House and the purpose for which this session was called better than the hon. member. If the hon. member for King's, who is fond of history and fond of reading, I will say parts of the reports of the proceedings of the House, will look at page 858 of Hansard of the present session, he will find that the leader of the Government said:

This session of Parliament was called, not for private business, but for one special purpose, and it has been confined largely to that, and I think the general sense of the House has been that it should be confined to that.

And the right hon. gentleman went on to say that we should close; that we had come here for a special purpose; that we had finished that special purpose; that the country expected us to confine ourselves to that purpose and then to go home. That was the view of the Acting Prime Minister expressed in this House on the 3rd October and appearing on page 858 of Hansard, and on the strength of that statement many hon. members left Ottawa; some of them are today on their way to the Old Country, some of them are in the West, and some of them are in other places, believing that the right hon. gentleman believed what he was speaking about, and I have no doubt that was his judgment at the time. But, of course, the hon. member for King's wipes that aside and says: Why should we take any notice of the statement of the leader of the Government? Why should we take his opinion? Did he not at that time know that there was something up the sleeve of the Government which was going to come down, and that we were not going to get away when we expected? We had, however, a right to believe the leader of the Government; we did believe him, and I am not accusing him at all, because I think he told us what he believed at the time. But somebody could not wait; some big interest thought it was well to strike the iron while it was hot; that it was well to rush this thing through, possibly while the Prime Minister was away or for some other reason. The Government no doubt consulted the hon. member for King's, and he told them that it was all right, and here it is.

5 p.m.

I do not wish to take up very much time of the House at this stage; but occupying the position that I do and realizing the very grave importance of the business that is before the House, I wish to state as concisely as possible the views which I hold upon this question. There is no wiping aside of the great question of transportation in this new and large country of ours; it must be attended to properly and well. No party, no Government, no Opposition, can afford to treat lightly dealing with the question of railways in this country, and hitherto both parties, Liberal and Conservative, have been giving their attention to this question to the very best of their ability. Mistakes may have been made; but if so, they were possibly mistakes of the head rather than of the heart and intention of public men of this country. The party to which I belong have nothing to take back and nothting to apologize for on the question of railways.

When the railway policy of the Liberal party was formulated in 1903 by Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Prime Minister of Canada, the scheme was fully discussed in Parliament and thereafter submitted to the people. An election was held in 1904, in which this question was comprehensively discussed and its minutiæ were presented to the people from coast to coast. The people enjoyed the benefit of the discussions on the question in Parliament the winter before. The newspapers had opportunity to deal with the subject from every standpoint and to publish everything in regard to it they deemed desirable. The railway question was also discussed on the hustings, and the Opposition of that day, led by the present Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) dealt with it in every part of the country. Every candidate, whether for the Government or for the Opposition, discussed it as completely as he desired. Altogether the people were in an ideal position to understand the subject in all its bearings. Fully comprehending it, they went to the ballot box and voted upon the question, giving their well considered judgment. You, Sir, I believe, were a candidate at that time, and I submit to you that the only question that was before the people in that election —at least, the only question worth talking about—was whether or not the Government should undertake the building of the Transcontinental railway and the further extension of it under the name of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The people of Canada passed judgment decisively upon the question. They sustained the Government, virtually saying to Sir Wilfrid and his Government: "We have considered your scheme and are satisfied with it. Go ahead and carry out the policy which you have submitted to us." Well, a start was made and in 1908, four years afterwards, the Government was again on its trial. An opportunity was given, both in and out of Parliament, for ample discussion of this question. The general election came on, but very little was said about it. In any event, the Government was again sustained. In 1911—and the building of the road was progressing rapidly between 1904 and 1911—an opportunity was afforded the people of learning how things were getting along and what the Government was doing. Another question, an entirely new one, was before the people in 1911, and not a word was said by the Opposition of that day criticising the building of the road. Nothing was said adversely in regard to entering upon the undertaking or as to what it was costing. I know whereof I speak, Mr. Speaker, because I have been through all those fights, and in our own province of Nova Scotia public questions of this kind are as keenly discussed as they are in any other part of Canada. I submit, and you know, Sir, that in 1911 there was a totally different question before the electorate, and the approval of silence was given to the railway policy of the Liberal party. The reciprocity treaty was discussed in this House very fully, and no vote was taken upon it for a couple of months, I think, if not more than that; and there was ample opportunity of criticising the Government not only in regard to the reciprocity treaty, but in connection with its general administration. It was the duty of the Opposition of that day, it was the duty of the Conservative press, to criticise not only the reciprocity policy of the Government but the whole administration and record of the Government, and the most striking slogan of the leader of the Opposition, now Prime Minister of Canada, was: "Leave well enough alone." That was his slogan: "Everything was all right. This country is in first-class condition. Don't take any chances by intermeddling or dabbling in things the consequences of which you cannot foresee. Your railway policy is all right; your immigration policy is all right; your financial policy is all right. Don't break into any new territory which you do not understand. Stand pat; leave well enough alone." That was the slogan, and hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House know that these things were said not only on the hustings but in this House also, as can be seen from Hansard of that date.

Thus it is plain that the policy of the Liberal party in connection with railway extension was not formulated in secrecy. It was not kept under a bushel, for every one knew about it and all the people of Canada gave their assent to it. If there was nothing wrong about it but the undertaking cost more than the people thought it would, we must bear in mind that surprises may lie in store for any concern. When you undertake to build—whether it be a house or a barn or a railway—the cost may exceed your anticipation. If, however, the work is done honestly, if there is nothing improper about it, what can be said except that you were mistaken in your calculation? Not only did the Canadian people approve of the railway policy of the Liberal party, but when a change of government took place in 1911 we find the Minister of Finance of that day (Sir Thomas White) endorsing it, in effect. He brought down his Budget on the 13th of March, 1912—the Budget of a capable financier, fresh from the country and, although a financier of many years' experience, a member fresh to the House, anxious no doubt to see just how matters stood and to ascertain that everything was all right before taking over his duties. I would refer hon. gentlemen to his speech delivered on the 13th March, 1912, in which he refers to the railway policy of the Liberal Government. He refers to those railways that were built and were in the course of construction, and says: "I do not regard those railways as any handicap or embarrassment to the Canadian people. I regard them as an asset of the people and of the country." These may not be his exact words; I have not Hansard here, but I take the responsibility for repeating in effect exactly what the Minister of Finance at that time said, entirely approving, as he did, of the building of the road and of everything else in connection with the railways that were handed over to the Administration of which he was a distinguished member. In the fall of 1913 we find the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) himself, with a galaxy of his Cabinet, going to the province of Quebec. I think my good friend, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) was among them. If not, assuredly they made a mistake in leaving him behind. However, there was a goodly number of the Cabinet down there. They went, of course, to be ingratiated into the good manners and advanced education of the gentlemen whom they would meet in the great old city of Quebec, and I must say, reading the speech of the right. hon. gentleman who then led the Government, that he acquitted himself admirably, and no criticism can be passed upon any of those who attended him concerning their demeanour on that occasion. What did he say? He came into power in 1911, and these things took place in the fall of 1913. For capable business men that was ample time to ascertain how matters stood. The whole speech was read and put in Hansard this session. It was full of laudations of the marvellous development of Canada that was forthcoming, and forthcoming by reason of the building of the Transcontinental and Grand Trunk Pacific. There was nothing too big, there was nothing too flowery, there was nothing to optimistic to be thrown on the canvas to excite the admiration not only of the province and city of Quebec, but of the whole world. That speech was well delivered, as the Prime Minister's speeches always are, interesting and well put together, and I would invite hon. gentlemen to read it. It was delivered by the right hon. gentleman after he had had plenty of time to consider the effect of this railway policy. There is not one word of criticism in it. It simply pointed out that we had arrived at a stage when a policy had been established in railway matters that would do justice to the great potentialities of this country, bring to Canada great streams of immigration and great streams of traffic that would be carried from one end of the country to the other. That was the decision of the Prime Minister—I have already mentioned the decision of the Finance Minister of that day—in connection with this railway policy of the Liberal party. I submit, we have nothing to apologize for; if there is anything to apologize for, that apology should and must come from the hon. gentlemen who took hold of this policy but who were not able to carry it out, who fell down, who have made a failure where there should have been success.

Now I come to the present situation. What is being done? The Prime Minister at that time told us that there was to be a wonderful development of the country by reason of these railways. We find an entirely different state of affairs. In those days they were hopeful down in the Maritime Provinces. The people of St. John, Halifax, Sydney, of my own town of North Sydney, of Louisburg, and other places where there are good harbours were looking for marvellous results from the great development of this country. There was a proviso, wisely put into the legislation of 1903, or at least into the agreement that was made with the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk, that the traffic from the West should not be switched aside and sent to Portland, it was to go to the Maritime Provinces, to St. John, Halifax, possibly to Sydney and sometimes to Louisburg. What do we find now? We find that millions of money have been expended on the harbour at St. John. Only last winter we made an arrangement by which the Government took over the harbour of St. John. We arranged to pay some millions of dollars and expect to pay a large amount to keep the harbour of St. John in proper shape to receive the trade of the West and of the rest of the country, the harbour to be owned by the Government to all intents and purposes. That was all right; there was no criticism of that move in this House. But, after all this expenditure, all this preparation, all this camouflage, we find that the water is cut off the mill. The mill is there, the wheel stands still, traffic is cut off and everything henceforth goes into a foreign country—to Portland. I do not know how much has been spent in St. John, but about $40,000,000 has been spent in Halifax, changing the railway, constructing docks and all the rest of it, and now the same thing is done; the traffic is taken away and the Maritime Provinces are left without any further prospect of development along the lines which they so hopefully looked forward to.

In another part of the country we looked forward with great hopefulness to the development that the country would receive in this way. We expected that the day was not so far distant when a ship loading coal at Sydney Harbour would deliver that coal at Port Arthur, and that in addition, when that ship had discharged her coal at Port Arthur, she would receive flour, grain, and the manufactured goods of Ontario and bring those back to the province of Nova Scotia with further transportation across the Atlantic if necessary. These were the big things to which the people of this country were looking. But they are all cut off. There is no further talk of developing the waterways of Canada. There is no necessity for it, according to the authors of this new scheme because we have to devote our attention to the further development of the harbour of Portland in the United States, a foreign country—good enough in its way, but not Canada. If there is any trouble at any time in the future, which we hope there will not be between Canada and the United States, we have to stop at the border, our water outlet is cut off, we have neglected the development of our internal waters, of our own eastern harbours and we are put back possibly a hundred years in the development of our country because we have forgotten to consider our own country, the development of our own ports and the encouragement of our own navigation but have made them subservient to the interests of ports in the United States.

These are some of the results that will likely flow from this new policy which is being developed—the neglect of our own country, the neglect of our own harbours, rivers, canals and ports to the advantage of a foreign country, the switching of our trade to another port entirely of which we had never thought and which was never in our contemplation when we were preparing for this large development of our country.

The hon. member for Kings (Mr. McIsaac) —and he will pardon me for referring to him again—spoke of this as a very slight affair. It was a very small thing and he thought that it was ridiculous that hon. members on this side should discuss it at all. The matter was so plain, so simple, so palpable, and what we were offered was such a bargain that we should all rush at it, wait not for one word of criticism or inquiry as to what the price was going to be, what it consisted of or anything else about it, but just grasp at this wonderful pearl of great price that the Grand Trunk are laying on the bosom of the Canadian people. That is the idea that we get from the hon. member and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who undertake to criticise are told that they are really wasting the time of the people and of the country and that they should not discuss such matters at all.

I myself, Mr. Speaker, am not of that view. My own position is that the Canadian people should get possession of every facility in this country that they possibly can get, provided they can do so at a proper price and provided they are able to operate that utility as much to the advantage of themselves and the country as it would be worked if it were in the hands of a corporation or private owners. There is no disguising, and I am not trying to disguise, where I am on this question—I am on record a hundred times in this House on the question of a man's individual ability and results when he is working for himself compared to his ability and results when he is working for a government. There is no question whatever about that. I always look for the best results when a man is working for himself, as compared with the results obtained when he is working for a government. When a man is working for himself he is ambitious, he is keen, he has got all his wits about him, he knows that the prize is for himself, and he wants to use his brain and his ability to the very best advantage. On the other hand, we find that a man is sluggish, indifferent, and careless when working for a government; he is only a cog in a wheel, there is not very much notice taken of him. He knows he is a cog and he will remain in that wheel—he will do the work of the wheel and that is all he will do. That is what is happening in this country and that is where the vast difference comes in between the results of the operation of concerns publicly owned and operated and the results of concerns privately owned and privately operated. In the great majority of cases, I am happy to say, we find privately-operated concerns making money, but that is not the case with public utilities. Of course, there are towns and cities who supply their own water and light, and some of them are making money—some of them are making ends meet and some making a profit—but that is entirely different from the working or exercising of the right of running a railway some eight or nine thousand miles long or dealing with such almost incomprehensible things as the operation of such systems. I suppose that, as in the past, a great deal of fault will be found with me because I express these views. I care not about that at all; I hate now, and will always continue to hate, pharisaical hypocrisy; and if hon. gentlemen opposite wish to take shelter in the camp of a pharisaical hypocrite, they can stay there—I will not.

Now, I am a single individual. I might on this question be absolutely wrong. I am not speaking as the leader of a great party, I am speaking for myself. That is my view, although I may be wrong. Before I sit down I hope to be able to prove to the House and to the Canadian people that I am right in saying that we get the best results from people handling their own business as corporations rather than from the loose way of government ownership and government operation. Mr. Speaker, we are told to be very much afraid and to pass by on the other side for fear we may touch the institution known as the Canadian Pacific railway. We are told to avoid it as far as we can; and indeed it is dangerous for a public man to express an opinion with regard to it because he is at once branded as being in sympathy with that concern and in their service, and as not being honest. Why that great public organ, the Globe, is calling myself to task for being in the service of, and in improper sympathy with, the Canadian Pacific. I have been in public life, Mr. Speaker, for thirty years. Fourteen years of that time have been spent largely in the service of the town and municipality to which I belong. Twenty years—five of them in Halifax and fifteen of them here—have been absolutely in the public service. I have been elected four times to this House, twice to the legislature of Nova Scotia, and fourteen times in municipal elections. That is a fairly good test, Mr. Speaker. I invite the Globe to look over those years, to look over that history, and if they find one single blemish, or anything that looks aught but what a public man's public service should exhibit of public honesty, they will have some license to attack me as being in favour of private ownership. That is my position, Mr. Speaker, and with that history, Sir, I think I have a right to say to hon. gentlemen in this House that whatever my views are they are honest, and there is nothing behind them except what I deem to be regard for the best interests of the Canadian people.

Now, supposing the taking of the Grand Trunk system is a good bargain. There is many a poor boy who walks along Sparks street on a cold day and sees nice boots in the shop windows and nice coats hanging up inside. He is very cold; he would like to get boots; he would like to get clothes; he would like to be well clothed to stand the severity of the weather. But he has no money to buy boots or clothes; the condition of things forces him to go without. Now, supposing this railroad bargain is all right, have we got the necessary money to carry it out? I submit, Sir, that we have not. I give no evidence of my own on that point except to say this: That while we talk about two billions of money as being the public debt of Canada I am informed on very good authority that it amounts to $2,270,000,000—that is the aggregate public debt of this country. We also have a railway debt of $400,000,000 which we now pass over in the name of the Canadian Northern; that is not added to our public debt although to all intents and purposes it forms a part of it, for we have taken over the road, we have assumed the obligation, and we might as well be honest with ourselves, add it to the general debt of Canada and reckon it in that way. On the authority of good financiers in this country who have gone into this matter, I received the figures just as I have given them to the House, and they constitute the main block of our indebtedness. Before coming down to details I appeal to the people of Canada and I appeal to hon. gentlemen if it is not a time when we should pause and examine the situation and determine whether we are in a position to impose such burdens upon the country. We are but a small group here representing about 8,000,000 of people, and commissioned to look after national affairs, and our friends at home rest at ease, believing that we will not enter into any contract or obligation but what is in the best national interest. Our constituents are busy about other matters, and when we take upon ourselves the responsibility of representing them they leave to us the duty of seeing that nothing shall be done here except what is in the best interests of the country. For that reason, Sir, I submit that it is the duty of every hon. member to ascertain the financial obligations of the country, and to consider carefully whether it is proper that we shall force on the people anything which they can do without. I contend, Sir, that we can do without this Grand Trunk for the present, and that the financial condition of the country is such that we should not attempt to take over the railway.

I was saying that the financial state of Canada was such as not to justify the position the Government is taking. Up till to-day who is there that we should look to as the best authority on the financial condition of the country? I submit that for the last seven or eight years the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has known more about the finances of the Dominion than any other Canadian. What is his advice? When he was talking upon a subject which involved the assumption of some further financial responsibility by the people, his advice was: "You cannot do it. If you take my advice you will not add another dollar to the obligations of Canada." And, Mr. Speaker, I have here a summary of what was put forward in support of that advice:

$30,000,000 is required this year for pensions;
$25,000,000 for soldiers' land settlement;
$10,000,000 for soldiers' civil re-establishment;
$102,762,000 for interest on the public debt;
$350,000,000 for war expenditure for 1920.
A total of $517,762,000.

And the same authority tells us that that is only a portion of what we have to provide, for in the session which closed on the 7th of July we passed estimates totalling $550,000,000. That immense sum of money has to be provided for, and the items mentioned here are but a very few of those aggregating the $550,000,000 which we then threw upon the shoulders of the people. But taking it as it is here, we find the items which I mention aggregate $517,762,000; and we are told by the very excellent authority that the aggregate revenue expected from every source this year will be $224,000,000. That, hon. members will observe, leaves a deficit of $273,762,000. Now, supposing that one-half of the $550,000,000 estimates we passed are yet to be provided for—I will not take half, I will say that we have $250,000,000 not yet provided for. Add that sum to the $273,762,000 and we have a deficit of $523,762,000. That means that this country during the current year must find $523,762,000 for which we have not one cent of revenue, because our revenue was exhausted long ago—and it must be remembered that our actual revenue often falls short of the estimate made by the Finance Department. But at the very best we are now confronting a situation where $523,762,000 must be borrowed, not so much for public works, but for the ordinary expenses of the country. There is no camouflage about that, these are figures given by the best authorities that the Government can put forward, they are the records of the Department of Finance given to us without question on the authority of officials of that department, including the ex-Finance Minister himself.

In the light of that situation would not sane, wise men say: Well, anything that Canada can do without for the present should not be acquired, but should be left over to be dealt with later under better circumstances; unless it can be shown that it is a very good proposition and something which will bring money to the coffers of Canada instead of placing us under new obligations. I submit, Sir, that if there is any fact in the present life of Canada which should receive our sympathetic support and careful consideration it is this fact of the returned soldier and his wife and children; they should receive as much consideration as anything else that could possibly come before this Parliament. We have been advised by the Government, and it is a matter of record, that there is nothing they can do for our returned men. We have been told on the floor of this House by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), who was then leading the Government, that it had already been decided that nothing could be done. Of course, there is something going on now—I do not know what it will amount to—but the record of the Government and the letter of the Prime Minister to the secretary of the Great War Veterans' Association, which was read here yesterday, are to the effect that the financial situation of the country is such that not a dollar can be raised to relieve those worthy sons of Canada who have done so much for the Empire and for this Dominion. If we have no money for the soldier—if his baby must cry for bread and we have no bread to appease its hunger—have we money to buy old railway stock? That, Sir, is the situation. We have been told by the Prime Minister, no doubt on his honour and what he thought was the fact, that much as he would like to help the soldiers he had not the means and dared not undertake to do anything which the financial situation of the country would not justify. But to-day there seems to be plenty of money to buy old stock that is worth nothing, to buy a railroad that is hopelessly insolvent and has not paid a cent of dividends for years.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is not so. How can the hon. gentleman say that?

Mr. McKENZIE: If it has paid a dividend, Sir, it has paid it out of the life blood of the road, out of money that should have gone into the upkeep of that road, according to the Drayton-Acworth report which is the Tory gospel.

That report says that $36,000,000 was taken out of the earnings of the road and paid in dividends, whereas it should have been put into the road. I am not responsible for the truth of that statement; it is in the Drayton-Acworth report. The report has been public now for nearly two years, and we have not heard that statement called in question by any Grand Trunk official. They admit that they have allowed the road to run down, taken money to pay dividends, and played the market—I say that advisedly—with the road, hoping when it has gone to rack and ruin to pile it on the shoulders of the Canadian people. A copy of the Drayton-Acworth report has just been put in my hands, and I find this (page lxxxvi, section 10):

> The Grand Trunk Company proper has made unjustifiable charges to capital. Its lines have not been adequately maintained. More than $21,000,000, which ought to have been spent on maintenance in past years, has not been spent. New capital expenditure of over $30,000,000 is immediately required. The country is suffering from the company's inability to give adequate service. The Grand Trunk railway ought to be managed in Canada, and not from London.

That, I think, is sufficient justification for what I said, but in another part of the report it is actually stated that the sum of $36,000,000 which should have been put into the road to keep it in proper shape was paid out in dividends.

Mr. J. D. REID: That has been denied by the Grand Trunk officials.

Mr. McKENZIE: It may have been, but woe betide any man on this side of the House who says that the Drayton-Acworth report is not literally and actually correct as to every word and every figure. Well, I have found those figures in that report, and I take them as being correct and shall stand by them until the Drayton-Acworth Commission tells this House and the country that they were mistaken and that that money was not used in the way they stated.

I was dealing with the question whether this was a good bargain or not. Whether or not it is a good bargain, I submit that we are not in a position now to launch into an expenditure of this kind, but we should get along as cheaply as we can consistent with present circumstances and the times in which we live. We have been told over and over again by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) that this is just as much a war year as any of the five years during which the war was on. If this is a war year, if it is necessary for the purposes of the war to borrow $350,000,000 this year and another $350,000,000 next year to square the account, is it not reasonable that we ought, if Canada can raise the money and we have money to spare, to look after our soldiers in the most sympathetic and generous manner? But out of that $350,000,000 we have not got a dollar for the soldier. We cannot give the soldier any because there are other demands. We are asked in some quarters to be generous with the shareholders of the Grand Trunk. I say that we have been generous with them for over sixty years in this country. If there is any generosity in the hearts of members of this House or the people of this country those who have the first claim upon it are the soldiers of Canada and not the shareholders in the Old Land. If we cannot be generous with our own flesh and blood I do not think there is any room for argument for generosity for wealthy men and women in the Old Country. We are anxious, of course, to give a fair deal to every man and every woman in the Old Land who chooses to put money in any of our enterprises; that should be our desire, and we should do it for the sake of our reputation. But the Drayton-Acworth report says that there was bad management in connection with this company. It declares that the road was badly managed both at the operating and the financing ends, that the management were, practically speaking, playing the market and neglecting the requirements of the road. Now that they have let the road go to rack and ruin, is that the time for the people of Canada to step in and pay for all the blunders and mistakes and shortcomings of the management of this road during the last sixty years? I submit that we have stronger calls upon our generosity and upon our finances. There is a greater need elsewhere for any generosity and energy that we possess. The proper thing now is to see how public ownership of railways is going to work out before we take over this system. Then, if public ownership of the railways is found to be good business, and if our finances will permit of it we can take the road over when public ownership has been made a success. To take an illustration, if one of my farmer friends in this House or outside buys a Jersey cow from a man to-day and is asked to buy another Jersey cow from the same man to-morrow, would not a sensible farmer say, "Let me see how the cow I bought from you yesterday is going to turn out, how much milk and butter she gives? Then, when I know what sort of a cow she is, I can talk to you about buying another one." That is business. Why not apply the same principle to the public ownership and operation of railways? We have from 14,000 to 16,000 miles of railway on our hands now. Surely we should be permitted to see how the operation of this mileage works out before we are asked to take over another 8,000 miles without knowing whether public ownership and operation of railways is good business or not. I submit that in view of these considerations and the facts I shall give later on, it is not a fair proposition to ask us to take over this road at this stage.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McKENZIE: (Resuming) Mr. Speaker, just at six o'clock, I was making some reference to the bargain with which we are dealing as not being a good one, and also to the financial condition of Canada, and I was drawing the inference that the purchase proposed was not a wise one nor a good bargain, and that the Canadian exchequer was not in a prosperous condition that would warrant entering into a speculation of this kind. A good deal of credit is claimed by the Government in connection with public ownership, and they have been trying to make out that they are pioneers in this matter and that they are doing it as a matter of policy and in the best interest of the country. I wish to quote from a cablegram which appears in this blue book which is endorsed "Grand Trunk Railway Company Acquisition and Memoranda respecting the same," published by the Government and placed in the hands of hon. members a few days ago. The very first cablegram which appears on page 3 is one from the Rt. Hon. Sir Robert Borden to the Dominion High Commissioner at London. It is marked "confidential," and reads:

Following for Smithers, President Grand Trunk. Begins. Most Confidential. Public opinion greatly exercised by proposed increase of railway rates. We are hearing appeal to-day from Railway Board's decision. Having regard to all conditions which confront the Government it seems highly probable that circumstances will compel us to take active steps toward nationalization of Canadian railways in immediate future.

I quote that, Sir, to show that the view of the Government at that time was not that they were entering upon a promising business or upon something that was inviting, but that they were confronted with a condition which would compel them in the near future to take over the railways. It is hardly necessary for me to point out that a business man does not enter upon a business venture in a spirit of that kind if he believes it to be a good one. He enters upon that business because he believes it is going to be profitable and that it will be a good investment for his money, or if he is investing somebody else's money, because he thinks it is a profitable venture for the person whose money he is handling, and he will not make use of such language as the Prime Minister uses here, namely, that he finds himself in a condition where, in the immediate future, he must deal with those railways as a national-owned railway.

I find a little further on in this book, at page 7, a reference in a letter which the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) wrote on the 11th July to Sir Alfred Smithers. I am quoting that letter only to show that the Government regarded the Grand Trunk railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific railway at that time as one and the same company and one and the same property. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) in this letter says:

This latter company—

That is the Grand Trunk Pacific.

—is in every sense subsidiary to, and its stock is wholly owned by the Grand Trunk Company.

A little further on, he says:

Throughout the negotiation and indeed prior thereto, it has been made clear to your company that the obligations of the Grand Trunk company to the Grand Trunk Pacific company could not be ignored and that the Government could not undertake to assume the indebtedness of and to operate the Grand Trunk Pacific and branch lines thereof, and to relieve the Grand Trunk of responsibility therefor, while the Grand Trunk itself, as a subsidiary of which and indeed as an extension of which the Grand Trunk Pacific was built, remained in independent hands.

This clearly shows that the Government and the Minister of the Interior at that date regarded the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific as mutually responsible for the obligations of the one and the other, and that the Grand Trunk was not going to get out from the responsibility which devolved upon it by reason of extending its road, as the minister said at that time, and building a branch to the West, and the Grand Trunk Pacific was at that time regarded as an extension of the Grand Trunk railway. I am mentioning that in connection with the horror with which the Government now view the idea of putting any railway into the hands of a receiver. The Grand Trunk Pacific is a road which the Government regard as part of the Grand Trunk. They say it is to all intents and purposes an extension of the Grand Trunk, and they immediately, without the slightest hesitation, put that branch, that part of the road, of the same company, into the hands of a receiver.

Mr. J. D. REID: Might I suggest to my hon. friend that they put themselves in that position because they refused to operate?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am talking about the question of receivership.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is what I am talking about.

Mr. McKENZIE: According to the Government, it is practically the same company under a slightly different name. According to Mr. Meighen's letter, it is the same road. The main body of the road is in Ontario; some of it is in the United States; but according to this letter there was an extension of it, namely, the Grand Trunk Pacific, into the West. That portion of it the Government do not hesitate to put into the hands of a receiver, and if it is proper business to put one portion of a road which defaults and one section of the same company which defaults, into the hands of a receiver, I can see no great sin in putting the balance into the hands of the receiver. That is why I say it does not lie in the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite who have adopted this rule of practically putting this whole company into the hands of a receiver, to say that it is a horrible thing to do so.

In view of the conditions that existed in 1903 and 1904, I submit, the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific are inseparably associated in their business, which is essentially indivisable from every standpoint, moral and practical. It may suit the convenience of the Grand Trunk to repudiate the Grand Trunk Pacific as a failure to bad management; but if the Grand Trunk Pacific had been successful and had made money—if its stock were away beyond par—you would see the Grand Trunk claiming it as absolutely their own, and arguing that there was no difference between the two except for a slight addition, and the extra word "Pacific" as applicable to the portion extending from Winnipeg to the West. If in the interests of Canada it is necessary to put one portion of the road into the hands of a receiver when it cannot pay its bills, there is no good reason why the rest should not be submitted to the same receiver, if the Government wants to keep it out of the hands of strangers. No man wants to buy any real or personal property without very definite information concerning the seller's title. If any trader comes to the door of any hon. member with a horse to sell, naturally the first question will be "Is it yours?" and if the seller says it is his, subject to five or six bills of sale which are recorded, the other man will decline to buy it encumbered in that way. He will tell the seller to clear the bills of sale and get a good title, and will not heed any suggestion that he should take the horse and allow the bills of sale to be submitted to arbitration to ascertain what equity there might be in the horse. In this case we are asked to buy property, in the shape of a railway and its belongings, that is ten times covered over and patched up and literally buried under mortgages and bills of sale of all kinds. There is no title in the company, because it is encumbered to the hilt. But we are told: "Take it off our hands and if there is any question about title the arbitration will settle it." The company say to themselves: "The company is a wreck; everything is smashed; and the Lord knows what the arbitrators may do. They may give us something, but if we don't get anything we cannot be worse off than we are now."

Now, an offer was made to the Government to buy this road, as appears on pages 12 and 13 of the blue-book. That offer is made on behalf of the company by Sir Alfred Smithers. The letter was addressed to the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and bears date London August 8, 1918. It reads:

Dear Sir Robert Borden:

At the meeting yesterday between you and Mr. Ballantyne and General Mewburn and a committee of my board and myself, I made a proposition which, after a long discussion, you asked should be put in writing.

I think, in order to put it in its true perspective, I should just put down the propositions that have passed between the Government and the company. You have all the particulars of those propositions, and therefore I only shortly put down the bare figures.

At your request on the 25th January, conveyed through the High Commissioner, asking the board to say on what terms they would recommend the sale of the Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific to the Government, I replied with a statement of terms which at the end of 1930 would have resulted in an annual payment by the Government of 1,609,000 pounds. On the 7th March you replied on the part of Government, with an offer which at the end of eight years would have involved on annual payment by the Government of 739,000 pounds, or you were prepared to leave the whole question of the amount to be paid to arbitration. At our meeting yesterday I proposed that the Government should pay a net annual sum of 977,000 pounds, being the amount of net earnings for the year 1913, the last normal year before the war, and thus following the course pursued by the British Government towards the British railway, and leave to arbitration what further sum, if any, the shareholders are entitled to in respect of the prospective value of the undertaking that must arise from the development of the Dominion. This offer I now repeat. But, it was also suggested that an alternative offer should be made of a definite sum without arbitration, and I am authorized to say the board would recommend to the shareholders the payment of an annual sum of 1,163,000 pounds.

There were other offers, but I think, without confusing the issue, that I am safe in treating this as the offer that was made by the company to the Government. The Prime Minister replied indirectly to this offer on 10th September, 1918. I say "indirectly," because his letter is addressed to the High Commissioner at London and was likely by cable. It bears date 10th September, 1918, and is as follows:

Perley, Dominion,
London.

B107. Please inform Smithers with respect to his letter 13th August that I have consulted Minister Finance who has just returned as well as my other colleagues. The Government has not power to guarantee proposed note issue without the authority of Parliament and we do not consider it practicable to ask Parliament for such authority. The Government is disposed to assist in every reasonable way the maintenance of company's credit as is evidenced by the advance of one hundred and twenty-two thousand pounds on July 1st and by our offer of 12th July last to advance three hundred and eighty thousand pounds to meet fixed charges upon terms which were regarded as reasonable but which the company declined. We shall be glad to have any further suggestions from Smithers as to the methods of assistance. There is strong objection in Council to any increase of our offer for the following reasons. It is most unwise and undesirable for a Government without the report of a commission or Board of Arbitration or a vote of Parliament to undertake a large annual payment which would represent the capitalization of eighty or a hundred million dollars. The offer already made is based on the Drayton-Acworth report which affords a sufficient foundation for Government's proposal.

If we go beyond the bounds of that report we have no certain guide as to what we should propose. Council will not accept either of the offers which Smithers put forward and unless they receive further offer before end of month they will consider negotiations at an end.

I have read that part of the Prime Minister's cablegram because it bears out the attitude which we take in this House. It has been said—perhaps it was said by myself while the resolution was before the House—that we should not consider the purchase of this railway until a proper report was made as to the actual condition of the company. We are borne out in that attitude by the Prime Minister, who says in this cablegram that the Government have nothing before them but the Drayton-Acworth report, and that that report would not justify them in accepting the proposal made by the company. I propose to show that there is nothing before Parliament or the Government except the Drayton-Acworth report and that there is nothing in the Drayton-Acworth report that would justify the attitude of Parliament or the Government in reference to this proposition to-day. When the Prime Minister refers to the Drayton-Acworth report, what does that report say? While I have not read the whole of the report and there may be some things in it which I do not know, I find reference to this question at pages lxiv and lxv. It says:

It will be seen that the average amount paid in dividends has been $3,600,000 per annum. So the Stock Exchange valuation practically capitalize the dividends on 5 per cent basis. And this, in a rapidly developing country, might be reasonable, if the dividends had been earned and could be maintained. But in view of the statement of the company's own officers that $21,000,000, which ought to have been spent out of revenue for maintenance has not been so spent, it cannot be contended that the dividends have been earned. In view of the further fact that the company has to face immediate liabilities of over $5,000,000 per annum in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific, and of the statement of its own officers that a capital expenditure of $30,000,000 is immediately required on its own lines to put the company in proper condition to do its existing business, it can still less be contended that the dividends are maintainable. It cannot therefore be expected that the trustees should acquire the stock from the shareholders on the basis of past dividends. Even if the Government were to relieve them entirely, as suggested by their president, of their unfortunate Grand Trunk Pacific venture—and as we have already said, we cannot think that this request can be reasonably justified—it is evident that the Grand Trunk Company is not and will not be for some time to come, in a position entitling it to pay out any money at all in dividends. We regard the entire share capital of the company as being intrinsically of but small value at the present time. On the basis of present value of maintainable income the fair compensation would be very small.

According to this report the stock of the company is practically valueless.

Mr. J. D. REID: Read on to the next clause.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am going to read; my hon. friend need not be afraid. I will give him the sweet with the bitter if he thinks that it is sweet:

But we do not think that this is the only basis on which the people of Canada should proceed.

I would like to tell my hon. friends that the authors of the report are now getting into a charitable frame of mind. It is likely after dinner when they are writing this part of the report the austerity of the other paragraphs has disappeared and they are becoming charitable.

But we do not think that this is the only basis on which the people of Canada should proceed. We think this is a case for generosity rather than strict justice. Canada is under obligations to the Grand Trunk shareholders, who, in the early days, with but small Government assistance, and in competition with the railways of the United States with their vastly greater resources, built up the first Canadian railway system. In later times the company has had further to meet the competition of heavily subsidized Canadian rivals. And it cannot be said that at any stage of its history the shareholders have obtained excessive profits on their enterprise. On the whole we recommend that, on condition of the surrender by the Grand Trunk Company of their entire share capital, guaranteed, preferred, and ordinary, the trustees grant a certain annuity, charged as a working expense on the whole undertaking of the Dominion Railway Company, for the first seven years, increasing at the termination of that period by something like 40 or 50 per cent.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is just what we are doing.

Mr. McKENZIE: I will satisfy my hon. friend to his heart's content that this is not what he is doing:

We have left the figures blank as there will be questions of cash in hand, value of stores, etc., which must make the precise figures subject to negotiation.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is what we are doing here.

Mr. McKENZIE (reading):

But our meaning is that the first figure should be a moderate but substantial percentage of $3,600,000—

"A moderate percentage of $3,600,000." I would like to know from the Minister of Railways where under this bargain he makes an annual payment of a moderate percentage of $3,600,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: There is the $2,500,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Evidently the hon. gentleman refers to something in the bargain that I could not come across. The hon. gentleman says "$2,500,000." That is the payment on the preferred stock but he has immediately alongside of that to pay nearly $8,000,000 on the debenture stock.

Mr. J. D. REID: This was to be in addition to that.

Mr. McKENZIE: This report does not say so. This report says that the company have to deliver up everything they have.

Mr. J. D. REID: No, it does not.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is the suggestion here. They have to deliver, holus bolus, everything they have from common stock up and then the Government comes in and makes an allowance upon the basis of $3,600,000. not the whole but a moderate or substantial percentage of the amount. That is the suggestion of the Drayton-Acworth commission and that is the only authority which the Government have to-day. They have had no further investigation, no inquiry, no report, no arbitration. The Prime Minister, in his cable to the commissioner of the 10th September, 1918, says that there must be some substantial basis for the figures in the offer before anything of this kind should be done and that it should not be done except after investigation, inquiry and report to the Government. There is no such inquiry, no such report, no justification for the bargain to-day which is infinitely, away and beyond anything that could by the most lively stretch of the imagination be justified under the Drayton-Acworth report. They were travelling in the dark and without a shadow of authority at all except what negotiations may have gone on here, as to which we have no report and nothing upon which this House can base any decision. Now, Mr. Speaker, those were the preliminaries and those were the matters which passed back and forth between the Government and the president of the road, and also the reference that was made to the Drayton-Acworth Commission report by the Prime Minister and making it a basis for further negotiations. I wish to point out, and I am using the Drayton-Acworth report for that purpose, that this company has not been for the last ten years in anything like a good business condition; that it is not in good business condition to-day; and that when the Government is taking the road over they are taking it over with that knowledge and with this report before them which was made by the select commission appointed and known as the Drayton-Acworth Commission. I said before—and many of the members of this House have said the same—that before we depart from the basis of that report, before we depart from the attitude which we took at that time and which the Prime Minister took, there should be something substantial and something reliable upon which the people of this country can base any different decision at which they will arrive.

I propose to show that the bargain we are making is going away and beyond what was proposed at that time, and away and beyond the value of this undertaking. I hold in my hand a copy of the report made to his company by Sir Alfred Smithers on the 21st March, 1919, in which he states:

> I have had most heartrending appeals from the many thousands of British investors who have invested their money in the securities of the Grand Trunk Railway.

Is that the institution which the Canadian people want to take over? Have we not enough appeals, and just appeals, now with respect to the moneys that this country can produce and pay out? Have we not enough of that without going to take over the heritage which this gentleman who was president of this board has howling around him and which he is anxious to pass over to the Minister of Railways?

Mr. J. D. REID: Might I suggest to the hon. member, they could not pay the dividends, although they were earned, as long as the Grand Trunk Pacific was in default.

Mr. McKENZIE: They have never paid one farthing on those bonds, and they are not paid yet. We have to pay them or they must be done without. That is the position of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Drayton-Acworth report went fully into the matter. They say nothing about money being paid to the Grand Trunk Pacific. They say that this company has been badly managed, badly financed, and badly operated; and that they have taken the life blood out of it, and for the sake of appearances, passed money around in the shape of a small dividend to keep the thing going, which money should have gone into the operations of the company. Those are the facts, Sir, and it was under those circumstances that this distressing statement of Sir Alfred Smithers was made, which I have read. If the Grand Trunk Railway Company—by one means or another, by any means, I care not what they were—induced money owners to put their money in an enterprise which is not legitimate—that is, legitimate from not having an earning capacity—is that any of our affair? We have never deceived them in any way; we have never treated them harshly; we have never charged them any more than any other company which was doing business in this country. And if they have failed to make ends meet, if they are not paying out their dividends as they ought to pay them, is that any reason why the wreckage should be brought home to the Canadian people and we should be obliged to pay one hundred prices for it so that this howling which is rending the ears of Sir Alfred Smithers should cease and "that the lowing of cattle and the bleating of lambs should not be heard any further in the land?" I submit, Sir, it is not a reason; and no matter how much we may sympathize with the people who have been fooled in this way and have lost their money, and no matter how much we might like to help them, we must be just to ourselves, just to our own people, and just to the taxpayers of this country whose money we handle. It is not our money and we must be just before we are charitable. We have no business to pay out moneys which do not belong to us in order to take over an ill-advised and ill-managed concern such as this company evidently has been.

Now I pointed out the offer that was made and the offer that we could have accepted if we had been anxious to take over this company at that time. I have prepared a statement based largely upon the figures which appear in the blue-book that was published by the Government for the information of members, and also upon information furnished to me direct by the Government, and as I wish to be very careful about these figures and as they require careful presentation, I would ask your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, and the indulgence of the House, in order to refer to my notes a little more than I usually do on occasions of this kind. On the guaranteed stock of the Grand Trunk railway, which amounts to £12,500,000, we undertake to pay annually $2,500,000. On the debenture stock, which amounts to £31,926,125 we undertake to pay in perpetuity $7,981,531. On a very close and conservative estimate we shall find that arbitration will value the stock at not less than $55,610,238, upon which we agree to pay interest at four per cent, amounting to an annual charge of $2,224,409. I submit when I am making this calculation that this stock may be put by arbitrators at fifty per cent. This stock that is likely to be submitted to arbitration is ranging now from eleven cents on the dollar up to forty-five and fifty; some of it, I understand, is as high as seventy and will go higher. Now, we had stock to arbitrate in this country a couple of years ago, that the Drayton-Acworth Commission stated was worth nothing—not worth one cent at all—but arbitration found it was worth eighteen cents on the dollar and called upon this country to pay $10,800,000 for it. Now it is not hard or fallacious or specious reasoning to say that if stock which was declared by a competent authority to be worth nothing at all, sold for $10,800,000, stock which is ranging from eleven cents to forty, fifty and seventy, should be found to be worth fifty per cent by arbitration. I trust it will not if we have to buy, but there is no telling what may happen, because this Government, when it established the very vicious precedent of allowing to go to arbitration stock which was worthless, put the argument in the mouths of all people for all time to come that this stock, declared to be worthless, was found by a competent court to be worth the amount I have mentioned, $10,800,000, and that equally valueless stock of any other railway companies might justifiably be treated in the same manner in future. The outstanding indebtedness of the Grand Trunk for equipment and other matters amounts to $552,556,019, and the annual interest on that debt, all of which is at 6 per cent, amounts to $33,153,361.

Mr. J. D. REID: Does the hon. member mean that the annual interest is that amount, or that that is the principal on which the interest is computed?

Mr. McKENZIE: That is the interest for one year; I do not know how long it may be continued. If the bonds and securities are taken over and the Government only pay the interest, that is the annual charge they will have to pay to keep that going.

Mr. J. D. REID: I was looking at page 39 of the blue-book. There I notice that under Notes Payable, which I take it are equipment bonds, the amount is $35,548,235. The figures are not quite the same, but I mean there would be interest on that $35,000,000. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that there will be that amount of interest instead of that being the amount on which the interest will be computed.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is the position I take, and I have obtained my figures from the blue-book which the hon. gentleman holds in his hand. There is also a stock issue of $50,126,655, shown on page 39 of the same blue-book recently issued by the Government in connection with the financial and business standing of the Grand Trunk. That stock, which we also assume, bears interest at four per cent, which will amount to a further claim against the country of $2,005,066. The total annual interest upon all the Grand Trunk liabilities which we assume is $47,864,367. The earnings of the Grand Trunk for the railway year ending 31st December, 1918, were $64,482,316; the operating expenses were $53,435,801; leaving a balance, of $11,046,515, from which must be deducted the loss on the roads operated in the United States amounting to $1,639,317. This leaves a net balance, without deducting the fixed charges, of $9,407,198; but subtracting the fixed charges, which were $9,398,438, there is left only $8,760. Taking the very best situation in which the road can be placed for that year and giving credit for a clean earning of $9,407,198, and deducting that amount from the annual interest charge of $47,864,367, there is left a deficit of $38,457,169 on the year's operations of the Grand Trunk, which deficit must be paid annually by the people.

Mr. J. D. REID: I think the hon. gentleman has made a mistake in regard to the equipment bonds.

Mr. McKENZIE: The mistake is very slight, if any. I mean that my figuring was rather in favour of the company—not intentionally, but some of the debenture stock is at five per cent and some at four per cent, and by mistake I figured the whole of it at four per cent, thus giving the company the advantage of that difference.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not say that the hon. member is intentionally wrong, but I understood him to state that there was $35,000,000 interest on equipment bonds, or rolling stock.

Mr. McKENZIE: There are a great many things in that indebtedness besides rolling stock. The hon. gentleman I think will find on pages 38, 39 and 40 of this blue-book a long list of indebtedness, including rolling stock and many other things besides. I have subtracted from that the stock which we are dealing with separately, and am dealing with the balance as being a standing indebtedness of the company. This is infinitely worse than if the Government had accepted one of the offers made by the company in the early part of 1918—that is the offer which I read to the House when the negotiations were instituted.

On that occasion the company offered to accept an annual payment of $4,885,000, leaving to arbitration any further allowance which should be made to the company for the prospective value of stock; or in the alternative the company offered to accept a total annual payment of $5,815,000, without any arbitration at all, the amount of $5,815,000 being for the full claim of the company for the road. It will be noticed that the difference between the two offers is $930,000, and in that way one can have a glimpse of the value which the company placed upon the prospective value of the stock which was to be arbitrated under their first offer.

We are now agreeing to pay $2,500,000 on the guaranteed stock of £12,500,000 and $7,981,531 on the £31,926,125 debenture stock, total annual payment for all time, upon those two classes of stock, $10,481,553. The company capitalized the prospective value of their stock evidently at $23,250,000. Supposing they only get 50 per cent of that value from the arbitrators, or say $11,625,000, that amount invested at 4 per cent brings an annual income of $465,000, making the annual payment under the present agreement of $10,946,553 on the stock alone, without reference to the outstanding indebtedness of the company, which must be provided for.

It is to be noted, as already stated, that on the 8th of August, 1918, the company offered to accept in full, without arbitration, $5,815,000, an amount of $5,131,553 less than the present bargain into which the Government have entered. This, of course, does not include the liabilities of the company or the outstanding indebtedness outside of the stocks herein mentioned. All of this goes to show that to-day the country is making a very poor bargain indeed, and one which cannot be justified or supported upon any business principle.

The official figures furnished to me by the Government show that in the year ending 31st December, 1918, the Canadian Northern Railway had total earnings of $60,689,257; the operating expenses were $55,843,154; fixed charges, $21,677,965, leaving a deficit for the operation of the year ending 31st

December, 1918, of $16,831,862, which the Government had to provide for, and on which the country had to pay interest to the extent of $841,000, making a total deficit of $17,672,862 for that year.

I have already referred to the result of operations on the Grand Trunk for that same year, and will not say anything further for the present.

For the same year, the Grand Trunk Pacific had a revenue of $11,888,808; the operating expenses were $13,687,681; fixed charges $9,398,438, leaving a deficit on that year's business of $10,263,281. On that deficit the interest amounted to $513,164, making a total deficit for that year of $10,777,445. In connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific, I have received further figures from the Minister of Railways and Canals. Up to August 31, 1919, the sum of $5,407,522.26 had been advanced to the road, and the net operating deficits are given as follows:

March 10 to 31, 1919	$185,447.66
April	458,286.61
May	586,434.45
June	518,816.56
July (estimated)	446,515.00
August (estimated)	505,247.00

A total deficit for March, April, May, June, July and August of $2,700,746.68. Those figures are for what may be regarded as the best part of the year, and are by no means encouraging.

The Transcontinental railway for the year ending 31st March, 1919, had total earnings of $10,412,407; operating expenses were $13,028,381; deficit $2,615,974. The capital invested in the Transcontinental railway is $173,000,000, interest on which amounts to $8,650,000 and interest on the deficit for one year $130,798, leaving a net deficit for the year's operations of $11,396,772.

The Intercolonial railway for the year ending 31st March, 1919, had total earnings of $26,435,343; operating expenses were $28,236,506, leaving a deficit of $1,801,163 for that year's operations. The capital invested in the Intercolonial is $125,000,000, interest on which amounts to $6,250,000; interest on deficit $90,058; total deficit, $8,141,221.

The total deficit for the last railway year of the three roads operated by the Government amounts to $47,988,300. If we add to this amount the deficit of the Grand Trunk $38,457,167, there is in prospect for government operation of railways an annual deficit of $86,445,467.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. J. D. REID: What did my hon. friend make the total deficit of the three roads?

Mr. McKENZIE: I said $47,988,300.

Mr. J. D. REID: The statement I submitted to the hon. member showed the deficits as follows: Canadian Northern $16,831,862, Grand Trunk Pacific $10,263,281, Transcontinental $2,615,974, Intercolonial $1,801,163, or a total of $31,512,280. Has the hon. gentleman added the interest on capitalization to those figures?

Mr. McKENZIE: That is true. Those figures bear incomes and disbursements but do not include interest on the capital investment. The figures the minister handed me were $43,423,500, which included some interest. We are paying 5½ per cent for money now and I have figured the interest only at 5 per cent. I did not make it 5½, but I am sure it would be no exaggeration to figure interest at that rate on any moneys the Government have to borrow to-day. I have calculated the interest on the capital investment, which in the case of the Transcontinental is $173,000,000. I have also calculated interest on the investment of $125,000,000 in the Intercolonial, because we are paying interest on that money. Of course, these moneys when not earned constitute a deficit and an obligation which must be paid out of other revenues.

The minister and the House know that the Grand Trunk has obligated itself to a certain amount of bonds and other obligations which we will have to assume when we take over the road with its assets. These obligations, which appear on pages 51 and 52 of the blue-book, amount roughly speaking, to $198,389,720. Some of these we may not be called upon to pay; I do not know. All that I say is this, that those roads in connection with which we gave those guarantees went nearly $2,000,000 behind last year. The Grand Trunk was called upon out of its Canadian earnings to send nearly $2,000,000 into the United States to pay for the operations of those roads. In connection with those roads, the Grand Trunk has given guarantees to the amount which I have mentioned, and when a man puts his name on the back of a note, he should always be prepared to pay it if called upon, and he must regard it as an obligation. He may not have to pay it, but he may; and when we find conditions of this kind confronting us, namely, that those railways do not pay and that they do not pay their obligations, the strong probabilities are that we shall have to meet those obligations and to make good those guarantees. For those reasons we must take into account the guarantees of the Grand Trunk to the extent of $198,389,720 which appear on pages 51 and 52 of the Blue Book. That is the condition of affairs of public-owned railways of this country, and I submit to businessmen that that is not a very inviting proposition. We must suppose that the operations are carried on as reasonably and as cautiously as the operations of a Government road can be carried on, and yet we are confronted this year with a deficit of something like $50,000,000. This House is deciding upon the question whether or not it is advisable to continue the undertaking and to continue adding to a property which does not seem to promise anything better than, if as good as, the roads with which we have been already dealing.

I have here some authorities on the working of the road and on the policy of Government ownership. Having spoken now longer than I expected, I will not trouble the House with quoting these authorities, and indeed the House is familiar with them. I was going to quote the Montreal Daily Star of October 27, which speaks very strongly against Government-owned roads and the operation of railroads by a government. I was also, on the financial question, going to quote a paper friendly to the Government, the Ottawa Journal, of October 14, 1919, which strongly warns the Government to undertake no further obligations along the lines suggested by this legislation. I was going to make reference to an authority which has already been quoted, Lord Shaughnessy who is, of course, running a railroad that might be regarded as in opposition to Government railways. But when we have to deal with authorities and men who know business, we must not refuse to give credence to their judgment because they happen to be opponents in business. We have in this opinion expressed by Lord Shaughnessy the word and experience of a man who has made a success of a great railway system in this country, and we should not lightly throw aside any suggestions that he may make about public ownership. He asks us to be cautious on this subject and not to plunge headlong into undertakings that may prove fatal to the country. I have also the authority of a certain Mr. Mitchell, president of the National City Company of New York, who, speaking before the Canadian Club in Montreal, gave that club the experience of the American people in connection with government-owned railways. He explains in his statement that the freights on the roads have been increased to the tune of something like $885,000,000 in the last year—that is, that much more money has been taken out of the American people than under private ownership of roads—and after paying this $885,000,000, they find that they have to put their hands into their pockets to the extent of $210,000,000 to square up the year's operation of the roads. The experience in England is not at all inviting, and I have given the House as carefully as I can the figures so far as I can get them in connection with the operation of our roads in Canada. With this evidence before the House, I think I have done all that can be expected of me, not all, perhaps, but at least a portion of what may be regarded as my duty as a representative of some of the Canadian people.

When the facts, the experience of operations of this road, are put before Parliament and the Government, it is then for the Government to decide, and if they make a mistake in the light of proper information and of the truth, the responsibility is entirely theirs. I trust that the Government will not plunge headlong into this undertaking without at least getting some more information about it, and at all events getting the information of which the Prime Minister speaks in his cablegram to the High Commissioner bearing date 10th September, 1918, and appearing on pages 14 and 15 of this Blue Book. In that cablegram he emphasizes the fact that there should be full information before the House before they would depart from their original undertaking or from the first offer that they made. I pointed out to the House that the offer we are making, the undertaking we are now willing to legislate upon and to pass into a bargain and obligation on the part of the Canadian people, is away and beyond and above the amount which was first spoken of and which the Government, in the early days of negotiation, were willing to pay.

As a last word, let me say to the Government that some days ago I pointed out that if this proposition must go through Parliament and we have to deal with it, we should take some precaution to protect the Canadian people against speculation regarding this stock. The negotiations commenced as far back as 24th January, 1918, that being the date when the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) sent his cablegram to Sir George Perley asking him to open negotiations for taking over this road. That became public at once on that date, and the whole world had an opportunity of speculating in that stock from that date forward. The value of that stock should be governed, not by any impetus which it might have received by the negotiations, but entirely by its value on the 23rd January, 1918, before the negotiations became known at all, because that is the real genuine value of that stock, and not the value that it might have obtained after the negotiations became known. We know that after the negotiations got abroad the stock increased in value, and any value that was given to it was given to it not because the property is any better, but because it was hoped that the Government would take it and render it more valuable, but we have no business to pay for that stock any more than it was worth when we commenced the negotiations.

That is the date at which we should consider what this stock was worth.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would move this amendment:

That the Bill be not read a second time but that the House do come to the following resolution:

That the Bill proposes an uncertain but very large addition to the debt of the Dominion at a time when existing obligations, arising out of the War and from other causes, are so vastly in excess of all previous obligations as to give much cause for anxiety on the part of all who are concerned in the financial position of Canada and the maintenance of the public credit.

That a measure of such wide-reaching character and large importance requires a study by the House and the people that cannot possibly be given in the closing days of the session.

That the present session of Parliament was called for a special purpose which has already been accomplished.

That on Wednesday October 8th the Honourable the Minister of Trade and Commerce, acting as leader of the House in the absence of the Prime Minister, stated that the Government's expectation was that the session would close within the then current week.

That under such circumstances the introduction by the Government of a measure of such great importance as the acquisition of the railway and property of the Grand Trunk Company of Canada is improvident and inexpedient.

That for these reasons the further consideration of the Bill be deferred until a future session of this Parliament.

I move this amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding).

Mr. J. D. REID: Mr. Speaker——

Mr. ROWELL: Mr. Speaker——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Who has the floor?

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friends will have ample opportunity to cast their vote against public ownership when the time comes.

An hon. MEMBER: How soon?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROWELL: The argument advanced by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) against the second reading of the Bill and in support of the amendment for the six months' hoist was based principally on four grounds. First, my hon. friend clearly stated his position as being opposed to public ownership of railways or utilities of this kind under any conditions which he conceived possible in Canada. Secondly, he took the ground that this proposal was not in the public interest, so far as the merits of the proposal itself were concerned; thirdly, if I understood him aright, he thought that the financial position of Canada was not such that the country should undertake the purchase at the present time; and lastly, my hon. friend expressed the view that it was inopportune at this session to bring forward the present Bill. I think I have fairly summarized the grounds upon which my hon. friend is opposed to the second reading of the Bill and moves the amendment for the six months' hoist.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to deal with these questions briefly and in the order mentioned. The hon. gentleman states his opposition to the principle of public ownership. Suppose we concede, for the sake of argument, that it is a debatable proposition. Then I submit my hon. friend has not made out a case, because in Canada we have public ownership of railways on a very large scale and must continue to have it for many years to come.

Mr. JACOBS: Has it been a success?

Mr. ROWELL: That depends entirely on the standpoint from which you view it. The Intercolonial was built as a political railway to serve political considerations of very great national moment. It was not built originally as a paying transportation proposition; it was intended to serve great national ends. During the long period of the existence of that road it was operated as a political railway, in the sense that business and transportation considerations were not the dominating motive in its management, and every hon. member on both sides of the House knows that to be the case. Under these conditions, you cannot test the question of public ownership of railways by the Intercolonial, and there is not an hon. member in this House who will say that the experience with the Intercolonial is a fair criterion as to the success or failure of the public ownership of a great system of railway transportation. We now have that added to by many thousands of miles of railway,—added to not primarily because the Government of Canada wanted to embark on the purchase of railways but because of the colossal failure of the private ownership and operation of railways in this country. The whole railway situation, which is calling for the most earnest consideration of the members of this House, and of the business men and the people generally of Canada, arises, not out of the public ownership of railways but out of the bedevilled condition created by private ownership of railways in Canada. If our railways are in trouble to-day it is not because of public ownership but because of private ownership.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend asks what about the Canadian Pacific railway. Well, it is a magnificently operated railway and has been a great success. But it has been subsidized by public moneys and lands as few railways in existence have been subsidized, and I doubt very much if it could have been the success it is had it not been for the great assistance which it received at the hands of the Government of Canada. But to come back to the other railways. They are in the hands of the Government not because of any failure of Government ownership but because of the failure of private ownership and operation of railways in Canada. Tens of millions of dollars have been invested in railways in Canada for which the public will receive no adequate return, because of the duplication of lines over stretches of territory where that duplication is wholly unnecessary, and the people of Canada for a generation must bear the burden. The transportation of the people must suffer by reason of this enormous and wasteful expenditure of public money under private ownership, and as a result of the action of both political parties in handling the railway problem in Canada. We are faced with a railway situation to-day where millions of money have been invested in sections of railways which are not needed in the public interest and for which the investors will never get an adequate return, for the traffic along these lines will not provide sufficient freight to enable them to earn a return. This condition of things is due not to public ownership but to private ownership of railways in this country.

Although public ownership and operation may not be as great a success as some of us hoped and believed it might be, or as some of my hon. friends feared, I venture to think it could not very well be worse than the experience we have had in Canada in connection with the private ownership of railways. I mention that because my hon. friend asked a question.

We have public ownership of railways in Canada whether we wish it or not, and the taking over of the Grand Trunk is not embarking upon a new venture. It is the endeavour to make more safe and secure our existing investment in these railways. Do hon. members say that this is not a wise and prudent thing in the national interest? Concede all my hon. friend says about the cost of operating our present railways, concede all my hon. friend says about the shortage, the difference between revenue and expenditure in operating these railways, concede all that my hon. friend has claimed about the deficits—although I was quite unable to follow his figures on many points—what does it mean? It means that we have this liability on our shoulders and unless we adopt some such expedient as securing this additional piece of railway, Canada will have to continue to bear that burden, will have to continue to meet these deficits, will have to continue to carry that huge liability without any immediate prospect of being relieved of the burden or of its being substantially reduced.

My hon. friend's whole argument absolutely lacks any business or common sense basis. We have got these railways, they are not paying at the present time and one reason why they are not paying is because we have not got a system which is complete in itself, we have not got the connections in the East for the important lines operated in the West. We want feeders in the East as we have them in the West, and one way to save the country from this annual expenditure which it must make in connection with its transportation system is to link up with this great system of railways in the East, the Grand Trunk railway with all its lines through the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, its great opportunities for gathering up freight to send out over our transcontinental railway and its great opportunities for distributing freight from the West throughout the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. With such connections it should be possible to reduce these great annual deficits which we must continue to pay if we do not link up with this system in the East. Without that, as my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) in introducing the resolution pointed out, we must pay out millions of dollars to establish connections in the East. I appeal to my hon. friends opposite, I appeal to any man of business common sense, looking at the matter quite apart from any question of public or private ownership, what would a business man do if he had a system of transportation such as the Government of Canada has, which could never be made to pay under existing conditions, and in which not millions but hundreds of millions of dollars are invested? What I ask would a common sense business man do?

Mr. CANNON: Throw some more good money after bad.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend would be forced to do one of two things; he would be forced to endeavour to make it a good and complete transportation system in itself—that is one possibility—or he must be prepared to sacrifice the investment he has already made. I venture to think that a common sense business man, in his own interest, would choose to protect the investment he has by making the additions which would ensure a complete and successful system of transportation. That is what the Government is now proposing. While the merits of this proposal are not dependent on the question of public or private ownership, in so far as I am concerned and speaking for myself, I believe that a national system of transportation under efficient management can be made a success.

Mr. McCREA: Has it been made a success anywhere else?

Mr. ROWELL: It has been made a success I believe in many countries in Europe. It has not been tried in Great Britain or the United States except under the stress of war conditions when there can be no fair trial from the standpoint of earning dividends. My hon. friend knows that under war conditions the earning of dividends is not the primary consideration in operating these railways. The question during the war period was to get the largest amount of freight to its destination in the shortest space of time, no matter what the expense might be. Financial considerations or the earning of dividends did not enter into the problem. Therefore, the experience of Great Britain or the United States is not a test of public ownership under nomal conditions.

An hon. friend near me says "Give a case." I say that we have in the Hydro Electric of Ontario the case of a great public utility efficiently managed which has saved millions of dollars to the people of Ontario.

Mr. CANNON: What happened in London yesterday?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend may speak of London or any other place; the people of Ontario are behind a publicly-owned and operated hydro-electric system, and they would vote in favour of it if they had the opportunity just as decisively as they did on the question of prohibition yesterday. My hon. friend asked for an illustration and I have given one.

Mr. CANNON: Give us another one.

Mr. ROWELL: Until my hon. friend can dispose of the one I have already given I think that will do for him. There is no reason why such a system should not be efficiently managed if given business management. It cannot be managed efficiently and successfully if it is made part of a political machine, every hon. member of the House knows that. One of the reasons why public ownership has not been successful in the case of the Intercolonial is that because, as my hon. friend knows, for a long time political party considerations did determine the question of appointments in connection with that road. But my hon. friend knows, and the Government is pledged to the policy, that in so far as the operation of this great transportation system is concerned, political considerations will not interfere with appointments or promotions to any branch of the railway service.

Mr. CANNON: Will the minister give the House the promise that that pledge will be better respected than that which was given to the Ontario farmers in 1917 by himself?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend's question will give just about as much comfort to the opponents of public ownership as his speeches in the Dorchester by-election gave to the German people when they were published in the German press. Coming back to the question I was discussing—the question of the operation of this system under public ownership—it can be operated if it is operated as a business proposition.

My hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) says that you cannot take the operation of this railway out of political control. I hope my hon. friend does not mean all that may be drawn from such a statement. I hope he does not mean that it is necessary that political appointments should be made on the staff or among the employees of the government railways.

Mr. FIELDING: There is no limit to political control.

Mr. ROWELL: If my hon. friend means that, then I emphatically dissent from his view. I should hope it would be possible for the people of this country to put in power in Canada a Government that would have sufficient backbone and sufficient force to refuse—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Well, resign then.

Mr. ROWELL: When we think of the horrible thing that would follow if we did resign, it is enough to deter any Government from resigning.

Mr. McCREA: Resign or reform, one or the other.

Mr. ROWELL: I should hope, Mr. Speaker, it is possible for the people of Canada, and for the Government of this country, to put national interests before political and party considerations in the management of our great national railways.

Mr. FIELDING: I did not mention "party control." I used the expression "political control" on the part of the Canadian people through their representatives. I did not speak of party interests at all.

Mr. ROWELL: I put the question to my hon. friend and he said there were no limits to political control,

Mr. FEILDING: Surely.

Mr. ROWELL: Therefore, I inferred my hon. friend meant all that I said in my subsequent statement. I do not wish to carry my hon. friend one step further than he desires to go in that respect. I go back to my statement again, and I say it is a sad reflection upon the public men of Canada and upon the intelligence and patriotism of the Canadian people if they are not prepared to put a great system of railway transportation on such a basis that it can be managed solely from the standpoint of the public interest on a sound business basis and free entirely from party considerations and from political appointments.

Mr. CAHILL: Does the minister believe that the management of our railroads is in that position now?

Mr. ROWELL: I believe our national system of railways is in that position now. I know there has been no political interference with appointments since the Canadian National Railway system was turned over to the board of management. I know that so far as I am concerned I have never been consulted with reference to a single appointment, and I am quite satisfied that is equally true so far as my colleagues are concerned.

Mr. BUREAU: Does the minister include the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental railways in the Canadian National Railway system?

Mr. ROWELL: I include all those now managed by the board of directors that is managing our railroads.

Mr. BUREAU: That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. ROWELL: I believe they are all under one board of management.

Mr. BUREAU: Is the Transcontinental under the Canadian National Railway system?

Mr. ROWELL: The Transcontinental is, but the Grand Trunk Pacific is under the receiver.

Mr. BUREAU: I am talking about the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental; I did not mention the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. ROWELL: The Intercolonial and the Transcontinental are both under the board of management.

Mr. BUREAU: When was the Order in Council passed?

Mr. ROWELL: I cannot give my hon. friend the date, but he knows these railways have been under the management of that board for months. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that not only has there been no interference on the part of the Government, but I do not think the board of directors would permit any interference—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: That is too strong.

Mr. ROWELL: —because they have been appointed on the understanding that they are to manage that system solely from the standpoint of the public interest.

Mr. BUREAU: Some system!

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friends opposite cannot understand that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: The difficulty is, some men judge others by themselves.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friends cannot believe but that if they were in power they would be exercising this political and party control. Therefore, they cannot give others the credit for not exercising it. This Government has deliberately divested itself of patronage by the Civil Service Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend again is incredulous. My hon. friend knows he would not divest himself of patronage but would use it to the best of his ability. Therefore, he does not credit anything that is done by anybody else.

Mr. DUFF: It is a question of patronage.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Would the minister permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROWELL: Certainly.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Will he tell the House whether the railways are under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. ROWELL: No, they are not; they are under the direction of the board that manages them, and I say that any appointments or promotions in connection with that railway system are absolutely free from political interference, just as free as appointments or promotions under the Civil Service Commission are—both are absolutely free. One of the biggest things this Government, or any government in Canada, has ever done has been to divest itself of political patronage in the public interest in order that the public life may be freed from it and the public service thus benefited by it. Therefore, I say I believe this national system of railways can be managed in the public interest under public ownership in a way that will prove a success.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I wish to go a step further and to say that so far as I am concerned, I am prepared to have them a little less efficiently managed, than they would be managed by private owners, if such is necessary under public ownership and still belive in public ownership. If there is one thing that has bedevilled the public life of this country it has been the influence of railway corporations.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

An hon. MEMBER: Mackenzie & Mann.

Mr. ROWELL: I venture to think, Mr. Speaker, that Canada will be much better off, even if it costs her some millions to operate her railways, than to have the influence, political influence, of great railway corporations in its public life.

An hon. MEMBER: Where would my hon. friend be but for Mackenzie & Mann?

Mr. ROWELL: I would be here, but I am not quite sure where my hon. friend would be but for the same influence.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friends should not get uneasy. They do not like the truth, it seems to be worrying them quite a little.

Mr. CANNON: Not from you.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend does not like it from me. Well, he sometimes has to take the truth even from unpalatable sources. I am sure a little truth will do him good.

Mr. Speaker, not only do I believe the National railway system can be operated and made a success from the business standpoint, and that it is in the national interest to continue to do so, but I believe we will educate our people to the higher responsibilities of citizenship and to disinterested public service only as we trust them with these important responsibilities. The refusal to admit that a public utility can be operated fairly in the public interest is an absolute distrust of the people. It is a distrust of public men; it is virtually to say that they are not prepared to give honest and efficient administration to the country. I do not so under-rate my fellow-citizens. I believe the people of Canada are prepared to support public men of both parties in giving an honest business administration of business affairs and eliminating political considerations entirely from them.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Give them a chance to say; go to the people on that question.

Mr. ROWELL: Go to the people? If we went to the people my hon. friends would not have a look in in the province of Ontario on the question of public ownership.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If hon. gentlemen desire to interrupt the speaker they might do the House the courtesy of rising and submitting their questions.

Mr. ROWELL: Not only do these considerations which I have mentioned support the proposition of public ownership and justify the country in enlarging its railway holdings, but I share the view expressed by the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) with reference to the general principle of public ownership as applied to our railway system. Therefore I cordially support this proposition on that ground.

But coming back for a moment to the other aspect of the question, even if I did not believe in public ownership, even if I were opposed to public ownership, I would support this proposition on the plain business ground of national necessity. I support it on this ground, Mr. Speaker, for two reasons: First, as an operating proposition. The only way in which we can fairly carry out the obligations we have assumed is by adding this railway to our present system, thus making, in a measure, a complete transportation system, and thus be in a position to enter into competition on fair terms with the other great railway transportation system, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. My second reason is that even if my hon. friend's view be correct, that we cannot successfully operate a system of railways in the public interest by public ownership, if we wished ultimately to dispose of these railways we would have a vastly more valuable asset with the Grand Trunk added than if we endeavoured to dispose of them without such addition. Test it on any ground, Mr. Speaker, and the acquisition of the Grand Trunk is an advantage to the country. I know it is the view of some business men in the East who are opposed to this proposition that as an asset our national railway system is vastly more valuable with the Grand Trunk added than it is in its present severed condition. And that the additional value of the whole system will be vastly more than the amount we have to pay to acquire the Grand Trunk.

I wish to make that point clear, Mr. Speaker. The combined system is worth vastly more than the separate portions of the system added together, and we only get the real value by combining. It does not need any argument to establish that contention. The reason the Grand Trunk Pacific was built was to give an outlet to the West to the Grand Trunk system in the East. And if you have the Grand Trunk Pacific, with all the burdens and obligations incidental to it, without the Grand Trunk system in the East, you have the burden without the compensation—you have the liability without the asset to make it good. I can quite understand men opposed to public ownership, if they wish to see public ownership fail in Canada, would be bitterly hostile to the acquirement of this Grand Trunk road, because they know that without its acquirement public ownership is bound to result in a heavy financial loss to the country; but with this Grand Trunk railway acquired, with our national railway system in a measure complete, it may be possible to make public ownership of railways a success in this country. I know that many people do not want to see it a success; honestly and sincerely they are opposed to the principle. They believe that in the long run it would be a mistake. They say it leads to Socialism. We have heard that argument during this debate, that public ownership of railways is only leading on to other public ownership of all other kinds of business and to Socialism. Therefore they are opposed to the whole business and want to see it fail. I think I see the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pelletier) who referred to the danger of socialism approving. I see my hon. friend confesses that he is responsible for that statement. Some hon. members think public ownership is going to lead to these dire consequences, and therefore they would like to see it fail. For that reason they are opposed to our taking proper measures to make public ownership a success. Well, that is not the view of the people of Canada. They have got this great undertaking on their hands, they want to see it made a success, and they want the Government to take the necessary means to that end.

Now I come to another point. My hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) said that this bargain was not a good bargain in itself. Well, I am not going to add much to what I said the other evening in Committee, neither am I going to add to what the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) have said, except to point out that we have as the basis of this proposal the Drayton-Acworth report to which my hon. friend referred. Based on this report we proposed a cash payment of $2,500,000 for the first three or five years—I have forgotten which it was—a higher sum for the next few years, and then $3,600,000 for the balance of the term. These figures have been before the House and the country for months, I have come back to it again, because no hon. member has up to this time ever challenged those figures, has ever said that our offer was too high, has ever suggested that our proposition was unfair to the people of Canada. And hon. members must bear in mind that there is only one way of acquiring this road, and that is by negotiation. We cannot get it by expropriation for we cannot expropriate the lines in the United States, the Grand Trunk refused that offer but they are willing to arbitrate. Having regard to those facts, the question is have the Government negotiated a fair deal in this present agreement?

Mr. CAHILL: No.

Mr. ROWELL: Well, if my hon. friend wishes to know the view put forward by the Grand Trunk Company as to their rights and position, he can find it in the statements from time to time issued by them. They not only challenge the proposal, they said it was confiscation to endeavour to force them to agree to it. My hon. friend knows that our proposal means tens of millions of dollars less for the Grand Trunk, so far as their shareholders are concerned, in our actual outlay to acquire this stock, than we have already given to the Canadian Pacific railway and to the Canadian Northern railway by way of bonus and subsidy, speaking of the subsidies granted both by the Federal and Provincial Governments. My hon. friend will see all those subsidies set out in the Drayton-Acworth report, shewing the amount which the Canadian Pacific railway, the Canadian Northern railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific railway have received from the Federal Government. And I submit that in view of the position of this road, in view of its earnings, its possibilities, and its relation to our national railway system, it is well worth the offer which the Government has made for it. The people of Canada are getting a bargain on a fair and sound business basis and on reasonable business terms in the agreement which has been negotiated and is now before the House and covered by the Bill now introduced.

Then my hon. friend said that we had not the money wherewith to pay the purchase price, and he drew a touching picture of the condition of the soldier's wife and child. My hon. friend need not appeal to members on this side of the House to give attention to the soldier's wife and child. They have been giving that consideration and attention ever since this Government was formed. They are giving it to-day. A committee of this House is at present giving that consideration and that attention to the soldier and his dependents. And my hon. friend wholly misinterpreted and misquoted—not intentionally—the statement of the Prime Minister in connection with that matter. The Prime Minister's statement was that the country could not afford an additional cash gratuity such as had been asked, and therefore it could not be granted; but he never said and never suggested that the widow and orphans of the soldier in need of care and protection would not receive attention from this Government and from this country. A committee of the House, composed of members on both sides, on the motion of the Government—and I had the honour myself to make that motion—are now considering that whole problem with a view to making such recommendations as they may consider wise to meet the situation in so far as it is not at present adequately met. My hon. friend knows that the widow of the soldier and his orphan child will receive at the hands of this Government, will receive at the hands of this Parliament,—for I am sure members on both sides are desirous they should—all that is necessary for their care and protection.

But my hon. friend says that we have heavy liabilities. So we have. And he says that we should not spend a dollar that will not bring us a dollar or more in return. We should not spend a dollar that we do not need to spend. I concur in everything my hon. friend has said about the duty of economy. I agree that it is necessary. We have a heavy financial obligation; we have a great burden of debt; we have a serious annual charge to meet, which will be a burden upon us for years to come, and we can only meet it by economy on the part of the Government and by thrift and increased production on the part of the people. We must devote our energies to these tasks. But my hon friend wholly misapplied the argument he advanced in speaking of this proposition as it exists. I take the argument he advanced in favour of economy and conservation of the resources of the country, and I say that under existing conditions we must pay out millions of dollars every year to maintain the railways which we are responsible for maintaining without any adequate return. We are taking over the Grand Trunk, not to add to our liabilities, but to contribute to the relief of our liabilities, to reduce our interest charges, to put our transportation system on a basis where we can see daylight—and we cannot see daylight at the present time. It is because of the necessity of getting relief, because of the magnitude of the burdens we have to bear, that we should complete this undertaking in order to have a transportation system which can pay its own way when normal conditions are restored after the war, and which, as the country develops and as population increases, and the extent of the services it renders to the country increases from year to year, will cease to be a liability and will become an asset of the people of Canada. I believe that is possible if we go ahead with this contract and place the system under efficient management and operate it solely in the public interest.

My hon. friend has said this is not an opportune time, that an intimation was given the House that we expected to adjourn a week ago, and that therefore we should not take this matter up now. It is difficult for me to understand the point of view of my hon. friend. I frankly confess I cannot understand it at all. At the time that intimation was made, as has already been pointed out, it was not anticipated that this agreement would be concluded. But it is concluded. How will we be in a better position to deal with it in February next than we are to-day? My hon. friend has not given us a single suggestion on this point.

We have now all the data we will have next February, and all the information we need to reach a conclusion on the whole proposition. Then what is the object of delay? There can be only one object gained by delay, and that is to give those who are opposed to the country acquiring this road an opportunity to organize their opposition more effectively, and to defeat what we believe to be in the public interests, which require the Government to acquire the road.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I say that you had this all prepared before the end of the session and were simply holding it by strings. That was the protest of the Montreal Board of Trade.

Mr. ROWELL: I had the pleasure of being present when a deputation from Montreal Board of Trade waited upon the Government, and not a member of the deputation made any such suggestion or anything that bears any relation to it.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I can show you an item in the Citizen where they represented that you were all along prepared to bring down this measure.

Mr. ROWELL: All I have to say is that no deputation that waited on the Government suggested it, and if any man does suggest it he suggests that about which he has no knowledge and which is absolutely untrue.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: May I ask why the deputation from the Montreal Board of Trade was received in a dark room, with nobody there except the ministers and five or six of the delegates? Nobody knows what passed at the meeting.

Mr. ROWELL: All I can say to my hon. friend is this: It may be that the deputation from the Montreal Board of Trade made a very great mistake when they did not include my hon. friend in the deputation, and that it was an oversight on their part. We are not responsible for that; my hon. friend will have to settle that with the members of the Montreal Board of Trade. I am quite sure had they included my hon. friend in the deputation and had he heard the discussion that took place he would be less satisfied with his opposition to this Bill, and would be more tempted to back up the Government in support of it when he had heard the good reasons advanced why the Government should go on with this legislation.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Did the Government satisfy the delegation?

Mr. ROWELL: I do not think we did.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Like the farmers' delegation last year.

Mr. ROWELL: They frankly stated their hostility to public ownership under any conditions. There is no policy this Government could take consistent with serving the public interest at this critical time that would meet the views of the Montreal men opposed to public ownership. Therefore, although these are men for whom we have great respect and whose business judgment commands consideration; and although nearly all of them were supporters of the Government—

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. ROWELL:—the Government could not at the same time serve the public interest as they see it, and meet the views of their friends in Montreal. So the Government decided to support the public interest as they see it at this time.

I come back to the question, what is the object of delay? There can be no gain by delay except to permit the interests that are opposed to the consummation of this bargain to organize more effectively to defeat it, and if the Government believes that this bargain is in the public interest, as the Government does, it would be false to its duty if it did not ask the members of Parliament to stay here long enough to give this matter the fullest consideration and to pass their judgment upon it. The fact that we thought we might go home a week ago is no reason why we should not stay two weeks longer if necessary, in order to do this business properly, and I for one cannot see any force whatever in the suggestion that we should not deal with this matter now. We have all the time that is necessary, and it is our duty to consider, not the question when can we get home, but what do the public interests require at our hands? That is the motive which has inspired the Government in presenting the Bill to the House at this time. It is the motive that inspires the Government in pressing the House to a decision on the Bill. It is the motive that inspires the Government to ask the House to vote down this amendment, which we believe to be contrary to the public interests, prejudicial to the success of our national system of railways and in the interests of those who are opposed to the acquirement of this road. We ask the House to vote down the amendment by a most decisive majority, because we believe that the people of this country are back of the Government in their determination to complete this system of Government railways to make it a paying business proposition in the interests of the whole of Canada, thereby giving public ownership a real chance so far as a great railway transportation system is concerned, and at the same time giving the country a fair deal on this most important business proposition.

Mr. JEAN J. DENIS (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House on this very important subject, I am fully sensible of the many difficulties which it presents. I am fully sensible that no man with an ordinary experience of business transactions can go through the details of the Bill now under discussion, give it consideration and render a judgment which would be equitable to him as well as to his constituents and the country generally. I have tried to acquaint myself with the conditions under which this House and Parliament are now asked to pass this Bill. I have examined it with an open mind, away from all party considerations, and so far as I am able, away from all prejudice for or against public ownership. I think the discussion on this Bill has been drawn out of its path by the constant submitting of this question of public ownership to the House. We are not here to consider whether or not public ownership is desirable. We have the submission from members on the other side of the House that, whether public ownership be desirable or not, we have to acquire the Grand Trunk railway because its acquisition has become a necessity and we cannot possibly avoid it. Well, Mr. Speaker, if this deal has become a necessity, if we cannot avoid it, we need not in this discussion consider whether public ownership is really good or bad for the country. Therefore, in the course of the few remarks which I shall make, I do not intend committing myself or making a declaration either one way or the other on this subject. I take this position for two reasons. The first reason is that it is absolutely unnecessary now for any man in this House who supports the Government or any member on this side to declare whether or not public ownership is desirable, because that question is not submitted. The second reason is that I do not consider I am versed enough in economics to be able to make a declaration on the subject.

I have just heard the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) bring out a long argument in favour of public ownership. What I have just said is to a certain extent an answer to that argument. I would say this to him: Whether we are in favour of public ownership or not, whether we are or are not bound to buy the Grand Trunk, there is one point which no man in this House can avoid, and that is that we must consider this question seriously; we must go to the bottom of it, and we must avoid making a bad bargain. Whether or not we are in favour of public ownership, we shall not be justified in buying the Grand Trunk railway under conditions which would not be fair to the country but would be detrimental to its interests. I intend to bring before the House to-night this point, that if this contract that is now under discussion and that is comprised in this Bill is to be entered into with the Grand Trunk, we are making a bad bargain with that company, we are making a bargain that will cost the country many millions of dollars which we should not have to pay. And for that reason only I am against the Bill.

What I have just said invites explanations and proofs. In order to determine whether or not this transaction is a good one, we have to consider on the one hand what we are assuming or, in other words, the liabilities of the company—because we are assuming the liabilities, we are taking the place of the company—and on the other hand the assets of the company or what we receive for our money. I have examined the different classes of stocks and securities which are part of the liabilities of the company, and I have come to the conclusion that they are of four classes:

1. The stocks which the Government is buying. These stocks include:

Common stock	$116,583,124.44
First preference stock, 5 per cent	16,643,999.78
Second preference stock, 5 per cent	12,312,666.50
Third preference stock, 4 per cent	34,884,534.95
Total	$180,424,325.67

2. The securities on which the Government guarantees the interest. These are:

Four per cent guaranteed stock	$ 60,833,332.51
Debenture stocks, four in number	155,373,806.20
Total	$216,207,138.71

3. Funded debt other than the debenture stocks mentioned above. The debenture stocks which I have just mentioned form part of the funded debt, and this is the funded debt apart from the above mentioned debenture stock, $18,184,738.42.

4. Then there are the other direct liabilities to the amount of, $89,578,890.71. Grand total liabilities, $504,395,093.51.

In that oft-quoted document the Drayton-Acworth report I find, on page 36, that the Grand Trunk railway proper made unjustifiable charges to capital; and, further, that new capital expenditure of over $30,000,000 was reported to be immediately required at the time this report was submitted. I contend that the country is assuming the whole of the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. It has been said that we are buying only part of the stock; but as the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) said, the moment we become interested in the affairs of that company to the point of guaranteeing $216,000,000 of its capital and buying its stock, then we are bound to support the company to the end. We are therefore pledging the country to the extent of $504,000,000 in this transaction. It may be said, truly enough, that the award of the arbitrators will reduce the face value of the stock and that when this happens we shall not have to pay that full amount of $504,000,000. But we do not know anything about that, and it is only an assumption.

On the other hand, there are the assets of the company. What do they represent? The assets of any concern are worth only what they can bring to the owner, and actually these assets are bringing practically nothing. Consequently, after we own the road we shall have to pay the full interest on the liabilities and shall receive practically nothing from the assets, which means that we shall have a deficit of between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000 each year.

This road is to be acquired through the intrumentality of arbitrators, whose award will be final if it is unanimous. I have the strongest objection to this procedure. I do not see why this Parliament should surrender its prerogative and leave it to three men to decide the value of a concern which is estimated by those who own it to be over $500,000,000. I would suggest that the award of the arbitrators be submitted to Parliament. At this late hour, Mr. Speaker, and after the very admirable and interesting speech with which the House has been favored by my hon. leader, (Mr. McKenzie) I do not intend to take up any further time. I think, however, that the House should give this question its most careful consideration, to the end that the country may not be committed to an undertaking which will prove disastrous.

Mr. F. N. McCREA (Sherbrooke): I have not a great deal to say on this question, Mr. Speaker, and as the hour is late I may as well express my views now, for I shall not take up very much time. In the first place, so that there may be no misunderstanding as to where I stand in this matter, I desire to say that I am absolutely opposed to the principle of government ownership of railways or any other utility that can be better managed privately, and I shall give my reasons. I asked the President of the Privy Council if he could mention any country that had made a success of government ownership but he did not answer. He said that English-speaking nations probably could or would, or had done so. but I asked him to name any single nation that had made a success of government ownership and to this definite question I received no reply. Now, I am opposed to government ownership for the reason that other countries have tried it and in every instance it has proved a failure, and I cannot see that it could be other than a failure. I think that the President of the Council will admit that government ownership and management of railways under the political system is bound to be a failure. Patronage will creep in and render it impossible for a government-owned railway to be successful. How do hon. gentlemen opposite propose to manage a public utility of any kind? Imagine an aggregation of men subscribing a large amount of money for the development of any enterprise—be it a railway or any other concern—and, having completed the preliminaries, handing it over to a few private persons, saying: "This is your property, and you can do as you please with it. Take no notice of us; you are under no obligation to accept any advice we may offer. The people who put their money into it and own it will have absolutely nothing to say about its management: you are virtually the owners." Could any undertaking conducted under such circumstances be at all successful? The best way in which the Civil Service or any other business naturally within the purview of the Government can be conducted is undoubtedly by the direct control of the Government itself. But a railway is a different proposition and must be handled on business lines, and it is unthinkable that any combination of men subscribing a large amount of capital for any business would surrender all interest in its operation. I cannot conceive how a railway can be conducted successfully under public ownership. We represent the people and are supposed to know something about what the Government is interested in, whether in the matter of railways or anything else. The experience of every country that has tried government ownership has been decidedly that of failure and not success.

Taking these two things together, I maintain that it is unthinkable that the Government of Canada or of any other country can handle a railway proposition, give the service and give the attention to it that can be given by the men who actually own the railway. It cannot be carried on as successfully as the Canadian Pacific and other well managed corporations are. The people who have their money in it are the people who direct it and carry on its management. It must be done in that way if it is to be successful and it cannot be done in any other way.

There are a good many reasons put forth why this road should be taken over. We are told that one is that some years ago, when the Grand Trunk Pacific was organized and became one of the lines of transportation, the Grand Trunk Railway Company entered into an agreement to take over and operate the road. They became financially responsible for some $125,000,000, and it is said now that the Grand Trunk, who guaranteed this loan, are not in a position to respect and take care of that guarantee. Therefore, that is advanced as a reason why we should take over the Grand Trunk. Yet, in taking over the Grand Trunk as proposed now, what are we going to get? What assistance are we going to get to pay the principal or interest of the road that has been guaranteed by the Grand Trunk? If I understand this agreement properly, and I think I do, we are proposing to assume a very heavy obligation. According to the Montreal Star of last Thursday, the interest at 4 per cent on the first mortgage bonds which the Government undertake to guarantee will amount to a little over $6,000,000 a year. On the second mortgage bonds the interest will be $2,500,000, while the third set of bonds or securities are supposed to be arbitrated upon, and that is as yet an unknown quantity. The arbitrators will fix the value of the third class security, but putting them all together, the first mortgage bonds at 4 per cent and the second mortgage bonds at 4 per cent, the total which the Government will have to pay will be $8,500,000, which, with the other obligation that will rest upon the sholders of the Government, will make an amount of $10,000,000. That is more than the Grand Trunk has been able to earn. In what way are we going to get any reimbursement of the loan or guarantee made by the Grand Trunk to the Grand Trunk Pacific? I cannot see any advantage in the proposition.

We have heard from both sides of the House that the Grand Trunk proper was in a deplorable condition, that the chairman of the Grand Trunk was appealing to the Government to take care of and protect his shareholders. As I understand it, the first duty of this Government is to protect the taxpayers of Canada; their sympathies should go out to the taxpayers of this country. If the Grand Trunk have operated this road for sixty years under the best management they could put forth, if they have not been able to make any dividends or revenue for their stockholders, if they now come to the Government of Canada and say: "Come to our rescue; take care of our stockholders," if they have been crying for mercy, if they have been saying that they have been receiving no remuneration or revenue in the way of dividends or interest on their stock in this road, I think that is one of the greatest reasons that could be put forth why this Government should be careful. If the stock is worth nothing and brings no revenue to the people who own it, why do we want it? We have trouble and obligations enough on our hands without undertaking to carry the burdens of the stockholders of the Grand Trunk.

It is said that the Grand Trunk put up the argument that they were misled when they were induced to go into the construction and operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I think this House and the people of the country are aware that Mr. C. M. Hays, who was the manager of the Grand Trunk at that time, was one of the ablest men on the continent, and if he made a bad bargain for his people is that a reason why the taxpayers of this country should be called upon to relieve them of that burden? Not in my judgment. If the Grand Trunk as it now exists is not able to meet its obligations and pay dividends to its stockholders, why should Canada take it over and why should we pledge the credit of Canada to pay that interest whether the road earns it or not?

One of the arguments put forth is the same as the argument which was put forth in connection with the Canadian Northern when it was a question of taking over that road. It was said that it ought to be done, and done quickly, because if it were not done and done quickly the apple would fall into the mouth of the Canadian Pacific. The Canadian Pacific were standing ready, we were told in this House, to take it over. I want to tell the House that the Canadian Pacific never had any intention of taking over the Canadian Northern or the Grand Trunk under any such conditions as we are taking over the latter road now. It may be true that the Canadian Pacific had entered into some negotiations, but you will find that the proposition about negotiations came from the seller, not from the buyer, the reason being that they wanted to get a bugaboo to bring before the House and to make the House believe that the Canadian Pacific wanted to get these roads. I can tell the House that the Canadian Pacific never wanted to buy the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Northern for any such money as this country is paying or proposes to pay.

But, suppose that either one or both should fall into the hands of the Canadian Pacific! The hon. the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) told us, speaking on this question from his place in the House last week, that the Canadian Pacific was one of the best managed institutions on this continent, that it was one of the best manned and operated roads, and that it gave a good service. Would it have been a calamity if the Canadian Northern had fallen, or if the Grand Trunk should fall, into its hands? You have the record of the Canadian Pacific as one of the best-managed institutions on this continent. If it had become the owner of either one or both of these roads and had given us the service that it is giving to the country to-day would any harm have come to the country? Suppose this road falls into the hands of the Government which has not the record of the Canadian Pacific as one of the best managed institutions on the continent? I am not throwing any stones at this Government, but I say that no matter what party is in power it is impossible for the Government to operate and handle the affairs of a railway as economically or as wisely as they can be operated and handled by any well managed railway company.

Now that is the difference. They tell us: "Oh, that would be a monopoly; one corporation controlling the whole railway system of this country would be ruinous." It might have been in years gone by, but now we have a Board of Railway Commissioners whose duty it is to see that no injustice is done to any person and that we get a proper service. How are we to get that proper service, or that cheap service, if we have two transcontinentals doing the same business? The more freight and the more business there is on a railway, or any other institution, the cheaper it can operate—the less its overhead charges, and its charges for maintenance of road-bed and everything else. Hon. gentlemen opposite told us that the Grand Trunk was in an excellent condition. I want to state that whatever the rest of their equipment may be the Grand Trunk have put in less than fifty per cent of the ties they should have put in—ties that they wanted to put in and did not have. Not having put those ties in, the road is consequently in that much poorer state, and I think that practically every part of the whole system is about in the same condition.

As I said, I am opposed to government ownership first, last and all the time; not from mere theoretical considerations, I am guided by the experience that all other countries had. I am opposed to arbitration because of our own experience in that regard in the past. We had an experience of arbitration with respect to the value of the Canadian Northern Railway stock. The report of the commission which examined into the railway situation pronounced the Canadian Northern stock to be absolutely of no value; it had never contributed a dollar to the construction of that railway. Not only that, but the same report says that the Canadian Northern had received from this country in the way of assistance from all sources more money than the road was worth. That means that the money granted by the people of this country was not put into the construction of the Canadian Northern. And in the face of that, and regardless of the fact that the owners and operators of the Canadian Northern had received more assistance from the people of Canada than they had ever put into the road, the arbitrators agreed upon $10,800,000 as being the value of the stock. With that experience in arbitration I do not want any more of it. But this Government evidently do not profit by the experience of the past, they do not see the handwriting on the wall. I was in hopes that they had seen that handwriting as denoted by yesterday's elections in Ontario, and that they would take a little notice of what was happening and begin to reflect whether they represented the people of Canada or not. I do not believe this Government have the confidence of the Canadian people either in railway matters or in anything else. It would be well, therefore, for them to move slowly until they have found out whom they represent. "Cox can't wait," I believe, at all events somebody can't wait.

Now we are told the Grand Trunk are not asking for any mercy. I notice they are asking to be relieved of their obligations with respect to the guarantee which they gave in the matter of the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific; but they are not asking this country to take over the Grand Trunk proper. What are we getting out of this transaction? Are we getting anything towards the reduction of the guarantees given to the Grand Trunk Pacific? As I understand it, not a dollar. The Grand Trunk are getting, or are going to get, from the taxpayers of this country actually more money than their own operations show the road has been capable of earning for the last ten years. Where, or in what respect, are the people of this country being helped out in regard to the guarantees that the Grand Trunk entered into on account of the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific? If we were going to be relieved of part of those guarantees then there might be some reason for this bargain. But, as I understand it, we are not.

[Mr. McCrea.]

We know that the earnings of the road will not amount to the sum that we are binding ourselves to pay. If the earnings do not reach that sum the taxpayers of this country will be called upon to make good the deficiency.

Mr. J. D. REID: Might I inform the hon. gentleman that the statements contained in the blue-book presented to the House do not show that at all. They show that the Grand Trunk has earned, since it was incorporated, interest on its debenture stock and on its guaranteed stock. It is true that it is not shown that during the lst two years of the war the Grand Trunk Company have paid any dividend. That does not say they did not earn dividends. I want to say to the hon. member, interest was earned on the guaranteed stock although it was not paid.

Mr. JACOBS: Not in the 90's.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: Excuse me.

Mr. J. D. REID: I say that the blue-book to which I have referred shows that in the years right along they did pay the interests.

McCREA: Will the minister tell me why it is the last proposition of the Government to pay about $10,000,000 when the Grand Trunk Company, through their chairman, Sir Alfred Smithers, offered to accept about $5,000,000 a year as the yearly rental of the road on a 999 year lease?

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. gentleman asks me, as I understand him, to explain why we propose to pay $10,000,000 when the chairman of the Grand Trunk, Sir Alfred Smithers, asks only $5,000,000. No such proposition has ever been submitted to this House. What was submitted is this: We offered to pay a total of $3,600,000 and Sir Alfred Smithers offered to accept $5,100,000 in round figures. We refused to agree to his proposition and now the matter is going to arbitration. Sir Alfred Smithers would not accept $3,600,000, and we would not give $5,100,000. There has been no mention of any such sum as $10,000,000 at all in the whole discussion.

Mr. McCREA: The Montreal Star, which supports the Government, and is generally right behind it—at all events it was in the last election—in its issue of last Thursday stated the first mortgage bonds would cost this country $6,000,000 and a little over; that the second mortgage bonds would cost

$2,500,000; and that the third mortgage bonds would be the subject of arbitration. The Montreal Star estimated the total cost would be over $10,000,000 a year.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is right.

Mr. McCREA: We have got to go to the press for information because hon. gentlemen on this side spent almost an entire evening last week trying to ascertain from the Government what the estimated cost of this transaction would be, and could not get any answer. And where are we going to get information if we do not get it from the Government?

Mr. J. D. REID: In the letter contained in this blue-book; that gives the offer in detail.

Mr. McCREA: It is the fact that last week two or three hon. members on this side, and I was one of them, tried to get from the Government what the award would be, what the yearly cost in the shape of interest, rental, or whatever you like to call it, would be, but we could not get that information. So I am taking my information from the Government organ, the Montreal Star, which they pin their faith to very strongly,—at election times, anyway.

Mr. JACOBS: The Government organ is a broken reed just now.

Mr. J. D. REID: No; it is stronger than ever.

Mr. McCREA: The Grand Trunk Company, as I understand it, and I think I am right, have not asked the Government to take over the Grand Trunk railway proper. They are simply asking to be relieved of the obligations which they entered into in connection with the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and they argue that that contract was violated by the Government, and, consequently, they are not responsible, anyway. As I see it, we are not going to get anything out of that guaranteed stock. We are taking over the Grand Trunk and paying all it can earn, whether it earns it or not; and therefore I believe it will be wise on the part of the Government to go slow.

Mr. CANNON: They cannot.

Mr. McCREA: Some hon. members have been advocating that we should leave this matter over until next session. My way of dealing with it would be to give it a six or twelve months' hoist. I have had some business experience, and my judgment leads me to the belief that it is not possible for a Government, no matter whether it be Conservative, Union or Liberal, to operate a railway successfully, for the reasons I have already given, namely, that if you leave the railway in the hands of the Government under the old system of patronage it cannot be successfully operated; and it is impossible to put it in the hands of a committee and say to them: You have carte blanche to do what you like. They must be responsible to some one, and who is that some one going to be? It must be the representatives of the people, the House of Commons, and there you cannot avoid politics.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON: I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and the debate adjourned.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty the House adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Wednesday, October 22, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

SOLDIERS' CIVIL RE-ESTABLISHMENT.

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization) presented the third report of the special committee on Bill No. 10, an Act to amend the Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment Act, as follows:

Your committee, in accordance with a resolution adopted at their morning session, on Tuesday, 21st of October, recommend that 3,000 extra copies in English, and 1,000 copies in French, of their final report, be printed for distribution, and that Rule 74 relating thereto be suspended.

On the motion that the report be concurred in:

Mr. CALDER: Mr. Speaker, in connection with this motion I think I should state that the committee working on this Bill had previously arranged for the printing of some 300 copies of our proceedings from day to day. That, of course, will cover our report, but undoubtedly there will be a fairly large demand for copies of this report just as soon as it is ready for distribution and for this reason the committee thought it advisable to ask the House for authority, when the report is being printed, to have 3,000 copies printed in English and French for distribution. That number will undoubtedly be necessary.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion can only be entertained by leave of the House.

Mr. McKENZIE: Might I ask the minister when he will be able to present his final report on this inquiry?

Mr. CALDER: It is somewhat difficult to state exactly when we will have finished our work. The committee has been meeting three times a day almost since it was appointed. Personally, I am inclined to the view that within the course of, say, a few days we will have completed our work. There would then be some work in connection with getting our report into final shape, but towards the end of this week I think our work will be completed.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of Census of Industry for 1917, part iv, section 3—Sir George Foster.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

DOMINION AND RAILWAY FINANCES.

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. What was the gross indebtedness of Canada on the 1st day of April, A.D., 1919?
2. What was the gross indetedness of Canada on the 1st day of April, A.D., 1914?
3. What was the total expenditure of the Canadian Government for the fiscal year ending April 1, 1911?
4. What was the total expenditure of the Canadian Government for the fiscal year ending April 1, 1914?
5. What were the total revenues of Canada for each financial year from and including, A.D. 1896, to and including A.D. 1919, and the total expenditure in said financial years?
6. What was the total gross indetedness of Canada on the 1st day of September, A.D. 1919?
7. When was the Canadian Northern Railway system taken over by the Government?
8. What was the total indebtedness of the said system at said date?
9. What was the total income or earnings of the said system during the last business year of its operations?
10. What were the expenditures of all kinds in connection with the said system during the last business year of its operations?
11. What was the total sum expended on Government owned or controlled railways during the last railway business year?
12. What was the total income or earnings from said roads during the last railway business year, giving the earnings and expenditure of each system separately?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. $2,676,635,724.77 (1919).
2. $544,391,368.86.
3. $122,861,250.46.
4. $186,241,047.63.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY BRIDGES.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Is the Government aware that the two bridges of the C.N.R. railway which unite Montreal to Charlemagne are very dangerous and that every day automobiles and vehicles are breaking through the pavement?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to repair the said pavement as soon as possible?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. The roadways of these bridges have been inspected and temporary repairs made, and sufficient material has been ordered to redeck bridges mentioned.

2. Answered by No. 1.

BAMFIELD LIFE SAVING STATION.

Mr. STEVENS:

Having reference to an answer to a question by the Minister of Marine given on the 18th September last, and appearing on page 442 of the Hansard and reading as follows:—

"It is not the intention of the Government to close the Bamfield Life-Saving Station."

1. Is the Government aware that the said Life-Saving Station has been closed?

2. If so, when were instructions issued to this effect and on whose authority?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN (for Hon. Mr. Ballantyne):

1 and 2. The operation of this station was temporarily suspended on August 15, 1919.

Applications have been invited to fill the positions of crew at the station with a view to put it in operation for the coming winter.

EXPORT OF NICKEL DURING WAR.

Mr. PEDLOW:

1. What is the date of the commission appointing G. A. Bell to investigate the export of nickel during the war?

2. What was the occupation of Mr. G. A. Bell at the time of his appointment?

3. In what department was this man employed at the time of his appointment?

4. Under what department was the supervision of the export of nickel at the time this investigation was ordered?

5. When did Mr. Bell make his report?

6. To whom did he report and in what form?

7. How much did this investigation cost the Government on account of (a) salary to Mr. Bell as Commissioner, and (b) other expenses?

Hon. Mr. REID:

POST OFFICE AT POINTE A PIC.

* Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has the Government received a petition from the inhabitants of Pointe à Pic, near Murray Bay, in the county of Charlevoix, demanding the erection of a post office building at that place?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to grant this request?

3. If so, when?

4. If not, why?

Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. Not at present.

4. Parliament has not made any provision.

WHARF AT STE. ANNE DE BEAUPRE.

* Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is the Government aware of the fact that a contract was given to one Poliquin of Portneuf, Que., to build a wharf at Ste. Anne de Beaupré, in the county of Montmorency, in the month of July last, 1919?

2. If so, is the Government aware of the fact that the work to be done under this contract has not yet been started?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to see that this work is carried on immediately?

4. If so, when?

5. If not, why?

Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. Yes.

2. No work done, contractor is procuring materials.

3, 4 and 5. The contract with Mr. Poliquin provides that the work will be fully and satisfactorily completed on or before March 6, 1920; instructions have been issued to the district engineer to have the work expedited.

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY.

* Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has the Government bought the Quebec and Saguenay railway?

2. If so, what price was paid for same? When was it paid and to whom?

3. Has the Canadian National railways taken possession of the road?

4. If so, on what date?

5. If not, when is the Canadian National railways to take possession or charge of same?

6. Who is in charge of the road now?

7. By whom is it operated?

9. If not, why?

10. When is it expected to be completed?

11. Is it the intention of the Government to continue the line of the Quebec and Saguenay railway as far north as Ha Ha Bay?

12. If so, when? If not, why?

13. Is it the intention of the Government to build a branch line from the main line of said railway at Baie St. Paul to St. Urbain?

14. If so, when? If not, why?

15. Have all the claims of right of way, ballast, pit, etc., been settled?

16. If not, why?

17. Does the Government intend to settle the, and when?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Yes.

2. (a) $3,489,313.53. (b) First instalment $697,862.70 on February 27, 1919. Second instalment $2,791,450.83 on April 12, 1919.

3. On September 24 an Order in Council was passed placing the Quebec and Saguenay railway under the jurisdiction of the board of directors of the Canadian National railways for the operation of same.

4 and 5. Answered by No. 3.

6. The road has been completed under the supervision of Mr. Gordon Grant, C.E., of the Department of Railways and Canals, and who is now engaged in transferring it to the Canadian National Railways Board.

7. The line has heretofore been operated by the contractors, Messrs. Hugh Doheny & Co.

8. The road is completed for operation, with the exception of some minor items, such as telegraph instruments, train order boards, road crossing signs, etc., etc.

9 and 10. Answered by No. 8.

11. No decision arrived at.

12. Answered by No. 11.

13. No.

14. Answered by No. 13.

15. No, all claims for right of way, etc., are not settled, as in some cases the amount demanded by the land owners is considered exorbitant, and they may have to be referred to the Exchequer Court.

16 and 17. Answered by No. 15.

I see that question No. 2 asks:

If so, what price was paid for same? When was it paid and to whom?

The answer gives a price but it does not say to whom it was paid. The answer was just handed to me before I came in. If the hon. gentleman wishes that information he can put that question on the Order Paper, or I will hand the answer to him privately.

FINANCES OF CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. What were, up to the 31st of August, 1919, the total receipts from all sources whatever, of the Canadian Northern system since it has been operated by the Government or the company acting for the Government?

2. What were the total disbursements during the same period for operating, purchase of equipment, betterments, maintenance, obsolescence, capital, coupons, notes, and for all other items?

3. Was there a surplus or deficit?

4. What was the amount in either case?

5. What is the estimated surplus or deficit for the current year?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Gross earnings, October 1, 1917 to August 31, 1919, $93,502,669.27. Proceeds of notes sold to public, $52,871,608. Advances from Dominion Government for repayment of notes and loans, construction, betterments and new equipment, also interest on securities, $71,606,463.58.

4. No land subsidy has been given to the Grand Trunk Pacific railway.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

What were the incomes of the different regiments' canteens: (a) in England; (b) in France?

2. Was there any money left over from that income?

3. If so, will that money be returned to different regiments?

On the motion of Sir George Foster (Acting Prime Minister) the House took up the consideration of Public Bills and Orders.

ADULTERATION ACT AMENDMENT (BRAN AND SHORTS).

On the Order, House in committee on Bill No. 7, to amend the Adulteration Act (respecting bran and shorts or middlings):

Mr. Sutherland moved that the Order be discharged and the Bill referred to the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): May I ask the hon. member who is in charge of this Bill if it is his intention to drop it altogether?

Mr. D. SUTHERLAND (Oxford South): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question submitted by the leader of the Opposition, there is nothing further from my intention than to drop this Bill, for I think it is a matter of extreme urgency and should be dealt with this session. I am particularly glad that a measure of this importance should be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, because an opportunity will thus be afforded all parties to appear and state their case. I have no doubt of a favourable result.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Sir George Foster, the House returned to the Orders of the Day.

NEW PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. F. KAY (Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I would ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Sifton) if he can give the House any information as to the progress being made with the new Parliament buildings; can he hold out any hope of our getting into them for next session.

Hon. A. L. SIFTON (Minister of Public Works): I can hold out a wonderful amount of hope, Mr. Speaker, but I can give no promises.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL AND INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAYS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers): May I ask the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) if it will be possible for him to telephone or send a messenger to the Clerk of the Privy Council for a copy of the Order in Council bringing the National Transcontinental and the Intercolonial Railways under the provisions of the Canadian National Railway Act?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to accommodate my hon. friend, and I will endeavour to get a copy of the Order in Council here as soon as possible.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT, 1918 — AMENDMENT.

COMPENSATION TO POSTMASTERS.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN moved the second reading of Bill No. 31, to amend the Civil Service Act, 1918, with respect to the salaries of certain postmasters and assistant postmasters.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Before this motion is put, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister if he can give me certain information as to the postmasters who will be affected by this Bill, giving their offices and salaries.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot properly submit a question as to the details of the Bill until it is in committee. Under the rules only the principle of the Bill can be debated on the motion for second reading.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this Bill for the reason that I think it is very unfair to the postmasters and assistant postmasters who will be affected by it. As I understand it, only nine such officials will be affected, namely, the assistant postmaster at Vancouver and the postmaster and assistant postmaster at New Westminster, Victoria, Moosejaw and Edmonton. I believe that the effect of this Bill will be to continue in force an Order in Council which should never have been passed.

Mr. GAUVREAU: There are lots like that.

Mr. McQUARRIE: As I understand it, the result of the Order in Council was to reduce the salaries of the postmasters affected to a figure below that which was paid to them prior to the commencement of the war; and, further, that it had the effect of making these postmasters and assistant postmasters refund moneys which had actually been paid to them extending over a period of some two and a half years. I have certain correspondence which sets out the facts more concisely than I could state them, and, with the permission of the House, I intend to read certain of that correspondence. The first letter is dated September 21, 1918, from the Deputy Postmaster General to the Hon. Martin Burrell, Secretary of State:

With further reference to the salaries of postmasters and assistants in certain city offices and especially those at New Westminster and Vancouver, who had been called upon to refund amounts overpaid them during the period of 2⅓ years from 1st April, 1914, I beg to say that there appears a misapprehension among these officers and others concerned in the matter in regard to the connection of the War Tax with a reduction in their salaries which called for the refund.

I may explain that the postmasters and assistant postmasters of city offices are paid according to a scale provided in Schedule "B" of the Civil Service Act which fixes the amount to be paid on certain revenues as follows,—

With postage collections of from $40,000 to $60,000—Postmasters $2,200; assistant postmasters $1,600.

On postage collections from $500,000 to $800,000—Assistant Postmasters $2,600.

It is only necessary to give these items out of the schedule in dealing with the salaries of the postmasters at New Westminster and Vancouver so that I need not trouble you with quoting all the rest of the figures that belong to the schedule.

For the fiscal year ended 31st March, 1914, the revenue of New Westminster was $43,985, which, according to the scale above quoted, allowed the postmaster $2,200 and the assistant $1,600 and they were paid at that rate. During the year ended 31st March, 1915, however, there was a falling off in the revenue to $37,419 on which the postmaster and assistant were entitled to only $2,000 and $1,400 a year, respectively.

In the case of Vancouver, the revenue fell from $530,632 during the year ended 31st March, 1914, to $452,211 during the year ending 31st March, 1915, with a consequent reduction in the amount the assistant postmaster was entitled to, from $2,600 to $2,400.

The War Tax on letters and post cards was not put into force until the 8th April, 1915, so that it will be observed that the sale of War Tax stamps did not, in any way, affect the revenue for the year ended 31st March, 1915, during which the falling off in revenue referred to occurred. The revenue collected during these years was all derived from legitimate post office business, and showed that the business at these offices had fallen off to a considerable extent, and the same may be said of all other offices in Western Canada.

There is no doubt whatever that post office business has not regained its former magnitude, but is still far below what it was in 1914. The revenue for the year ended 31st March, 1915, could not be obtained until July of that year, and it was then found that the falling off of the revenue for the year ended 31st March, 1915, would necessitate a reduction in the salaries of some of the postmasters and assistant postmasters, for the previous year, that is, commencing on the 1st April, 1914. A report to Council was at once prepared for the Postmaster General's signature, recommending that the said reductions be made at once, and if there had been no delay, the officers concerned would only have been called upon to refund over-payments for one year and one-third. There was delay, however, as the then Postmaster General, the late Hon. T. C. Casgrain was reluctant to sign the said recommendation and it was only in October 1916 when he finally concluded that it was not a question of choice, but of statute, that he decided to sign the report to council. If, therefore, the postmasters in these offices are not asked to refund, it would not only be a contravention of the statute, but an injustice to all other postmasters who were compelled to make the refund. Moreover, in view of this being statutory, there is no way the department can relieve them except by repealing the statute. If the revenue had increased, we would be compelled by statute to give them an increase, and no power could prevent its being given to them. The question of right, therefore, works both ways and the department is compelled to enforce the statute impartially. In consequence of this delay, the salaries of the said officers were not reduced to the amount which the revenue of their respective offices, for the year ended 31st March, 1915, entitled them to, until the 1st October, 1916, and the over-payment in each case amounted to $500, that is, at the rate of $200 for 2½ years. I wish to emphasize here the fact that the falling off in revenue and subsequent reduction in salaries was in no way effected by the war tax stamps, which were not being sold during the year in which the falling off occurred. The question of excluding the war tax from the revenue begins with the year 1915-16 as it was in April, 1915, that the war tax was imposed. When the revenue for the year ended 31st March, 1916, was made up it was found as it was naturally expected, that, on account of the sale of war tax stamps it had increased enormously. In the case of New Westminster and Vancouver the gross revenues went up to $48,227 and $565,746, respectively. These figures would restore the salaries of the postmaster and assistants to the amount they were receiving in 1914 if the war tax stamps were to be counted as part of the postal revenue. In view of the fact, however, that the Government was taking this means of raising money to carry on the war it was claimed that it would not be fair to the people to impose a tax and then give a percentage to postmasters for simply selling the stamps. This view was expressed to the department both by members and Conservative Associations and as it was obvious that the imposition of the war tax would not entail any additional work in the handling of mail matter it being just as easy to handle a letter with a 3-cent stamp as one with a 2-cent stamp, the department decided that the salaries of the postmasters would continue to be based on the legitimate postal revenue only. The late Mr. Casgrain, who was then Postmaster General, issued instructions that postmasters and assistant postmasters of city offices were not to be allowed salaries on the revenue derived from the sale of these war tax stamps and from statistics in the department it was calculated that 28% of the total revenue was derived from the sale of war tax stamps.

The postmasters and assistants had expected to be paid from the gross revenue including war tax stamps sales and it was claimed by them that the department had no legal right to do otherwise. In view of this contention the question of legality was submitted to the Hon. Mr. Doherty in October, 1917, who was then acting Postmaster General for his decision and he referred the matter on to the Department of Justice. The reply of Mr. Newcombe dealing with the question as to whether postmasters are entitled to have their collections from war stamps computed for the purpose of ascertaining their salaries, is as follows:

"I observe that your department has proceeded upon the view that this is not permissible, and possibly that view may be sustained, but I am very doubtful about it upon the construction of the statute. It certainly seems to be a very selfish and unpatriotic procedure on the part of the city postmasters to insist upon taking a share of this special revenue which is raised not for post office purposes, but in order to defray the expenses of the war; and therefore I suggest that instead of leaving the question to legal opinion you should procure an Order in Council under the War Measures Act declaratory of the intention of the Act of 1915 to exclude the claim of the city postmasters."

On receipt of this advice the Deputy Minister of Justice was asked to draw up a recommendation of Council along the lines he suggested and the recommendation as drawn up by him was submitted to council and passed on 8th January, 1918. The order stated "that the Postmaster General considered that it would be incompatible with the spirit intent and purpose of the Special War Revenue Act to permit the diversion of any portion of the special revenue derived from the sale of war tax stamps to any object other than the special one for which such revenue was authorized, viz.: to defray the extraordinary expenses which are incident to Canada's undertakings in connection with the war, and the above recommendation is made in order to remove and to set at rest any doubt upon this subject which might arise upon construction of the statutes."

The question was only submitted to the Acting Postmaster General because of the contention of the officials concerned that the department could not legally withhold from them the percentage based on the revenue derived from the war tax and as the declared policy of the Government was made by the Hon. Mr. Casgrain, Postmaster General, following discussion in the House and representations made by Parliament that none of this money so raised should go into the pockets of postmasters throughout the country, it was decided to refer it to the Acting Postmaster General for a definite decision as to what should be done. It was referred by him to the Deputy Minister of Justice who stated that in order that it might be legal it would be necessary that an Order in Council should be passed under the War Measures Act. It was, therefore, to ascertain whether we could legally do what we had been doing upon the instruction of the Postmaster General rather than to prevent any portion of the money, so far as the officials were concerned, from going to the postmasters, that induced the reference.

I think the above will explain my position and the position of the department in the matter and the Order in Council referred to leaves no doubt as to the policy of the Government in connection with the claim of the postmasters for a percentage of the war tax in fixing their salaries.

I have already, in correspondence with the department, taken exception to the statement of the Deputy Minister of Justice that these postmasters and assistant postmasters were unpatriotic and selfish in endeavouring to get a portion of the revenue derived from this tax. What they were really doing was trying to get from the department the same salary that they had been receiving prior to the war.

We all know that owing to the increase in the cost of living it has been the policy of the Government since the war to increase the salaries of employees in the Civil Service. It seems to me that these men were not asking anything out of the way when they requested, not that their salaries be increased, but that their salaries be allowed to remain the same as they were prior to the war. The Deputy Minister of Justice himself did not attempt to contribute any part of his salary to the purpose of carrying on the war. As I understand it, he received a present of some $10,000 from the Government, and also a very substantial increase in his salary. Had he been desirous of carrying out the principles of patriotism and unselfishness he would have contributed some of his own salary towards carrying on the war, instead of trying to reduce the salaries of postmasters who were receiving $2,200 and assistant postmasters who were receiving only $1,600 a year.

As a matter of fact, although the Order in Council was passed on the principle that none of the money collected from the sale of war tax stamps should go to anything but for the purpose of carrying on the war, the only ones affected by this Order were the postmasters and assistant postmasters whom I mentioned, and the tax did not go to the Government free from any commissions, because the postmasters throughout the country, that is, country postmasters, city sub-postmasters, stamp vendors in the city offices and everybody else who handled these postage stamps were allowed their regular commissions in connection with them. I cannot speak positively as to other offices, but I know that in the case of New Westminster the effect of this Order in Council was to cut down the salary of the postmaster to less than the amounts which were received by two of the clerks in his office. The salary which was allowed to him under the Order in Council was $2,000, less a repayment of $300, retirement fund payment of $100, and Canadian Patriotic Fund payment of $50, leaving him a net salary of $1,550 a year as compared with the salary of $2,200 which he was receiving before the war. In this office, J. S. Cameron, a 2-A clerk, received after deductions were provided for, a salary of $1,750 a year, and W. H. Bracher also a 2-A clerk, received $1,627 a year. As a matter of fact, the postmaster received very little more than the letter carriers, although he had charge of some forty-five or forty-seven men. That Order in Council was wrong; it should never have been passed. It has been objected to by every member of Parliament in whose constituency any of these officers happen to be and it should not be continued. Instead, this legislation which is now before the House should provide for a return to these postmasters of amounts which were illegally taken away from them. They were illegally taken away from them, or otherwise there would have been no necessity for the Order in Council. I am certainly opposed to this kind of thing being continued. I might mention that during last session provision was made for returning one year's deductions to the postmasters, and it seems to me, where the department admitted the principle that a return of one year's deductions was justified, there is absolutely no reason in the world why the Government should not have put through an order for the return of the whole amount, namely, the deductions for two and-a-half years. The postmasters who have been affected by this Order in Council have been unfairly treated, and it is not right and proper for this House, after it has been seized of the facts, to continue in force an unfair Order in Council such as that. I apologize for having taken up so much time, but I feel that I owe it to these men to lay their cases before the House. As a matter of fact, all the members for British Columbia, although they are not all present, would back up everything that I say here to-day. I am not speaking only for myself; they have all written letters to the department, and they are just as much opposed to this Order in Council and its continuance as I am.

Mr. GAUVREAU: The hon. member ought to be opposed to the other Orders in Council also.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: Mr. Speaker

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member exercises his right to reply the debate will be closed. Therefore, if any hon. member desires to speak he should do so now.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have just a few words to say in explanation of the Bill. Hon. gentlemen will remember that in the early days of the war a war stamp tax was levied for the purpose of adding to the revenues of the country. Letters then requiring a two-cent stamp were in future required to bear a three-cent stamp, and many articles were required to bear a stamp of one cent for the purpose of adding to the revenues of the country, particularly for war purposes, and these taxes were specially designated as war taxes. Later on, under the War Measures Act, an Order in Council was passed declaring that postmasters who were paid a salary on the basis of revenue should not, in calculating their salaries, take into account any of the receipts from the war stamp tax. I do not appreciate the argument of my hon. friend when he says that the salaries of these postmasters were reduced by reason of the Order in Council. Their salaries had been fixed by statute long before the war, and perhaps I might indicate to the House the principle on which they were based. This refers entirely to city post offices. When postage collections exceeded $250,000 the salary was $4,000; when they exceeded $150,000 and did not exceed $200,000, the salary was $3,500; when they exceeded $100,000 and did not exceed $150,000, the salary was $3,250; when the collections were between $60,000 and $80,000, the salary was $2,400; when they were between $20,000 and $40,000, the salary was $2,000, and these salaries were voted annually in the estimates, although when payment was made to such postmasters the exact amount was determined by the actual revenue of the particular post office. Later on the Government was of the opinion that any revenues received by postmasters on account of the sale of war tax stamps should not be considered in calculating what their salaries should be. By reason of the enactment of the War Stamp Tax Act, the salaries of postmasters were not cut down at all; their salaries fell by reason of the diminution of the postal revenue.

Mr. McQUARRIE: In the days of the war?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes. That was the reason why their salaries fell, and not because the Order in Council had passed. It strikes me that the policy involved in the Order in Council was absolutely sound. This was a war tax imposed for a special purpose; it did not incur any additional labour on the part of the postmasters, and I think the Government were quite right in expecting that these officers should be tax collectors of this special tax, without any cost to the country. The position of my hon. friend with respect to these postmasters whose salaries have diminished by reason of a declining postal revenue may be all right, and perhaps they are entitled to some consideration, but that does not affect the principle involved in the Bill.

Mr. ROBB: Has it been the experience of the country that the increased postage rate has resulted in a diminution of post office business?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, I did not say that, but in certain parts of Canada during certain periods of the war, there was a diminution in business generally, which would naturally affect the postal revenue. I am not in a position to say just how matters stand in that respect to-day. This Order in Council will remain operative until peace is declared, which will be shortly, and we are now seeking legislation for making its provisions effective after peace is declared and until the Civil Service classification becomes effective at the beginning of the next fiscal year. I think this is fair legislation and should be accepted by the House.

Mr. McKENZIE: What machinery is there for distinguishing between the ordinary revenue and the special war revenue of the post office?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The rule adopted under the Order in Council was to calculate 72 per cent of the revenue as being purely postal revenue. The Bill gives power to the Postmaster General to determine what percentage of the postal collections at any post office shall be attributed to the sale of war tax stamps, and the balance will be the amount upon which the salary of the postmaster will be computed. My hon. friend will understand that this must be settled in an arbitrary fashion. To arrive at mathematically correct figures would require a large staff and involve a great deal of work, so power is given to the Postmaster General to settle the matter in the best way he can.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee on the Bill.

Progress reported.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM.

BILL PROVIDING FOR THE ACQUISITION OF THE SYSTEM BY THE GOVERNMENT.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Reid for the second reading of Bill No. 33, respecting the acquisition by His Majesty of the Grand Trunk railway system, and the amendment thereto of Mr. D. D. McKenzie.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, before entering upon a brief discussion of the Bill on its merits I should like to answer one or two objections that were raised to this legislation yesterday afternoon and evening by speakers on the other side of the House. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) positively announced himself as unalterably opposed to public ownership and challenged anybody to give an instance where public ownership had been a success. If he will remain in the House for a short while, I shall give cases where public ownership has been a very pronounced success indeed. He also took the ground that no set of employees would serve a government railway system as efficiently as they would serve a private owned railway. If the employees of the national system of railways were directly under the Government, there might be some force in his argument, but it is well to remember that the railways that are now controlled by the Canadian people, and this of course applies to the Grand Trunk if it is taken over, are managed by an able board appointed by Parliament and with powers independent of the Government. The Government has divested itself of power to control, so there is no reason why employees should not serve just as efficiently and just as faithfully under that board as if it were a board managing a private owned railway.

My hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin) made a point yesterday afternoon about the press being opposed to the acquisition of the Grand Trunk. I think he is under a misapprehension. As I read the press, most of the great papers of Canada are supporting the acquisition of the Grand Trunk. I need only mention Toronto, where the three leading newspapers are supporting the proposition regardless of their political predilections. The same thing is practically true of the West, where the great papers are supporting this public ownership idea. My hon. friend also spoke of the Government squandering money, as if we were simply shovelling out money to the Grand Trunk. Surely he has not followed the history of railways in this country or he would know that the country has shovelled out tens of millions almost yearly into the maw of the railway exploiter and got nothing for it. We purpose now to end that practice and to own the Grand Trunk system so that any further money we spend on the road we shall be spending on our own railway. He also referred to the Canadian Pacific, pointing out how magnificently it was paying, and asked why the government-owned railways did not pay. He implied they would never pay. I think I shall be able to give abundant reason before sitting down why the Canadian Pacific railway pays, and pays well. I want to refer briefly to a point or two made by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie), who announced that for his part he was unalterably opposed to public ownership. He also twitted the Government with rushing this legislation through. I cannot help thinking he was ill advised in taking that position. The Administration is not rushing this legislation through. The legislation has been pending for nearly two years, as every hon. member who has read the correspondence in the blue-book distributed recently must know. If the Government had not pressed this legislation through it would have been absolutely remiss in its duty to this country. The public owned system at the present time is confined largely to the West and to the East, and unless we are able to secure branches and terminals in Central Canada, it is absolutely impossible to make a success of railways under public ownership. Instead of the Government being to blame for introducing and pressing this legislation forward, the Government is to be commended for doing so. We cannot make our present system pay until we get these connections. I do not apprehend, and I am sure hon. gentlemen will agree with me, that there is any rush about this thing at all. Abundance of time is being given and every hon. gentleman who wishes to speak will have an opportunity of doing so. In my judgment the Government would have been remiss in its duty if it had failed to press forward this very important legislation at this moment.

I was struck with an expression of the hon. the leader of the Opposition when he said that the party with which he is associated has nothing to take back or apologize for in regard to its railway policy. I do not wish to blame one party more than another in regard to the railway policy pursued in this country for, in my judgment, the country has been on an awful debauch for the last twenty-five or thirty years in regard to its railway policy. But let us examine the railway policy as pursued by the party to which my hon. friend belongs. Surely it must be generally recognized that no greater, no more colossal blunder was ever perpetrated in this or any other country than the building of the Transcontinental railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific at the time they were pressed to conclusion by the party to which my hon. friend belongs. Instead of costing $13,000,000, as was promised, the Transcontinental railway cost, I think, in round figures $150,000,000. It is little or no good to the country at the present time. I am told that grass and trees are growing up in much of its roadbed. It is away ahead of time. The policy advocated by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) at that time was in my judgment the correct policy. It was his view, and it was backed by a great many people throughout the country and by a great many members of this House, that two or three roads around the north shore of lake Superior were entirely superfluous, that one road was all the country could stand and that what should be done was to doubletrack the Canadian Pacific around the north shore and let every other railway corporation have running powers over it upon proper terms. That in my judgment would have been the ideal policy. In addition to the Transcontinental being built, we had the spectacle of the Canadian Northern building around the north shore of lake Superior, and it was this transaction that practically swamped the whole railway situation and brought upon us this crisis.

Let me remind the leader of the Opposition that he surely has nothing particularly to be proud about in regard to the Transcontinental railway, because an independent commission was appointed to inquire into certain matters connected with its construction and they found that $40,000,000 was spent either in extravagance or graft on that one road alone. I do not think the hon. gentleman has much reason to be proud of the railway policy of the Liberal party. I am not saying that it is very much worse than the policy which has been pursued by the other party during the last twenty-five or thirty years, because both were thoroughly bad, and now it is our duty as responsible members of the House to apply the only remedy that offers itself

The leader of the Opposition announces himself, I see, as being absolutely opposed to public ownership. He says: "We have not got the money, and if we have not got the money how are we going to buy this Grand Trunk railway?" I do not think the hon. gentleman has a correct appreciation of the situation. It is true that Canada has not got the money to buy the Grand Trunk at the present time, but we do not have to pay for it. We merely assume the bonded and debenture liabilities of the Grand Trunk and pay out of the earnings of the road the interest which they bear. I am in hopes that the course of the arbitration and the terms of submission will be such that we shall not be called upon to pay one cent of the common stock obligations of the line. If we do not take over the Grand Trunk and assume its debenture and bonded liabilities we are up against the absolute proposition of being obliged to pour tens of millions into this particular corporation in order to maintain it as a running concern. I am told that $90,000,000 is the amount of the obligation of the Grand Trunk to the Grand Trunk Pacific under the contract. The time came when the Grand Trunk reached the end of its tether, they said: "We cannot run this Grand Trunk Pacific any longer," and they threw it up —fell down on the proposition absolutely. Would the leader of the Opposition suggest —and I shall pause for a reply—that the Administration should have stood quietly by, refused to do anything and allowed the thousands and tens of thousands of people who have been induced to go into that country and settle along that line of railway, to remain without any railway accommodation or connection? What would the hon. gentleman suggest?

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is asking a question of me. He says that this company had reached the end of its tether and had been obliged to go into the hands of a receiver. It has gone into the hands of a receiver, who is the Minister of Railways and Canals. I do not anticipate that there would be any difference if it went into the hands of any other receiver; the business of the road would be carried on in the same way.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The Grand Trunk refused to further operate the Grand Trunk Pacific. The expression that the Grand Trunk was at the end of its tether appears I think in its own correspondence in the Drayton-Acworth report. The Government was obliged to operate the road and if there are deficits on the road it is not due to any maladministration on the part of the Government which has been obliged to carry this baby, to take care of this child, of the so-called Liberal party. It was forced upon this Government years ago. Surely there is no blame coming to the present Administration on that account. It was simply put up to them and they had to do something with the Grand Trunk because the Grand Trunk announced that they were at the end of their tether and that they could not raise money not only to pay their obligations in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific but even possibly to take care of some of their other obligations.

The Government is faced with the necessity of dealing with the Grand Trunk. My hon. friend says that we cannot afford to take over the Grand Trunk at this time; the fact is we cannot afford not to take it over. In view of the railway situation that Canada is faced with we must take it over in order to save ourselves. I thought the leader of the Opposition was peculiarly unfortunate in the two illustrations which he gave. He said that the position of the Canadian people was like this: They have embarked on the enterprise of public ownership and purchased one cow—I think he said a Jersey cow. Why not, he asked, let us see whether we can make a success out of this cow before we buy another? Well, Mr. Speaker, it seemed to me that my hon. friend utterly failed to grasp the idea that the cow we had bought or rather that was forced upon us was a dry cow—it does not yield any milk. In order to make that cow productive, he inquired, would you go on and buy another cow. I say yes; we want to get a mate for the cow we have bought and see if we cannot put the pair in the way of producing for ourselves milk, butter and cheese. We will never get these products until we have another cow associated with the one we have bought and make the two productive. I think that is clear. My hon. friend also used another parallel which I thought was most unfortunate when he said the country is in the position of purchasing a horse—the hon. gentleman seems to have a peculiar affection for domestic animals—and when we come to make the purchase, he says, we find a bill of sale, or liens, on the horse. Now that is perfectly true. The horse is there, we have got to purchase it, and if we do not make the purchase we have got to pay the liens and the bill of sale, anyway. That is the position with regard to the railroads of this country; I want to make that point as clear as I can. Now

I would like to give a few figures, and I will endeavour to be as brief as possible, in order to show what this country has done for the railroads of the Dominion. I prefaced my remarks by stating, and I challenge contradiction, that the people of Canada during the last forty or fifty years have given sufficient—and I want this to sink into the mind of every hon. gentleman here—have given sufficient in cash, and lands, and the equivalent, to build every mile of railroad that we have in the Dominion at the present time. That is true; the people of Canada have given sufficient in cash, land, completed roads, exemptions, and largesse of one kind and another, to build every mile of railroad that now exists in Canada. And we do not own the railroads—in fact, for the last twenty, thirty, or forty years they have practically owned us. Now let us see where we would have been had we started on the right line? We have paid this money, we have given these exemptions, we have given this land, and yet, had we built and owned the railroads ourselves, we would have had them all paid for and there would be no capital to provide interest on. But because we have dealt with the buccaneers, manipulators, and railroad exploiters for the last thirty or forty years, we have this enormous railroad mileage in existence at the present time. It has all been loaded with stocks and bonds to the value of every dollar they cost and more, and the country has got to pay in freight rates sufficient to provide for the interest on this vast amount of capitalization. Had we done the thing ourselves we would never have been called upon to pay anything like the rates that we are now paying. I remember reading, when I was rather a young lad, and the Canadian Pacific Railway charter was before Parliament, that Sir John Macdonald, the man who was the father of that railway, made the statement that owing to the vast subsidies which the people of Canada were giving to the Canadian Pacific they would be able to carry freight at about one-half what they would be obliged to charge if they built the road with their own money. Now, notwithstanding the fact that we have poured this enormous sum of money, much exceeding a billion, into the construction of all these railroads we are obliged to pay the very highest freight rates at the present time; and the carnival will continue unless a halt is called. I admit it is late in the day, very late. This carnival has not existed with my acquiesence, because I began twenty-five years ago to denounce it, and use my influence to turn the people away from the idea of pouring subsidies into railway corporations. But it has gone on and we are face to face with this difficulty; and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite who expect to vote against this arrangement to pause and consider what the alternative is: you must either take over the Grand Trunk or continue to pour tens of millions of dollars into the maw of these corporations. That is the alternative, and the only alternative, because we are told this railway company are at the end of their tether.

Mr. CANNON: Would it not be possible for the Government to simply let the Grand Trunk go into liquidation?

Mr. RICHARDSON: Well, that could be done, but one of the great difficulties about the Grand Trunk, I may tell my hon. friend, is that it is a vast system and a great portion of it is in the United States and there are complications—so I am informed in discussing the matter with experts—that make it almost impossible to resort to that expedient. The view is held by the men who are in a position to know, the men who have studied questions of this kind, that the only possible way, the only satisfactory way, by which this road can be acquired is in the manner that the Government has adopted. For a long time I held the view suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Cannon). If there is one thing that I feel, and feel strongly, it is that this country owes nothing, absolutely nothing, to any railroad corporation. All these corporations have held the people by the throat for many years and have shaken the last dollar out of them. Talk of generosity! I would not extend one atom of generosity to railway exploiters. They have exercised a malign influence in this Dominion for the last thirty or forty years. Their course and their machinations for decades have resulted in debauching the people of Canada and I feel no generosity towards them. I would exact the last dollar, and I am hopeful—it is my view in supporting this arbitration—that the terms of the arbitration will be such that the idea of generosity will not even be thought of. The manipulators of the stock of the Grand Trunk have been making money all these years out of these manipulations. Is it not time we came to the end of this flim-flam game? Is it not time we heard the last of the talk we have heard with respect to the credit of Canada that has been dealt out to us during the last fifteen or twenty years? Whenever a crisis arose in this country and there was any idea of the people doing justice to themselves—doing justice to themselves and even no injustice to the party of the second part—you always heard the view expressed: "Oh, the credit of Canada will be interfered with." What do we care about that? Let us interfere with the credit of Canada. If that credit is to buttress up all these crawling creatures and has got to suffer because of their machinations, as it has suffered for decades, it is time we said: "To Hades with the credit of Canada." The time has come when we are not looking to British capital as the source from which to derive our money in this country. Because we have found that we must rely upon ourselves. We have to pay the piper, and the commitments of this country are appalling—appalling is the word—and we should see to it that not one farthing beyond a just award is paid for this Grand Trunk system. I would like to see provision made that the award be reviewed by Parliament.

Mr. McKENZIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I appreciate that view as expressed by an hon. member of the Opposition. I do not know whether or not it is feasible, but I have the assurance not perhaps on behalf of the Government, but from a Government source, that in this arbitration the selling value of the stock in the old land will not be considered or allowed to influence the award and I have the further assurance that the obligations of the Grand Trunk to the Government under the Grand Trunk Pacific contract will be provided for. Naturally I felt considerable uneasiness, coupled with some indignation, when I saw in the newspapers that stock jobbers were manipulating the Grand Trunk stock in the Old Land, and that it would influence the price we must pay. The report went out broadcast that this was a stock jobbers' deal, and that perhaps men who if they got their desserts should be in the penitentiary, would make big profits out of this transaction. I carried my fears to a Government source, and I was assured that not one farthing would be added to any award because of any supposed selling value of the stock in London.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will my hon. friend permit me a question? Can he tell this House any method by which the arbitrators can be prevented from giving value to the stock by recognizing what it is selling for in London? How can that be prevented, and how would the award stand if the arbitrators refused to recognize such value?

Mr. RICHARDSON: I could not tell my hon. friend off-hand just how it could be prevented. But if I were an arbitrator—and I hope to see an able layman on that arbitration and not a technical judge—I certainly would not award a single cent because of any manipulation of the stock in London. I do not know exactly how that can be done, but I give my hon. friend the opinion that I have obtained.

I have no quarrel with the leader of the Opposition because of the opinions he holds. Yesterday he frankly stated that he was opposed to public ownership. He appealed to his long public record, and if he is honestly convinced that public ownership is an improper thing for this country, he has an absolute right to that view, and I duly respect it and him for stating it frankly. I take the other view, however, and I advocate public ownership as strongly as I know how. I am extremely anxious that this great transaction should be closed up. I believe its consummation will mean a great deal for Canada, and therefore I am not in favour of delay. But I agree with hon. members on the Opposition side who suggest that every possible safeguard should be thrown around this transaction in order that the country shall not be bled to the extent of even one farthing beyond what is the just and proper amount to be paid for the acquisition of this railway.

Mr. JEAN J. DENIS (Joliette): Will my hon. friend allow me a friendly question? I may say that he is making many friends on this side of the House, at least as far as I and many members to whom I have spoken are concerned, when he says that the country owes nothing to the railroads, that we have no generosity to extend to them, and no presents to give them. But our great apprehension on this side of the House is that the award to be made by the arbitrators may constitute a most magnificent present to the Grand Trunk Company by reason of the fact that these arbitrators are liable to make mistakes on a large scale in the valuation of such an immense transaction as this, and that if the award is final there will be no appeal from it either to the Supreme Court of Canada, to the Privy Council, to the Parliament of Canada, or to any other tribunal in the world. If the arbitrators should place a value of, say, $50,000,000 in excess of the real value of the stock, then we would have to pay the excess. Therefore my question is this: Would not the hon. gentleman agree with us on this side of the House when we say that the award should be submitted to Parliament before it becomes final and valid?

Mr. RICHARDSON: I might say in reply to my hon. friend, that I greatly appreciate the position which some members on the Opposition side appear to desire to take on this question. I do think, however, that they are seriously misled, but I am not impugning their motives. If it were feasible that the award should be submitted to Parliament, I would certainly like to see it presented to us for ratification; but there might be difficulties in taking such a course, and I would not like to answer off-hand the question put by my hon. friend. We shall probably hear from the Government on that point.

I want to see the arbitration agreement, for I think it should receive the attention of the House, and I would like to see it submitted to the House when we go into committee on the Bill, because this is a very important matter. All classes of politicians in this House are equally to blame for our present railway situation, and the time has come when we might very well say: Let us look at this question on its merits, and on its merits alone. Let us see whether it is desirable that this railway should be taken over, and let us not be influenced by partisan considerations in reaching a conclusion. Partisan considerations have been the great curse of this country for the last thirty or forty years, and we now see the handwriting on the wall. The people themselves have begun to realize that partisanship is a curse, and they are taking the game into their own hands. I am not prepared to say that it might not be a good thing, if we, the people's representatives, will not apply the reform that the people themselves should speak and act. What difference will it make if the Union Government and the so-called Liberal party be set aside, so long as the people are truly served? That should be the only issue to be considered in the Dominion at the present time.

Mr. McCREA: Would it not be a good idea to let them speak on this question through a general election?

Mr. RICHARDSON: I promised to present a very brief summary of what the Dominion has given to the railroads, and when I refer first to the Canadian Pacific railway my hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin) will see the answer to his question: Why cannot the Government-owned railway pay as well as the Canadian Pacific railway? First, let me give a brief historical reference I have in mind, and in this connection I would like to appeal to my hon. friends on the Opposition side. In the year 1872 the Mackenzie Government came into office, led by as grand a man and Liberal as ever appeared in this country. He was the man who helped to create the great Liberal party, and he believed in public ownership. That grand old Scotchman had made a study of the question, and he realized Canada's needs and necessities, and he advocated that the railway system to bind the East to the West, which was a condition of Confederation, should be built under public ownership.

It would have been a great thing for this Dominion had the hon. Alexander Mackenzie been continued in power long enough to carry out that policy. It would have saved hundreds of millions of dollars to the people of this country, it would have meant decent freight rates, and we would not have had the bedevilment and corruption of our politics and public life that we have witnessed during the last thirty or forty years. I want to appeal especially to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie). His honoured leader, the man who helped to create his party, believed in public ownership and undertook the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway to connect the Pacific with the Atlantic as a publicly-owned line.

His party continued in office, as is well known, from 1872 until 1878, when it was defeated on the trade question—an improper issue at that time, as history will attest. But he was defeated, and Sir John A. Macdonald, the great apostle of private ownership, came into office. And what did he do? He brought into existence the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and handed over to it at once $38,000,000 worth of road that had been completed under Mackenzie and 25,000,000 acres of land. Let us see what the Canadian Pacific Railway Company actually received. They got $71,000,000 in cash. They got $38,000,000 worth of completed road. They got a land grant running up to some thirty or thirty-five million acres. Now, they have realized over $125,000,000 from the land which they have sold, and, according to their own statement, the land which still remains, untaxed, in their hands they value at another $125,000,000. So that the people gave them directly—it was just the same as cash—$359,000,000. And the original cost of the road, according to their own figures, was $143,000,000.

Let us examine what further aid they received. They got exemption from duty on all their supplies. They got exemption from taxation until Gabriel blows his trumpet on every penny's worth of property that they own in this country. Do you know what that means? If you figure it out according to recognized authorities you will find that that means $500,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company every thirty years. As the company have been in existence over thirty years, the people, therefore, have contributed to the Canadian Pacific Company about $850,000,000 in cash, lands and tax exemptions. No wonder they can earn splendid dividends; no wonder they can set aside a handsome reserve of from one hundred to two hundred millions. I commend the figures to my hon. friend the member for Wright (Mr. Devlin). It is in order to combat the strength of that great railway company that we want to have the Canadian-owned system strengthened; because I believe our system will be able to compete satisfactorily with the Canadian Pacific when the time comes if we get it properly organized and co-ordinated.

Now, let us see what we gave to the Canadian Northern. I want my hon. friend (Mr. Denis) to listen to this, because it is important; he has a receptive mind and I am satisfied that his vote on this question will be an honest one.

Mark you, we gave $850,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific, and into the maw of the Canadian Northern the people of Canada poured $300,000,000. Is it any wonder that there has been a bedevilment of our politics in this country? Is it any wonder that the great railway interests became arrogant and overbearing and practically attempted to own the country as they gained in affluence and wealth?

According to the information given by the Minister of Railways this afternoon, we gave to the Grand Trunk $15,000,000. Mark you, the people gave $674,000,000 in cash or its equivalent to the three railroads of this country; and if you add $500,000,000 by way of tax exemption and duty exemption you will get the enormous total of $1,540,000,000 that the people of Canada have contributed to the railroads of this country. If that is not sufficient to appal members of Parliament, to say nothing of the citizens ot Canada—well, I do not know what would appal them. If that is not "going it strong"; if that is not being on a colossal railway debauch for thirty years, I do not know what is. It seemed to make no difference during the last ten or fifteen years how often you tried to call a halt; the carnival went on, and it was participated in just as boisterously by the party to which my hon. friend belongs and to which I myself once belonged. I opposed them on the Grand Trunk Pacific-Transcontinental policy however; I ran against the member of the Government in Western Canada who was pushing the thing through there; I have at least that to my credit.

I say that notwithstanding all that we have given, unless we stop now, we shall have to continue the carnival. Is it not about time that this condition came to an end? The Grand Trunk so say the company's officials themselves is at the end of its tether. Any one who studies the financial position of Canada knows that this country also will be practically at the end of its tether if it does not put a stop to this kind of thing. Here is the alternative: If you do not take over the Grand Trunk you will have to nurse the baby; you will have to continue pouring millions into the lap of that corporation to enable it to support the Grand Trunk Pacific and, probably, itself.

If we do not take the Grand Trunk, in order to make a success of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Intercolonial, we shall have to build branch lines and terminals in Ontario, and that would involve a cost to the people of probably two hundred millions. And then what have we got? We have the Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk and our own system, all in competition. We cannot make a success of the state-owned system without the Grand Trunk. If we wipe it out, we wipe out its competition, and with a splendidly equipped system from the Atlantic to the Pacific we shall be able to effectively compete with the great Canadian Pacific Railway system. In no other way under the sun can we make a success of our national system of railways. That is the position which confronts the Government at the present time.

Hon. members argue strongly that the road should not be taken over, but they do not stop to think that if we do not take it over we shall have to support it. We have been supporting the railways, lame and otherwise, for the last thirty or forty years. Surely to Heaven we ought to have reached the end of the lane. It is such a reflection upon the judgment and the intelligence, not only of members of this House but of the people of the country as well, that I marvel that any sane person should continue this foolish policy an hour longer. It was inevitable that the time should come when we would have to end it; and that time is the present.

I have made some reference to the policy of the so-called Liberal party in the old days when they launched this Transcontinental and Grand Trunk Pacific system. The then Minister of Finance, the present member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) who opposes this Bill, was the exponent and mouth-piece of the Government of that day. It was he who told us that the Transcontinental would cost the country only $13,000,000, whereas it has cost us over $200,000,000. I was looking over his speeches the other day; it seemed to me that they were models of solemn absurdity and financial incompetence. I marvel that he takes the position that he now takes on this question, having regard to the vast blunder with which he was associated and which he helped drive through this Parliament and fasten upon the country. The only way in which the country can recoup itself for some of these losses is by taking over the Grand Trunk, co-ordinating it with our other publicly-owned lines and making it a thorough, competent, well-equipped system. When we do that we shall be able to make money out of it and probably get back some of the hundreds of millions that we have already spent.

Now, in what I am about to refer I should like to have the attention of the member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea). I hope that he will wake up and follow me closely, because I am coming to the declaration that he made last night—in which, no doubt, he was perfectly sincere. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman knows that there is any country under the sun which has made a success of public ownership. I want to appeal especially to him because he is a hard-headed—shall I say hard-fisted—business man. He knows how many beans make five; and, if I size him up correctly, I take it that if he thought that failure to acquire the Grand Trunk would add ten dollars to his taxes he would be in favour of taking it over and saving the ten dollars. I hope the hon. gentleman will appreciate the compliment.

In discussing the question of public versus private ownership, I want to make a prefatory remark, that the only thing to consider is not dollars and cents. It is not dividends that we must look at, especially, but service to the people. Does the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) appreciate that? It is not so much just whether we make five per cent or six per cent; we might make a little less, but if we serve the people, that is the idea of public ownership—the subordination of dollars and cents to public service.

[Mr. Richardson.]

Mr. McCREA: It is on forty years of experience as a shipper that I base my argument.

Mr. RICHARDSON: All these public utilities that are in their nature natural monopolies, such as gas, water, light, telephones, telegraphs and railways, that enter into the service of the people, should belong to the people. Just let me tell the hon. member for Sherbrooke that people throughout the world have the idea of public ownership. Water, gas, light, telephones and telegraphs belong in the old land, as well as on this continent, very largely to the people themselves. It just occurs to me now that in Glasgow we have the greatest example of the success of public ownership that the world has ever witnessed. For the last twenty-five years or more the whole street railway system and every other municipal service of that great city have been owned by the corporation of Glasgow. If my hon. friend has ever visited Glasgow, he will find that he can ride on a street car there for a penny and sometimes for a cent, and the revenue from that system is so vast that it has been almost entirely wiping out the taxes of the people of Glasgow for the last twenty or twenty-five years. That is one case. The conviction is being steadily forced upon the people, not only of Canada but of the world, that public ownership is in the general interest of the people, because it supplies them with service in preference to dividends, though it generally does return dividends. Let me suggest this to my hon. friend. He says that no success has ever been made of public ownership, and he challenges anybody in this House or out of it to produce any instance of its having proved a success. All the postal services, I presume, throughout the world, are under public ownership. Could a service be much better managed than even our own postal service which usually produces a revenue, notwithstanding the enormous disability, the Civil Service disability? In my judgment, the Civil Service should be taken by the heels and smashed against the wall; we are paying just double what we should pay for Civil Service at the present time, it could be cut in halves and its efficiency increased, and yet we are going on and appointing hundreds more to positions, mostly at big salaries.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend might tell us something about the grain elevators of his own province of Manitoba.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I promised not to be too long, my good friend. I have so much to tell you about that perhaps you will be glad when I finish.

Mr. J. D. REID: They are operated successfully.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member for Springfield will not say that they are well managed.

Mr. J. D. REID: They are owned by the Dominion Government, and they are operated successfully.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The Minister of Railways has suggested that they are a success, and I have no doubt that as he is a truthful man, the Opposition Chief Whip (Mr. Robb) can rely on his words. The postal service, telephones and telegraphs in the old land from which we derive our precedents, all belong to the people; they are all magnificently managed, and I believe they pay well.

Mr. CANNON: What about telephones in Manitoba?

Mr. RICHARDSON: Just possess your soul in patience, my good and eloquent friend; you will have an opportunity after I am through.

Mr. CANNON: I should like to know.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Just let us come down to railways. Does the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) know—if he does not know I will tell him—that the railways of that great German Republic, as we must call it now—it used to be an Empire; I dislike to instance Germany, even to mention its name in the House, but it will do all right as an illustration—has owned all its railroads for the last thirty or forty years? The best testimony that I can secure proves that those railroads have been efficiently managed and that they have paid. What are the rates on those railways? Three-quarters of the people of Germany have been travelling for the last twenty-five or thirty years—mark that—at a rate of one-quarter of a cent per mile. How does that compare with three and four cents per mile in this country, and yet those railways pay a dividend and are efficiently managed.

Mr. TOBIN: What wages are paid there?

Mr. RICHARDSON: Never mind—I do not know what wages are paid. It is very easy to crack in questions. Although one should rise from the dead, I do not believe that my hon. friend would be convinced. I am not appealing to him as I expect him to vote with his party. That is the kind of men who are a curse to the country; they follow party instead of following logic. Let me tell the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon that Germany is not the only instance. Austria-Hungary has owned most of their railways for years; those railways pay well, and the rates are very low. Italy owns most of its own railways and makes a handsome profit.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RICHARDSON: You must not smile when I am presenting you the truth, because I expect you to vote aright.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. gentleman that he must address the Chair.

Mr. RICHARDSON: All right, Sir, I will endeavour to do so.

Mr. McCREA: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON: At this stage of the debate I decline to be interrupted. In Italy the railroads are mostly owned by the people; the rates are very moderate, and those railways pay. I want to tell my hon. friend—I want to tell the Speaker this time—that France—and France is a country that will appeal to many hon. gentlemen sitting opposite—owns most of its own railways and makes money out of them; that wages are good in France, and that the rates are low. Therefore, we are not entering upon an experiment at all; public ownership has been tested for decades and has proved a success.

Let me give just one instance of the success of public ownership that appeals specially to myself. It was referred to by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) the other day, and I shall repeat the salient points. In the city of Winnipeg we, the citizens, went along for many years paying ten cents per kilowatt hour for our light and a correspondingly enormous price for our power. There was a privately-owned system belonging to Bill and Dan, and we had to pay whatever price was asked. The citizens thought that was a mistake; they thought they could get power in at very much less, because nature had provided the Winnipeg river, which connects the lake of the Woods with lake Winnipeg, with magnificent water-powers. So the city of Winnipeg embarked on the undertaking of developing power on its own account. Naturally, just as the President of the Privy Council said last night, the interests immediately got busy and told us that the city was plunging into an enormous liability, just as the leader of the Opposition said last night with regard to this Grand Trunk business. The interests did their best to scare the people of Winnipeg from embarking upon this enterprise, but the people believed in public ownership; they thought they had a good thing in this Winnipeg River power and they appropriated sufficient money to develop it. Mark you they developed on the Winnipeg river up to 100,000 horse-power, and transmitted that power to the city. They spent $7,500,000, and at what rate do you suppose light has been distributed to the thousands of citizens of Winnipeg during the last seven or eight years? Ten cents per kilowatt hour? No, three and-a-half cents per kilowatt hour. They cut the rate by more than two-thirds. The city of Winnipeg is supplied with light at the lowest rate, I believe, on this continent, because of public ownership. The prices charged for power were reduced in the same proportion. Has public ownership in this case meant disaster for the city of Winnipeg? Not at all. During the last few years, in addition to paying interest on this $7,500,000 and providing a sinking fund, the city has been able to set aside $400,000 in profits, and the citizens have saved from one to two millions annually in the price of their light and power, because the competing privately-owned company had to meet the new rate. There you have a magnificent example of the success of public ownership, and it will be that way all along the line wherever the principle is properly carried out.

I see it publicly stated that Sir Adam Beck's hydro-electric system has saved the people of Ontario fifty millions of dollars. The danger is in dishonest administration, and you cannot always safeguard yourself from the manipulations of scoundrels. But if you have public ownership and honest efficient administration it is bound to be a success. There is no reason why there should not be honest administration, and that brings me back again to the position of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. He says that we cannot get men who would serve the people as they would serve a corporation. I don't believe that is so. I give him credit for expressing what he believes to be true, but what reason under the sun is there why servants should not serve under a board of management appointed by the Government just as faithfully and efficiently as under a board of management appointed by directors in old London? His position does not hold water.

While some friends on the other side of the House may vote against this proposal under the belief that they are doing a good turn to the country in striking at public ownership, I want to tell them in all solemnity that actually they are attempting to deal our national railways a deadly blow. Thank God, it will not be fatal to the principle of public ownership, which means so much for the interest of this country. Let them appeal to their old leader, Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, the man who created the Liberal party. Was he a private ownership man? No, he stood for public ownership. How the party has degenerated since his day! We have the remnant of the party here pleading for private ownership in a case where public ownership is the only possible remedy for the situation.

Opponents of public ownership very naturally point to failures and say: "Look at the Intercolonial." I have heard that said on every platform on which I have spoken on public ownership during the last twenty years. Let us examine the Intercolonial for a few minutes. As you especially know, Mr. Speaker, for you come from the Maritime Provinces, the Intercolonial was not built as a commercial enterprise. It was not expected—and I want my hon. friends to mark this—that the country would make money out of it, but it was one of the terms of Confederation that the East should be connected by rail with the West. The Intercolonial was not built on a direct route, as a railway built for commercial purposes would have been, but followed a circuitous course around the coast line in order to serve this, that and the other community. Therefore, it could not be expected that it would be a commercial success. What has happened to the Intercolonial? As everybody knows, and especially the leader of the Opposition and hon. members from the Maritime Provinces, the road has been bled white for the last thirty or forty years. The cars used on the Intercolonial carry probably ten tons, but they would be set down as carrying only three or four tons, and while injury was done to the track the man who shipped freight over the Intercolonial got off with a very small payment. The curse of the Intercolonial has been political management and the foisting upon the line of thousands of incompetent political heelers and dependents, to the awful prejudice of the enterprise. No wonder the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) and other hon. members from the Maritime Provinces look askance at public ownership, for they have seen what has happened. But the trouble has been with the management. The road has been a political railway to help out this, that, and the other politician. I venture to say that nothing of that sort will happen under the board that is administering the National Railways of Canada. We had an ebullition in connection with the Intercolonial from a politician not very long ago, when the then chief whip of the Conservative party threatened to resign because he was not given as great consideration from the Government in the matter of the Intercolonial railway patronage as he expected. The point I want to emphasize is this, and mark it, because it is worth while: The Intercolonial for thirty or forty years and until quite recently carried freight for less than one-third the amount charged by private-owned railways. Let that sink deep into the heart of my hon. friend, who I expect will vote for us before he is through. The country lost heavily, but Maritime Province residents got the benefit. I am satisfied that when the Intercolonial is amalgamated with the Grand Trunk system, which is required to link up the East with the West, we shall have a railway system that will pay.

Let me add that thousands and thousands of miles of railway have been built in this country that never should have been built, much of it being simply duplication. That is the result of this colossal railway blunder policy that has been carried on by both parties during the last twenty-five or thirty years. When we get the Grand Trunk incorporated into the public owned railway system, and have eliminated all waste mileage, and let me add, all waste capital, we shall have a system that will pay interest on a reasonable capitalization, pay operating expenses, and give a valuable return to the people, if not in large dividends at least in reduced rates. We have got the National Transcontinental, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Intercolonial, and the Canadian Northern now, but they are no good to us without the Grand Trunk system. They are like the cow of the leader of the Opposition that is not giving any milk. We have to acquire the road that will complete our system, and when that is done my judgment is that we shall be able to give an excellent service to the people and make a profit into the bargain. But one thing will have to be done. Owing to the absurd system that has been followed by both parties in this country, and both parties are equally responsible, we have allowed railroad exploiters to persuade us to pour immense sums of money into their maws in order that they might construct railway mileage, useless or otherwise, to enable them to make off with vast amounts in construction guarantees, etc. Because of that foolish policy—and both parties are equally to blame—we have hundreds, if not thousands, of miles of unnecessary railway mileage in this country at the present time. That has to be eliminated. The capital cost has to be erased from the public ledger and the country has to take the loss. If we acquire the Grand Trunk and co-ordinate it with our already publicly-owned system we shall have a complete system with which the country can compete efficiently with the Canadian Pacific and without which we cannot compete with that great corporation.

It is all very well for the leader of the Opposition to say: "Well, we already have one cow, let us see what that cow does before we buy another." Surely the hon. member knows that the cow is dry—dry as a whistle. It has never given a pint of milk ever since we had it and until we get another member of the bovine species and link them up we shall never have a productive and successful system. We might go on until the crack of doom with a big railway mileage in the West and a big railway mileage in the East, but without connections in the centre we cannot operate through trains, or make a success of the system. We can never make a success of this without this connection and unless we take over the Grand Trunk at the present time in order to make any success whatever of the thousands and thousands of miles we have, we shall have to build a system in central Canada to connect up with. We have either to take the Grand Trunk or build a connecting system in Ontario or Quebec. That would cost us from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000. That is the only way. You can not make a success of this cow unless you give her a companion. When we have acquired the Grand Trunk, and it is the only logical thing to do, we shall have a system in this country which I believe will be a paying institution and will be capable of effectively competing with the Canadian Pacific.

I think it was the leader of the Opposition who spoke of the failure of public ownership in the United States; if it were not he it was some other member of the Opposition. In the United States, since the outbreak of the war, the railways have been taken over and operated by the people. It is true they have not returned dividends to the people, but I will tell you what they did do; they helped to win the war. And if it had not been for the taking over of the railway system by the Government of the United States the United States could not have been as effective in France and Belgium as that country was at the period when its troops were there. The idea of profits was absolutely subordinated to winning the war. Before the Government of the United States undertook to control the railways there were 23,000 miles of American roads in the hands of receivers. That was under private ownership. It is not surprising that under public ownership during the war, when the service was subordinated to the carrying of troops they did not make a very great success of the operation. In addition, however, there is far too much water in the stocks of the American roads to make a success. Great Britain took over and operated its railways. I read recently in a white-book issued by the Government that during the operation of the roads by the Government they earned a profit of $81,000,000.

With regard to the Bill under consideration and which provides for the taking over of the Grand Trunk, I may say that the Grand Trunk owes the Government $90,000,000 under the Grand Trunk Pacific contract. I am informed, as I said at the outset, that when the agreement for arbitration comes to be made the interest of the people will be guarded. I am informed that no appreciation of Grand Trunk stock in the old land since it was known that the Government was negotiating for its purchase will be recognized. I am informed that the arbitrators will perfectly guard the interest of the public. If that is true I do not see that there is going to be any very great danger in taking over the road. Of the $115,000,000 of common stock of the Grand Trunk, I am told that no more than $15,000,000 actually represents money put into the railway. A lot of this money has been wasted. Of course, the stock sold very much below par and the money has been wasted. I do not think we have very much to fear in connection with taking over the line. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) says that he is not opposed to public ownership but that the greatest and best public men of Canada are. I think those are his words.

Mr. FIELDING: Not the "greatest" but the "gravest"—I do not want to exclude my hon. friend.

[Mr. Richardson.]

Mr. RICHARDSON: It is just a mistake in one letter. I would like to ask my hon. friend if he would not give the House a few of the names of some of the gravest and best men in this country who are opposed to this scheme. I marvelled at the statement because a long acquaintance with my hon. friend has given me a high respect for him and I always listen to his statements in this House with great pleasure and attention, but I cannot bring myself to believe that the hon. gentleman was speaking with due warrant when he said the gravest and the best men of this country were opposed to this transaction. I could understand the editor of the Financial Times, if he is one of the gravest and best men in this country, being opposed to it because the Financial Times of Montreal issues a warning and appeals to the Senate to throw out this Bill, in the interest of this burdened country. Just fancy the Times which has devoted its long life to fighting and working for the interests, posing as the champion of the public on any question. I shall not discuss the question as to whether Lord Atholstan is one of the gravest and best men in this country but if the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens refers to the Canadian Pacific directors as being among the gravest and best men who are opposed to this proposal, I will agree with him that they are probably opposed to it, but I would take immediate issue with the suggestion that they are the gravest and best men in this country in so far as the public interest is concerned. They are fully able to look after the interests of the Canadian Pacific railway but that they have any tender regard for the interests of the people I beg leave to very much doubt. I would have liked my hon. friend to have mentioned a few names when I gave him the chance. But in the absence of any names I must conclude that the gravest and best men are some of the stodgy-brained bell-wethers of Montreal finance. That may be a harsh judgment but I cannot believe that they have made a study of the question because if they had I cannot imagine they can take the position which my hon. friend suggests they do take.

Now my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) in some remarks which he made on the question, said something about this being a stock-jobbing transaction. I was not in the House at the time and I would not wish to misquote the hon. gentleman. I want to say, however, that even if it were a stock-jobbing transaction it cannot fail to result in benefit to the people to get this railroad out of the hands of the stock-jobbers and manipulators and flim-flam artists into their own control. Then it will clear our politics and clear our public life in a manner that we little dream of. The alternative in this transaction is that we either take over the Grand Trunk or we go on pouring millions, tens of millions into the hungry hands of these corporations. I pause for a moment and ask the leader of the Opposition if he believes that would be the best policy to pursue? He may denounce the taking over of the railroads, but has he viewed the alternative in all its gravity? Does he realize that if we do not take over this railroad we have got to carry the foundling and nurse and feed it? That is the position and that is what we have been doing during all these decades. Is that to go on any longer? Is the country not thoroughly sick of continuing the practice? Has the time really not come when we should put an effectual stop to it and know exactly where we are? If we do not take the road over, we have got to carry it. We have come to its rescue to the amount of $90,000,000 on the Grand Trunk Pacific. Is not that about enough, or have we got to go on continuing it? If we co-ordinate the two systems and get the Grand Trunk, which is the central road, it will help to feed the other ends and take care of the business, and we shall then be able to make some money out of the transaction, we shall then be able to make it pay; we cannot possibly make it pay under the present circumstances. It is a question of doing that or continuing to throw millions and tens of millions of our money to these corporations. I have, in a feeble way, shown the House what the railroad systems have cost the country. Is it not time we ended the farce, once for all, and took over the Grand Trunk, the central road, so as to make the Canadian publicly-owned system of railways a paying system, a possible system. It is no wonder the Government has been anxious and anxious ever since it became possessed of some of this mileage, to have an agreement with the Grand Trunk, get it out of the way, and get their system embodied in our publicly-owned system. In that way and in that way only can we solve the transportation problem in this country. It is all very well to talk about haste, and for the leader of the Opposition to say this matter is forced on the country in the dying days of the session. I believe every member of Parliament is prepared to stay here until the snow flies, and even until next spring, in order to settle this great question. Let us take all the time that is necessary. There must be no undue haste but let the matter be settled and settled in the right way. It is true that a campaign has been started, I suppose by the Canadian Pacific and by interested people, against the acquisition of this railway. But it will fail and fail miserably and react upon those skulking behind it. The course I have outlined, Mr. Speaker, is the only solution of the transportation question in Canada—the only one. We cannot afford to build another system to compete with the Grand Trunk, but if we acquire the Grand Trunk on proper terms, and let every member of this House see to it that the terms are proper, we shall have a splendid publicly-owned system of railways in this country.

Mr. DENIS: Does my hon. friend realize that after this Bill has been passed, the people, and especially this Parliament, will have absolutely nothing to do with the terms? I am putting this interrogation in answer to what the hon. gentleman has just said, " Let us buy the road on proper terms." If the road was to be bought on proper terms, with sufficient guarantee, I am not going to say I would vote against the Bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I am delighted to hear my hon. friend take that stand because it is precisely my own position. I propose to scrutinize the terms when they are brought down. I am assured that the enhancement of stock in the Old Country will not add one dollar to the price we have to pay, and that Grand Trunk obligations to Canada will be taken care of in the arbitration.

Mr. DENIS: But we will have nothing to do with it. After this Bill has been passed the matter goes into the hands of the arbitrators, and then all we have to do is to pay the amount of the award. That is why I say we will have no possible means of ascertaining whether the terms are proper, we will have no way of controlling proper terms or making recommendations to the arbitrators.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has spoken, and the member for Springfield has the floor.

Mr. DENIS: I was merely asking the hon. member a question. I was asking the hon. gentleman if he realizes that in this instance Parliament will be absolutely handicapped and powerless, after this Bill has been passed, in so far as the proper terms are concerned? That is my question.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I rather appreciate, Mr. Speaker, the kindly interruptions of my hon. friend. I can tell by his voice and by his eye that he wants to do absolutely the right thing with regard to this Bill. I believe he will vote right when it comes to the issue. He wants to do right, and when a man wants to do right the greatest patience and the greatest kindness must be exercised in regard to him. Now, I cannot really tell my hon. friend—I cannot give him the guarantees he asks for. I may say that I was informed by a man—I would not like to say how close he is to the Government because I do not want to give away secrets—that all these questions will be provided for, and that under this arbitration not one dollar more will be paid for the stock because of any enhancement or alleged enhancement of that stock on the money market at the present time. I was pleased when I heard that because I want to tell my hon. friend—

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. gentleman says he proposes to scan carefully the terms when they are brought down. Are we to have any other terms than those set forth in this Bill? The hon. gentleman intimates that some other terms are to be brought down and that we are to scan them. I have no intimation that there are such terms to be brought down.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Will there not be an arrangement with regard to the appropriation of the road? Will there not be some arbitration agreement?

Mr. FIELDING: To be brought down here?

Mr. RICHARDSON: Yes, I fancy so.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not know, I am asking the hon. gentleman for information.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I merely tell my hon. friend that I have been assured that the enhancement, or the alleged enhancement, of the price of the stock on the London market will not be allowed to affect the finding of the arbitration here. I may have been deceived.

Mr. FIELDING: That is not quite the point. My hon. friend says he proposes, for his own protection, to scan carefully the terms when they are brought down. I have no intimation that we are to have any terms brought down, and therefore my hon. friend will not have an opportunity of scanning them.

[Mr. Denis.]

Mr. RICHARDSON: I am under the impression that there is to be an arbitration agreement.

Mr. FIELDING: To be brought here?

Mr. RICHARDSON: I cannot say that it will be brought here, but I shall hope so.

Mr. FIELDING: All right.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I may be speaking in ignorance, but I was under the impression that the question would be more fully elucidated by the Government before the Bill finally went through Parliament, and I was hoping for further information on it. I take the position that I am just as sincere in my views in this matter, and just as anxious to guard the public interest as any member opposite; and I trust the agreement under which the arbitration will be submitted will be such as to absolutely safeguard the interests of the country.

Mr. FIELDING: And that it will be submitted to the House at this session?

Mr. RICHARDSON: Well, I have not got the ear of the Government. I have not got that assurance from them, and I am unable to give my hon. friend that assurance.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, and I have taken up much longer time than I had intended, a word or two in conclusion. We are faced in this matter with the alternative of pouring millions and millions of dollars into the hands of the corporation unless we take a radical step, such as is proposed at this time, and take over this railway. Then we shall have a publicly-owned railway system which will serve the whole country, and, I believe, serve it efficiently.

I am not of the view that the Canadian Pacific railway should be taken over. It is a magnificent railway system efficiently managed and pays well and every body wishes it well. No wonder it pays well in view, as I have shown the House, of the vast amount of money the country has given to it. I would have the Canadian Pacific railway continue as a competing road, and I think that if it remains so the public will be better served than if it becomes incorporated in our national railway system.

When we get this Grand Trunk Railway system incorporated in our own national system, as I believe we shall in a very short time, the next thing to do will be for this Parliament to eliminate all waste mileage from the public owned system, and write the cost off the ledger. Then we ought to charge rates sufficient to pay interest on the reasonable cost, and only the reasonable cost, of the road, and maintenance and upkeep. If we start off with a fair capitalization we ought soon to be in a position to make the system pay as an enormous saving can be at once effected in the elimination of hundreds if not thousands of officials and offices which are now duplicated. But without a fair capitalization it is impossible, in my judgment, to make a success of our venture. The point is very important. Take the Grand Trunk road, its capitalization although constructed when material and labour were absurdly cheap has climbed to the enormous figure of $127,000 a mile. The capitalization of the Canadian Pacific, which was built under pretty favourable auspices, is $69,000 a mile, the Canadian Northern still lower $54,000 a mile, and the Grand Trunk Pacific which was built under very bad auspices, as indicated by the report showing $40,000,000 of extravagance and graft, cost $98,000 a mile. $127,000 a mile is an enormous capitalization, for it must be remembered that the Grand Trunk was built in the early days, and I do not see how it could have cost that large sum. But I suppose there were railway exploiters and manipulators, and they probably sold railroads on political bases to the Grand Trunk just as readily in those days as in more modern times, which probably largely accounts for the enormous capitalization. The Manitoba Railway system which the Northern Pacific built some twenty years ago only cost $9,000 a mile. Compare with that the capitalization of the Grand Trunk at $127,000 a mile! Of course, that includes equipment. But the difference is out of all proportion. And the Canadian Pacific even at $68,000 a mile is much too high. However, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company added to their capital. They issued tens of thousands of dollars worth of capital stock. They distributed the original first issue of stock among themselves at 25 cents on the dollar, set the proceeds aside and paid themselves interest at 6 per cent, and in four years recouped themselves every farthing they paid for it, and they owned the stock into the bargain. That is the way these transactions have been carried out. The city of Winnipeg built a railroad 100 miles in length out to Shoal lake, along the waterworks aqueduct, on the Lake of the Woods, and from the figures I have obtained the cost of construction and equipment — of course, the equipment is not great— was but $12,000 a mile—all constructed within the last five years. If we are to make a success of our publicly owned system, it is very important that we reduce the capitalization to the figure it would take to reproduce the system, and then let us pay interest on that reasonable capitalization, which will enable us to give the people rates very much less than are being charged at the present time.

I think that politics can be kept out of the management of this publicly owned system, Mr. Speaker. I have yet to learn of any political interference since the Intercolonial railway and the Canadian Northern railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific passed into the hands of the board at present managing them—at least no complaints have reached me—and I believe it is the duty, as I am advised it is the resolute intention, of this Government to keep the system absolutely free from politics. If it does, I have no doubt that we can operate it successfully.

Last session I took the view that it would be unfortunate if we had to take over this Grand Trunk system under arbitration owing to our distressing ten million experience with the wretched Canadian Northern railway stock, but there seems no help for it. I am told that the difficulties of allowing the system to pass into the hands of a receiver and then acquiring it would be insurmountable, because so much of the system is in the United States. I am told that event the plan of purchasing or guaranteeing to pay a certain return on the bonds and stocks would not do because we cannot acquire control. I hope when the time comes to appoint arbitrators we shall get a good business board. God protect us from too many legal quibblers on the board. I do not think we ought to have lawyers—we might have one legal gentleman. But if we have a business arbitration, and the arbitration agreement which I rely upon is of the right character, I cannot help thinking that the country does not take much risk even in going into arbitration. The difficulty, however, is that for two years the Government has been endeavouring to acquire the road by purchase. We said that we would guarantee so much interest on the bonds and debentures, but the Grand Trunk people would not accept our offer, and nearly two years ago the Government proposed arbitration. Arbitration seems to be the reasonable thing under the circumstances. If you and I, Mr. Speaker, cannot agree upon a certain point, I would think you would have a right to feel very much offended if I declined to agree to submit our difference to a third party. Surely we can get justice from arbitration, providing it is of the right character. If we have business arbitrators I should think they would at least do justice to the people of Canada. I would not like to see three judges appointed. I think the arbitration board should be composed of two business men, with perhaps a judge as a third man to look into the legal aspect of the case.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must apologize for having taken up so much of the time of the House, but this is a great subject and perhaps none of greater economic importance has come before this House in the last twenty-five years. The issue means a great deal to this country. I do not know whether the arbitration agreement will be submitted to the House, but when we are in Committee on the resolution I suppose we shall have every opportunity for further discussion. I want to say in conclusion that I find difficulty in understanding the Liberal party—or the remains of the Liberal party—offering opposition to public ownership in view of the position which the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, practically the creator of the party, took on this very question. It must be a compelling spectacle to the interested historian and to every reflective citizen to see the descendants of the old Conservative guard allied with the progressive elements of the old Liberal party in carrying out the most progressive legislation which this country has ever witnessed, whilst the apparently all too willing, even if unconscious, remnants of the once proud and virile party created by Brown and MacKenzie appear in this House as the agents or servants of arrogant and malign interests to try to block this important legislation.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I do not very often trouble the House with speeches. During the whole time that I have been a member of the House I believe that I have made only two speeches, one on the naval question and one on military matters. I feel, however, that it is necessary for me to give the reasons why I am opposed to this Bill.

My first reason is that I am and have been for a great number of years opposed to Government ownership and operation of railroads. My second reason is that the present financial condition of the country should prevent our entering upon such an enormous expenditure as would be involved in the taking over of the Grand Trunk system.

As I understand the Bill, we are first to pay interest at the rate of 4 per cent on the debentures, £31,000,000, and of the stock £12,500,000, equal to about $222,120,000. The interest on that amount would be about $8,885,200 per annum. Then, there is to be left to arbitration the question of the amount we are to pay in respect to the first, second and third preferred stock as well as the value of the common stock. The nominal value of these stocks is £37,073,492, or $179,820,000. When the arbitrators make their award as to the value of this stock we are then to issue new stock payable in thirty years at par, and on that new stock we are to pay interest at the rate of four per cent.

Provision is made for the method of selection of two arbitrators; and it is further stated how the third arbitrator is to be selected.

I am afraid that the award of this Board of Arbitration will be a very large sum, because the arbitrators will take into consideration not merely the value of this stock to-day or before the war, but also what is called the prospective value or what the shareholders might have earned out of the road had it remained in their possession. All lawyers know that the matter of prospective value is an uncertain quantity. Take, for example, the Canadian Northern. Everybody admitted that the stock was worthless. We took over the road, after putting into it the enormous sums of money that we did; but we did not take possession as mortgagee. The matter of the value of the stock was left to arbitration. We were told that the stock was worthless; that the arbiration was a mere matter of form, and that the value arrived at would probably be merely a nominal sum. But because they took into consideration the very thing that I have mentioned, the arbitrators placed the value of the stock at over $10,000,000.

If fifty cents on the dollar is awarded in respect of the preferred stock of the Grand Trunk, that will be equal to $32,795,000. If they determine upon twenty-five cents on the dollar as the value of the common stock, that will be equal to $30,000,000, a total of $62,795,000, on which we shall pay interest at four per cent. Of course, it is easy to say that the award of the Board of Arbitrators will not be so large, but I venture to say that it will be largely in excess of the amounts which I have mentioned. When the value of anything is left to arbitration, in respect to railways or anything else, the arbitrators take into consideration more than the mere selling value of the article or what price it would get if it were put up at auction. So many considerations are taken into account by the arbitrators that in some cases the award is more than any one had thought it would be.

I am arguing now on the ground that the present financial condition of the country will not permit our entering into this purchase. Besides the stock of the Canadian Northern in respect of which the award of the arbitrators was $10,000,000, there was a bonded debt of $327,000,000, and other liabilities brought the amount up to $437,312,747 That is an obligation upon this country incurred by taking over a road that we now know was bankrupt—a road to which we loaned money again and again to help it along; a road that hon. members on your right, Mr. Speaker, say should never have been built. We have taken over that bankrupt concern, and we are now obliged to run it.

If the statements of hon. gentlemen are correct that the Grand Trunk Pacific was not required in the West, and that the Canadian Northern was not required, we might fairly ask: Now that we have both the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern, why should we operate both? It might well be argued that we should operate only one of them, and in so doing we would come right within the lines of the Drayton-Acworth report.

On October 16 the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier)—Hansard, page 1145—gave a detailed statement of the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. This statement must have been very carefully prepared; a great deal of time and attention must have been given to its compilation. In that statement the hon. member gives a detailed list of the bonded obligations and other liabilities for rental and so on in respect of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the other companies that are associated with it.

The hon. gentleman is the only hon. member who has taken the trouble to prepare in detail such an important statement. Since that statement was made I watched carefully to see whether the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) or the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) would dispute it, and whether any denial of the correctness of the figures and of that detailed statement would be made. As neither the statement nor the correctness of the figures has been disputed, I suppose I can confidently rely upon that statement being correct in every particular. If we add up the figures, without going into the details, we find that the bonded and other indebtedness of the Grand Trunk railway will mean a capital obligation of about $400,000,000 and annual charges of $20,000,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: I might say to the hon. member that I intend answering that statement as soon as I have an opportunity, but the statement is not correct.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: In what particular is it not correct?

Mr. J. D. REID: As to the annual charges of $20,000,000 that it is claimed the Government will be liable for.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: Is the statement in detail of the different companies, the bonded indebtedness and the rental to be paid, correct?

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not agree with the statement at all.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: I would like to ask the Minister of Railways to point out in that statement one detail that is not correct.

Mr. J. D. REID: I will give the matter in detail when I address the House, or if the hon. member has any particular point on which he wishes information now, I shall be glad to furnish it.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: Supposing I read to the Minister of Railways these particular items; or still better, the Minister of Railways, I am sure, is willing to give us all the information possible; I am sure he is very anxious that we shall have correct information, and I am sure he will during recess look carefully over the statement to which I refer—that will take him only a few minutes—and point out to me before I go on wherein that statement is not correct and wherein the figures made up from the statement are in error, because that will be a fair thing to do, as I am relying on the correctness of this statement which was made a number of days ago by an hon. member and to the correctness of which no objection was taken.

Mr. J. D. REID: Who made the statement?

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier). It will be found on Hansard, page 1145, of October 16. I should be glad if the minister would during recess look carefully over this statement, so that he will be able, when the House resumes after recess, to tell me wherein there is any error in the statement, in the amounts, or in the total figures, and I can then continue my speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will hardly desire the Minister of Railways to make what will be in effect a reply before the hon. member continues his speech. It is somewhat unusual for an hon. member who has the floor to interrogate either a minister or other hon. member in his seat. The Minister of Railways says that he is going to make a speech during the course of the debate, as he is entitled to do under the rules. It would be better that the rules of the House should be adhered to.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN (resuming): I stated before the House rose at six o'clock that the capital obligations were about $400,000,000, and annual interest charges about $20,000,000. As those amounts were called in question I gave the sources of my information, and I will now give the items making these figures:

1. Grand Trunk railway perpetual debentures, five per cent..	$ 21,351,875
2. Grand Trunk railway perpetual consolidated debentures, four per cent..	123,122,275

An additional amount has been pledged for security, and I will give that later on:

3. Grand Trunk, second equipment, six per cent..	$ 1,865,000
4. Great Western perpetual debentures, five per cent.. ..	13,615,400
5. Northern Railway of Canada, 3rd preferred debentures, six per cent..	72,500,000
6. Northern Railway of Canada, perpetual debentures, four per cent..	1,541,075
7. Canada Atlantic , first mortgage, four per cent..	16,438,450
8. Grand Trunk railway equipments, four and a half per cent, Series A.. .. $2,167,000 Series B.. .. 2,016,000 Series C.. .. 1,572,000
Total for the Grand Trunk railway equipment, four and a half per cent..	5,755,000
9. Grand Trunk railway five and a half per cent secured notes unmatured..	12,050,000
10. Wellington, Grey and Bruce bonds..	312,000
There are also the following issues:
11. Matured bonds not presented for payment..	3,500,000
12. Collateral Car Trust, five per cent, due Whipple Car Co., guaranteed by Grand Trunk railway..	225,000
13. New England Elevator Company, first mortgage, 3½ per cent, guaranteed by Grand Trunk..	$ 250,000
14. Montreal Warehouse first mortgage, four per cent guaranteed by Grand Trunk railway	1,000,000
Total..	$208,312,875

This is exclusive of the Grand Trunk Pacific securities which are $97,301,252. If we add these two together we get a total of $305,614,127 as the amount of the Grand Trunk Railway Company's bonded obligations for its own system and the Grand Trunk Pacific. Now for the annual capital charges:

1. For the Grand Trunk perpetual debentures 5%..	$1,067,594
2. For the Grand Trunk perpetual consolidated debentures 4%.. ..	4,924,891
3. Grand Trunk second annual equipment bonds 6%..	111,870
4. Great Western perpetual debentures 5%..	680,770
5. Northern Railway of Canada 3rd preferred debentures 6%.. ..	4,350
6. Northern Railway of Canada perpetual debentures 4%..	61,643
7. Canada Atlantic First Mortgage 4%..	657,538
8. Grand Trunk equipment bonds 4½%..	258,975
9. Grand Trunk railway secured notes unmatured 5½%..	687,500
10. Wellington, Gray and Bruce bonds..	12,855

The interest on these bonds varies; but I am giving the interest paid in 1917 as contained in the report of the Grand Trunk Railway Company for that year at page 10. To continue:

11. On matured bonds. (There is no interest paid on them.)
12. Collateral car trust 5%..	$ 11,250
13. New England Elevator Co., First Mortgage 4%..	40,000
14. Montreal Warehouse First Mortgage 4%..	500,513

The above figures are taken from the Grand Trunk Annual Report for 1917, page 11. This makes in all a total of $9,029,184, to which we must add:

(a) Rental due for leased lines (Annual Report of the Grand Trunk Railway Company for 1917, page 32)..	$ 776,030
(b) Interest on $15,000,000 First Mortgage 4%..	600,000
(c) Interest on Grand Trunk Pacific bonds guaranteed by the Grand Trunk railway as follows:—
1. 4% Series A Second Mortgage Bonds, due 1955..	408,240
4% Series B Second Mortgage Bonds, due 1955..	398,520
2. Dominion Government Loans 1909-1913 at 4%..	1,000,000
3. 5% Secured notes..	486,000

4. 4% Perpetual debenture stock ($34,874,252.86) Interest charges	$ 1,395,170
5. 4% Lake Superior Branch bonds interest	301,320
Total	$14,394,404

The above is taken from Moodie's Analysis of Steam Railroad Investments, 1917, page 243. This amount of $14,394,404 of annual interest and rental charges is not all. The Grand Trunk has guaranteed interest upon Central Vermont Railway First Mortgage 4 per cent Bonds ($10,732,000 outstanding) to an amount not to exceed 30 per cent of the gross earnings from the interchange of traffic between the two railroads. These figures are taken from Moodie's Analysis of Steam Railroad Investments, 1917, page 48. Then, there are dividends upon £12,500,000 guaranteed stock, which at the rate of 4 per cent will net $2,000,000. These figures are taken from the Grand Trunk Railway Company's report, 1917, page 27. Adding this to the foregoing figures, $14,394,404, we get $16,894,404 as the annual fixed charges to be met by the Grand Trunk Railway, exclusive of the guarantee to the Central Vermont railway and the dividends to be paid upon the three classes of preferred stock.

If the Government acquires the Grand Trunk and assumes the annual charges the obligation would be increased up to $20,000,000 at least. I have given these figures to back up the statement I made that the capital obligations of the Grand Trunk would be about $400,000,000 and the annual interest charges $20,000,000.

Now as to the Grand Trunk Pacific. On March 17 the Minister of Railways was appointed receiver for the road. As I understand it, when an officer of the court is appointed receiver for a railroad or any other company he is given power to issue what are called receiver's certificates, which, by order of the court, rank above all other obligations of the company and are therefore a first lien on the income and assets of the company.

Therefore, any amounts advanced by the Government to the receiver, or through the receiver, for the running of the road, under the court's direction, would have to be paid before all other charges. In other words, with the assets of the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Government would not risk any expenditure or payment they might make to the receiver. The Government's capital obligation on account of the Grand Trunk Pacific will be increased by $300,000,000 and the expense will be increased by about $8,000,000 yearly. I would call the attention of the House to the statement which is contained in Hansard at pages 1148-49. If this statement is not correct it can be corrected by the Minister of Railways when he makes his address to the House on this Bill and I would be very glad if he would correct me. I would like to have correct information as to the capital obligation and the annual charges. It is difficult for a man who is not an accountant to gather from this mass of figures a clear and concise statement. What I gather from it, however, leads me to the conclusion that the statement which I have made is correct. The Minister of Railways and the officials that he has will be able to put the correct figures on record as to the exact amount that will be due. In addition to this, there are the deficits of the Canadian National railways. The Minister of Railways made a statement yesterday to be found at page 1253 of Hansard, in which he gave these deficits as follows:

Canadian Northern $16,831,862, Grand Trunk Pacific $10,263,281, Transcontinental $2,615,974, Intercolonial $1,801,163, or a total of $31,512,280.

That shows the deficits on the railways for last year and it is a very large sum of money, approximating $32,000,000, which will have to be provided for.

I want to draw the attention of the House to another matter in connection with the Grand Trunk to which I think other hon. members have referred. I see that the Minister of Railways states now that the Grand Trunk officials say that the statement to which I propose to refer is not correct. We would be very glad to have the minister make the proper correction of the statement which I shall refer to and which is taken from the Drayton-Acworth report at page xxxiv and which is given in the report as being absolutely correct. What the commissioners say in the report is this:

Requirements for rolling stock, shops and machinery	$26,150,000
Requirements for automatic block signals (main line in Canada only)	3,533,000
Requirement for installing rock ballast crushing plant	467,500
Total	$30,150,500

Putting together revenue and capital expenditure, we find that the Grand Tunk Railway, in the opinion of its own officers, requires over $51,000,000 spent upon it to put it in a position to meet the requirements of its to-day's business. We see no reason to expect that under existing conditions this necessary money will be provided.

It seems to me that every one who knows Sir Henry Drayton, who made this report, knows what a careful man he is in making statements, knows also the advantages that he has had from having presided over the Board of Railway Commissioners, and when he and Mr. Acworth, the great English authority who was associated with him, made that statement, we have a right to assume it is correct.

I wish now to draw the attention of hon. members to a statement made by Mr. A. H. Smith, President of the New York Central Railway Company and Chairman of this Royal Commission. He stated, concerning what we call the Drayton-Acworth report, that the plan proposed by Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth of taking over the railway would add about $1,000,000,000 to the debt of Canada. The interest on this, he says, would be about $40,000,000. He also points out that the fundamental defect of their plan is in placing the Government in the railroad business in which they would be operating railways not only in Canada but in the United States where they would be subject to both Federal and State regulations. That will be found at page ci. Mr. Smith as we know is a man of great experience. He is the head of one of the greatest railway systems of the United States. He and Sir Henry Drayton went over every part of this system and made a careful personal examination. Mr. Acworth came later and did not go over the system.

There you have the opinion of a railway expert with a thorough knowledge of United States conditions, and in his opinion the amount required would be $1,000,000,000. He further points out the fundamental defect of a plan under which the Government of Canada would endeavour to operate a system of railways with such a large mileage in the United States where they would be subject to Federal and State legislation. Mr. Smith proposes, at page cii, a plan or scheme by which this operation could be carried on. As I remember it, without troubling the House by reading the report, briefly it was that the Government should get the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk Pacific in the West, that they should make a traffic arrangement with the Grand Trunk in the East and that with the Grand Trunk they should operate these systems. Then we have an alternative plan proposed at page civ. It is to form a private company and to give the company an operating lease to induce private enterprise to undertake the management with a profit sharing plan which would give the public a share in the profits. You will of course understand that Mr. Smith was against government ownership. His alternative scheme was to get a private company to take over the properties. They would be under the control and subject to the regulations and orders of the Railway Commission; they would be induced, of course, by the agreement that would be made, to embark capital in this enterprise, and any profits made would be shared with the Government. That seemed to me to be a practical scheme, a good scheme, and one that I think it would have been wise for Canada to adopt —it would have been wise for this country to take Mr. Smith's advice on that point.

I will not detain the House with any further figures in connection with these enormous obligations, and interest obligations, that we will have to assume on taking over this road. The figures are so big that a person can hardly grasp them. We are accustomed now to speaking about millions, and then we get up to billions, and we toss these figures about as if they were merely dollars. Really, Mr. Speaker, it is difficult for a man to grasp or to take account of the enormous sums of money which we have expended, and which we will have to raise in the future to meet further obligations.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: If we are committed to these great expenditures what do we get in return therefor?

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: We get the Grand Trunk Pacific which is bankrupt, and the Canadian Northern which is in the same position. We also get the Grand Trunk which, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) told us this afternoon is also about bankrupt.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Do we get no income?

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: According to the Drayton-Acworth report the Grand Trunk paid dividends—a great many million dollars, I forget the exact amount—which they should not have paid, which money should have been put into the road. That means that for a great number of years past the Grand Trunk Railway Company have practically been bankrupt. If that company is not bankrupt, if they can go on as they have been going on without assistance or help, what is the necessity for our stepping in and grabbing that road from the shareholders—paying them back part of their stock investments and carrying on the railway as a government concern? Further than that, we know that the reason the Canadian Northern was not successful was its unlawful ambition, so to speak, to parallel other lines of railway in order to get a terminus on the Pacific coast. And it is the same with the Grand Trunk Pacific; they have made enormous expenditures in order to be able to say that they went to the Pacific coast. That is also the reason why we are assuming these great obligations at the present time—simply to say that we have got a road from the Atlantic to the Pacific owned by the Government of Canada. I will speak a little later as regards one aspect of the case, the Grand Trunk terminus at Portland, Maine, but now let me resume where I left off when my hon. friend (Mr. W. F. Maclean) interrupted me to ask a question.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I did not intend to interrupt the hon. gentleman.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: Very well, go on and ask your question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: What I am endeavouring to show now is Canada's financial position—the position in which we stand at the present time. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, and I want to satisfy the House, that our financial position is not such as will permit us at the present time to undertake these great obligations. For the purpose of illustrating my point, let me endeavour to strike a trial balance. Canada started business in 1867 with a gross debt of ninety-three millions and an interest liability of $4,500,000. In 1914 our debt had grown to $544,000,000; and our present debt, I believe, to be about $2,000,000,000 in round figures. There is another matter we require to look at. We have become a borrowing country. Canada must borrow money, enormous sums of money, to carry on. We have already borrowed great amounts, but we have to borrow more. We shall have to negotiate another loan after the present one —perhaps one or two more after that.

What is our financial position? Besides the great debt of about $2,000,000,000 that we owe at the present time our various provinces owe very large sums of money. I have here a statement showing the indebtedness of all the different provinces, and without giving the details I may state that the gross amount is $264,706,000. And you must remember that some of these are short-term obligations. You must likewise bear in mind that the provinces must also go into the market to borrow money. You must further recollect that we have got to raise in Canada the money that requires to be borrowed now, because we have been told by the late Minister of Finance that we practically cannot borrow it outside; the only amount that we could borrow in the United States would be about $75,000,000, and on the last loan of that amount we had to pay a very stiff rate of interest. We cannot assume that we can borrow in the United States more than $100,000,000, therefore, we must take a survey of the financial position of this Dominion and the financial position of the several provinces. Let me go a step further and give you a statement of the municipal indebtedness, because that is a matter that must be taken into consideration. You have to go to our great cities and to our prosperous counties in order to get money from our own people. The municipalities will have to borrow money in the future; they have to pay interest on the money they have already borrowed; and they must renew these loans, which means more money to be borrowed. It is difficult to arrive at the municipal indebtedness, but I find that taking 62 cities and towns in Canada the total bonded indebtedness amounts to $456,000,000. The population of these cities and towns amounts to 2,598,000, making an indebtedness per head of $210.17. Now if these cities and towns are fairly representative of the whole of Canada, the latter figure would yield a key to the situation. The total population of Canada residing in urban communities of over 500 inhabitants is 3,281,000, and therefore the total municipal indebtedness for the Dominion, based on the figures I have already given, $210.17 per head, would amount to $689,500,000. That, of course, is an estimate. If any gentleman would like to have my authority for these figures I shall be very glad to furnish it, but I am quite positive the statement is absolutely correct. Now then, let us sum up: Canada's net debt at the present time is about two billions. The debts of the provinces amount to $264,500,000; and the municipal indebtedness $689,500,000; or a total for Canada of $2,954,000,000, almost $3,000,000,000.

But in addition to this we have to look after our other liabilities. Here is a statement made by Mr. Fred. Field of the Monetary Times, in regard to our external liabilities:

British capital invested in Canada $1,878,900,000; United States capital invested in Canada $1,272,850,000; estimated Canadian flotations in London upon to 1918, over $937,000,000; or total liabilities of about $4,089,750,000.

Then there is our indebtedness to investors in France and Holland, which he estimates at about $5,000,000. These figures, of course, it may be said, have no bearing on the matter. But they have this bearing, and a very important one, too, that financial people when lending money to a country naturally want to know what are the liabilities of that country, and they would look not only at our national, but also at our provincial and municipal debts, because they know that in order to redeem these loans we have to go to our own people to raise the money.

In his Budget speech of June last Sir Thomas White gave us the financial condition of the Dominion. He stated:

> This is a war year and it was necessary also to add the estimated expenditure which has been and will be incurred on account of demobilization. This will aggregate the large sum of $300,000,000, including $92,000,000 for war gratuity. The entire estimated expenditure, therefore, of the year on ordinary account, capital account and for demobilization will reach the large total of $620,000,000.

And he gives the items making up our revenue for the year, which he fixes at $280,000,000. Then he proceeds:

> While from the statement which I have just made it will appear from our total estimated expenditure, ordinary and capital accounts, and for demobilization, will amount to $620,000,000, our estimated revenue on the present basis will reach only $280,000,000. Putting it another way, our revenue would enable us to pay only our ordinary expenditure and leave a small amount to be applied to other purposes.

Sir Thomas White also stated that:

> This year the Dominion Government must find not only its ordinary expenditure of $270,000,000, for which its revenue will barely suffice (in fact I doubt if it will meet the ordinary expenditure) but also the capital expenditure of $50,000,000. In addition to that, large expenditures in government railway systems, ship building programme and expensive credits which we have been obliged to give to Great Britain and other countries. The amounts involved are exceedingly large. Outside of England, about $106,000,000 of credits have been issued, viz.: to Belgium France, Italy, Roumania and Greece.

Then he takes up the question of how we are to raise this money. He stated that our ordinary revenue is not quite sufficient to meet our ordinary expenditure. As to additional revenue from taxation, he states that the main source of our revenue is our customs, our inland revenue, our income tax and our business profits war tax. As regards our income tax, in his opinion, it cannot be made any higher. It is now as high as the United States' income tax. Then he points out the fact that as regards income tax there is a provincial income tax in some of the provinces, a municipal income tax, and the federal income tax, and he gives as an example the province of British Columbia, where they have three sets of taxes imposed on income; and in Nova Scotia they have two. He also stated that our business profits war tax would be renewed. In view of the circumstances Sir Thomas White said he did not see any escape from our floating another loan. Out of the loan we were then making, he stated, $300,000,000 was due to the banks, and that they might agree to $72,000,000 of that amount standing over for another year, but that that would mean we would have to make another loan at least next fall.

If we are taxed to the limit now, what is left to us? Mr. R. W. Breadner, Commissioner of Taxation, and Sir Thomas White are of the opinion that practically the only further tax that can be levied is a tax upon land—and the farmers of this country may as well know the position we are coming to. Such a tax will mean that every farm will have to pay taxation according to a valuation. As pointed out by Mr. Breadner, it is a difficult tax to collect, because it requires such a large number of people to make the valuation and collection. I have here also the statement of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) with regard to the financial condition of the country, but I shall not read it; it is in line with that which was made by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White).

Now, to sum up, this is the way the case presents itself to me. We have great resources, and in order to develop those resources, we want capital. If we impose taxes which are too severe we shall prevent the investment here of the capital which is necessary to the development of our resources. Moreover, we have to raise large sums of money by way of loans, without taking into consideration at all any liability imposed upon us in respect to the Grand Trunk. There may be another large loan next year; shall we be able to raise that money in Canada? In view of these circumstances, this country ought to go slowly; in the words of the railway watchword, we must "stop, look, listen." There is no necessity for our rushing in and taking over the Grand Trunk at this time. The bugaboo is put before us that if we do not take it over the Canadian Pacific will take it. But in order to take over the Grand Trunk the Canadian Pacific must come to this Parliament for the necessary legislative authority, and in that legislative authority we can impose whatever restrictions we think proper. But it is idle to think that the matter will be considered at all by the Canadian Pacific at this time. Besides, look at the obligations of the Grand Trunk in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Do you think that any private company would take over the Grand Trunk with all those enormous obligations standing against it? The Government, as mortgagee, have the most absolute control over the Grand Trunk. They need not take it over; they can take it over two or three years hence just as well as they can do it now, and in the meantime they can go ahead and attend to the business that is in hand—that of developing and managing the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific, the latter being in the hands of the Government as receiver.

The Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) says that the management of this road, should it be taken over, will be kept entirely out of politics; that no political influence will be exerted in connection with it in any shape or form. Well, who appoints the manager and directors? The Governor in Council. Who fixes their salaries? The Governor in Council, I suppose. Who has to supply the money for the deficits? The country, through the Government; we must supply the money. Do you mean to say that the Government are not going to exercise any control over the expenditure or the management of that road? If the Government wanted anything done, would the manager dare to refuse to carry out instructions? That reminds me of an old story. Commodore Vanderbilt had bought some new cars for the New York Central. He called in his head painter and said: "Now, Tom, you are absolute in your own department; I would not think of interfering in any way. I want these cars painted; I don't care a darn what colour you paint them as long as you paint them red." It will be something the same with the instructions that will go out from the minister to the manager of the Government railway system: "You can do as you please—if you do so-and-so and so-and-so."

I may add that throughout the country a spirit of distrust prevails with respect to the management of the Government railway system. I have nothing to say against Mr. Hanna, the general manager; he seems to be a very capable man. But for years he acted for the Canadian Northern as the servant of Mackenzie and Mann, and naturally one would think that Sir William Mackenzie could exercise a great deal of influence over our general manager if he wanted to. Mr. Hanna and Mr. Mitchell will be practically in control of our great railway system. Of course, if they do not carry out their work efficiently the Government can, and probably will, make a change. But it is a fact that the country has not absolute confidence in the men who are managing our national railways, and this attitude is due to the manner in which these men were educated in railway work by Mackenzie and Mann and to the fact that certain men interested in railway matters are now their bosom friends. To these men they would naturally go for advice, and as I say these men could, if they wished, exercise some influence over them.

My other objection to the taking over of this road is based on my opposition to government ownership. For many years I have been opposed to public ownership. In 1891 when my partner and I bought the Daily Telegraph we published a number of articles against government ownership. In 1903-04 when the matter of the Grand Trunk Pacific was put before the country I came out on the hustings against government ownership and in favour of private control. I believe in government control through the Railway Commission, and if that body did not have sufficient powers, I was in favour of giving full and ample power to them. I have always been strong and consistent in my opposition to government ownership.

Just in that connection, some one said to me during the recess for dinner: "It is all very well for you to oppose this thing; you are solicitor for the Canadian Pacific." Well, I am like a great many other professional gentlemen in this House who have taken retainers from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I am glad to say that never at any time during which I have acted for the Canadian Pacific have they attempted in any way to influence my action on the occasion of an election. I will give you an example. On the occasion of the reciprocity campaign I was a candidate. I had then some heavy retainers from the Canadian Pacific in connection with large matters of business. Sir William Van Horne came to my county and spoke against me. But he did not attempt to influence me, and his attitude made no difference whatever so far as their having further dealings with me was concerned. Hon. members know whether the Canadian Pacific have been sympathetic with the Liberals or with the Conservatives during the last number of years. Until the last election I had been a strong, fighting Liberal, but during all the time that I was active and aggressive as a Liberal the Canadian Pacific Railway Company did not attempt to influence my vote in any way or to do anything which would affect my position in politics.

I do not believe that the Canadian Pacific would in any way interfere with the solicitors who act in their interests. There are hon. members sitting on your right, Sir, who can back me up in that statement. From time to time, statements have been made that the Canadian Pacific conducts lobbies. I am not in the secrets of the Canadian Pacific, but I do not know personally of any such lobby having been conducted in this House, and I think I can fairly make the statement that no hon. member can say that he has ever been approached by any Canadian Pacific official endeavouring to influence him in this matter. As regards public ownership, the Canadian Pacific may have a different opinion from the one I hold; I do not think they hold such strong views in the matter as I do. For example, this is a statement given out to the press a short time ago by Mr. Beatty, President of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company:

> The desire of every one is that Canada to-day should have a railway system, or systems, so administered that the best service to the public will be obtained at the lowest rates consistent with fair wages, both for labour and capital. I say fair wages because without them efficiency, loyalty and enterprise cannot be obtained, and without these things the quality of work which ensures efficient operation and low rates cannot be secured.

I am sure that every one will agree with that statement.

> The question therefore is: Will government ownership bring about this result? the question sounds simple but is in reality complex. Theoretically much may be said in favour of government ownership. Will those theories stand the test of practice? If those theories prove a failure initially but correct themselves, in course of time, as their exponents may urge, how long a time can the Canadian people afford to pay the losses on a demoralised railway service?

That seems a fair and common sense statement. He does not come out in favour of government ownership, but he says: There is what is required; will government ownership bring about this result? If it does not, it means on the other hand that the service will be demoralized. Then he says:

> Do they wish to launch out on the experiment now, or wait until our near neighbours, the United States, have worked out their experiment a little more satisfactorily? The cost of our own experiment could not fail to be great, a cost certain to be collected, directly or indirectly, from the pockets of the Canadian people. Railway men have an admirable slogan which I feel inclined to commend to the attention of the people of Canada at this moment, namely, "Stop, look, listen."

That seems to be a fair, strong and able statement. Mr. Beatty goes on to give his own views:

> I have my own views on public ownership of railways, but they are not unalterable. I am undoubtedly prejudiced by association with one company. That company has slowly developed to a point of efficiency and successful operation. Looking back over that history one is amazed at the importance of the part played by men whose enterprise, resourcefulness and tenacity of purpose could not, I think, have been stimulated and given rein in any civil service. It has taken more than thirty odd years to make the Canadian Pacific railway as efficient as it is to-day. It was not easy. The consciousness that it is so easily shattered is largely responsible for the constant and intense ambition on the part of officers and men to maintain, and even improve on, the tradition.
> This much may, it seems to me, be said with confidence now, namely, that we do not know enough that is encouraging about government operation of large railway systems to justify any further excursions into that field at this time.

This man of great experience, head of one of the great railway systems, without giving a statement in favour of government ownership, but stating the facts as he has done fairly and fully, says that we do not know enough yet about the operation of large railway systems to justify any further excursions into that field now, that is, the field of government ownership.

> To argue from the experience of old countries where civil service obtains a much better share of the ambitious young men than in Canada, or to argue from the alleged success of comparatively local affairs, or government organizations dominated by exceptional personalities, is unfair—not to the railways, but to the country which has so much at stake in this issue. We can well afford to wait, to study dispassionately our own situation, and the experiment of the United States, before committing our country to serious changes in policy. The solution finally adopted in the United States will be of inestimable value to Canada, meantime too, the experience which Canada will now have of the present newly organized government system will demonstrate many things. It will indicate very largely the general nature of the results we may hope to secure from an extension of the system. . . .

I invite hon. members to consider carefully this statement made by the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I would like to ask the hon. and gallant member whether Mr. Beatty of the Canadian Pacific is or is not disposed to give more for the Grand Trunk than the Canadian Government is now willing to give for it?

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: The hon. gentleman had better go and ask him.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have a great respect for my hon. friend's judgment, and I would, therefore, like to ask him a question. Assuming that the Grand Trunk is unable to carry on without further assistance from this Government, and the other fact that this Government owns and controls the Intercolonial, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental, what alternative would the hon. member suggest to the Government's proposition?

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: It would be very difficult for me, with no knowledge of railway operations, with the very limited experience that I have had, to outline, just on the call of the minute, a general scheme for the management of a great railway system. That is for the Government themselves to consider, but I brought before the House the opinion of the President of the New York Central, the Chairman of this Railway Commission, a man of vast experience and knowledge, and he condemns utterly government operation of Canadian railway systems for the reasons that he gives in his report, and he proposes a private company to be formed under such restrictions and in such a manner as will safeguard the interest of the country and ensure such efficient operation as will induce capital to go into that company. You would have all the safeguards of a Railway Commission and other safeguards surrounding it and, as he says, the profits are to be divided. Thus we would have private operation, private ambition, and the country would get the service and would have the profits divided. That is one proposal made by Mr. Smith.

9 p.m.

I am very glad to say that I shall be through very soon. When I got up to make an address, I thought it would take me only a few minutes. I felt I had to give the reasons why I was voting against the Bill, and I endeavoured to boil down my reasons and make them as short as possible.

To sum up. I am against Government ownership. I have been for a number of years in favour of private ownership and Government control. This we have through the Railway Commission. Their control has been efficient and effectual, and their decisions have commanded the respect of all railway men. It is impossible for me in the limited time at my disposal to go fully into the arguments against public ownership. Books and pamphlets by the hundred have been issued on public ownership, pro and con. My principal grounds of objection are: First, the inability of state-owned roads to earn sufficient money to pay interest on the capital invested. Second, the interjection of politics into the service to the detriment of discipline, and at heavy cost to the Government. Third, the failure of the Government to operate the railways strictly as a business proposition. Fourth, the service, both passenger and freight, becomes worse. Fifth, it is a step towards socialism.

I do not want to argue these grounds in detail. As I have said, authorities pro and con have issued pamphlets on the subject by the hundreds. The authorities I have are Mr. Acworth, one of the members of the Drayton-Acworth Commission, who in his book makes a strong statement against Government ownership, and Palgrave, the great authority on political economy, who also makes a strong statement against it. I will not take up the time of the House to read extracts, but will only say that these are two great authorities. Of course, I know authorities sometimes differ, just as in law cases; one side will bring forward what seems conclusive authority, to be followed by equally conclusive authority from the other side, and it is for the judge to decide. In this case it is for the House of Commons to decide, and on their decision we must rely.

The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) said this afternoon that the operation of railways in Great Britain under Government ownership had been a great success. My hon. friend must have been misinformed. I have a statement here showing that the railways of Great Britain before being taken over by the Government were on a 4 per cent earning basis, and the Government guaranteed these earnings when they took over the roads. Under Government management the estimated annual deficit is about $440,000,000, or as Sir Eric Geddes said, about $1,250,000 a day. The British Government must continue to operate these railways for two years more and pay rental to the owners. In the United States the roads were taken over by the Government after the war had been on for a long time, during which time all the great trunk systems there had been showing a fair profit. When the Government took over the roads they guaranteed to the shareholders the average net earnings for the three years prior to the war, and if no profit was made the shareholders received no dividends. What was the result? Mr. A. B. Cummings, Chairman of the Committee of Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate, on August 5, 1919, said (page 3870, Congressional Record):

> We lost 240 million last year, and we lost in the four or five months of this year 260 million; and we are now losing at the rate of 39 million per month.

That has been the experience of Great Britain and the United States. True it may be said that these are war times, when the cost of labour and materials is abnormally high. Then why does not the Government stop, look, and listen, and wait for two or three years until conditions become more normal? Why rush in at this time and incur the enormous charges that will have to be borne?

Now let us see what has been done under private ownership. The Canadian Pacific railway under private ownership and private control has also had to pass through the war period, and was subject to the same conditions in regard to high cost of material and everything else as the government-controlled roads, but the Canadian Pacific has been able to pay full dividends to their shareholders and put by a handsome surplus, besides contributing large sums for war purposes. They were able to assist Great Britain's financing in the United States by putting up their valuable securities. Contrast that with the results obtained under Government ownership.

I regret I have taken up so much time. Not being a speaker, I thought it would not take long to make my statement, but it takes a very much longer time than an inexperienced speaker would expect. I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Railways to a matter in which the people of St. John are vitally interested. The St. John Board of Trade a few days ago passed the following resolution:

> Resolved, that this council views with grave apprehension the acquirement by the Government of Canada of the Grand Trunk Railway, including that feature which would involve the owning and operating of a railway in a foreign country, and in the absence of fuller information would oppose the plan. The council would, however, welcome any person that the Government might feel disposed to depute to explain to the board the advantages to the country of the action proposed, and in the meantime would maintain an open mind on the subject.

The people of St. John are also much concerned over a statement made by the Minister of Railways on October 15, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), as follows:

> Mr. J. H. Sinclair: The policy of the Grand Trunk, as I understand it, has always been to make Portland, Me., the Atlantic terminus for their traffic. What is the view of the Minister of Railways with regard to that? Does he intend to continue that policy?
> Mr. J. D. Reid: So far as I am concerned, as I stated a few minutes ago, when we took over the Grand Trunk Railway system we would have one great national system of railways, and we must get the very best men available to manage this system and they must of course adopt whatever policy they think is best to ensure successful operation. I could not express an opinion on the question put by my hon. friend. The manager to be appointed will be the only person in a position to answer such a question.

The hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough says:

> I presume from his answer that the minister does not intend to continue the policy that the Grand Trunk management has always pursued and maintain Portland the Atlantic terminus.
> Mr. J. D. Reid: I can only say that whatever is the best course in the interests of the railroad will be adopted. I could not give any opinion as to what particular policy will be pursued.

That is a matter which our people in St. John are very much agitated over. They are afraid, as the people of Halifax are, that taking over the Grand Trunk and putting it under a business manager will mean a continuance of the policy adopted by the Grand Trunk. For example, we have in the evidence before the royal commission the following statement made by Mr. Chamberlin, general manager of the Grand Trunk, at page 76 of the report:

> Commissioner Acworth: Therefore if the Grand Trunk, as it does at present, were to send traffic through Portland instead of through Halifax it would be a fraud on the agreement?

He is referring to the Transcontinental railway agreement by which freight originating in Canada had to be shipped through Halifax or St. John.

> Mr. Chamberlin: Yes. We are bound to go on with all that tremendous outlay and to carry that load and yet not get one dollar benefit from it. The Grand Trunk simply cannot carry it.
> Mr. Biggar: It is provided for in the agreement dated the 29th of July, 1903, chapter 71, statutes of Canada, 1903.

Under the agreement freight from points in Canada had to be carried entirely through Canadian ports, and so on. At page 79 Mr. Chamberlin says again:

> How are we to go on carrying the burden if we are forced to carry all that stuff all the way down there at Boston and Portland rates?

All the way down there meaning to St. John and Halifax.

Sir Henry Drayton: Your second point is that of impossibility.

Mr. Chamberlin: It is an impossibility. It was always impossible.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a serious matter to our port at St. John. The port of St. John itself has expended a large sum of money and the Government propose to spend a further large sum of money on that port. At Halifax a large sum has been expended. The distance to Portland is much shorter than the distance to St. John or Halifax. We have the statement made by Mr. Chamberlin that it is impossible, practically and on a paying basis, to carry out that condition of the agreement. When it is put up to the Minister of Railways by the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough, when the minister is asked: " How are you going to carry out that agreement? —the minister answers that it will be left entirely to the manager. We are told that they will get the best man as manager. What will a practical railway manager do? He may be influenced by Mr. Chamberlin's opinion; he may be influenced by the opinion of the traffic men on the Grand Trunk. If he is influenced by their opinion he will use these very valuable terminals at Portland. Instead of shipping the long distance to Halifax and St. John, and being guided by the principle that Canadian freight should be shipped to Canadian ports, he may be influenced by the policy of the Grand Trunk in that respect.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand the hon. gentleman to favour the turning over of all these railways, including the Grand Trunk, to a private company. What does he think the private company would do in relation to these shipments?

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: What did we do when we made the contract with the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific? We put a clause in the agreement and in the statutes and made it the law of the land that all freight received in Canada from Canadians should be shipped through Canadian ports. There is the law, and if you made a binding agreement with a private company you could put that clause in again.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman does not quite state it correctly. Really it was " unless otherwise routed by the shipper." That is very important. That being the law of Canada in relation to the Grand Trunk Railway Company now when the stock is owned by individuals, will it not still be the law of Canada in relation to the same company when the stock is owned by the Government? What is the difference?

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: I do not think it will. Here is a new company. This stock which is being taken over is to be destroyed. The other stock is to be transferred to and acquired by a new company, the Canadian National Railway company. Now it depends on whether all laws that would bind the Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific would bind that new company I do not know about that. It will depend upon what legislation is passed or what agreement may be made because it is very easy to wipe out a clause of that kind and it may be difficult to put such an obligation on the new company. If my hon. friend will undertake as a lawyer to say that St. John and Halifax will be left in the same position, that the law as it now stands will be reenacted and carried out absolutely by the Canadian National railways; in other words that no matter what the manager wants to do freight received in Canada will be shipped through Canada, I will be perfectly satisfied. That is all we want. In view of what the Minister of Railways has said we are beginning to be a little afraid as to what may happen.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to follow the argument of the hon. member from Royal (Mr. McLean) at any great length, but I would direct the attention of the House to the fact that he has just now stated that he is opposed to Government ownership. He has been opposed to Government ownership since 1891. He was opposed to it in 1903 and 1904, and he assisted the Government of that day in bringing about the legislation whereby the Grand Trunk Pacific was brought into being, which is now saddled on this Government and upon the bonds of which they are now compelled to pay the interest. The hon. gentleman was a supporter of the Government that carried out that proposition.

He talks about the financial affairs of this country. Had it not been for the enormous sums of money that were spent on the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental, it would be an easy matter for us to finance the affairs of Canada at the present time. The hon. member for Royal calls attention to the fact that the Grand Trunk agreement of 1904 had a clause in it by which the company were compelled to route certain freight to St. John and Halifax. If the shipper in Canada wished to have his freight routed to St. John and Halifax they were compelled to ship it that way. But there was no other arrangement whereby they were compelled to ship it in that way if not so directed by the shipper.

He calls attention to the fact that the Government of this country are likely to ship a great deal of freight to Portland. Let me inform him that the Grand Trunk Railway Company, with their double track from Niagara Falls to Chicago, handle on that line enormous quantities of freight gathered in the latter city, brought on through Toronto down to Montreal and shipped to Portland. Why? Because the shipper in the United States definitely and distinctly asks that these goods be shipped through Canada to Portland. The Grand Trunk Railway Company have been able to acquire hundreds of thousands of dollars every year on the freight that is shipped in that way, and it would be folly for this Government, or any other body of men who might take over this railway, to attempt to say to the people of the United States: "We will not carry your freight through Canada and on to Portland for shipment to Europe." Let me tell the hon. gentleman—and I feel confident the Minister of Railways will concur in the statement—that it is not the intention of the Government to ship any freight by way of Portland, unless a shipper in Canada asks that it shall be so shipped, and I will give him the reason for this statement. The hon. gentleman knows full well that within the last year we have undertaken a shipping policy, we have undertaken to construct fifty-two vessels in Canada. To what use are these vessels to be put? They are to be placed at our ports, Halifax, St. John, Quebec and Montreal for the purpose of carrying the products of this country to the markets of the world. But does not the hon. gentleman realize that, especially when the winter months come, the Canadian Government will see to it that every pound of freight they can get is shipped over the National railway to the ports of St. John and Halifax? It would be folly to expect that this Government, or any commission appointed by them, would dare to route their freight or passengers, if they possibly could do otherwise, via Portland instead of via St. John, Halifax, and our other ports. The hon. gentleman has not offered any alternative for the proposition which he condemns; he says he has no alternative to propose. In that case, why argue this question? The Government has got to deal with the situation. We cannot possibly wait for one or two years, as the hon. gentleman has suggested. We have a disorganized, disconnected and disjointed government railway system, and the sooner we get that system rounded up, organized and put in proper condition the better it will be for the public. Instead of waiting for months and years we cannot, in my opinion, act too quickly in this matter. I take that position believing and knowing that is is in the best interests of our people to take over the Grand Trunk, round up our great national system, and place it in a position where it will be able to compete with the Canadian Pacific. I have heard men say within the last few days that this bargain is going to interfere with the Government loan which is now being asked for. Some men have even gone so far as to make this statement—I heard of one man that went to another who was likely to subscribe for a bond and said to him: Why the money you are going to put into that bond will be taken and put into this Grand Trunk Railway system. It is not the intention of the Government to use one dollar, that they collect from the people in connection with this loan, or to use it in any way towards the development of this railway system. All the Government are seeking is to have this enabling Act passed whereby they will be able to bring about a definite agreement with the stockholders of the Grand Trunk in England.

Now let us look at another point or two which the hon. gentleman has raised. It is not altogether a question of public ownership. The present legislation is rendered necessary by reason of the failure of private ownership. The hon. gentleman knows right well that in the year 1903-4 the Grand Trunk entered into a definite arrangement to build the Grand Trunk Pacific. It is true that an enormous sum of money has been put into the latter railway and taken from the public treasury for that purpose, and it is also true that the Grand Trunk have advanced a considerable sum towards its construction. But we are to-day in this position: The Grand Trunk threw up their responsibilities as regards the Grand Trunk Pacific and practically forced this Government to take over that portion of their system. Does the hon. gentleman want us simply to take over the Grand Trunk Pacific and not the Grand Trunk? Does he want us to take over the lean end of the proposition, the end that cannot pay for many years to come, and allow the Grand Trunk which is the profitable end, that has always paid the interest on its bonds, to continue in opposition to the government-owned railway? If the hon. gentleman will go to Western Ontario to-day, he will find that freight is being routed by way of Chicago to the western provinces of Canada instead of being routed by North Bay and on through to Winnipeg over the National Transcontinental. Why? Because this Government has been compelled to take over the Grand Trunk Pacific and the thousand miles of line between North Bay and Winnipeg is in the hands of the receiver. The Grand Trunk Railway Company can therefore make more money out of the long haul through Chicago, and over their own line in the United States to Winnipeg, than they would make if they were compelled to bring that freight round by North Bay. But when the Canadian Government system is re-organized and rounded up, you can depend upon it the passengers and freight from the western portion of the province of Ontario will be sent by North Bay, and will help to develop this National Transcontinental system and help to make it a paying proposition. My reason for taking an active interest in this debate is because I feel particularly anxious about the interest of the western Ontario peninsula. If you run a line through the centre of the city of Toronto from lake Ontario north to the Georgian bay, west of that line, there are 1,500,000 Canadians, represented by 45 members in this House, this is the most thickly peopled area in any portion of Canada. More factories are located in this district than in all the rest of Canada put together. This district has an assessed value of $1,100,000,000, yet not one mile of the Canadian Northern, of the Transcontinental, of the Grand Trunk Pacific, of the Intercolonial—not one mile of the government-owned railways to-day enters this great district. These people have as good a right to be served by our national system of railways as the people of any other district. Do you want to build lines to parallel the Grand Trunk and make it worthless? For in that district you find the Grand Trunk running into every city, town and village; their double track running through to Chicago and with connections from Niagara Falls on to New York, a double track runs from the city of London to the city of Windsor; another double track runs from the city of Hamilton to the city of Toronto; you find a single track runs along the northern shore of lake Erie; another single track runs from Toronto through St. Mary's and Stratford to Sarnia, other tracks run north and south. The whole country is served and served well by the Grand Trunk; when that system is connected up with our national railways it will become a mighty power in assisting the management of our national railway system in bringing about a successful operation of all lines.

This system is largely located in western Ontario and in the province of Quebec and in the eastern provinces. The Canadian Northern runs from Quebec to Montreal through our north country to Winnipeg, and there they commence a splendid transportation system of 6,500 miles covering the very best territory in the Northwest. But this end of the line is practically without branches or feeders. The Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental are in worse position, because the Transcontinental starts at Moncton and runs through Quebec and our north country to Winnipeg, where it connects with the Grand Trunk Pacific, running to Edmonton and on to Prince Rupert—one long band of steel practically across the continent, with very few feeders. How can we expect, unless we link up this other system with it, that we can possibly make our national system a paying proposition? Look at the position the Intercolonial railway has been in for many years, coming up from the Atlantic coast to Quebec and Montreal, without a terminal in Montreal and with very few feeders. Even the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) within the last few weeks has been urging the Minister of Railways to build branches in the eastern provinces connecting them with the Intercolonial railway. The Intercolonial railway would be a power in this country to-day if in 1903 and 1904 hon. gentlemen opposite supported the proposition of Government ownership of a railroad connecting with the Intercolonial and running through to the West. We would then have had a railway system that would have been a paying proposition, instead of this enormous debt which we have to-day.

The leader of the Opposition says: "You already have 14,000 miles of Government owned railways, why do you not experiment with that system?" I have tried to show, Mr. Speaker, how impossible it is to go on with this disorganized and disconnected system without the Grand Trunk to back it up. The Canadian Pacific has a splendid organization in the eastern provinces; in the West there is a well rounded out system, thoroughly organized. We are all glad and proud to know that it is so successful, but we also must realize and appreciate this fact, that in the early days enormous sums of money and extensive land grants were made in order to place the Canadian Pacific railway upon a safe and sound footing.

Hon. members argue that the Grand Trunk should not be responsible for the Grand Trunk Pacific. I can hardly believe that any hon. member could support that contention, because I have under my hand the statement of the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the statement of member after member on the other side in 1903 and 1904, showing what a splendid proposition they had put before the people of Canada in the carrying out of the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme.

Other hon. members say: Wait until next session. This question was up in 1916, 1917 and 1918, and was thoroughly discussed from time to time, and the very proposition that we are voting on to-night or to-morrow has been before the country for the last sixteen months at least.

Mr. BUREAU: Why was it not mentioned in the speech from the Throne, then?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) knows full well how impossible it would be to make mention of this proposition in the speech from the Throne, when this Government did not know until a few weeks ago that the Grand Trunk were going to accept their offer of arbitration. Knowing that, how could the hon. member expect that it would be mentioned in the speech from the Throne? Some hon. gentlemen say—and I have heard hon. members on this side of the House also say—that both parties were equally responsible for this railroad trouble, that is, for the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific. It was my privilege to be a member of this House in the early part of 1904, and I remember distinctly resolution after resolution that we brought forward urging and begging hon. gentlemen opposite to extend the Intercolonial through to the Pacific, and so give us a Government-owned road from ocean to ocean. In order that some hon. members may know what Hon. A. G. Blair said on that occasion, I will read a couple of extracts from his speech:

Mr. Blair was Minister of Railways at that time, and he resigned rather than support the proposal for the building of the National Transcontinental railway. This is what he said:

> My decided preference is for a government owned and government operated railway across the continent, and my chief reason for favouring it is that it will have an equalizing and regulating influence upon all other railways throughout the western territory.

That is good practical common sense. Practically every word that Mr. Blair used in his letters to Sir Wilfrid Laurier in connection with his resignation and in his statement to Parliament has been borne out by the facts. He said further:

> In this view I am practically alone, and therefore I admit at once that this proposition must be laid aside. But the Cabinet has decided that the Government shall build half way across the continent as a Government road, namely, between Quebec and Winnipeg, and when built shall lease the same to the Grand Trunk Pacific; and as to the other half, it has been determined, as I understand, that liberal Government aid shall be given the same company to build and thereafter to own to the coast.
> To this mode of solving the railway problem I am decidely opposed. At best it is a hybrid scheme, involving the compromise of two antagonistic principles and will be followed as is usual with compromises of that kind, by unsatisfactory results. It will also fail to satisfy the exponents of either view. It will be difficult to explain why Government should build and own the lean section of this railway, and provide a company with Government credit to enable them to build and operate the fat section.

That is what has been going on. We have been building the lean section. We have been pouring tens of millions into that railway, in order to carry out the proposal that hon. gentlemen opposite placed before us in 1903-04. When I hear hon. gentlemen say that members on both sides of the House are equally responsible for the condition in which these railways are to-day, I take the position that I took on that occasion and that was taken by members who are now on this side—that of definite opposition to the proposal. Our argument was: Why pay nine-tenths of the cost of building the road and let private interests own it? If we are going to pay nine-tenths of the cost let us pay the other tenth as well, and own, control and operate the road for the people." That is what should have been done. Had that proposal been accepted in 1903-04 there is no doubt that the people of Canada would not to-day be in this humiliating position on the question of railways.

These railways are in our hands not simply because of an adoption of the principle of public ownership. The plain fact is that private ownership has failed to carry on and the Government has been forced to take them over.

"Let the road go into liquidation" is another cry which we hear from hon. gentlemen opposite. Let us look into that suggestion for a moment. The people of Canada have invested, in round figures, $300,000,000 in the Canadian Northern; $118,000,000 in the Intercolonial; $10,000,000 in the Prince Edward Island railway; $114,000,000 in the Grand Trunk Pacific; $13,000,000 in Grand Trunk Pacific branch lines; $159,000,000 in the National Transcontinental; $28,000,000 in the Grand Trunk—a total of $733,000,000 in cash, land grants and bonds. We must protect these interests. We as a Government would certainly not be carrying out the wishes of the people or acting in their best interests if we did not proceed as is now proposed.

I have said that the Grand Trunk Pacific received $114,000,000, the Grand Trunk Pacific branch lines $13,000,000, and the Grand Trunk $28,000,000, a total of $156,000,000. To that extent, therefore, the people of Canada are interested in the proposal that is now before Parliament. In view of the fact that the Grand Trunk is the most profitable of these railway systems, it is our duty to take it over and attach it to the other government roads.

"Sell the road under the hammer," say some members of the Opposition. Well, who would be the purchaser? No individual or corporation outside of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would undertake to purchase this road. If it were put up at auction I have no doubt that the Canadian Pacific would be very glad to purchase large sections of it in order to break up the system and to do away with its competition in years to come.

The people are vitally interested in this matter, and we must protect their interests. We cannot afford to have all our transportation in the hands of monopolies. The Canadian people spent freely of their money to break up a private monopoly in years gone by; they would never consent to create a still greater monopoly such as would be created if we allowed this system to go over to the Canadian Pacific. The Canadian Northern was a pioneer road in the West; its operation greatly increased production and population. It is well located and economically constructed. The Canadian Northern will become a mighty power in the development of our western provinces, and materially assist in making a success of this undertaking.

Just a word with regard to the financial aspect of the question. We pay interest on the bonds upon which interest has been paid for the last fifty years. Everything the Grand Trunk owns we shall own. The outstanding liabilities as shown in the Blue Book are sufficient to convince any reasonable man that the proper thing for us to do at the present time is to take over this road and deal fairly with the Grand Trunk stockholders. Any liability undisclosed three months after the award is made is to be adjusted by the auditors.

The Grand Trunk is not relieved, under this proposal, of any of its obligations in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Grand Trunk is an established paying concern, running through densely settled parts of the country. The Government, when this road is taken over, will have the use of roads, terminals, rolling stock and organization pertaining to all these systems.

The Government made a fair offer sixteen months ago to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. They have stood by that offer; they are to be congratulated upon their firm stand, and they are certainly worthy of our support. Every opportunity has been given hon. gentlemen opposite to investigate this matter. The Grand Trunk, with its small system, could not compete with the larger railway organizations; they own only a small portion of a great system. There is plenty of room in Canada for the two great systems that we shall have when this proposal is carried into effect. We shall own and operate twenty-two thousand miles of railroad, compared with the eighteen thousand miles of the Canadian Pacific, and we shall have seventy-five thousand miles of telegraph and telephone lines under Government ownership, control and operation. In addition to that, we shall have six Canadian Northern steamships, twelve Grand Trunk Railway steamships and the fifty-two Government owned vessels that are being constructed to carry our products to foreign ports—a total of seventy steamships. There are fifteen Government owned elevators, with a capacity of thirty-four million bushels, all located along these railways, as well as the Canadian Northern elevators on their right of way, nine hundred and eighty-four in number, with a capacity of sixty-three million bushels—over a thousand elevators located along the right of way of these Government-owned roads. It is certainly the greatest Government ownership proposition in the world.

When this undertaking is consummated, the Intercolonial, the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern will be united in one system, and this system must remain entirely separate from the Canadian Pacific. The Canadian National railway must be under Canadian control and management, free from political interference. These roads will start out with fixed charges of about $2,000 per mile or $45,000,000 per annum, and they must be operated as a commercial concern in competition with a well-established and well-equipped rival. The management must remember that the people of Canada are paying interest on this investment, and if the roads do not earn enough to pay this interest, then it must come out of the people by way of taxes.

Let us give the trustees in charge of this great national undertaking the widest possible powers, and I have every confidence in the successful outcome of the proposition. The Government have presented the best possible solution of this problem. It is a safe, sound, sane, businesslike proposition, and I intend to give it my hearty support.

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with very great attention to the hon. member for Lambton East (Mr. Armstrong), and I wish to call your attention to two points made by him in the course of his remarks. First, the hon. gentleman is under the impression that the taking over of the Grand Trunk railway will cost this country absolutely nothing. That, if I understood his speech properly, has been one of his main contentions. In the course of this debate, hon. gentlemen on the other side have given the Opposition and the people of this country an altogether different idea. For instance, I recall a speech from the other side in which it was declared that it would cost at least $51,000,000 simply to put the Grand Trunk into proper working condition. In my estimation—and I am not a financier; I am an ordinary poor barrister who is trying to do the best he can to earn a living for his family, and I do not claim to know too much about figures——

Mr. BUREAU: Do not get too humble.

Mr. CANNON: ——$51,000,000 is quite a sum even for the hon. member for Lambton East to forget when he is speaking about purchasing the Grand Trunk for nothing at all. Moreover, I call the attention of the hon. member to the Bill which is before the House, and I will ask him to read, for instance, clause 8, which gives to the Government power to give to the directors of the Grand Trunk immediate financial aid. That means disbursements; that means that some money is going to be spent; that means that this purchase calls for the outlay of public moneys.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I do not think for a moment that the hon. member wishes to put into my mouth any words that I did not use. The statement that I made in regard to the Grand Trunk is a very different statement from what I made in regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental. I pointed out that we would, year after year, be compelled to pour millions of dollars into the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific in order to keep them running, if we did not have the Grand Trunk; but if we have the Grand Trunk proper, that is the old Grand Trunk, then we shall not have to assume a very great deal of expense in that connection.

Mr. CANNON: After having listened to the hon. gentleman's explanation, I can only say that his explanation is preferable to his speech. My memory is generally good, and I remember perfectly that the hon. gentleman said—he may have said it by mistake—that the taking over of the Grand Trunk—not the Grand Trunk Pacific—would not cost this country any money. When the hon. member rose, I was speaking of clause 8 of the Bill whereby the Government is empowered to give to the directors of the Grand Trunk immediate financial aid—and we know what that means, especially if the declarations made by the members of the Government and the members sitting to your right, Sir, are accurate. The Grand Trunk Railway Company are badly in need of money, and if we are now to supply them with all the money they need, I repeat, the public moneys of this country are going to be taken by the Grand Trunk to a very great extent. Moreover, if the hon. member for Lambton East refers to clause 4 of the Bill, he will find that by virtue of that clause the Government,or to speak more accurately and properly, the people of this country, guarantee the payment of interest on certain stocks and bonds of the Grand Trunk. Where is that money to come from—and, it is only part of the consideration?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The hon. gentleman knows full well that the earnings of the Grand Trunk have always paid the interest on those bonds.

Mr. CANNON: The hon. gentleman knows perfectly that one of the reasons given by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) and one of the reason given by the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) last year and this year for the present transaction is that the Grand Trunk is not in a position to pay the interest on its bonds.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: It has been doing so.

Mr. CANNON: If the hon. gentleman refers to the blue-book that has been distributed amongst hon. members, he will find that one of the first letters we find in that book, a letter written by the Minister of the Interior while he was in London, states that the Government will not help the Grand Trunk to pay the interest due in July of that year. I think that question will not require any further discussion. It will cost this country some money to take over the Grand Trunk line. Personally, I am not a railway man. I am against this Bill for three reasons. First, the time is most inopportune to bring in this Bill; second, the reasons advanced by the Governmeent in support of this measure are not reasons that should convince this House; and, third, the methods provided for in this Bill for the purchase of the Grand Trunk are methods that should not be approved by the majority of this House. This is not a proper time, first of all, because the Prime Minister of this country is not in the House. The people of Canada have a right to ask for the presence of the Prime Minister when a Bill of this nature is being discussed. I have an admiration for the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid); I have a certain amount of admiration for the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen); I even have a certain amount of admiration for the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell); but even those three lights of the Cabinet do not replace the Prime Minister of this country, and that right hon. gentleman ought to be in his seat. Hon. gentlemen opposite will say: The Prime Minister is at present ill; he is not in a position to be in the House. I sympathize with the Prime Minister; I regret his illness, and I hope that very soon he will be back in his seat.

10 p.m.

Legislation of this momentous importance should not be brought down when the Prime Minister is away. Moreover, up to yesterday, the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) had not been in the House this session. What is the use of having a Minister of Finance elected for the constituency of Kingston who appeared in this House for only twenty minutes yesterday afternoon and has not been seen in its since?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: He is here now.

Mr. CANNON: I am pleased to see him in the House. The reason for my mistake is that we on this side of the House are not used to seeing so much modesty on the part of a Cabinet minister. Ministers as a rule are to be found in the front row. The Minister of Finance ought to give us a full statement of our position. We are certainly entitled to it, and until the Minister of Finance has given us that statement I do not think the Government has the right to press the second reading of this Bill. What information have we got? Certain questions have been put to the Government in the House of Commons and the Senate, and to-day in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), asking what amount had been given to the Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk, and the Canadian Northern, the Government answered that the Grand Trunk Railway system had been given all told in the last sixty-five years the sum of $15,000,000 in round figures, that the Canadian Pacific had been given all told the sum of $31,000,000, and that the Canadian Northern had been given all told the sum of $27,000,000. Mr. Speaker, we know that these figures are absolutely false. If the hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who was responsible for these figures had opened the Sessional Papers for 1917 he would have found that those figures are absolutely inaccurate. What do we find in the Sessional Papers of that year, printed and distributed to the members of this House by the Government? We find that the Canadian Pacific has received not the sum of $31,000,000 as stated by the Government to the House to-day, but the enormous sum of $228,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman say that the Canadian Pacific received that amount in subsidies?

Mr. CANNON: In money subsidies and land subsidies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The question asked for the subsidies granted the Canadian Pacific. The answer given shows the subsidies and the land grants as well.

Mr. CANNON: Even so—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why didn't you say so?

Mr. CANNON: I will make my speech the way I want to, and the minister can make his the way he wants to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should not like to make mine that way.

Mr. CANNON: I will stand no interruptions from the minister. If he is in a bad corner let him get out in the right way. No small tricks with me. I am not afraid of the minister at all, and never was. The Canadian Pacific according to this blue-book received in cash subsidies the sum of $66,000,000. Does the minister hear that? But to-day we were told that it was $31,-000,000.

Mr. CAHILL: That is pretty close, for the Government.

Mr. CANNON: Then the Grand Trunk, according to the answer given to members of the Opposition to-day seeking information so that they could discuss this question intelligently, received in round figures $15,000,000 whereas according to this same blue-book the total aid given to the Grand Trunk was $28,000,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Are there details there showing how that is made up? I was under the impression that it was only $15,-000,000.

Mr. CANNON: Not this afternoon, because I listened to the hon. member speaking and he was away up in the several hundred millions of dollars so far as the Canadian Pacific was concerned. If I was the hon. member I would stick to my figures of this afternoon.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I was not seeking to question the hon. member's figures at all. I took my figures from the Drayton-Acworth report, which showed the aid given to the Grand Trunk as $15,000,000. I had no knowledge of any other amount, and I asked the hon. gentleman courteously to tell me how his figures were made up.

[Mr. Cannon.]

I was not criticising his statement; I was simply surprised.

Mr. CANNON: What I say is this: The Government this afternoon gave us figures which are absolutely false when compared with the figures that appear in this Sessional Paper. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) in his speech this afternoon said that the aid to the Canadian Pacific amounted to $750,000,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Hear, hear, including the exemption from taxation of land and all appurtenances.

Mr. CANNON: The Government said they had given $31,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is in subsidies.

Mr. CANNON: There is a wide margin. The Government say they have given the Canadian Northern in round figures $27,000,-000. The figure given in the Sessional Papers is $298,000,000, or roughly speaking, $300,000,000. I say that the Government has no right to mislead the Opposition and the people of this country in that way, and now that the Minister of Finance is in the House, and seeing that he signed this report, I hope he will tell us whether the figures he gave when he was commissioner are the ones he gives now when he is Minister of Finance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no mystery at all about these figures, they are perfectly plain. The answers, as I understand,—I did not hear them read—referred to subsidies. I absolutely stand by the whole of the totals set out in that report. They do not deal merely with subsidies. Subsidies are indeed a very small part of them. The subsidies to the Canadian Northern are shown, and I think correctly shown, at some $38,000,000. The lands which the railway got in connection with the Manitoba charter and subsequently are shown at the amount that the company received for them, some $34,000,000. The loans outstanding on investment are also correctly shown, and the guarantees given by the Government are also correctly shown. Subsidies are one thing, proceeds of land sold are another thing, loans on outstanding investment are another thing, and guarantees outstanding are something else, entirely different. The total is correct. It is exactly the same in connection with the Canadian Pacific. The Canadian Pacific, under the head of subsidies are shown to have received $104,000,000, but you will see from the side note on the report that that amount includes the value of the railways which had been previously constructed by the Government, and which under the contract was turned over to the company. Those values were arrived at as nearly as we could. Then, again, you have the proceeds of the lands sold. These were lands actually sold at that time and as a result the total, as the hon. member has correctly stated, is $228,000,000. The Grand Trunk was built before subsidies were paid as they have been in later years. They got subsidies from different sources, but so far as this Government is concerned the Government made loans to them many years ago. On those loans they never collected interest and as far as the Grand Trunk is concerned it is fair to say that the Dominion aid to the Grand Trunk amounted to $15,000,000.

Mr. CANNON: I do not want to enter into a long discussion with the Minister of Finance, but if the hon. gentleman refers to the book again he will see that according to Government reports the roads now comprised in the Grand Trunk Railway company's undertaking have received aid as follows: Subsidies, Dominion Government, $3,423,690; provinces, $4,077,233; loans by the Dominion Government made to the Grand Trunk Railway company many years ago, $15,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Apparently the hon. gentleman is agreeing with me.

Mr. CANNON: If the minister adds these figures together, $15,000,000 and $3,000,000, he will find that they make $18,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, that is all true. But there is more than that.

Mr. CANNON: And the answer given this afternoon was $15,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. gentleman must remember that the question referred to subsidies granted by this House. It did not refer to provincial subsidies or municipal grants. The only money which the Grand Trunk, as I understand it, has ever received from this Parliament is the sum of $15,000,000. That is shown in the report as $15,142,633 and the amount of $142,633 is the interest that has been charged on the investment.

Mr. CANNON: If the minister refers to the book he will see that it says Dominion Government $3,000,000 subsidy and further down loan by Dominion Government $15,000,000 odd; and $15,000,000 and $3,000,000 make $18,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The total should be $28,000,000. There is something beyond that.

Mr. CANNON: The answer given this afternoon shows only $15,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the hon. member will find that these subsidies were not subsidies of this House but that they were granted prior to Confederation.

Mr. CANNON: Of course. The report made by the hon. gentleman says the "Dominion Government". There is only one Dominion Government. I know that the Minister of Finance and many other hon. gentlemen think that this is the first Dominion Government we have had, but before this Government there were other governments called "Dominion Government". The Dominion Government granted a subsidy of $3,000,000 and then there was loan of $15,000,000. Now, $15,000,000 plus $3,000,000 makes $18,000,000; yet this afternoon we are told not $18,000,000 but $15,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think if the hon. member will look up the statutes he will find that that extra $3,000,000 was a grant made to one of the subsidiaries which afterwards came into the company, and not a direct Grand Trunk grant at all. But the fact remains that the total is shown to be a much larger sum than the hon. gentleman is now making. The hon. gentleman is taking off $13,000,000 because the total shown in the report is $28,145,000.

Mr CANNON: Well, the book reads:

According to Government report the roads now comprised in the Grand Trunk railway undertaking have received aid as follows:

"Grand Trunk railway undertaking".

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: "Roads now comprised".

Mr. CANNON: It was not $15,000,000 but $18,000,000. The question asked in the House was:

What is the amount paid in subsidies to the Grand Trunk railway system during the last sixty-five years?

The answer was $15,542,655.34. In the book containing the report made by the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Finance the amount is given as $3,000,000 and $15,000,000, making $18,000,000. I hope the hon. gentleman will explain more fully to the House at a later occasion how this $3,000,000 has disappeared so suddenly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the report it says $13,000,000 and $15,000,000 making a total of $28,000,000.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I hope hon. members will refrain from any further discussion of these figures. The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) has the floor and should be given the opportunity to interpret the figures as he reads them. Any explanation which may be given on behalf of the Government must be given at some later time, because these interruptions are absolutely out of order when the House is not in committee.

Mr. CANNON: I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that the Government should not bring in this legislation because the Prime Minister was away, because we did not have complete information, and also because the famous reconstruction of the Cabinet is not completed. We have ministers vanishing from this House. We have seen, for instance, Hon. Mr. Carvell demobilized and sent to the railway board. We have heard also that an hon. member for British Columbia is waiting to renounce the arduous duties of a cabinet minister for a life of ease, the life of a civil servant, with a comfortable salary. We were told that other ministers would disappear and that the weak timber would be replaced by something more substantial and more solid. I think the House and the country have a right to ask that the cabinet be reconstructed before we deal with problems of this vast magnitude. There is another reason why we should not consider this Bill to-day. Is this the proper time to assume huge liabilities and responsibilities when the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) goes before a parliamentary committee of this House and declares that it is a time to have strict economy, that not a cent should be spent unless the circumstances demanded it? He also told us what our national debt was. It is appalling. Last year, while the Budget discussion was on, we asked different members of the Government: "Where are you going to find the money necessary to carry on the business of the country?"

Hon. gentlemen opposite could not answer —the only thing they could tell us was that they trusted in Providence. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that Providence is sometimes very generous and charitable but we must not abuse the kindness of Providence. The advice I give to these gentlemen is: Do not abuse the kindness and goodness of Providence and do not expect too much from Providence. If hon. gentlemen opposite were to read a certain old Latin poet they would see a verse which they should ponder over because it is full of food for reflection: Quem Deus vult perdere, dementat prius.

An hon. MEMBER: Explain.

Mr. CANNON: The returned soldiers have come to this Parliament and they have told the representatives of the people that on account of what they had done on the other side they were entitled to further recognition of their services. The committee to whom the matter was referred, has not as yet made its report but we have been told certain things in this House by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) and his utterances were so pleasing to the ears of the members of the Government that his speech was printed and copies delivered in large numbers throughout the country. What were his statements? They were to the effect that Canada could do no more financially for the soldiers. Is it fair, is it prudent, for the Government, after having answered the soldiers the way they answered them, to undertake such a vast expenditure of money as the purchase of the Grand Trunk will call for? Mr. Speaker, I submit that the Government should pause before they decide on spending hundreds of millions of dollars for the purchase of a bankrupt railway, when the soldiers throughout the country are discontented on account of the refusal to give them some recognition for the services they have rendered.

Mr. Speaker, there is another reason to be borne in mind: There are officials who are receiving fat salaries from the Government for delivering lectures throughout Canada and preaching to the citizens that they ought to observe strict economy in their households. In the city of Quebec where I live and in the constituency of Dorchester which I represent, several women have come to me and complained that the high cost of living prevented them from giving the necessaries of life to their families. And while these people are facing the approach of winter with fear in their minds and apprehension in their hearts they are told by these lecturers to economize. Yet this Government, who are giving the same advice, are ready to throw away hundreds of millions of dollars to satisfy the appetites of their friends, the speculators on the stock markets in England. Mr. Speaker, I tell the Government to pause and beware. The President of the Privy Council last year talked to us about Russia, with tears in his eyes and trembling in his voice. What was the reason for the happenings in Russia? The uprising of Russian Bolshevism is nothing but the explosion of suffering in the hearts of poor human beings who have been crushed by an autocratic government. Let this Government remember that the patience of the people of Canada has limits and should those limits be exceeded the ministry must assume the responsibility for coming events.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CANNON: Some gentlemen opposite laugh. It is their usual answer—to laugh. I have seen people in a court room who were accused of murder laugh when declared guilty.

Mr. Speaker, another question: Is this the proper time to press this measure when the Finance Minister is calling upon the people of the country to lend money to the Government. This Government is like an ordinary man who wants money. If he desires to obtain money he has got to inspire confidence in the man from whom he demands it. Last year I went throughout my county and spoke in favour of the Victory Loan, and the contribution from Dorchester very largely exceeded the amount allotted to it by the Victory Loan Committee. This year I went again. Will I go back? I might go back providing the Minister of Finance shows us that this money will be properly spent, and not squandered and wasted in the scheme before the House at the present time. But what I can do is of no importance. I am a private member and do not claim to have much influence. But other people have. I would refer the Finance Minister to a letter which appeared in the Quebec papers; a letter not signed by a politician, not signed by an opponent of this Government, but signed by one of the most influential men in Canada, a former president of the Manufacturers' Association, a man who has built up in the city of Quebec one of the largest industries that we have—I am speaking of Hon. Mr. Amyot. Mr. Amyot subscribed to the last Victory Loan and subscribed generously, and this is the letter he writes:

To the Editor of Le Soleil, Quebec.

Dear Sir,—

In this morning's Chronicle we are advised that the Ottawa Government has laid before the House the proposition for the purchase of the Grand Trunk railway, and that Mr. Smithers, the president, is prepared to accept conditions laid down by the Government. That is to say, that a pre-arranged scheme is being submitted to the House at the very moment when Sir Robert Borden is absent and when the leader of the Opposition has no seat in the House, and at a time when the House was called for the unique purpose of ratifying the Peace Treaty, as well as to obtain for itself a second indemnity.

At this time, advantage is taken to rush through in a hurry a law for the purpose of taking over a fourth or a fifth railway system, to purchase the control of shares at a time when the country is staggering under the load of an excessive debt and burdened with all kinds of other troubles.

These gentlemen have the temerity to carry on this purchase at the time when they are endeavouring to float a national loan called a "Victory Loan." Vain words, no doubt, but in any case they call it a Victory Loan. I am of opinion that the country should refuse to subscribe anything whatsoever to this loan if the Government persists in its view that the Grand Trunk railway must be acquired, and, in so far as I am concerned, I intend to give the example and will not subscribe one single cent. I have subscribed to loans made during the war and have done so generously. To the first loan $50,000, to the second $250,000, and to the third $500,000. Consequently I think that I have in the past done my bit, but I refuse to subscribe anything whatsoever to this last loan if it is the intention to administer the country's affairs in this reckless fashion; and if I have any advice to give it is, that my example should be generally followed throughout the country.

Thanking you, Sir, for the publication of this letter, I remain,

Yours very sincerely,
George E. Amyot.

This letter cannot be ignored by the Government. As I said before, it is written by one of the most prominent men in Canada; and I think that the sentiments expressed are also shared by a great many business men throughout the country.

There is another reason, Mr. Speaker, why this measure should not be pressed. This Government has not the confidence of the people. I say so, and I support my utterance with proofs that cannot be contradicted. A few months ago there was an election in Prince Edward Island. What was the result? The Provincial Government was defeated. Why? Because it was supported by the Union Government at Ottawa. But what is the use of speaking of Prince Edward Island, Mr. Speaker? I will refer to a province which is far more interesting to the hon. gentlmen on the other side—the province of Ontario. The Hearst Government had been in power for many years; it had been supported in one general election; but the moment the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) lent his support to that Administration it was wiped out altogether. And the night the results came in I thought that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid), who always had directed the old Tory machine in Ontario—this gentleman who knew where to place some oil, for instance, when he went to Kingston to show to the people of that good town the benefits of electing the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) by acclamation, as the papers have told us—this old political warrior of many battles would have carried the Tory machine to victory if it had not been for the reckless interference of his colleague, the President of the Council. But the moment the hon. gentleman interfered, like a misguided saint, he ruined the chances of the Hearst party altogether. If the electors of Prince Edward Island and Ontario receive in this fashion any party which is endorsed by the Union Government, can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, the disastrous results of a direct appeal from these gentlemen themselves? If this Government had the confidence of the people why did they not put up a candidate in Quebec East, where there is an election this week, to explain to the people of my good province the benefits of their administration? I have not seen in this House for the last two weeks the friendly face of the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder). I am sorry he is not here. But I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, if the Union Government has the confidence of the people, as was claimed yesterday by the President of the Council, why did not the Minister of Immigration put up a candidate of his own in the Province of Saskatchewan? They say they have the confidence of the people, Mr. Speaker. Well, the leader of our party was chosen by convention last summer, he offered himself to the electors of the County of Prince, and this Government, which has the confidence of the people, did not dare fight his election.

Mr. P. McGIBBON: Might I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON: Certainly.

Mr. P. McGIBBON: Why did not his leader take a seat in his own province?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh! Cheap!

Mr. CANNON: I think it would have been a very good thing, because it would have improved in many ways the representation from that Province. Mr. Speaker, I say that the Government has not the confidence of the people. I say, further, that the Government has no mandate on the question of public ownership. I was listening today to my good friend, the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) talking about public ownership. He might have been in favour of public ownership this afternoon, but I understand from rumours which come from Winnipeg that very often he used to be also in favour of the Canadian Pacific railway, which is private ownership.

Mr. RICHARDSON: May I contradict that? I never in my life was in favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I never gave utterance to anything in favour of the Canadian Pacific railway other than what my hon. friend would do, namely, that it is a well managed institution, and the Canadian people may well admire its management; but he will search in vain through any papers I can show him for any speech I ever made endorsing the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. BUREAU: Were you in favour of the Red River Valley?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. These questions and answers from one side of the House to the other are absolutely out of order in a debate on the second reading of a Bill.

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. gentleman this: His speeches at times, in this House at least, do not always express his real views, judging by the way he votes afterwards. But in addition to that the hon. gentleman has the misfortune not only of making speeches but also of writing articles in his paper, and I would refer him to his file—he might have surprises, and great ones, which will contradict altogether his conviction that he never was against public ownership.

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that the Government has no mandate. This Government was elected for what purpose? They told us that it was absolutely necessary that their talents be kept at the service of this country to save the British Empire. If we had not the genius of administration of these gentlemen we see sitting in front of us,—if the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) had not remained at the head of his Department; if the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) had not stood by what he thought was his duty; if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) had not remained, working for the good of his country, although he is old and sick and tired,—the British Empire would have disappeared, Mr. Speaker,—so they said. The people of this country understood the British Empire was to be saved. But now that it is saved, Mr. Speaker, would these gentlemen please save their own country by relinquishing power?

I oppose this Bill, Mr. Speaker, not only because I think that this is not the proper moment for discussing such a measure, but also because I think that the reasons given for its introduction are not sound.

I heard the President of the Council (Hon. Mr. Rowell) say yesterday: "We are continuing our work." I would like to know where that work began; moreover, I would like to know where it will end. The work of this Government in the matter of railway policy is nothing but a continuance of the traditions of the Tory party in this country. The Canadian Pacific scandal, Mr. Speaker; the Canadian Northern scandal; the Grand Trunk Pacific scandal—and now the climax, the crowning work of these genii, the Grand Trunk Railway system scandal. I know what their work has been so far as my province is concerned; it has been an effort to destroy what the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier did for Quebec and for Ontario; an effort to efface completely any trace of the work of that great patriot in the building of the Transcontinental railway in 1903 and succeeding years. That has been the policy of the Government so far as we in Quebec are concerned.

We have built the Quebec bridge at a cost of millions of dollars, and will you believe me, Mr. Speaker, when I tell you that hardly any trains pass over that bridge? Why? Because this Government has absolutely no interest in Quebec; Quebec does not count. If Quebec does not count in the estimation of these hon. gentlemen, it did count in the estimation of a former government, the views of which were larger and broader and the object of whose consideration and attention included the interests not of one province or one section of the country but of the Canadian people as a whole. During the last election the Toronto Telegram advised the people of that city that they ought to support the Hearst Government because a vote for Hearst was a vote against Quebec; a vote for Hearst was a vote for Toronto against Montreal. I leave these gentlemen to their petty appeals; they have had the answer that they deserved.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the House much longer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. CANNON: The member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard) says "hear, hear." I know that he voices his feelings. The question whether or not this party is against private ownership is not at issue. I am a Liberal; I am a progressive; I am in favour of anything that means progress in this country. Public ownership has been the policy of every Liberal organization throughout the world. But, Mr. Speaker, different countries have tried public ownership in recent years; we have had examples that we did not have before, and in the face of those examples and of those results, are we not justified, as sensible and reasonable men, in suggesting that it would be better to wait and see before we decide this question?

The member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) said that the public ownership of railways was a success in Italy. Has the hon. member ever travelled in Italy?

Mr. RICHARDSON: Yes.

Mr. CANNON: He must have been glad to get away from those railways.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Not at all.

Mr. CANNON: The hon. member told us that public ownership of railways in England was a success. But the British Government to-day is altogether undecided what to do with the railways. They have on their hands a number of white elephants that they would like to be rid of—somuch so, Mr. Speaker, that the question of nationalization is coming up again in that country, not only as regards the railways, but also as regards the mines. The Prime Minister, Mr. Lloyd George—and the member for Springfield will admit that he is a Liberal—has declared that the matter of the advisability of nationalization is of such grave importance that it will have to be decided by the people themselves. Hon. gentlemen opposite usually imitate what happens in England; why should they not make the same wise decision which the Prime Minister of England has made on this question?

They have had public ownership of railways in the United States. I challenge any member of this House to deny that the deficit on the railway in the United States under Government administration has not been a million and a half dollars a day. What is it going to be here, judging from our experience in the past in connection with the Intercolonial?

Hon. gentlemen tell us that the administration of the national railways will be altogether outside of political patronage, "we have pledged ourselves to that." But this Government have made pledges in the past which were never fulfilled; the farming sections of Ontario remembered one pledge two days ago. This Government, Mr. Speaker, should be serious. The President of the Council said yesterday: "We have to buy the Grand Trunk not on account of the failure of public ownership, but on account of the failure of private ownership." That was one of the main arguments put forwards by the Minister. The Canadian Northern failed as a private enterprise, and that is why the Government took it over. But what I cannot understand is why the Government, if they wish public ownership to be a success, leave in the hands of the same old gang who maladministered the Canadian Northern the administration of our national railways. If the man who was working for Mackenzie and Mann was not competent to administer a railway under private ownership where did he acquire new competency, additional talent, new administrative capacity, now that he works for the Government? If gentlemen go to the head office of the Canadian Northern in Toronto they will find there the same old faces of these political and railway buccaneers who robbed every Government in Canada; and they are still at the same game. The President of the Council may wax eloquent, but these are cold facts that cannot be contradicted.

Who runs the Government railways? Whenever there is any trouble or any difficulty in this country we have only to go down to the Central Station to see on one of the sidings the private car of Mackenzie and Mann in which a Government official is receiving advice from these gentlemen. Everybody in Ottawa and throughout the country knows that. Yet these people talk about public ownership as being a public duty—"a patriotic duty", to use the expression of the President of the Council. Is it patriotic to ruin your country? If so, this is the first intimation I have had of it.

It is a new doctrine; it is a very modern theory. Mackenzie and Mann robbed and bled every Government in Canada. If this Government are sincere, they have one duty to perform, namely, to rid their system not only of Mackenzie and Mann who are the figurehead, but of the puppets who hide behind them. Giants in railroading have failed throughout the world in recent years; in the administration of railroads will this Government contend seriously that pygmies will succeed where giants have failed? Patronage is abolished! These railroads are going to be run in such a way that the administration of Canadian railways will be cited throughout the world as a new wonder. Was it patronage or not, to give to the Hon. Mr. Carvell his reward and a $12,000 salary? Patronage abolished! In my county, I have the example of a station agent who was replaced after having been dismissed, because Hon. Mr. Sévigny was running as a candidate, and he wired the general manager that it was important that that station agent should still run the station because he had many relatives having votes in that constituency, and accordingly he was reinstated. But these gentlemen must be serious with the House of Commons and the country. Every Senator who is appointed is a political appointee and nothing else, and to remove that impression from my mind I would ask any minister of the Crown to explain to me why the appointment to the Senate concerning the county of Frontenac was not made before the elections were over. That is a very pertinent question.

The Government tell us that the main reason for this deal is necessity, it has to be done. Since when has it to be done? On the first September, when we met here, we were called upon only to put an end to the awful state of war which existed between us and Germany. I remember the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) making one of the most eloquent speeches ever delivered in this House when he called upon us as patriotic citizens of this country to put an end to the state of war. We were called upon for that purpose only, to give peace to the good men, women and children of Canada. We did that. The ministry was not satisfied. On September 20 this deal was not yet necessary; we did not hear anything about it. Even on October 1, even on the 3rd, when the Acting Prime Minister of this country (Sir George Foster) spoke in this House, he did not disturb the Government's supporters who were packing their satchels and trunks in order to go home. It was not necessary then. But all of a sudden the atmosphere becomes loaded with clouds; the credit of this country is in danger! Again the Government proposes to the House of Commons a patriotic duty; we have to save the credit of Canada, says the President of the Council, all of a sudden. Save the credit of Canada! There is one way of saving the credit of Canada, and that is to prevent highway robbers and thieves from influencing the decisions of the Government——

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman is exceeding the rules of debate in the imputation implied in his remarks. They are entirely unparliamentary.

Mr. CANNON: I had not concluded my sentence. I was going to say—to influence the decisions of the Government in the minds of evidently wrongly-informed people in this country.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know that the hon. gentleman helps his remark any by so concluding it. That is the judgment of the House.

Mr. CANNON: I bow to your decision, Sir. I say that it is the impression which wrongly exists in the minds of several people in Canada. The credit of this country has in no way been enhanced by the Canadian Northern deal; it was in no way enhanced by what we did last year; and I do not think it will be enhanced by the present proposal. It is necessary, say the Government, to help these railway companies. Since when has a company which is bankrupt, or on the way to bankruptcy, a claim on the generosity of this country? Other institutions in Canada have failed, have become bankrupt; have the Government interfered to give them financial help, to prevent them from failing? I will take a very recent example, the example of the Farmers' Bank in Ontario. That institution failed, and hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House had promised their constituents relief. The Bill was thrown out by the Senate and the Government never introduced that Bill. Why? Because it is an altogether unsound principle to claim for any company a right to financial relief from the Government. Let hon. gentlemen look at what happened in the United States. Practically every important railway in the United States failed in the course of its existence. The American Government never interfered. When a railway failed, the same thing happened as when any other corporation failed. Since when have we, the people of Canada, become dealers in scrap and rags? This is a new role for a Government.

11 p.m.

I am opposed to this Bill, not only because the time is not opportune and because the reasons given for the Bill do not justify its introduction or adoption, but because the method indicated by the Government is wrong. Why should we have arbitration? We had an example of what arbitration meant to the people of Canada. The Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) when he was chairman of the Railway Board, declared that the Canadian Northern stock was absolutely worthless. Nevertheless, the arbitrators who were named by the Government decided that a stock which was worth absolutely nothing, not one cent, was to cost the people of Canada the enormous sum of $10,800,000. We, the representatives of the people, have no right to constitute a tribunal on the same basis as that, which meant such a tremendous loss to the country in connection with taking over the Canadian Northern. Are we going to have the same experts to determine the value of this stock? I have nothing to say against these gentlemen, but if my memory serves me right, one of those who sat on the Canadian Northern arbitration board was the Chief Justice of the province of Ontario, and he again is named in this Bill to choose one of the arbitrators, together with the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and the senior judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You are about a year behind the times.

Mr. CANNON: I am not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, go ahead the way you are then.

Mr. CANNON: If I go ahead the way I am it will be going ahead differently from the minister because my course will be straight. I say we have no right to put in the hands of these gentlemen the decision of such an important question after the way the Canadian people were treated at their hands a year or so ago. That tribunal gave over $10,000,000 to Mackenzie and Mann and their friends for a stock which was absolutely valueless, and the present Minister of Finance declared so himself. What is going to happen so far as the Grand Trunk is concerned we do not know. The sinister influences which were exercised in connection with the Canadian Northern still prevail. We know those men. Unfortunately for Canada they are still alive. They are watching these proceedings. The papers in Canada which have supported the present Administration for years, papers which put the present Administration into power, are protesting against this Bill and against the methods employed to take over the Grand Trunk. I hope that when we are in committee on the Bill, if it is not withdrawn altogether, it will be decided by the Government that no arbitration award shall be binding on the people of this country until ratified by the Parliament of Canada. Why should we divest ourselves of our responsibility? Why should three gentlemen, no matter who they are, impose on this country an expenditure of millions of dollars? The constitutional theory on this point is very simple—no taxation without representation. I need not recall the long struggle in England and in Canada for the adoption and sanction of this constitutional principle. We have it. The members of the House of Commons, the sole representatives of the people, have no right to give to three judges, no matter who they are, the right of taxing the Canadian people, especially when that taxation amounts to millions and millions of dollars.

I will conclude these remarks by saying that the responsibility of the Government in a constitutional country is very heavy. The role played by a minister is very noble and very high. The trust that the people put in the ministers is a trust that should be respected. The Canadian people have entrusted these gentlemen with the protection and the safeguarding of their interests, financial, national and otherwise. These gentlemen are simply the stewards of the people. If they read the Gospel, as I have no doubt the President of the Council does every day, they will see that our Lord speaks in very stern words of the responsibility of stewardship. He painted the duties of stewardship as the most binding that a man can have imposed upon him. Stewards of the people, you have no right to squander one cent of the public moneys. Not the smallest fraction of money should be squandered or wasted. The Canadian people are watching, and I hope that some time the sun will rise on the day of reckoning for these gentlemen. I have no doubt that when that day comes, not the Canadian Northern, not the Grand Trunk, not the Grand Trunk Pacific, or any of their railways will prevent them from being removed from their seats to your right, Mr. Speaker, to the seats on your left in this House.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): If the debate from this on is to be a serious discussion of the resolution before the Chair, it is imperative that very little time or attention be paid to the speech of the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon). The speech he has just delivered was characteristic of him, in that it was replete with what might be called clever turns of language, and also characteristic of him in that it was absolutely barren of everything else. There may be some success in controversy in this House if there is substance, relevant substance, to an address, even in the absence of candour, and candour in a speech in the absence of material facts or substance is always acceptable and welcome; but a speech that is lacking in both is not likely to live very long in the memory of hon. members.

I noted as time went on, two or three references the hon. member made which had some remote bearing on the resolution we are now discussing. I was interested as well without noting any relevance to the subject, in the appeal he made, a very touching appeal, on behalf of the returned soldiers of this country and their families, and I could not help but reflect on the sweet and enduring gratification it will bring to all the soldiers and heroes of our country when they learn that their champion in this House is now the hon. member for Dorchester. He had all the resources of his mind marshalled to attack the arbitration that took place on the subject of the Canadian Northern railway shares. I do not know whether his language in that regard was any more extravagant than his language relative to the Bill before Parliament. There is this however about the effect of the hon. member's opinion, that if there were any serious minded members of this House who had any honest doubts as to the wisdom of his course in supporting this legislation, these doubts would be set at rest when he finds that the measure meets with the envenomed hostility of the hon. member for Dorchester.

As to the arbitration that took place two years ago words failed the hon. member to properly characterize that policy. He thinks that any course on the part of the Government in regard to large railway systems that does not permit the onward, or downward, march of liquidation is reprehensible in every respect. There is in such a course, he says, a violation of responsibility and an utter ignoring of our duties to the people. Let railway systems, like everything else, go into liquidation and all is well! That is the way it has been and the way it ought to be! I was in this House when the gentleman whose memory the hon. member for Dorchester affects to revere was leading the Liberal party. If the hon. gentleman refers to the records of this House at the time when this Parliament was faced with the alternative of the Canadian Northern going into liquidation, a system less in magnitude than the Grand Trunk, he will see that that leader stood up in Parliament and warned us that it was our duty not to allow liquidation to take place. He warned this House that the duty before it was to arrest the progress of liquidation in the name of and for the sake of the credit of this country and for the dearest interests of Canada. Not only did the leader of that day use such words and warn the Government accordingly, but his ex-Minister of Railways, Hon. G. P. Graham, now not in Parliaament, was even more emphatic than the then leader of the Opposition in chiding Parliament for ever thinking of liquidation as to the Canadian Northern system because it meant more in loss than this country could hope to gain thereby. If liquidation was a thing unthinkable for the Canadian Northern railway is the argument not equally applicable to the Grand Trunk? All the arguments used by Sir Wilfrid Laurier relative to the Canadian Northern railway apply equally, identically and with redoubled force to the subject now before this House. But logic is lost on an intellect under the sway of passion such as that possessed by the hon. member for Dorchester. Liquidation is right; public ownership is wrong. With the Canadian Northern liquidation was wrong but public ownership was right.

When the subject was before Parliament the Opposition of that time, within whose ranks were many hon. members opposite, moved a resolution calling for the public ownership of the Canadian Northern system, calling for arbitration as to the value of the stock in the Canadian Northern with a maximum of $30,000,000, the very course that we afterwards pursued except that we reduced the maximum to $10,000,000. I heard this subject referred to by the present temporary leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) the other day. "Yes," he said, "we did in 1914 support a resolution moved by Dr. Pugsley, calling for the taking over of the CanadianNorthern Railway system by means of the ownership of the stock at a value to be defined by arbitration and calling for the fixing of a maximum of $30,000,000 as the value of that stock. But, "he said," that was before we loaned them $35,000,000; as soon as we loaned them $35,000,000, they had $5,000,000 more than our maximum and therefore the maximum could not stand." I hardly know how to attack a position of that sort. As if the value of the stock of the system was depreciated by the fact that we loaned them $35,000,000. The $35,000,000 was a loan to the company. It was opposed because it would help the stockholders. How would it help the stockholders if it ruined the stock? If it had any effect on the stock it would raise the value of the stock. Though the stock which, without that raise, was to have under their plan a maximum value in arbitration of $30,000,000, still in the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite there is robbery of Canada if the stock having this raise is arbitrated at a maximum of $10,000,000. I do not hear the mutterings of the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) for which I should be grateful.

We have had abundant and repeated witness of the truism that there is no use whatever in taking the advice in any respect of hon. gentlemen opposite because the moment we take that advice they deny its parenthood and assail their own ideas. Liquidation, let me repeat, was the agreed upon and recorded policy of hon. gentlemen opposite in relation to the Canadian Northern Railway system. Arbitration of the value of the shares was right and public ownership was right. Will any hon. gentleman tell me why liquidation was wrong in connection with the Canadian Northern and public ownership and arbitration right, and liquidation right and public ownership and arbitration wrong in respect to the Grand Trunk? The exigencies of political position are very great and drive public men into strange paths; and in proportion as the leadership is vacillating these exigencies become more repeated and more difficult.

I did not rise to refer particularly to the remarks of the hon. member for Dorchester. I was not able to be in the House when the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) was making his speech the other day, but I took occasion as I sat in my seat to-night to read it, and I thought I would be lacking somewhat in my duty—I had almost said to posterity—if I did not put on record a gem that I found in this speech. It is full of them, all of them just about, although not quite approaching in ludicrousness the specimen I am now going to treat. There is indeed scarcely a paragraph in the speech but against which the same attack could be made that I am going to make against this, but time prevents me from going over the other paragraphs with a like purpose. The hon. gentleman was endeavouring to show the burden that was going to fall upon Canada by way of annual charges as a result of taking over the Grand Trunk system and incorporating it with the Canadian National railways. He said first that the outstanding indebtedness of the system was $552,556,019. I find here in the blue-book he was relying on, a figure which is within ten per cent of that amount but which in no way represents the indebtedness of the company.

There is a figure in the papers before Parliament of $504,629,211. The hon. gentleman evidently had reference to that when he put it as $552,556,019. At all events, there is no other figure so close. Now what is this figure of $504,000,000? It is not said in the documents to be the liabilities of the company—there is no hint of such a thing at all. It appears as the total on both sides of the balance sheet of the Grand Trunk system. Now I am not going to say the hon. gentleman does not know what a balance sheet is, that he does not know the difference between the debit and the credit side—he knows at least the geographical difference. I do not charge the hon. gentleman with anything, but really if I made such a statement as I find here in his remarks I would feel complimented if he charged me with dishonesty. The total on the credit side includes huge amounts but many appear on the debit side in exactly the same figures as on the credit side, being investments made by the company necessary to answer for charges in favour of, say, their own employees and others, therefore necessarily appearing on both sides but in no sense a liability. They contain none of the attributes of a liability at all but to make a balance sheet complete they must be there. The company have to answer to their employees for them, but they have the money invested to provide for that accounting. A balance sheet to be complete must include these items on both sides.

Mr. McKENZIE: Before I presented those figures to Parliament I submitted them to the minister who has charge of this Bill. I told him what I was going to say and he made no objection to it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would take the Minister of Railways half a day to discover what the hon. member was driving at and to trace up the origin of his figures.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister can take his course now; I have made my explanation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I propose to take it. Indeed, I have to acknowledge my own despair as regards part of his speech. There is a portion here, on page 1253 of Hansard, where he has selected a lot of figures. I do not know whether he got them from the statistics of Brazil or the population records of China, or where he got them, or what on earth he was driving at in presenting them, or what he was trying to argue. I have tried my limited ability at them for an hour and a half and I can not make head or tail, or beginning or end of the conglomeration I consulted the Minister of Railways and he agreed with me that he did not know what the hon. gentleman meant or intended to mean.

Now let us go on. Included in that statement, the balance sheet, are also current liabilities against which there are current assets of about double the amount necessary to answer those liabilities. Included as well are the three classes of preference stock and common stock, all included and figured out at the whole face value. Now then, besides what I have named are the actual liabilities which I gave out the other day, $60,833,000, $173,558,000, $5,344,000—advances by the Canadian Government, equipment trust notes, and so on—and the $35,548,000 of short term notes. Those are the liabilities of the system but the hon. gentleman takes the side of the balance sheet which is $504,000,000 and he adds to that $50,000,000 which he finds in the back of his head—at any rate no one knows where—and makes the amount $552,000,000, and then he says—and this is really beautiful—we have to pay interest on that $552,000,000 at six per cent. He says that interest amounts to $33,153,000, notwithstanding the fact that the statement itself showed the rates in every case; nowithstanding the fact that all these things at the bottom had nothing in the world to do with the interest; notwithstanding the fact that the interest runs three, four, four and a half, and five per cent, and includes $100,000,000 of common stock, and all these other things that do not bear interest at all. It is difficult to find where the hon. gentleman's absurd process leads to. I do not know what he means by talking in that way in this House. But that is not the worst. He has got the annual charge at $33,153,000 by the indescribable process to which I have referred, and then he goes on and says that is not all. He remarks that on this page 39 is another item of $50,126,665.98 of four per cent debenture stock that we have got to add. Now will the House believe me when I say that there is this foot-note at the bottom of the statement:

$50,126,665 of Grand Trunk four per cent debenture stock further than above has been deposited as collateral security for notes (indicated by an asterisk).

That is to say they make short-term loans; they owe on these loans this amount of money $35,548,000, which I quoted, and they deposit the debenture stock as security, and the hon. gentleman adds the collateral to the debt. Now I give the hon. gentleman credit for distinguishing between the debit and the credit sides, at least as to position, but I will ask him in dealing with balance sheets after this not to add both sides together and confuse them. How can the debenture stock be a liability, when it is not out of the company's possession but placed merely as a collateral against their debt. Why did the hon. gentleman add it?

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it not an outstanding stock of the company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, how is it outstanding?

Mr. McKENZIE: It is deposited in the banks as collateral, that is where it is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE: And it must be paid.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How can it be a liability?

Mr. McKENZIE: Because the company does not have it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How can they deposit it as collateral?

Mr. McKENZIE: How can a man give as collateral something he has not got?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I say. I say they have it and lodge it as a collateral.

Mr. McKENZIE: Once they have deposited the collateral? Hon. gentleman opposite seem to be great financiers and very clever, but once a man gives his watch as a collateral is not that watch out of his possession, and if he does not pay the money the watch goes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If he gives his watch as collateral security for the sum of $10, he does not owe the $10 and the watch too.

Mr. McKENZIE: If he fails to pay the $10 the watch goes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why of course but he does not owe both. I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for the illustration. Well, he says now, you have to add interest of $2,000,000 on that $50,126,665. You add that, he says, to the $33,153,000 that he has made out to be worth six per cent in the way I have tried to describe and by so adding he gets—now listen:—a total of $47,864,367. Well, I would be interested to know just what this new scheme of addition is;—$33,153,361, add to that $2,005,066, and then in the next sentence he says:

> The total annual interest upon all the Grand Trunk liabilities which we assume is $47,864,367.

In the mere process of putting the figures down the hon. gentleman adds calmly and apparently deliberately and with the utmost self-satisfaction the sum of $12,000,000 odd. He gives no explanation whatever. Has the hon. gentleman no sense of his responsibility? How does $2,000,000 and $33,000,000,—even if both were right, but both are ludicrously wrong,—added together make $47,000,000. Well, we will take the $47,000,000. What does the hon. gentleman say about that? There is $47,000,000 of annual charge. But he says, "I will admit that after payment of operation cost they have $9,400,000 left. So he just took that $9,000,000 off the $47,000,000, and he says in the peroration of this phase of his speech that there is left a deficit of $38,457,169, which deficit "must be paid annually by the people." Could arithmetical monstrosity go farther?

Mr. McKENZIE: Those figures are absolutely right, no matter how the hon. gentleman tries to muddle them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I must in generosity to the hon. gentleman, admit this, that they are just as correct as his whole position, they are just as correct as the whole idea and spirit behind the opposition to this Bill, they are just as near truth, they are just as near reason, they are just as near common sense.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does my hon. friend argue what constitutes common sense?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is this difference between me and the hon. gentleman. When I argue what common sense is I precede it by some reason, I do not simply pronounce it as from high Heaven and say, "This is final, let it go."

The hon. gentleman then moves his resolution which says: We cannot go on and decide this question in the closing days of the session. Well, what makes the session close? Is it not when we get through? How is it that we could decide this subject better if something else followed? If we have only this to consider, and this is the last business, have we not more time for its consideration than if we had some other things to consider? What particular advantage would it be to us in our deliberations on this Bill to know there were some other Bills to follow? The hon. gentleman's resolution in effect says there would be great advantage! We are not asking him to go home,—we are not asking any one to go home. From the moment we had reason to believe that we were likely to secure the culmination of the negotiations we invited every one to stay. That was our plain duty, and that is our invitation today. No effort has been spared on the part of the Government to urge that hon. members both of this House and the Senate remain at their posts, and without hurry, without agitation, without being driven in any way quietly, calmly, and deliberately to think this thing out and decide what is best to be done on behalf of the people of Canada.

I was very much interested indeed in the speech of the hon. member from New Brunswick (Mr. H. H. McLean). There is no member in this House for whose motives and patriotic principles I have more regard. I see that he is apprehensive that the taking over of the Grand Trunk system will, first of all, add to our responsibilities and debts, and, second, that it may possibly result in a diminution of traffic through the port of St. John. Well, naturally the taking over of a large railway system adds to our obligations and to our responsibilities; there is no doubt about that. It does not add, as hon. gentlemen opposite would like to confuse the country into believing. Apropos of that—here is another marvel that I am glad I did not forget. The leader of the Opposition says that the Drayton-Acworth report did state that $3,600,000 was the average earning of the stock for ten years, and did recommend that a reasonable or substantial proportion of that amount be paid to the shareholders from the first, to be increased later by 40 or 50 per cent. But he said that was to be after all the debenture stock was paid off, after the whole road was clear of encumbrances. Did the hon. gentleman really mean that? May I ask him now?

Mr. McKENZIE: I have read the report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; that is just what he never does on the point really in question.

Mr. McKENZIE: I read the report, and it is on Hansard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sorry to flatly contradict the hon. gentleman. But I will read it for him now; that probably will do just as well. The Drayton-Acworth report, at page lxiv, gives the dividends paid by the company from 1906 to 1915. On what stocks? On the guaranteed, on the 5 per cent first preference, on the 5 per cent second preference, and on the 4 per cent third preference. It adds that nothing was paid on the common. It gives those dividends year by year, then it deduces that the average over the ten years was $3,600,000 on those stocks. Does that include money paid in dividends on the debenture stock or bonds? Nothing could be more absurd. Why, it says in so many words, and there is the page—let the hon. gentleman turn to it again. He is turning up his own speech—I have that here, too, and I will read to him what he says. At page 1250 the hon. gentleman quoted from the report as follows:

> But we do not think that this is the only basis on which the people of Canada should proceed. We think this is a case for generosity rather than strict justice. Canada is under obligations to the Grand Trunk shareholders, who, in the early days, with but small government assistance, and in competition with the railways of the United States with their vastly greater resources, built up the first Canadian railway system. In later times the company has had further to meet the competition of heavily subsidized Canadian rivals. And it cannot be said that at any stage of its history the shareholders have obtained excessive profits on their enterprise. On the whole we recommend that, on condition of the surrender by the Grand Trunk Company of their entire share capital, guaranteed, preferred, and ordinary, the trustees grant a certain annuity, charged as a working expense on the whole undertaking of the Dominion Railway Company, for the first seven years, increasing at the termination of that period by something like 40 or 50 per cent.
> We have left the figures blank as there will be questions of cash in hand, value of stores, etc., which must make the precise figures subject to negotiation.
> But our meaning is that the first figure should be a moderate but substantial percentage of $3,600,000—

Now, during the course of the reading of that the Minister of Railways interjected: "That is what we are doing," and the hon. gentleman went on to explain:

> "A moderate percentage of $3,600,000." I would like to know from the Minister of Railways where under this bargain he makes an annual payment of a moderate percentage of $3,600,000.
> Mr. J. D. Reid: There is the $2,500,000.
>
> Mr. McKenzie: Evidently the hon. gentleman refers to something in the bargain that I could not come across. The hon. gentleman says "$2,500,000." That is the payment on the preferred stock but he has immediately alongside of that to pay nearly $8,000,000 on the debenture stock.
>
> Mr. J. D. Reid: This was to be in addition to that.
>
> Mr. McKenzie: This report does not say so. This report says that the company have to deliver up everything they have.

Mr. J. D. Reid: No, it does not.

Mr. McKenzie: That is the suggestion here. They have to deliver, holus bolus, everything they have from common stock up and then the Government comes in and makes an allowance upon the basis of $3,600,000, not the whole but a moderate or substantial percentage of the amount. That is the suggestion of the Drayton-Acworth commission and that is the only authority which the Government have to-day.

The hon. gentleman was telling this House that the suggestion of the Drayton-Acworth Commission was that there should be paid a moderate but substantial percentage of $3,600,000, against not the preference stock, the guaranteed stock and the common stock, but against all the bonds on which the interest is from seven to eight millions, and against the guaranteed preference stocks and common stocks as well. One reading of the Drayton-Acworth report by anybody at all will make it clear that the report not only intended to say but said distinctly: "Take it subject to these bonds and pay to the stockholders a moderate but substantial percentage of $3,600,000, and add to whatever you pay during the first few years by forty or fifty per cent later on." Surely, that is clear.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is what is in the report; I understood that I was perfectly within what the report suggested:

On the whole we recommend that on condition of the surrender by the Grand Trunk Company of their entire share capital, guaranteed, preferred and ordinary. . . .

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I said.

Mr. McKENZIE: It does not mention anything else.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course it does not.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is all that this learned Commission mentioned; the whole thing had to be given up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course that is all they mention; that is what I am arguing —the surrender of its share capital that is the guaranteed, preferred and common stock; but the hon. gentleman added in the bonds.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not say a word about bonds.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the hon. gentleman did; here it is:

Evidently the hon. gentleman refers to something in the bargain that I could not come across. The hon. gentleman says: "$2,500,000." That is the payment on the preferred stock but he has immediately alongside of that to pay nearly $8,000,000 on the debenture stock.

That is, the bonds. Now, does the hon. gentleman still say that he is right?

Mr. McKENZIE: I say that I was talking about stock, not bonds. You may call it debenture stock, but it is stock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But does not the report say that the proportion as recommended of the $3,600,000 is to supply to the guaranteed stock, the preference stock and the common stock, which is share capital? The debenture stock is not share capital at all. It is an other name for bonds and the report makes that clear.

Mr. McKENZIE: It says nothing about debenture stock at all. I had reason to suppose that they were dealing with the property of the company; that we were going to get it when we paid for it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, the property of the shareholders of the company.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the report did not deal with the whole property, that is not my fault.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The report did, but the hon. gentleman mis-stated the report.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did nothing of the kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is not a member of the House who does not see it.

Mr. McKENZIE: I quoted the report word for word, and there it is. Do not let any minister say that I mis-quoted the report, for I did not.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is perfectly within the rules for the minister to say that the hon. gentleman misquoted the report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not wish to take shelter behind the rule; it is absolutely clear that the hon. member did misquote it, and he sticks to it because he says that this money was to discharge the whole thing—debenture stock, preference stock, guaranteed stock and common stock. That was not the report.

Mr. McKENZIE: It may be that I was wrong to that extent, but the bargain is absolutely bad enough for my purposes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, because the hon. gentleman's purposes are purely political. The member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) favoured us with some quotations from Horace or Virgil, I know not which, but as I thought of the blind and confused gyrations through which the hon. gentleman is leading His Majesty's Opposition on this and on other great questions of policy, I was reminded of the famous apostrophe of our own bard:

Man, proud man,
Drest in a little brief authority,
Most ignorant of what he's most assur'd,—
Plays such fantastic tricks before high Heaven,
As make the angels weep.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is the privilege of the hon. gentleman to say these things, but I have nothing to be ashamed of in the course which I have followed.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. gentleman to remember that the minister has the floor.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In regard to this case the hon. gentleman's mistakes were real errors and might be forgiven. I am not so sure that having regard to his whole course as leader in the conduct of other debates there has not been something to be ashamed of.

Referring again to the apprehensions of the hon. member for Royal (Mr. H. H. McLean) the obligations which we assume are set out distinctly in the now historic report which has been before this Parliament for over two years, to which our policy is securely anchored, on which it is built and by which it is justified. We are now negotiating, as the report recommends, as to just the proportion of that $3,600,000 we shall pay. We are compelled to negotiate by way of arbitration for the simple reason that we cannot agree. We take the company's properties, subject to their obligations which the company has in normal times, and up until the last year or so, always discharged out of its earnings; and we assume a proportion of what they have regularly paid to their shareholders. That is the situation. We do that not because we want to, not because we are running out into the highways and by-ways to see what railways we can gather into our system,—that is not the spirit behind the Government's policy,—we do that because we find ourselves in this position: We find ourselves with a system of railways truncated and divided East from West, a system of railways that by its very composition cannot be a complete or successful system. But more than that we do it because we find ourselves saddled with the burden of operating at tremendous loss two great railways which private companies found themselves unable to operate—the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental. The Grand Trunk Pacific operated last year at a loss of $10,300,000 odd and the Transcontinental at a loss of something I think, between five and six millions. These are two roads which were built in my judgment, without any justification. They were badly founded in business sense from the commencement. But if they had any justification, however meagre, however inadequate, it was this: that they were extensions of, and part of, and to be operated with, the Grand Trunk system. Those two railways operated not in conjunction with and as part of the Grand Trunk system could scarcely be said to be railways at all, operation of them I repeat, disjointed from that system, is unjustified on any principle of business or on any principle of national common-sense.

They must be operated in the very body-commercial of that system if they are to serve the purposes for which railways are built. How are we going to do that if we do not acquire this railway? How are we going to do that if we do not stretch out and make the system what it was intended to be? How can we get any even moderately adequate value out of the Grand Trunk Pacific or the Transcontinental? We must unite it up with the great system of which it was built to be a portion, an auxiliary, an extension and integral part. The hon. member refers to the possibility —I have heard of it more than once—of some traffic agreement that we might make with the Grand Trunk that would make that system serve the purposes intended to be served toward the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental. If such an agreement were in the interest of the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk would have been before us to make the agreement long before this; indeed, it would have been in existence long ago. Ah, we are told, you can force it on them. So, perhaps we could, by holding them to their Grand Trunk Pacific obligations; strictly, we might. But here is a company that as it is to-day cannot stand up, cannot at all events continue long under present conditions. How then is it to continue after we have forced upon it an agreement that binds it against its interest to serve the Tanscontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Mr. ROBB: At the last annual meeting of the Grand Trunk shareholders held in London, England, in March, Mr. Smithers is reported to have stated to the shareholders that he made an offer to the Government for an absolute interchange of traffic as between the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk system and to operate that system at cost. Will the minister enlighten the House as to the correctness of that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, they to operate one end and we to operate the other. A moment's consideration of the proposal would convince the hon. member—I do not know whether he has read it or not—that such an idea would manifestly not be in the interest of Canada. They were to get the good and we take the bad. But that is not the traffic agreement I have in mind. A traffic agreement that we forced upon the Grand Trunk railway would make us answerable to the Grand Trunk railway for the penalties which that railway might suffer as a result. Could we answer them by saying: We will not assist you, although we forced upon you a traffic agreement which makes your road subservient to ours and help to make our road pay. Before I leave that, let me repeat that we are asked to do that with a road that is now at the door of the Government for assistance; that now under present conditions is meeting with all manner of difficulties in traversing its path. But we have had traffic agreements with the Grand Trunk; we have had an agreement for interchange at Montreal with the Intercolonial, and what has been the result? Any man in this House who understands railway business will know that, unless there is a definite selfish purpose to be served by a road in living up to traffic agreement, that traffic agreement will never serve the other road. There are a thousand evasions oven, all manner of them, and you cannot follow them up. Have we ever been able to do so with the traffic agreement we had? It has been one continual process of dispute and arbitration ever since it was entered into and with no satisfactory results, and that was a traffic agreement only as to a small specific matter of local interchange. But a traffic agreement that is intended practically to make one big system operate in unison with another, especially a traffic agreement in any way contracted under duress, is wholly impracticable and ineffectual. That is our position.

It is worth while to add that if such an arrangement were in practice by any means made effective, it would have the practical result of bringing this system in any event under the wing of the Government subject to Government dictation and entailing Government responsibility. It would have all the disadvantages and none of the merits of complete government ownership, operation and control. Therefore, the fact is not that we are eagerly seeking after new responsibilities; we are not; we are not in a financial position to seek new responsibilities that we can legitimately avoid; the fact is that we find ourselves in 12 p.m. a position at once onerous and grave—a position that can be relieved and improved only by the acquisition of a system that makes our own system real; that makes our present system an operating possibility and a probable success. That is why we take the course that we do. I have heard many objections and I know there are many hon. members who, if they were given a choice between assuming these responsibilities and simply standing aside without any responsibilities at all, would gladly take the second alternative—many an hon. member on both sides would, I believe, gladly do that—but we are not in that position. We cannot get out of responsibilities, it is only a case of choosing which class of responsibility we shall assume, and any criticism of these proposals that is not accompanied by an alternative proposal that will meet the stern necessities binding on us at this time is of no value by way of criticism. It is a waste of words and should pass by us as the idle wind. We have been addressed by prominent business men, as prominent indeed, as the very respectable gentleman (Mr. Amyot) quoted by the honourable member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon). We have been addressed from many quarters, I feel, by big business even which seems on this subject to be allied with honourable gentlemen opposite. We have been addressed with objections to government ownership in theory, principle and practice and all the rest of it. But we have never been addressed from big business or little business, from politician or stateman or newspaper or any one else with any workable alternative that we could put in place of the proposals which we now venture to advance. Standing squarely and facing these facts, is it not the duty of Parliament to support the Government in the course we are pursuing? Is it not the duty of honourable members of this House to make clear to the people of this country our real position, not an enviable position, it is true, but a very real position that we are now in—and show them what is undoubtedly the truth, namely, that we are making the best of a bad situation, seeking to the best of our capacity as representatives of the people to take a course in the best and final interest of all?

On the motion of Mr. Robb, the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Honourable Mr. Doherty the House adjourned at 12.05 a.m. Thursday.

Thursday, October 23, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

HON. W. L. MACKENZIE KING.

INTRODUCED TO THE HOUSE BY MR. McKENZIE AND HON. MR. FIELDING.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a certificate of the election and return of the Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King for the electoral district of Prince, P.E.I.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to you Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, member-elect for the county of Prince, Prince Edward Island, who has taken the oath, signed the roll, and now desires to take his seat.

Mr. SPEAKER: Let the hon. member take his seat.

PRIVILEGE—STATEMENT BY HON. J. D. REID.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways): Mr. Speaker, there has been brought to my attention, an article appearing in the Regina Leader of 20th inst. in which reference is made to an alleged meeting between myself and other members of the Government, and Sir William Mackenzie, Sir Clifford Sifton and others at Sir William Mackenzie's private car in Ottawa, on or about October 10. The intention is to endeavour to create the impression that the latter two gentlemen were in some way interested in, or consulted, with regard to the Government's policy as to the acquirement of the Grand Trunk Railway system. Other papers antagonistic to the Government's policy have sought also to disseminate this idea.

I desire to say that the article in question is a false and malevolent fabrication from beginning to end. There has been at no time, consultation, conference or any communication whatever, between the Government and either of these gentlemen, directly or indirectly, in any form or manner whatsoever, with regard to the policy of the Government or anything relating thereto. There was no such meeting as alleged, or anything bearing the faintest resemblance to it.

Upon enquiry, I find Sir William Mackenzie was not in the city at that time nor for a considerable time before and after. The article is nothing more or less than a disreputable attempt to malign these persons as well as the members of the Government, and these and all other attempts to induce the people to believe that the persons referred to are in any way associated with, or interested in the Government's policy in this matter, are nothing but vulgar mendacity.

CANADA AND NAVAL DEFENCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): I desire to call the attention of the Government to a despatch which appears in this morning's paper and to ask a question with reference thereto. The despatch in question is a cablegram from Melbourne, Australia, purporting to give a summary of a report which has been made by Lord Jellicoe, and in the course of the message the following occurs:

> The report declares that the naval interests of the empire will likely demand within the next five years a strong far eastern fleet comprising vessels of the Royal Navy East Indian squadron and Australian, Canadian and New Zealand navies. The report suggests that each dominion and India and also Great Britain should bear the cost of vessels specially allocated for the defence of their own harbours. The annual cost of maintenance of the far eastern fleet is estimated at twenty million pounds sterling. Australia's share would be four million.

I would like to ask the Minister of Justice, who seems to be leading the House, if he has any information to give on this subject and if Canada is to be taxed in the way described.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Acting Prime Minister): The Government is not in possession of any report such as referred to, and I do not think the hon. gentleman need be apprehensive that taxation will be imposed on Canada because of any views that Admiral Jellicoe may entertain, or otherwise than by the action of the Canadian Parliament.

THE TARIFF—CANADIAN MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I wish to ask the Government another question. The newspapers stated yesterday that a meeting, conference or interview had taken place between certain representatives of the Government and representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers Association. I would like to know whether any demand has been made by that association for an increase in the tariff, and if so what reply has been made to that demand?

Mr. DOHERTY: There was no conference whatever bearing in any way on the tariff or any question relating to it.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the hon. gentleman state the nature of the interview?

Mr. DOHERTY: The gentlemen desired to make certain representations to the Government with reference to what would be, in their opinion, better methods to adopt in connection with questions affecting the high cost of living, and so forth. There was no reference to the tariff.

Mr. MURPHY: They referred to Monday's elections?

Mr. DOHERTY: They did not mention them.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM.

BILL PROVIDING FOR THE ACQUISITION OF THE SYSTEM BY THE GOVERNMENT.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Reid for the second reading of Bill No. 33, respecting the acquisition by His Majesty of the Grand Trunk railway system, and the amendment thereto of Mr. D. D. McKenzie.

Mr. F. S. CAHILL (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, very little new light has been shed upon this question since it was first introduced into the House, but I presume it is the intention of the Government, when we get into Committee of the Whole on the Bill, to furnish us with certain information, provided they have it.

Last night when the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) was speaking in reference to the attitude of the Liberal party on the Canadian Northern purchase, he said that the Liberal Administration of 1916 had advocated and supported a policy of arbitrating the value of the stock of that railway and its assumption by the country on the basis of arbitration. He pointed out that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) had stated that when they made the proposal to take over the road it was on the basis that not more than $30,000,000 should be paid for the stock. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) also informed the House that the Government of the day loaned the Canadian Northern people $35,000,000—I believe the correct figure is $40,000,000—and that therefore the assets of the company were worth more than they were before this money was advanced to them. In other words, he argues that the more money the Dominion Government loaned to the company the more the stock of that company would be worth, and therefore his Government was justified in paying $10,000,000 for what was described by the Drayton-Acworth report as worthless stock.

Much has been said, Mr. Speaker, during this debate, and also during the debate in the previous session, with regard to the railway policy of the Liberal party, which many hon. members opposite claim to be responsible for the present involved railway situation in this country. I have been looking up the figures on this question, and I find that during the period from 1896 to 1911—15 years, the total aid granted by the Liberal Administration to all railways in Canada was $48,000,000. That information will be found on page 436 of the year book for 1917. During the period from 1911 to 1917—6 years, the Conservative Administration advanced $37,000,000 by way of cash aid to our railways. In other words, during six years they advanced an amount within $10,000,000 or $11,000,000 of the total aid granted by the Liberal Administration during the much longer period of 15 years. Those figures will be found at page 413 of the year book for 1918. But it may be argued, Mr. Speaker, that it was not the system of cash grants which stimulated so much railway construction, but the guaranteeing of bonds. I find that for the period from 1896 to 1911 bonds were guaranteed to the extent of $85,000,000 by the Liberal Administration; but between 1911 and 1918 $103,000,000 worth of bonds were guaranteed by the Conservative Administration. So that there is apparently no foundation for the statement made by some hon. members opposite that the present railway position is a legacy from the Liberal party.

During the period from 1896 to 1911, 10,000 miles of railway were constructed under the Liberal Administration, or an average of 670 miles per year. Between 1911 and 1917 under the Conservative Administration 13,000 miles of railway were built, or an average of 2,100 miles per year. During the period between 1896 and 1911 the colonization of the country kept pace with our railway construction. According to the Drayton-Acworth report there were 285 people to every mile of railway in this country in 1896. In 1911 the report gives the population at the same figure, but it goes on to say that in 1917 there were only 185 people to every mile of railway. So that the Conservative Government during the period between 1911 and 1917 apparently forgot about colonization and embarked on the policy of guaranteeing bonds and giving cash assistance to stimulate railroad construction all through the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, much has been said about the folly of the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental. I was in Saskatoon in 1905, and I remember survey parties of the Grand Trunk Pacific going through to Edmonton, running their surveys from the South Saskatchewan to where the railway was to be constructed to the North Saskatchewan at Edmonton, a territory comprising 300 miles of the very finest land, with practically not a settler on it. The Grand Trunk Pacific opened up that territory. The Transcontinental in the East also opened up the magnificent territory running through the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario. But again the policy of this Government was to discourage settlement in that territory, and that discouragement, coupled with the bad railway service, has made it impossible to induce settlers to come in, although there are some 15,000 inhabitants in the territory in the province of Quebec immediately east of the Ontario boundary living in a very fine country, and it would be an exceedingly prosperous country if the people had proper railway facilities to enable them to take out their products and develop the land.

We are also told, Mr. Speaker, that the Grand Trunk under their agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental were unable to live up to its terms on account of the high cost of the Transcontinental. I believe the Transcontinental was estimated to cost in the neighbourhood of $60,000,000 odd. The final returns show that the cost was in the neighbourhood of $160,000,000. Well, Mr. Speaker, if this road did cost $100,000,000 more than was originally estimated, could not an arrangement have been made with the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific to assume the liabilities of the road on the basis of the first estimated cost of $60,000,000 odd? If the Grand Trunk Pacific were made to live up to the original agreement with the Government, an adjustment might have been made on the basis of what they considered in the original estimate was the fair cost of the road. The Grand Trunk then in turn could have been forced to live up to their agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific in regard to the bonds of the latter which they guaranteed.

No reason has been given why the Grand Trunk was not made to live up to its agreement in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Hon. gentlemen tell us that it would be impossible to live up to that agreement. Well, if it would be impossible to live up to that agreement why do the Government pay $60,000,000 to the Grand Trunk Railway Company before they undertake to make that company live up to its obligations in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific? But they had no intention of asking the company to live up to that undertaking; the Minister of the Interior, who was in charge of the negotiations, states quite clearly that he has no such intention. In his letter of July 11, 1918—which, he tells us, is the basis of the negotiations which we are now asked to complete—he said:

> The Government to take over the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway and branch lines and the Grand Trunk Railway Company; to acquire all assets, and to assume all obligations of both companies.

There is absolutely no question of asking the Grand Trunk Pacific to live up to their obligations or the Grand Trunk to live up to its obligation in regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific. He goes on to say that the Grand Trunk could not do so, but in the very next breath he says that although the company are unable to pay the $97,000,000 which we claim they owe us, we will pay them $60,000,000 before we attempt to arbitrate the amount of our claim against the Grand Trunk. There is no foundation whatever for the purchase on the basis of inability of the Grand Trunk to meet their obligations in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific agreement; at least, no argument to that effect has been substantiated here.

A fairly good argument, however, has been put up by the ministers in charge of this Bill on behalf of the Grand Trunk. When we refer to the Drayton-Acworth report, which points out that some thirty millions should have been spent on maintenance, up-keep and betterments, and ask what condition the Grand Trunk Railway system is in, they tell us: "Well, the president of the company says that the road is in first-class shape and that the company are able to pay dividends." But the report of these experts, on the basis of which the Government are attempting to purchase this road—and that is the only advice which they have on the subject—states that the road is not in good condition and that it is not in a position to pay dividends. Yet members of the Government tell us, when they bring the Bill before the House, that they have the assurance of the President of the Grand Trunk Railway Company that the road is in first-class order. In other words, the man who is selling them the gold brick says that it is pure gold.

Mr. Speaker, in Committee on the resolution, I and a number of members on this side attempted to get some information from the Government, and the reply that we received was very much like the speech of the Minister of the Interior last night in which he gave absolutely no information, said very little, if anything, pertaining to the subject, and did little more than attempt to ridicule members on this side for asking for information. On page 41 of the blue-book I find that the total funded debt of the Grand Trunk undertaking amounts to $448,000,000. Add to that the $60,833,000 of 4 per cent guaranteed stock, which has practically become a funded debt, and we get $509,000,000; and if we add to that the current liabilities we get a total of $579,885,000 as the capital sum on which we are agreeing to pay interest if we acquire this railway system. I am not giving these figures as correct, because no information is available that we can speak of as being correct; but I ask the Government to state what the exact figures are, if these are not correct.

In answer to a question, the Minister of Interior takes up the blue-book and says: "Can the members not read the statement which appears here? There are two sides to it; the totals on both sides are the same." But he does not tell us what the liabilities are, what the assets are or what the totals are. He states that there are notes payable, liabilities amounting to $35,000,000 and another item of current liabilities amounting to $22,000,000; and he says that there are current assets to offset that amounting to $51,000,000. I ask for the details of that item of current assets. Surely a matter of forty or fifty millions is of sufficient importance to justify even this Government in satisfying itself whether or not these are real assets. If these assets are liabilities of the different companies that we are taking over —liabilities to the parent company—certainly they would not be a liquid asset in any sense of the word. That is one of the items that I would like to have cleared up.

The Minister of the Interior tells us that the Grand Trunk statement is the statement to accept with regard to the liabilities that we are assuming. But when we assume the liabilities under the Grand Trunk purchase we are assuming all the liabilities of that undertaking, including the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the other subsidiary companies; and that is not shown in the Grand Trunk statement. We should have a statement of the assets and of the liabilities of the whole undertaking so that the people will know what this legislation means and what it amounts to.

The President of the Council (Hon. Mr. Rowell) made what I thought was a significant remark in his address the night before last when he said that we must get these railroads all together; that we have one end in the West and another end in the East and that for operating purposes it is absolutely necessary to get them all in with the Canadian National, and that if at any future time we hand it over or dispose of it, it will be a more valuable asset with the Grand Trunk included. Now, that is just what I fear; that when the Government make a huge loss in operation they will hand the system over to some persons, and those persons are likely to be the present operators of the Canadian National railways —the Mackenzie and Mann crowd. The minister said that the national railways should be efficiently managed, and when I asked him if they were efficiently managed, he said that they were. But it is common knowledge to any one who has anything to do with the Canadian National railways that they are not efficiently managed. I doubt whether one manufacturer out of ten in Canada would route his stuff over the Canadian National railways in preference to the Canadian Pacific if he had the choice. They are not efficiently managed; they are managed purely and simply for the people who are controlling them—the Canadian Northern crowd, Mackenzie and Mann and Lash and Hanna, who are selling supplies to this company, constructing lines for it and making profits out of it.

In answer to the member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) the Minister of Railways stated that in one year the deficit in operating the Canadian National railways has been $15,000,000 and interest charges $19,000,000, and that the Grand Trunk Pacific deficits and interest charges would be not less than $12,000,000, making altogether $46,000,000 that the Canadian people are out of pocket in respect of one year's operation of these systems.

I should like to know how much money is being made by the people who are handling the undertaking, the people who have the privilege of buying the ties, rails and other supplies of all kinds for this undertaking and who are paying absolutely no attention to the management of the railway except so far as their own interest is concerned. The condition of the railway has been allowed to run down throughout the country; it is getting in bad odour everywhere it is being operated, and even the operation of the Intercolonial is not as good as it was before it was taken over by the Canadian National railways.

Facing this condition, hon. members say that we must acquire the Grand Trunk.

There is only one purpose for taking that course. One of the ministers said that it was the policy of the Government since 1911 to have public ownership and management of railways. I did not know that this Government had been in office since 1911; but apparently the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) was quite satisfied with that statement, and he said that it was the policy of this Government to own and operate the railways of Canada. But they all balk at the Canadian Pacific; they will not go so far as to acquire that railway. They are quite willing to go as far as building up a competing line to hand over to the Canadian Northern, but they will not go a step further. They are willing to pay any price for the Grand Trunk. If hon. members were honest in their advocacy of public ownership, the first thing they would want to do would be to get the railway at a reasonable and fair price. Prior to the purchase of the Canadian Northern by the Government $100,000,000 worth of unguaranteed securities was circulated. The Government would not furnish us with the information as to who held those securities, which were passed out to friends of Mackenzie and Mann before the purchase was made. The Drayton-Acworth report will tell you that there was against this road $100,000,000 worth of securities more than the road was worth; yet these hon. gentlemen tell us that it was in the name, and for the sake of public ownership that we must pay these exorbitant prices. When we come to the purchase of the Grand Trunk, the same thing occurs. The first thing they do is to advance $60,000,000 worth of stock to persons unknown, but it is intimated in the press that these people must have had knowledge from governmental sources, because the stocks were bound to advance as soon as they were guaranteed by the Government. They did advance, and there is no doubt that some people will, in less than a year make anywhere from thirty to forty million dollars out of this transaction. Why does the Government not reserve that for the people of Canada who are furnishing the money to acquire this railway? What reason is there for giving some people $60,000,000 before you attempt to set a price on the property by arbitration? As regards one item of $40,000,000 or $50,000,000, I do not know whether it is worth a cent or not, and that without taking into consideration anything of the value of the undertaking. We agree to pay the shareholders of the Grand Trunk $60,000,000, and then we agree to arbitrate the value, if any, of the property. We release them from their Grand Trunk obligation and from their National Transcontinental obligations, and we give them $60,000,000 and then arbitrate as to the value, if any, of the property. Just because they write across the cheque "for public ownership" the Government think they can issue a cheque for any amount they may desire. The Government are not satisfied with paying these exhorbitant prices; but in order that their friends may be safe, they appoint an arbitration commission. Does the report of arbitration come back to Parliament for the money to be voted? Not at all. The Government by Order in Council take the right to issue a cheque for whatever amount the arbitrators may decide upon. They give power to that arbitration to enable them to pay out to their friends money that Parliament would not give to the Government; that the Government would not dare to come to Parliament and ask the privilege of issuing cheques for and of spending money without submitting their estimates to Parliament; but in this case they purpose issuing a cheque for an unlimited amount without the sanction of Parliament. It looks to me as though there was something very urgent about this deal so far as the Government of Canada was concerned.

The minister stated that the deal was finally completed after prolonged negotiations. The negotiations were cut off after July 11, 1918. The Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company said that he did not understand the letter of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen), and he took it to the Prime Minister of Canada and asked for an explanation. The Prime Minister said that the letter meant the same offer as was made in February of that year, but in that letter there is this paragraph which might be construed differently:

> Should the company desire, the guaranteed stock may be treated as an obligation in the same way as the company's bonds.

But the Prime Minister said that that did not mean anything and Sir Alfred Smithers, Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Grand Trunk said that it did not mean anything. The Prime Minister said that the offer was practically the offer made in February of that year, so that the transaction which was brought in the last days of this session was an entirely brand new transaction; it was a transaction based upon an understanding arrived at between Sir Alfred Smithers and the Minister of the Interior, an understanding of which Parliament and the country had absolutely no knowledge. There never before was any suggestion that these bonds would be guaranteed first and the value, if any, of the balance of the stock arbitrated afterwards. The suggestion was never made in the Drayton-Acworth report, and we are now asked, in the last days of a session that was called for another purpose, to sanction this purchase. The Government come down with a proposal on which they have absolutely no information. They do not know what liabilities the country is assuming; they do not know what the assets amount to; they have no idea whether the road is worth the funded debt or not, nor whether the stock is of any value or not. But they first give $60,000,000 worth of stock so as to make their friends safe before they attempt to arbitrate, and they tell us that they must get this road in order to complete a system with connections at both ends that will be useful to their friends, the Canadian Northern crowd. The Minister of the Interior said last night that it was impossible to make a working arrangement, as suggested by Mr. Kelly, President of the Grand Trunk, between the Canadian National railways and the Grand Trunk Railway system. In the United States, there is not one railroad running from the Eastern States or from New York clear to the Pacific coast. There are five railways through the Western States, all of them with working arrangements with Eastern railways. There is not in the United States one line owned from coast to coast. Therefore, they are all under working arrangements, and why could we not have a working arrangement if it were in the best interest of the country? The Government were apparently very anxious to bring forward this matter as a public ownership proposition. I for one do not know that I would be very much opposed to public ownership of railways provided that the undertaking were managed by an efficient Liberal administration; but public ownership of railways managed by the present Administration with the assistance and connivance of the Mackenzie and Mann interests is something to which I am absolutely opposed, and I think it will be found that the country will be opposed to it too.

Mr. WILLIAM FOSTER COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, before entering upon a discussion of the subject before the House, may I be permitted to extend my congratulations to the new arrival (Mr. Mackenzie King), who is in our midst today? He is a King from Prince, I am told, and we have now the satisfaction of seeing three gallant leaders on the Opposition side. It is a triumvirate of wisdom, because wise men come from the East, it is said, although they sometimes have the wisdom to stay in the West when they get there. We trust that under the guidance of these three hon. gentlemen the Opposition will see new daylight on the railway question.

I hope that the hands of the Opposition have not been tied by the amendment that has been moved. I understand that the hon. leader who has just taken his seat has full knowledge of the amendment, and if he has not I commend it to his early and serious consideration. He is a man who has long stood for the cause of labour and is recognized as a very high authority on many aspects of labour questions, and I could scarcely conceive him giving his full assent to a policy that excludes public ownership from the policies to be pursued in Canada in the interests of labour particularly. Coming, as I do, from a workingman's city, I know that public ownership has been one of the strongest planks in the labour platform for many years. Labour believes that public utilities of all kinds should be owned and operated in the interests of the people, and that appears to me to be a fairly sound plank in the platform of labour. It is several years since I gave my assent to the proposition of ownership by the people themselves of public utilities in the municipal, provincial and Dominion fields, and if there are profits accruing from the operation of these great utilities, which are really using the public resources, they should accrue to the people who should own and operate these utilities. I think that principle is fairly well accepted now by the larger number of our public men, and of the people of Canada.

The Bill before us, Bill No. 33, for the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway, is one of the most difficult and intricate that it has been my lot to endeavour to make a few remarks upon during my parliamentary career, and I do not blame the Opposition in any sense if they have not fully mastered what is contained within the four corners of the measure now before the House. I have done my utmost on this occasion as on previous occasions to fathom this railway question, and the few remarks I have to offer this afternoon are from the standpoint of a business man who is looking, I trust, to the best interests of Canada as a whole, and trying to see daylight through the chaos that prevails in the railway world at the present time. Canada embarked, not to-day, nor yesterday, but several years ago upon a somewhat reckless policy of building railways, and while it may be said that we have not got value for our money I am hopeful that in the long run the optimism and the business acumen that may have been displayed in the construction of these roads will not prove to be altogether wasted, but that the roads will eventually redound to the advantage of the country, and not only serve the people efficiently, but at the same time afford a return to the pockets of the taxpayers of the country who have to support these great undertakings.

The figures that have been presented to the House are so conflicting and confusing that I have had very great difficulty in ascertaining just what this Bill involves. I shall endeavour to give just my own view, holding no one responsible in any sense for any thing I shall say on this question. I have endeavoured to arrive at the sum of the obligations that we are undertaking by this legislation, the amount of the annual interest that will have to be paid, and the questions involved in the operation of this intricate system known as the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada. In the first place this system presents difficulties that do not face any other railway in the Dominion of Canada. I hold in my hand a map showing the ramifications of the Grand Trunk, of its branch lines, subsidiaries, leased lines, and so on, in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and in the adjacent states to the east and west in the United States. The whole of it is a labyrinth of railway construction of trunk lines, cross-country lines, and so on, some of them under lease, some of them rented, and some of them merged into one heterogeneous and, I trust, a somewhat homogeneous whole. It is certainly an eye-opener to look at this map and see the various lines that are involved in this system. I have consulted what I consider to be one or two of the best railway authorities who have studied this question, and the views that I give are confirmed more or less by these authorities. Let me give an extract from the report of the Royal Commission, commonly known as the Drayton-Acworth report, showing what they recommend to the Parliament and people of Canada as the best course to take in dealing with this great railway question. The recommendations are very brief, and I think it is wise for us to bear them in mind at the present moment, because at the time that commission was appointed we believed it was composed of the most able railway men to be found in Canada, and the United States for that matter, because one of the commissioners was a citizen of the United States. Their recommendations are found on page lii of the report and are as follows:

1. That a Board of Trustees be constituted by Act of Parliament and incorporated as "The Dominion Railway Company."

2. That the ownership of the Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk, and Grand Trunk Pacific Railways be vested in this company.

3. That the Government assume responsibility to the company for the interest on the existing securities of these undertakings.

4. That the Intercolonial (including the Prince Edward Island) and National Transcontinental Railways be also handed over by the Government to the company.

5. That the whole of these railways, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Intercolonial, and the National Transcontinental, be operated by the company as one united system.

This day, are these recommendations fulfilled in your ears,—to use a Scriptural phrase,—because every one of these roads has been acquired, or will have been acquired when this legislation becomes effective, and will be operated under one management. That will give public ownership a chance to show what it can do. With all deference to those who say that public ownership has been an entire failure up to date, in my judgment it is too early to make any such statement, because up to the present time public ownership has never had a fair show in the Dominion. I am surprised that these leaders on the other side of the House, two of them coming from down East, are prepared, so far as we have heard from them, to oppose public ownership, when they were willing to submit to public ownership so long as it served the eastern provinces at a loss to the rest of the Dominion, as has been the case for the last thirty or forty years with the Intercolonial railway. I do not recall in my twelve or fifteen years' experience in this House ever hearing these gentlemen denounce the public operation of the Intercolonial, because it was serving the Maritime Provinces in many instances at less than cost. I not only make that statement with confidence but I can recall, as can the hon. members recall, that on different occasions hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have said that when the Transcontinental railway was built it was never the intention of the Dominion to make that railway pay. It was built as an obligation undertaken at Confederation by the Government of Canada. I have heard that argument advanced with considerable skill by hon. members opposite, who have contended that passenger rates should not be increased to a paying basis, and freight rates should not be made paying rates because it was an undertaking with the Maritime Provinces that this railway should be run for their benefit, no matter whether it was operated at a loss or not. Therefore I say that the results of operation of the Intercolonial for the past thirty or forty years cannot be by any means an evidence that public ownership is an entire failure, even in the case of that railway itself. True, you may ask, Sir, what about the Canadian Northern railway? Well, the Canadian Northern has been in the possession of the Government for nearly two years, but I desire to point out that that railway has not so far had a fair chance to show what it can do, and I believe that we have received good value in its purchase. I have stood by it on every platform where anything to the contrary has been said, and I have yet to see in the debates on that question the opponents of the Canadian Northern get anything but the worst of a contest with any one who is at all acquainted with the terms on which that railway was obtained. It is the cheapest railway on the North American continent, costing about $44,000 or $45,000 per mile. It is well located and has put on the map many of the towns and cities in the West. These prosperous communities have sprung up because the Canadian Northern went through and built up that part of the country. The Canadian Northern up to the present has been operated by the Government only under war conditions, because, though the war was terminated nearly a year ago, costs of operation are higher than ever they have been, and I think it is well for hon. members to bear this fact in mind, for it is applicable to the situation and is one cogent reason why the Canadian Northern is not paying. It is between the upper and nether millstones, so to speak. Operating expenses consisting of fuel, labour, material, repairs, etc., have gone up about 100 per cent within the last five years. During that time we have had two advances in freight and passenger rates, one of 15 per cent, and another of 25 per cent, making a total of 40 per cent. During this period the operating expenses, as I say, have advanced about 100 per cent, and the railways—this statement embraces the Canadian Pacific railway as well—have not been allowed to fix their freight and passenger rates at paying prices in consideration of the high cost of operation that now prevails in Canada. This, therefore, is but a fair consideration to have in our minds when we assert that the Canadian Northern is not paying and cannot pay. This is a factor that cannot be lost sight of, and in my judgment it explains to a very large extent why up to date we have a deficit on the operation of all Government railways. The rates have not been advanced to suit the times. We have been compelled—

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (Simcoe): The hon. member must bear in mind that there has been an advance of twenty-five or thirty-five per cent.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I have already said there has been an advance of 40 per cent, and if the hon. gentleman had been listening he would have heard my statement. But I say that 40 per cent is not enough under the circumstances and consequently we have not got the railways on a paying basis up to the present. It is now proposed by this Bill to go a step further and to supply what has been lacking in the recommendations of the Drayton-Acworth report—that is, the acquisition of the Grand Trunk proper.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will my hon. friend permit me a question?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Assuredly.

Mr. McKENZIE: I know he is a good business man and I should like to know how long he would give the roads to demonstrate whether or not they will be successful from a financial standpoint?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: That is a question for the future, but I should judge that from three to five years would be a very moderate period in which to allow these railways to get into sucessful operation in such a way as to reward the business interests of Canada for the tremendous investment in the roads. I think that from three to five years is the shortest time within which the board can get these railways into thoroughly co-operative organization and operation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that one of the main reasons why public ownership is not the success that we should like to see it—and this is rather a delicate point, although I think it is only fair to mention it—is that in the eastern portion of Canada there seems to be a group of forces that are antagonistic to the principle of public ownership. I should like to commend my good friend from Cape Breton North, whom I may now call Leader of the Opposition No. 2, although until quite recently he has acted ably as Leader No. 1, on the fact—

Mr. McKENZIE: Pardon me; Cape Breton North "and Victoria."

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I accept the correction. Cape Breton North and Victoria then —not a leader?

Mr. McKENZIE: No.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Well, I congratulate my hon. friend on the fact that he has done his best during his leadership, and he has handed over a legacy to his successor which it will be difficult to shoulder. However, the hon. gentleman has placed himself in opposition to public ownership. I regret that in the province of Quebec, and to a certain extent in the Maritime Provinces, there is a very considerable consolidation in opposition to public ownership. And I want to say to my hon. friend in all sincerity that if he were on this side to-morrow and leading the Government, he could not get away from the fact that public ownership is here, and here to stay. In the face of that indisputable fact, is it not folly to go on pounding public ownership and depreciating properties that we have bought and paid for and others that we are about to acquire? Surely it is not a nice bird that fouls its own nest, and it is not good patriotism to depreciate the securities of one's own country. My good friend from Cape Breton North and Victoria must recognize that this country owning as it does already some fourteen to sixteen thousand miles of railway is very largely interested in public ownership, and if he were administering the affairs of Canada to-morrow he could not upset that arrangement. It is here to stay and I beseech him as a true citizen of Canada to cease pounding this property and rather to begin to boost it. The greatest stumbling block in the progress of public ownership is the fact that in some sections of the country there is too much pounding of these railways. The attitude is this: "I told you so. You went into it and we succeeded in making it a loss just as we told you." Is that the kind of citizenship we want in Canada? I trow not. I am free to say to my hon. friend that when the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental proposition was brought before the House in 1903-04, I fought it for all I was worth, both in the House and in the country. I take no responsibility, so far as I am concerned, for the building of that road. I fought it strenuously, believing that it was going to be a white elephant, as I termed it at that time, and I won out my first election in fighting that particular railway project. I thought it was a very wildcat scheme at the time.

But what is the use to-day in getting up and telling the House that that railway is not worth five cents on the dollar? It is absolutely useless to do so. We have the railway on our hands and it is our duty to make the best of it. Our money is in it and we are not going to be benefited by abusing and belittling the property. We are not going to get any money out of it by saying that the enterprise cannot be made to pay. As true citizens, we ought all to take pride in the National railways of Canada. We ought all to set ourselves to boost our own property and to endeavour to make a success of public ownership. Success should be the guiding star in this respect of every truly loyal citizen of Canada.

Do not let us say: "We are prophets of evil and we told you so and now fry in your own fat and stew in your own juice, so to speak, and get out of it as best you can." No, that is not the spirit and I ask my good friends in Quebec, and in the city of Montreal particularly, to think this over—because I have myself received many communications endeavouring to influence me more or less on this question. But my mind has been made up. I said some years ago on the floor of the House that I was in favour of public ownership and I have not yet seen any reason why I should change this view. It is true it has not worked out altogether as I expected nor altogether as I had hoped; but with the rounding out of this great railway scheme, with the purchase of the Grand Trunk and the giving of that loyal support that should be given to a great national enterprise, there is no reason why, in the no distant future, we should not have a favourable financial showing from the enterprise. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, as I say, that these hostile influences, particularly in Quebec, should be prevalent to a very considerable extent. I trust that these citizens, who I think are misguided in continuing their opposition, however rightly they may have intended it in the first place, may change their views. I admit that once on a time I was opposed to public ownership. But the times change; progress is made; the world becomes more enlightened; and it would be shutting our eyes to all that is reasonable and right if we were to say: "Oh, well, private enterprise has always been good enough in Canada to conduct all the railways; it has been good policy even to the extent of the Government handing over lands and money subsidies, and all that, to railways all the time up to date, and what was in the beginning shall be now and continue hereafter." That surely is a short-sighted policy. Therefore, I trust that our good friends, particularly in the province of Quebec—and now I have in mind the very highly-trained business men and the vast business interests to be found in that province—should change their tune on this question. And when I say that, Mr. Speaker, I want it to be distinctly understood that I am just as friendly as I possibly can be to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have, both in Canada and abroad, time and again pointed to the magnificent Canadian Pacific as a monument to Canadian enterprise. I look upon it as the shining masterpiece of organization and of business success in Canada, and probably nowhere in the world has a transportation company achieved as great a success as has the Canadian Pacific Railway. All honour to it, I have always been its friend. I do not want to be considered anything but its friend now when I advocate the public ownership of railways in Canada. The very first public address I ever delivered, was on the building of the Canadian Pacific railway in the year 1882. I spoke strongly then in favour of the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway; and from that day down to this I have always viewed that enterprise with just pride. I consider that the management has been most effective, and we all know that railway is looked upon as one of the most wonderful transportation organizations the world has ever known. All honour to the Canadian Pacific Railway; it is not out of any spirit of antagonism that I now advocate that the other railways in Canada be amalgamated into one gigantic property, and operated and developed for the advantage of Canada as a whole.

I do not wish to dwell upon this question of public ownership further but I want to give a few figures as to what I apprehend we are undertaking to spend upon the Grand Trunk railway. It is true that the blue-book that has been placed in our hands, containing the correspondence relating to this arrangement, is a little difficult to understand. Referring, however, to the last page in the book, page 56, you will see there what has been paid in recent years by the Grand Trunk Company to its shareholders. I find that until the years 1917 and 1918 in the guaranteed stock four per cent was paid each year. That amounted to about $2,500,000 in round figures. There had never been a failure to pay that until the two years mentioned, 1917 and 1918. I think a word of explanation with regard to the reasons why it was not then paid would perhaps be in order. I understand it is owing to war conditions and very largely to the branch lines of the Grand Trunk in the United States that this result has happened. The McAdoo award fixed the price of labour at a very high figure in the United States, and the Grand Trunk is also subject to the Interstate Commerce regulations which fixed the price of freights to be charged, so that the railway has been, so to speak, between the upper and the nether millstones; it has been ordered to pay high wages and it has had to submit to the ruling of the United States Government as to the amount of freight and passenger rates to be charged which were fixed at less than the Government themselves must have known these railways could be operated at. One reason for that, as I understand it, was to keep down the already high cost of living, because if the railways had been allowed to advance their freight rates, as they should have been considering the cost of operation about 100 per cent, the cost of living would have proportionately increased and therefore they decided that the Government would have to meet it anyway. As the Government are operating the railways over there they preferred to take this loss themselves and to allow the foodstuffs of the people, and the coal and other commodities that were required, to be carried at actually less than the railways could afford in order that the cost of living to the workingman should not be unduly increased.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is the hon. gentleman able to tell us how much the Government increased the railway freight rates over there during the year 1918?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I did not catch the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Government of the United States operated the railways over there in 1918. To what extent did they increase their freight rates? Does the hon. gentleman know to what extent the freight rates were increased?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: No, I am afraid I do not. My information is they increased the rates by very little. The total as handed to me by my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr.

G. B. Nicholson) is 40 per cent. I give that on the authority of my hon. friend, who is a railway expert, and whose figures I have generally found very reliable. My hon. friend says that 40 per cent is the exact amount of the raise over there, while the rates were raised in Canada 15 and 25 per cent. Wages in the meantime had increased, I suppose, fully 100 per cent. Coal has increased well-nigh 100 per cent, if not more in some localities, and was very difficult to get. The cost of all kinds of repairs required by locomotives and by cars and rolling stock generally increased enormously during that time, so that it is not to be wondered at that public operation of the railroads of the United States has turned out a great financial loss. But those railways were endeavouring to serve the nation in order to enable them to win the war, in order to carry their troops, in order to carry munitions of war, and all the supplies for the troops. These supplies and troops, I understand, were carried at a comparatively nominal figure as compared with what they would have been if the Government had been beholden to private companies and the latter choose to charge a paying rate on all the traffic that those roads had by reason of the war. That seemed to me to be a reasonable statement and I cannot comprehend why my hon. friends opposite should wish to advance the argument they have because the United States has lost one to two hundred million per annum or as one of them said yesterday a million and a half a day. I am not quite sure whether it was a million or a million and a half a day, but that is neither here nor there when the question at issue was between the service to the people and the winning of the war, which was the all-important question and to which everything was made subservient during the two years to which I referred.

That seems to me to be a reasonable proposition. But before I was diverted I was setting out to show what I conceive to be the fixed charges that we are obliged to pay under this agreement. In the first place, those charges, as I make them up, are in round figures $11,000,000; that is, interest charges upon advances of one kind and another secured by guaranteed, preference, or debenture stock. Then the Grand Trunk Pacific obligation, from which, I suppose, under the agreement, we will relieve the Grand Trunk; I fix that at about $4,000,000. Then interest on the Grand Trunk guaranteed stock, $2,500,000. In addition, I suppose we are obliged to a certain extent to continue all the bargains the Grand Trunk has made with various lines in the United States with which it is working in co-operation either by lease, traffic agreement, or otherwise. I admit the Grand Trunk has some very entangling alliances with the American roads, and those alliances constitute, to my mind, one of the stumbling blocks in this proposition. I regret that these entangling alliances are a factor in the agreement. I view them with more or less alarm in a way, and still I do not see any reason why the American Government should not treat the Grand Trunk under our control and ownership in as fair a way as it treated the parent company, for which we are now becoming responsible. My figures in the aggregate for interest charges of one kind and another, as near as I can get at them, Mr. Speaker, amount to $18,500,000 per annum. The Grand Trunk has never failed to earn and pay the $11,000,000, which is more than half of the whole amount. Only for two years, as I showed a moment ago from the last page of the Grand Trunk statement, that is, in the years 1917 and 1918, did the Grand Trunk fail to pay interest on the guaranteed stock, and on the first preference stock it has only failed to pay dividends for four years out of the last fifteen or twenty years, and those four years were war years. So we have reason to believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Grand Trunk will continue to earn enough to take care of a very large proportion, if not all, of these fixed charges. One of our hon. friends opposite, the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier), the other night gave some excellent figures, and I have very little fault to find with them, in which he estimates the fixed charges at $20,000,000. The difference between us is only $1,500,000 per annum, and as I have endeavoured to arrive at my figures after careful consideration and study, I think they may be taken as a close estimate. With regard to the war years during which the Grand Trunk failed to pay certain of these stock dividends, if it had been allowed to raise its rates, as I pointed out, to the standard at which a business man would say the railway should be operated, we have no reason to believe that there would have been any failure to meet those fixed charges.

Mr. Speaker, I for one believe that if public ownership in Canada is to be a success we must put it on a business basis and keep it there; a political basis will not do, it will not pay. Our national railway system must be put on a business basis, and every one using our roads for freight or passenger service must be willing to pay fair rates, otherwise we can never hope for successful operation. No merchant could afford to sell goods at less than cost and hope to prosper; and no public ownership undertaking can afford to carry freight and passengers at less than cost and have a nice balance at the end of the year. It cannot be done. We must be willing to pay fair freight and passenger rates, and then with sound business judgment and capable management I am very hopeful indeed, Mr. Speaker, of the results that will be obtained in the next three or five years.

My hon. friend opposite, who has up to date been the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie), made a very interesting speech the other night, and I have perused it with a good deal of sympathy, especially as I found he was more or less confused with figures, the same as I admit I am myself sometimes in viewing such an agreement as this. We cannot blame the hon. gentleman if his figures did not all tally with the presentation made from this side of the [illegible] question, and while [illegible] dered good business to add both out-go and income together and call the total your income, we have the example of the Dominion Government doing that in trade matters, because it is well known that the total trade of the Dominion is made up every year in that way, both exports and imports are added together. No merchant, no manufacturer, no business man would be allowed to publish a balance sheet on that basis, but public officials are a law unto themselves. If a business concern floats a stock issue it is bound to show only what it sells, and must not include what it buys as part of its business. So my hon. friend when he made up his figure of $47,000,000 for annual interest was only adding the two sides together. But even then I do not know where he got the balance, because, according to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier) whom I have already quoted, our annual interest obligation will be $20,000,000 while my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) put it down at $47,000,000 or $48,000,000. I do not blame him. I admit myself that figures are very confusing. But the total was more than double what one of his own followers had estimated it to be, and I am sorry to say in this case the follower was nearer the truth than his leader. That is no reflection upon the leader, because followers sometimes are men of very bright minds.

Mr. McKENZIE: Either the one or the other will show a very bad bargain for the country.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Not necessarily. If we are able to get in $25,000,000 and only have to pay out $20,000,000, we would have a balance of $5,000,000 to the good; and I do not think it is too optimistic to say that within five years with proper management we will have a balance on the right side. I fully believe we will. But this result can only be secured by insisting upon proper management on strictly business lines and absolutely free of politics.

I want to refer for a moment to the amendment moved by my hon. friend, because I think that as a great leader, and as this is perhaps his last public act as leader of the Opposition, it is a pity that he should spoil a good reputation by handing down to posterity a document such as he prepared as an amendment to the Bill now under discussion.

It is one thing, Mr. Speaker, to riddle a policy with holes; it is another thing to put a better policy in its place. If all the statements made in the proposed amendment are true, then it was up to the leader of the Opposition to suggest a better way of dealing with the matter. He gives three reasons why this Bill should not pass; and I think it will not be amiss if we refresh our minds as to what those reasons were. The amendment proposed is as follows:

That the Bill be not read a second time but that the House do come to the following resolution:

That the Bill proposes an uncertain but very large addition to the debt of the Dominion at a time when existing obligations, arising out of the War and from other causes, are so vastly in excess of all previous obligations as to give much cause for anxiety on the part of all who are concerned in the financial position of Canada and the maintenance of the public credit.

That a measure of such wide-reaching character and large importance requires a study by the House and the people that cannot possibly be given in the closing days of the session.

That the present session of Parliament was called for a special purpose which has already been accomplished.

That on Wednesday, October 8th, the Honourable the Minister of Trade and Commerce, acting as leader of the House in the absence of the Prime Minister, stated that the Government's expectation was that the session would close within the then current week.

That under such circumstances the introduction by the Government of a measure of such great importance as the acquisition of the railway and property of the Grand Trunk Company of Canada is improvident and inexpedient.

That for these reasons the further consideration of the Bill be deferred until a future session of this Parliament.

I fail to find in that amendment anything constructive. The hon. gentleman gives three reasons why he would not do it, but he does not tell us how we are going to get out of the woods. We are facing a condition which is not of the Government's seeking; it is a condition which has come down to the Government as a legacy largely from my friends opposite. Let them not forget that, because they can never get away from their responsibility for the Grand Trunk Pacific undertaking, which was the main cause of the crippling—yes, almost the annihilation—of the old Grand Trunk proper when it tried to put into execution a bargain into which it entered with hon. gentlemen many years ago. We tried our best to save them from it, but the Grand Trunk has failed to fulfil its obligations, and for years the Government has been operating the Transcontinental at a loss because the Grand Trunk, which had undertaken to pay three per cent on all the money invested in that road, failed to come forward and fulfil the contract when the road was finished. So that the operation of the road by the Government was not of the Government's own choice; it was because of the bargain which hon. gentlemen opposite, who were at that time in power, made with the Grand Trunk and because of the inability or the lack of desire on the part of the Grand Trunk to carry it out. Later the Grand Trunk commenced the operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific from Winnipeg to the Coast; it has been operated for some years, and always at a loss. I do not think that in any single year it paid operating expenses, and certainly it has not been able to meet any of its interest obligations. That condition, therefore, was not of this Government's seeking; it was a legacy left by hon. gentlemen opposite. This Grand Trunk matter is now up for settlement, and action upon it cannot be postponed. Knowing that, the hon. gentleman tells us where the proposal is all wrong, but he does not give us the slightest constructive thought as to what we are to do under the circumstances. I think, therefore, that he will be condemned throughout the country—at any rate by those who know that this situation has been forced upon the Government and was not of their own seeking. The chickens have been a long time coming home to roost, but they have come home, as we prophesied many years ago—as far back as 1903-04 when the Grand Trunk entered into this wild-cat scheme, along with the Government, of building the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific. That scheme was a white elephant and everybody knew it; it was a political railway from the start; it was not destined to pay. It was fifty years in advance of the times and of the requirements of the country in all that northern section. Whatever may be said with regard to its operation in the West, I believe that that part of it can be made to pay, provided there is proper management, where the line does not too closely parallel the Canadian Northern.

Of course, we are blamed for assisting the Canadian Northern. But who began the main assistance which was given to the Canadian Northern? It was not hon. gentlemen who are now on this side. The grant given by the Laurier Government some ten or twelve years ago of $35,000,000 in respect to the northern section above lake Superior was the beginning of our serious troubles in connection with the Canadian Northern. From that time on it was inevitable that the interests of the Government of Canada and the Canadian Northern Railway system should be so linked up that they could never be separated. It was not within the bounds of possibility that the Canadian Northern could relieve itself of its immense obligations in respect of the aid given to it by the Government, so that two years ago it came into our hands. The Intercolonial was already there. The Grand Trunk Pacific is now in the hands of a receiver, and is about to come under Government control. The Transcontinental has been in the hands of the Government for some time, and now we are to have the Grand Trunk. The Grand Trunk is an old parent company for which I have a great deal of sympathy; but I do not want to see the country get soaked in the terms embodied in this measure. There are one or two features of the measure that I am not very clear about and that I do not like very much.

Section 6 is one which gives me cause for hesitation and uncertainty; it provides for the method of arbitration. It is proposed by that section that the Board of Arbitration shall consist of three judges. Now, I have a great respect for the Bench and for our courts of justice, but on a question such as this I would rather take the opinion of a great railway man or an excellent business man than that of a judge; and I say that without any disrespect. I do not think that we should have three judges on the Board of Arbitration. I look upon that provision as a weak spot in the Bill.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend is under a misapprehension. The Bill does not provide for three judges; it simply provides that in case the two arbitrators who are appointed, one for the Government and one for the railway, do not agree, a third is to be appointed by two judges.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The section uses the word "judges". It says:

> The value, if any, of the first, second and third preference stocks and the common or ordinary stock of the Grand Trunk now issued and outstanding to the face values above mentioned (hereinafter together called the "preference and common stock") shall be determined by a board of three arbitrators, one to be appointed by the Government, one by the Grand Trunk, and the third by the two so appointed, or, failing agreement, by judges to be designated in the said agreement.

Now, the alternative is all judges, as I understand it. If that is not correct, then I am glad to know that a business man or a railway man may be selected.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend is in error in assuming that the alternative is all judges; the provision is that the third is to be appointed by two judges.

Mr. FIELDING: And the third need not be a judge.

Mr. ROWELL: My impression is that the provision in the letter which was read to the House is that the third shall be a judge. I am speaking from recollection.

Mr. FIELDING: The Bill does not say so.

Mr. ROWELL: The Bill does not say so, but my recollection is that the letter which contains the basis of the proposal so provides. But the other two need not, and probably would not, be judges.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am glad to know that there is something in that, but I do not think it quite covers my point.

Is there any reason to suppose that the Government are not going to appoint a judge? I do not see any reason for supposing that they are not going to appoint a judge, because the Government, as a rule, appoint judges. I do not suppose the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) would object to a judge being appointed, but I do not think that in a railway arbitration a judge is the very highest class of arbitrator so far as values are concerned. What I want to see appointed is an arbitration board that is going to take into consideration the value of the line, the location of the line, where its traffic is going to be lasting. For instance, you might build a branch line of railway into a wood country, and for ten years, while the timber was coming out, that road would be a paying one; it would, perhaps, be paying a considerable profit. But when the timber was all out, the line would be something of a scrap heap. We want men with an initial knowledge of what will develop traffic, who will go over the line in order to find out what permanent traffic is to be expected from it. That having been ascertained, you will then know that the road is well planted. In addition to that, I would want to know the quality of the road. While a judge is an excellent man in a court room, I do not know whether he is as good a judge as to the values of ties, rails and things of that kind, as a railway man. There is nothing in the Bill that says that the Government shall not appoint a judge, nor that the company shall not appoint a judge, and there is nothing to show that two judges having been appointed will not agree on a third judge; I should think that they would be likely to agree on a third judge. Unless we know the kind of arbitrators to be selected, I do not think the explanation that has been given is conclusive. It is distinctly provided that if the two arbitrators fail to agree on a third, two judges will then appoint a third arbitrator, and he is likely to be a judge also. Therefore, I do not like the proposition. Perhaps I misread it, and I hope that the interpretation placed upon it by the President of the Council is correct, but I fear it will be an objection similar to what we have had many times in the past.

Further, in the acquisition of the Canadian Northern, a limit was placed beyond which the award could not go, and that limit was $10,000,000. I know I shall be told: You cannot go into an arbitration and, at the same time not go into it; if you are going to submit your case to arbitration, you must submit it, and you must pay the award. But, as the Government in the Canadian Northern case, fixed a limit of $10,000,000, I would have felt some more assurance in my mind if the Government had, in this arbitration, fixed a limit beyond which we could not go even if it were fairly high. Then the country would know what is involved in this whole purchase which otherwise it does not know and cannot know, perhaps for years to come. That appears to me to be a very crucial question right there in the Bill, and as a business man, I have forebodings that public ownership again is going to be soaked more or less with values that do not exist. I do not say that to crack the Bill; I am going to support it because I do not see that there is anything else to it, especially as my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Cahill) gave us no alternative proposition. But having said that, I do not know why I should shut my eyes to things that may be stumbling-blocks to myself and others, and that is one of the stumbling-blocks I find in the measure. I should like to have the assurance that at least one business man or one railway man will be on that arbitration board. I do not think that is an unreasonable request, and whether this has been tried or not, I do not know, but it appears to me that a limit should be fixed which the Grand Trunk themselves could not oppose and beyond which the country could not go in paying for the road.

We are assuming immense responsibilities in its purchase; there is nothing else to do but to face them and to raise the financial requirements to carry the deal through. But that having been said, that is no reason why we should not get one hundred cents on the dollar for every dollar that we put into the undertaking; and as a business man and as a man who is in favour of public ownership I say that a worse blow cannot be given to public ownership than to overpay for properties that the Government is acquiring and then to expect that the country is going to get value in the result. It cannot be done; we must get value, and public ownership is not given a fair trial until you buy your properties at a fair market value which is to be determined by their earning capacity. The dividends that can be earned upon the road are the only criteria that we have of value. I may be told that the Grand Trunk cost $134,000 per mile, but I want to see where the assets are, where the dividends are coming from on that $134,000 per mile. As a business man, I think it is our duty to look into this and to see that too high a price is not paid for the road.

I have spoken longer than I intended, but I have not touched the fringe of the subject. It is so intricate and more or less involved that I do not wish to multiply figures. My intention was—and I hope I have made that clear—to show to the House about what our financial obligations would be, and I have shown that they will amount to about $18,500,000 per annum, or supposing that my hon. friend opposite is correct, about $20,000,000 per annum. We are not very far apart. Those are the annual charges, and if you capitalize them at 5 per cent, you have pretty well arrived at what the capital will be, at the obligations that will rest upon the country and that will have to be met. Although they are mortgages at present, they are on the property, they are fixed charges that you have to meet, and they will not be removed until you pay out the capital for them so that you must not say that we are risking simply the interest; we are also becoming responsible for the principal. There is no doubt about that. If you buy a house with a mortgage on it, you take the house with the mortgage, and the mortgage remains on the house until you liquidate the capital involved in the original amount. It will not do to say that the mortgage is only so and so and that I have to pay five or six per cent on that, amounting to $200 or $300 a year; you have to take the capital on which this is the interest, and that is the obligation that rests upon the country. I figure that we shall be involved in a capital liability which must some day be met, that will run up into the hundreds of millions of dollars. I do not shut my eyes to that. I am not sure that the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) was very far wrong in the capitalization that he gave. As I read the Drayton-Acworth report, the capitalization will run into the neighbourhood of $400,000,000 or more, so that there is a very heavy financial obligation in the acquisition of the Grand Trunk. But we are face to face now with the proposition that the Grand Trunk is unable to continue to run the road and to meet its financial obligations with regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific. In other words, it is unable to meet its liabilities, and it is to-day practically insolvent. Some hon. gentlemen may say: Why not put it under the hammer? We have never seen any railways of that kind go under the hammer in Canada, and I hope we never shall. If it should be allowed to go under the hammer, there is only one possible bidder in Canada so far as I know outside of the Dominion Government, and you all know who that is without my mentioning the name. The people of Canada would not view with equanimity the control of two great railways by a single corporation, no matter how high-minded the board might be. We want competition; we have spent hundreds of millions of dollars in this country to get it, and now that we are on the threshhold of obtaining one of the greatest assets in the way of railways that Canada can get, for the development of trade that binds the east to the west and the north to the south, are we going to let this offer slip through our fist into the hands of a private corporation? I cannot see that that would be sound business.

Though I have some misgivings with regard to some features of the measure I have been forced to the conclusion that there is nothing else for the Government and the country to do but take over the Grand Trunk at the best possible bargain that can be made, and then have all the national railways consolidated under one management. I would put the finest men that can be got in Canada in charge of the management of the road, and have them told by this Government and the country that they are expected to operate the national system of railways to the best advantage of the people and to give financial results of which we need not be ashamed. So far as I can see, there is nothing else for us to do, and therefore I endorse the Government's proposal and trust that this legislation will pass.

Hon. WILLIAM LYON MACKENZIE KING (Prince, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Cockshutt) has been so kind as to allude in generous terms to the confidence which the electors of Prince have placed in me in choosing me to be their representative in this House. I must thank him for giving me this opportunity to acknowledge publicly that great trust. He has also referred to the exceedingly difficult task which has fallen upon me in the obligation which will come in the course of time to assume the leadership of the Opposition in succession to my hon. friend from Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie), who has led the Opposition during the past two sessions. No one is more conscious than I am of my many limitations adequately to discharge the obligations of that position. I am thankful to my hon. friend for the example which he has set me, and I have asked him, in order that it may be possible for me the better to acquire familiarity with the procedure of the House to acquaint myself with the matters that are coming before Parliament, if he will continue to lead the Opposition for the remainder of the present session, and he has very kindly consented to do so.

It is as the member for Prince that I should like to speak on the amendment which is before the House. I designedly say as the member for that constituency, because it is one of eight or ten constituencies which ought to be represented on the floor of this House in such an important discussion as the present, but which for obvious reasons have had no representation in this Parliament through the whole of this session. I contend that that of itself is a reason why hon. gentlemen opposite should not press with such undue haste the enactment of this legislation at this time. Surely, if Parliamentary Government stands for anything, it does stand for the right of the people of the country to have their voice heard through their representatives in the halls of Parliament. There are eight vacancies, I think, existing at the present time throughout the Dominion. In the constituency of Assiniboia there has been no representation for nearly two years. Are not the farmers of Assiniboia entitled to have their voice heard here in regard to the important measure which is before Parliament at the present time? Are not the electors of the constituency of Victoria and Carleton, in New Brunswick, similarly entitled to be represented here? Are not the electors of the constituency of North Ontario entitled to representation here and to their voice on this important measure? Are not the electors of the constituency of Glengarry entitled also to representation here, and the electors of Quebec and Kamouraska, in Quebec, and the electors of Victoria, in British Columbia? From one end of this country to the other we have constituencies with no representation in this Parliament, and yet the Government without giving any real reason to the country, persists in driving ahead with this measure, which has been described by one of the ministers of the Crown as the most important transaction which the Parliament of Canada has ever had to deal with.

Mr. SHEARD: May I ask whether the constituencies of Gaspé and Maisonneuve are represented here during this debate?

Mr. KING: I will answer my hon. friend. Only some ten days ago the leader of the Government, I think it was, assured this House that by the end of last week or the week previous the proceedings of Parliament would be at an end for this session. That assurance by the leader of the Government was accepted in good faith, and the representative of the constituencies mentioned, with another hon. member, arranged to take their passage across the ocean on a mission which they had had in mind for some time previous. If, therefore, these constituencies are not represented here at this moment, it is not the fault of the members of those ridings. but it is due exclusively to the fact that they accepted in good faith, as they had a right to accept, the assurance given them by the leader of the Government. That is also a very strong reason why, when the Government through its leader informed not only the members of this House but the country that there was no further business of importance to bring up, we should not proceed at this time with this most important measure. No mention was made in the speech from the Throne of legislation of this kind. If the speech from the Throne has any significance at all, it is that the members of Parliament and the people of the country may know what legislation is to be brought before Parliament, and I submit that here is another reason why hon. members on this side of the House are justified in asking the Government not to press this matter to a conclusion at this session, but allow it to stand over, at least for the short time that must elapse between now and the next session of Parliament.

I did not rise for the purpose of adding much in the way of argument to what has been said, and said so fully, from this side of the House. My purpose is rather to emphasize the need for caution in proceeding so hastily with such an important measure, and I would mention as the chief reason for that the misapprehension which I believe exists not only throughout the country, but in this very House, in regard to the significance of this particular measure. I need nothing more to assure me that I am right in this than the speech to which we have just listened from my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt).

I should like to point out, first of all, that there is an impression abroad that the Government is undertaking by this Bill to purchase the Grand Trunk Railway system, that this is a measure in the nature of an act of purchase, for the purchase of the Grand Trunk Railway properties or of the Grand Trunk Railway stock. Sir, I submit that there is nothing in this Bill to justify such an impression. There is nothing here which will enable any one to say that if this measure carries the properties of the Grand Trunk Railway system will be acquired by the people of Canada. I shall enlarge on that in a moment. In order to deal with two points at once, let me say that the larger misapprehension which I believe exists is that this particular measure is in the nature of a measure for public ownership of the Grand Trunk Railway system by the people of Canada. My hon. friend who has just sat down prefaced his remarks by saying that he wondered how any one who was a supporter of labour in its advocacy of different measures could possibly oppose a measure of public ownership when introduced into this Parliament. It is in regard to this very question of public ownership and to the misapprehension which I believe exists, not only throughout the country, but in this Parliament in regard to the significance of this measure as a measure of public ownership that I wish to speak for a moment, and wish to urge that the Government do not continue to exercise the haste it has been exercising in pressing this measure forward at this time.

To my mind, it is not a measure of government ownership at all, and that is the note I should like to have sounded throughout this country. My hon. friend speaks about government ownership and labour. Well, let me reduce the whole matter to a simple illustration which every workingman will understand. When a working man who has been paying rent for a house decides that, instead of continuing to pay out of his income a certain portion every month to the landlord, he will save his money and purchase a home of his own so that thereafter he will not have monthly payments to make, he is going in for what he understands as ownership. He purchases a house with his savings and he has nothing further to pay to any one else in connection with it. It is his property. Now, public ownership is understood by the workingman as just this thing, the only difference being that the ownership is in the state and not in the individual. When workingmen talk about government ownership they have in their minds, as most people rightly have, that the thing which is being acquired will be the people's, and that there will be no further payments to make in the nature of dividends on stock. They understand that the property is acquired in order that what has been paid or is being paid out in dividends to private shareholders will thereafter be available to the people themselves in the form of a saving whereby services can be performed at a lower rate. That is the only conception of public ownership that is worthy of the name. But what does this Bill propose? I was almost about to say it proposes that when the Government has acquired the property it shall do certain things; but, as I read the Bill, the Government never comes into ownership of these properties at all. At best, so far as ownership of the Grand Trunk properties goes, it is but an agreement in the nature of an option for the purchase of the Grand Trunk properties, not now, but at the end of thirty years. Let me read to hon. members just what the Bill itself says in regard to these Grand Trunk properties which we are discussing here and which a large number of honourable members opposite think that this country is coming into the ownership of. The preamble reads in part:

Whereas the present capital stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, consists of the following:—

Four per cent (4%) guaranteed stock	£ 12,500,000
First preference five per cent (5%) stock	3,420,000
Second preference five per cent (5%) stock	2,530,000
Third preference four per cent (4%) stock	7,168,055
Common stock	23,955,437
	£ 49,573,492

And whereas the present outstanding debenture stocks of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada consisting of—

Five per cent (5%) Grand Trunk debenture stock	£ 4,270,375
Five per cent (5%) Great Western debenture stock	2,723,080
Four per cent (4%) Grand Trunk debenture stock	24,624,455
Four per cent (4%) Northern debenture stock	308,215
	£ 31,926,125

That represents the Grand Trunk Railway property as it is held by the different shareholders and the debenture holders. All of that stock may be divided into two groups in accordance with what is proposed in this Bill: The first, stock which is to be retained by the present owners, and the second, the stock which is to be exchanged—not to be acquired absolutely by the Government of this country with the obligation ending there but to be exchanged. Something is to be given in return for it, another form of stock of actual or greater value, with a dividend guaranteed at four per cent by the Government. Let us see how that measures up with the idea of government ownership. This is what is proposed in clause 4:

As part of the consideration for such acquisition, the Government may agree to guarantee the payment of:—

(a) Dividends payable half yearly, at four per cent per annum, upon the present guaranteed stock;

(b) The interest upon the present debenture stocks as and when payable, in accordance with the terms thereof.

In other words, the four per cent guaranteed stock and all that is described here as outstanding debenture stocks remain, exactly as they are to-day, in the possession of the people who own them, and what the Government proposes to do is to agree to pay these holders of capital and debenture stocks the dividends which up to the present time they have had to look to the Grand Trunk Railway Company for.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question, not with any intention of interrupting him? Suppose I buy a house from him. I have not the whole of the money but pay two thousand dollars down and give mortgage for the balance of two thousand. The mortgage is made out to my hon. friend and the deed stands in my name. Whom does he consider the owner of the house?

Mr. KING: I would answer my hon. friend by asking him this question: Where is the deed that the Government gets for this property? The Government gets no deed for the property which they are assumed to be acquiring or purchasing. The property remains in the possession of the people who already own it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not by any means.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Certainly.

Mr. KING: Will my hon. friend (Mr. Cockshutt) please follow the Bill? "Four per cent guaranteed stock, £12,500,000;" —will any hon. gentleman rise and say that this is going to be transferred from its present owners?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Not immediately.

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps the hon. member will permit me a question?

Mr. KING: By all means.

Mr. STEVENS: The possession or control of the property will rest in the voting stock, and the debenture stock and guaranteed stock, which is non-voting, cannot be claimed to have possession. Am I correct?

Mr. KING: I desire to repeat what I have already said. This is what the Government measure itself says, defining the different stocks representing the property: First, there is four per cent guaranteed stock amounting to £12,500,000, and I challenge any member to say that that stock does not remain with its present owners. All that this Bill does is to guarantee that the Government instead of the Grand Trunk Railway Company shall hereafter pay the dividends on that stock, and by so doing the Government increases the value of the stock, as my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) so ably pointed out the other evening. It raises the stock in actual value. With regard to the outstanding debenture stock—five per cent amounting to £4,000,000 odd, another five per cent amounting to £2,000,000, four per cent amounting to £24,000,000, and four per cent amounting to £308,000—every bit of that stock remains in the hands of the present owners.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Will the hon. member permit me a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: My hon. friend has asked a question and I am merely attempting to answer him. What is the difference between——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: What is the difference between debenture or any other stock and an actual mortgage of property where the holder of the stock has no other interest in it than to receive the dividend on the stock, without any voting powers whatever? We say that the holders of the stock are simply mortgagees without the power of management in the concern, and all we have done is to assume the right to pay them off.

An hon. MEMBER: Don't make a speech.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I wish to inform the hon. gentleman (Mr. Middlebro) that the statement he has made is not a question.

Mr. KING: I am addressing my remarks at the moment to the question of ownership. I am taking up the question as to whether this is in the nature of a transaction of government ownership and I am answering by pointing out—and if I am not correct in so doing, I would like hon. gentlemen opposite to tell me—that all this retained stock remains in the possession of the people who have it at the present time.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Just as a mortgagee.

Mr. KING: It remains in the possession of the persons who have it at the present time, but the difference is this: Instead of the payment of dividends on all that stock being made by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, the Government of Canada hereafter will have to guarantee and make every bit of the payment at greatly enhanced values.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Can the holders of this stock to which the hon. gentleman has made reference sell that stock?

[Mr. King.]

Mr. McKENZIE: Why not?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am asking the question.

Mr. McKENZIE: Certainly they can.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Can they sell it?

Mr. KING: Certainly they can sell it and make a profit on it—selling it with the Government guaranteeing the interest on it. There is left the other remaining stocks the value of which the Government proposes to have arbitrated, the stocks to be exchanged for stocks with dividends guaranteed by the Government. Now the value of these stocks at the present time, according to figures that appear, in the Drayton-Acworth report, amounts to—well, it is questionable, to put it mildly, whether they possess any value at all. It is a question whether, if the Grand Trunk met its obligations as it ought to meet them, there would not be a considerable deficit, and not a single cent go to the holders of that stock. What does the Government propose? It proposes to take and give all that stock a value to exchange it for stock which will yield four per cent under government guarantee, and sell at par. I wonder if the people of this country appreciate this transaction. I am sure that the members of this House to whom I am speaking at this moment never dreamed that this was what was actually being proposed in this measure, but every word of it is true. Let me distinguish the one lot of stock from the other. The first lot I would call the stock that is being retained by private possessors; the retained stock, this lot is stock that is being exchanged, the exchanged or exchangeable stock. What does the Government get? The Government gets that exchanged stock, but what does it give? It gives a four per cent stock to take its place, it guarantees to pay four per cent interest on that stock, and also undertakes that none of it shall be purchased by the country for another period of thirty years. My hon. friends opposite speak of this as a measure for government ownership. Do they realize that what this measure does is to make complete government ownership of railways in Canada impossible for another thirty years to come? That is what it does. Suppose the people of Canada to-morrow, or ten years from to-morrow, or twenty years from to-morrow, should say: "We have made up our minds that we will become the owner of the railway systems of Canada; we want complete government ownership." Under the terms of this Act they could not acquire the properties of the Grand Trunk from these private owners who will be entitled to hold the stock until 1950. There is the position, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite go plunging ahead in the name of government ownership and say, "We must get this measure through at this particular session of Parliament." I warn the Government to be careful. If they think that the advocates of government ownership are going to support them in a transaction of this kind, because, as I have said, far from making for government ownership, this measure makes government ownership impossible for another thirty years. Let me read clause 5 of the Act itself which governs this matter. It provides as follows:

> The present guaranteed stock and the new guaranteed stock, or any part thereof, may be called in or redeemed by the Government, at par, at any time after thirty years from the date of the appointment of the said Committee of Management, on six months' notice, by advertisement, to the holders thereof.

Now there is the true nature of the measure which the Government is rushing through Parliament at this particular stage —a measure which absolutely precludes the possibility of government ownership of railways in Canada, of the entire railway system of the Dominion, until after the year 1950, and more than that: Not only makes it impossible for the country to acquire these railroad stocks at a value they could be purchased at to-day, but makes it necessary that they shall be purchased only at par, this value being enormously increased in the interval in virtue of the fact that the Government stands as security of guaranteed dividends for all that period of time.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I would ask the hon. gentleman would he approve of the Government of Canada borrowing money at five or five and a half per cent and paying off these stocks that are only carrying four per cent, because then we would own the stock?

Mr. KING: This is not a good time to borrow money. The Government will be well advised if it does not enter into any more schemes for borrowing money than are necessary. What is needed above everything else in this country to-day is economy and some regard for public expenditure. It is the wanton extravagance of this Government, more than anything else, that has exasperated the people of this country.

Mr. McCREA: The Government does not know anything about that.

Mr. KING: What is this agreement for? I have said it is not an agreement to purchase the Grand Trunk, it is not an agreement to acquire public ownership. Notice this: The word used all the way through the Act is the word "acquire." That word "acquire" may mean anything. I think in legislation which it proposes the Government should be careful in placing before the country exactly what is meant. I say this is not an agreement in the nature of purchase either of properties or of stock. Stock that is brought in to the country under an arbitration does not represent value acquired by the country for, as I have said already, there is given in exchange for it a four per cent guaranteed stock.

Now, just in passing. The hon. member (Mr. Cockshutt) referred in his remarks to the way in which that exchangeable stock was to be arbitrated and he took exception to the fact that judges were to be named as the arbitrators. I would like to ask the honourable the Minister of Railways, who I am glad to see opposite, if he would tell this House just why a certain change was made. I notice in the letter that was written to Sir Alfred Smithers on October 9th and signed by Mr. Meighen, Minister of the Interior, and which is placed on Hansard at page 1023, setting forth conditions to which Sir Alfred Smithers, as president of the Grand Trunk, had agreed, there is the following in reference to the nature of that arbitration:

> The value (if any) to the holders of the first, second and third preference stock, and the ordinary or common stock, shall be determined by a board of arbitrators consisting of three persons, one to be appointed by the Grand Trunk, one by the Government, and the two so appointed to select a third, or failing agreement, the third to be selected from among the judges of the Superior Courts in Canada.

Now, notice this. We have something definite here, we have some little guide as to who is to be the arbitrator in this matter because it will be on the third arbitrator's decision more than that of any other that the whole question of what the country is to pay for this stock will turn.

> —failing agreement, the third to be selected from among the judges of the Superior Courts in Canada by Sir Louis Davies, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, and Sir Walter Cassels, Judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada, acting together.

There are two gentlemen whose names are known and respected throughout the Dominion, and it was agreed that they should name the third arbitrator. Now, in the Bill as brought down that course has been departed from altogether, as my hon.

friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) pointed out. Section 6 of the Bill reads:

The value, if any, of the first, second and third preference stocks and the common or ordinary stock of the Grand Trunk now issued and outstanding to the face values above mentioned (hereinafter together called the "preference and common stock") shall be determined by a board of three arbitrators, one to be appointed by the Government, one by the Grand Trunk, and the third by the two so appointed, or, failing agreement, by judges to be designated in the said agreement.

What I want to ask my hon. friend is: Why was a change made from the original proposal which Mr. Smithers was prepared to adhere to, by substituting for the two judges whose names are mentioned therein a clause which leaves us entirely in the dark as to who the third arbitrator is to be selected by, or who the third arbitrator is to be?

Mr. J. D. REID: It was not necessary to set that out in the agreement. Mr. Smithers, representing the Grand Trunk, and the Government agreed that the two gentlemen named should designate the third arbitrator. When the Bill gets into committee if it is necessary to word the clause differently, there is no objection to its being done.

Mr. KING: Will the minister give the House an assurance that when the Bill goes into committee it will be worded in accordance with the terms of that letter?

Mr. J. D. REID: In accordance with the two names I have mentioned?

Mr. KING: In accordance with the terms of the letter that passed between Mr. Meighen and Mr. Smithers.

Mr. J. D. REID: Will the hon. gentleman read the letter that he referred to of July, 1918?

Mr. KING: I am referring to the letter of October 9, 1919, just two weeks ago, which is set out in Hansard at page 1023.

Mr. J. D. REID: The letter is in this form:

The value, etc., shall be determined by a board of arbitrators consisting of three persons, one to be appointed by the Grand Trunk, one by the Government, and the two so appointed to select a third, or failing agreement the third to be selected from among the judges of the Superior Courts in Canada by Sir Louis Davies, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, and Sir Walter Cassels, Judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada, acting together.

I have no hesitation in saying that the Government will embody in the agreement exactly what is in that letter. If it is not in the Bill it will be in the agreement, and I give my assurance to that effect. Is that the answer?

Mr. KING: That is satisfactory. That improves the situation to this extent, that in the Bill as it was presented to the House the amount of money which the country becomes obligated to pay for this stock was to be determined largely upon the words of one gentleman—unknown, who was to be chosen by judges—unknown, the country to pay for the stock it is obtaining an amount—unknown.

Mr. ROWELL: Will my hon. friend permit me a correction there? The Bill is framed upon that letter, which is the basis of the agreement. It did not require that all the terms should be embodied in the Bill. There never was any intention to depart from it, and the Bill is not a departure from it.

Mr. KING: I would say to the honourable the President of the Council, with all deference, that I think it should be stated in the Bill, and I hope the Government will see that the Bill is amended in a manner which will make it perfectly clear that that course is to be followed. I understand from what the Honourable the Minister of Railways said that that will be done.

But the situation, important to observe, is this. Here is stock, the value of which up to a couple of weeks ago could have been ascertained from a stock list. In view of the fact that the Government has brought forward this measure to guarantee interest payments on the stock that is to be given in exchange, all this other stock is going up, up and up. It is all important, therefore, it seems to me, to fix a definite date with reference to which the arbitrators are to base their estimate of the value of the stock. Is that the intention of the Government?

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. gentleman has reference, of course, to the stocks that will be the subject of the arbitration?

Mr. KING: That is it.

Mr. J. D. REID: Certainly, a date will be fixed in the agreement. The hon. gentleman should of course know that.

Mr. KING: Will the Minister of Railways undertake to say that the date to be fixed will be a date prior to the time at which the Government's intention in this matter was made known to the public?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is not fair to ask a question of that kind. But I will say this to the hon. gentleman: When the date is being fixed the Government will protect the interests of the people by setting a date of which no advantage can be taken.

Mr. KING: I appreciate what the hon. minister has said about fairness; it is the element of fairness that I am trying to consider. The public of this country as a party to this transaction, are entitled, it seems to me, to the greatest element of fair play. Now, a good deal turns, it seems to me, upon the date to be fixed, and in fairness to the public, I submit that the Government ought to assure Parliament immediately that the date with reference to which the valuation of these stocks will be considered will be a date prior to the time at which the intention of the Government in the matter of this transaction was made known to the public. Without that assurance the whole transaction becomes one which seems to have reference very largely to the stock market, rather than to the interests of the people. It is important in these transactions that the interests of the people in matters concerning payments out of the revenues of the country should be freed from the possible influences of stock transactions inimical to the national interest.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have pointed out that this measure is not for the purchase of the Grand Trunk properties; it is not even a measure for government ownership. What is it then? It is nothing more than an agreement for the transfer of the management of the Grand Trunk Railway system to the gentlemen who, as my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) described them, are managing the Canadian National Railroads at the present time, and who were controlling the Canadian Northern system before it was taken over by the Government. That is all that this measure is—plus this one other important feature. It is also a measure to enhance the value of the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. That is all. Those are the only two things that are accomplished in this Bill. There was no need of an agreement between the Government and the Grand Trunk as to the acquirement of the stock; that is something the Government could have arranged with the stockholders if it had wished to do so. But when it comes to the question of relieving the Grand Trunk of its liabilities it was necessary to enter into an agreement, and that is the purpose of this whole measure. It is a Bill to foist on the people of Canada all the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Railway system and of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and to give in return for an exchange of management to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company an enhanced value for their stock. I say to my hon. friends they have no right to proceed with a transaction of that kind at this stage of the session. I say we have a right to expect the Prime Minister here in his seat in discussing this question, and I ask my hon. friends opposite to defer the enactment of legislation such as this, which is going to bind the country for another generation, until the Prime Minister can be present in his seat in Parliament.

If the Government wish to make a working arrangement between the Canadian National Railways and the Grand Trunk Railway system, they have it in their power to effect it.

The ostensible purpose as put forward in the Bill is that a committee of management shall be formed as soon as the agreement is ratified to operate the Grand Trunk system in harmony with the Canadian National railways. A great deal is being said about the merits of bringing these two systems together. Well, every one will admit that it is desirable that these two systems should operate together; the one supplements the other. If they are not supplementing each other in such a manner as will best serve the interests of the country, this Parliament can find a method of bringing such a condition about. Parliament is all-powerful in effecting any arrangement which it thinks best in the interests of the people; and I say that in order to effect a working arrangement between these two great systems which will make the whole system, as it were, serve one big national interest, it is not necessary to go so far as this measure goes; it is not necessary to saddle this country with the liabilities of the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific and at the same time give additional value to the stock of the shareholders over across the seas.

There was one remark made the other evening by the ex-Minister of Agriculture, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), which I should like to read, because I think it is all-important that he and those who agree with him should understand just what this transaction amounts to. I quote from page 1211 of Hansard, which contains a report of the debate on October 20:

> An argument has been put forth by the directorate and management of the Grand Trunk that it should be relieved of any liability in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific. In the face of all the circumstances I think it is impossible for this Parliament to concede that position for a moment—
> Mr. Rowell: Hear, hear.

Well, the whole purpose of this Bill is that the Grand Trunk shall be relieved of any liability in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific; it simply turns over to this country all the liabilities of the Grand Trunk in regard to the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific. The member for Marquette could not have appreciated that fact when he made his speech. Like many others throughout the country and, apparently many in this House, he was under the impression that this measure was based upon a carrying out of the principle of government ownership; that it was being introduced with a view of freeing the country from certain liabilities pertaining to one of the biggest corporations. As a matter of fact, this measure does the very thing that I have described; it simply loads the country with these liabilities and gives in return to the Grand Trunk shareholders an increased value and guarantee dividends for their stock.

Now, Sir, I have nothing further to add except this—and I say it with realization of its full import. The Government are the trustees of the people of this country. They are the trustees of the public funds and the use that is made of them not only in the present; they are trustees also for the generations that are to come. This measure, it seems to me, loses regard of the full sense of obligation of trusteeship which the Government should have in respect of its duty to the people at this time. It loses regard of the obligations of the Government towards those who come after. By this Act the Government would make it impossible until the year 1950 for the people of Canada to get complete possession of the railway systems of this country if that should be their desire or to acquire ownership of the Grand Trunk properties then, except at a greatly increased cost. The Government have no right so to bind the people for the future.

The Government brought this session of Parliament about for a particular purpose; that purpose related to the Treaty of Peace. That purpose has been fulfilled, and it is not right that the Government should at this time introduce the measure which is now before the House. Moreover, the Government was elected, by means that were very questionable, for a purpose; and what was the purpose? The winning of the war. Does any hon. gentleman say that the war has not been won? Does any hon. gentleman say that the purpose for which the Government was elected has not been fulfilled? The purpose being fulfilled, then, by what right does the Government continue to hold office? They were not chosen by the people to put through a Bill of this kind on behalf of the shareholders of one of the biggest corporations in the world; they were chosen for an entirely different purpose. I say to hon. gentlemen that in accordance with right and proper constitutional procedure, the only course open to them is to drop this measure altogether, for the present at least; give the representatives in Parliament here assembled a chance to go back to their constituencies and confer with the people and get their views. Then this measure can be discussed when Parliament reassembles in February; the representatives of the people will be able to deal with the matter with due regard to the wishes of their constituents. In the meantime, opportunity will have been given to the people to understand the nature of this transaction. I say that Parliament has no right to usurp the rights of the people in regard to a great transaction of this kind and to decline to give the people an opportunity to inform their representatives in Parliament of their wishes in the matter.

What we need in Canada to-day is more control of Parliament by the people and of the executive by Parliament. This measure shows, as no other measure possibly could show, how far we have been getting away from constitutional government in Canada. The time has come to call a halt; the time has come when members of Parliament should have regard for the people's wishes and when the representatives of the people in Parliament should control the executive.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (Algoma, East): May I at the outset be permitted to join with the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) in expressing my congratulations to the hon. member for Prince (Mr. King), who has just taken his seat in the House as leader of the Opposition? Perhaps I may be also permitted to say that I feel disposed to express my disappointment at the performance to which he has treated the House on this his first appearance since he was elected as member for Prince and leader of the Opposition. Some of us were looking forward with some degree of hope at least that upon entering the House the hon. gentleman would be able to clear up some of the mists which have apparently been hanging over the eyes and intellects of hon. members who sit around him in connection with the matter of the Grand Trunk purchase, or the taking over of the Grand Trunk system. But having listened to him intently; having taken notes of what he said and given attention to what he has read; having examined the deductions that he made from the things which he read, I have reached the conclusion that the light which he has on the railway situation in Canada, particularly the light which he has had in regard to the proposal now before the House, is not very much brighter than the light which has been exhibited by the hon. gentleman who has been keeping his seat in this House warm for him during this session and the last.

The hon. gentleman has undertaken to show to this House—and without question with the intention of convincing the country, if he can—that the taking over of the Grand Trunk Railway system under the terms of the agreement outlined in the Bill now before the House will not constitute and will not consummate an act of public ownership. He bases his argument in support of that—and I must confess I was utterly amazed to hear him do it—on the fact that the Government undertakes to continue to pay or to be responsible for the interest on the bonded indebtedness of the Grand Trunk railway. Will the hon. gentleman who, I presume, knows something about financing large institutions in this country, undertake to say that because the Canadian Pacific Railway Company agrees to pay the interest on its bonded indebtedness to the people who have purchased and own those bonds, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or the shareholders of that company, are not the owners of the system? Would those who cheered so lustily for the statement of the hon. gentleman when he said that this would defer for a period of at least thirty years the possibility of public ownership in this country say that, because a corporation pays interest on its bonds, it does not own the institution upon which those bonds have been issued? The proposition of the hon. gentleman is so obviously absurd that it seems to me unnecessary to take up even a moment of the time of the House in arguing against it. What this Bill purports to do and what the agreement authorized by this Bill brings into effect is nothing more or less than this: The Canadian people take possession of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, subject to its bonded indebtedness and in accordance with terms that will be determined by a board of arbitration that is set up by this Bill. Just as soon as that board of arbitration has given its award, ownership of the Grand Trunk railway, as ownership is understood by any man who understands anything about the matter, passes absolutely to the Canadian people. The illustration given by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), in asking the hon. gentleman a question, illustrates the point exactly. The fact that a man has a mortgage on his house, that he may have a certain liability resting on the property that he owns, does not interfere in the least degree with his ownership. It is the title that passes. It is the Canadian people who will own, control and operate the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada. They will do just exactly the same as any other owner; they will do just the same as if the Grand Trunk passed from the hands of one company to another; they will continue to carry the obligations that the Grand Trunk must always carry, and they will own the system. I almost came to the conclusion, as I heard the hon. gentleman leading up to his argument, that he was going to put forward as a basis for his conclusion, the theory that the only way by which the Canadian people could become owners of the Grand Trunk railway would be by utterly repudiating the bonded indebtedness. If that be the position he takes, why then, all right, we are on ground that we can discuss. If it be the feeling of the hon. gentleman that the Canadian people in taking over the Grand Trunk should repudiate the bonded indebtedness of that railway, that they should undertake to say to the bondholders of the Grand Trunk railway: We are not going to give you even the right to foreclosure under a mortgage, but we are going to cancel the indebtedness—if that be his position, there is at least some degree of reason in it. He can be placed in the same class as all those who believe in the confiscation of everything in the shape of real and physical property. If that be his position, the House and the country will clearly and definitely understand it. But if he proceeds to argue that when we purchase a property, when we agree to pay to the man who holds a mortgage on that property, the interest on his mortgage until such time as the mortgage is liquidated, as a result of that we do not get ownership, then he takes a position that cannot be justified and that he cannot defend before any man who understands anything about business transactions or the control of any institution of this description.

Let us see what will be assumed when we take over this railway. The Drayton-Acworth report, that we have heard a great deal about in this House and that every member must agree went into the whole question of the physical condition and values of railways in Canada more thoroughly, I presume, than any other commission or body that has ever investigated railways in this country or possibly on this continent, says that the Grand Trunk railway cost—that is its value at the time the report was made—$127,000 per mile. The bonded indebtedness that the Government of Canada for the people of Canada assume under the agreement constitutes an obligation against the Grand Trunk railway of $49,000 per mile, and not one cent more. The Government says: We will pay the interest on the guaranteed stock and the bonded indebtedness, and we will leave to arbitration what, if anything, shall be paid in lieu of the first, second and third preference stock and the common stock of the Grand Trunk railway. In reality they practically wipe out one-half of the value of the Grand Trunk railway as set forth in the Drayton-Acworth report, leaving to arbitration what, if anything, shall be paid for a sum of about $60,000,000 worth of first, second and third preference stocks, and in doing that they base their position on the Drayton-Acworth report that in itself stated that in their judgment there should be paid for the first, second and third preference stock a sum substantially approximate to $3,600,000 per annum for seven years, with a substantial increase at the end of seven years.

I do not wish to detain the House at any length, and I am not standing here as one of those who are at all enthusiastic with regard to public ownership of railways. On many occasions in this House I have made my position with regard to that clear, but we are dealing, not with a theory, but with an actual condition. The leader of the Opposition—I will accept the suggestion thrown out by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Mackenzie King), and I will refer to the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) as the leader of the Opposition—has moved an amendment to this Bill and has spoken on it at some length. The hon member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), who sits alongside of him, spoke also on this Bill at length. Now we have had the hon. member for Prince (Mr. King) speaking this afternoon at length. Has any one of the three intimated to the House or the country any alternative to the proposal made by the Government? What is the alternative that these hon. gentlemen suggest? It is simply: Wait, drift, dilly-dally with this question that has been pressing this country for two and a half years. How has it been pressing? What is it that has brought the country into the condition in which it is? If my memory serves me correctly, the hon. gentleman was a member of the Government which brought about the condition that makes it absolutely necessary for the Government of Canada to take over this Grand Trunk railway. The hon. gentleman speaks of the people of Canada relieving the Grand Trunk of all its obligations in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific. It has been a matter of amazement that any hon. member sitting on that side of the House who supported the Government which backed up the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific should ever come to stand up and utter even the words "Grand Trunk Pacific" in this House.

It is the iniquity of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental that has placed Canada where she is to-day in regard to this railway situation, and which makes it absolutely necessary that we take over the Grand Trunk railway in order that by some means or other the people of Canada may be relieved of carrying a burden that can never be borne unless the National Railway system is rounded out. Will the hon. gentleman or any one else on the other side of the House tell us what he would do with the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental without the Grand Trunk railway? Will they tell us?

The hon. gentleman speaks about traffic agreements and a gentleman's arrangement between railways, and all that sort of thing. Some of us know a little about the operation of railways, not very much, but we have given the matter some little thought, and I ask any practical railway man who has been close up to the management of a railway, what kind of a job could be made of operating the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental under a traffic arrangement with the Grand Trunk. Where would we land? In just one of two positions: We would still further bankrupt the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental, and they are bankrupt now, or we would bankrupt the other road. We would be operating them in the first place at a double overhead cost of management, equipment, terminals and all that kind of thing, and in the end we would be working simply on the basis of a gentleman's agreement. Take, for example, the history of the United States railways and you will find that these "gentleman's" agreements have not been very effectual in making it possible for United States railways to operate successfully. There is only one way in which public ownership of railways in this or any other country can be made a success, and that is by rounding out the system as it should be rounded out, spending a sufficient amount of money to develop the system as it requires to be developed, and then operate it strictly under a business management, with a tariff for both freight and passenger traffic that will make it possible for the railways to operate without placing indirect taxation on the people of the country to support them.

Coming back to the question of what we are going to do with the roads that have been foisted on us by the Government of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) and those who supported him in this House, what are we going to do with the roads we now have if we do not take over the Grand Trunk? Will some hon. gentleman tell us how we are going to operate them? As a matter of fact, whether we take over the Grand Trunk or not, we are up against this in connection with the Transcontinental, that some one will have to operate it for the next twenty years at a loss, but that is not the case in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific, so far as operating expenses are concerned because it is within the bounds of possibility that it can be operated so as to make both ends meet. It is true that if we are going to deal fairly with the Canadian people as a whole, we can never look forward, and I use the word "never" advisedly, to having the Grand Trunk Pacific or the National Transcontinental earn interest on the money that has been sunk in those two roads, because there has been no equivalent value produced for the expenditure of that sum. I think the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) said this afternoon that it would be a fair proposal to say to the Grand Trunk: We will give you the National Transcontinental on the basis of $60,000,000, the original estimated cost. As a matter of fact, the National Transcontinental has cost about $215,000,000, and the Grand Trunk Pacific $260,000,000 or $270,000,000. Where did the money go? Not into the construction of the railway—not for one moment. It would be utterly impossible to trace where the money did go to, but any one who has investigated the matter for a single moment knows that the money did not go into the railway. Consequently, it would be unfair to competing railways or the people of Canada to expect the road to earn interest on anything more than its actual value, which is about 35 or 40 per cent of what it is supposed to have cost.

Something has been said during this debate with regard to arbitration. The hon. member for Prince (Mr. King) was apprehensive that the country might get the worst of it in connection with the arbitration. Reference has also been made to the arbitration award in connection with the Canadian Northern. It is true that the arbitrators in that case found a value that the Drayton-Acworth Commission did not find. Whether they were justified in their finding or not, I am not going to argue. The position I have always taken is not to question the integrity of the judges on the bench of this country. I believe the arbitrators acted honestly. They may have been mistaken. Whether they were or not, I say that when the Canadian people got the Canadian Northern at the price they paid for it under that arbitration, even though they assumed all the obligations of the Canadian Northern, they got the best railway bargain that has ever been handed over the counter in this country. They got the cheapest railway that has ever been produced in this country, because the road was built by railway men and built honestly. The money all went into the railway, and not into the pockets of political friends of those who were behind the railway. Those are the facts.

There is one other point: What would happen if we did not take over the Grand Trunk railway? If the Grand Trunk Pacific, which the country has to take over because we have guaranteed the bonds to an amount greater than the value of the railway, and if the Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern are to be a successful system, one of two things is necessary. We must acquire eastern connections, either by purchase or by construction. Which are you going to do? It has been stated on the floor of this House that it would cost $100,000,000 to round out the Canadian Northern and the National Transcontinental in Eastern Canada. It will cost nearer to $200,000,000 to construct terminals and a gathering system in Eastern Canada that will make the operation of the National Transcontinental a success. When you have spent that $200,000,000, what have you got? You will have a reckless duplication of lines, which is what has bedevilled the whole railway business of this country. Would that be a wise policy to pursue, instead of acquiring lines that are already in existence? The hon. gentleman has referred to the necessity for economy. Would there be very much economy in the Canadian people undertaking to construct another set of terminals in the city of Toronto, for instance, or in Ottawa, or in any of the towns throughout Ontario and Quebec, and duplicating lines already in existence throughout these provinces in order to make more difficult the profitable operation of the lines now there? Instead of doing that we should begin with eliminating some of the lines we now have, and one of the things that will be necessary before government ownership or any other kind of ownership can be a success is the elimination of certain of these non-productive competing lines that never were necessary and should never have been constructed.

In conclusion, if any hon. member in this House, or any business man outside of it, be he a railway man or not, will show me a way by which this railway burden that has been imposed on the people of Canada can be carried, other than by acquiring the Grand Trunk and rounding out the National Railway system and operating it as a public utility, I will be ready to hold up both hands for it.

If the hon. gentleman (Mr. King) can find any group of financiers in this country, either the Grand Trunk financiers or any others, who will take these burdens off our shoulders, co-ordinate the railways, and give to the people the service they should get from them, then I would be willing to write off all the money that his friends pocketed out of the construction of the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific and turn the whole thing over to them for nothing. That is the position I would take, and it is a perfectly logical position. But faced as we are with this tremendous burden from which we cannot escape and which was imposed upon us against the will of the people and notwithstanding the protests of those who were best fitted to know what the railway situation was, what are we going to do to-day? I say to my hon. friends: Come forward with some alternative proposal that possesses intrinsic merit and show the Canadian people sane leadership in the endeavour to get out of the wilderness into which they were led by the hon. gentleman (Mr. King) and his friends in connection with this whole railway business.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE (St. James): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the question before the House I am not going to repeat the many good reasons given by the speakers on this side who have preceded me against the acquisition of the Grand Trunk at the present time and under the existing circumstances. I desire not so much to express my own views as to put on record the resolutions and protests of the Montreal Board of Trade, the Chambre de Commerce and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association against this transaction. My desire is mainly to place before the House and the country the views of these great commercial organizations, composed of eminent business men, with respect to this transaction. The announcement of the Government's policy with respect to the Grand Trunk came as a surprise not only to the city of Montreal, but to the whole country, because nobody expected the question would come up at the present session. As a result of the strong opposition to the Government taking over the Grand Trunk railway which is expressed by the business men of Montreal, the Board of Trade met on the 16th of October and passed a resolution demanding that the Government halt in its present proposal. That resolution was worded as follows:

> That this special general meeting of the Montreal Board of Trade, having in view the result of Government operation of railways both in Canada and the United States, and the heavy financial responsibility assumed by the Dominion Government in connection with the railways already taken over by it, which, added to a public debt, enormously increased by war expenditure, necessitates a heavy burden of taxation on the country, strongly protests against the proposed acquisition and operation by the Government of the Grand Trunk Railway system.
> Also resolved that a special delegation be appointed by the Board Council to present this resolution at Ottawa, and secure all information possible regarding the railway situation.

The above resolution was moved by Mr. George Sumner and seconded by Mr. Lansing Lewis, and fifteen minutes after its introduction was unanimously passed by the attendance of over two hundred business men at that meeting. That indicates that all these business men had a thorough grasp of the situation, appreciated the circumstances of the case, and understood what was involved in the Government's policy of acquiring and operating railways.

In moving the resolution, Mr. Sumner said:

> Why should this great question, involving all Canada be hurried through in the closing days of a session of Parliament?
>
> Is it politics and votes that are sought—or why are the Canadian people to be led blindfolded into the fatal policy of more government controlled railways? Has not Canada been bled for a generation by deficiencies of the I.C.R.?
> Have we not before us the huge deficiencies in recent years through the management of railways by the Government of the United States and Great Britain?

The newspapers say the G.T.R. had an operating surplus of $1,543,000 for the past six months. Is there one man in this room who believes that the Government could have operated the G. T. R. for the past six months and shown a loss of less than $3,000,000?

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. gentleman and his clients not believe in government control? If they do, is it not true that in case the railways which are controlled object to that control and wish to give up, the Government must be prepared to own the lines?

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Really, Mr. Speaker, I will not undertake to answer a question that more nearly resembles a speech than anything else. My hon. friend entertains theories of his own and some of those theories excite surprise among his fellow-members. The hon. gentleman is welcome to his theories but at present I am not speaking about government ownership or nationalization. I am explaining why this transaction should not be carried through at the present time, and I am quoting the opinions of business men of Montreal in support of that view. To resume now with my quotation from Mr. Sumner's speech at the Board of Trade meeting:

Montreal is the great centre through which flows the produce of Canada, and if the Government would take their advice from men of experience in railways instead of looking to the West to catch votes, they would keep themselves out of trouble.

That is very plain. Mr. Sumner said further:

I am told that there are very great errors in the Drayton-Acworth report? Why are they not pointed out? For instance the statement that cost of equipment was added to capital, I am informed, is not true. Why are not the facts about what is written off and in development brought out?

Why the great hurry to acquire the Grand Trunk?

The Canadian Government has loaned money or financed the purchase of wheat and cheese for Great Britain, and also various products of Canada that are being shipped to Roumania.

Why not give a helping hand to the G.T.R. so that her pressing debts may be paid and her equipment improved? Then wait a few years until Canada gets over this horrible war's effects and until the whole country can think and work calmly.

The Government of former days subsidized the Grand Trunk Pacific. Then came a new Government that subsidized the Canadian Northern. Who is at fault for these two railroads being built from Edmonton to the Pacific?

In view of these facts, why should not the Government take over the Grand Trunk Pacific and pay its debts and relieve the G.T.R., and thus enable it to become a credit to Canada.

It appears to me that such help to the Grand Trunk would put them in a position where the railway could, under reasonable rates of freight and proper traffic arrangements with the Grand Trunk Pacific, relieve Canada of a calamity of further Government-run railway. At the same time, there would be fair prospects of paying dividends to the English owners.

Does the Government expect that taking possession of, or tying up the Grand Trunk, will help the Victory Loan? It is the common talk of the street—Not one dollar for the Victory Loan, if the Grand Trunk is taken over or throttled.

That question comes from a gentleman who is respected in Montreal and who is not a French Canadian, but a good English-speaking Canadian.

The reasonable plan is to form a working agreement for freight and passengers between the Grand Trunk in the East and the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk Pacific in the West, and thus enable all these roads to earn dividends.

Characterising the Canadian National railways as a "wooden railway, run by wooden heads," Mr. Lansing Lewis, in seconding the resolution flayed those who sought to nationalize the Grand Trunk. While the motion, he said, did not contain "enough pep," he was willing to second it and support it.

Lansing Lewis, speaking on the resolution, said it seemed to him rather a ladylike one, and if he had had anything to do with it it would have been a little more definite.

This is a most vital question and one on which the board should express itself very distinctly. It is not fair and just that such a big question should come before the country, and that the Board of Trade should not be heard from. Is it not selfish to leave a poor old government to struggle with this question alone? Are they possessed of the business acumen which we naturally look for in a congregation of such men as I see here to-day?

Are we to leave all legislation to the west, where the Board of Trade is a very wise one? The boards of trades in various cities are often foolishly jealous of one another, but I know the Montreal Board of Trade does not want to boast as having the whole say in this matter and we passed a resolution in July last that was very good. He hoped they would not think him discourteous if he said that the question was such a big one that it required a meeting of the whole board to express its opinion rather than simply the council alone.

Continuing his remarks, Mr. Lewis asked what had been the result of the resolution. He did not think that any of them had seen any results except that the Government were going to do exactly the thing they did not want them to do. It was by their actions that they showed what was in them. They knew what happened to resolutions, stacks of resolutions were being proposed and carried every day, with an extra quantity on the first of January, but they must show that they meant what they said in order that the resolution had any effect.

"When you want a thing done you must go to the Government and tell them what you want done and get some attention," declared Mr. Lewis, "That is the only way we can get attention. Do you realize the position of the Montreal Board of Trade? It is in the metropolis of Canada, the head of commerce, banking and everything else. We must enlist the interest of all the boards of trade throughout the Dominion on this Dominion question, for we want their assistance. A person by the name of Wilhelm Hohenzollern caused to be injected into the German people a very viscous bias, and we know the result. Another person in the province of Ontario seems to be playing much the same game, and entirely turning the heads of our people in Ontario, but that borders on politics.

"I have pored over the newspapers and have not heard a single man who pretends for a moment that our government or any government in any country can run a railroad.

"I don't want to allude to that ridiculous railway that is said to run between here and the lower provinces, the laughing stock of Canada."

Mr. Downey: "It is the wooden railroad. I christened it that years ago."

Mr. Lewis: "Yes, the wooden railroad run by wooden heads. Any government-run railway means increased taxation, but for some reason members of parliament who have taken the oath to serve the best interests of this country are preparing to vote for it and we are paying those gentlemen $2,500 each to put us in the hole."

I do not think that he alluded to members on this side of the House, because we are making a fight on that.

If you really mean what this resolution says so very daintily, I do ask you to express yourselves in such a way that the council will feel that it is necessary for them to take such steps as will induce the Government to realize that the Board of Trade of the metropolitan city of Canada looks on this project with the greatest horror as being one that is bound to bring disaster and which should be avoided in every possible way.

That represents my view exactly; I could not present it any better than it is given there.

Mr. A. A. Ayer was the next speaker. He said:

—that Montreal as an individual city through which poured the commerce of the country should have the biggest voice in determining whether or not it was best to take over the Grand Trunk railway.

And he went on to give good reasons why the resolution that had been presented should be adopted.

Mr. James Cleghorn, Vice-President of the Board of Trade, then made the following statement:

As a member of the council I would just like to say a few words in reply to Lansing Lewis. Mr. Lewis had a feeling that we should recommend that something be done. We sent a recommendation to the Prime Minister last July. At that time no person had any idea that this was to be sprung upon us and only one week ago the Prime Minister informed the House that the session would end in another week. Not even the members of the Opposition at Ottawa had enough information to discuss this important question. They are asking for a delay until next session in order that they may acquire the proper information so as to find out if the statements of this present Government are facts, and that the taking over of the railway is the only way out of the situation.

In looking at the papers we find that the Minister of Railways made a statement that if this deal goes through we will have 21,780 miles. The largest system of national ownership in the world. That is what astonishes us. We have heard about the Intercolonial. It is a crime the way that road has been operated and it fills us full of fear when we hear about this proposal.

It is useless therefore to expect your council to put a definite proposition before the Government. That would be impossible. We have not the proper figures upon which to work. We are told that we will not have to pay any money but the country nevertheless will be responsible for the deficits and the annual fixed charges if this deal goes through and we cannot tell what this is going to cost us. The council has been alive to this matter. Last week we sent a telegram to the Acting Prime Minister protesting against the scheme.

Among the other speakers were Messieurs William Galbraith, F. W. Covert, W. P. Downey, Huntley Drummond and John Baillie, President of the Board of Trade. I will not read the complete list of names, because there were over two hundred at that meeting.

On the 20th of this month this resolution was presented to a committee of the Cabinet by a delegation consisting of Messieurs John Baillie, Huntley Drummond, A. A. Ayer, W. R. Miller, Herbert Molson and George Sumner. The delegates were introduced by Senator Smeaton White to the committee of the Cabinet, which consisted of the following members of the Government: The Acting Prime Minister, Sir George Foster; Mr. Meighen, Mr. Rowell, Mr. Doherty, and Senator Robertson. With regard to what took place on that occasion, the Montreal Star says:

The hearing took place behind closed doors and the delegation, judging by their reticence, were evidently completely tied up as to what transpired.

The members of the delegation who afterwards were questioned as to their views of the situation declined to make any statement.

Sir George Foster said that the delegation presented two resolutions expressing the sentiment not only of the council but of the whole Board of Trade. Of course, we do not know what took place, but this despatch—whether the gentleman who sent it to the Star was inspired I do not know—says this:

> There is no question that the Government has things pretty well lined up to secure the passage of the Bill. For months many powerful and influential interests have been insisting upon the acquisition of the road and the presence here of heads of the Canadian Northern and of a certain politician, who had much to do with the formation of the Union Government has afforded evidence of what was in the wind.

That is what I endeavoured to say the other day to the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell), namely, that something of that kind was said,—that there was a man behind who was holding the strings and influencing the Government in trying to push this deal through the House.

Mr. ROWELL: I will give my hon. friend the answer made in this House this afternoon by the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid), namely, that the statement is absolutely false, manufactured out of whole cloth by the interests which are opposing the policy of the Government, a policy which is in the public interest.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Who has manufactured that anyway?

Mr. ROWELL: The supporters of my hon. friend on this motion.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Let the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) remember that the Star is a friend of the Government, not mine, and I am to-day putting all these things before the House for a certain purpose. I want my hon. friends opposite to be sure that they will be sincere and not hypocritical at the proper time. The same despatch continues:

> Montreal's delegation to-day, though representing the greatest body of business men in the Dominion, thoroughly convinced of the peril of nationalization, was as the voice of those crying in the wilderness. They were received courteously but that is all that they got. However, the impelling force behind the deal and the Government, evidently, is an acquiescent party prepared to utilize its prestige and influence to see it through without regard to any disastrous consequences it may entail.

There is no way of getting out of this. That is to say, our hon. friends opposite will not take any reasons or arguments; they are ready and they have decided to pass this measure, and in proof of that I have only to quote these words of the acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) to the delegation:

> "The measure is before the House and will be pressed to a conclusion," said Sir George Foster, acting Prime Minister, to the delegation from the Montreal Board of Trade.

We are losing time in discussing this matter, but we will do our duty up to the last moment to show that we are sincere on this question. I have given the protest of the Board of Trade, but let hon. gentlemen remember that there is another Board of Trade, the Chambre de Commerce, as we call it, of the city of Montreal which represents the French business men of that city and which includes many English-speaking members as well. In the Gazette of this morning it is reported that they met and passed a resolution. The article in the Gazette reads:

> Opposition to the proposed purchase by the Government of the G.T.R. was voiced at a special general meeting of the Chambre de Commerce yesterday and a resolution of protest was adopted with one dissenting voice. The resolution, brought in by Mr. C. H. Catelli, chairman of the committee on transportation, which, at the last meeting, was instructed to study and report on the G.T.R. question, is as follows:

This is the resolution:

> Whereas the national debt of Canada has reached such a figure that the resulting taxation jeopardizes the chances of competing, in Canada as well as abroad, with foreign producers;
>
> Whereas the manner of acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway system proposed by the Government is a most onerous method;
>
> Whereas the Government might, perhaps, without acquiring the railway, secure the right of way over the Grand Trunk lines which could insure to the Government transcontinental lines the necessary feeders;
>
> Whereas experience, in Canada and elsewhere, has demonstrated that a democratic state cannot operate a railway as economically as a private company;
>
> La Chambre de Commerce of the district of Montreal declares its opposition to the purchase of the Grand Trunk Railway system by the Government of Canada according to the resolution presently before Parliament;
>
> And expresses the opinion that later it will be found expedient to devise a method of transferring to a private company all the Government lines.

The report of this meeting in the Gazette is in part as follows:

> In moving the adoption of the resolution which he had submitted, Mr. Catelli stated that the committee in its study of the question had concluded that if the deal were proceeded with there were only two methods of taking over the system, sequestration and acquisition by arbitration. He ventured the opinion that sequestration was out of the question, as the road had been able to pay dividends. His opposition to the arbitration method was based on a quotation from the Hansard which tended to show that the awards of the arbitration board would be final and not subject to appeal.

Not even subject to a report to this House after the arbitration. That is to say, the representatives of the people will have nothing to say as to the decision given by these gentlemen from Toronto—because I expect that three Toronto men will be the experts on this question; there is no doubt about that, because I may say, en passant, that when somebody who wants to have his property expropriated has already one man on the arbitration board, it is very easy to get a second. The article continues:

Mr. Catelli submitted that this procedure would be unbusinesslike, particularly as practically no information as to the reasons for the proposed acquisition had been laid before the people by the Government.

Mr. J. N. Cabana, in seconding the resolution, declared that the question was one of the most serious which had ever come before the country. He briefly outlined the history of the G.T.R., and attributed its failure to achieve more favourable results to the fact that the directors of the road were all in England and thus had at best only a detached interest in this country. He alluded to the deficit of the Canadian Northern under Government administration and called upon his hearers to imagine what the deficit would amount to if all these roads were taken over. Mr. Cabana suggested that all three transcontinental roads should be placed under common control of a private company. He thought that a more practical plan than that of Government acquisition was needed.

Another big manufacturer in the city of Montreal, Mr. Alfred Lambert —thought it extraordinary in a democratic country such as Canada that such a situation should arise as the Government attempting to put through such a deal without furnishing the people with the most minute details as to reasons for, and people behind, such proposal. He said that the spread of Bolshevistic tendencies in this country was greatly deplored, especially by the Government, but declared that the Government, in pursuing such a policy as that which it had adopted with regard to the G.T.R. deal, was going farther than any other agency in propagating Bolshevism. He even intimated that the people, if this course of procedure were persisted in, might take over the reins of government themselves. While not opposing the principle of nationalization, he thought that a full light should be thrown upon the matter.

There was only one dissenting voice, and that was as to the manner of taking over the shares. A copy of this resolution has been sent to every hon. member of this House, so no doubt the Government have received copies.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association are also opposed to the Government's proposals. So unanimous in their opposition to the Grand Trunk railway deal, proposed by the Federal Government, that they decided that discussion was unnecessary, and believing that the reasons for their opposition were so obvious, the Quebec Division of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association passed a resolution against the scheme at their first annual meeting last night, to the accompaniment of a determined and solid vote and hearty applause. The resolution reads:

"In view of the grave financial responsibilities already assumed by the Government of Canada, through the acquisition and operation of railroads, which responsibilities add to a public debt enormously increased by war expenditures, and which will necessitate a heavy burden of taxation on the country.

"And in view of the actual results of such government operation of railroads both in Canada and in the United States.

"Be it recorded that the general meeting of the members of the province of Quebec division of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association held in Montreal on October 16, places itself on record with the Dominion Government, as unalterably opposed to the contemplated acquisition and operation by the Dominion Government of the Grand Trunk railway."

The motion was introduced by F. W. Stewart, the vice-chairman of the division. Mr. Stewart said that at a meeting of this kind the question of the Grand Trunk purchase should be taken up as one of the most important issues facing the country to-day.

Without further comment he read the motion as given above, and it was greeted with applause on all sides. He then called for a seconder and Lieut.-Col. W. J. Sadler responded, but without making any comment upon the proposed resolution. The chairman called for expressions of opinion but there were none offered. He then put the motion and called for a show of hands in favour. A veritable forest of hands sprang up, and when an opposition vote was called there was none. The resolution was declared carried unanimously. The president instructed the secretary to wire the resolution at once to the acting Premier and the Minister of Railways.

No doubt the Government have received that protest also.

I also wish to read a few extracts from editorials in the Montreal Star, which will no doubt appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite. The editor of the Star is addressing them, not us, because he thinks the members of the Opposition are doing their duty to the country in this matter. He talks very straight:

But the deal itself, above and apart from all its possible graft,—

Did hon. gentlemen opposite hear that? Is there any possibility of graft in this transaction? The editor of the Star, at all events has his suspicions:

But the deal itself, above and apart from all its possible graft, is pregnant with disaster. Not only does it add hundreds of millions to the debt, not only does it commit the country to annual millions which will never be earned, to necessary capital expenditures for maintenance running into scores of millions, and to tangled Grand Trunk legal liabilities in the United States amounting to scores of millions more, but as at present before the House it commits the country definitely to the greatest and most dangerous experiment in public ownership the world has ever seen.

In another Star editorial I find this:

If the country is let in for this deal, hastily and without a prepared avenue of alternative when the inevitable disaster impends, we shall be led near to national ruin, if not over the brink. This population cannot bear the burden of debt and deficits, the burden of waste and graft,—

Again the word "graft" is mentioned:

—the burden of political domination by the huge machine which the administration of a great transcontinental traffic system by politicians will thrust upon us.

The Minister of Railways has undoubtedly read these words with care, and, astute as he is, he must read between the lines. The article goes on to say:

But so rigid are party bonds, even under the coalition, that there are apparently none in Ottawa to make a fight for the public welfare in so desperate a difficulty except for party reasons. But whatever the underlying motive, there is sound common sense back of the Opposition demand for slow progress and careful consideration of every step in this portentous project.

Not later than yesterday the Star said:

Democratic principles are completely disregarded in the present proposal that Parliament shall accept in a few days a highly complicated proposition prepared in secret conferences extending over many months. It comes out of a survival from the times of war exigency of that dominance of the executive, properly exercised when the Hun thundered at the gate, but to-day both unwise and undemocratic, a shocking reversal of British practice and an abominable denial of primary public rights. To all intents and purposes, there is to be staged at Ottawa a spectacle of taxation without representation, for a blindfolded chamber could not pretend to translate into effective influence the feeling of the people in regard to this scheme. A bold injection of the element of hurry places both the House of Commons and the people in the hands of the schemers.

Schemers, Sir! I do not know that such a word would be countenanced were it not for the fact that I am quoting an article. The rules of the House, however, protect me and if the cap fits any hon. member on the other side he can wear it.

—a situation entirely to the liking of docile parliamentary pawns,—

Observe, Mr. Speaker, some hon. gentlemen on the other side are described as "docile parliamentary pawns." These are not my words; I am quoting them.

—fraught with the gravest dangers to the country, as all men of independent mind are aware.

I read in the Citizen of this morning the following:

Deficit reported on Canadian Northern railway operation. Total $17,011,875 up till Dec. 31 last under government ownership.

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) said that this question had not been anticipated at the time it was stated that prorogation would shortly take place. He said that the agreement had been suddenly submitted to the Government. The agreement was dated October 9, but the correspondence began in March, and the advice to the Grand Trunk concerning the receiver was contained in a communication dated March 7, 1919. Now, the question we cannot refrain from asking ourselves is, what transpired between that time in March and the middle of October? The letter of the 24th March, which it is said was "handed to Sir Thomas White by Mr. H. G. Kelley," conveyed the intelligence that the negotiations were completed. What happened since then? At page 1021 of Hansard on October 10 the Minister of the Interior says:

I need not read the cables themselves for the reason that if my memory is correct they have already been produced and are embalmed in Hansard; but further for the reason that they are embodied in the letter dated 11th July, 1918, addressed by myself to Sir Alfred Smithers, President of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. This letter was written after thorough consideration and review on the part of the ministers then overseas, and after full conference with members of the Government at home. That the record may be properly based, I shall read that letter which is as follows:

That letter is dated July 11, 1918, and refers in part to the conferences that had been held, but I want to know what led to that letter of the 9th of March, and by what process Mr. Smithers had come to the conclusion to submit this proposition to the Government with a view to arbitration, when there had been no previous hint of any kind. Until I am convinced to the contrary, I shall believe that the decision to hand the matter over to the Government was arrived at long ago and that the Government was just waiting until the last moment to spring it upon the House.

The Prime Minister has stayed away and has not compromised himself; and Sir Thomas White, who is responsible for a great deal of this trouble, is no longer Finance Minister. His successor has not had very much experience in Parliament as yet, and I do not think he will be able to offer a strong defence of this bargain. If I understand correctly the vote is to be taken to-night and that hon. gentleman has not yet spoken on the question although he should be here to defend this bargain in view of the great financial problems that are connected with it.

There is another feature involved in the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway by the Government and that is how the taxes now collected by different municipalities on the railway property will be made up after that property passes under government control and becomes exempt from taxation. In the city of Montreal that taxation amounts to $350,000 annually. So that city is confronted with a loss of that big amount, and Toronto and other municipalities will be in a similar position. In my opinion the Government should embody such amendments in the Bill as will protect the interests of the municipalities concerned.

My conclusions on this question are these: The purchase of the Grand Trunk railway will immediately burden Canada with an obligation of nearly half a billion dollars and in interest and loss of taxes of from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000 yearly.

That is to say that the Dominion debt, which is already $1,750,000,000 and rapidly reaching $2,000,000,000, will be increased by at least two or three billions, without taking into account the enormous increase of obligations for pensions, allowances, etc., and the necessary public works.

This railway legislation which is contemplated was rightly styled by an important Canadian newspaper as an imminent calamity, and nevertheless in the presence of these facts and other criticisms equally disinterested, and of the horrible examples very recent of the operations of the United States Government and in Great Britain, we are at present officially informed of the approaching accomplishment of a vast plan of nationalization the financial results of which should cause the greatest uneasiness to all the business men and to all the labour classes of Canada.

With a national debt of approximately nearly two billions, in comparison with that of $400,000,000 before the war, and facing numerous other problems which our economical and social status is facing, we seriously propose, completely ignoring, or nearly, the will of the people, to increase the enormous present debt to the fabulous sum of two billions and a half.

And who is to profit by this stupendous absorption? The English shareholders who alone will benefit by this transaction, for we will relieve them of the burden of several million dollars of shares invested in that country (of which the stock does not carry at present any more obligations on the part of the Dominion). And, in exchange, we shall give the promise of payment by Canada in the shape of bonds resting on the entire assets of Canada as security.

In pursuance of the proposed plan of nationalization, the shareholders of the Grand Trunk shall receive the interest on their debentures, whether it is earned or not. If it is earned so much the better, if not taxes will be needed to pay the note. To-day the shareholders of the Grand Trunk only receive dividends when they have been earned. It is no wonder that they are in favour of the proposed nationalization.

It is unnecessary to discuss the anticipated deficits of the Government, which are unceasingly increasing. The United States, England and Canada have gone into railway operations and we find that their real losses figure up to billions of dollars, in operation and interest. Although the Canadians need no more information with regard to the well known inaptness of the Government when it takes up the administration of railways, it seems opportune to reproduce a paragraph of "The Canadian Railway Problem," by Mr. W. F. Tye, C.E., published in 1917:

> Including the operating expenses and fixed charges, it costs the C.P.R. about $70 to do $100 worth of business. Including the operating expenses and interest on costs (that is to say fixed charges) it costs the Intercolonial and other railways of the Canadian Government $200 to $220 to transact business of $100.

Fortunately, and this is the point Ottawa is called upon to decide, there are in Canada a large number of opponents who do not pronounce themselves, but who are nevertheless sincere opponents to the subsequent experimentation in the national operation of railways. In opposition with this important group of taxpayers there is a small number of theorists who have discarded discretion and their great experience, being confident that Canada in all adverse condition is strong enough to go through, even with a burden which will soon reach a debt of $2,500,000,000.

I pretend that the Grand Trunk is bought to prevent it being put in the hands of a receiver, but notwithstanding the difficulties of the Grand Trunk Pacific, the opinion prevails in the financial circles that if the Grand Trunk was administered in Canada and not in London the company could have at its disposal a sufficient financial aid on this continent to take charge, not only of its obligations, but also of those of the Grand Trunk Pacific and also to permit of a larger extension of its system.

In view of the very urgent need of the greatest reserve in national expenses, I am opposed to the present proposition and deal.

Mr. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Lapointe) will pardon me if I do not answer the remarks that he has just made. I rise particularly this evening to reply to a few of the statements made by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. King) and the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Prince (Mr. King) on his appointment to the leadership of His Majesty's loyal Opposition in this House. It is an honourable position, and I only hope and trust he may occupy it for very very many years.

I am very glad indeed that he has been elected in time to take his seat during the present session. We have before us one of the most important questions that has ever been presented to this Parliament, and it is well to have on it not only the position taken by the hon. member who was leading the Opposition until to-day, but also the pronouncement of the leader of the Liberal party selected by that party as a whole. I must say that when I listened to him this afternoon I was very much surprised. I did believe that during his speech he would make some suggestions as to what he and his party thought the Government should do in the present condition of affairs. What a spectacle we have presented to us this evening: We have the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Lapointe) reading resolution after resolution,—all going to show that this Government was embarking on public ownership, and protesting in every way against the Government taking that course. So far as the hon. member for St. James and many of his associates who have spoken are concerned, they have all taken the position that if this transaction goes through the Government are adopting a policy of public ownership, and against that they are protesting. In contrast to that we have the leader of the Opposition taking his seat to-day and devoting three-quarters of his time trying to prove that if this transaction goes through the Government will not be owners of the Grand Trunk railway, and that we on this side of the House are trying to lead the people to believe that this means public ownership when in reality it does not mean anything of the kind. What are we to understand from these diametrically opposite expressions of opinion? Does the leader of the Opposition (Mr. King) wish us to understand that his followers were not right, and that he is opposed to all of them? For that is really what it means. If I understood him, he was trying to prove that although we were becoming sole owners of the stock, yet that did not constitute public ownership and the Government did not own the road, notwithstanding that the stock gives us absolute control of the sale or disposition of any part of the road in every way, shape and form and absolute control over its operation.

Mr. KING: I do not wish to interrupt the minister, but I desire to clear up one remark he made to the effect that the Government is getting the stock. Does the Government get the 4 per cent stock?

Mr. J. D. REID: Let me tell my hon. friend what we get. In the first place, the original debenture stock is simply a mortgage; there is not any question about that. The hon. gentleman knows that, for it was stated in this House, that what we will get is the script of the first, second and third preference stock and the common stock, which will be all handed over and deposited in the vaults of the Dominion Government in Ottawa. Now as to the guaranteed stock—and I can anticipate what the hon. member was going to ask me. That guaranteed stock has a voting power the same as any other stock, but that voting power is taken away and it is simply treated as the original debenture stock—we pay the interest on it in perpetuity, but we have the right at the end of thirty years, if the Government of this country feel that that stock is more valuable, to take it over and pay for it. Therefore, in the meantime that stock is deprived of its voting privileges and simply becomes a bond issue.

Mr. KING: I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but I would like to have this point clearly understood. His remarks, as I gather, now imply that what the Government gets in this 4 per cent guaranteed stock is the right to purchase it thirty years from now?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. KING: That is true. But the Government does not get the stock at the present time?

Mr. J. D. REID: We do not have the script transferred to us.

Mr. KING: No, certainly not.

Mr. J. D. REID: And I can tell the hon. gentleman in a minute why we do not want to buy it now.

Mr. KING: What becomes of government ownership then?

Mr. J. D. REID: I will tell the hon. gentleman why. It is simply because that stock, for which one hundred cents on the dollar was paid by those who hold it, earns 4 per cent, and if we bought it we would have to pay 5½ or 6 per cent.

Mr. KING: I do not wish to make too many interruptions, but I think it will help us to understand exactly what the Government is getting.

Mr. J. D. REID: Anything I can do to convert the hon. gentleman I shall be quite happy to attempt.

Mr. KING: Then we will take the other stocks to which the minister has referred, the first 5 per cent preference stock, the second 5 per cent preference stock, the 4 per cent third preference stock and the common stock, amounting relatively to £3,000,000, £2,000,000, £7,000,000, and £23,000,000 and over. As I understand the minister he says that the Government gets that stock and puts it into its vaults?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. KING: And when the Government gets that stock and puts it into its vaults it gives to the holders of that stock an equivalent value in Government guaranteed stocks bearing interest at four per cent which the Government cannot for a period of thirty years purchase from them.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member is absolutely wrong; he knows he is wrong when he makes that statement, and I will tell him why. With regard to the first preference stock, $16,643,999.78; the second preference, $12,312,666.50; the third preference, $34,884,534.95 and the common stock, $116,583,124.44—I repeat that script for that stock will be transferred and placed in the vaults of the Dominion Government. But the hon. member suggests that the Government will then issue equivalent stock and pay interest on it at the rate of four per cent. He must know that that is not correct. These four stocks are submitted to the arbitrators for valuation. The hon. member tries to make the people of Canada believe that we are taking over that common stock, for instance, amounting to $116,583,124.44, and issuing equivalent script and handing over four per cent interest on it in perpetuity to the shareholders of this company.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. KING: Let me make myself perfectly clear. What I say is this: The Government proposes that its arbitrators shall say what the value of that stock is. Then the Government proposes to give to the holders of that stock a Government stock carrying a guarantee of four per cent and to place it beyond the power of the holders of that stock to have the stock purchased by the Government within thirty years. When the minister says that the Government is getting a certain value in stocks which it is putting into its vaults, that statement is misleading inasmuch as the Government gives back what the arbitrators say is the equivalent value of that stock.

Mr. J. D. REID: I wish to make it plain, I do not want there to be any misunderstanding as between the leader of the Opposition and myself. The arbitrators will place a value—"if any," mind you—upon the stocks that I have just mentioned, and then the Government will issue stock for the amount at which the arbitrators value this stock, and on that stock the Government will pay four per cent. Now that is entirely different from what the leader of the Opposition said.

Mr. KING: That is all that I have said.

Mr. J. D. REID: Perhaps that is what the hon. gentleman meant, but he expressed it in such a way that any member of the House or any private citizen who reads his statement might think that the Government were handing all that equivalent stock over and paying four per cent interest on it, and if I had not answered my hon. friend the people would have believed that was the case. The member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie), when he was speaking the other day, said that if we took over this railway system the Government would be pledged to pay in perpetuity a sum by way of annual interest on the total liabilities of the Grand Trunk, which would include all those stocks. Had the Minister of the Interior not replied to this statement, it would have gone out to the country as correct. Now, that is the answer with reference to the stock.

Mr. KING: May I see whether we are absolutely agreed on this main point? As I understand the minister now, these stocks that have been referred to are to be valued by arbitrators.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. KING: They are the stocks that the Government is going to put into the vaults. That is what the Government is getting; that is all that the Government is getting.

Mr. J. D. REID: What else do they want?

Mr. KING: Then suppose the arbitrators say that the value of these stocks is nothing, the Government gets nothing.

Mr. J. D. REID: They get the stocks.

Mr. KING: Just so; they get nothing. If the arbitrators give the stocks a value of a million dollars or ten million dollars, then the Government hands over to the owners of that stock a Government-secured stock, guaranteed at four per cent rate of interest; so that the Government gets nothing at all.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is simply absurd. The hon. member states that if the arbitrators decide that the four stocks I have mentioned are worth nothing, we shall get nothing. Well, I will tell you what we do get in that case. In the first place, we get absolute control and ownership of the Grand Trunk Railway system without paying anything for the stock. That is one thing we get.

Mr. KING: Where is the ownership in that?

Mr. J. D. REID: Well, wait until I finish telling you what we get. The Drayton-Acworth report showed that during the ten years prior to the war the average annual interest earned and paid on the stocks that we are now arbitrating was $1,100,000, or $11,000,000 in ten years.

Mr. JACOBS: What was the dividend percentage?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is mentioned in the Drayton-Acworth report; the hon. member can find it there for himself. Now, the Government was willing, the people of the country were willing, to continue paying that $1,100,000; so that if the arbitrators say that this stock is worth nothing we not only get ownership, control and operation of the road and get the stock for nothing, but we save $1,100,000 per annum more than is involved in what we are now proposing.

Mr. KING: May I put this question? I am quite prepared to admit—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member (Mr. King) will have to limit himself to a question, and it can only be asked if the hon. minister consents.

Mr. J. D. REID: I am willing to allow the hon. member to put a question.

Mr. KING: I think it is important to make clear the distinction between control and ownership. The minister speaks about the Government owning the Grand Trunk Railway system. In that event will the minister tell the House what is the meaning of this clause in the Bill:

> The present guaranteed stock and the new guaranteed stock—

That includes all the capital stock and debenture stock.

> —or any part thereof, may be called in or redeemed by the Government, at par, at any time after thirty years from the date of the appointment of the said Committee of Management, on six months' notice, by advertisement, to the holders thereof.

Where is the "ownership" of property which cannot be acquired for another period of thirty years?

Mr. J. D. REID: I must frankly admit that it is pretty hard for me to convince the hon. member on any of these matters, but perhaps I might try to do so. The hon. member's question is: Where is the ownership, because the guaranteed stock is held practically as a debenture stock, whoever it may be held by, also where is the ownership, because the stock that we issue is in the hands of the public? I will try to explain to him where the ownership is. The guaranteed stock, whoever it may be held by, and the new stock that may be issued, will simply be held as security on which they will get interest without their having any say as to operation or sale, without being able to interfere in any way with the operations of the Grand Trunk and with knowledge of the fact that the Dominion Government have the right under this Bill to sell or otherwise dispose of any portion of the road. We have the stock transferred to us; we own the first, second and third preference stock and the common stock; and instead of borrowing money at 5½ or 6 per cent in order to pay the award, we are simply giving them as collateral security for the first, second and third preference and the common stock, an issue of non-voting stock. That is as well as I can explain the matter to the hon. member, and I think that will satisfy the public as regards public ownership. The hon. member, if I understood him aright, argues that because we own only the stock, we really do not own the railway and can do nothing with it. We now own all of the stock of the Canadian Northern railway. Might I ask the hon. member if he now considers that the Government are really the owners of the Canadian Northern system?

Mr. JACOBS: Unfortunately, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the Government pay dividends to the stockholders?

Mr. J. D. REID: That is not the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING. That is what they are doing by this measure. That is quite different from this.

Mr. J. D. REID: I want to ask the hon. member again this: The Dominion Government own the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company with bonds against it just the same as in the case of the Grand Trunk. Will he say now that we do not own the Canadian Northern railway? He cannot say that; he knows he cannot say it. The hon. member this afternoon argued, if I understood him aright,—and he is doing so now—that in taking over this stock, we are not really getting government ownership. During the course of his remarks this afternoon, I must frankly say that I was waiting very anxiously to see whether he was in favour of public ownership or private ownership, but he did not commit himself. I should like to ask him now. Are you in favour of public ownership?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the minister is unable to frame a policy, I am quite prepared to take the responsibility of framing one when the time comes.

Mr. J. D. REID: I should like to ask the hon. member another question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. minister is certainly not in order in putting questions to an hon. member who has already spoken and who has exhausted his right to speak.

Mr. J. D. REID: Have I the privilege of asking him whether he would consent to a question or not?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It could possibly be done with the unanimous consent of the House, not otherwise. A similar ruling was given last night by Mr. Speaker, and I must respect that ruling.

Mr. J. D. REID: I bow to your ruling, Sir. The only point I wish to make is this, namely, that we now have in this House a leader of the Opposition who, in my opinion, is afraid to stand up and say whether he is or is not in favour of public ownership. As regards the present transaction, every hon. member opposite, with the exception of the leader of the Opposition, has endeavoured to impress upon the people that this side of the House in adopting the policy of taking over this road is entirely committed to public ownership. He is the only one of the whole party who is endeavouring to persuade the people now that the other members on the opposite side are all wrong; that it is not public ownership at all; that we really do not own the railway. Is it not a nice spectacle to see the leader of the Opposition in his first remarks in this House as leader take a position of that kind?

It is not a question whether the members of this House are in favour of public ownership or not; it is a question whether the Government are going to take over this road or let one of two or three things happen. I only wish that you, Sir, had not ruled that I could not ask the hon. member one or two more questions, because I would like to know which one of these two or three alternatives he would be willing to adopt. In the first place we are face to face with this proposition, and it is all on account of the policy of hon. members on the Opposition side when they were in power, and the leader of the Opposition (Mr. King) who was at that time a member of this House, is also responsible for the railway tangle in which we find ourselves at the present time. I will tell the hon. member why we must decide to-day whether the Government will take over this railway, not because of public ownership but in the interest of the people of this country, or, whether we will let the Grand Trunk go in another way that would prove disastrous to the Canadian people. I will tell him why we are in this trouble. The Grand Trunk railway, the Canadian Pacific railway and the Canadian Northern railway were all at one time doing well and prospering, with great futures in this country. What happened? In 1903, the Grand Trunk wanted to get into the Great West, just to get a connecting line into Saskatchewan and Alberta. I was here at the time and I know what I am speaking about. I saw Mr. Charles M. Hays, and he declared he did not want to go further than Saskatchewan and Alberta, but the Government of that day—and the hon. member who is now leader of the Opposition was one of those responsible in the matter—insisted that the road must be built from Moncton to Winnipeg and from Edmonton to the Pacific.

The company agreed to do that and the Government of that day told Charles M. Hays, and led the people of this Dominion to believe that it would not cost this country more than, I think, some $13,000,000.

Mr. TOBIN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. J. D. REID: I will not allow any more interruptions. Mr. Speaker, I want, with all respect to the hon. member to say this. I am prepared now to let him or any other hon. member on the other side of the House ask me a question if the leader of the Opposition will let me ask him one. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. King) sits quiet and makes no reply to my question.

Mr. TOBIN: He said—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. TOBIN: I just want to put the minister right.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member has no right to interrupt the minister, who has the floor, without his consent.

Mr. J. D. REID: Now let me tell the members of this House and the public just what the leader of the Opposition did to get us in the railway muddle we are in at the present time.

Mr. TOBIN: He was not in the House then.

Mr. J. D. REID: He was a minister in the Laurier cabinet, and advocated his leader's policy consistently. Hon. gentlemen opposite were responsible for the building of the Transcontinental, and they told the Grand Trunk company and the people of this country that it would cost only some $13,000,000, but when they got through and were ready to hand it over to the Grand Trunk they found it had cost over $200,000,000, on which the Grand Trunk by the terms of the agreement had to pay interest in perpetuity after seven years. Was not that enough to make the Grand Trunk or any other railway company throw up its hands? The construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific was carried on simultaneously. The Grand Trunk guaranteed the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific believing that the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his government would carry out their policy. But when the Grand Trunk Pacific was completed and the Transcontinental was ready to be handed over, the Grand Trunk were faced with the liability, if they took over the road, of interest after seven years upon $200,000,000 to $217,000,000, instead of upon $13,000,000. It was impossible for the Grand Trunk to operate successfully with a liability of that amount. The Grand Trunk was faced with a liability of $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 per annum if they operated the Transcontinental railway, and it was absolutely impossible for them to succeed on those terms. They had also guaranteed the Grand Trunk Pacific securities to an enormous amount, and they had pledged that they would pay no dividends on the old Grand Trunk stock if the Grand Trunk Pacific did not earn the guarantees the Grand Trunk had given. They are therefore in the position to-day that they cannot pay their shareholders any dividends, if earned, until the Grand Trunk's guarantees in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific are met, and the Grand Trunk is also liable for the deficits on the Grand Trunk Pacific. How under Heaven could the Grand Trunk live with liabilities of that amount? Yet to-day the leader of the Opposition, if I interpreted his remarks correctly, and those behind him, advocated that we keep the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern and the Intercolonial, and release the Grand Trunk from all of its liabilities and let it continue to operate or be taken over by the Canadian Pacific. That is such an absurd proposal that no government could accept it and remain in power.

Faced with this position, what could the Government do? It is not a question whether we want public ownership or not. We have the Canadian Northern, with its lines in Western Canada superior to the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk Pacific put together. The Canadian Northern lines in that territory cannot help but pay. The Government of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier allowed the Canadian Northern to extend its line from Port Arthur east, and this put the road practically in the same position as the old Grand Trunk, the western lines becoming liable for the amount guaranteed in respect of the extension to the east. Unless the Canadian Northern can get feeders in Eastern Canada it is in a hopeless position. The Grand Trunk Pacific from Winnipeg to Port Arthur is in a similar situation. It has no lines in Eastern Canada gathering up traffic to be taken West. Then in Eastern Canada we have the Grand Trunk system with no connections in the West, but with better facilities for gathering freight in Ontario and Quebec than the Canadian Pacific, or the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern combined. Would it have been fair to the people of Canada, who have put so much money into the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific initiated by the Government of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, for this Government to say: We will not force the Grand Trunk—I use the word "force"—to join up with the other roads and complete the national system? Whether the road is operated by the people of Canada or by a private corporation it will be in just the same position to compete for traffic with its rival, the Canadian Pacific. Yet the leader of the Opposition this afternoon tried, for a political purpose, if I may be pardoned for saying so, to make a certain portion of the public believe that we are taking over the road simply because we believe in public ownership. He knows that is not the case. He knows we have no alternative to taking over the Grand Trunk if we want to save that road, as well as the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern, and in years to come give the people of this country the cheapest freight and passenger rates it is possible for any railway to give.

The leader of the Opposition also stated that this was neither public ownership nor private ownership, but was simply transferring the road to the present management of the Canadian Northern system. Perhaps he did not say so in so many words, but I got the impression that he was trying to lead the public to believe that we were handing the road over to Mackenzie and Mann.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. J. D. REID: My hon. friends say "hear, hear," which shows that I am interpreting the hon. gentlemen's remarks correctly. Now let me say to the leader of the Opposition, what I said this afternoon, that neither directly nor indirectly in any shape or form have Mackenzie and Mann been concerned in the management of the Canadian Northern or the Canadian Government railway system, and the hon. gentleman knows it. And when he or any other member of this House makes the statement in this Chamber or otherwise gives it publicity, that Mackenzie and Mann have either interfered in or discussed the operation of the Canadian Government railways with any member of this Government, from the Prime Minister down, he is making a statement that is absolutely false and unfounded. I want to emphasize that fact, because the allegation has been thrown across the floor of the House that Mackenzie and Mann were operating the road.

Mr. JACOBS: What about Mr. Lash?

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. REID: Mr. Lash is a solicitor like the hon. member himself and is glad to earn any money he can in the shape of solicitor's fees.

Mr. JACOBS: I should like to know—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. JACOBS: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. gentleman may put his question.

Mr. JACOBS: I should like to know from the minister if Mr. Lash is advising the Government in this transaction?

Mr. J. D. REID: Mr. Lash is one of the best railway lawyers in Canada, and is as respectable and honourable a man as the hon. member himself. His word is as good and his honour as unsullied as the hon. gentleman's, and he is advising the Government on this question.

Mr. JACOBS: I asked the question merely to secure information, and not with any intention of reflection on that gentleman's honour.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. gentleman does not wish to reflect on the honour of Mr. Lash, but the very fact of his asking the question that he has put to me as to whether Mr. Lash is advising the Government in this matter is sufficient to create a suspicion in the minds of the people, and that I say is unfair to Mr. Lash. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was also very anxious that nothing should be done in this transaction that would enhance the stock and lend itself to stock speculation. That was his most anxious care. When, however, other transactions were being negotiated in the past in connection with the Transcontinental my hon. friends were not quite so anxious as they are at the present time. The hon. gentleman asked me the question to-day, and I must frankly say I was surprised that he had evidently not seen the statement of the Minister of the Interior in connection with the matter made on a previous occasion. It seems almost unbelievable that any leader of the Opposition would fail to read the speeches that are made in the House every day on such an important subject as this, but the Minister of the Interior at page 1074 of Hansard said:

There necessarily must be a date fixed as of which the value must be found. Should it be a date later than about the date the hon. gentleman names I think there should be no appreciation owing to the taking over, or probable taking over, of the road by the Government. That can be provided for, and I think, I may say, will be provided for in the agreement. It may be that the date might be fixed as he suggests, about the end of August, in which event there would be no need for such a provision.

Let me add, in order to satisfy the leader of the Opposition—because I am just as anxious that he shall be perfectly satisfied as that everybody else in the country shall be satisfied—that the Government will take every precaution to see that in the fixing of that date no stock speculation that has taken place or can take place will be of any avail. We will safeguard that point to the best of our ability as a Government. I trust that this statement reassures the hon. gentleman. Now, the hon. member, if I understood him correctly, also stated that this was a "job" to foist all the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific on the people. Well, the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific are on the people to-day and have been for the last seven or eight years. The hon. gentleman knows that we have been voting seven and a half or eight million dollars per annum to pay the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific. It is not true that those liabilities are being foisted on us; I repeat, we have had them for the last seven or eight years. The Grand Trunk Pacific is in the hands of the receiver —why? Because the Government believed that the time had come when we must stop handing over seven or eight million dollars a year to the Grand Trunk railway for them to own and operate the Grand Trunk Pacific and pay dividends to their own shareholders; and we said: "By our refusing to continue paying you that sum every year you cannot pay any more dividends to your shareholders and you must either assume those liabilities or come and settle with the people of this country." On July 11, 1918, we gave our final answer. They could not pay any more dividends after that, for if they did, the directors of the Grand Trunk would have gone behind the bars. That is why they had to come and settle with us in connection with the matter. That is our position with reference to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. We made them a proposition with which the hon. member finds fault.

The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) and the leader of the Opposition himself, I think, referred to the Drayton-Acworth report. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish the House to bear in mind that that report was prepared by Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth, a gentleman from England. And, in passing, lest I forget, I want to say that one of these two gentlemen is to-day Minister of Finance; he sat in Council with this offer submitted to him, and both in Council and in this report he agreed that this proposition was the best and only one which the people and the members of the House should endorse. Further, let me remind hon. members that in this House the other day we heard the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), who occupied that position for eight years and who is as anxious as any other hon. gentleman to save every dollar that possibly can be saved to the public. He is not a member of the Government. Fully cognizant as he is of the problems that face the country, he told this House that this proposal was the only one which the Government could carry out in the interest of the country. We therefore have the advice of such well-informed men as the Minister and the ex-Minister of Finance. I shall read from the Drayton-Acworth report, but first let me say that before they made the recommendations contained therein these commissioners had gone into the whole affair of the Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific. They had painted it as black as they could, and after doing all that, here are some of the recommendations they made:

> We recommend that the control both of the Grand Trunk Pacific and of the Grand Trunk be assumed by the people of Canada on terms hereafter set out.

Now that is to be found on page 86. Here is another recommendation:

> We do not recommend that further public aid be given to the Canadian Northern as at present constituted.

We accepted that recommendation and took over the Canadian Northern. Here is another recommendation:

> We do not recommend that the Grand Trunk, Grand Trunk Pacific and Canadian Northern companies be allowed to go into the hands of a receiver.

They also recommend the following:

> We recommend that the control of these three companies be transferred to a new body.

And immediately following we have this:

> We have discussed and rejected the following suggestions:—Transfer of all three railways to the Canadian Pacific. Transfer of the Canadian Northern or a portion of it to the Canadian Pacific.

They also recommend:

> That the entire share capital of the Grand Trunk, guaranteed, preference and ordinary, be surrendered to the trustees in exchange for an annuity based on a moderate but substantial proportion of $3,600,000, the average sum paid as dividend in the last ten years; and that this annuity should increase by 40 or 50 per cent after the first seven years.

That is exactly what we are doing to-day. They go on to say:

We recommend that the precise figure be fixed by agreement and that it be left to the directors of the Grand Trunk Company (1) to apportion the annuity among the five classes of Grand Trunk shareholders, and (2) to procure such assents of their shareholders as are legally required to complete the transfer.

These are the recommendations that were made by the Drayton-Acworth Commission in connection with the railway situation.

Now it has been suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite that we enter into a working arrangement—that there should be a working arrangement between the Grand Trunk and the other three railways. In 1903 the Government of the day decided it would be well, instead of taking over the road, to have a working agreement with the Grand Trunk at that time. The matter was discussed in the House and the plea advanced then was: What a grand thing it would be for the lower provinces, what a grand thing it would be for Halifax and St. John; we will have a working agreement with the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific railways and we will carry everything to the ports of Halifax and St. John. Well the Government of that day made the agreement and I have the statute which contains that agreement before me. Let me say to hon. gentlemen: the Grand Trunk solicitors of that day were a little too shrewd for the Prime Minister and his Government, because they had a nigger in the woodpile. I will read what the nigger was:

The company accepts the aid on these conditions and agrees that all freight originating on the line of the railway or its branches—

Now listen to this:

—not specially routed otherwise by the shipper.

There is the nigger. The result was that the company started out all their agents, and had them going to the shippers and the shippers would mark on the bill of lading "via Portland," and so far as the Intercolonial Railway was concerned from 1903 up to the present time they never derived any advantage from the working agreement that was made by the Liberal Government, as I have explained.

Let me say in passing there was another nigger in the woodpile that the Government of that day allowed to creep into the arrangement which they made. Although they professed to be so anxious to do all they could for Halifax—the good old port of Halifax, the port I am proud of and whose traffic, together with that of St. John, I hope will not only be doubled but trebled by our taking over of this road—they made a traffic agreement with the Grand Trunk railway containing a clause providing for a preferential rate of one per cent per hundred pounds against that city. How could you expect a shipper to route freight via Halifax when he was told: "It is going to cost you one cent per hundred pounds more if you send this freight by Halifax than it will if you send it by Portland," and the traffic could not be sent via St. John because the haul was so much longer around by Moncton to that port. Such has been the result in the past of a working agreement of that nature. This Government believes in a working agreement between the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern and the Intercolonial. But the great difference between our proposition and the arrangement made by the Liberal Government is that we want an agreement without any nigger in the woodpile—we want the ownership and control of these roads. Does any member of this House believe that this Government would do anything else than build up, develop and route Canadian traffic through our own Canadian ports? That is the position we take; and instead of Grand Trunk agents doing in the future as they have been doing in the past—going to Toronto, Ottawa, Brantford, and all these cities in Ontario, and saying: "Route this freight to Portland,"—in view of the fact that we have our own vessels, our agents will be in a position to say, "Give us this traffic; we have fifty ocean vessels. We have a fleet as big as that of the Canadian Pacific running from Halifax and St. John in the winter, and from Montreal and Quebec in the summer; give us that traffic and we will carry it for you on our own Canadian lines right from Brantford, Hamilton, or Toronto, as the case may be, and transport it in our own Canadian vessels to Liverpool." That is the position that this Government takes. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) who up until to-day was leading the Opposition in this House, says he is in favour of private ownership and therefore he does not want this arrangement to go through. He takes that position and is trying to prevent this arrangement from passing in order that the freight and passenger traffic that is collected in the province of Ontario by the good old Grand Trunk railway shall go to Portland instead of going to Halifax or St. John.

I also wish to say that the working agreement which is being made by this Dominion Government is one that will be controlled by the people. The members in the House, representing the people, will have a say as to any policy in connection with the matter of routing. The agreement we shall make will be of this nature: Instead of our traffic, gathered in the province of Ontario, going over the Grand Trunk to Chicago and then over the Milwaukee and St. Paul railway to Winnipeg and other western points, our agents will get that business for our Canadian routes, and any agent who does not act on that principle will not, while I am Minister of Railways, be on the job very long. Canada first and last, is my motto.

But, Mr. Speaker, what about Portland? We have lines on the other side and we have lines in the West. There is a great amount of traffic that comes from the West. A great deal of that business in the past has been routed over American roads; the Grand Trunk got the benefit of a great deal of that and hauled it to Portland. We will have the Central Vermont, of which Portland is the terminal, as one of our American lines.

Of course, there will be traffic by Portland for the American roads, and there may be some for Canada but we are in a position that we were never in before, the position of getting the greatest amount of traffic that it is possible to get not only in Canada but in the United States for our own Canadian ports, and in a position to get it without any discrimination against Halifax.

Now, Mr. Speaker, another suggestion that I understood the hon. member for Cape Breton to make the other night was this. He said: Let the Grand Trunk railway go into liquidation, why should we interfere? Well, Mr. Speaker, acting on the advice of experts such as those who constituted the Drayton-Acworth Commission, and on the advice of our own railway experts, we felt that it was in the interests of Canada that the Grand Trunk railway should not go into liquidation, for if it did it would really go into the hands of the Canadian Pacific railway. Another reason is this: From $400,000,000 to $600,000,000 of British money—money collected from over 180,000 people in the British Isles—was put into the construction of this railway when Canada had a population of only a few hundred thousand, and we have had the advantage of that investment in many ways, for it has helped to build up this country. The Grand Trunk railway did more to build up Canada than any other railroad. Therefore, would it be fair and right, with not a dollar of Canadian money in this road, to take the position of the hon. member for Cape Breton and say: We will let this road go into the hands of a receiver and will try to squeeze every dollar out of you and not give you a cent on the investment you have made in this good old Dominion of Canada. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Drayton-Acworth Commission said, 'No; this Government said, No; and the people of this country would say, No, if they were appealed to.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: We did not manage their road; it was their own management.

Mr. J. D. REID: The old Grand Trunk Railway system has not been managed, probably, as well as it would have been if it had been under a Canadian directorate, but even with the management over in England the hon. member knows that the Grand Trunk railway was always able to pay the interest on the debenture stock, amounting to $7,000,000, the interest on the guaranteed stock, and $1,100,000 on the stock to be arbitrated. So even under what my hon. friend terms the bad management of the Grand Trunk it was able to earn those dividends. The only difference between my hon. friend and me, Mr. Speaker, is this. I say the Grand Trunk people were deceived when they were assured that it would only cost $13,000,000 to build the Grand Trunk Pacific; that is where the bad management came in, and not in the operation of the railroad. If we will just separate the Grand Trunk Pacific from the old Grand Trunk, the latter will not only pay the interest on all of these stocks that I have mentioned and which are the subject of the proposed arbitration, but it will earn a surplus in the future as in the past. In taking the Grand Trunk over, the liability that the hon. member for Cape Breton mentions of some $10,000,000 or $11,000,000 on the capital will be no liability, because that interest was earned in the past and will be earned in the future, and by transferring Grand Trunk traffic to our Canadian Government Railway system and our western traffic to the Grand Trunk we shall effect a saving in operating cost which, I believe, in the next five or six years, as was stated by some hon. member this afternoon, will enable our Government railway system to make both ends meet.

I want to mention once more the Halifax and St. John situation. The hon. member for Cape Breton, more I believe for political reasons than by way of argument, tried to emphasize the fact that we have spent millions of dollars on Halifax and millions of dollars on St. John, and that all this vast expenditure will be worthless, for we are now going to build up Portland. That is the effect of the hon. gentleman's statements. Let me repeat again, Mr. Speaker, that so far as Halifax is concerned, it was put in the position by the Government of that day that it got no benefit in any way from that traffic agreement with the Grand Trunk railway. By taking the Grand Trunk over we are in a position to give more business than we ever did to Halifax, to operate a fast Atlantic service in connection with Halifax, and to take people to any part of Canada—to Quebec, Ontario or the West, on lines owned, operated and controlled by the people of this country. That is the position we are putting Halifax in. So far as St. John is concerned, the hon. member knows that we have within the last month or two —I cannot remember the exact date—made a connection with the Transcontinental from McGivney Junction into St. John, and we are in a position to carry traffic from Ontario or any other part of Canada right into the city on an equal basis with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The hon. member and other hon. gentlemen on his side of the House have emphasized the fact that the old Intercolonial has not paid in the past. And by the way, when the hon. member from Cape Breton urged so strongly that we should keep to private ownership, I noticed he did not say to the Government, "Sell the Intercolonial. We are tired of public ownership." He would be the last man to say that, for if he ventured to voice such an opinion he would never be re-elected. But, Mr. Speaker, we have been handicapped in the past by having the Intercolonial railway carrying traffic from Montreal to Halifax on the same basis as from Montreal to Portland, the reason being that the Grand Trunk railway and the Canadian Pacific railway squeezed the Intercolonial into this position: They said, "We can carry freight from Montreal to Portland for so much per mile, and we will give you only the same amount for carrying it from Montreal to Halifax as we would earn to Portland." Now, if a carload of freight starts from Edmonton and goes to Halifax or St. John, the Intercolonial will get its due share of its earnings, in other words, pro rata rates, and it will show a profit probably instead of a deficit.

So far as the Intercolonial is concerned I want to take issue with the hon. member for Cape Breton. He insinuated that the Intercolonial was not run on a basis similar to that of a privately owned road. I want to say that, so far as I can see not only while I have been Minister of Railways, but under my predecessor's régime at least, and I believe still farther back, the Intercolonial has been operated by men who are as good railway men as any on the Canadian Pacific railway or any other railways in Canada, and I want to say that about the Intercolonial railway employees also.

I say that it is managed as economically and that it is as free from political interference as is the Canadian Pacific railway. There is no doubt about that in my mind.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why didn't you make any money, then?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have just explained the reason why; it is pretty hard to get the hon. member to understand anything. I am having the same trouble that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) had the other day. He tried in every way to put the hon. member right, but he did not succeed; and when the Minister of the Interior failed in that respect I could hardly succeed.

The leader of the Opposition (Mr. King) came into this House and joined with other hon. members opposite in the complaint that we have brought this Bill in at the end of the session. A few days ago the member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) pointed out that at a certain stage in the session the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) had intimated that we hoped to prorogue at the end of that week or during the following week. Because the Acting Prime Minister said that the hon. member for North Cape Breton said: "Mr. Speaker, we want to go home; surely you are not going to ask us to sit here another week or two weeks to pass this Bill. We want to go home, no matter what happens; the country and the railways can go to the mischief; please let us go home and do not proceed with this Bill." And the leader of the Opposition himself, on the first day that he takes his seat in the House and in his first speech, says to the Government: "I have sat in the House only one day, but we want to go home. It will be awful if I have to sit here any longer; please let me go home." That was the position of the leader of the Opposition. That hon. gentleman has been here in Ottawa; he knew what was going on, and as he did not have to concern his mind with legislation he had ample opportunity to evolve some policy which he could bring before the House and say: "There is the policy that I want the people of this country to adopt in connection with the operation of railways." But instead of that, Mr. Speaker, his only policy is this: "Please let us go home; we have been here too long."

There are several other matters that I would like to touch upon, but I have already spoken much longer than I had intended to speak. But may I point out this in closing: In his first speech to-day the leader of the Opposition made, so far as I can remember, only two points. First, he tried to convince hon. members and the people of the country that even though we got all the stock of the Grand Trunk; even though we got the control, management and operation of the road; even though we got complete possession of it and were in a position to sell it or dispose of any portion of it, take up rails or anything we liked, we were really not getting ownership of the road. Second, "Please let us go home." Having answered those two points, I do not feel that I need take up the time of the House in discussing any other points in connection with this proposal. It has been very hard to make the leader of the Opposition and the member for North Cape Breton and Victoria understand anything in connection with this railway other than my reply to the two points which I have mentioned; I think, therefore, that I will now resume my seat.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): I wish to congratulate the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) upon the lung power which he has shown. After the little trouble that occurred on Monday night in his electoral division, I did not expect him to have such recuperative powers.

Mr. J. D. REID: We won in my county; that is the only county I was in, and we won.

Mr. JACOBS: I can now understand why it was that my hon. friend's candidate won; the hon. gentleman has a reputation for winning wherever he goes. In addition to demonstrating his lung power, the minister has shown a woeful want of accuracy in some of the statements which he has made this evening. Of course, these statements were made for a certain purpose and it seemed to delight the gentlemen on this side of the House, or at least a certain number of them; for I noticed that some of his remarks did not seem to meet with the approval of the erstwhile Liberals who now sit on his side at whose door he wishes to lay the responsibility for the railway complications which we have to deal with to-day. The applause seemed to come from the old-time Tories, who can understand the hon. gentleman's style of oratory and appreciate it, perhaps more than we can.

The minister made some most astonishing statements in regard to imported matters, which I think ought not to be allowed to go unchallenged. But before I go into that I should like to say a word or two with regard to the anger which he exhibited at the very mention of the name of Mr. Z. A. Lash. Mr. Lash is a gentleman for whom I have great admiration. He is a practising member of the Bar in very high standing; he is widely known as one of the most astute lawyers of this country. I asked the minister whether Mr. Z. A. Lash had been consulted with regard to this Bill and his answer was that Mr. Lash was a respectable attorney and that if he had been consulted, he, the minister, could not see that very much damage had been done. Well, perhaps the minister will permit me to read a word or two from a standard work "The Railway Builders of Canada" by Professor Skelton of Queen's university; and in doing so I am not going to make any reference which will impugn the character of Mr. Lash. This is what I wish the hon. gentleman to hear and inwardly digest. It is at page 184 of this work, speaking about Mackenzie & Mann:

> William Mackenzie had also carried through much work for this company. In 1886 the notable partnership of Mackenzie and Mann was formed. The firm built the Calgary and Edmonton, the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan, the Canadian Pacific short line through Maine, and many minor railways. They developed capacities which made each the complement of the other—Mackenzie, a master of finance, and Mann as successful in extracting a subsidy from a politician as in driving ahead the work of construction. Later Z. A. Lash, a shrewd and experienced corporation lawyer, joined them, and the three, with able lieutenants, carried through their ambitious plans without more than momentary pause, until within sight of the goal.

Mr. LALOR: What is wrong about that?

Mr. JACOBS: That is why I ask the hon. gentleman whether Mr. Zebulon A. Lash had been consulted in connection with that deal, and I gather from the reply that he had been consulted and that he has been in consultation with the Government ever since.

Mr. KEEFER: Why should he not be consulted?

Mr. McKENZIE: He is a partner to Mackenzie & Mann.

Mr. JACOBS: There is no reason in the world why he should not be consulted. There is no reason in the wide world why Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann should not be consulted.

Mr. J. D. REID: I simply want to say to the hon. member that Mr. Lash was consulted as a legal adviser because he was considered to be one of the best railway lawyers in Canada, and because he is consulting lawyer for the Canadian National railways.

Mr. JACOBS: Another startling statement was made by the minister. Of course, he was delivering a stump speech in the House, and we will overlook some of the remarks which he made in the heat of the moment when he was working up his friends to a state of enthusiasm at the wonderful speech he was making attacking our new leader (Mr. King). He made the extraordinary statement a few minutes ago that he would dismiss any agent who goes outside of his own territory to route freight over United States railways. This is what he said yesterday when a question was put to him by the hon. member for Guysborough:

Mr. J. H. Sinclair: The policy of the Grand Trunk, as I understand it, has always been to make Portland, Me., the Atlantic terminus for their traffic. What is the view of the Minister of Railways with regard to that? Does he intend to continue that policy?

Mr. J. D. Reid: So far as I am concerned, as I stated a few minutes ago, when we took over the Grand Trunk Railway system we would have one great national system of railways, and we must get the very best men available to manage this system and they must of course adopt whatever policy they think is best to ensure successful operation.

To-night he tells us that any man who adopts a policy of that kind, looking to the United States, will be forthwith dismissed from his employ. Last year when the question of the Canadian Northern was up, we were told that that railway was to be taken completely out of politics; that it was going to be placed in the hands of Mr. D. B. Hanna and a directorate, and that the Canadian National railway was taken out of politics and neither the minister nor any other person connected with the Government had the remotest intention of interfering with this company and the management of the line. Yet, now the minister stands up and bluntly and coolly tells us that he is going to dismiss any person who will route freight over United States lines, and his friends on his side cheer him to the echo.

Another extraordinary statement made here to-night by the Minister of Railways is this, that the poor old Grand Trunk railway was fooled by the former Liberal Government into believing that the cost of this railway would be $13,000,000, and it subsequently cost $200,000,000. Did you ever hear of such a thing as that—astute railway men, builders of a great line of railways across the continent, were fooled by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his friends into believing that this railway would cost $13,000,000 when it subsequently cost $200,000,000, and that for that reason we ought to show consideration to the Grand Trunk railway! These are only a few choice morsels that I culled while the minister was going along at the rate of sixty miles an hour.

The minister told us that this agreement embodies the report of the Drayton-Acworth Commission, overlooking the fact that for the last three or four weeks every man in this House has been carefully studying that report. He knows as well as, if not better than, any one else in this House that the Drayton-Acworth report was in no way followed. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) told us a few days ago, when introducing the Bill, that they wanted the Grand Trunk to come to terms on the basis of the Drayton-Acworth report, but they refused to do so, and consequently the Government were compelled to go very much further than they expected and the result was that this bargain was entered into which was in no way what that report suggests.

There is another astonishing thing in connection with the Government, and it is this: The former Minister of Public Works, Hon. Mr. Carvell, has been an antagonist of public ownership of railways for many years. In fact, during the whole of his political life, Mr. Carvell, in season and out of season, in this House and out of it, on every public occasion, in his public utterances has declared himself as being against public ownership of railways. He left this House and the Government a few days ago, and what has become of him? He has been made chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, the board which holds in the hollow of its hand the whole of the railway problem of this country.

And yet this Government tell us that they are in favour of public ownership when they appoint the greatest antagnoist of public ownership to the most important railway position in this country.

It will be interesting also to find out the views of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and of the Naval Service (Mr. Ballantyne) with regard to this question of public ownership. He has not hesitated to declare on many public occasions what his views are. I do not know whether he has done that in the House, but his views are well known. Has he been consulted on this matter? No person knows. What has happened to the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) who, instead of being at Geneva, should be in his seat to-day to protect the interest of the city of Montreal and of the Board of Trade of which he has been for many years the idol? Where is the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) who represents St. Anne's division in the ctiy of Montreal and who is also one of the darlings of the Board of Trade of that city? Where are these people? An echo answers "where"? Therefore, it falls on us, the second line of defence, to take up the cudgels for the Montreal district, for the city of Montreal, which has within its confines over ten per cent of the entire population of this Dominion and which, perhaps, contributes in income tax 35 or 40 per cent of the entire amount received by the treasury of this country from that source. It is necessary for us to say a word or two for those organizations that have been passing resolutions but have received such scant courtesy at the hands of the Government.

I should like to say a word or two with regard to the bargain which has been entered into by the Government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The Bill before the House commits the country to a liability equal to one-quarter of the national debt. I wonder whether hon. gentlemen in this House really stop to think of the magnitude of the proposition which is before us. One-quarter of the national debt is involved in this proposition, and yet it is being rushed through, and why? I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker. The President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) told us the other day why it is being rushed through. I have not his exact words before me, but he stated that he was afraid of an organized opposition to defeat the Bill. We take the ground that a matter of this magnitude ought to be discussed throughout the length and breadth of the land, on the hustings and in every public place. The President of the Council takes the ground that it is not in the interest of Canada to allow the opposition to this measure to be organized, and that is one of the chief reasons, he says, why this Bill is being forced through the House to-day.

I wish briefly to pass over the contract which is about to be put through by the Government. This is what it proposes to do: The Government guarantees the $60,000,000 of what is called the "guaranteed" stock, which immediately upon the Government's imprimatur being placed on it becomes worth, as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) pointed out the other day, 80 or 90 cents on the dollar. In addition to that we take over the bonded indebtedness debentures amounting to about $153,000,000. Finally, we take over about $185,000,000 of common stock which is to be valued by a board of arbitrators appointed in the manner indicated in the Bill. Now what we have reason to fear is that the arbitration board may put upon this stock a value altogether beyond what it is worth, and we say that the Government should make some provision in the Bill providing for the manner in which the stock shall be valued. The arbitrators may be asked by this company to value the stock on the basis, for instance, of the cost of duplication of the road at present prices, that is, the cost of equipment, rolling stock, and so on, or they may be asked to take into consideration the potential possibilities of the road after the country is better developed than it is now. If the arbitrators are going to do that, we have very good reason to be apprehensive as to the amount we shall be called on to pay. We know what happened in connection with the Canadian Northern, when $60,000,000 of stock belonging to Mackenzie and Mann or their transferees was valued by the arbitration board at nearly $11,000,000 and that amount of the money of this country was paid over to these gentlemen. Now I put to the Government this question: If stock which never cost the owners one single penny, representing merely so much water, is valued by an arbitration board at $11,000,000, how much will the people of this country have to pay for stock which actually cost $185,000,000? That is a question which I put to the Government. We ought to see to it that safeguards are inserted in the agreement whereby the arbitrators will pass upon the value of the stock from the standpoint of the condition of the road to-day as a going concern, and not taking into consideration the cost of duplication or the potentialities of the road when it becomes further developed. There is no such provision in the agreement, and the stock goes before the arbitrators to be valued in the same way as the Canadian Northern stock was dealt with.

I do not want to say very much on the question of public ownership, not that I am afraid to express my views, but it seems to me that the question does not enter into this discussion. We have this railway. It has been decided to take it over, but it ought not to be taken over on the terms which were made by the company and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen). We say first that the $60,000,000 of what is called "guaranteed" stock should have been submitted to arbitration for valuation in the same way as the first, second, and third preference and common stock. Why was this stock not submitted to arbitration in that way? As I understand it, the Drayton-Acworth commission recommended that this stock should also be valued, and there is no reason in the world why it should not be valued in the same way as the other stocks. We are in a position to deal with this company as we like. We are the creditor and they the insolvent debtor, and who ever heard of an insolvent debtor dictating to his creditors the terms on which he will surrender his property? The property belongs to the Dominion of Canada. The Grand Trunk have defaulted on their bonds in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and consequently it is for us to take over the road and make our own terms with the company. But we find the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) in a charitable and indulgent mood when the pockets of the people are concerned, and not his own private pocket. He spoke of the old Grand Trunk, using the word "old" as a term of endearment and affection, I suppose. Dear old Grand Trunk! Good old Grand Trunk! The people put their money into this company in good faith, the minister says, and we should see they get everything they can out of it. If that be so, why not pay the Grand Trunk every dollar that was paid in by the various stockholders? Why not pay them this $700,000,000 or $800,000,000? Why stop at $250,000,000, if they are the dear old Grand Trunk, and it is necessary that the credit of this company should be kept up in England? The fact is the Grand Trunk went into this deal originally in the same way as other people do. They expected to do well out of it, but it turned out not so good as they expected. Is that any reason why the money of the taxpayers of this country, not the private money of my good friend the Minister of Railways —for he is too astute a gentleman to part with his money unless he gets value for it—but the money which belongs to every man, woman and child in this country, should be turned over to these foreign investors? None whatever, unless as a matter of charity. I say that charity begins at home, and we must be just to our taxpayers before we are generous to strangers, and the sooner the Government learns that the better it will be for them.

The reason which it seems to me impels the Government in embarking on this grand coup is to provide themselves with something to go to the country at the next election. Their platform is pretty well broken; it is somewhat wobbly, and needs new planks. The President of the Council rather let the cat out of the bag the other day when he assured us that west of Ottawa there was not even a fraction of the people who were against public ownership. He wants to give the people what they want. I think he wants to provide for my good friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) so that he may be able to go home. At present that hon. gentleman finds it somewhat difficult to land safely in the West, but if he comes home bringing the bacon—I ask pardon of my Christian friends—he will be perhaps more welcome than if he came empty-handed.

Now, Sir, this talk about government ownership which has been thrown across the floor of the House for the last week or ten days is something upon which I do not intend to dwell. I just put it to my good friends on the other side, if they think the Canadian Pacific railway would have been the success it is if it had been managed by the Minister of Railways, who would immediately dismiss an employee if he routed freight on a United States railway. How long do you think the Canadian Pacific railway would last under such conditions? I have in my mind's eye a picture of Lord Shaughnessy, as president of the Canadian Pacific railway, standing on the carpet in front of the desk of my good, amiable and unassuming friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen). I also have visions of Mr. Beatty calling to see the present Minister of Railways and learning from the vast storehouse of knowledge which this minister possesses, something about the running of the railway. The thing has only to be mentioned for us to see the absurdity of it. And yet these gentlemen will insist upon declaring that government ownership is the best thing for the country.

Mr. J. D. REID: Does my hon. friend take the position that in acquiring the railway it is really government ownership, or does he take the position of the leader of the Opposition that it is not government ownership?

Mr. JACOBS: I take exactly the position of the leader of the Opposition, and for this reason: If I buy a house for $25,000 and it has a mortgage of $50,000 on it, I do not own that house until I pay the $50,000, because when the mortgage comes due the creditor can foreclose. Now, Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a great deal of vacillation on the part of members of the Government with regard to this question of public ownership. I have not heard the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Mewburn) in his seat loudly proclaiming the virtues of government ownership. I have not heard the Overseas Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) in his seat declaring himself in favour of government ownership. I should fancy that a man of his experience would be able to enlighten the House to a very material degree upon this question. But nothing of the kind has transpired. The people who are anxious for government ownership are those who want it as a means of being returned again to power at the next election, and who feel that they can carry the West on this question and nothing else. Some criticism was made in this House this evening by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Lapointe) on the conduct of the Government in reference to the treatment of the Montreal Board of Trade. I think it was the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), who is acting at present as Prime Minister, who received the Board of Trade delegation and told them that the Government had taken a stand and was not going to retreat from it. If hon. members will remember, I asked the acting leader of the Government whether he had received a letter from the Montreal Board of Trade protesting against the acquisition of the Grand Trunk. He replied that he had received a letter of that kind, and when I asked him what answer was made, he fell back on a famous line in "The Raven". He said that the letter had been acknowledged, "Only this and nothing more". Well, Mr. Speaker, I make bold to say that when the hon. gentleman's friends present themselves to the members of the Board of Trade seeking the sinews of war which are always necessary in times of great stress the reply of the members of the Board of Trade may be another passage from "The Raven": "Quoth the raven, never more".

May I as a parting word commend to my friends on the opposite side a remark or two made by the present Minister of Finance in the famous Drayton-Acworth report and give them that thought to take home with them and slumber on. I would refer to page xliv of the sessional papers Nos. 20C-20G, Vol. LII, No. 12, 1917, under the heading, "Government Operation Discussed and Rejected":

> We are instructed to consider the acquisition of the Canadian railways by the State, and the possibility of their operation in connection with the Intercolonial. We do not recommend this course. In our judgment it is not in the interests of Canada that the operation of its railways should be in the hands of the Government. We know no country in the world, where a democratic state own and operates its railways, in which politics have not injuriously affected the management of the railways and the railways have not had an injurious influence on politics.

Of course, I wish to say in parenthesis, other countries probably did not have at the head of their railway departments a gentleman of the astuteness and railway ability of our present Minister of Railways. No doubt that is why they failed. To continue:

> We do not think government ownership of the Canadian railways would tend to reduction of rates, but rather in the contrary direction.

My hon. friends from the West will note that.

> For the carriage of one ton of freight one mile the Canadian shipper pays at present on the average three-fourths of one cent. On the railways of New South Wales, the oldest and most important Australian state, where the railways have been in government hands from the outset, the shipper pays well over two cents. But we see no cause to enlarge here on such general considerations. There are several reasons peculiar to Canadian conditions why state ownership and operation should be avoided.

I am sorry the Minister of Finance did not tell us what were these reasons "peculiar to Canadian conditions." They might be interesting. On page xlix I read, under the heading "Possibility of Forming a Commercial Company Discussed":

> Assuming, then, that the Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk, and Grand Trunk Pacific must be united into one system, and that this system must remain entirely separate from the Canadian Pacific railway, we have considered the possibility of forming a new company on a commercial basis, to which the operation of these three undertakings might be transferred. We have come to the conclusion that this course is not feasible under the circumstances, as they at present exist.

To-day, when we are discussing the question of public ownership of railways, we have invited the Minister of Finance to give us the benefit of his counsel. He is the father of this report, and he is being asked to give his support to a Bill which belies every consideration mentioned in it and to which he has appended his signature. And then we have taken the former Minister of Public Works and put him on the Railway Commission to deal with the railways as, in his judgment, he may deem best.

I do not know that there is anything further that I can add. The Minister of the Interior has said that one line without the other would be incomplete, cut in the middle and useless. That is precisely the position of the Government on this question of public ownership. Here we have some of them in favour of it and some opposed; some exiled to Europe and others gone to their reward on the Railway Commission, and we have nothing but voices. Moses heard on the occasion when he descended from Mount Sinai, voices that were neither of Victory nor of Defeat, but merely a combination of human sounds. It was a noise and nothing more, and it was only fit and proper, on this occasion, that the Minister of Railways should have concluded his remarks with the great finale with which he treated us to-night, when he said, "We are sick of it; we want to go home."

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I intend to detain the House for a very few moments, but there are some things which it seems to me ought to be brought to the attention of the country before this debate closes.

Let me say at the beginning that this is not the time to declare for public ownership or otherwise. As the Minister of Railways has very properly said, it is not a question of whether or not we want public ownership but whether we have got to have it in this particular case. The fact, Sir, is that as regards public ownership on this particular question the Government are at the end of their tether and they say they must take over the road willy-nilly. That is the trend of their argument. Therefore, the question is not whether we are in favour of public ownership as a concrete proposition or not, but whether this House deems that in its judgment this is a fit and proper bargain to make in taking over the Grand Trunk railway. Before I go further there is one thing I would like to point out: The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. G. B. Nicholson), if I understood his remarks aright, and the Minister of Railways also, led the House to believe that the railway muddle is wholly due to the policy pursued by the Liberal party in 1903.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PARDEE: "Hear, hear," the hon. gentleman says. In 1903, declares the Minister of Railways, the Grand Trunk Railway Company wanted to get into the West and in order to meet that want the Liberal party presented railway legislation which they deemed to be in the best interests of the country, and the Grand Trunk Pacific adventure was entered into. Let me point this out: that if the Grand Trunk Pacific arrangement was bad—which I am not admitting in any way whatever—if the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific was improperly undertaken, the Conservative party at that time under its leader, Sir Robert Borden, also advocated in the strongest possible terms the construction of another road, as an alternative to the Grand Trunk Pacific, to meet exactly the same end. So that, whatever may be said with respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, there is this to be offered in extenuation of any fault there may have been in the arrangement entered into, that the Conservative party at that time also considered another transcontinental railway to be necessary.

So far as this bargain is concerned, I am not arguing against public ownership in any way whatever, I express no opposition to public ownership; but I say that to my mind there are three fatal objections to the proposed arrangement. In the first place the Minister of the Interior declared that it was the largest transaction that had ever been brought before the Dominion. That is so, without a shadow of a doubt, and therefore I maintain this is not the proper time to bring down such legislation as this. This session was called for a specific purpose. That specific purpose has been fulfilled; and to-day I assert, and I believe the people will back up the assertion, that the only reason for bringing down this Grand Trunk legislation now, was to afford some reasonable and fair excuse to extend the session beyond the period of thirty-one days. Sir, there is another fatal objection to the proposition and it is this: The other day when introducing the resolution upon which this legislation is founded, the Minister of Railways was asked the question, "In what condition is the road?" to which he replied: "I am informed it is in very fair condition."

Mr. McKENZIE: "First-class condition," he said.

Mr. PARDEE: I want to ask hon. gentlemen, suppose they were buying even a horse or an automobile unsight unseen and the only recommendation they had was that it was in very fair condition, would they dare to buy either one without a valuation and without a thorough looking over? Where is the valuation in this case? The ex-Minister of Finance the other day told us that we must recollect that we are buying this road on a marginal liability. Well, if we are buying it on marginal liability have we not got the right to ask the fullest particulars be brought down to show the people what margin they are getting for the money they are putting out? Why, Sir, there is one item alone of $43,000,000 of bills receivable. Up to this day I have not seen in Hansard, nor have I heard, one single particular of what that $43,000,000 consists of. Is it a good or is it a bad item? If you are assuming a marginal liability have you not got the right to know the value of your assets? The $43,000,000 in question may not be worth a dollar. If such is the case that fact should be taken into consideration by the arbitrators in fixing the value of the stock that the people of Canada have got to pay for. We have absolutely no valuation, absolutely no particulars in, with respect to what we are buying. If ever the accredited representatives of the people entered into a bargain that they knew absolutely nothing of, they are doing so to-day in the purchase of the Grand Trunk railway. Moreover, Sir, I make this assertion, and I say it is positively correct. The Minister of the Interior declares, "We must be generous to the English shareholders." Well, we are to-day entering into an arrangement to pay the English shareholders the interest on stock that we are guaranteeing—stock that those shareholders are not getting a dollar on and that we are making good for them. In view of these facts I say that the bargain entered into is not a well-considered one and that it is utterly lacking in those particulars that are necessary in order to deal with it intelligently. Therefore, I say that the only right and proper thing to do, so far as this bargain is concerned—and without at this time going into the question of any further particulars—is to have the fullest valuation made of the assets, of the leases, of the bills receivable, of money owing, of all the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Information as to every one of these items should be submitted to the House, and until such time as that information is in our possession we have absolutely no right to commit this country to the huge amounts that we are committing it to in the purchase of this road. The Minister of Railways to-night, with his usual acumen, went into many facts and many figures that were far from germane to the subject under discussion. He beclouded the issue in every way that he possibly could. He brought a mass of what he supposed to be facts and figures bearing upon this matter; but kept very carefully away from the absolute meat in the nut, namely, what the people of Canada are getting for the moneys the Government propose to expend on this railway.

I repeat again, Sir, that until such time as these particulars have been brought down, until such time as hon. members and the people are fully informed as to the exact amount of liability they are assuming, and as to the exact amount of advantage that may accrue to them from the assumption of that liability, this House has no right to pass this measure, but it ought to be deferred for further consideration by the House and by the country.

Mr. G. W. ANDREWS (Winnipeg Centre): Mr. Speaker, before recording my vote on this important subject, I desire to say that unless the leader of the Government can in some way postpone this debate until after the report of the Special Committee on Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment is brought before this House, I shall have to vote in favour of the amendment. My reasons for this decision, Mr. Speaker, are not because I am opposed to public ownership. The Germans made an unqualified success of state operation of railroads, and what German men can do Canadian men can do better. But, rather, my reasons are to be found on page 943 of the proceedings of the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Committee, No. 15, of Friday, October 10, 1919. My hon. friend the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder) and Chairman of that Committee, in winding up the proceedings of taking evidence, made the following statement:

> I am sure that every member of the committee appreciates the spirit of Mr. Waistell's remarks to-night. We have recognized throughout the entire investigation that on the part of those associated with Mr. MacNeil there has been a desire at all times to co-operate with and assist the committee in every way possible. We have a very difficult problem to solve, one of the most difficult, I dare say, that Parliament has had before it for many years.

These are the weighty words of the Chairman of that Committee, Mr. Speaker. Further down on the same page he said:

I can assure you that personally I have learned a great deal, and in saying that I am sure I speak for every member of the committee.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is not in order. Until a committee makes its final report to the House, it is irregular to refer to its proceedings in the course of a debate.

Mr. ANDREWS: I submit to your ruling Mr. Speaker. I hope you will pardon my ignorance. The words I have quoted will be found in due course in the report when it is submitted, although this portion of the evidence came into my hands in the usual way and I thought every member had a copy. The words were uttered at a public meeting at which the press were present. However, Sir, I have gathered from my observations during this debate that no matter what happens the taking over of the Grand Trunk will cost this country a good deal of money. My hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) who, in my humble opinion gave the clearest statement that I have heard on the entire subject, this afternoon stated that it would cost $18,500,000 a year. Now, the successful re-establishment of our soldiers will involve a considerable amount of money, Mr. Speaker, and $18,500,000 will re-establish quite a number. If you will advance that money to them in loans I think they will pay you 5 per cent for it, and be glad to. And I want to say this before taking my seat, that I sincerely hope this country will be able to successfully re-establish the Grand Trunk and the other railroad systems of this country, and I also hope that they will be able to re-establish the soldiers; but if it ever comes to a showdown between the Grand Trunk that failed and the soldiers that won, I am going to put my money on the men that won the fight.

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Before I enter upon the subject under discussion, Mr. Speaker, I would like very briefly to convey to the leader of the Opposition (Mr. King), who has taken his seat this afternoon, my most cordial congratulations. I say that with particular pleasure because, as may not be known, the hon. gentleman is a native of the city which I have the honour to represent in this House, and I view his promotion with all the greater pleasure on that account.

Now, Sir, I enter upon this discussion with a certain reluctance, largely because of the fact that I do not entirely agree with some of the views and conclusions that have been drawn by hon. members on this side of the House. It has been stated that the question of the nationalization of the Grand Trunk railway is not a matter of public ownership at all. I cannot view it in that light. And I would like to say at the outset, for myself at least, that I am entirely and absolutely a believer in the principle of public ownership—in the principle of public ownership in general and in the principle of nationalization of railways in particular. I come from a city where that principle is pretty much an article of faith with every one. In that city the ownership of public utilities has been a great success; there has been no failure whatever in connection with it. While it may be a far cry from the successful public operation of the smaller utilities in a city such as the one I come from to the operation of a national utility, it is, after all, some encouragement for me to believe that the same principle would be successful in the larger national field.

It has been argued that the matter of taking over the Grand Trunk is not in itself a matter of public ownership. Technically that may be correct. But I would like to point out this, and I think it has been lost sight of very largely in the discussion, that the object of public ownership is not the making of profits; it is the service that may be rendered to the public. Ownership in itself is not the consideration. It is important only because of the fact that it gives control of operation, and by that means the power to give service. I think under the Bill which has been presented there can be no real doubt that the Government will have absolute control of the operation of the Grand Trunk. I believe, Sir, that many hon. members have no conception of the growth of public feeling in favour of public ownership of the great public services and the great natural resources of this country. I believe that the people are tired of continually paying out millions to private corporations for the operation of public utilities and more especially of railways.

The people of Canada have, I believe, paid fully one billion dollars in one way or another to the railways of this country; they have paid enough money to the railways to build the roads, and yet we do not own them to-day.

I believe further that the people of this country will go a great deal further in the direction of public ownership than we have gone up to this time; I believe that they will go beyond the nationalization of the railways. I am not going to enlarge on that now, but I hope that will be the case.

It would be impossible to exaggerate the gravity of the financial condition in which this country now finds itself, but I would not like to admit that the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway system under proper conditions, on a fair basis and on fair terms would necessarily aggravate the seriousness of that position.

Now, we have two groups, as I take it, that are opposed to the nationalization of railways, or to the nationalization of the Grand Trunk, the matter which is before us to-night. One group consists of those on both sides of the House, who do not believe in the principle at all; they believe for various reasons that private ownership of railways is preferable to public ownership. The other group consists of those who do favour the principle, and perhaps this group may be subdivided into three classes. The first class embraces those who theoretically believe in public ownership but have not the courage of their convictions when it comes to applying the principle on the larger national scale. Then there are others who claim that the time is inopportune for the acquiring of the Grand Trunk; and I will deal with that very briefly in a moment. Then we have the third group, consisting of those who think that the present project is a very bad and a very poor bargain for the people. I should like for a moment to examine these objections.

Some who are opposed to the entire principle of nationalization and believe in private ownership are of that mind because their private interests are concerned—interests which are not consistent with those of the public. The larger number fear that in the case of the nationalization of the Grand Trunk there will be political manipulation; that the road will be used for political advantage and that there will be consequent inefficiency of management resulting in large financial loss.

I admit at once that unless the Government, if it takes over the Grand Trunk, creates an absolutely efficient board of management the project will be a sad financial failure. If it is decided to take over the road I would get the very best railway men in the world; I would not care where they came from, and I would pay the price. I do not see why men who understand the railway business, men who are the best in their own particular line, cannot give the same kind of service to the country that they can give to a private corporation, provided they are not interfered with by those who are higher in authority.

I admit that it takes a good deal of faith to believe that the policy of interference for political purposes will not continue. But if you obtain the right kind of men—men with backbone, men with a sense of responsibility and with a fair amount of patriotism—they will not allow themselves to be interfered with in the performance of what to them must be not only a work for remuneration, but a matter of public and patriotic duty.

During the last session, when the incorporation of the Canadian National Railway Company took place, I voted against that Bill because I felt at that time that the Government was not acting in the interests of the country when it retained in the management of that road the men who had already made a failure of the Canadian Northern. I believe that to-day. I have no particular criticism to make against the gentleman who was then very freely criticized, the president of the road. When a man does not make a success of one undertaking I think it is fair to assume that he will not make a success of another undertaking which is much larger. If I believed that when the Grand Trunk is incorporated into the Canadian National Railway system the National railways would remain under the control of the present management, that would be sufficient justification for opposing the acquisition of the Grand Trunk, because you would be starting out with practically no chance of success. I was very glad to read in Hansard, therefore, the following remark made by the Minister of Railways a few days ago:

> There is another matter that I wish to mention in connection with this great railway undertaking. When these two railway systems are operated as one system it will be absolutely necessary for the Government to select a management and a staff of the best men that can be found, no matter where they come from, to operate this whole new complete system, and those who are decided upon must assume this responsibility.

I gather from that—and I would like to be corrected by the Minister of Railways if I am wrong—that it is his intention to appoint a new board to manage the enlarged national system.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member is absolutely right. I made that remark the other day, and if I can use any other words to make the expression stronger, I wish to be understood as doing so. I repeat that so far as I am concerned this road will be operated by the best railway men that we can get, no matter where they come from. The intimation or insinuation of an hon. gentleman opposite—I think it was the member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie)—that the management of these railways would be turned over to the present management was absolutely wrong. The whole board will be reorganized and a set of railway men will operate the system entirely independent of myself or any other man.

Mr. EULER: I understand, then, that it is the intention to reorganize the whole board?

Mr. J. D. REID: Certainly.

Mr. EULER: I am very glad to have that assurance from the minister. Just a word or two with regard to the danger of financial loss under government ownership. The real reason, I think, why some railways in Canada have been losing money is that there has been no co-ordination of our railway services. If the Grand Trunk is taken over we shall have the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk, each one weak where the other is strong. I know that that point has been mentioned in the Drayton-Acworth report, but I think it should be dwelt upon in view of the argument that public ownership of railways will necessarily result in a heavy financial loss. In the West the Canadian Northern is well supplied with branch lines, but it is weak in Eastern Canada and especially in Western Ontario, of which I have more intimate knowledge. On the other hand, the Grand Trunk has insufficient branch lines in the West but it has lines running into practically every town, village and hamlet in Ontario.

These two roads can be organized to form a complete system. I see no reason why they should not be at least fairly successful at the outset, and develop ultimately into a well-paying proposition. While I am on that point, I should like to mention another feature which is of much importance to the people of the province from which I come, the province of Ontario, and especially to its western portion. In that section of the country public ownership has made great progress. We have made a success of it on a smaller scale in most of the towns and cities. We are now entering upon the building of what is known as radial lines of railway, publicly-owned. In order to do that, unless the Grand Trunk is nationalized, it will be necessary to duplicate many lines which are already in existence. If the Grand Trunk is nationalized, the people of Ontario would like to see the branch lines which are already there, which are not operated as they should be (many of them with only one or two trains a day) placed under the control of those who would electrify these roads, save a great deal of duplication, and render a tremendous service to the people of Ontario.

Duplication, of which I have already spoken, is another cause of losses. There is only one remedy that I can see for that, and that is the placing of all these roads, including the Canadian Pacific, under one national control, and then relentlessly cutting out duplication wherever it may exist, saving the unnecessary overhead expenditure and maintenance of parallel lines and all the rest of it. Then I believe the national roads would have a fair chance of financial success.

During last session and again during this session I was disappointed and surprised to hear the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) make the remarkable statement that it was well to take over—I am perhaps not using his exact words, but this was his meaning—the Canadian Northern, which was a losing proposition, to take over the Grand Trunk now, which is perhaps, to some extent, in financial difficulties, but to leave the Canadian Pacific alone, because it is a paying institution and is a prosperous and well-managed road. The only conclusion to draw from that is this, that it is the business or the duty of this country to take over the lame ducks and to leave the prosperous and paying institution in the hands of private interests. I am personally sufficiently a believer in nationalization of railways to say that if it be at all possible, I would also include the Canadian Pacific railway in the national system.

Others say that the time is not opportune for taking over the Grand Trunk. That may be true. I for one cannot see that there is any immediate likelihood, perhaps not for a generation, of Canada's being in any very much better position to take over the road than it is at the present time. We are loaded down with a tremendous debt. There is no reason for believing that we can get rid of these obligations for a very long time to come. In the meantime, I presume, it will be with this road as it has been with others, namely, that if they lose, we pay; if they win, they keep the profits to themselves. If we are obliged to pay anyway, we may as well own and control the road.

Another alternative that has been mentioned is to allow the Grand Trunk to go into liquidation, and then if we wish to nationalize it, to buy it in at bargain figures. Perhaps that argument is sound. When private interests fail to make a success of their business, the Government or the people of Canada cannot be expected to come to their assistance, and possibly the same rule should govern in the case of the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific. But I believe, after all, if a fair and just bargain can be made for the purchase of the Grand Trunk, it will be preferable to take it over in that way rather than to allow it to drift into bankruptcy, with all the inconveniences that come from interference with a great public service such as is provided by a great railway system.

I come to the last point and I shall be very brief. I wish to refer to the claim that we are making a very poor bargain on the basis which is proposed in the Bill before the House. I do not know whether this is going to be a good bargain or not, and I question whether any hon. member on the other side or on this side of this House is able to express a really reasoned opinion whether we are going to make a good bargain or not, because there is so much uncertainty connected with the terms presented to us now. I am entirely in favour of the acquisition of the Grand Trunk and the incorporation of it with the national railways if that can be done on the proper terms, and anything I may say is not to be considered as in any way a retreat from that position. I am in favour of nationalization of the Grand Trunk.

I will, however, say this, that after looking over the blue-books and the financial statements that have been placed before the House, it appears to me that there is a good deal of ground for the amendment that has been moved by the leader of the Opposition, that we have not had, and we cannot have sufficient time, merely, by debating the question in this House, to come to a really reasoned conclusion as to what we are actually doing in connection with the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway. I know that the Minister of the Interior has said in this House in regard to that criticism that the Government is willing to stay here and debate this question as long as may be necessary; but I say in all seriousness that I do not believe that it is possible to arrive at a correct estimate of the situation merely by making speeches on one side and then on the other side of the House. A question of the magnitude of this kind involving hundreds of millions of dollars ought to be discussed not only by the newspapers, but the people ought to be given an opportunity to think it over, to talk to their representatives in Parliament, and thus permit us finally to arrive at some sort of reasoned conclusion with regard to the matter. For that reason, I am inclined to favour the amendment. We should thus have two or three months thoroughly to investigate and to digest the information. Then, next session, in January or February, we could deal with it intelligently.

I would, just for a few moments, refer to the terms themselves as I gather them from the Bill and from the balance sheet as submitted by the Grand Trunk railway. We are taking over the assets and the liabilities of the road. Those assets consist of property and equipment of a value of $434,990,999. There are other sundry items amounting to some $25,799,381, and outstanding accounts in one item amounting to $43,838,831 as to the details of which, as the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee) said, we have absolutely no knowledge whatever. That makes a total, if we take it at its face value, of $504,629,211. The liabilities consist of the funded debt of $216,207,138 upon which we guarantee to pay perpetually 4 per cent per annum, further bonds of some $18,184,738, an advance by the Canadian Government of $15,142,633, equipment notes and loan of $5,344,207, and notes payable of $35,548,235. Then there are current liabilities amounting to $22,801,474, reserves amounting to $3,455,344 and advances to controlled companies $7,286,995. We are, therefore, agreeing to assume a responsibility as regards liabilities of $323,970,767. I am taking that from the statement in the blue-book. Upon $290,426,958 of that, there are fixed charges that this Government undertakes to pay.

Deducting $323,000,000 of liabilities from $504,000,000 of assets there remains a nominal balance to be arbitrated upon of $180,000,000, covered by three preference stocks totalling $63,000,000, and common stock of $116,000,000. Where my misgivings come in, so far as the bargain is concerned, is in connection with the arbitration on this $180,000,000 of stock. I am not so particularly concerned over the ability of the Grand Trunk to take care of the fixed charges, so far as the present guaranteed and debenture stocks are concerned. From the past history of the Grand Trunk, according to their statements, I am inclined to think they would be able to take care of those fixed charges. According to the rates of interest given, they would amount to something like $12,500,000 per annum. I understand the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) has fixed it at something like $18,000,000. Of course, to the $12,500,000 must be added any possible amounts that the country may have to pay because of certain guarantees which the Grand Trunk has made in respect to other companies. I am quite willing to accept the figures of my hon. friend from Brantford, $18,000,000, although they are somewhat higher than I had thought. I repeat it is possible, and I believe that under proper management it is probable, that the Grand Trunk will be able to take care of those charges.

The great objection I have to the proposal as it stands is this: I am afraid to entrust to any three men, no matter how competent they may be, the determination of the value of the $180,000,000 of preferred and common stock which is to be referred to arbitration, and to bind this country without further reference to Parliament. I think the responsibility in the end must devolve on the Parliament of Canada to say what amount shall be paid. While I am going to vote for the amendment, which would give us more time to study and discuss the matter, I do not for one moment intend to vote for anything that would tend to sidetrack nationalization of the Grand Trunk on proper terms. I say that if the arbitration award did not become effective until after it had been approved by the Parliament of Canada, I should vote for the main motion. I do not suppose the Government will vary its Bill on account of anything a member of the Opposition may say, but I wish to reaffirm this: In a project of this magnitude, which involves the people of Canada in a possible expenditure of at least $180,000,000, for which I believe there is very little value to-day, and a total investment of half a billion dollars, I believe that Parliament should pass upon the award of these three arbitrators before it becomes effective.

There are two things that should be considered, and which may even affect the ability of the Grand Trunk, after it is acquired, to pay the fixed charges of which I have spoken, and they are these: We are affected by the Grand Trunk Pacific entanglements. I do not know exactly what that liability involves, but it is going to be very great, and it ought to be taken into consideration when the value of the $180,000,000 of stock is being considered. We have further the statement in the Drayton-Acworth report that some portion of the dividends which have been paid in past years, amounting to something like $21,000,000, should not have been paid, but should have been spent on the road, and thus have been a charge on the revenues.

I apologize for having spoken at this length, but I desired to make my position plain. I am for the nationalization of the Grand Trunk. I believe it would be in the interests of the people if we could give it the fullest possible thought and discussion. I have not yet heard any reason advanced why the interests of the country would suffer if discussion was allowed in the interval between now and the next session, when the whole matter could be debated in the light of the knowledge we may ourselves elicit and that may be obtained through discussion in the press and elsewhere. Finally, I urge that the award be not effective until the Parliament of Canada has passed upon it.

In conclusion, I do not intend, nor do I desire, to give any vote that will place me in the position of opposing nationalization of the Grand Trunk or any other railway on proper terms.

The House divided on the proposed amendment of Mr. McKenzie which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. A. McGREGOR: I was paired with the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Turcotte). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. FOURNIER: I was paired with the Minister of Militia (Major-General Mewburn). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I was paired with the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. GREEN: I was paired with the hon. member for Victoria, Alta., (Mr. White). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Main motion agreed to on the same division reversed, and Bill read the second time.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid the House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1:

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask when the minister intends to resume the consideration of this Bill in committee after the adjournment to-night? To-morrow is Friday and there will not be very many members in the House. Could we not leave this matter until Monday evening?

Mr. J. D. REID: I discussed the matter with the chief whip of the Opposition and we thought there would be no objection if we dealt with the Bill until about six o'clock, when we could take up some other business, resuming the Bill on Monday.

Mr. BUREAU: The trains leave between four and five o'clock in the afternoon, and if you discuss this Bill until six o'clock any hon. members who desire to leave in the afternoon may be unable to do so if they are anxious to take part in the discussion of this matter.

Mr. J. D. REID: There will be a good many members here who will be desirous of speaking on the Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: We would like to be present also to take part in the discussion.

Mr. STEVENS: May I point out that practically all the members from west of the Great Lakes remain here continuously throughout the session and never get home to see their families or touch their business? Hon. gentlemen from Ontario and Quebec as well as from the extreme East should have some consideration in the matter.

Mr. BUREAU: There is other business that could be taken up. We have concluded this debate earlier than we might have done, and in so doing we have made a concession. We are not asking anything extraordinary in the request that further consideration of this Bill be postponed until Monday. Hon. members would not suffer, and in the meantime some other business might be proceeded with. The various bye-elections take place on Monday and many hon. members will no doubt be absent.

Mr. J. D. REID: I move, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee rise and report progress.

Mr. BUREAU: Will the minister kindly give an answer to my request?

Mr. J. D. REID: I can only repeat that I made an arrangement with the chief Opposition whip and I think we had better let the matter stand as agreed upon between us. To-morrow we shall see if there is any other business that we can do, and in the meantime we shall proceed with this Bill until six o'clock.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty, the House adjourned at 12.20 p.m.

Friday, October 24, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

ADULTERATION ACT—AMENDMENT.

(Bran and Shorts or Middlings).

Mr. R. C. HENDERS (Macdonald) presented the first report of the Select Committee on Agriculture and Colonization on Bill No. 7, an Act to amend the Adulteration Act (respecting Bran and Shorts or Middlings), as follows:

Your committee having had under consideration Bill No. 7, an Act to amend the Adulteration Act (respecting bran and shorts or middlings), beg leave to recommend the same to the House without any amendment.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND STATIONERY ACT—AMENDMENT.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Solicitor General) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 36, to amend the Public Printing and Stationery Act.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, this amendment is introduced at the instance of the Board of Civil Service Commissioners. It refers to the Stationery Department of the Printing Bureau, and provides for a certain limited amount of reorganization, with the object of better co-ordinating the work of that department.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION FINANCES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on the 22nd of this month question No. 8, which stood on the Order Paper in my name, was answered. The question was:

1. What was the gross indebtedness of Canada on the first day of April, A. D., 1919?

To which the answer was given:

1. $2,676,635,724.77 (1919).

But in Hansard the question is in this form:

1. What was the gross indebtedness of Canada on the first day of April, A. D., 1911?

I wish to bring the error to your notice, Mr. Speaker, and to request that the necessary correction be made.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the error is in the transcription of the document by Hansard, I shall see that it is corrected; otherwise it must go as printed.

Mr. McKENZIE: As the question appeared on the Order Paper it is all right; but in Hansard it is all wrong.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will have inquiries made, and if the facts are as stated by the hon. member the necessary correction will be made.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM.

BILL PROVIDING FOR THE ACQUISITION OF THE SYSTEM BY THE GOVERNMENT.

House again in committee on Bill No. 33 respecting the acquisition by His Majesty of the Grand Trunk Railway system.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Last night the committee adopted clause 1, namely, "Short title."

Mr. CAHILL: Mr. Chairman, clause 1 was not adopted last night.

Mr. McKENZIE: There was nothing adopted last night.

The CHAIRMAN: It was carried. However, we will take it up again.

Short title.

Mr. CAHILL: Before clause 1 carries, I think the Government should give to this committee a statement of the total liabilities that are to be assumed by this undertaking.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member wishes the title of the Bill to be changed in any way, he would be in order in moving accordingly, but in committee the discussion must be strictly relevant to the clause immediately under consideration, and he is certainly not in order in referring to the total liabilities of the undertaking on clause 1, which is merely the Short Title of the Bill.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Government empowered to enter into agreement with Grand Trunk Railway Company for acquisition of entire capital stock of company except 4 per cent guaranteed stock.

Mr. CAHILL: I would ask the Government now to state what are the total liabilities to be assumed by the country.

Mr. J. D. REID: The total liabilities that the Government will assume when they take over this system will be as follows:

1. The debenture stock,—which really represents bonds against the road—in perpetuity amounting to a total of $155,373,806.20.

And also:—

2. Second mortgage equipment bonds 6 per cent $1,814,779.97.

3. Northern third mortgage 6 per cent bonds, $70,566.67.

4. Canada Atlantic 4 per cent bonds $16,000,091.77.

5. Wellington, Grey and Bruce bonds $295,893.34.

6. Matured bonds unpaid, $3,406.67, or a total of $18,184,738.42. Those two items together amount to $173,558,544.62, representing the funded debt against the property by way of bonds.

In addition to that we will assume the following liability: The interest at 4 per cent on the guaranteed stock of £12,500,000 in perpetuity, with this exception, that the Government will have the right at the end of thirty years to take over that stock instead of paying the 4 per cent interest that we guarantee on it so long as we leave it in its present position, in the meantime the stock being divested of its voting privileges.

Of course we also assume the interest on the items that I have mentioned comprising the total of $173,558,544.62.

In addition to that there are the following other stocks: 1st preference 5 per cent stock, $16,643,999.78; 2nd preference 5 per cent stock, $12,312,666.50; 3rd preference 4 per cent stock, $34,884,534.95, or a total amounting to $63,841,201.23.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Does that include the arrears of dividends upon the preferred stock?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, we pay no arrears on any of the stock. Whatever award is made as to what interest, if any, we shall pay will be effective from the date that the award is made. The arbitrators, then, will value this $63,841,201.23 of stock, and on that valuation we will pay four per cent interest in perpetuity, with this exception: we have the right to purchase it after thirty years.

Mr. McKENZIE: In reckoning the liabilities, why does the minister take out the $60,000,000 of guaranteed stock? Are we not assuming that liability?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have stated that upon the $173,558,544.62, which is the funded debt, we pay interest in perpetuity. The interest on the guaranteed stock of $60,000,000 we pay also in perpetuity, except that we have the right to take it over at the end of thirty years.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Have we not the right to take over the debentures? Are they not redeemable?

Mr. J. D. REID: If my memory serves me correctly, these bonds are in perpetuity, and we have not the right to take them up. The rate of interest is very low.

Mr. McKENZIE: Bonds are not usually in perpetuity.

Mr. J. D. REID: They are in this case.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Some of these debenture stocks are at five per cent and some at four.

Mr. J. D. REID: It is only the guaranteed stock, as I understand it and the stocks that the award is made on that we have the right to take up at the end of thirty years.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I do not understand the intimation of the minister that there will be no arbitration of the value of the debenture stock, because we are assuming that liability. The Minister says that we have the option of wiping out the guaranteed stock after thirty years; I understand him to say also that in the case of the debenture stock we have not that right; we must continue to pay interest at five per cent, or whatever the rate is, in perpetuity.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is as I understand it at present. We are allowing the debenture stock, which is in perpetuity, to remain; we are not taking that right at the present time. In that I am subject to correction, and if I am wrong, I will correct my statement later.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I would like to be clear on that point. I understood the minister to say a minute ago that there was to be no arbitration on the $60,000,000; that we have assumed that and the arbitrators will have nothing to do with it. The minister now says—

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member is quite wrong in that. I said that upon the £12,500,000 of guaranteed stock, which amounts to $60,833,332.51, we pay four per cent in perpetuity unless we take it up after thirty years. Then the arbitrators will determine the value of the other three preference stocks, or the difference between $60,833,332.51 and $124,674,533.74, which amounts to $63,841,201.23, and upon the valuation at which they arrive we will pay interest at the rate of four per cent in perpetuity unless we decide to purchase at the amount of the award after thirty years.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is this transaction subject to the rate of exchange?

Mr. J. D. REID: Thirty years from now there may not be any question about the rate of exchange. In any case, the matter of exchange does not come into it at all.

Then we come to the common stock, $116,583,124.44, upon which no dividend has ever been paid. That also will be valued by the arbitrators, and upon the valuation arrived at, if any, we shall pay interest at four per cent in perpetuity unless we decide after thirty years to purchase it outright.

Mr. McKENZIE: In calculating the possible cost to the country of this white elephant which we shall have upon our hands, has the Government made any general estimate of what valuation will be placed upon these stocks by the Board of Arbitration?

Mr. J. D. REID: It would be difficult for me to make any statement of that kind.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

The Drayton-Acworth report stated that these companies had paid $3,600,000 per annum by way of interest on these several stocks that I have just mentioned, the Government felt justified in recommending the annual payment of $2,500,000 as a minimum, this to be added to from time to time so that at the end of seven years they would pay the $3,600,000. The Government decided that these stocks were of such a value that they were justified in paying $1,100,000 per annum in perpetuity in respect to them. That, of course, is in addition to the $2,500,000 interest on the guaranteed stock. In other words, the Drayton-Acworth report recommended, and the Government considered that they were justified in offering the payment of an annual amount, whether you call it rental or dividend, on the guaranteed stock and all other capital stocks—that is, the preference and common stocks—equal to $3,600,000 per annum. The amount of $1,100,000, therefore, could be applied on the three preference stocks and the common stock. The Grand Trunk railway claimed that that was not a sufficient amount, having regard to the value of the road.

We must remember that the Drayton-Acworth report made that recommendation of $3,600,000 after the Government relieved the Grand Trunk of liabilities and responsibilities that it might be subject to on account of its guaranteeing the Grand Trunk Pacific, and also after taking into consideration the fact that the Grand Trunk railway was used to operate the Transcontinental built by the Government between Winnipeg and Moncton, and the Grand Trunk thought that they should have an amount first, I think, of $5,600,000 per annum, which was later reduced to, I think, about $5,100,000. I have not the exact figures in my mind at the moment. Therefore, the Grand Trunk, rather than accept the amount offered of $3,600,000, decided to accept the offer of arbitration. That is the only way in which I could place any value on the stock in reply to the question asked by the hon. member.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That offer was not $3,600,000; the offer was to assume the liabilities and to pay $3,600,000 in addition. The offer is contained on page 8. This is the Government proposition:

1. The Government to take over the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and branch lines and the Grand Trunk Railway Company; to acquire all assets, and to assume all obligations of both companies.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is right.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That includes the debenture stock, and as I understand it, it includes the guaranteed stock.

Mr. J. D. REID: Let me correct the hon. member there. That offer was on this basis: The Government to pay $3,600,000 per annum, and in addition to that the Government would, of course, pay the interest on the funded debt, that interest amounting to about $7,000,000. Therefore, according to that offer, we would have to pay $7,000,000 interest on the funded debt, plus $3,600,000 interest on the other stocks.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister, if I understood him aright did not tell us when he made his explanation, that we were to assume the fixed charges in the first place, and then we were to pay the $3,600,000 on the common stock and the three preference stocks.

Mr. J. D. REID: And the guaranteed.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: This goes on further to show that the stock may be redeemed on paying twenty-five years' rental at once, which would amount to $90,000,000. The letter capitalizes the total at $90,000,000. That is to say, the Government offers to assume all the fixed charges of the Grand Trunk Railway system and the Grand Trunk Pacific, and to pay in cash $90,000,000. Am I right there?

Mr. J. D. REID: No.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The Government agreed to pay $3,600,000 a year, and the letter goes on to say:

> The Government to have the option of purchase on the basis of and during the term of the final rental at the end of any year and on one year's notice at twenty-five times the annual final rental.

If you multiply $3,600,000 by twenty-five, you get $90,000,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is right.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That is how I arrive at the $90,000,000. The Government then agreed to pay $90,000,000 for the preference stock and the common stock.

Mr. J. D. REID: No, I will tell the hon. member where he is wrong, and perhaps I can put him right. The Government agreed to pay $90,000,000, if the hon. member wishes the matter put in that way, at the end of thirty years. What for? For what the $3,600,000 interest represents, and I will tell the hon. member what it represents, and he will see at once, because this has been explained so many times. It was to pay first $2,500,000 for the guaranteed stock. You have to add the $60,000,000 of guaranteed stock.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That is common stock.

Mr. J. D. REID: No. It is to pay $90,000,000 for $241,257,658.27, or in other words, the $3,600,000 was the annual interest for ten years on the four per cent guaranteed stock amounting to $60,833,332.51, and the first, second and third preference stocks, the four of them added together amounting to $124,674,533.74. In addition to that the common stock amounts to $116,583,124.44 on which no interest has ever been paid. The Government therefore said, no interest having ever been paid on the common stock, we will not take that into consideration at all; we will allow you $3,600,000, the annual amount you have been receiving on your guaranteed and first, second and third preference stocks. If you will accept that and hand us over the common stock as well, on which $30,000,000 has been paid, we are wiling to pay you that $3,600,000 in perpetuity, or $90,000,000 at the end of thirty years. The matter would sum up in this way. Take the amount as $90,000,000 if you wish to look at it in that way; deduct the $60,833,332.51, and you are left with a valuation of $30,000,000 to apply to the $64,841,301.23, that the first, second and third preference stocks added together, plus the $116,583,124.44 common stock, or in round numbers, $190,000,000 which that $30,000,000 would represent.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: In what part of the Drayton-Acworth report does the minister find justification for offering that $90,000,000?

Mr. J. D. REID: On page 88, section 41 says:

> We recommend that the entire share capital of the Grand Trunk, guaranteed, preference and ordinary stock—

That would be $241,257,658.27.

> —be surrendered to the trustees in exchange for an annuity based on a moderate but substantial proportion of $3,600,000, the average sum paid as dividends in the last ten years; and that this annuity should increase by forty or fifty per cent after the first seven years.

That is where we get that recommendation, and as this Bill provides, we are taking over the guaranteed, the preference and the ordinary stocks in the way that I have just stated, subject, of course, to the award that may be given by the Board of Arbitrators.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister has wandered far from my question. We are undertaking the purchase of the Grand Trunk Railway system including several railways, as well as the ownership of the stock of the Grand Trunk railway itself. What is the total amount of the liabilities we are assuming by the purchase of the Grand Trunk Railway system? I am not speaking merely of the Grand Trunk railway or any one portion of the system, but of the system as a whole.

Mr. J. D. REID: I was giving the items when I was interrupted. I explained that we were assuming the total funded debt. I cannot say what the liability will be in connection with the first, second, and third preference and common stocks until the arbitrators make their award. All that hon. members can do in the meantime is to place their own valuation upon it. The interest of $1,109,000 would represent a valuation of about $25,000,000 or $30,000,000.

Mr. MICHAUD: The minister must have an idea of the total amount of the liabilities.

Mr. J. D. REID: They are given in detail on page 39 of this blue-book. I quite understand what hon. members desire, but I would not for one minute undertake to say that we are assuming a liability of $116,583,124.44 in connection with the common stock, for instance, as was stated by the leader of the Opposition the other evening. There may be no valuation placed on this stock at all by the arbitrators. We did not consider it as of any value when we made the offer. We cannot say what the stock is worth until the award is made. I can only say that we assume liability for the total funded debt amounting to $173,558,544.62, and the guaranteed stock amounting to $60,833,322.51, and for the valuation placed on the preference and common stocks by the arbitrators. Then we have in our books a loan of $15,142,633.13 which was advanced to the Grand Trunk many years ago. While the Grand Trunk are liable for that amount, the Government has never regarded it as a liability. The understanding, I believe, was that the company would never be asked to pay back that sum or the interest on it until they had paid interest on their common stock. That $15,000,000 was all the Grand Trunk got by way of subsidies or assistance in any shape or form from the Dominion Government during the sixty-five years it has been in operation.

Mr. EULER: Was there an agreement that that $15,000,000 should never be repaid?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not the data here, but the Grand Trunk have never been asked to pay even interest on that amount, and I think we will have to take it for granted that the Government would not insist that it really was a liability which we could deduct from the assets in this transaction.

Mr. McKENZIE: Was the amount not always carried forward in our books as an asset of the Dominion of Canada, and is it not there to-day?

Mr. J. D. REID: It certainly is there, or it would not appear in this list of liabilities.

Mr. McKENZIE: Then what right have you to say that the amount is going to be wiped out?

Mr. J. D. REID: I am not saying that. It is an asset of the Dominion. What I say is that the Government have never taken any action to collect either principal or interest.

Mr. McKENZIE: In determining the net debt of Canada, the minister would deduct that amount of $15,000,000, and as long as he does that, he has no right to say that this amount is going to be wiped off.

Mr. J. D. REID: I say that the arbitrators must take that amount into consideration when making their award, as well as every other liability against the road. I am not saying it would have a very serious effect on their decision.

Mr. FIELDING: Does the minister expect the arbitrators to treat that amount as a liability after he has stated he wants the amount wiped off?

Mr. J. D. REID: I am only stating the facts. My hon. friend was Minister of Finance for very many years, and if that amount was considered a liability it was his duty to collect the interest, and not let the loan stand in the position it did stand in for so many years. The hon. member knows the situation better than I do. I am sure he knows exactly on what terms and conditions that $15,000,000 was given to the Grand Trunk, and if I have not given the facts correctly, now is the time for him to give the information.

Mr. FIELDING: I think $15,000,000 is a good deal of money even in these days, and when there is an item of that amount concerned in this matter I think my hon. friend should bring forward more information than he has given so far as to the precise position with respect to that sum. If we did not collect it from the Grand Trunk and it should have been collected, all governments from Confederation down are responsible. To-day we are only concerned in knowing precisely how the matter stands. I am not anxious to press things against the Grand Trunk, but I think we should have full information in connection with all these matters. One of my objections to proceeding with the legislation this session was that we had not time to get full information. Here is an item of $15 000,000, and my hon. friend has not thought it necessary to bring forward a precise statement of the terms under which that liability was created. I am not arguing whether or not it should be collected, but the minister should give us more information than he has, instead of simply saying he did not think it was ever intended that we should get back this money. We should know the precise terms and conditions under which that loan was made.

Mr. J. D. REID: The board of arbitrators will consider all the liabilities against the Grand Trunk on their merits. They are not going to base their award upon what I or any other member of the House may say; otherwise they should not be appointed. They will take every item into consideration on its merits. I cannot imagine that any of the arbitrators are going to read Hansard and base their award on statements made by hon. members of this House. If they do, they will have a nice time making the award. The arbitrators who will be appointed will be men of honour and will take every item into consideration on its merits, regardless of any statements I may make in the House or anywhere else.

Mr. CAHILL: The Canada Year Book, 1918, in the statement of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, Ottawa, says:

> The actual increase was greater by $15,142,633, but this sum, representing a Government loan to the Grand Trunk railway, which had for years been returned as part of the company's capitalization, was eliminated in 1917.

That would be done with the knowledge of the Government.

Mr. J. D. REID: What book is that?

Mr. CAHILL: It is the Canada Year Book.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not know that I can give any further explanation than the statement I have already made. The sum of $15,000,000 has been advanced to the Grand Trunk, and—

Mr. CAHILL: How was it eliminated?

Mr. J. D. REID: I did not say it was eliminated. If it was eliminated it would not be in this book.

Mr. CAHILL: This authority says so.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Canada Year Book surely is not more reliable than the official records of the department.

Mr. CAHILL: Who is responsible for the publication of these statistics? Is it not the Department of Railways?

Mr. J. D. REID: I am taking the statements as obtained from the official records in the department.

Mr. CAHILL: We must have the official records.

Mr. J. D. REID: I am giving them to you here.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is well sometimes to have two authorities.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister say what there is to arbitrate in this $15,000,000? The Canadian dollar is worth a dollar, and they are not going to arbitrate the value of our money. We have loaned this company $15,000,000, and the minister tells us now that we shall appoint arbitrators to ascertain the value of that sum. Why, it is $15,000,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: Let me tell my hon. friend what they will arbitrate, although it is hardly necessary that I should do so, for he must, by the nature of his profession, be better acquainted with these things than I am. The arbitrators are going to ascertain the value of the Grand Trunk Railway system and how much we should pay for it, taking into consideration all of the liabilities. First of all, the assets will all be added together and the liabilities will be deducted from them, what is left being the value of the stock.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Minister of the Interior told us the other night—and incidentally he poked a good deal of fun at myself in connection with the matter—that the sixty million dollars that we paid to the Canadian Northern had nothing to do with what we should pay for the stock. Was that sound logic? It was thrown across the floor, and a battalion of ministers applaudingly supported him in his contention that the moneys we lent to the company had nothing to do with the amount at which the stock should be valued. If that was sound financial logic, then the $15,000,000 lent to this company has nothing to do with the value of the stock.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend, inadvertently no doubt, has stated quite inaccurately what the Minister of the Interior said.

Mr. McKENZIE: What did he say? Hansard is available.

Mr. ROWELL: As the Minister of Railways has pointed out, in ascertaining the value of the stock the arbitrators will no doubt take into consideration both the assets and the liabilities as well as the earnings, because upon those two considerations mainly must the value of the stock depend. The point that was under discussion the other night, as I recall it, was this: At a certain period the maximum of $30,000,000 was fixed in a resolution moved in this House as the amount that might be paid for the stock of the Canadian Northern railway, and my hon. friend in commenting on that made the statement that subsequently the company borrowed a sum of money—$15,000,000, I think;— and my hon. friend contended, as I recollect, that the fact of the borrowing changed the value of the stock.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not say that. I said that it certainly should reduce the amount we would pay for the stock.

Mr. ROWELL: Then my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) challenged that statement for the reason that if the money borrowed went into the road the road would be increased in value to that extent. The value of the stock would not be diminished by that amount if the money went into the road. You simply have a borrowing on one side of $15,000,000, and on the other side you have an investment in the road and an increase in your assets of $15,000,000. That transaction does not change the value of the stock; it might improve its value under certain possible conditions. If the company were on the verge of liquidation or were in financial difficulties the $15,000,000 would tide it over and enable it to discharge urgent obligations or make improvements essential to its operation. If it were relieved of its immediate distress or were enabled to make improvements absolutely indispensable to its operation, the company would be in a better position than before. Only in that sense might it be improved, but in the other sense it would not change the value of the stock if the money went into the road or was used to pay off liabilities.

Mr. McKENZIE: Suppose we said to the Canadian Northern, "We are willing to give you $30,000,000 provided you pass over to us every earthly thing you own," and they said they would not do that. Then we lent them, say, $45,000,000 or $50,000,000 and in the meantime they decided to throw up the sponge and give us the road. Does the minister mean to say that we would not take into consideration and balance up against the Canadian Northern that $50,000,000 we gave them? Would we not say: "It is true that four years ago we were willing to give you $30,000,000, but since then you have borrowed $50,000,000. You are indebted to us and are entitled to nothing. We have paid for the property already more than it was worth. Your physical property is what we are looking for. We have more than paid for it and don't care about your stock because it is worth nothing."

Mr. ROWELL: If that $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 did not go into the road or into the discharging of liabilities, then there would be some point in my hon. friend's contention. If, on the other hand, it went into the road or discharged liabilities, it improved the position of the company by the amount of the obligation that was incurred. To illustrate: Suppose the company had $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 of urgent obligations to meet. They come to the Government and say: "We are not able to finance ourselves. Will you loan us $40,000,000 or $50,000,000?" The Government agrees to do this, and the company with that sum discharges urgent liabilities to that extent. The company is no worse off. It has only changed its creditors. Its stock is worth just as much as before, the only difference being that the creditor is the Government instead of the former holder of the liabilities. In that sense I would say that it was not a question that would effect the value of the stock one way or the other. That is with respect to another road, however, and does not touch the immediate matter under consideration.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Would not the road have increased in value in the meantime?

Mr. ROWELL: It might have increased in value.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It did increase.

Mr. EULER: It seems to me that we are entitled to a definite answer from the minister as to whether this $15,000,000 is or is not an asset of the Dominion of Canada. I cannot see that there is any force in the contention that the amount itself is subject to arbitration. The $15,000,000 is money that the people of Canada gave to the Grand Trunk Railway Company as a loan. If that is the case they owe it to the Dominion of Canada. If it is true we do not expect to receive that money back we ought to know it. I do not see how the amount itself can be subject to arbitration. It is either $15,000,000 or it is nothing, and it seems to me that this liability of the Grand Trunk to the Government is just as much a liability as any other item they may owe to anybody else. I would like to know whether, in the opinion of the Government, or whether, as a matter of fact, this is a real asset of the Dominion of Canada owed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not think much can be added to what my hon. friend the Minister of Railways has already said about it. The facts are that it was an advance made fifty or sixty years ago, perhaps more, which was not intended to be repaid at the time.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend says that it was not intended to be repaid. There ought to be a record of that. I do not contend against the hon. gentleman's argument, but I say that we ought to have the record of it. We ought to have what the bargain actually was from the document itself and not what somebody thinks it was.

Mr. ROWELL: Quite so, and the Minister of Railways will bring down whatever record there may be.

Mr. FIELDING: It was before Confederation.

Mr. ROWELL: Quite so. Whatever the record is it will be placed before the House. As I understand no interest was to be paid upon the loan until the company had really paid a dividend on the common stock. No dividend has ever been paid on the common stock, and therefore no interest has ever been charged on this $15,000,000. But it has been carried in the books of the Government as an obligation of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to the Government. The Government has never written it off its books, but it has never demanded payment. In preparing the statement for the information of the House, the officials of the department brought this item into the account showing it in that way. The actual document relating to it, whatever it may be, my hon. friend will bring down.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, I will bring it down.

Mr. EULER: Will the minister say whether, in his opinion, the amount is arbitrable?

Mr. ROWELL: I have not seen the document, and I therefore would not care to express an opinion offhand. It is arbitrable in this sense, that the arbitrators, in endeavouring to arrive at the 4 p.m. amount of the assets and liabilities, must consider all these items. If the arbitrators consider that this is a real liability of the company then this stock is more worthless than if it were not a liability of the company.

Mr. EULER: By whom was this item of $15,000,000 brought into this statement? Is it a recognition by the Grand Trunk of a liability?

Mr. ROWELL: No, it is brought in by the Government. I am not aware that there is any dispute between the Grand Trunk and the Government as to the conditions under which that loan was originally made, or as to the conditions upon which interest is payable upon it.

Mr. FIELDING: Might I call the attention of the minister to another point bearing on the question of the arbitration? Considerable interest has been expressed—not entirely on this side of the House—regarding the possibility of the outcome of this arbitration, especially in regard to the enhanced advancement of values in the London market. I am not sure whether it was the Minister of Railways or the Minister of the Interior, but I think one of them assented to the view that this arbitration should be in that respect limited, that there should be a date fixed and that in so far as—just how far it would be proper to go is another point—market values may have any proper bearing on the result of the arbitration, these market values should be taken as of a date substantially before the introduction of this measure. I understood that the Minister of Railways, or the Minister of the Interior—I will not say "promised"—but gave us to understand that such a provision would be made. I would like to call the minister's attention to it because if there is to be such a limitation it ought to go into this Bill.

Mr. J. D. REID: My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, in his remarks a day or two ago, made reference to this very matter, and stated that a date would be fixed on which the value of these stocks would be based. I think some hon. member suggested as the date August 31, which would preclude the possibility of any speculative value being given to the stock. The Minister of the Interior assured the House that that would be protected in some way and I also gave an assurance last night.

Mr. FIELDING: Does my hon. friend propose to deal with it in the Bill?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, I had not any intention of dealing with it in the Bill but I will give the assurance that it will be protected in some way.

Mr. McKENZIE: On this subject of the date, when the letters in connection with the negotiations were introduced here the other night, I brought the matter up with the Minister of the Interior and not knowing that the negotiations had gone away back for over a year, and believing that these were new negotiations, I stated that perhaps the last day of August, 1919, would be a suitable date. I said that believing that we were on new negotiations altogether but since then, from speeches and information gathered from the other side, it turns out that these were continuous negotiations from the 24th January, 1918. The negotiations were first opened by the Prime Minister's cablegram on the 24th January, 1918. I went back on my date of the 31st August when it was disclosed that the negotiations had been going on since January. My contention is that the date to be fixed with regard to the value of the stock should be the 23rd January, 1918, the day before the Prime Minister's cable was sent to the old country.

Mr. J. D. REID: I would not like to agree to any particular date at the present time, and I think that my hon. friend, when I mention the facts to him, will agree with me. Due to the fact that the Government were entering into negotiations with the company I believe that the stock was much higher in January, 1918, than it was in August, because the hon. member, reading in the press, would see that there was quite an issue taken in London as to the amount the Government were offering. The stocks, in August, in my opinion, were about as low as they ever were and therefore I think it is well to let the question of the date remain until we come to take up the agreement and decide the thing. I have said that we will protect the situation if there is a possible chance of the stock being inflated on account of the decision of the Government to take over the road.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Will the agreement be before the House?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, the agreement will not be before the House. After the Bill goes through it will take some time to prepare the agreement. There will be a great many details which will have to be placed in the agreement, which will have to be gone into and which could not be embodied in the Bill before the House.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I agree with my hon. friend from Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) that a date ought to be fixed or some assurance given to the House that a date will be fixed so as to enable the House to be satisfied that more shall not be paid for the stock than should be paid.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I regarded that point as of such essential importance that I took the earliest opportunity on my return from Winnipeg a few days ago to ascertain from governmental sources whether this alleged inflation would affect the arbitration, and I was assured from sources that were satisfactory to me that it was the Government's intention to see that this inflation would have no bearing whatever on the amount that the arbitrators might award. Hon. gentlemen will remember that when I addressed the House on Wednesday I mentioned that matter. I did not like to give the source of my information, because I did not want to betray any confidence. But inasmuch as it has been stated on behalf of the Government that it is the intention to take that precaution, it is my judgment that it would be well, if possible, to have the date fixed in the Bill, and I therefore agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Mackie). The people are exceedingly suspicious and anxious about this matter.

Mr. McKENZIE: They have a right to be.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I do not agree with my hon. friend that they have any right to be. But there is such a feeling of doubt about everything—even about my hon. friend—that I think it would be well to fix the date now. While I am on my feet, I would like to ask with regard to the $90,000,000 obligation of the Grand Trunk to the Government under the Grand Trunk Pacific contract. I was also given an assurance that that would be taken care of in the arbitration. Consequently, feeling that these two important points were to be provided for in the interests of the public, I had no difficulty in endorsing the proposal to purchase the Grand Trunk.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It is a very simple matter to discover the market quotations of this stock. Why not get them for the last three or four years, and see if there has been any great inflation or not? If there has been, then let us take the lower figure.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: When the arbitrators are establishing the value of the stock, neither my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) nor I will be present to discuss the manner in which they are to proceed; but if we now fix a date on which the value of the stock ought to be considered, we are convincing the public that we are protecting them.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That would be my idea too. I think the lowest market quotation should be selected in arriving at the value of the stock.

Mr. FIELDING: It must be understood that the stocks we are talking about are the three preference stocks and the common stock, which are the subject of arbitration. To my mind the more serious question is in regard to the guaranteed stock, and as to that I am afraid we have no protection.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I would like to make a suggestion to my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) that, inasmuch as he raised the issue on the debate, he state what in his opinion should be the date to be adopted in arriving at the value of this stock.

Mr. FIELDING: I would not like to answer that question definitely. I am prepared to accept the assurances of the ministers that they will select a date; but I would like to see them select the date and put it in the Bill. I am inclined to study the Stock Exchange reports before I attempt to answer my hon. friend's question, and I am not anxious to be over-critical. On the question of the guaranteed stock, it is well to remember that what we are talking about does not touch that stock, which has advanced to 45 and, I believe, will reach 90 before the business is concluded. But that is another story, and perhaps it is not in order to debate it at this stage.

Mr. ROWELL: The hon. member (Mr. Fielding) has stated the situation correctly. The Government will see, as it properly should, that in this agreement the holders of the stock which is being arbitrated do not receive any higher value because of any appreciation of their stock due to the arrangement made between the Government and the company to take it over. It would be most improper that they should receive any enhancement in value under the circumstances, and whatever is the best form to guard against that will be provided for in the agrement, as the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) stated when this point was first brought up.

Mr. FIELDING: But my hon. friend will admit that that will not apply to the guaranteed stock.

Mr. ROWELL: I quite agree that it applies only to the stocks that are being arbitrated. I do not know if this is the proper time to discuss the guaranteed stock.

Mr. KING: If it is the Government's intention to do as the minister advises us, what is the objection to stating that intention in the Bill in a form which will help establish confidence throughout the country in the Government's intention.

Mr. ROWELL: I should not think anything would be necessary to establish confidence in the Government's intention with reference to the matter. But there is this feature to be considered: First, without an examination of the stock exchange returns, it is not at all clear what would be the best date to take; secondly, if we are negotiating an agreement, it is a proper matter for conference with the other matters to the agreement. However, the Government has given assurance that a date will be fixed which will safeguard this particular matter.

Mr. STEVENS: I would like to interject a suggestion here. I think we are on rather dangerous ground if in this Bill we fix a stated date at which this stock shall be valued, such a date being based apparently from the discussion upon a study of the market price of the stock. If we do that we are indicating to the arbitrators that this Parliament recognizes the market value of that stock at a given date. My opinion is, viewing this balance sheet somewhat carefully, that we would be exceedingly unwise to guarantee to pay to the Grand Trunk shareholders the value of their stock as represented on the market. What we want to do is to so arrange this arbitration that the arbitrators will ascertain the intrinsic, not the market, value of the stock, as represented by the surplus of assets over liabilities. Therefore, Mr Chairman, I do suggest very earnestly to the House that we should not fix a date which has any bearing whatsoever upon the market value of that stock, for we are by that very act recognizing the market value as against the intrinsic value.

Mr. CAMPBELL: My hon. friend's suggestion would involve ascertaining the physical value of the property, would it not?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is quite right, and we have two methods of doing that. Probably I have no right to speak with any authority, and I am now merely giving my own opinion. We have the Drayton-Acworth report, and that commission engaged the most expert engineers available to examine and report on the railways of this country. If that report is not satisfactory, it is open to the arbitrators, or to either party to the arbitration, to demand a new physical valuation. But the point I am making is that we would certainly be treading on very dangerous ground to introduce into this Bill the element of market value as a basis rather than the element of intrinsic value.

Mr. FIELDING: I think there is some force in the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens). I certainly did not contemplate that we should recognize the market value as a vital element in the matter. The words which I used were, "that if the arbitrators admit the market value as an element for consideration, such market value should be as of an earlier date." There is considerable force in what my hon. friend says. I know that in the case of the Canadian Northern arbitration, in my individual judgment the putting a limit on the value was a mistake, because it was an invitation to the arbitrators to go to that amount. But I think in this case we might provide that if in the judgment of the arbitrators market value enters into the question at all, it must be such market value as at an earlier date.

Mr. McKENZIE: We cannot examine the market quotations from year to year, or from month to month, and select some date when the stocks of this company are very low. That would be illogical and improper, and would not be sustained for one moment. But we can very well say to any person holding this stock: You have no right to profit by any inflation or advancement of the stock which took place because of the fact the Government decided to buy. I think it would be quite fair to draw the line at the day when it first became officially known that the Government of Canada contemplated the purchase of this property and of the material that was giving value to this stock. If January 24, 1918, was the day when that official announcement was made, then the holders of this stock should be entitled only to the value of the stock as it stood not later than January 23, 1918. Of course, if there were earlier negotiations which might have influenced the value of the stock, the Government are aware of them. But if there was no earlier public announcement, I would fix the day as I have suggested, and I would say: "You cannot come this side of that line, because it is quite probable that any inflation of this stock is the result of our decision to purchase."

Mr. ROWELL: I think my hon. friend will see, if he reflects a moment, that the date which he suggests would not be a wise one to select and that it would be much wiser to leave the matter open so that the Government can take care of the situation in the agreement. I intimated the other evening that in my view the market value of the stock, viz: what it happened to be selling for at any particular day on the exchange, should not influence the arbitrators in fixing value. I gave my reasons then for that view, and I shall not repeat them. But since January, 1918, some very important events have taken place in the history of the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific which would, I think, have a much greater effect upon the stock than the initiation of negotiations on the part of the Government. One of these events was the confession of the Grand Trunk of its inability to continue the operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Then there was the further fact that when it confessed its inability to operate the Grand Trunk Pacific the Government had to appoint a receiver. There is also the fact that the Grand Trunk has since found itself unable to continue operation without receiving certain other assistance. All these matters have quite an important bearing upon the value of the stock, and we would not be wise to fix a date as far back as my hon. friend has mentioned, because the stock is really of less value because of these events than it was on January 24, 1918. I agree with my hon. friend—and the Minister of the Interior made it clear the other evening that this would be provided for in the agreement—that if the question of the quoted market value of the stock is a factor in the situation, then there should be no enhancement of the amount of the award by reason of any enhancement of the value of the stock due to the fact that the Government had entered into this agreement.

Mr. J. D. REID: I want to interject a little statement here; some one has started a story in connection with this matter which I want to dispose of now. The story has been circulated throughout the country that on account of this road being taken over by the Government no taxes will be paid by it to municipalities throughout the Dominion. I want to correct that statement. There is nothing in this Bill which permits the Government to depart from the position which the Grand Trunk has always been in with regard to this matter. Whatever taxes they paid in the past, or were liable to pay to any municipality or otherwise, they will be subjected to when this Bill passes. As I am getting telegrams from many parts of the country with regard to this story, I think it is well that I should make this correction now.

Mr. FIELDING: If it is Government property, will it be liable to taxation? I am not arguing whether or not it should be; I am simply putting the question.

Mr. J. D. REID: The position I take is this: It is still a private company, but the Government owns the stock. It is not the same as if the title of the property was in the Government. But it is not the intention of this Bill to make the Grand Trunk free from taxation as was the case with the Intercolonial. In the case of the Intercolonial, a deed in fee simple is passed to the Crown for every part of the right of way. In this case we have the stock and the road is to be operated as a private company; so that the conditions will be the same so far as any requirements of the municipalities are concerned.

Mr. FIELDING: Is not the Intercolonial, by reason of our recent legislation, to-day the property of the Canadian National Railway Company?

Mr. J. D. REID: Only so far as operation is concerned.

Mr. FIELDING: They are not the owners?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, they are not the owners. In the case of the Canadian Northern, of course, there is power to issue debentures, and the position might be different, but so far as the Intercolonial is concerned the management was simply transferred to the Canadian National Railway Company and there is no right on the part of that company to issue bonds or mortgages in respect of that part of the Government railway system—not, at all events, without the consent of Parliament. Of course, that is true of the other end of it; the Board of Management would not on any account issue bonds without the consent of the Governor in Council.

Mr. KING: Does not what the minister has just said bear out exactly the contention I made yesterday, namely, that when the Government talks about this proposal involving the government ownership of railways they are misleading the House and the country? The minister has just stated that it is not government ownership; therefore these properties will remain liable to taxation.

Mr. J. D. REID: So far as the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Northern are concerned, when we buy the stock we are the owners of the road.

Mr. KING: Then if it is Government property and therefore exempt from taxation, why do you allow the municipalities to impose taxes upon it?

Mr. J. D. REID: As I understand it, Government property in fee simple, owned and registered in the name of the Crown, is, under the British North America Act, free from taxation. In this case the title to the property is registered in the name of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, a private corporation of which we own the stock.

Mr. MACKENZIE: KING: A private corporation.

Mr. J. D. REID: And owning the stock, we own the company. We own the property of the company, and, therefore, we must be the sole owners of the company.

Mr. McCOIG: If it is the case as the hon. minister explains it, what would be wrong in having a clause inserted in the Bill so that there would be no possible question about this road being subject to taxation? Some other minister in some future year might interpret the Act in an entirely different manner. If it is set out now and clearly established by a clause in the Bill that the road is subject to taxation, the municipalities would be satisfied that what the minister says is absolutely true.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not like to load the Bill up with anything that is unnecessary, and if any other minister comes into this House at any future time, or if the Government of the day at any future time should change its mind and decide that it is going to collect taxes from every municipality in the Dominion of Canada, because these roads run through almost every municipality, and to depart from a system that has been in existence since the Grand Trunk was built and that has been continued by the Government—

Mr. FIELDING: The minister is reversing the matter. It is not because the Grand Trunk collects taxes.

Mr. J. D. REID: —then I say the minister of that day must assume the responsibility and have the support of the members of this House to justify him in departing from the system and allowing the railway companies to stop paying taxes.

Mr. EULER: Surely it is not a contention of the minister that the Government is going to tax the municipalities for the privilege of having the railways pass through them. I think he has reversed the argument.

Mr. J. D. REID: What I meant to say was to allow the municipalities to collect taxes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are the positions identical in regard to the Intercolonial and this railway as it will exist after this measure has gone through? In the case of the Intercolonial at the present time, does the Government pay any dividends on stock to any stockholders?

Mr. J. D. REID: There was no stock issued.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know. The Government owned the railway from the outset. That is the difference. That is government ownership. This is not government ownership; this is private ownership, with the Government taking over certain of the stock, giving other stock in return and paying dividends on the latter.

Mr. J. D. REID: There is no use in myself and the hon. member arguing this. I would suggest to him that when he has time he should get the other members on his side into some room and endeavour to convince them that they are wrong. Every other hon. member opposite is arguing that this is complete government ownership, and I am not endeavouring to change their opinion; but the leader of the Opposition is arguing directly against every other hon. member on that side of the House.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is not the point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think there is a distinction which perhaps has not been kept clearly enough in mind by the minister in his remarks, that is the distinction between government ownership and government operation. I am prepared to say that the measure which the Government is putting through at the present time is a measure in the nature of effecting government operation of railways. It is a transfer of the management of the Grand Trunk Railway Company from the Grand Trunk to a commission composed of the Government's own appointees to manage the road. That is the nature of the transaction. I will admit that it is a transfer from private operation to public operation, and as such I think the ultimate value of it is very doubtful. There are certain merits that private management has when there are stockholders who have an opportunity of watching the efficiency of management and who avail themselves of their opportunity in order that the dividends may increase through efficient management. All that advantage is going to be taken away by this arrangement, because the Government in taking away the voting power from the shareholders gives them a guaranteed rate of interest which they will get from year to year irrespective of how inefficient the management may be.

Government ownership and Government operation are two distinct things. The minister speaks of this measure as one of Government ownership and operation. I will admit that it is a measure of Government operation, but I decline to admit that it is Government ownership. The Intercolonial is Government-owned, but this is not.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend fails to distinguish between things that differ. A man may own property in two ways; he may own a property by having it stand in his name, as a man owns a house, or a factory, or a farm, or any other property, but he may own it in a different way. He may have the title to that vested in a corporate entity, and he may own the stock of the corporation. He owns it in all the elements of ownership just as much in the one case as in the other. It is a different method of holding. The corporate entity, it is true, is entirely distinct from himself; but he owns the stock, and he has the ownership in all its plentitude and in all its power, except that he must carry on the work of the corporation in the manner in which the law requires a corporation to carry on its work. The two methods of ownership are illustrated in the Intercolonial and in the Canadian Northern. In the Intercolonial the title to the road is actually vested in the Government. The Government owns it in the first way I have mentioned. In the case of the Canadian Northern, the Government owns the road by owning the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. It owns the one just as much as it owns the other, but it owns it in a different way. My hon. friend is quite mistaken when he says that the Government does not own the Canadian Northern railway. The Government owns and operates in both cases, but in one case it owns and operates directly, that is, it did before the operation was turned over to the Canadian National railways. In the other case, the Government owns and operates through a corporate entity. This is a matter of convenience, because it is believed to be wiser to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to point out this distinction which I see in the difference to which the hon. minister has just drawn our attention. Let us assume that the Government wishes to dispose of the Intercolonial railway at any time. It is free to do so of its own initiative; it has not to go to some shareholders and buy up their shares at the end of a period of thirty years; it has complete ownership at the present time. There is nothing more to be paid out; the Government has full possession of the title. That is not the case in regard to the Grand Trunk proposition. The Government cannot dispose of the Grand Trunk railway until it acquires the outstanding stock, which outstanding stock it can purchase at the end of thirty years. Until that stock is purchased and held in the name of the Government, the road is not government-owned. In the case of the Canadian Northern, which has been referred to, the Government owns the stock. In the case of the Intercolonial, it owns the railway. In the case of the Grand Trunk, it owns neither the property nor the stock, to a very considerable percentage of it at least.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend there is under a misapprehension again.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No misapprehension.

Mr. ROWELL: Take the three roads. In the case of the Intercolonial, the Government owns it without any obligations outstanding against it; it paid for it at the time. In the case of the Canadian Northern, it owns the stock subject to obligations outstanding against the road, debenture stock and bond issues, just the same as a man owns a house subject to a mortgage. As I think I mentioned the other night, I have always believed that I owned a house. I have lived in it for many years; I have never had anybody question my ownership, but I have never held it free from a mortgage.

That does not change my ownership of the property. I still own it, subject to the mortgage. Now, that is the position of the Government in relation to the Canadian Northern Railway. It owns the stock, but there are obligations outstanding against the road. It will own the Grand Trunk in just the same way, with this difference, that instead of the securities outstanding being called bonds they are called debenture stock. They are a mortgage charge upon the property, as I am informed. Next to that comes the guaranteed stock. That is not an express charge upon the property of the company, but it is a prior charge to the preference and common stocks in this sense, that it is entitled to a dividend out of the earnings in priority to the other stocks, and in case of liquidation is entitled to be paid in full before the other stocks get a dollar. As to the preference and common stocks, the Government might buy that stock and pay cash or give securities in return. At the present time we are getting the stock on a basis which is much more in the interest of the country than to pay cash for it. Instead of paying cash, we give what is called a stock, which has no voting rights, no control whatever. It is a kind of government security, perpetual in its character, bearing interest at 4 per cent, but which we can redeem at the end of thirty years. That is done because it is a good thing in the interest of the country to do it. If we did not do that we would have to pay cash and we could not raise the money at less than 5½ per cent. We are selling our Victory Loan bonds at 5½ per cent to-day. Now, what would be the wisdom of endeavouring to get the people of this country to buy government securities at 5½ per cent to pay an obligation which we can discharge by a so-called government stock bearing interest at 4 per cent? The method we have adopted is in the interest of the Government and the country, and means a saving, if the award is a substantial sum, of many hundreds of thousands of dollars per annum to the people of Canada.

Mr. McKENZIE: Provided always you are getting value.

Mr. ROWELL: Assuming that the arbitrators fix a fair value, of course. I am only dealing with the method of paying the award.

Mr. EULER: In various parts of the Bill it is mentioned that the preference and the common stocks shall be submitted to arbitration and that to the holders of these stocks a new guaranteed stock shall be issued to the amount of the award, the old stock being transferred to the Government. What is the status of that stock which will come into the hands of the Government? Is it upon the ownership of that stock that the Government rests its claim to ownership of the road itself?

Mr. ROWELL: It is.

Mr. EULER: Is that stock still in force?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, it is the stock which controls the road. The Government owns it absolutely.

Mr. EULER: It will be watered stock, because you will have already given its value, as determined by the arbitrators, to the Grand Trunk stockholders.

Mr. ROWELL: It is not watered stock. It is stock got and paid for by issuing what is called a new 4 per cent guaranteed stock. That is the government security which we issue in payment, rather than paying cash. The stock which we take in and deposit in the treasury is the stock which controls the road, and it will retain the standing it has to-day.

Mr. EULER: But it would have no actual and inherent value, because new stock to the actual inherent value of the system, as determined by the arbitrators is to be issued to the present holders.

Mr. ROWELL: It has whatever value we pay for it, presuming, of course, that the arbitrators fix a fair value. We pay for that stock by issuing a new security. Let me carry it a step further. This security bears interest at 4 per cent, and we have the right to redeem it at the end of thirty years. Whether we would redeem it or not at the end of that period will depend on the value of money in the market. If thirty years hence Canada is in a position to go into the money market to borrow at 3½ per cent, as she was many years ago, when money was cheaper, then undoubtedly we would go into the money markets of the world, and issue our bonds, raising the necessary money at 3½ per cent to pay off this security bearing interest at 4 per cent.

Mr. EULER: That is not my point. There is something like $180,000,000 of preferred and common stock. The arbitrators may fix the value of that stock at $50,000,000, $60,000,000 or $100,000,000, although I hope they will say it is worth nothing. Let us suppose the award is $50,000,000. You then issue $50,000,000 of guaranteed stock. You would then have $230,000,000 of stock where you had only $180,000,000 before, and you have not increased the assets of the company by one dollar. Therefore, I say that stock is water.

Mr. ROWELL: I thought my hon. friend, in speaking of watered stock, was referring to the stock we get.

Mr. EULER: Exactly.

Mr. ROWELL: The stock we get is not watered. You may say the stock we issue is watered, if you like. The Bill declares it shall be considered paid-up stock bearing interest at four per cent. In the hands of the holder it carries interest at four per cent guaranteed by the Government of Canada, but it has no voting power whatever.

Mr. EULER: It is watered stock because you have more stock than you had before and no greater assets. Is not the whole object of the Government in acquiring that stock to get control and ownership?

Mr. ROWELL: The object in taking over the stock is to give us the control and ownership.

Mr. EULER: That is all.

Mr. ROWELL: Still, that is everything.

Mr. KING: Assuming that the stock which we may call the exchangeable stock to distinguish it from the other stock, which we may call the retained stock, because it is retained in the possession of the stockholders, is worth $50,000,000, the Government takes that $50,000,000 of stock and regards that as its possession. Is that right?

Mr. ROWELL: No. The Government takes the $180,000,000 of stock. It gets in every dollar of stock that is outstanding and gives in exchange, if you wish to put it that way, $50,000,000, if that is the award of the arbitrators, of this new stock bearing interest at four per cent, and guaranteed by the Government, but without any voting power.

Mr. KING: What the Government takes is what the arbitrators express to be the value of the exchangeable stock.

Mr. ROWELL: They take the whole of it.

Mr. KING: But what they get in value is the value the arbitrators put upon the stock. Is it not the case that the Government gives in exchange an equal amount of guaranteed four per cent stock to the holders of this exchangeable stock?

Mr. ROWELL: No, we give stock to the amount of the award.

Mr. KING: That is what I say: $50,000,000, if that was the amount of the award.

Mr. ROWELL: For the sake of illustration, let us suppose the amount is $60,000,000, which is just one third of $180,000,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Make it ten millions.

Mr. ROWELL: Well, let us split the difference and say twenty, with the advantage on our side.

An hon. MEMBER: Always.

Mr. ROWELL: Say twenty millions, that is, one-ninth of the stock outstanding. Let us assume that it is all of equal value, although as a matter of fact it is not. It would mean that a man for nine shares of stock surrendered of the par value of nine hundred dollars would receive one share of one hundred dollars of non-votable stock, on which the Government guarantees to pay four per cent interest half-yearly. That is the situation.

Mr. KING: The Government gets nothing that he does not get the equivalent of.

Mr. ROWELL: The Government only gives him in return what the arbitrators find to be the value of the stock, and the one share should represent the value of the nine.

Mr. KING: Exactly.

Mr. ROWELL: The value of the one should be equal to the value of the nine, with this difference, which is an important one: At the present time, if we paid in actual value, having regard to what money is worth, we would have to pay more than on the basis of four per cent. On the present value of money we would have to give him a security bearing, say, five and a half per cent. But we do not discharge it in that way. We discharge it by a four per cent security, so that he does not really get the value. It is a very great saving to the country. It is one of the important features of the agreement that we are able to discharge our obligation by a four per cent security instead of five and a half per cent at the present rate.

Mr. FIELDING: If that point is disposed of I should like to bring another to the attention of the committee. Some one owns this railroad. Apparently it is not the Government but the Grand Trunk Railway Company, which is to continue to own it. Am I right?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. FIELDING: Don't answer too hastily. The Government do not own it.

Mr. J. D. REID: The shareholders own it, and the shareholders will be the Government of Canada. They will own it the same as they do the Canadian Northern.

Mr. FIELDING: Will not the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada remain an entity?

Mr. J. D. REID: Certainly, but it cannot exist without shareholders, and all the stock being transferred to the Canadian Government, the Government are therefore the owners of the railway.

Mr. FIELDING: I am not discussing that point; I am endeavouring to ascertain how this matter will work out. There are one or two things which we know very well. For instance, we know that we shall have the elephant, and secondly we know that we shall have to feed him; but I am not sure that we all know how he is to be handled. If the Grand Trunk Railway Company remains a corporate entity, of course it will have shareholders. There is going to be $180,000,000 of these several classes of preferred and common stock which are to be arbitrated on and called in. Are they to be cancelled, or do they still remain stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company? There is going to be $60,000,000 of guaranteed stock which will remain outstanding. There is no question about that; and there will be ten, twenty, thirty or fifty millions of new guaranteed stock issued. Do all the stocks called in remain in the Treasury of Canada? Are we to have the Grand Trunk Railway Company? Is my hon. friend the Minister of Railways to be president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and are we to have an annual meeting for the proper conduct of the business? The Government do not own the road, but some one must own it. The Government do not own it except as stockholders, and they can only be stockholders in a corporate body. I am not complaining; I am only trying, in the calm serenity of this sunny afternoon, to learn something. It seems to me that we are perpetuating the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Is my hon. friend (Mr. J. D. Reid) to be president, and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) to be vice-president of the company, with all the paraphernalia of the Grand Trunk Railway Company kept in existence?

Mr. ROWELL: That is exactly the point I made in answer to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. There are two methods of ownership, one by holding stock in the company, and the other by owning the property. In this case we own it by stock in the company. The $180,000,000 is not to be cancelled. Whatever may be decided in the future, at the present time it is the intention to preserve the corporate entity of the Grand Trunk, which carries all the franchises and privileges and agreements with it. But the management, as my hon. friend has pointed out, will be in the reorganized Board of the Canadian National railways which will operate all the Government railways as one system. Probably in time it may be wise to bring about actual consolidation; it may be wise to bring about a practical merging. That is a question of policy that will have to be settled according to the developments of the situation from time to time.

Mr. FIELDING: I am not trying to argue against my hon. friend, or to determine what is right. We are all anxious to ascertain where we are at, to use the popular slang expression. It is perfectly clear that the Grand Trunk Railway Company is to be perpetuated; it is to own this property. We are the shareholders in the Grand Trunk Company; I admit the force of that statement. But it is well that the public should understand that the Grand Trunk Railway Company is not to be wiped out. It is to exist; all its franchise, powers and authorities are to remain, and they are to be exercised by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and others. If the Government do not own the road it is clear enough that the Grand Trunk Railway Company, no matter who owns the shares, are still to be the owners, and we are to be shareholders in it. Let us clearly understand that this is a Bill to perpetuate the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and that we are to be its shareholders.

Mr. J. D. REID: My hon. friend knows that the Canada Atlantic Railway was taken over years ago.

Mr. FIELDING: Before the minister proceeds further, am I right or wrong?

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member is right in that the Grand Trunk Railway Company is to be continued in existence.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If the Grand Trunk is to be continued as a corporation, where is it to get its revenue?

Mr. J. D. REID: I will answer the hon. member in a moment. I was going to say that the Canada Atlantic Company was taken over by the Grand Trunk Railway and although you do not hear of the Canada Atlantic Company now it is still in existence as part of the Grand Trunk system. We are taking over the Grand Trunk Railway system and as shareholders we will own it. It is necessary to keep it in existence, but we transfer the operation of it, the same as the Canadian Northern and the Intercolonial, to the Canadian National Railway system, and they will all be operated as one system. All the revenues from the whole railway system will go into one fund to pay for their operation.

Mr. CAHILL: All of them?

Mr. J. D. REID: Under the Bill we passed last year. The stock, having been transferred to the Canadian National Railway system, it is owned by the Government, and the whole system will be owned and operated by the Government.

Mr. CAHILL: I am not quite clear in regard to the answer given to the hon. member for North Waterloo as to new issue of stock. The President of the Privy Council is corporation lawyer enough to know that you cannot issue new stock without getting value for it, at least according to Canadian law. You are increasing the stock to some extent by an issue of new stock.

Mr. ROWELL: I am lawyer enough to know that this Parliament, which creates a corporation, can authorize it to issue stock in any form that Parliament sees fit. This Bill expressly provides that we may issue this stock and it defines the position of the stock.

Mr. CAHILL: In exchange for the other, but what about the increase?

Mr. J. D. REID: The common and the first, second and third preference stock is all transferred to the Government, and it is held by the Government. The Government will issue stock to the value of the award; it may be $10,000,000, $20,000,000, $30,000,000, or whatever it is. We are issuing our stock, note or bond—we call it the Grand Trunk 4 per cent guaranteed stock—to the value of the award. It is not adding another liability against the Grand Trunk. It is what we call issuing stock for the amount of the award for the shareholders to hold as security for the $180,000,000 of stock scrip which they surrender.

Mr. FIELDING: I suppose the new stock will be stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada?

The CHAIRMAN: Questions relating to the distribution of the new stock would be relevant to clause 6 but not to the clause under discussion. If the discussion is limited to clause 2 questions will be in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I would like to say a word with regard to an expression that fell from the Minister of Railways. He assured the committee that this company, when it became the property of the Government, would not become exempt from taxation, but that the properties of the company would pay taxes just in the same way as they had done when they were under the control of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I want to point out the gravity of that situation. When the Grand Trunk is incorporated with the Canadian National railway system, it will be a system as extensive, and probably possessing as valuable assets, as the Canadian Pacific. The Canadian Pacific is exempt from taxation. Every farthing's worth of property the Canadian Pacific owns is exempt from taxation for ever. The land grant was exempt for twenty years and when that term expired the exemption was extended for another twenty years. It is probable that by the time the second twenty-year term expires the land grant will be disposed of. Hon. gentlemen must see the enormous handicap against the Government system of railways that this taxation question will be in in competition with the taxation exempt C.P.R.. I gave the figures the other night showing that if you take the amount of taxation that the Canadian Pacific would have paid in the last thirty years it would reach a total of $500,000,000. I think those figures, contained in Poors Manual would indicate—

Mr. KEEFER: What taxation is the Canadian Pacific exempt from—not municipal?

Mr. RICHARDSON: Roadbed, rolling stock, station houses, and all appurtenances are exempt from taxation.

Mr. KEEFER: They pay taxes in Ontario. I know that when I was city solicitor they were taxed time and again. It may be different in the west; I do not know.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Have you ever read that clause in the charter where it distinctly says that the roadbed, rolling stock, station houses and all appurtenances are exempt from taxation?

Mr. BOYS: That is certainly not so in Ontario.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The clause in their charter reads that all the land grants shall be exempt for twenty years; they constitute a grant direct from the Crown. I recall the actual words because I have used them in Parliament, in the press and on the platform for twenty or twenty-five years. However, I will look it up again.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: That is only in so far as the West is concerned.

Mr. KEEFER: It is not so in Ontario.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I am told that I am all right in so far as the West is concerned, and before the Bill goes through we may find out that I am all right all round. Even in so far as the West is concerned, hon. gentlemen will understand what an enormous handicap it must be to the nationally owned system if it has to pay taxes and the Canadian Pacific is relieved from the payment of taxes. I submit the question for the consideration of hon. gentlemen, but I shall look up the Canadian Pacific charter again and endeavour to ascertain the facts.

Mr. EULER: The hon. member (Mr. Richardson) is most certainly incorrect in his statement if he applies it to Ontario. But surely it is right that the railway company should pay taxes to the municipalities just the same as any other institution. Even if it were a handicap to the National railway to pay taxes in competition with the Canadian Pacific, which does not pay taxes, it surely would not be right to saddle that loss on the municipalities rather than upon the country. The municipalities are entitled to these taxes to-day, and I would like to revert again to the request of the municipalities that their rights be preserved so that there can be no question about it. There seems to be a considerable difference of opinion as to whether the Grand Trunk is going to be owned by the Dominion of Canada or by a private corporation. There seems to be a doubt now, and while the ministers have now no doubt it may happen, and I think will happen, that these hon. gentlemen may not always occupy the seats of authority and they may be followed by others who may view the question in a different light.

5 p.m.

Mr. M. CLARK: Will the hon. gentleman forecast that they will all view it in the same light?

Mr. EULER: I speak only for myself. I would like to support what the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) said, that in order to make it certain beyond any doubt that the municipalities will be protected a clause should be inserted to the effect that notwithstanding any interpretation which may be placed upon the question as to the ownership of the road, if you like to put it in that way, the municipalities should always be entitled to collect their taxes from the railways upon the properties of the railways within their bounds whether they be the properties of the company or the Government. I do not think any harm can come from that, it does not burden the Bill and it will make assurance doubly sure.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister himself introduced the subject of taxation and we must deal with it. Gentlemen who are so fond of public ownership cannot have their cake and eat it. They must take the responsibilities of their love for public ownership. Public ownership means property in the Crown. That property shall become the property of the Crown representing the public. It is public owned property, meaning that it belongs to the Crown. There is no such thing as the Crown owning, and not owning property. It either owns the property or it does not. There is no use of camouflaging about it? It would not be a fair defence for the Government to say: "We own the property but we have put it in our wives' names" so that our creditors cannot touch it. Is that a fair position for the Government to be in? The Government say that they own the property but to get out of some responsibility or liability they say that they are holding the property in somebody else's name. The courts of the country do not recognize camouflage of that kind. They go direct to the point and say "Who owns this property?" And whoever owns it has the rights and responsibilities incidental to it. If the contention of the Government is right this property belongs to the Crown when we take it over. I do not agree with what they say about stock or shares or bonds or anything else. If they take the bonds they are taking the property with it, and they own the whole thing, if we are to believe them, so that it is the property of the Crown. There is no escaping from that conclusion. Now, section 125 of the British North America Act says:

> No lands or property belonging to Canada or any province shall be liable to taxation.

We cannot change that, and we cannot put anything in this Bill—we can, but it would be mere child's play, because the courts would not recognize it—we cannot put anything in this Bill which will conflict with the constitution. Now, this property that we are taking over—and the farmers might as well know it—must necessarily be public property, the property of the Crown, and therefore exempt from taxation under the British North America Act. How can it be otherwise? If it is not exempt from taxation it is not the property of the Crown, it is not public ownership. The Government must take one position or the other. The President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) shakes his head, but I do not know of any Mahommet's coffin position he can take between Heaven and earth about this property: It is either owned privately or it is owned publicly. If it is owned publicly it cannot be taxed; if it is owned privately it can be taxed. The Government state that the municipalities in Ontario along the line of the Grand Trunk can collect taxes on the railway property. Does the President of the Council think that the good people of Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are going to tolerate that discrimination against themselves? He will at once have to start paying taxes on the Intercolonial railway, because here is a government road running through the western provinces and the middle of Canada paying local taxes at every stage, but although we in the eastern provinces are supplying our share of the funds to run those railways, where the Intercolonial railway is operated not a cent of local taxes are paid in respect of its property. Is that a system of municipal management that the hon. gentleman thinks will stand for one moment? He is introducing a doctrine that, when applied throughout the country, is going to give him a lot of difficulty. I want to know at this stage: Is he ready to admit that the Government must pay municipal taxes in relation to the Intercolonial and its branches or in relation to any other road that is being operated in conjunction with the Intercolonial railway? If he says, No, then the people of the Maritime Provinces will say: We are furnishing our share of the money to run the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern, and if those roads are paying taxes in the West they must pay us taxes in the East. I want to know from the Government if it is their intention to adopt this as a universal rule, that Government owned roads will pay taxes.

Mr. ROWELL: I am not quite sure that I clearly understand my hon. friend's viewpoint in reference to this tax question. If I rightly understand him, however, his argument is that the Intercolonial should be placed in all respects on the same basis as the Canadian Northern is at present and as the Grand Trunk will be under this arrangement. If my hon. friend takes that position, and if the freight and passenger rates on the Intercolonial are raised so as to bring them up to the full standard charged on the other roads, I think possibly the Intercolonial could afford to pay taxes.

Mr. McKENZIE: The one has nothing whatever to do with the other.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend must see that he cannot eat his cake and have it too. My hon. friend is trying to place himself in that position.

Mr. McKENZIE: Not at all.

Mr. ROWELL: My friend must be content to say that the Intercolonial was built to serve a particular national purpose, and by reason of that fact the Maritime Provinces are entitled to rates below the normal standard charged on other roads, and therefore the railway property is not taxed; or he must be prepared to take the position that it shall in all respects stand on exactly the same basis as all the other roads. In the latter case I think the Intercolonial could probably afford to pay taxes to the municipalities. However, that question is not now before us.

Mr. McKENZIE: Certainly not.

Mr. ROWELL: But my hon. friend introduced it.

Mr. McKENZIE: Not freight rates, not by any possibility.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend wants the assets without the liabilities—he wants to eat his cake and have it, too. Coming back to the other point, my hon. friend says that either the Government owns the road or it does not; the property is subject to taxation or it is not. Does not he realize that the stock of the company is property in the hands of the shareholders; the physical assets of the company are property in the hands of the company? Both are subject to taxation, or the income from them would be so subject. If the holder of stock in the Grand Trunk lived in the province of Ontario and received dividends from his stock, he would be liable to taxation on those dividends while the Grand Trunk would be liable to taxation on its physical assets. Now, what we are buying under this Bill is the stock. That stock is vested in the Government, and would not be liable to taxation, for being government property it is covered by the British North America Act. But when we come to the question of the physical assets, which are still vested in the corporate entity, that corporate entity being distinct from the shareholders—they would still continue liable to taxation by the municipalities. The situation here does not differ in any respect from the Canadian Northern situation. The Government took over the stock of the Canadian Northern, and that stock is government property; it is not liable to taxation under the British North America Act. But the physical assets of the railway, which are still vested in the railway corporation, are at the present time taxed in the different municipalities throughout the Dominion. The Grand Trunk will be put in exactly the same position. The argument advanced by my hon. friend is that if the Government owns all the stock, therefore the intervention of the corporation between the stockholders and the Government does not change the real ownership, and the municipality therefore could not collect taxes. That is my hon. friend's suggestion. Well, we have had this practical experience with the Canadian Northern, that the municipalities have taxed the railway, and the taxes have been paid, on the ground I have mentioned, and the same ground will apply to the Grand Trunk.

Coming to the point of my hon. friend from North Waterloo—

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend has not answered my question. I asked him this straight question: Will he pay taxes on the Intercolonial railway if he pays them on the Grand Trunk railway?

Mr. ROWELL: That question is not now before us. I asked my hon. friend if he would accept the same freight rates—

Mr. McKENZIE: As I understand it, under the last Railway Act we placed the whole business of freight rates in the hands of the Railway Board, so it is not a question for discussion here.

Mr. ROWELL: Coming to the question of my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), he appears to think that another Government might get in power which would take a different view and not be so friendly disposed towards the municipalities as is this Government. I can sympathize with my hon. friend's feeling of apprehension on this question of public ownership in the event of a change of Government.

However, the physical assets of this railway could not be transferred to the Government without the necessary legislation. If any government, therefore, decided to wipe out the corporate entity of the Grand Trunk and vest all its property in the Government, it would have to come down for legislation to do so, and on that occasion a provision might properly be inserted in the Bill to the effect that notwithstanding the change, local municipalities would still be entitled to levy taxes as if the property were owned by a corporate entity, the Grand Trunk But that is not necessary at this time.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The clause in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company charter of 1880-81 to which I have reference is as follows:

> The Canadian Pacific railway, and all stations and station grounds, work shops, buildings, yards and other property, rolling stock and appurtenances required and used for the construction and working thereof, and the capital stock of the company, shall be forever free from taxation by the Dominion, or by any province hereafter to be established, or by any municipal corporation therein; and the lands of the company, in the North West Territories, until they are either sold or occupied, shall also be free from such taxation for 20 years after the grant thereof from the Crown.

Hon. members will see that I was partly right and partly wrong. But in view of the fact that I am partly right, I contend that if the Canadian Pacific is to go scot-free until the crack of doom so far as taxes are concerned, the minister should not take the view that this new system should pay taxes. It is not right that the Canadian Pacific should be free from taxes in the West—and the West is a very important part of Canada—while the Government railway system is taxed; the two should be in a position of absolute equality.

Mr. EULER: Does the hon. member believe that municipalities should have the right to tax railway properties?

Mr. RICHARDSON: It is my view that municipalities should have the right to tax railways, as well as farmers or anybody else.

Mr. EULER: Does the hon. member think, then, that municipalities should be required to yield up rights which belong strictly to them in order to increase the profits of the National railways?

Mr. RICHARDSON: They would not be yielding up any rights, because under the constitution of the railway company these properties would be non-taxable.

Mr. EULER: Why should they shoulder a loss which properly belongs to the National railways?

[Mr. Rowell.]

Mr. KEEFER: When were these lands granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? I observe that the exemption is for twenty years after the land was granted by the Crown, and the land was surely granted more than twenty years ago.

Mr. RICHARDSON: A lot of things have happened in this country that my hon. friend does not know anything about, in spite of his wide knowledge. The clause reads:

> The lands of the company . . . . shall also be free from taxation for twenty years after the grant thereof from the Crown.

But the wily Canadian Pacific Railway Company allowed the twenty years to expire without taking out their patents, and then they claimed that " the grant thereof " meant the issue of patents. Of course, all the lands that had been sold in the meantime became taxable and the burden of the tax fell upon the settler and the purchaser. Well, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company got a judicial decision, which I and other members resisted very strongly, giving them exemption for another twenty years, and by that time all the lands will be sold.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: This question of taxation is a very important one. As the Minister of Railways has said, there has been a good deal of apprehension among the municipalities that the physical assets of the Grand Trunk Railway Company will be exempted from municipal taxation. It has been established by the President of the Council that as long as the modus vivendi provided in the Bill continues, local taxation will continue. But there seems to be an element of doubt whether this will go on forever; it is suggested that at some future time the Government may decide to vest the titles to the real estate in the Crown, and these lands would, under the British North America Act, then be exempt from taxation. We should have a definite statement from the Government that if they do vest in the Crown the real estate, lands, buildings and so on, now vested in the Grand Trunk Railway Company, they will see that no injustice is done to the municipalities. There will be a good deal of dissatisfaction on the part of the municipalities if they get the idea that with the Grand Trunk property vested in the Crown it will be free from taxation for all time to come. I believe that under this Bill the property will be vested in the Crown; I can see absolute reason for saying that it is public property; it remains public property under a corporation. One of the main reasons why it should be run under a corporation is because it operates in the United States as well as in Canada, and as a railway entity in the United States it might be able to do in the United States what the Canadian Government would find it very difficult to do. But I hope that the President of the Council will give the assurance, if it cannot be incorporated in the Bill, that if the question of municipal taxation does arise in connection with any future transfer to the Crown of the right of way, real estate and buildings pertaining to this system, the rights of the municipalities will be respected.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend evidently overlooked an observation I made. There can be no transfer to the Crown of the property and assets of this railway without new legislation. This legislation does not authorize it, and so long as the company continues its corporate entity it cannot dispose of its property and assets except under the terms of the Railway Act. If in the future the property was being transferred to the Crown that would be a proper occasion upon which to provide, in the legislation then enacted, that the road should be free from taxation. All we are doing in this case is exactly what is now being done with respect to the Canadian Northern. The Government owns the stock; the Canadian Northern railway continues to pay taxes in the local municipalities through which the railway runs.

Mr. McKENZIE: Who pays the taxes that are now paid in the name of the Canadian Northern?

Mr. ROWELL: The Canadian Northern pays them out of the moneys which it receives through its operations.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have to finance the road.

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it not our money that they are paying out in taxes?

Mr. ROWELL: I agree that if the Canadian Northern did not have to pay taxes its earnings would be that much more and Canada would receive the benefit.

Mr. McKENZIE: Then Canada is paying the taxes.

Mr. ROWELL: Indirectly Canada is paying the taxes; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why should Canada pay taxes upon public property?

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: I quite understand the principle; that is, the Government, as I understand it, will continue to pay taxes which the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern have been paying to different municipalities. In the case of the Intercolonial, very valuable property rights were taken over by that railway in the city of St. John, and the municipalities, towns and cities of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia cannot tax the Intercolonial railway property. It seems to me only fair if municipalities, towns and cities in Ontario and the West are going to continue to tax these properties and to obtain that revenue, that the same right should be given to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I see that by clause 2 the Government is given power in the name of His Majesty to—> Enter into an agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the acquisition by the Government of the entire capital stock of the Grand Trunk, except the four per cent (4%) guaranteed stock of the Grand Trunk, amounting to £12,500,000 the latter being hereinafter called the "present guaranteed stock."

Why is that exception made? Why should the Government not be given power to enter into an agreement to acquire that stock?

Mr. ROWELL: Because the agreement which the Government is proposing to the House does not provide for the immediate acquisition of that stock. The agreement which the Government is proposing is one under which it guarantees the dividend on this stock rather than take it over.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that the agreement provides that, but why does the agreement make that exception?

Mr. ROWELL: Simply because we could not buy it on any other terms.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the minister mean to say that the Government of Canada can buy only on the terms that the Grand Trunk proposes?

Mr. ROWELL: No, the Government of Canada can buy only on the basis of a negotiated agreement. We cannot go into the United States and expropriate their property; we have to negotiate. We have negotiated an agreement which we believe to be eminently in the country's interest, but this is one of the provisions which the Grand Trunk required and to which we agreed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it the Grand Trunk which wishes to sell, or is it the Government which wishes to buy?

Mr. ROWELL: The Grand Trunk is in such a position that it cannot continue to carry on unless the Government relieves it from its obligations. The Government is not willing to relieve it from its obligations, and therefore the Grand Trunk is prepared to negotiate a sale.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister say that the Grand Trunk is anxious to sell and that the Government is not able to make terms except on the Grand Trunk's own basis?

Mr. ROWELL: Certainly not. We have been negotiating for two years. We have refused the Grand Trunk's terms. If my hon. friend would only read the correspondence he would see that the Grand Trunk people have protested again and again and again against what it claims our unfair terms; it claims that we are not treating them fairly; that we are confiscating their stock. My hon. friend will note the agitation in the English press about the matter. In order to reach an understanding, because the situation had to be cleared up in some way, we offered in our letter of the 11th July, 1918, to treat this guaranteed stock in the same way as the debenture stock by our undertaking to pay interest upon it We undertook, in case of an arbitration, to do that, and after negotiating from July, 1918, until October, 1919, the Grand Trunk people finally have accepted that proposal, although during all that time they have been refusing to agree to it, because they thought it was putting them in an unfair position.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What becomes of the argument, then, that this is a government-owned railway? The minister has told us that the Government cannot purchase this part of the railway because the Grand Trunk will not sell.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not think we shall make any headway by further discussing the point. My hon. friend's difficulty is this: He is not a lawyer; he does not draw—

Mr. JACOBS: Yes, he is a lawyer.

Mr. ROWELL: He is not, I believe, accustomed to dealing with stocks and bonds in relation to corporation and finance, or he would clearly understand that the position he is taking is wholly untenable, and does not touch the question of public ownership at all. But I do not think we shall get any further ahead by any effort on my part to convince him that he is wrong, and my hon. friend will certainly not make any headway in endeavouring to convince me that he is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should not like to stand in the position of a legal expert for a moment, but I would be prepared to stand in the position of a man of average intelligence who is going to be held responsible for this agreement, when it is carried out, in the way of meeting its obligations, and it is to get an explanation that the average citizen will comprehend that I am putting these questions. Apart from legal phraseology and technicalities of one kind or another, I would ask the minister if what he has just told us does not amount to this, namely, that the Government of the day is negotiating with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and that it cannot make certain terms because the Grand Trunk is not prepared to accept those terms. Is that not true?

Mr. ROWELL: Certainly it is true. Supposing we offer the Grand Trunk a million dollars for all its property, and they will not accept that. Does my hon. friend want to take the position of saying to the Grand Trunk: Unless you take whatever we say regardless whether it is fair or not, we will force you into liquidation. The Government of Canada, exercising its power and control over this situation, with the Grand Trunk in the position in which it is, could force the Grand Trunk into liquidation. Does my hon. friend think it should do that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did the Government not do that in regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific? Did it not set a precedent in that regard?

Mr. ROWELL: The Government had to take over the Grand Trunk Pacific because the Grand Trunk at a critical period, notified the Government that it could no longer continue the operation of the railway. Could the Government stand by and see hundreds of miles of railway ceasing operation with all the loss and inconvenience to thousands of people throughout Canada, the dislocation of business, the prevention of supplies coming into cities, towns and villages? No Government worthy of the name of a Government could face such an alternative; they had to take over the management and to appoint a receiver in order that the transportation of the country might be continued.

Mr. DENIS: There is a point which has been repeatedly raised and which, I think, should be settled once and for all so far as we can settle it in committee, as this will be the last opportunity we shall have to settle this question. I refer to the guaranteeing by the Government of the £12,500,000 worth of guaranteed stock. If we refer to the Drayton-Acworth report, page lxxxvii, we find this:

> We recommend that the whole of the Dominion railways be operated by the trustees as one united system.

Following on that on the next page I read in paragraph 41:

> We recommend that the entire share capital of the Grand Trunk, guaranteed, preference and ordinary, be surrendered to the trustees in exchange—

They say:

> We recommend that the entire share capital of the Grand Trunk—

That includes the five stocks, namely: Common stock, first, second and third preference stocks, and the four per cent guaranteed stock. The Drayton-Acworth report recommends that the five stocks > —be surrendered to the trustees in exchange for an annuity based on a moderate but substantial proportion of $3,600,000, the average sum paid as dividend in the last ten years; and that this annuity should increase by 40 or 50 per cent after the first seven years.

>
> 42. We recommend that the precise figure be fixed by agreement and that it be left to the directors of the Grand Trunk Company (1) to apportion the annuity among the five classes of Grand Trunk shareholders, and (2) to procure such assents of their shareholders as are legally required to complete the transfer.
> 43. We give reasons for considering that this recommendation is generous to the Grand Trunk shareholders, and why the shareholders in their own interest will do well to accept it.

Those are the recommendations of the Drayton-Acworth Commission. They recommend that the five stocks be taken over by the board of trustees. Now the Government is not appointing this board of trustees, but a special board which will take charge of all the railways belonging to the Dominion. Now when this report recommends that the five stocks be taken over by the Government, and that the interest on these five stocks should not represent more than a moderate but substantial proportion of $3,600,000, how is it that the Government does not follow the recommendations, but enters into a transaction under which it will have to pay a much higher amount to the Grand Trunk shareholders than, to quote the exact words, a "substantial proportion of $3,600,000." What would be a substantial portion of $3,600,000? The report does not say, but I would think fifty per cent would be a substantial proportion. That would not be even $2,000,000. Consequently, according to the report, all the interest that the holders of the five stocks are entitled to is not more than $2,000,000 a year. But we are going to pay four per cent interest on $60,000,000 of guaranteed stock, which means an annual expenditure of $2,500,000. We are binding ourselves in perpetuity to pay that amount on that stock alone, although the report says that the interest on the whole five stocks for the first seven years should not be more than $2,000,000 a year. In addition to that, we bind ourselves to pay four per cent on the amount of the award. Supposing the arbitrators allow $50,000,000 as the value of the four stocks, which have a nominal value of $180,000,000. The interest on that would make $2,000,000 more. Consequently under the Government's proposals we will have to pay the very first year $2,500,000 plus $2,000,000, that is, $4,500,000. That is what we are going to pay in interest on the five stocks in perpetuity, or until we buy the stocks thirty years from now. Why should we pay $4,500,000 in interest on these five stocks when the Drayton-Acworth report says that all they are worth in interest is a substantial proportion of $3,600,000 for the first seven years, increasing at the termination of that period by something like 40 or 50 per cent? Even then it would not amount to $3,600,000.

The Government has given no good reason why the five stocks should not be arbitrated upon, although the question has been raised repeatedly in this debate. It was raised a few moments ago by the leader of the Opposition, it was raised in committee on the resolution, and although I have followed this discussion very closely and attentively I have not yet heard a satisfactory answer given by the Government. Their answer is that these are the best terms they could get from the Grand Trunk. I am not satisfied with that answer. When a company like the Grand Trunk is bankrupt, when it cannot fulfil its obligations towards the Grand Trunk Pacific and has to borrow money from this Government year after year, when the Government have in turn to impose a heavy taxation upon the people of this country, I say we have no presents to make to the Grand Trunk, and it is up to them to say "We accept the terms you impose." The Government might very well say to the Grand Trunk "We have the Drayton-Acworth report, which is the very highest authority in this matter. It was not prepared with the object of buying the Grand Trunk or giving direction to anybody with regard to the present transaction, but was prepared by the best railway experts available and signed by a man who is now Minister of Finance and therefore enjoys the confidence of the Government. We are going to stand by the recommendations in the Drayton-Acworth report, and will give you what they propose, but nothing more. These are our terms and we will submit to no other. If you are not satisfied, go to work and carry out your obligations." I would consider that a reasonable business-like proposition to make to the Grand Trunk, and I cannot conceive of a man of the ability of the President of the Privy Council or any other member of the Government coming to Parliament and saying: "These are the best terms we can get from the Grand Trunk." That is not a reasonable answer to our question; it is not convincing; it is not even plausible, and I trust a more satisfactory answer will be forthcoming.

Mr. KING: Referring to the statement of the capital stock, there are four stocks that are to be referred to arbitration for the purpose of valuation. Why is it that the same process has not been adopted in regard to the 4 per cent guaranteed stock? Is it because the Grand Trunk was unwilling to have that done, or is there any other reason?

Mr. ROWELL: If my hon. friend would permit me to refer for a moment to the question of my hon. friend (Mr. Denis), because the one has a direct relation to the other, what my hon. friend asks is not that we should act on the Drayton-Acworth report but on his interpretation of that report. We are acting on the Drayton-Acworth report, but not on his interpretation of it.

Mr. JACOBS: What about the $60,000,000 of guaranteed stock?

Mr. ROWELL: If my hon. friend will have patience I will deal with that, too. The criticism of my hon. friend (Mr. Denis) is perfectly legitimate and therefore I wish to answer it. The Drayton-Acworth report said a moderate but substantial percentage of $3,600,000 increasing by forty or fifty per cent after seven years. The Government's interpretation of that—an interpretation which is shared by the man who wrote the report—is that a substantial percentage is $2,500,000.

[Mr. Denis.]

Mr. McKENZIE: That is extraordinary. How can he be the judge of what the world would call "substantial"? Do not introduce the man who wrote the report; that is childish.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend says that it is childish that the man who wrote the report should say what the report meant.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is childish to say that he is to judge what is substantial.

Mr. ROWELL: He knows what he meant when he recommended that.

Mr. McKENZIE: He cannot be a judge of that at all.

Mr. ROWELL: Then, all I have to say is that we share his view. We are agreed on that point.

Mr. McKENZIE: Take the full responsibility yourself; don't switch it on to him.

Mr. ROWELL: We unhesitatingly take the full responsibility.

Mr. McKENZIE: Very well.

Mr. ROWELL: We say that a substantial percentage of $3,600,000 is $2,500,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Very substantial.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ROWELL: If you increase it by forty per cent you get $3,500,000, and by fifty per cent, $3,750,000; or, if you split the difference, and strike a medium between the two, you get $3,600,000. We have therefore taken what we consider to be a substantial percentage, namely, $2,500,000 for the past three years, and have increased this by between forty and fifty per cent, bringing it to $3,600,000, and offered to pay that amount as an annual rental after seven years. We say that in doing that we were carrying out the Drayton-Acworth report, and we believe that that was a fair proposal to make having regard to all the facts and conditions disclosed in the report.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand that the Drayton-Acworth report says that after seven years we add this forty or fifty per cent, but do we not begin right away with this large payment?

Mr. ROWELL: No. You have to bear in mind the distinction between the cash offer and the offer for arbitration. The cash offer was $2,500,000 for the first three years, $3,000,000 for the succeeding five years, and $3,600,000 annually thereafter. Then we offered an alternative. We said that if they would not accept that cash offer we would arbitrate. My hon. friend will bear in mind that that was an offer in addition to the obligations on the debenture stock. We said that we would arbitrate and in that arbitration we offered, in order to secure a basis for agreement, to treat the guaranteed stock practically as debenture stock and pay interest on it. That was our proposal made in July, 1918.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am afraid my hon. friend is mixing two things. I understood he was interpreting for the committee the meaning of the proposition contained in the Drayton-Acworth report. Now he is mixing with that the terms the Government is offering.

Mr. ROWELL: I have already interpreted the Drayton-Acworth report and I am proceeding to apply it to the present situation, to meet the question of my hon. friend from Prince (Mr. King) as to why the guaranteed stock is treated differently from the first, second, and third preference. We offered to treat the guaranteed stock the same as bonded obligations, namely, to pay interest on it. That offer made in July, 1918, was not accepted, and you will see the protest against it in the correspondence. I desire to direct attention to one fact in connection with that offer. In a statement issued by the Grand Trunk in which they were protesting against the offer made by the Government they set out their understanding of our proposal. At this point I may say that this cash offer was made earlier in the year but was repealed in the letter of the 18th July. They say that this $2,500,000 would mean the payment in full on guaranteed stock immediately. At the end of three years, the payment on first preference five per cent stock at the rate of 3.38 per cent. At the end of eight years the full payment of first preference stock and the payment of 2½ per cent second preference stock. I mention this for the reason that the Grand Trunk recognized that the $2,500,000 would have to be applied first in paying the interest on this guaranteed stock, and they so state in the publication in reference to it. They accepted the offer of arbitration with the provision that we should treat this guaranteed stock in the same way as debenture stock; that is to say, that we should pay interest amounting to $2,500,000. That we agreed to do. If they had accepted the cash offer, that would have given them the same amount, to pay interest on the guaranteed stock. The leader of the Opposition has suggested that we are undertaking to pay a larger sum. That is not the case. It is for the arbitrators to say how much we shall pay for the other three stocks and the common stock. The Government will contend as forcibly as possible that the obligations of the company render practically nil the value of the stock. On the other hand, the Grand Trunk will argue that it is of value, and it is for the arbitrators to determine how much. My hon. friend assumes that they will find $50,000,000, but he has no basis for that assumption.

Mr. JACOBS: If they take up the potential value of the property.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend has no basis for assuming that they will find $50,000,000. On that assumption he says that we are going to pay more than the Drayton-Acworth report recommends. We shall not pay more than the Drayton-Acworth report recommends unless the arbitrators find that the property is worth more, and we shall pay less than the report recommends if they find it is worth less. That is the point for the arbitrators to determine.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. McKENZIE: Oh, no, it is far from being carried.

Mr. KING: In order that we may the better understand this agreement I should like to ask the minister again if the Grand Trunk Railway Company are asking the Government to make this purchase? Are they pressing the Government to make this purchase?

Mr. ROWELL: I believe at the present time the Grand Trunk railway would be glad for this agreement to go through.

Mr. JACOBS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend says "hear, hear." They are in such a situation that they have to make some arrangement with us or someone else.

Mr. JACOBS: They are insolvent.

Mr. ROWELL: They have to make arrangements with us or somebody else. They might be able to make an arrangement with somebody else. They might even be able to make it with the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. FIELDING: Not without legislation.

Mr. ROWELL: Quite so, but the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's would be the last man to say that this House should use its legislative power to deny the Grand Trunk the opportunity to sell if we were not prepared to buy.

Mr. FIELDING: I will consider that when the question is properly raised.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend cannot put it that way. We must buy the property and pay a fair price or we must be prepared to allow them to get out of their difficulties by dealing with other people. That is the situation.

Mr. JACOBS: The rights of the people cannot be affected.

Mr. ROWELL: The rights of the people are being abundantly protected under the agreement having regard to the value of the assets.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend did not answer the question of the hon. member for Prince. Does the Grand Trunk seek to get the Government to take it over or is the Government pressing the Grand Trunk? It is not a sufficient answer to say that the Grand Trunk want this thing carried out. Of course they do, but did the Grand Trunk approach the Government with a desire to sell out? I see no evidence that they ever did.

The Committee rose.

At six o'clock the House resumed and then took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill No. 29 (from the Senate), for the relief of Millie Wettlaufer.—Mr. Sheard.

Bill No. 32 (from the Senate), for the relief of Arthur Leroy Eastcott.—Mr. Green.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM.

BILL PROVIDING FOR THE ACQUISITION OF THE SYSTEM BY THE GOVERNMENT.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 33, respecting the acquisition by His Majesty of the Grand Trunk Railway system.

The CHAIRMAN: When the Committee rose at six o'clock section 2 was still under discussion. Shall the section carry?

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Chairman, there was an agreement reached yesterday afternoon in regard to this Bill.

Mr. ROWELL: I was just going to mention that. I recall that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) did intimate that the House would sit on the Bill until six o'clock.

Mr. MURPHY: That is right.

Mr. ROWELL: Under those circumstances it is my intention to move that the Committee rise and report progress. But before doing so I desire to answer the question put to me by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) just before the Committee rose at six o'clock. As I recall my hon. friend's question, it was this: Were the Grand Trunk Railway Company pressing to sell the system to the Government? That is my recollection of the question.

Mr. FIELDING: It is my question in substance, but it is not the whole question.

Mr. ROWELL: My answer to that is: No, the Grand Trunk Railway Company did not wish to sell; in fact, that was the last thing it wished to do. I might state in a few words the position taken by the company. What it wished was additional assistance from the Government for the Grand Trunk Pacific, such as it had been receiving in recent years, the Government advancing to the Grand Trunk Pacific a sum sufficient to enable it to practically pay its deficits and continue operation. The Grand Trunk Company pressed the Government to continue that assistance. The Government took the position that it would not be justified in continuing year after year to advance millions of dollars to assist this road, and that the people of Canada would not approve of its being done. The refusal to continue assistance to the Grand Trunk for the benefit of the Grand Trunk Pacific forced the situation which led to the receivership. The company said it did not have the money to continue operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific and therefore would be obliged to discontinue. It justified the claim for assistance on the ground, that when it undertook in 1903 and 1904 to build the Grand Trunk Pacific, it was to open up and develop a certain territory; that subsequent to that date the Government had given assistance, by way of guarantees, to the Canadian Northern railway to parallel the Grand Trunk Pacific line; that the result of the new construction thus started had greatly increased the cost of construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and at the same time had deprived it of traffic which otherwise would naturally have flowed to it; and that it never would have undertaken to build the railway had it had any knowledge of the course that the Government subsequently pursued. Even on that ground the Government did not feel justified in making further advances. The Grand Trunk not only did not want to sell, but still declined the cash offer the Government made of $2,-$500,000 rental for the first three years, $3,000,000 for the next four years, and $3,600,000 thereafter, insisting that that was wholly inadequate, and that it would be virtually confiscation to force it to accept that offer. Therefore the company finally accepted the alternative of arbitration.

Mr. FIELDING: The question to which my hon. friend refers was partially as he states it. Let me put it in another form, however. It has been stated freely in this debate as the justification—that is the word my hon. friend would use; as the excuse, I would say—for the pressing forward of this matter at this time that it is one of great urgency. Now, my question, if I may repeat it, is this: Was that urgency on the part of the Grand Trunk Railway or on the part of the Government? My hon. friend talks of some negotiations that took place in connection with the receivership of the Grand Trunk Pacific, but that event happened many months ago and cannot have been the basis of the present proceeding. If the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada were coming to the Government and urging them to take over this road, surely we should have some evidence of it in the papers which the hon. gentleman brought down. The beginning of this whole transaction is the effort made by the Government to get possession of the Grand Trunk. There is nothing in this correspondence to show that there was any urgency on the part of the Grand Trunk, for the condition my hon. friend describes was a condition that existed many months ago. Suppose that the arrangement—I am putting the question I put at an earlier stage of the debate—between my hon. friend and his colleagues and Sir Alfred Smithers had not been come to for a week later, until the understanding—I won't say engagement—that the Government had given the House as to prorogation had taken effect; suppose the House had been prorogued, and then the understanding had been come to between the Government and Sir Alfred Smithers, what would have happened? What distressing situation would have arisen if that had been the position instead of the one we have to-day?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend is quite correct in saying that there is nothing in the correspondence indicating urgency from the standpoint of the Grand Trunk. The fact, however, is that the Grand Trunk was in need of additional assistance, and within the past six weeks the Government has had to render assistance to the Grand Trunk to prevent it getting into more serious default—not assistance to the extent of millions, but a few hundred thousand dollars. Therefore the situation to be faced is, whether the Government is to continue giving that assistance? If not, it must deal with the purchase at this time. Now, what my hon. friend says is correct. If an understanding had not been arrived at until after the House had risen, naturally the matter would have had to stand until the next session of Parliament.

Mr. FIELDING: And what interest would have suffered?

Mr. ROWELL: This interest would have suffered: The Government could not have closed the agreement, because the Government did not feel justified in closing an agreement on so important a matter without the approval of Parliament. The Government, therefore, would have had to let the whole matter stand over. The position of the Government is—and we must deal fairly throughout—that the Government does not believe it to be in the national interest that the Grand Trunk should dispose of its road to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or to any other corporation allied with it. My hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) smiles, but it is not a matter of theory; it is a matter of fact. If we are not prepared to permit the Grand Trunk to deal with others, then when we come to an understanding with it, I cannot possibly see what excuse there is for delay in consummating it. What reason is there for delay? It has been before the country for nearly two years. Why should we not deal with it? That is one thing, I cannot understand.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I suggest the additional reason: That in operating the white elephant that was unloaded on the country under the policy of our friends opposite, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental, the country is losing enormous sums of money.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend must not ask the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) to concur in that, because the President of the Council has said, as I have said, that that arrangement was an excellent thing for the people of Canada. He must not try to put the President of the Council in the position of attacking that arrangement. To do that is unfair to the President of the Council and I want to come to his defence.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Does my hon. friend suggest that the President of the Council has declared that the construction of the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific was an excellent thing for Canada?

Mr. FIELDING: Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I must differ from my hon. friend.

Mr. FIELDING: The President of the Council was a member of the Liberal party in good standing at that time, loyally supporting Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the whole of us; and although we differ in some respects to-day I know him too well to imagine that he will repudiate the stand that he took on that occasion. However, that is only by the way.

It has been stated here day after day that this is a matter of urgency. I think a fair question to put is this: Is the urgency on the part of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, or is it on the part of the Government? Now, if the Grand Trunk Railway Company has been coming to the Government and pressing its demands on it, why in Heaven's name have we not the evidence of that in the correspondence? Why do we have to have my hon. friend saying to us, "Oh, well, the Grand Trunk was hard up; the Grand Trunk would have to do this and would have to do that and would have to do the other thing." The Grand Trunk is a big, well-organized corporation, and if it made any urgent demand upon the Government surely the Government, as business men, were in a position to ask that this request be put in writing so that it would be in the record. But there is no evidence of urgency here; the plea of urgency put forward in this debate is absolutely unfounded so far as any evidence of it in the correspondence is concerned. The only urgency is with the Government of Canada. The Government—they will say, for good reasons; I am not assailing that—made up their mind that they wanted to grab the Grand Trunk Railway system, and they have been pushing the matter; now they come and say that it was an urgent case. The urgency was on their part, not on the part of the Grand Trunk.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not think that there is much to be gained by prolonging this discussion. I was a supporter of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and I believed that the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific was a good thing, but I always had some doubt as to the wisdom of the extension of the road to the East at such a cost to the Country. But let that go. What I did not approve of, what I do not now approve of and what I think was a colossal blunder, was permitting the Canadian Northern to duplicate these lines as a transcontinental railway. I think that it was a mistaken policy to permit the extension of the Canadian Northern from Western to Eastern Canada, to guarantee its bonds and to commit the credit of Canada to two transcontinental railways. It duplicated lines unnecessarily; it depreciated the value of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, and it made it more difficult for that company to meet its obligations, and, on the other hand, it imposed immense obligations on the Canadian Northern. But we will gain nothing, as the member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White) said in his address on this Bill, by mutual recrimination with regard to the responsibility for the difficulties which exist in respect of the transportation systems of Canada. We cannot gain anything by doing that; the difficulties are here and we have to meet them.

Now, the Government of Canada believes that it is in the national interest to acquire the Grand Trunk Railway system. We do not offer any excuses for that; we say that the national interest demands it. Nobody on this side has said that there is urgency in the sense that we must proceed without due deliberation. My hon. friend has been told that he can have all the time he wishes to consider it; the Minister of the Interior has repeatedly said: "Stay as long as you like to consider it." But we can see no reason why the proposal which has been before the people for a year and a half and which is in a position to be consummated should not now be carried out with full legislative authority. I do not hesitate to say that one reason why we should not delay is found in the fact that powerful interests in this country are opposed to the Government's acquiring this road and are seeking to organize opposition to our acquiring it.

Mr. RICHARDSON: They are organizing it.

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, and we should only be putting a further opportunity into their hand of defeating something that we believe to be vital in the public interest. The Government, with knowledge of the hostility that is being organized against that which is in the public interest, would have failed to do its duty had it not proceeded with all due expedition, at the same time giving full opportunity for discussion and consideration of this important matter.

Mr. FIELDING: Translated into the language of the man in the street, that means that the hon. gentleman is afraid of public opinion; he is afraid that if the Government do not rush this thing through this session there will be an organized effort to defeat him. If public opinion is so strongly in support of this measure, why does the President of the Council fear an organized effort to defeat it? The hon. gentleman's plea is a confession that he is afraid of public opinion and he is rushing this thing through Parliament avowedly with the purpose of preventing public opinion from being heard.

I agree with my hon. friend that there is nothing to be gained by recrimination over the history of the railway question. If my hon. friend will get possession of the Minister of the Railways when he comes in and pound that thought into him he will be doing a good service. Did not the Minister of Railways last night spend half the evening in denouncing the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Government and stating all the awful things that happened to the Grand Trunk Pacific contract? My hon. friend says that a mistake was made in subsidizing the Canadian Northern alongside of the Grand Trunk Pacific. There is some force in that argument, and I am always prepared to admit an argument made by an opponent when it has some weight. But he should point out also that while the Liberal Government subsidized and assisted that road, the Conservative Government carried it on right through to the coast. When the member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White) said—and I give him credit for it—that the credit or discredit, as the case may be, of this great railway enterprise, any mistakes made in connection with this great railway enterprise should not be ascribed to one party or the other; they should be distributed over the two parties. In our zeal, having great faith in the future, we were, perhaps, too zealous to build ahead of the times. I have faith enough in the country to believe that within the lives of the young men of this House, and of some who are no longer young, there will be a justification for these roads, and that in the building up of the country we shall have business enough for them all.

Coming back to the question of urgency, again and again the statement is made that if we do not do this thing now some awful thing will happen. Is that an exaggeration? That is the substance of half the statements that have come from the other side. Mr. Chairman, I have been trying to find out what this awful thing is. My hon. friend says that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will get possession of this system. Now, he knows that the Canadian Pacific cannot get possession—I doubt whether they want to get possession of it, but that is their business—without coming to this Parliament. Then why should this bugaboo about the Canadian Pacific Railway be dragged into this transaction again and again?

Then, he says, if we do not allow the Canadian Pacific Railway to take it, we must take it ourselves. These are large questions for the future. Before this transaction goes through, all these accounts, the complicated accounts of the Grand Trunk Railway system should be examined—it would take a chartered accountant months to understand them. Subsidiary companies, connected interests in Canada and the United States, hotels, steamships, railways—there never was such a complicated transaction submitted to this House. Yet the hon. gentleman is rushing it through on the plea of urgency, and while the correspondence shows that the only people who are under the necessity of urgency are the Government, he is trying to grab this road and to put this thing through Parliament because he is afraid that public opinion will be against him.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend is wholly mistaken. I am not afraid of legitimate public opinion of this country. My hon. friend knows the influence of corporations in the past in carrying on organized propaganda opposing or supporting legislation. Members of this House and the people of the country know what has happened in that regard in past years. We have the facts in connection with the Grand Trunk situation before us, and if we are wise men, we will act upon the facts we now have. We know the situation and we can make up our minds. My hon. friend knows to-night that he is opposed to this transaction, and I am not questioning for a moment his right to hold that opinion. My hon. friend has the same right to be opposed to this transaction as I have to be in favour of it. But he will not be any less opposed to it in February next than he is now, and my hon. friends opposite will not be any less opposed to it in February next than they are now. The members on this side are in favour of this transaction—

Mr. FIELDING: Some of them.

Mr. ROWELL:—and they will not be any less or more in favour of it in February next than they are now. The views of both sides regarding this transaction are known. Then let us register our opinion and thus enable the Government to proceed with the re-organization of the transportation systems of this country for which the Government is responsible.

Progress reported.

THE PEACE TREATY WITH AUSTRIA.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty the House reverted to the Government Notices of Motion.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved:

That it is expedient that Parliament do approve of the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Austria, signed at St. Germain on the tenth day of September, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, a copy of which has been laid before Parliament, and which was signed on behalf of His Majesty, acting for Canada by the plenipotentiaries therein named, and that this House do approve of the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that on the 22nd September, in answer to a question put as to the action contemplated by the Government with regard to the Treaty with Austria, it was stated that if a copy of the Treaty which had been signed arrived while this House was still in session, the Treaty would be submitted to this House as was the Treaty with Germany. As the House is aware, the Treaty has been received and copies have been distributed and have been now for some days in the hands of members. This motion is intended to implement the promise so made. It is also within the recollection of the members of the House that, upon an amendment to the Bill coming before the House, giving powers to the Governor in Council to do those things which would be necessary for the carrying out of the Treaty with Germany and the giving effect to its provisions, which amendment was made in the Senate and which extended the provisions of the Bill so as to include powers for the carrying out of the Treaty with Austria and the fulfilment of its provisions, this House accepted the amendment made, and included in that Bill, which, as I said, conferred the powers that I mentioned, the Treaty with Austria. For reasons which were then given, this House did not assent to the inclusion in that Bill of the conferring of powers in regard to treaties not signed and the giving effect to the provisions of such treaties. We have now before us, as I have said, the Treaty with Austria. As I pointed out when the amendment to which I referred was before the House, the Treaty with Austria, in all essential points, I think I might say in all points save where it deals with matters which are necessarily different in the two treaties, such as, for instance, the boundaries that require to be settled with regard to Germany in the one instance and with regard to Austria in the other, is identical in all respects upon lines absolutely similar, and practically with regard to all important measures, with the German Treaty. It was because of that fact that the Government felt justified in making the statement it did, that if the Treaty did not arrive while this House was in session, and if, in consequence of the House not being in session, it would be impossible to submit it to the approval of the House except by calling a special session, the Government would be warranted, in view of the approval of the House given unanimously to the German Treaty, in advising the ratification of the Austrian Treaty without calling the House together again for that purpose. The Government arrived at that conclusion and made that declaration because, under those conditions, the approval of the German Treaty was naturally tantamount to an approval of the Austrian Treaty, and to have held up the latter Treaty under those circumstances merely until there would be an opportunity to submit that absolutely similar Treaty to the House, would have been holding up the Treaty for the purpose simply of fulfilling a formality, the substance of approval having already in effect been given. I think I pointed that out at the time I had occasion to say what the Government desired to say with regard to the amendment made by the Senate. The adoption of that amendment, while in a sense it might be taken as implying approval of the Treaty, nevertheless had no further or greater effect than to confer upon the Government power to carry it out and to take such steps as might be necessary to give effect to its provisions. Before that power could come to be exercised at all, the Treaty would have to become binding upon Canada, and it would only have become so binding by reason of the ratification of His Majesty on the advice of the Government of Canada. The only circumstances in which the Government would have felt justified in ratifying the Treaty without special submission to Parliament would have consisted purely and simply in the fact that in the case of the German Treaty, which in all important respects is identically the same as this Treaty, the Government had acted only after the express approval of this House with the text of the Treaty before them.

However, the Austrian Treaty has arrived and we have been in a position to lay it before the House, and there is now no occasion for the Government basing its action upon that which I have described as the substantial approval, the equivalent of the express approval, by this House of that particular Treaty. The Treaty is now before the House which by this motion is asked to express the same approval of it that the House unanimously expressed with regard to the Treaty with Germany. It is not necessary, I fancy, that I should this evening go into any explanation or exposition of the provisions of this Treaty. The House has had it in its possession for some days now, and I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen who have read it carefully have found that its text fully justifies what I pointed out in connection with the amendment to which I have already referred, namely, that the Treaty is in all important respects identical with, and in all matters substanstially the same as, the German Treaty. Certainly it is on the same lines. So, without detaining the House further at the present moment, I ask the House to adopt the motion.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton and Victoria): I have very little to say upon the motion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), because I think his motion and this whole proceeding puts this House in a very extraordinary and unusual position, to say the least. It is about a week or ten days ago since the minister came to this House with an amended Bill. An amendment had been made in the Senate in which the minister asked us to concur, the effect of such concurrence being to ratify this Treaty. Bill No. 3, which we passed this session dealing with the German Treaty, although it is word for word on exactly the same lines as the British Act ratifying the Treaty, did not express our approval or ratification of the Treaty. It was to implement the Treaty by furnishing the money that was necessary to carry out its terms, and to give the Government power to appoint the officials necessary to be appointed under the Treaty. The minister told us then, and quite properly so, that the passing of that Bill necessarily implied our approval of the Treaty.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think I said that.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister said the same thing to-night.

Mr. DOHERTY: I did not say "necessarily" implied. I said it might be taken in a sense to imply.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is sailing very close to the wind. If it implies it in a sense, it implies it.

Mr. FIELDING: Unless there is no sense in the transaction.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman should repeat my exact words.

Mr. McKENZIE: The British Bill when it passed the House of Commons in England implied, although it did not mention, approval of the Treaty, because it was for the purpose of furnishing the money for carrying out the terms of the Treaty, and of course if Parliament did not approve of the Treaty it would not furnish the means for carrying it out. We, about ten days ago, did everything to approve of the Treaty that is before this House to-night that the British House of Commons did for its approval. They passed an Act furnishing the money and empowering the Government to appoint the necessary officials. We have done that already on the word of the minister that the document we were approving was precisely the same as the German Treaty. Why, therefore, does the minister come here to-night and ask the House to go through the empty ceremony of re-approving something that has already been approved? I do not admit that there is any necessity for it at all. When we were discussing this matter ten days ago I read Lord Milner's despatch in this House, which, of course, had reached the minister long before we saw it. Lord Milner on the advice of the law officers of the Crown in Great Britain advised the British Government that the approval of the British Parliament was not necessary, nor the approval of this Parliament. On the strength of that I argued that it was not necessary for us to do anything at all except what the British North America requires of us in order to furnish the wherewithal to carry out the Treaty so far as it imposed duties upon us. For that reason, although I am not going to offer any strenuous opposition, I think it would be more dignified for the House to stand by its action. We have already approved this Treaty, because we have passed an Act implementing it. I think it would be more consistent with the dignity of the House—although I suppose it does not in any way detract from our dignity to confirm our action, having done a thing once and believing we have done it right, and in fact knowing it was right so far as its constitutionality and legality are concerned—to stand by our action of a week or so ago. I do not think we are adding any strength to our position by doing the thing over again in this way.

Mr. FIELDING: When the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) spoke of the careful consideration and reading which he was sure the members of the House had given to this document, I thought I observed a merry twinkle in his eye. Now I am going to make probably the risky statement that I doubt whether a single man in this House has read this interesting document of one hundred and fifty pages. It might be very wicked to suggest that the distinguished Canadian who signed it had not read it, but even that is a possibility. However, I believe the House is going to pay the Minister of Justice the high complement of approving this Treaty, not because they have ever read it, but simply upon his assurance that the Treaty is in all substantial things the same as the German Treaty. I confess I have not read it myself, but I am going to support the motion simply on the faith that my hon. friend has spoken correctly in that respect.

It is a technical point, and I do not think of very much importance, but I observe that the resolution speaks of the Treaty being signed by the plenipotentiaries acting for Canada, whereas my hon. friend will see by looking at the Treaty that it is signed by only one plenipotentiary.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be glad to amend the motion by substituting the word "plenipotentiary" for "plenipotentiaries."

Mr. KING: Before the motion passes I think it is only fair to the members on this side of the House, as the minister has spoken of the distribution of this Treaty, to say that it appears to have been distributed only to-day, so I think very few members of the House could possibly have had an opportunity of reading it.

Mr. FIELDING: They would not read it to-morrow either.

Mr. KING: I did not receive a copy until this morning, and I think other members are in the same position.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): There is one point in connection with the Treaty in regard to which I should like to have an explanation from the Minister of Justice. Article 4 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, which is part of the Treaty, contains the following provision:

> The Council shall consist of representatives of the principal Allied and Associated Powers, together with representatives of four other members of the League. The four members of the League shall be selected by the Assembly from time to time in its discretion. Until the appointment of the representatives of the four members of the League first selected by the Assembly, representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Spain and Greece shall be members of the Council.

On page 11 of the Covenant there are given the thirty-two original members of the League of Nations, who are signatories of the Treaty of Peace, and there is also a list of states invited to accede to the Covenant. In this list of nations that are not now members of the League, but who are to be invited to become members, we find Spain. Belgium is one of the original members of the League, and so is Greece; but Spain is not yet a member. How is it that Spain has representation on the Council when she is not a member of the League of Nations?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: Nobody will have representation on the Council until the League of Nations is formed by the acceptance and ratification of the Treaty, so far as the signatory nations are concerned. Spain will have representation on the League only after this has come about, and, of course, when she has accepted the invitation extended to her, and which—whether it was formally announced or not—the Conference, in accepting this Treaty, and the Commission in drafting it, were amply satisfied that Spain would accept. Nobody is a member of the League yet, because the League will come into existence only when the Treaty becomes effective. And it was in anticipation that, as soon as that should happen, Spain, availing herself of the invitation, would become a member of the League, that all the nations signing this Treaty agreed that among the first four other members to be selected by the Assembly Spain should have representation upon the Council.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: There are twenty-six nations who are already members of the League. Why select a nation not yet a member of the League and one that may never become a member?

Mr. DOHERTY: I pointed out a moment ago that no nation will be a member of the League until the Treaty is ratified.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: They are described as signatories.

Mr. DOHERTY: They are signatories of the Treaty and as such they become entitled to be members of the League. But the League is created by the Treaty. The Covenant of the League is part of the Treaty and that part of the Treaty produces no more effect than any other part until the whole Treaty comes into force. When the whole Treaty becomes effective, that is to say, when it shall have been ratified by at least three of the great powers, then the provision which says that the signatories of the Treaty are members of the League will become effective with all the other provisions. As I pointed out, it was in anticipation of Spain's acceding to this particular part of the Treaty that the thirty-two signatories decided that it was proper to allow this representation to her. And, while I cannot say what were the motives of all those thirty-two nations, I believe it was considered desirable that at the initiation of the League the representation on its council should not be confined absolutely to the allied and associated powers. It was conceded as a courtesy, if you will, but at all events it was thought desirable, to include a nation which was not one of the allied or associated powers. I can only suggest that as being among the motives that may have impelled the thirty-two nations to that decision. Twenty-seven of those thirty-two nations being the nations who, when the League would come into operation, would be entitled to elect the four other members, thought proper to include among the four one nation who would become a member by acceding to the Covenant. All of the nations are yet to become members, some merely by ratification of the Treaty, and others by acceptance of the invitation to come in, and it was in anticipation of their becoming members in one way or the other that the composition of the first council was decided upon.

Mr. KING: The Labour Convention, which forms a part of the Treaty, provides for a general conference of representatives of the members to be held once a year. I understand that the conference has been called to take place at Washington next week. But there is a report to the effect that as the United States is not yet a member of the League of Nations this conference may not be held. As the Government is sending delegates to the conference, may I ask the minister if it has any information as to the exact situation?

Mr. SPEAKER: I must remind the House that under the rules hon. members are limited to one speech on this motion. The Minister of Justice has already made two, and I think it might perhaps be well, in order to adhere closely to the rules, that information in regard to points raised by hon. members be reserved by the minister until he exercises his right to close the debate.

Mr. ROWELL: I rise, Mr. Speaker, simply to answer the question of my hon. friend in reference to the position of the International Labour Conference. That conference is officially called to meet on the 29th of this month—that is to say, on Wednesday next—at noon, in Washington, and it will meet pursuant to that call. But whether it will be able to proceed with the consideration of the matters mentioned in the agenda for the conference is a question which will not be known until the conference meets. So far as I am aware, the Treaty with Germany has not yet been ratified by the three powers necessary to bring it into operation. The Treaty is not yet in effect. It may go into effect before the conference meets or on the following day. I have no knowledge in that respect other than the intimation, which appeared in the press recently, that the Treaty was likely to be ratified and go into effect about that date. Notice has been issued by the Secretary of Labour of the United States intimating that it might be necessary to adjourn the conference in view of the fact that the United States had not yet ratified the Treaty, and therefore was not in a position to take part in the conference.

Many of the delegates have arrived in the United States from foreign countries. I believe the British, the Spanish, and Japanese delegates, as well as the delegates from a number of other nations have already arrived in Washington for the work of the conference. It is a matter worthy of consideration that Canada takes part in the conference as one of the original members thereof and with the same status as all the other members of the conference. The Government in this case, pursuant to the provisions of the convention, has asked the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, as being the largest group of employers of labour in Canada, to name a delegate representing the employers, and has asked the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, as being the largest organization representing organized labour, to name the labour representative to the conference. These bodies have named their representatives, and the advisers have also been named as provided for under the terms of the convention.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: When the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) ten days ago asked the House to concur in certain amendments to Bill No. 3 made by the Senate, he explained that he did so because it would make unnecessary the submission of the Austrian Treaty separately to the House. As I understood him at the time, and my understanding is confirmed by reference to Hansard, which under the rules of the House I believe I am not allowed to quote, that was the ground on which the House, at the hon. gentleman's request, concurred in these amendments. That being the case, I desire to know whether the proceeding which the hon. gentleman has submitted to the House by his motion is necessary.

Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps I might state now if it is in order——

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Mr. Speaker, I did not anticipate that we should be asked this day to consider a matter the importance of which is as great as that of some of the measures which have been discussed within the last ten days in this House. Had I expected that this question would be brought up this evening I should have prepared for the occasion. I find myself obliged to speak extemporaneously on a subject of international importance. We were called together at this time of the year to approve of the Peace Treaty and the League of Nations, on both of which I have already spoken. Only to-day did I receive the blue-book on the subject of the Austrian Treaty, and by no means did I expect at this sitting of the House, when the representatives of the two adjacent provinces should be at home spending the week end, that this Treaty would be brought up for confirmation.

It is true that I am not a politician and I do not know all the devious ways by which the members of this Government may work to their ends, but that this Government should ratify, or confirm, or approve of the Austrian Treaty with the Allied Powers on the basis of what has already been said in the House with reference to the Treaty between the Allied Powers and Germany is difficult to understand. It is going absolutely too far because the conditions which obtain in one case are not the conditions that obtain in the other.

It is true that it is said by the Government in answer to a question by the Opposition, that what obtained in one case obtained in the other except as to territorial limitation. I am not satisfied that that is correct because I have not had the opportunity to read the blue-book which was sent to me through the mail to-day, and which I only received at three o'clock. But at any rate you have the question of Poland to consider in the Austrian Treaty, you have the question of Galicia to consider in the Treaty between Austria and the Allied Powers, you have many and varied questions. Is this Government so devoid of a sense of responsibility that it must, on a Friday evening, when there is not sufficient representation on the Opposition side or on the Government side, undertake to deal with a matter of international importance in this manner?

For instance, we have had questions put in this House by hon. members on this side of the House as to whether or not Poland guaranteed the liberty of the Ukranians in Galicia both as to their religion and as to their civil rights. We received the assurance from the members of the Government that these had been guaranteed. But it is only within the last few days that I had a message from certain Ukranians in the western provinces which I transferred to the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty). I understand from the Minister of Justice that a cablegram has been sent overseas dealing with this question but no answer has been received yet as far as I know. There is also the question as to whether or not the Ukranians in Galicia will be given a plebiscite in order to determine whether they shall remain Poles or whether they shall remain Ukranians and form part of the great republic which has been already declared in the southern portion of Russia. We are now asked to ratify, confirm or approve of the Treaty between the Allied Powers and Austria. My hon. friend from George-Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) has repeatedly brought the question up in the House as to the foreign population in Canada—and let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I have absolutely no sympathy with the foreign population in Canada where they have shown no proper desire to serve their adopted country.

9 p.m.

I am quite in sympathy with the policy which has been enunciated by this Government, that that part of our foreign population which has not shown a desire to become assimilated should be deported. But there is also another policy which I believe in—the policy to conserve and improve that which we have acquired. This Government and its predecessors have spent thousands, if not millions, of dollars to bring immigrants to our shores, and it is therefore the business of the Government of the day to see that these newcomers acquire our own ideas and become good Canadian citizens, rather than to talk of deporting them to their native land, where conditions are worse than we have even thought of. Instead of presenting a Bill of this importance to a depleted House, I submit the Government should have deferred its consideration until the members absent over the week-end returned, in order that it might be thoroughly discussed.

Furthermore, in relation to Poland and Galicia, I wish to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) if it is not true that during the war the Polish Council in Ontario had the ear and the confidence of this Government as to who should and who should not go overseas with our Expeditionary Force; if it is not true that this Government did receive the assistance of this Polish Council in that very regard; and if it is not true that this Government, while accepting the recommendations of this Polish Council, permitted it to take an affidavit from each and every individual who volunteered for service overseas that he owed fealty to Poland rather than to this country? What right has Poland to interfere in the business of Canada until the terms of the Treaty of Peace have been settled? What right had this Government to permit the Polish Council in Ontario to take affidavits of that character? There is no question about that—it is true. I have seen the affidavits. I have also been requested to ask the Government whether or not this Polish Council was allowed to deal with Austrian cases, and I have submitted the whole matter to the Government. Why, for instance, should 80,000 Galician Jews now in this country be requested to swear that they are Poles, and threatened that if they do not do so they will be deported or prosecuted? Why should Poland be given the right to dominate Galicia by simply declaring that the predominant element in the population is Polish?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing to agree that Canada is not a nation. We have had a great deal of discussion on this point, which I do not intend to repeat, but no matter what may be the sophistical arguments advanced in favour of the contention that Canada is a nation, I assert that Canada is not a nation. In connection with any conference which may be convened in the near future with regard to preserving the peace of the world, I would ask any hon. member this question: Does Canada represent any such principle of general interest as may compel the great powers of Europe —and the great power of America for that matter—to consider that we have a right to demand any particular remedy? If we are a nation then we must present a status of equality before the eyes of the world. This is denied us by the American nation; it is denied us by Britain; it is denied us by France—in a word, it is denied us by all the associated powers who had anything to say in the Peace Conference, or who may have anything to say in the League of Nations. Why should we this evening, with so few members present, be called upon to approve a Treaty of Peace between Austria and the Allied Powers without taking into full consideration with those powers all the circumstances and all the facts of this Treaty? We talk about acquiring the Grand Trunk Pacific, we talk about prohibition and the transfer of Federal rights to the provinces —these are as nothing compared with what the Canadian nation is going to do as one of the great world powers which are going to keep the peace upon earth. And yet I find myself suddenly confronted by a resolution of the Government brought forward at 9.15 on a Friday evening, when most of the Opposition members have gone to Quebec and Ontario over the week-end.

An hon. MEMBER: There is not much over there.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: It is true that there is not much over there, I agree, both in the metaphorical and the literal sense; but there is less on this side—in both senses. I wish the co-operation of the House this evening in my request that this matter shall stand over until we have had an opportunity to study this Blue Book.

I have been flattered by the extent to which our chevelure has been ruffled with pride in the very thought that Canada shall take its place among the nations. It has been difficult for me at times to comb my hair down in the mornings, with all the lotions that I like to apply, as I think of the tremendous position that Canada is to take among the nations of the world in preserving the peace of the world. But when we come down to actual facts—and I am making no academic speech this evening; I am speaking extemporaneously—we find difficulties for which we have not been prepared and it becomes necessary for us to protest, and I do so with all respect. I am a supporter of the Government—and may I always be permitted to support it rather than support the weak Opposition which we have across the floor of the House. But when I am called upon to support this Government I find these difficulties, and I make this protest with all respect to the ministers of the Crown and with all due deference to their opinions, because I quite realize that the Minister of Justice sat on this Peace Conference; that he on one day represented the British Isles and on the other day represented the Canadian Government; that he on one day was imperialistic and on the other was—may I say?—colonial, with apologies to you gentlemen on the other side, because you do not believe that we are colonials yet. Why should I on this occasion take exception to the opinions of these gentlemen who were sent overseas for the purpose of representing us and who understand these questions a great deal better than we do? It seems rather presumptuous, and I feel somewhat inclined to offer my apology for the protest which I raise this evening. But I would not be doing my duty as a member of this Parliament or as a citizen of this Dominion, having regard to the interest which I have in the whole of Canada as well as in my particular constituency, did I not register my protest when we are asked in these particular hours, on a Friday evening, to ratify and confirm and approve a treaty which deals with manifold nations such as the Czecho-Slovaks and the other Slovaks that we have heard so much about in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I do apologize for giving this much pleasure to the Opposition—because I know that I am giving them much satisfaction this evening. It is one of the rare occasions on which I afford them the pleasure which they now experience. But I must also be fair to them and say that if it does give them pleasure this evening that I should express my views on this subject as I do, nevertheless I believe that I am right and correct, and whenever the Opposition are right and correct I shall be pleased to support them.

I would like to ask the Minister of Justice, before this resolution goes further, whether it is the intention of the Dominion Government to take exception to the action of the Allied Powers with regard to the distribution of the assets of Europe among the various nationalities as they have been conceived, so far as we have been advised by the press and by this Government? Has he given full information to this House as to what is the territorial limit of the various nationalities? Has he given full information to this House at any time, or has any minister of the Crown given full information to the House, of what may be the territorial limits in that part of Europe which we have not dealt with up to the present time? I am free to say that if such information has been given it was when I was absent from the House. Has the Minister of Justice or has any minister who represented Canada at the Peace Conference told us what the principles were upon which we may insist that Roumania, for instance, shall be tolerant to the various denominations so far as their religious beliefs are concerned? Have we received any information as to the principle upon which Galicia is not going to be safeguarded in its religious belief? Have we received any information as to why all nations should not respect the religious beliefs of all others? If the League of Nations is going to make good and is going to preserve the peace of the world, why do we find one nation compelled, and some nations not compelled, to respect the religious beliefs of others? We have not heard why there is not a general clause in the Treaty making it obligatory upon all nations of the world to respect the rights of minorities and to respect the religious beliefs of all nations.

Why are we called upon at this hour, on Friday night I repeat, when I wanted to be at the picture show, to approve of this important treaty? I was told when I came to this House that I must abandon my radical views. I have. I was told that legislation meant compromise. I believe it is true. No farming community in the West can come here and expect that they can impose their views upon the rest of Canada; no labour faction can come from any part of Canada and impose their views upon the whole country. At the same time, we are entitled to receive some information from those who presume that they can dictate from the front benches of the House what shall obtain in Canada, America and the world at large.

We are entitled to be informed on the subject matter of the resolution that is before the House. We have had a great deal of discussion in this House on the War-time Elections Act. I can see my hon. friend from Cape Breton already curling his moustache above the smile. I can see others who are simply chloroformed under the very idea that there was such an Act and are almost sound asleep; may we not disturb them. I can see others who are prepared to approve or disapprove of the Act, no matter what may be the consensus of opinion throughout Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope that the hon. member will bring his remarks to bear more closely on the subject that is before the House; he is going very far afield.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to go further away than I should go; I had intended from the reference which I made to draw a conclusion which would come more closely to the subject. However, I accede to your request, and say this: The resolution before the House is one that should receive the greatest possible consideration; one that is more important than the passing of a Grand Trunk Railway Bill; one that is more important to the national life of this Dominion of Canada than any Bill that has been presented; and we are asked in the hours of a Friday evening to pass a matter which, if properly debated, should occupy several weeks, in order to ascertain the proper information upon which the conclusions are reached in this resolution, in order to acertain the true state of affairs in Europe about which we are legislating, in order to ascertain how we, as a nation or a colony, are responsible for the terms of these things about which we are to legislate. If these are not more important than free trade; if these are not conditions more important than any other matter that has been before the House, I say that we are not paying very much regard to the consequences of those things upon which we are legislating. It is simple to pass an Act; it is simple to vote upon a resolution; but it is not simple to accept the consequence of our own acts; it is not simple—and I hope I am not wandering far away from the resolution now—that we, as a Canadian people, as a part of the League of Nations, should accept the responsibilities of what may be the voting power within the League of Nations. It is not material to you, Sir, and to me, whether you, I, your children or mine, shall participate in the future wars of this world without being consulted, simply on the declaration that "when Great Britain is at war we are at war." It is not material to you or to me that we should accept all our share of responsibility of what is being done by the League of Nations without having had a voice in the matter or having been consulted. That is what we are doing in this resolution when we approve the terms of this Treaty, without knowing what are the particulars of the Bill or the menu which we are ordering. These are things about which I have a concern. It may be very simple for the Minister of Justice, or the Minister of Customs, or the Minister of Public Works now to say in the House: We have gone; we have come; we have conquered; or we came, we saw and we conquered. It is a very simple thing for these hon. gentlemen paid by the Canadian nation, to perform a duty towards the whole Empire, towards the whole world, to come back and say: This is what we have done. We are entitled to ask them for a bill of particulars. When I was a student at McGill university, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) lectured to me on marriage covenants, I took heed of what he told me in those days, and I have been true to the lessons that he gave me. It is true that I am not going to confess to him all my weaknesses, but what he told me in regard to marriage contracts I have followed religiously in giving advice to others, for which advice I have been paid.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member should give me a commission.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: But I do not accept the dictation of the Minister of Justice as an envoy of the Canadian nation to deal for me in the problems of the world unless he is prepared to show to me that the law that he hands down to me is well founded upon certain commandments or until such time as I find his reasoning is in accordance with the exigencies of the case.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I am very glad that this note of warning comes from the Opposition. I have sat on this side of the House when I have felt in my heart I should shout "carried." I have been sick at hear often times when the Opposition have started, and before they have gone but a few minutes, I have felt that I should have liked to cry "carried." If they are sickened as much as I have been at times of their oratory, I shall be pleased to take my seat.

Mr. DOHERTY: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the Minister of Justice exercises his right to reply,I wish to remind hon. members that if any hon. members desire to speak, they should do so now; otherwise, the debate will be closed.

Mr. DOHERTY: I find myself in a somewhat embarrassing position. Whereas I have to meet, coming from in front of me, the reproach that I am asking this House merely to do what it has already done, and that, therefore, my proceeding is absolutely futile, there comes from behind me a very grave arraignment for that I am asking the House, without proper information, and saddest of all on a Friday night, to pass this most important resolution. May I point out, to deal first with the observations of the hon. member (Mr. H. A. Mackie), that he in common with all the members of this House has already expressed approval of those provisions which, if I have followed his arguments of this evening, give rise to most doubt and most desire for information, and indeed in some cases to direct opposition on his part. The hon. gentleman spoke of Poland and objected to our expressing approval of this Treaty until we had further explanations with regard to conditions in that country. May I just point out to him that in this particular Treaty, the one reference to Poland is that Austria says that she accepts the boundaries of Poland as already fixed by the Allied and Associated Powers; that is to say, the boundaries were fixed in the Treaty with Germany which the hon. gentleman has already approved. Furthermore, with regard to his observations in connection with the protection of the rights of minorities in Poland, may I point out to him that he has already approved the Treaty with Poland which has been submitted to this House and in which it is expressly stipulated that Poland shall respect all those very rights to which he has so eloquently referred. With regard to his reference to the Ukrainians, there is nothing in this Treaty that bears upon the provisions in regard to the Ukrainians and more particularly upon what questions may arise between certain Ukrainians, native or former inhabitants, I believe, of Galicia and Poland, and this simply because, as I have said, it is in the other Treaty with which we have already dealt that the boundaries of Poland are fixed, and because we have dealt with a special Treaty which imposes upon Poland that she shall respect the rights of minorities of all classes.

As to the Ukrainians to whom the hon. gentleman refers and in connection with whom—I do not think the matter was very relevant—he arraigns this Government for the line of action it has seen fit to adopt in the past in connection with certain Poles as also in connection with certain Ukrainians in this country, let me very briefly state just exactly what the situation is. The hon. gentleman has referred to a Council of Poles whom he says this Government have recognized and upon whom he seems to conceive that this Government has conferred some power or authority to compel Ukrainians to swear that they are Poles. The situation with regard to that Council is a very simple one indeed. Poles are nationals of an allied power. We had certain restrictions in this country as to freedom of departure from Canada imposed upon alien enemies, and when people came forward and said that they were Poles we found that it was of advantage in the absence of any particular Polish consulate or consul to be able to have their claims verified by people known to be of that nation and in a position to vertify whether they were Poles or not, and we did accept from persons claiming to be Poles, as part of the evidence going to establish that claim —not, however, without further verification in cases where it was called for,—the certificates of this Council to persons known to be Poles and respectable and reliable people. I understand that the complaint of the Ukrainians which the hon. gentleman has voiced has been that they were compelled to swear they were Poles. Now it is only natural that when they went to that Polish Council asking for certificates the Council would say to them "The thing that we undertake to certify is that a man is a Pole or not a Pole. If you are not a Pole we have nothing to do with you." I do not know that they required them all to swear they were Poles, but if they did, it was perhaps not an unnatural thing for a body called upon to certify that a certain individual was a Pole to ask him whether he was willing to swear that he was a Pole.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: What I said was that they were called upon not to swear that they were Poles, but to swear fealty to Poland.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think the hon. gentleman will find himself mistaken in that regard, although I do not say that positively. I do not think it involved the question of swearing allegiance to anybody. Certainly the only question in which we were interested and which could have any relation with that Council was whether the particular individual was a Pole or not. It may be—I am not prepared to say it was not so—that in the process of testing whether a man claiming to be a Pole really was a Pole—and he had no business going to the Council unless he was representing he was a Pole—they called upon him to swear fealty to Poland. Some of these people, and I have had representations from different ones, seem to have misunderstood the situation, and to have supposed that in order to get out of Canada they were having imposed upon them through some sort of governmental authority an obligation to say they were Poles. I have explained just to what extent we were interested in the question whether they were Poles or not, and it was not with any idea of inducing people to swear they were Poles so that they might on false representation get out of the country that anybody would have been asked to make an affidavit. There was a misapprehension on the part of these people who do not readily grasp and understand—and quite naturally—the different regulations to which they were subjected. I may say that on the part of this Government there has been a desire to afford Ukranians who are individually responsible and reliable people and not subject to deportation every means that can be found of enabling them to establish those facts. There certainly has been no desire to discriminate against the Ukrainians. There exists at the present time in the city of Montreal a Ukrainian body to whose certificates with regard to persons claiming to be Ukranians in connection with their respectability and fitness to be allowed to remain in the country great weight is attached by the officers of this Government. Let me assure the hon. gentleman, who, I know, takes great interest in the people of this race, that there is no desire on the part of this Government to discriminate in any way against these people. Of course, for the purpose of assuring ourselves of proper control of persons of alien enemy races within this country it was unavoidable that these people, being, as they were during the course of the war nationals of an enemy country, should be subjected to regulations, but I am quite certain that on the part of this Government in the administration of those regulations both towards Ukranians and people of other races there was no desire to do any injustice or act with any harshness.

With regard to the observations in connection with the treaty which the hon. gentleman made, I think I am safe in saying that the different matters that he adverted to are all of them matters which were covered by the provisions of the treaty with Germany, and he is not being asked, in regard to any matters so far as I can recall them to which he referred, to approve of anything which he has not already approved in approving the German Treaty. He spoke of the obligations of the League of Nations. Let me point out that this Parliament has approved the Covenant of the League of Nations as contained in the German Treaty, and we are not binding ourselves any more now because the Covenant is also found in the Austrian Treaty. It is just the same Covenant, and whatever may be the extent of its obligations we have already assumed them in approving the German Treaty. I feel that I have not taken up seriatim, and very possibly have not done full justice to all the representations made by the hon. gentleman. But I have endeavoured to meet them in a general way at all events, and if I have overlooked any of them I trust he will not consider that it was because of any intentional discourtesy on my part. I would be quite incapable of that. I am very touched by his assurance of his recollection and appreciation of valuable lessons which in earlier days it was my privilege to address to him.

With regard to the question of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) and some observations made by hon. gentlemen opposite, rather reflecting upon the utility of the present proceedings, I am free to admit that perhaps this is not absolutely necessary, but the other day in connection with the amendment which I moved that this House should accept, there was a good deal of criticism, and it was pointed out that it was not absolutely regular, which I concede, to ask the House to confer the powers that were conferred by that amendment, the House not having before it the actual text of the treaty. I think I acknowledged then that it would have been better if the text of the treaty had been before the House, and I supported the suggestion that we accept the amendment upon what seemed to me to be the common sense ground, namely, as the House had already expressed its approval, in the form of the Treaty with Germany, of all the substantial provisions of this treaty. that, subject to the House being willing to accept the assurance of the Government that this Treaty was similar, it would be a commonsense action on the part of a body in that situation, having conferred the powers upon the Governor in Council necessary for the implementing of the German Treaty, to consent to confer the same powers, in so far as they might be required, for the purpose of implementing and carrying out the Austrian Treaty. And, if my memory serves me, I pointed out that that legislation would never come into practical operation unless the Treaty with Austria became binding by its ratification. I then called attention to the assurance which had already been given to the House by the Government, that it would only advise that ratification without coming back to this House if the Treaty, when it reached us, proved to be so identical with the German Treaty that you could not escape the conclusion that a House that had approved the provisions contained in the German Treaty would, consistently with itself, approve the provisions contained in the Austrian Treaty.

But, fortunately or unfortunately, the session has been prolonged until the Treaty has reached us, and now we put it before the House. It was suggested then that there was something irregular in our not having it before the House. Now we have met that suggestion and have put it before the House, and asked the House to approve it. We do that to meet the suggestions I refer to, and to carry out the promise made on the 22nd of September that it would be done. After all, is it a very grave ground of complaint that we should seek, if you will, to make assurance doubly sure? If we have already, in passing the amendment referred to, approved this Treaty, it can do no possible harm that we should now do it formally and precisely with the Treaty before us, if for no other reason than that we should have the approval of the Treaty absolutely regular in form, although the approval of the German Treaty is substantially the approval of the Austrian Treaty.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (East Edmonton): Will the minister permit me two questions? Will Poland allow the Ukrainians in Galicia to determine whether or not they shall remain part of Poland or become part of the Ukrainian Republic? Secondly, when was the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Austria signed? Was it on the 10th day of September, 1919, and was a copy submitted to this Parliament? Further what opportunity has this House had of considering the same?

Mr. DOHERTY: With regard to what Poland may do or may be compelled to do in connection with the position of the Ukrainians in Galicia, I may point out again that the question does not arise under the present Treaty with Austria, and perhaps, if the hon. member will reflect a moment, he will realize why. It is a question between the Ukrainian population of Galicia, and Poland; it is not a question between Austria and the Allied and Associated Powers. As to whether or not the Ukrainian population of that portion of Galicia which is claimed by, if not allotted to, Poland, in the boundaries fixed in the German Treaty, will be entitled to a plebiscite to determine their allegiance, is a question which, so far as my information at the present time goes, is not yet determined. It is still pending before the Council. As to the question when the copies of the Treaty were distributed, if I am correctly informed, the Treaty was laid on the table of this House some four days ago. I understood that the Treaty was to be distributed yesterday, but the particular hour at which it reached the members I am not prepared to say.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Three o'clock this afternoon. Now, may I ask another question, or at least, may I be permitted to correct an impression which has been given to the House by the minister?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will not be in order. He has already exhausted his right to speak and the minister has spoken three times.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I do not wish to make a speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister is quite capable of giving correctly any impression he desires to convey to the House.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: With the permission of the Minister of Justice, may I correct the impression he gave the House?

Mr. SPEAKER: The Minister of Justice cannot give permission for the rules of the House to be broken.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I do not wish to break the rules of the House, Sir.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKIE: But if I may be permitted—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKIE: May I address the Chair?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order; the hon. member has already spoken.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY: Mr. Speaker, I beg to move:

That a message be sent to the Senate to inform Their Honours that this House has passed the following resolution:—

"Resolved by the House of Commons,

That it is expedient that Parliament do approve of the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Austria, signed at St. Germain on the tenth day of September, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, a copy of which has been laid before Parliament, and which was signed on behalf of His Majesty, acting for Canada, by the plenipotentiaries therein named, and that this House do approve of the same."

and requesting that Their Honours will unite with this House House in the said resolution by filling up the blank therein with the words "Senate and."

Motion agreed to.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: May I ask a question, Mr. Speaker? Is it not competent for a member of Parliament to rectify an impression created in the House, that he has said something which as a matter of fact he has not said? Is it possible under any circumstances for a member to correct such an impression?

Mr. SPEAKER: As a matter of courtesy it is quite competent for an hon. member, by leave of the Chair and of the House, to correct an impression that has been falsely gathered in respect of something that he may have said himself. But it is not competent for him to correct an impression which some other member may have created.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Mr. Speaker, I wish to correct an impression which has been given this evening about that which I am alleged to have said but may not have said. May I correct that impression?

Mr. SPEAKER: I very much regret the hon. gentleman would not be in order in doing so now because the occasion on which he could have made his correction, if he had desired to do so, has passed. The motion has been carried.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: If I have the right to do it on a following occasion may I do it now?

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no subject before the House.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. CHARLES DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 30 to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: If I remember correctly the explanation the minister gave it was that this amendment is simply for the purpose of extending the power to the Exchequer Court to deal with some international questions which may have arisen out of war difficulties. If that is the case we have no objection to it.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is all.

Motion agreed and Bill read the second time, considered in Committee and read the third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT 1918—AMENDMENT.

SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS AND ASSISTANT POSTMASTERS.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 31 to amend the Civil Service Act, 1918, with respect to the salaries of certain postmasters and assistant postmasters.—Hon. A. K. Maclean.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—revenue from war stamps not to be included in postage collections when determining salaries of city and assistant city postmasters:

Mr. McKENZIE: What is this?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend (Mr. A. K. Maclean) gave a very full explanation on the second reading of the Bill. I can give any further information that is desired. The object of the Bill is to continue the right which has been given under certain Orders in Council, passed under the War Measures Act, to exclude from the salaries of city postmasters who are entitled to be paid a percentage of the receipts from the sale of stamps, the additional amount which it is figured they would have received on account of the war stamp tax. If they sold a two cent stamp before they now sell a three cent stamp; if they sold a one cent stamp before they now sell a two cent stamp. It was not considered just that the salary should be increased by the percentage derived from the sale of stamps the proceeds of which were intended purely for war purposes. This has been in force since the War Measures Act was passed, and by Order in Council, and it is simply to continue it.

Mr. McKENZIE: One difficulty about this is that it is practically impossible to carry it out except by sheer guesswork. It is not desirable to be dealing with a man's property by guesswork. The salary that a man earns by selling postage stamps and attending to his business in the post office is his property just as much as his house or his horse, and it is a part of the constitution—too old indeed to be mentioning it now—that no British subject shall be affected in his property or rights of any kind except by due process in a court of law. This salary which he earns is his property. We are going to pass an arbitrary Act in this Parliament, which is not a court of law in which this man can give evidence and with no machinery provided to enable him to give any explanation or testimony about his rights in this matter, authorizing some person to say "This is all you are to have; the rest of your earnings go to the Crown." I think this is a most arbitrary piece of legislation. Besides, it is extremely difficult to know where the line should be drawn. It was suggested at the time this law came into force that there should be a special stamp for war purposes and ordinary stamps for ordinary postal purposes. It was promised at that time that if we would agree to allow the ordinary stamps to be used promiscuously a special stamp would be provided. But things went on and it was never done; the postage stamps were used for other purposes. I think that it is better in the interest of fair play and in the interest of the country that things should be left as they are. If postmasters, by reason of this laxity got a few dollars extra—it will not be very much —I do not think it is worth 10 p.m. while to create many sore hearts, a great deal of disappointment and irritation by starting out now to correct what was possibly a mistake. Take the case of the banks; they buy an enormous number of stamps. The banks use a great many postage stamps in their ordinary business. They have to use stamps on all their cheques, notes and drafts. They buy these stamps but the post office does not lose the two cents nor do the banks; the man who cashes the cheque pays for the two cents stamp. The postmaster sells these stamps, but how is anybody going to tell how many stamps went on bills, notes and cheques and how many were used in the bank for ordinary mailing purposes? It is absolutely impossible; there is no account kept. A sheet of stamps comes into the bank and these stamps are used right and left as they are required. There is no attempt made to discriminate between those that go on letters and those that go on the cheques that are cashed for the customers of the bank.

Those are the reasons why I think the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) and the Government should test it before imposing this power and duty—which I am sure no one wants—upon any one to divide this money equitably between the Government and the postmasters. Therefore I think it would be very much better to leave matters as they are rather than bother with this legislation.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I was under the impression that this Bill would not come up until next week; in fact, I was so informed by the minister (Mr. Maclean) who was originally in charge of it.

Mr. ROWELL: If either the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) or I had been aware of that understanding we would not have taken action. We are endeavouring to dispose of as many Bills to-night as possible. If there is any understanding with the minister (Mr. Maclean) that the Bill should stand over, of course, I do not wish to proceed with it.

Mr. McQUARRIE: He told me that it would not be proceeded with until he came back. I had some further remarks which I would like to make in connection with the Bill, but I do not care to deal with the matter when he is not here. For instance, he promised to give me information in reply to certain questions which I was not permitted to ask on the second reading. I presume that when he is here he will be prepared to give me that information.

Mr. FIELDING: Is the Bill intended to be retroactive?

Mr. ROWELL: No. This is the present situation, regarding which my hon. friend the member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) is under some slight misapprehension. The Government did pass an Order in Council under the War Measures Act fixing the percentage which should be considered as the proceeds of the war stamps from which the postmasters should not receive any return—my recollection is that it was 28 per cent, but I speak subject to correction—and that their salary should be computed on the basis of 72 per cent. As I understand it, the department in fixing that 28 per cent made the best estimate that was possible. Of course, I agree with my hon. friend that you cannot fix the percentage with exactitude; but I am quite sure that the Post Office Department thought that in the percentage they fixed they were not taking any advantage of the postmasters, but were giving them the full measure of the proceeds of sale so far as the former postage would apply. My hon. friend will see that on three-cent stamps it would be a third, on two-cent stamps a half, and on war stamps the whole amount. Now, the object of this Bill is simply to continue in the Postmaster General the power to do what has been done until the new classification under the Civil Service Act goes into effect in April, 1920, when the scale of payment is fixed on a different basis.

With reference to my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie), if he would discuss his point on the third reading, it would enable us to advance the Bill a stage; but in view of his understanding with the minister I certainly shall not press on the Bill now.

Progress reported.

HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AMENDMENT.

AMENDMENT AS TO DELAY FOR BY-ELECTIONS AND DECLARING POLLING DAYS PUBLIC HOLIDAYS.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: With the permission of the House, I move that we proceed with the order of Public Bills and Orders. The purpose is to take up a Bill introduced by the member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) to amend the House of Commons Act, and to provide that polling days at elections shall be public holidays. I notice the hon. member is not present. I may say that the Bill, having passed through the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, has come back in an amended form, which is acceptable both to the hon. member who introduced the Bill and to the Government. I promised him that I would give the Bill an opportunity of being passed at the present session, and as the hon. member introducing the Bill and the Government are in agreement to accept the Bill as amended, subject to a slight alteration to which the hon. gentleman has also agreed, I would like an opportunity of redeeming my promise to him, even though he be absent.

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee on Bill No. 9, to amend the House of Commons Act, and to provide that polling days at elections shall be public holidays—Mr. Jacobs—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: There are several amendments to the Bill and I will read them.

Mr. COPP: I rise to state, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member who is in charge of the Bill received a telegram after six o'clock requesting his presence in Montreal. He asked me to say that in so far as he is concerned he is quite willing that the Bill should go through as amended, but that the hon. member for West Kent (Mr. McCoig) desired to move an amendment. He, however, I find has left for Toronto. I make this announcement for the information of the House; I do not know whether the Bill will be proceeded with or not.

Mr. DOHERTY: Would it not be possible for the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig), if he desires to press his amendment, to move on the third reading to send the Bill back to the committee for that purpose? In the meantime we could proceed on that understanding.

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 1 of the Bill as reported by the special committee reads as follows:

1. The House of Commons Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, Chapter 11, is amended by inserting the following sections immediately after section eleven:—

11A. In the event of a vacancy occurring by reason of the death of any member or by reason of his accepting any office a writ shall be issued within six months after the receipt by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery of the warrant for the issue of a new writ for the election of a member of the House of Commons.

Provided, however, that this section shall not apply where the vacancy in respect of which the warrant has issued occurs within six months of the expiry of the time limited for the duration of the House of Commons, or if Parliament is dissolved after the issue of a new writ hereunder such writ shall thereupon be deemed to have been superseded and withdrawn.

11B. No person shall be eligible as a candidate for election as a member of the House of Commons in more than one electoral district at the same time, and no person shall be nominated or consent to be nominated so as to be a candidate for more than one electoral district at the same time, and if any person is so nominated for more than one electoral district and consents thereto all such nominations shall be null and void.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it the intention of this Bill that if a man is nominated in two places both nominations shall be void?

Mr. DOHERTY: The intention is that all nominations consented to by the nominee, wherever a man is nominated for more than one constituency, shall be void. If a gentleman, by consenting to be nominated in two places, seeks to obtain a nomination which under this law would be illegal, both nominations shall be void. Of course, generally speaking, nominations without the consent of the candidate are void for want of that consent. But there is an amendment which I desire to suggest to 11B, and which has been accepted by the member (Mr. Jacobs) who introduced the Bill. I move to amend paragraph 11B by striking out all the words preceding the words "no person" in the third line thereof and by substituting the word "and" for the word "or" in the fourth line. It did not seem fair that a man's absence, he being not in a position to control the thing, his election should be rendered impossible simply because he was nominated in two places. It was pointed out to me—in my innocence I would never have thought of it—that if the nomination of a man in two places made all nominations void his friends and supporters might nominate him in a constituency in which they had every expectation that he would be elected and his opponents could prevent his even having a chance of being elected organizing to get somebody to nominate him in some other constituency. That is a possibility which, I think, should not be created. In the certainly exceptional case where it will happen both that a man is absent from the country and that he is nominated in more than one constituency, he may be elected for more than one constituency. If that does happen, the case is covered by the present provision of the law requiring him to make option, because that provision is not repealed. It is in order to avoid the possibility of an absent man being absolutely debarred from election by the mere fact of his absence and of his being nominated in more than one place unknown to himself that I have moved to strike out these words:

No person shall be eligible as a candidate in more than one electoral district at the same time.

Then the section goes on to provide that where nomination is made and consented to by any person for more than one place, all such nominations shall be void. But the effect of the first words which I have moved to strike out is, without reference to whether the person consents or does not consent, without reference to whether he is absent or present, to declare a person absolutely ineligible as a candidate—not ineligible as a member, but even as a candidate—in more than one electoral district at the same time; the mere fact of nomination for two places would, therefore, render a man ineligible as a candidate in either. It did seem to me, and the member for George Etienne Cartier quite agreed with me, that that would be a desirable result to produce. But the great bulk of cases are the cases of men who are at home and whose consent is necessary to their nomination; and with regard to them we shall be ensuring that in the future no man will be elected for more than one constituency.

Mr. FIELDING: In the case of nominations of that exceptional character to which the minister has referred, owing to the absence of the candidate, two nominations might be legal?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: And if a man attaches importance to running in two constituencies can he evade this law by simply going away?

Mr. DOHERTY: That, perhaps, is a possible thing.

Mr. FIELDING: It is more than possible if he attaches importance to running in two constituencies.

Mr. DOHERTY: I should be glad to devise a law that it would be impossible to evade. At all events, I think the effect of this law will be to reduce to the lowest possible degree the probability of our having people elected for more than one constituency. The men who are likely to be nominated for more than one constituency are usually men of prominence in one or the other of the two great parties, men who would not care or who would not think it necessary to run away from the country for that purpose; while such an evasion is possible, I confess that I cannot devise a method of rendering this law absolutely iron-clad.

I may say that the Solicitor General and myself gave some considerable time to trying to devise a system that would be absolutely perfect and render evasions impossible, and I am assured that the Committee on Privileges and Elections likewise devoted considerable time to the same purpose, but that they arrived at the conclusion that they could not find a way to make it an absolute certainty that nobody would ever be elected for more than one constituency. This provision, so far as it goes, diminishes very materially the probability of that happening, and it is, so far as it goes, a distinct improvement to the law. Possibly as time goes on somebody may discover a method of further extending it so as to make it absolutely proof against evasion.

Mr. FIELDING: Had the committee under consideration the expediency of making the voting absolutely simultaneous in the case of a number of vacancies occurring at the same time?

Mr. DOHERTY: I was not a member of the committee, and I am not in a position to say whether that matter was considered or not. I do not think that question was dealt with in the Bill that was considered by the committee, and it is not impossible that it might have been overlooked.

Mr. DAVIS: Not having before me a copy of the Bill as amended, what I may have to say may be irrelevant; but dealing with the point which the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has raised, that a man has only to leave the country to make himself eligible for two or more nominations, could not that be rectified by providing that he shall be held to be nominated in that constituency which stands in the highest alphabetical order, and that, say twenty-four hours being allowed, his other nomination shall be dropped; that he shall be considered not legally nominated in any of the others?

Mr. DOHERTY: The effect of doing that would be to assure to that man who went out of the country for the purpose that he would be nominated in at least one constituency. It would be a better way to deal with the matter, if that were a practical way, by some provision that if any person leaves the country for that purpose, his nomination shall be void, but I realize the difficulty of making proof of that. It is true that we might do what the hon. gentleman suggests; but if we did it, we would be depriving a constituency of the privilege of nominating a man who might be bona fide absent. If we provided that where a man being absent is nominated for more than one constituency, his nomination shall stand good in that which is in the highest alphabetical order, all that his opponents will have to do when they find out that he is going to be nominated in a constituency that begins with "Z," will be to nominate him in another constituency the name of which begins with a higher letter and in which they know for an absolute certainty that he has not a ghost of a chance of being elected. Then, if we adopt the amendment suggested, he will be a candidate in that place that begins with the highest alphabetical letter, and he will be effectively and assuredly defeated. I realize that it will still be possible under this measure, by people who are willing to resort to contrivances of that kind, that a man may worm himself into two seats in this House, but it will not be as it is to-day with the door wide open for any man who wants to take the chances and who can get twenty-five people in each of two constituencies to nominate him, to try to get into the House. I think the hon. gentleman will realize the force of what I point out, that if you choose a constituency for that man, you make it possible for his adversaries to select that constituency for him.

Mr. DENIS: I am finding it very hard to understand just where we are at now. All that there is for the convenience of the members is the Bill as originally drafted, and this Bill has been amended in such a way that clause 1 as originally drafted has been practically all changed. I understand that the Minister of Justice has moved an amendment to that clause as amended. Personally I have only a vague understanding of the Bill. No hon. member can reasonably be expected to carry the terms of this Bill in his memory. Without the Bill before us it is hard for us to understand what is going on. We cannot legislate looking in the skies. I would suggest that the Committee rise and that the Bill be reprinted as amended, or that some copies should be provided for the members.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Bill is really not a Government measure, and it is not in my charge. I am endeavouring to put it through this evening because the Bill as amended seems to be a very desirable measure and because I had agreed with the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier that he would have an opportunity of passing it. Hon. gentlemen may remember that at one time in the early part of the session there was an adjournment of the debate, and I think some hon. gentlemen were good enough to take it for granted that there was some desire because of that to shelve the Bill. On the contrary, the principle that underlies the Bill seemed to myself and the Government to be sound, and we were desirous that, subject to its being amended in certain details, it should have an opportunity of passing, and that is the reason why I am endeavouring to pass it now that an opportunity presents itself. As to the hon. gentleman fully grasping it, the measure coming before us as amended is reduced to such very small compass and is in the terms so little difficult of comprehension that if the Chairman would be good enough to read the Bill, I think the hon. gentleman would follow it without difficulty.

Mr. McKENZIE: Before the Bill is read for the information of members, I am afraid that this taking away the right of running in more than one constituency is going to create a good deal of trouble. As the election laws stand now, there is no provision for the holding of a poll until two contending parties are nominated, and then there is a poll. Supposing, for instance, that two nominations are made in violation of this measure. They are two illegal nominations. One constituency does not know that the man is nominated elsewhere, perhaps a hundred miles away, and both elections are held. The election of the man who has put in his nominations improperly is void; he was never nominated. But supposing that in both cases he is defeated, it strikes me as a nice question of law if the other man is elected at all even if he gets a majority of votes, because it is perhaps an illegal poll where there was only one legal nomination.

Mr. DOHERTY: The reason why it would be an illegal poll, if it really were so held, would be that only one man had been legally and regularly nominated and that there should not have been a poll at all; but the consequence of the fact that there should not have been a poll at all is that the one man, being the only man legally nominated, would be declared elected.

So you have no complication in the case where it is the adversary of the illegally nominated man who is declared elected. You have, of course, the unfortunate circumstance that an expensive election has been held when it was not necessary. Might I ask the hon. gentleman, does he think it is a probable thing in Canada, does he even think it is a possible thing, that a man should be nominated in two constituencies and that the election should go on and that in those two constituencies nobody should know that that man was nominated in another constituency? Really, it seems to me hardly possible. At election time our newspapers from one end of the country to the other contain lists the day after nomination of the people nominated in all the constituencies. After all, during an election people are pretty alert to ascertain who is the man that has been nominated on the other side, and I do not think we are running a very serious risk that elections will go on with a man nominated for more than one constituency and that the two constituencies for which he is standing will be quite ignorant of that fact, and will go on and hold the election and vote for the man who is nominated in both places. It might happen, but I think we would all be very much surprised if it did.

Mr. McKENZIE: If there is only one person nominated the returning officer can declare him elected. If two men are nominated, one of them illegally and the other properly, he declares a poll; that is his duty. He cannot recall anything he has done and the election goes on. An hour after he has declared a poll he may discover that one of the candidates has been illegally nominated and that he never should have declared a poll, but he is absolutely powerless. He cannot declare that the candidate is elected any more than he can recall his having granted a poll. There is no machinery, so far as I know, to declare the man elected who was legally nominated and who received the majority of the votes.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not the statute before me, but I am inclined to think the hon. gentleman is right in his suggestion that there is no provision for declaring the man legally nominated in such a case to have been elected, but I think I can say without hesitation that in a case of that kind it would be perfectly possible for the man who was the only one legally nominated, if he would take the pains, to give the necessary publicity to the fact of the illegality and nullity of the other man's nomination to claim the seat, whatever was the result of the voting.

Mr. McKENZIE: That would have to be by petition.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. But if the man legally nominated got the majority of votes, I do not think anybody would make a petition to unseat him on the ground that the votes given for him were not regularly taken because of the fact that his adversary was not regularly nominated. I think a man who came petitioning on that ground would be asked at the very threshold "What is your grievance? Do you who were illegally nominated feel aggrieved because the only man legally nominated has been declared to have a majority of the votes?" The legally nominated man would be doubly entitled to the seat in such a case. He would be entitled to it because he was the only legally nominated man, though the returning officer was not in a position to declare it; but the court would be in a position to declare it.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would be very sorry to put a man to that trouble.

Mr. DOHERTY: I doubt if there is anybody who would be willing to deposit $1,000 as security for an election petition the foundation whereof was that he or the candidate whom he supported, and for whose failure to be elected he is aggrieved, never had the right to be voted for at all. If anybody is so foolish as to spend $1,000 in support of a petition based on those grounds I think it would be a good thing for the gentleman who happened to defend the man declared elected, because he would have security for the costs and would get them paid, and would have no difficulty in defending the seat. I do not think there is much danger of anybody launching a contestation on that ground.

Mr. PROULX: I see that the provision with regard to the six months does not apply when a member resigns his seat, but only in the case of his death or acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that the reason which led the committee to exclude that case was that in their judgment it was not desirable that an individual member should have it in his power to force an election in his particular constituency at any time that he might feel like having it done. The purpose of the provision is to withdraw from the Governor in Council the power which, I think, from time immemorial he has enjoyed of fixing, or failing to fix, the date of an election when vacancies occur. I think there have sometimes been, perhaps under all governments, what might be described as abuses of that power, too long a period being allowed to elapse without the writ being issued. The clause as reported by the committee provides that in cases other than those mentioned there shall be an absolute time limit within which the writ must be issued. In the judgment of the committee it was thought desirable not to put in the hands of every member representing a constituency the opportunity of forcing an election in that constituency at any moment he might think was a good time to bring on that election. If he thinks he ought to resign he is free to resign, but he ought not by his resignation to be able to determine that there shall be a new election in that constituency within a period fixed by statute, whether the public interest be or be not served by holding the election at that particular time.

Mr. PROULX: If a member were appointed to an office under the Crown and the Government did not want a by-election to be held in his constituency, he could resign before accepting the office, and then the seat would become vacant by resignation and not by acceptance of office.

Mr. DOHERTY: It would, of course, be a case of vacancy by resignation and this would not apply. That is apparently true. I suppose it is another case where improvement is possible, although we have improved the law.

Mr. FIELDING: In the case of a member resigning, the law would be as at present.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: It would be in the hands of the Government to determine, and I can see some force in the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Proulx). It is not unreasonable to say that a constituency should not be deprived of representation for more than six months, no matter how the vacancy occurs. It is not the interest of the individual but of the constituency, and if we provide that the constituency may remain unrepresented for more than six months we are not making much of an improvement in the situation.

Mr. DOHERTY: We are making an improvement to this extent, that whereas today the period may be indefinite we have now reduced it to a space of six months, not, of course, in the case where a member chooses to resign. Matters will be no worse in that case than they are under the present law. They are not improved; that is to be conceded. I was not a member of the committee that considered this Bill and I do not feel authorized to do more than ask this committee to accept it as it was sent to us. It is true that I did move one amendment, but that was as a result of consultation with the hon. member who introduced the Bill, and with his assent. I would not like to try to extend its provisions further than the committee, with the assent of the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill, thought proper to go.

Mr. FIELDING: I quite appreciate my hon. friend's point in that respect, and I would not like to see the Bill adversely dealt with in the absence of the member who introduced it. But on the particular point to which attention was directed a moment ago, the Bill is open to objection. What seems to have been in the mind of the Committee was entirely the convenience or the possible aims of the individual. But it is a very grave error to exclude a constituency from representation in Parliament for a period of six months or longer, and leave the matter entirely at the dictation of the Government of the day. I share my hon. friend's aversion to changing the Bill in the absence of the member who introduced it, and I think it might remain in committee.

Mr. KING: At the present time there is a by-election in Assiniboia as a consequence of a vacancy which occurred through a member resigning nearly two years ago. That constituency has been without representation for a period now of nearly two years, the Government not having chosen to give the constituents an opportunity to return a member to Parliament. This Act would not alter that condition and would still leave it to the Government to adopt a similar course.

Mr. DOHERTY: In the particular instance the vacancy was attributable, I think, to the fact that the gentleman who held the seat was appointed to an office. If I am correct, that particular case would come under this restriction.

Mr. FIELDING: Unless he resigned before he received the appointment.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is possible the situation might be brought about that way. I have no objection whatever to accepting the suggestion of the hon. member, and I would move that the Committee rise and report progress. I suppose there would be no objection to carrying the amendment I moved.

Mr. FIELDING: I have no objection.

Mr. PROULX: A provision might be made to meet the case of a member resigning to accept office.

Mr. FIELDING: I would suggest that we leave the whole question open.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is desirable that the committee should have an opportunity to think over what means we might devise to ameliorate this condition. So far as this measure goes, it is an improvement, because it does in certain cases take the power out of the hands of the Governor in Council of indefinitely retarding elections, and possibly on greater consideration, there may be some reason for a further modification. I should be glad to have the benefit of the views of the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill, and of consultation with the members of the committee who reported it, before assenting to any change.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is a very good Bill and is a long step to reform. But we are passing a law fixing the period that must elapse between the occurring of the vacancy and the holding of the election, and I do not think there is any good reason why the cause of vacancy should have any bearing on the question at all. The important question is: How long should any constituency be left unrepresented? We have decided that six months is long enough, and I do not see the force of the suggestion that we should take into consideration how the vacancy occurs. The important point is that the constituency shall not be left more than six months without proper steps being taken to give it representation in the House. In one case a man is appointed a judge and the law permits a period of six months before the constituency may be represented. Another man with capricious notions resigns without any conceivable reason, and it is not fair that his constituency should be penalized and left unrepresented simply because of his idiosyncracy.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. DOHERTY: I recognize the force of my hon. friend's contention, but I have already intimated my willingness to let the matter stand.

Amendment agreed to.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. McKENZIE: Can the minister say what will be done on Monday?

Mr. DOHERTY: We shall take up on Monday, I expect, the other Bills on the Order Paper, and then of course there is our old friend the Railway Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: May I remind my hon. friend that the elections are now over in Ontario, and suggest that, everything being pretty well smashed up, we might go on with the Temperance Act?

Mr. DOHERTY: I was not connecting the two things which my hon. friend has mentioned, but I announced to him just a moment ago that there are two Bills on the Order Paper which happen to be Temperance Bills.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Monday, October 27, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

SENATE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill No. 37 for the relief of Frank Thimm.—Mr. Nesbitt.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

INSIDE SERVICE DISMISSALS.

Mr. STEELE:

How many dismissals have been made from the Inside Civil Service since January 1, 1919?

Mr. GUTHRIE: 301.

QUEBEC RIOT CLAIMS.

Mr. PARENT:

1. Have any claims for indemnity been made to the Government by or on behalf of families whose relatives have been killed when the so-called Quebec riots took place in 1918?

2. If so, in what form was or were such claim or claims presented?

3. How many letters, if any, have been addressed or sent to the Government respecting such claims?
4. From whom did such letters come?
5. What is the date of each one?
6. Has the Government given a decision in the matter?
7. If so, what is the nature of it and on what date was it given?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. One claim, that of the widow of Leon Belanger, constable.
2. By letter.
3. Nine.
4. From Jean Marie Guarard and Mme. Veuve Belanger.
5. From Mr. Guarard, November 25, 1918, December 19, 1918, February 8, 1919, March 4 and 14, 1919, April 15, 1919, and May 20, 1919. From Mme. Belanger, February 11, 1919, June 24, 1919, July 31, 1919.
6. Yes.
7. Compassionate allowance voted by Parliament at the First Session of Parliament of 1919, and paid to the widow of Leon Belanger July 21, 1919.

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR TITLES.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton):

Was it the intention of Parliament when passing the resolution dealing with the question of titles of honour and titular distinctions that it would cancel all recommendations which had been made, prior to the passing of the same, in regard to officers serving in Canada?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: Stand.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: May I ask when I may expect an answer to this question?

Mr. DOHERTY: The next time the question is reached.

GOVERNMENT COAL SUPPLY.

Mr. BOYCE:

1. What are the names of the parties who are supplying the coal to the Dominion Government at Ottawa?
2. Is the said coal received from the mines direct by regular coal dealers or by parties not directly engaged in the coal trade?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. W. Lamarre & Company, of Montreal, Quebec; John Heney & Son, of Ottawa, Ontario; Independent Coal Company, of Ottawa, Ontario; Andrew Baille, Limited, Montreal, Quebec; Joseph Dolan & Sons, Ottawa, Ontario.

2. Coal is supplied by dealers directly engaged in the coal trade. It is received direct from the mines by the dealers named.

C.G.S. CHAMPLAIN.

* Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to discontinue the service of the ferry by the C.G.S. Champlain, between Rivière Ouelle wharf, St. Irenee?
2. If so, when?
3. If not, why?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: The present intention is not to discontinue this service, but to make it tri-weekly instead of daily, in conjunction with the proposed service from Murray Bay to Tadousac.

LOTBINIERE AND MEGANTIC RAILWAY.

* Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to buy the Lotbinière and Megantic railway and the Charlevoix and Montmorency railway?
2. If so, when?
3. If not, why?

Hon. J. D. REID:

1. Any intention of the Government in regard to these railways will be made known in due course.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY.

* Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. How many passengers have been carried by the Quebec and Saguenay railway since it has been in operation, from July 1?
2. What have been the net earnings of the Quebec and Saguenay railway since it has been in operation, if any?

Hon. J. D. REID:

1. Thirty-three thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine passengers have been carried on the Quebec and Saguenay railway from August, 1918, to October 1, 1919.

2. Twelve thousand nine hundred and forty-one dollars and sixty-six cents represents the net earnings on the Quebec and Saguenay railway from August, 1918, to the 1st of October, 1919.

RIVIERE OUELLE TRAIN SERVICE.

* Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to discontinue the service of the branch line between Rivière Ouelle junction and Rivière Ouelle wharf?
2. If so, when?
3. If not, why?

Hon. J. D. REID:

1. It is the intention of the management of the railway to discontinue the train service between these two points.
2. Not yet decided.
3. See answers to Nos. 1 and 2.

PETITION FROM J. H. GARAND.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1 Has the Secretary of State received a petition from J. H. Garand asking for the granting of a fiat for the recovery of the sum of $5,000 reward promised by the Government in connection with the attempted blowing up of the residence of Lord Atholstan at Cartierville?
2. Has the request been refused?
3. If so, for what reason?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Because in the opinion of the Minister of Justice it was contrary to good policy, that Mr. Garand, being the manager of the Thiel Detective Agency which was engaged and paid by the Government to detect and apprehend the offenders, should at the same time, be permitted to claim the reward in addition for services for which the agency had already been paid.

ST. FIDELE WHARF.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has the Government received a petition from the inhabitants of St. Fidele, in the county of Charlevoix, P.Q., demanding the construction of certain works at the wharf of said parish?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to do such works?

3. If so, when?

4. If not, why?

Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. The Government has received such a petition.

2, 3 and 4. The petition has been submitted to the Engineering Department and will be considered when its report is received.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. ETHIER:

1. What is the total cost of the classification of the Civil Service as authorized by Parliament, and prepared under the direction of the Civil Service Commission, up to date?

2. What is the total cost of the stationery and printing of the first report made by the so-called experts appointed for that purpose; also the cost of the table of classification and salaries, forming the schedule of the said report already laid before the House by the Civil Service Commission, and which has been rejected and recognized unacceptable?

3. What is the total amount paid to the so-called experts to date, and the number of days that they worked to prepare the said classification of the Civil Service of Canada?

4. What is their salary, by day and by hour?

5. How many clerks were employed by them, and what amount has been paid them to date?

6. Are these so-called experts of British origin or American?

7. If the latter, why has this work been given to American rather than British citizens?

Mr. ETHIER:

1. What are the names of the so-called experts appointed to prepare the classification of the Civil Service, as authorized by Parliament?

2. What was their occupation previous to their appointment for this work?

3. What are their qualifications and experience for doing such work?

4. By whom have they been recommended for such appointment?

[Mr. Lanctot.]

5. Is the Canadian Government aware that the American government rejected the classification of their Civil Service, made by the firm of Arthur Young and Company?

6. Are the so-called experts for the classification of the Canadian Civil Service members of the said firm of Arthur Young and Company?

*Mr. DUFF:

1. During the present year, was a letter written by the President of the Privy Council to the other members of the Government, advising them that the Privy Council, upon the recommendation of the Repatriation Committee, had approved of an agreement being entered into with the Pathescope Company to provide a Canadian Weekly News Film Service for the moving picture theatres of Canada, and that the supervision of this work would be under the Department of Public Information?

2. What were the terms of the agreement entered into with the Pathescope Company, and how much has been paid the company to date?

3. Was any further amount beyond that paid to the Pathescope Company expended by the Department of Public Information in connection with the moving picture business, and if so, how much?

4. At the time the above letter was written by the President of the Privy Council, and the agreement made by him with the Pathescope Company, was there another department of the Government equipped with a moving picture outfit? If so, which department, and what did its moving picture outfit cost?

5. Why was it not authorized to handle the class of work for which the contract was given to the Pathescope Company?

6. When will the contract with the Pathescope Company expire?

7. Is the Pathescope Company located in Toronto? If so, who are its officers and shareholders?

8. Who represented the Pathescope Company in the negotiations with the President of the Privy Council, and by whom was the agreement drawn?

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JAMES ALEXANDER ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), I desire to ask the Government when we may expect an answer to question No. 8, which reads:

What is the amount the Government claims the Grand Trunk Railway system owes them?

In view of the legislation now before the House, it seems to me that this information should be in the hands of the Government and the country.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways): I will try to get the answer this afternoon from the Grand Trunk officials and to answer it next time, but probably I will announce the amount to-day during the discussion.

MINERALS IN NORTHERN MANITOBA; SURVEY RAILWAY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. CAMPBELL (Nelson): In the edition of the Winnipeg Telegram, dated October 23, there is a rather extended article on the front page regarding the mineral resources of northern Manitoba and especially in regard to a proposed railway into the district in question. The article winds up by stating that the Hon. J. A. Calder and the Hon. Arthur Meighen informed Premier Norris that a survey of this line would be undertaken this winter. Is that correct?

Hon J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration): So far as I am concerned, I never made any such statement to any person. Whether the Minister of the Interior made a statement of that kind, of course, I cannot say.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is the Government going to build the railway? That is the main thing.

Mr. CALDER: That is a matter that the Minister of Railways might reply to.

Hon. J. D. REID: The Minister of Railways made no such statement.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM.

BILL PROVIDING FOR THE ACQUISITION OF THE SYSTEM BY THE GOVERNMENT.

House again in committee on Bill No. 33, respecting the acquisition by His Majesty of the Grand Trunk Railway System.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 2—Government empowered to enter into agreement with Grand Trunk Railway Company for acquisition of entire capital stock of company, except four per cent guaranteed stock:

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at 8.30 on Friday evening, clause 2 had been under consideration during the evening. Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. CAHILL: I desire again to ask the Government what is the total amount at this date of the liabilities of the Grand Trunk undertaking which are being assumed by the Government, that is, exclusive of the amount that is to be arbitrated.

Mr. J. D. REID: I will try again to give that all in detail so that there will be no doubt about it. The items are, of course, all in detail on page 39 of the blue-book, but I will give them much fuller. Let me try to explain this so that the hon. member will understand, and I am going to give him the principal and the interest as well, so that we shall see just exactly what the whole liabilities and the different classes of securities are. We have first the Grand Trunk five per cent debenture stock, $20,782,491.38.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does that amount appear in the blue-book in that form?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, the items that I am going to read are all under the heading of liabilities. The hon. member will see that there is a total of $504,629,211.93, the items of which are all in the books of the Grand Trunk under the heading of liabilities. I should like to explain it all in detail, from top to bottom, and then the committee will understand it probably a little better. These are the liabilities:

	Amount.	Interest per annum.
Grand Trunk 5 per cent debenture stock	$ 20,782,491.38	$1,038,124.58
Grand Trunk 4 per cent debenture stock	119,839,012.69	4,793,560.56
Great Western 5 per cent debenture stock	13,252,322.48	662,616.12
Northern railway 4 per cent debenture stock	1,499,979.65	59,999.18
Second mortgage equipment bonds	1,814,779.97	108,886.80
Northern railway third mortgage bonds	70,566.67	4,234.00
Canada Atlantic 4 per cent bonds	16,000,091.77	640,003.68
Wellington, Grey & Bruce bonds	295,893.34	24,000.00
Matured bonds unpaid	3,406.67	.....
On which there seems to be no interest.
Five year, 5½ per cent secured notes	12,166,166.50	669,166.67
Three year 6 per cent secured notes	4,866,666.50	292,000.00
Three year 6 per cent secured notes	14,598,539.80	876,000.00
Total	$205,190,417.52	$9,168,591.59

To that we have to add the Grand Trunk guaranteed stock, $60,833,322.51, on which the annual interest would be $2,433,333.33, making a total of $266,023,750.03 with an annual interest of $11,601,924.92. That covers the debenture and guaranteed stocks and the fixed charges. My memorandum states that the interest on equipment notes and loans, amounting to $11,601,924.92, is a charge against operation and is therefore not considered a fixed charge. The officials say that to the annual fixed charges should be added rental of leased lines $340,666; also the deficits on the United States lines, amounting to $1,639,317, estimating on the basis of 1918. That makes the total fixed charges $13,581,907.92. Against this the company receives interest on securities owned by the company which in 1918 amounted to $2,008,382.47. Therefore the total net fixed charges for which the Government are assuming responsibility amount to $11,573,525.45.

I have stated that the total liabilities in connection with the debenture stock are $266,023,750.03. Then on page 39 of the blue-book we have additional liabilities as follows:

First preference 5% stock ..	$ 16,643,999.78
Second preference 5% stock	12,312,666.50
Third preference 4% stock ..	34,884,534.95
Total preference stocks	$ 63,841,201.23
Common stock	116,583,124.44
Total preference and common stocks	$180,424,325.67

These are the stocks which will be submitted to arbitration and on which we will have to pay interest annually.

Mr. DEVLIN: On what does the minister base his figures for those stocks?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have given the par value. Then we have also the following liabilities:

Advanced by Canadian Government, $15,142,633.13.

This loan was made many many years ago. Then there are the following:

Notes unsecured	$ 3,916,362.18
Current liabilities	22,801,474.35
Reserves, fire insurance, etc.	3,455,344.86
Advances, etc.	7,286,995.75
Net income balance	234,118.33
Equipment notes	5,344,207.54
Total	$58,181,136.14

That makes a total of $58,181,136.14, but we must remember that equipment notes, current liabilities, advances, and so forth are charged against operation, and are not a standing liability such as mortgages and stocks so that the total is $52,836,928.60.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister says these items are not to be taken into account with the other liabilities. Are they not to be looked after from the proceeds of the road?

Mr. J. D. REID: Certainly. But the last item I have read, for instance, net income balance $234,118.33, is a profit. That, of course, would not be considered a liability. The item immediately above, $7,286,995.75, is a book account. We would add in the list of liabilities the item of $22,801,474.35 which is made up of interest on capital account accrued. Wages unpaid at December, 1918, amounting to $3,132,851.84, would be a charge against operation. Then on the opposite side of page 39 we have current assets as follows:

Sundry outstanding accounts.	$43,838,831.44
Outstanding traffic accounts..	1,581,852.15
Materials and supplies on hand	6,407,195.57

Those are supposed to be in connection with operation and are not what we would call a direct liability against the property. Let me complete the statement I was giving. I stated that the debenture and guaranteed stocks amounted to $266,023,750.03, and the net fixed charges $11,573,525.45. We have to add to that, $180,424,325.67. Then there are equipment notes amounting to $58,181,136.14, making a total of $504,629,211.84. That includes $116,583,124.44 of common stock, on which interest has never been paid, and $63,841,201.23 of first, second and third preference stocks. I think that answers the question as regards the total liabilities of the Grand Trunk.

Mr. CAHILL: I desire to know what the total obligations of the proposed purchase amount to. Will the minister explain what is meant by the item, appearing on page 26 of the blue-book, "funded debt $448,703,356"?

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member will see, under the heading, "Capitalization" on the same page, the following:

In hands of public December 31, 1917, for the system, including the Grand Trunk Pacific (1918) and American roads.

The Grand Trunk Pacific is therefore included in that item of $448,703,356, it and the American roads representing a total of $275,000,000.

Mr. CAHILL: I want to make myself perfectly clear. What is the Government purchasing? Can the minister answer me that question?

Mr. J. D. REID: They are purchasing the Grand Trunk system, the liabilities of which I mentioned.

Mr. CAHILL: Perhaps we shall get a better insight into the proposition if we know what the Grand Trunk system consists of.

Mr. J. D. REID: On page 34 of the blue-book there is a statement in regard to the system:

Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, owned by parent company, 3,382.9 miles.

There follows a list of railways controlled, leased or operated, and the Grand Trunk is merely a subsidiary company.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Are the American roads included in the statement appearing on pages 38 and 39?

Mr. J. D. REID: The balance sheet on pages 38 and 39 shows the results of the operation of the American roads. We are purchasing the Grand Trunk system, and the Grand Trunk Pacific is a subsidiary company.

Mr. CAHILL: I understand that the Government purpose taking over a railway system comprising the Grand Trunk and other companies or branches of railway. Now, what is the total mileage, and what are the liabilities against the total undertaking? I do not care about any individual company just at present; let us know first of all how many miles we are purchasing altogether and what all the liabilities amount to.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Grand Trunk railway mileage is given on page 32, and we are taking over other lines, a long list of which appears on pages 32 and 33. These lines are: Atlantic and St. Lawrence; St. Clair Tunnel; Buffalo and Lake Huron railway; International Bridge; Champlain and St. Lawrence; Chicago, Detroit and Can.; Michigan Air Line railway; United States and Canadian railway; Cincinnati, Saginaw and Mackinaw railway; Lewiston and Auburn R.R.; Pembroke Southern railway; Trackage rights, T.N.O.; International C.N.Y.C.; Central Vermont railway; Montreal and Province Line railway; Stanstead, Shefford and Chambly railway; Bethel Granite railway; New London N.R.R. and West River R.R.; Detroit Grand Haven and Milwaukee railway; Grand Trunk West railway; Pontiac, Oxford and Northern railway; Detroit and Toledo Shore Line R.R.; Saginaw and Muskegon railway. The total affiliated roads reported in the United States are given. Then there are: Grand Trunk Pacific railway; Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Line Company. The total Grand Trunk Pacific mileage amounts to 2,962. The total line owned, controlled and leased, Canadian, is 6,620, from which there must be deducted Lake Superior branch operated by Canadian Northern. The total line operated in Canada is given at 6,431 miles and the total line operated in the United States, 1,367 miles, or a grand total of 7,799 miles. This comprises the Grand Trunk system which we are taking over.

Mr. CAHILL: What are the total liabilities against that system?

Mr. J. D. REID: I read the total liabilities a few moments ago. With reference to the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk is liable for the interest on the debentures that they have guaranteed to the extent only of the interest on the guarantee and preference stock; or, in other words, the earnings of the Grand Trunk cannot be paid out until the interest on the debenture stock has first been paid. Then, of course, they could not pay any dividends on the guarantee of the first, second and third preference stock until their guarantees on the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds had been paid. If we take the system over we will be liable for, first, the interest on the debenture stock, say, $7,000,000, and the $2,500,000 of the guarantee plus the award of the arbitrators, if any, on the first, second and third preference and guaranteed stock. Then we will also be liable for the interest on the Grand Trunk Pacific debentures and any loss in operation on the Grand Trunk Pacific line. As far as I can see, that answers everything in the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. CAHILL: We will get back to the question again now. What are the total outstanding liabilities against the undertaking which the Government proposes to acquire? That question ought to be plain enough surely.

Mr. J. D. REID: They are set out fully on pages 38 and 39. I tried to explain them in detail a few minutes ago. I do not know whether there is any way in which I can make them any plainer. If I could I would be very glad to do it. It would be impossible to give the hon. gentleman the exact amount for this reason: There is the $266,023,750; I have no doubt about that being a debt against the road. The other amount is $180,424,325.67, which is the common stock and the first, second and third preference stock total. The value of that would have to be appraised when the award is made. It would probably be a very small proportion of that amount. Outside of that, the other items are those which I have just read. There is the Government loan of $15,000,000, but I do not know what value would be placed upon it.

Mr. DAVIS: The hon. member (Mr. Cahill) is asking practically what are the obligations against the subsidiary roads in addition to the obligations on the main road. The main road owns an interest in subsidiary roads which undoubtedly have bonded debts and debentures outstanding against them. What are these debentures which are totalled with the debts against the parent system and give the total liability of the whole system?

Mr. J. D. REID: The total of $266,000,000 and the interest on that which is against the Grand Trunk is all that we assume. Any other liabilities that there may be against subsidiary companies we are not assuming as we are the liabilities against the Grand Trunk system.

Mr. DAVIS: It is true we are not going to be asked to guarantee all these debts, but if we are going to obtain the properties we have to see that the interest on these underlying claims is paid in order that we shall not lose the properties. Therefore we ought to know what these obligations amount to.

Mr. J. D. REID: We do not assume the liabilities on the subsidiary companies other than as I have stated. We only assume the liabilities that are against the Grand Trunk main system. We guarantee the interest on the $266,000,000 of funded debt. We are not in any way guaranteeing the interest with regard to the subsidiary companies.

Mr. DAVIS: But there are these underlying obligations on the subsidiary systems which must be satisfied by the parent company, and we, as the successor of the parent company, are to draw the dividends from these systems. We would like to know what obligations stand against them and what will be the nature of the interest which we acquire when we acquire the interest of the Grand Trunk in them?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have a statement here showing the securities against the subsidiary companies outstanding, but the Grand Trunk own a lot of them. I suppose that is what the hon. member means. It is as follows:

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM.

Net amount for which Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada is obligated in respect of guarantees			18,936,377 29	1,886,029 80

It will therefore be seen that the net amount for which the Grand Trunk Railway is obligated in respect of guarantees—that is on principle—is $18,936,377.29, and the total annual interest is $1,886,029.80. I want to add that while that shows the amount we are liable for, the Grand Trunk Railway and the subsidiary lines forming part of that great system are of such value that the revenue derived from the traffic contributes largely to the profits they have been making, to an extent, at all events, sufficient to pay the $7,000,000 on the debenture stock and the amount of $3,600,000 which the payments on the guaranteed and first, second and third preference stocks have averaged during the last ten years.

Mr. DAVIS: Does the minister say, then, that these additional obligations, amounting to about $40,000,000, added to the statement that he first gave of about $414,000,000 constitute the total of the Grand Trunk system's obligations to the public—that is, for stock and debentures?

Mr. CAHILL: Not stock, debentures and bonds.

Mr. J. D. REID: The best way for me to explain that would be for me to state this: The total outstanding liabilities against the Grand Trunk would be $266,023,750, and, if the hon. gentleman wishes, plus whatever the award may be on the $180,000,000, representing $116,000,000 of common stock, and the first, second and third preference stocks. These three stocks and the $116,000,000 of common stock amount to $180,000,000, and whatever the arbitrators determine the value of that stock to be, would have to be added to the $266,000,000. At present we cannot say what that addition would be. Outside of that, the amount guaranteed by the Grand Trunk or their subsidiary companies would be $18,936,377. Then there is an amount of $21,081,116 not guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway stocks, plus the equipment notes and current liabilities in connection with the company's operations.

Mr. CAHILL: I again ask the minister to state what are the total liabilities to the public of this undertaking which the Government proposes to take over?

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not see how I can make it any plainer.

Mr. CAHILL: Does the minister mean to tell me that he proposes to buy something the liabilities of which he does not know?

Mr. J. D. REID: No man in this House or in Canada can give the total, because the award has not yet been made.

Mr. CAHILL: I am not talking about the award; I am referring to the total liabilities.

Mr. J. D. REID: The total liabilities amount to $266,023,750.03.

Mr. DENIS: The minister has repeatedly said that the funded debt amounts to $266,000,000 in round figures, but on page 39 of the blue-book the total funded debt is given as $173,558,544.62.

Mr. J. D. REID: The amounts given under the heading of "Funded Debt" on page 38, $155,373,806.20 and $18,184,738.42, make the total of $173,558,544.62. Then further down there are the notes payable secured: $12,166,666.50; $4,866,666.60; $14,598,539.80. These make the total of $205,190,417.52. We call those notes "secured notes" for this reason: Instead of selling debenture stock and having it in the funded debt they borrowed the money and deposited debenture stock as collateral security. Therefore we consider that these three items should be added to the $155,373,806.20 and $18,184,738.42, thus making the total funded debt $205,190,417.52. Then we are adding to that the item of $60,833,332.51. The debenture stock and guaranteed stock taken together I am calling the funded debt; but it means the total of these items which I have given.

Mr. DENIS: It would have been much clearer if a statement along the line of that which the minister has just given had been printed in the blue-book, because, as I have pointed out, the total funded debt is stated on page 39 of the blue-book as $173,558,544.62. I think it is quite right to say that these notes payable, secured notes, should be treated as funded debt.

Mr. J. D. REID: The $173,000,000 is debenture stock; it is really like a mortgage against the property. The other item is money borrowed on notes with a certain amount of debenture stock out as collateral security, and until this stock is really sold and registered as debenture stock against the property it is treated as a liability, as is shown in the blue-book. It is merely the method that would be employed by an accountant in keeping the accounts, pending the sale of the debenture stock and its being charged up against the property.

Mr. CAHILL: May I again ask the minister for an answer to my question? What are the total liabilities against this system? Is not that a plain question?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is a fair question, and I tell my hon. friend frankly that I have answered it the best way I can, and in every detail. I have given the statements from the books of the Grand Trunk Railway Company showing the funded debt, the current liabilities, the amounts in connection with the proposed award, and so on. The hon. member wants me to state a certain sum and to make an estimate of the award.

Mr. CAHILL: I did not ask the minister anything about the capital stock that is to be awarded; let us make that plain. I am asking what are the liabilities of the company. If the minister is not able to answer that question, surely he will not carry this transaction through. Before we proceed to an award we should at least know what this thing is to cost us; what the liabilities are against this undertaking.

Mr. J. D. REID: I will answer my hon. friend again. The total liabilities of the Grand Trunk Railway System are $266,023,750.03. The amount that the Grand Trunk Railway System has guaranteed is $18,936,377.29; so that if you add $266,023,750.03 and $18,936,377.29, you have the funded debt plus any amount that may be awarded.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the total?

Mr. J. D. REID: $284,960,127.32 plus any amount that the arbitrators may award.

Mr. CAHILL: Do I understand the minister to say that this amount represents the total liabilities of the Grand Trunk undertaking?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, that is the amount for which the Grand Trunk and its subsidiary companies are liable. Of course, there are other amounts that there are not guarantees for. In addition to that the Grand Trunk Railway Company have guaranteed the interest on the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds. Then, there are the guaranteed stocks and the first, second and third preference stocks, they cannot pay any dividends on those to the shareholders until the other obligations have first been released. If they do not earn the money, they do not have to pay it.

Mr. CAHILL: What is meant by the statement that appears on page 40? The statement, it is true, is rather old; it is headed "capitalization—December 31, 1917"?

Mr. J. D. REID: It explains itself. Grand Trunk parent company, funded debt, bonds and debentures, notes, loans, amounted to $202,332,997. That was in 1917. The capital stock guaranteed or preferred amounted to $124,674,533. If the hon. member will turn back to page 38, he will find there, common stock, $116,583,124.44. That is practically the same as the amount of common stock given on page 40, of $116,583,120. The capital stock $124,674,533 is explained in detail on page 38.

Mr. CAHILL: If the minister will come back with me to page 40 and look at the statement "Funded debt, bonds and debentures, notes, loans," which appears under the date line, and if he will follow that down to the total, he will find that the total Grand Trunk Railway system, funded debt, bonds and debentures, notes, loans, amounts to $448,703,356. That is exclusive of the stocks. Will the minister explain that item?

Mr. J. D. REID: If the hon. member will look at the statement he will see that the total—"reported under Grand Trunk Railway Company"—amounts to $205,989,280. That is explained in the statement I read a few minutes ago in regard to the funded debt against the parent company. The total I gave was $205,190,417.52, of which the details appear on pages 38 and 39. To the funded debt, etc., of the Grand Trunk parent company amounting to $202,332,997 they have added on the statement on page 40, Buffalo and Lake Huron Railway funded debt, etc., $3,656,283, but the Grand Trunk own that. The funded debt is there, but the bonds are owned by the company. That gives a total of $205,989,280. There is the statement with regard to outstanding bonds that I read in a long detailed list a few minutes ago. Then there is shown on page 40 a list of railways including the Central Vermont Railway Company, Montreal and Province Line railway, Stanstead Shefford and Chambly railway, Detroit, Grand Haven and Milwaukee railway, Grand Trunk Western railway, Pontiac Oxford and Northern railway, etc., giving a total for affiliated roads reported in the United States, of $26,460,965. That makes a total for all lines except the Grand Trunk Pacific of $232,450,245, to which has to be added the Grand Trunk Pacific, bringing the amount up to $448,703,356. The hon. member can see that the statement of December 31, 1917, is slightly different on account of the statement being about two years old.

Mr. CAHILL: Is this the Grand Trunk system that the Government purposes acquiring under this legislation?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Grand Trunk system would mean the Grand Trunk parent company, all the subsidiary lines, including the list I have read, American and Canadian lines, plus the Grand Trunk Pacific, which is a subsidiary company of the Grand Trunk. When the arbitrators are considering their award, they must take in consideration the condition of every subsidiary company including the Grand Trunk Pacific. They must take into consideration that it is a subsidiary company, because the Grand Trunk Railway owns all the stock in the Grand Trunk Pacific, just as it does in the case of all the other companies, and they must take into consideration the fact that the Grand Trunk Pacific is losing seven, eight or ten million dollars per annum, just as they would take into consideration any of the other subsidiary companies that might be showing a loss or a profit.

Mr. CAHILL: I am not speaking just now about the award of the arbitrators. I want, first of all, to find out whether there is anything to arbitrate or not, whether the total liabilities against the undertaking are not greater than the undertaking is worth. Before you attempt to buy anything, you want to know what the total liabilities are against it. We have not quite arrived at the arbitration stage yet; we want to know whether there is anything left to arbitrate, so we want to know first the total obligations outstanding to the public against the complete system. At the foot of page 40, there is an amount of $448,703,356 of liabilities against the Grand Trunk railway system, which I presume is what the Government proposes to acquire. That is the funded debt, and there will be other liabilities. I, therefore, want to know what are the total liabilities at this time outstanding against the Grand Trunk undertaking as proposed to be acquired by the Government of Canada. Surely that question ought to be understandable?

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not know how I can answer the question more clearly. The statement there shows the total liabilities against the Grand Trunk parent company and subsidiary companies. If you take page 40, it shows the total liabilities of all except the Grand Trunk Pacific of $232,450,245, of which amount $3,656,283 is owned by the Grand Trunk railway itself. But those are the total liabilities on which we shall arbitrate, plus the first, second and third preference and the common stock. Then of course, if you want to add to that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and its branch lines, the amount outstanding against it, as shown near the bottom of page 41, is $216,253,111, on which there is a loss of eight or ten million dollars per annum. That, of course, has to be arbitrated on.

Mr. CAHILL: They will not arbitrate on what we are assuming.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Grand Trunk Pacific is in the hands of a receiver and we are not assuming anything until the award has been made. When it has been made, the Government will pay the interest on the debenture and guaranteed stocks, and whatever is awarded on the other stocks will be a liability which the Government will have to assume.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the total amount of the liabilities on the Grand Trunk Railway system which the Government proposes to acquire under this legislation?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend has already had the answer from the Minister of Railways. On page 39 of the blue-book he will see the aggregate of the funded debt, bonds, debentures, notes and loans as of the date mentioned, which, if you take in the Grand Trunk system, speaking of the system as we understand it, including the subsidiary companies and the branch lines in the United States, and the Grand Trunk Pacific and its branch lines, amount to $448,663,356. That is the funded debt, bonds, debentures, notes and loans as of that date. That is the answer. Of course there will be some slight variation between the figures as of that date and the present time, but it would not be important in the general statement of the financial position. In addition to that there is, of course, the guaranteed stock of $60,000,000. That is not included in the amount I have given, because that is not part of the funded debt as it now stands. I do not see what further information my hon. friend requires. It is all set out in that statement.

Mr. CAHILL: The Government have never stated the amount which the minister has just stated. That is what I have been asking for. My hon. friend said that $448,663,356 was the total funded debt of this undertaking.

Mr. ROWELL: Of all these various undertakings. That information was in the statement which was laid on the Table before this Bill was taken up, and it has been there right along for the information of my hon. friend.

Mr. CAHILL: Then there are also the current liabilities. What explanation has the minister to give of those liabilities amounting to $22,801,474.35? Has that amount to be added to the liabilities we are assuming in connection with that undertaking?

Mr. ROWELL: The current liabilities are offset by the current assets. They will vary from time to time, from month to month, and from period to period. My hon. friend will find the statement of the current liabilities on page 39 of the blue-book, where they are shown as amounting to $22,801,-474.35. The current assets are given on page 38 as $51,827,879.16.

Mr. CAHILL: What are the details of those current assets? Is that $51,827,879.16 cash?

Mr. J. D. REID: Take the last item, materials and supplies on hand, $6,407,195.57; that will be the stock. Outstanding traffic accounts, amounting to $1,581,852.15, will be the floating traffic accounts; sundry outstanding accounts, amounting to $43,838,831.44, make the total current assets $51,827,879.16. I have a detailed statement of that which I will read if my hon. friend desires. It is as follows:

Amounts receivable from other companies, individuals, etc... ..$8,388,082.41

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What companies does that include?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not those details here, but I could get them.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The information as given by the minister is very indefinite. If he is going to give the details he should give us the names of the companies who owe this money.

Mr. J. D. REID: Perhaps I had better continue with this statement first.

Loan to Central Vermont Railway for construction and general purposes.. .. ..$8,355,964.71

That simply means that instead of the Central Vermont issuing bonds, the Grand Trunk advanced the money and charged it up against the Central Vermont. The usual thing when constructing or extending a road is to issue bonds from time to time, charging the amount against the road. In this case the Grand Trunk loaned the money.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Do we hold any security for that loan?

Mr. J. D. REID: Only the stock of the Central Vermont railway. We shall control that railway.

Mr. McKENZIE: Adverting to the first item, if we have loaned money to one of our own companies, and the Grand Trunk has many subsidiary companies, these amounts must appear in the books. According to the minister's statement we have loaned a considerable sum to one company.

Mr. J. D. REID: That $8,000,000 odd included several companies.

[Mr. Rowell.]

Mr. McKENZIE: We are taking over this system with all its subsidiary companies. It is no use saying we owe money to ourselves. We will never get this money back, because we are taking over the company with all its indebtedness and everything belonging to it. I think the country is entitled to know just what these amounts receivable are. It is no use saying we owe ourselves a few million dollars, which we cannot collect from ourselves.

Mr. ROWELL: We would make better progress if the minister were permitted to give the details, and my hon. friend would be in a better position thereafter to discuss intelligently any item which he desired to deal with. I do not agree with my hon. friend's contention, but I think he might allow the minister to proceed uninterruptedly with the details which he wishes to give the committee.

Mr. McKENZIE: It would be time to send for the doctor if my hon. friend agreed with me.

Mr. J. D. REID: I should like to read this statement in order that the hon. member might be thoroughly informed as to the details and the total amount:

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister hazard a guess as to how much real asset there is in that $43,000,000? If the Central Vermont, the Grand Trunk Pacific and other railways become part of the general system, their individual assets disappear so far as the aggregate corporation is concerned. How much of that $43,000,000 can be realized as a real asset by the system?

Mr. ROWELL: The Central Vermont Railway Company could have issued its bonds in order to raise the money it required for construction and other purposes, or could have raised it in some other way. As a matter of fact, the Grand Trunk railway loaned it the money and this loan is an asset of the Grand Trunk Company. If the Grand Trunk Company had not advanced the money the Central Vermont would necessarily have had to procure it by some other means, and there would have been that additional obligation against the property of the Central Vermont. If that obligation were outstanding to some one other than the Grand Trunk itself, the stock of the Vermont Railway would be worth that much less.

Mr. ROSS: But it is not.

Mr. ROWELL: To illustrate: Suppose you owned the stock of a company which required money for any purpose. If it borrowed the money from an outsider, then there would be an obligation against the Company for the amount.

Mr. ROSS: It did not borrow from an outsider.

Mr. ROWELL: No; then the avance is an asset or the stock which we hold is worth that much more. The money has gone into the property, and as a matter of bookkeeping between the main company and its subsidiary company it is proper to charge it up against the subsidiary company.

Mr. EULER: Does the minister mean to say that the stock of the Central and Vermont is at all affected in its value relatively whether the liability is owing to the Grand Trunk Railway Company or to any one else? I understood my hon. friend to say that the stock of the Central Vermont was in some way affected because the money was advanced by the Grand Trunk. What difference does it make, so far as the Central Vermont's liability is concerned, whether that liability is owing to the Grand Trunk Railway Company or John D. Rockefeller or anybody else?

Mr. ROWELL: I am not at the moment familiar with the exact position in which the Central Vermont stands in relation to the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. J. D. REID: We own the stock.

Mr. ROWELL: Very well. Then the Central Vermont needs the money for construction purposes. It could go on the market—

Mr. ROSS: It did not.

Mr. ROWELL: The hon. gentleman will be kind enough to allow me first to answer the question of the hon. member (Mr. Euler). The company could go on the market and borrow money, issuing its bonds, and that would be an outstanding obligation of the Central Vermont. On the other hand, it could go to the parent company—the Grand Trunk—which owns its stock, and borrow the money. The Grand Trunk advances the money, which is an obligation of the company and an asset of the Grand Trunk.

Mr. EULER: The stock itself of the Central Vermont is worth exactly as much whether the liability is in the form of a bond which it owes to some one else or of cash advances made by the Grand Trunk company.

Mr. ROWELL: Quite so, but that is on the basis that the advance to it is an asset in the hands of the Grand Trunk as a bond would be an asset in the hands of the holder to whom that bond was issued.

Mr. EULER: I do not question that, but the value of the Central Vermont stock is unaffected either way; whether the money was loaned by outsiders or by the parent company.

Mr. ROWELL: Quite so, assuming that it is an asset.

Mr. ROBB: It must be quite apparent to hon. members who are favourable to the public ownership of railways in Canada that not only is the Government attempting to embark upon the policy of public ownership within the limits of Canada, but it is going into the United States. The minister has made a statement as regards the Central Vermont railway. In the memoranda presented to Parliament relating to the acquisition of the Grand Trunk, at page 51, there is outlined a number of obligations that Canada will be responsible for in addition to the debt of the Grand Trunk. There are certain guarantees given by the Grand Trunk. The Grand Trunk has endorsed certain notes for which it is to be responsible. If we take over the property the people of Canada become responsible for these guarantees. Later on I hope to draw the attention of Parliament and of the country to the guarantee as it affects the Grand Trunk Pacific, but for the moment I wish to deal with the Central Vermont railway. This statement with reference to the Central Vermont shows that:

> The Grand Trunk railway guarantee the interest on the bonds by traffic contract up to an amount equal to 30 per cent of the gross receipts from interchange business.

So that we guarantee these bonds of the Central Vermont railway. In that connection it is interesting to see how far this railway in a foreign country will be able to carry itself, how far it will be able to pay the bonds, and to see how the people of Canada will be called upon to make up the difference represented by the loss of traffic in connection with a railway operating in a foreign country. We have a statement of the Central Vermont railway business from 1910 to 1917 and in those years the statement shows a gross deficit of $423,782. In certain years it shows a surplus of $325,412, which leaves a net deficit for the seven and a half years' operation of $98,370, or an average annual deficit of $11,809. This is the undertaking that the Government is asking the people to embark in.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend is referring to the statement at page 54, is he?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. ROWELL: The facts are as set out in the statement; but the American connections west to Chicago and east to Portland are amongst the most valuable assets of the Grand Trunk railway. My understanding of the situation is that the net profits of the Grand Trunk, by reason of its American connections, are very much larger than the operating deficit which it has had to pay in certain years. The figures which have been given of the earnings of the Grand Trunk are the earnings after all of these deficits have been paid and provided for. A very substantial amount of traffic originates on these American lines. The Grand Trunk system in Canada has the benefit of the haul, and the net result is that the American connections are very valuable to the Grand Trunk as a whole and are so considered by the Grand Trunk and by those who understand the railway situation. The Grand Trunk makes much more out of the haul of this freight than any shortage there may be on the operation of these roads.

Mr. ROBB: The fact remains that the people of Canada will be compelled to make up this deficit in the traffic earnings of the Central Vermont. The minister can make any explanation he chooses.

Mr. ROWELL: No, the people will not be, for this reason: The traffic which originates on these American connections, being the traffic that originates in Chicago and the West and which is destined for American ports and goes to Portland, has a haul through Canada of which the Grand Trunk operating in Canada gets its pro rata.

Mr. ROBB: Is the minister arguing that traffic through Portland goes over the Central Vermont?

Mr. ROWELL: No; I refer to the traffic that goes east on these railways. I may say to my hon. friend that I am not familiar with the lines on the ground, and I am only speaking of the general situation as I am advised. The traffic originating in the United States passes over the Grand Trunk lines in Canada, and in a substantial measure, I understand, reaches the Atlantic ports over Grand Trunk connections. The result is that the Grand Trunk system in Canada gets the benefit of this haul of freight which very substantially adds to the earnings of the Grand Trunk in Canada, because my hon. friend will realize that if you increase the volume of the traffic which you are able to handle upon your road you increase your percentage of profits. Your overhead is the same and your cost of operation must be maintained up to a certain standard. If you can increase the amount of freight you haul you add to the net profits. The Grand Trunk in Canada profits not only to the amount of the deficit, if any, which it has to make good, but as a result of this business it gets a very substantial sum in addition, which it adds to the profits of the railway in Canada. If the people of Canada owned the Grand Trunk, instead of their being called upon to make good a deficit on the American lines, having these American connections would so add to the earnings of the Grand Trunk in Canada that there would be a surplus out of which could be paid the loss, if any, in the operation of these connections.

Mr. ROBB: The argument of the President of the Privy Council is that to wipe out these deficits that have existed in the traffic operation for the past seven and a half years the policy of the Government would be to divert more business to United States and away from Canadian ports.

Mr. ROWELL: No; I did not make any such statement. I stated the result up to date according to the information I have received from the Grand Trunk officials who are responsible for the operation of the road and from the men who are responsible for handling the accounts and the business. The result is that they have received more out of the handling of this freight through Canada than is sufficient to provide for the deficit; in fact, so much more that it adds very substantially to the earnings of the Grand Trunk in Canada.

Mr. CAHILL: Did I understand the minister to say that this $8,000,000 obligation of the Central Vermont is not regarded as an asset?

Mr. ROWELL: No, I did not say that at all; I said just the contrary.

Mr. CAHILL: How do you figure it? We are to own the Grand Trunk and we propose to purchase the Central Vermont. How do you propose to get the money from the Central Vermont, or how do they propose to get it?

Mr. ROWELL: We are not purchasing the two companies, we are purchasing the stock of the Grand Trunk. The Grand Trunk controls the Central Vermont and by getting control of the former we secure control of the latter. The Central Vermont has its assets out of which the claim could be realized if that was desired.

Mr. CAHILL: Where would the Central Vermont, under this arrangement get the money to pay this $8,000,000 to the Grand Trunk?

Mr. ROWELL: They could issue bonds against the road for that amount.

Mr. CAHILL: Then would that show a liability in addition to the $448,000,000 you spoke of as representing the present liability?

Mr. Rowell: It would be a liability against the Central Vermont.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: When the Central Vermont has not been able to carry itself for the last seven and a half years, but comes out with a deficit, how is it ever expected that the company will ever be able to pay interest?

Mr. ROWELL: My information is that the Central Vermont has paid interest on all these outstanding obligations, including the interest on this loan from the Grand Trunk, and that the deficit is after all these obligations have been paid.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: Where did the $1,639,637, that the Grand Trunk had to send in to the United States to make good the earnings of the road, go to last year?

Mr. ROWELL: That would be an adjustment of the accounts between the Grand Trunk and its subsidiary companies, and the money would be earned by the Grand Trunk carrying on its system in Canada the traffic which originated on its lines in the United States. I am speaking from what I am informed by the Grand Trunk officials.

Mr. ROSS: How much of the $14,000,000 which the minister claims to be assets, is made up of similar indebtedness by subsidiary companies to the parent company, that is, indebtedness similar to the $8,000,000 owed by the Central Vermont to the Grand Trunk?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have already given a list of $43,000,000.

Mr. ROSS: Were those all similar to that $14,000,000?

Mr. J. D. REID: Not all similar.

Mr. ROSS: How much of the $14,000,000 is made up of similar amounts owed by subsidiary companies that the Grand Trunk own?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not got the detailed statement now before me, but it will appear in Hansard to-morrow, showing the figures in detail.

Mr. ROSS: It would be very interesting to know the total.

Mr. J. D. REID: There were three very large items: $15,000,000 due by the Grand Trunk Pacific; $8,000,000 due by the Central Vermont, and $7,000,000 due by the United States Government.

Mr. ROSS: I do not count those as good assets.

Mr. J. D. REID: The others could be collected by issuing bonds against the road.

Mr. ROSS: The liabilities of the system we are taking over would be increased by that much.

Mr. ROWELL: The interest on these loans has always been paid.

Mr. J. D. REID: The interest has been charged up to the companies concerned and they have always paid it.

Mr. ROSS: Nevertheless, it would increase our liabilities if the Government assumed the control of these roads.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I would like to have an explanation regarding the $7,000,000 due by the United States Administration. Is that the net amount due, or is there any contra account to go against it, and how long has this amount been due?

Mr. ROWELL: It is a running account in connection with the operation of the Grand Trunk lines by the United States Administration plus, as I understand it, a certain amount due with respect to supplies and other commodities taken over by the United States Administration when these roads were taken over.

5 p.m.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: When was that?

Mr. ROWELL: On the date the United States Director General of Railways was appointed. I should think it very likely, that a substantial part of that amount would be liquidated when the roads are returned by delivering to the Grand Trunk supplies of a similar kind, and possibly of equal value, for those taken over. My hon. friend will see that when a railroad system is taken over, certain supplies on hand are also taken over, and when the railway system is handed back there will be certain supplies on hand which will also be handed back. A substantial part of the amount in question, I have no doubt, will be liquidated in that way.

Mr. ROBB: In addition to the deficit of the Central Vermont railway, the statement presented to the House also shows a deficit on the Atlantic and St. Lawrence railroad (Norway branch) amounting to $1,272,496. The Central Vermont railway, in 1917, showed a deficit of $154,729. That is so far as our connections in the eastern part of the Grand Trunk system are concerned. When we turn to the western American subsidiary companies of the Grand Trunk railway—to be found at page 55 of the blue-book—we find a statement of deficits paid by the Grand Trunk railway in the last seven years. According to this, the Detroit, Grand Haven and Milwaukee railway showed a deficit in the seven years of $1,818,999, or an average of a little over a quarter of a million dollars a year—$259,654. That is the proposition the Grand Trunk are asking the people of Canada to take over. The Grand Trunk Western showed a deficit on the seven years of $2,843,125. This is a road altogether within the United States, and yet this is the proposition which the Government are asking the people of Canada to take over and tax themselves for. The Toledo, Saginaw & Muskegon showed a total deficit of $545,563 in the seven years, or an average of $77,935 a year. The total deficit on these subsidiary companies in the seven years amounted to $5,205,687, or an average of $743,669, almost three-quarters of a million dollars a year, of railways that are within the United States.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Have the Government admitted that they are liable for these deficits during recent years?

Mr. ROBB: As soon as they become the owners of a road, the Government are liable for all the obligations of the concern, if I understand the situation correctly. Now let me put on record a statement of the business done by these railways. In 1918 the total tonnage done by these roads in the United States—which may have originated in Portland or Chicago, or points tributory thereto in the adjoining republic— was 5,479,206.

That was the total tonnage carried over this system between points in the United States. The total business originating at United States points was 24,905,484 tons. The minister will have to make some further explanation to satify the people with regard to the deficits in respect of these United States lines.

Mr. ROWELL: Where does my hon. friend get the figure of 5,000,000 odd tons?

Mr. ROBB: This is information I have of the business carried by the Grand Trunk. It is from a source which I have every reason to believe to be reliable.

Mr. ROWELL: The figure which I have of the traffic originating in the United States in the year 1918 is approximately 7,000,000 tons, and the gross receipts of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in Canada with respect to that tonnage are something over $16,000,000. That gives a gross return which enables the Grand Trunk Company to pay any deficits, to pay the cost of operation, and to have a substantial surplus to the credit as a result of the operation of these lines. That is why the Grand Trunk so greatly values these American connections. If they were liabilities instead of assets, why would the Grand Trunk continue them and value them? We are not responsible for the obligations of these subsidiary companies, except in the cases where the Grand Trunk Railway Company has guaranteed their bonds. If it were considered desirable that these companies should be liquidated, that could be done. But that is not the position of these companies; they are considered a very valuable part of the Grand Trunk Railway system.

Mr. FOURNIER: The Grand Trunk Railway Company has guaranteed interest upon Central Vermont first mortgage four per cent bonds, of which there are $10,732,000 outstanding, to an amount not to exceed thirty per cent of the gross earnings from the interchange of traffic between the two railroads. Of course, the interest varies with the variation in amount of traffic carried; but I would like to know what is the amount of interest that has been paid annually on this account during the last few years.

Mr. J. D. REID: This arrangement is somewhat similar to that which we have in connection with the St. John Valley railway, but in that case the division is forty and sixty per cent. I have not at hand the information which my hon. friend wants; perhaps I shall be able to get it in a few moments.

Mr. DEVLIN: Did I understand the President of the Council to say that if we assumed the common stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company we would not be responsible for the obligations of the subsidiary companies?

Mr. ROWELL: We are not responsible for the obligations of the subsidiary companies unless we directly assume them. We are making an investment. If the property is worth keeping, we would be foolish not to keep it and to pay the obligations because of the asset we would receive. But there is a real difference between an investment in a property the benefit of which we consider it desirable to obtain by discharging the obligations against it, and a direct obligation of the Government to discharge the obligations no matter whether the investment is worth anything or not.

Mr. DEVLIN: Then do I understand that when we assume the common stock, it does not follow that we are going to become owners of the subsidiary companies as well?

Mr. ROWELL: We do become owners of the subsidiary companies in that we become owners of the stock.

Mr. DEVLIN: Then if we become owners of the subsidiary companies, do we not become liable for their obligations?

Mr. ROWELL: No, not if the Grand Trunk has not directly guaranteed them. But this is the situation: We own the stock. If the company's assets are in excess of its liabilities then we would be exceedingly foolish not to discharge the liabilities of that company in order to get the benefit of its assets and its franchises. But if we have not incurred any direct obligations, and if the liabilities exceed the value of the assets and franchises and we consider the property of no value, there is no reason why we should not give the stock away; we are under no obligation to pay the debts.

Mr. DEVLIN: Following out the reasoning of the President of the Council, let me put it in another way. We shall not find out whether it will be worth while to hold these subsidiary companies until after the arbitration proceedings have been had?

Mr. ROWELL: No.

Mr. DEVLIN: Then when and how are we to find out?

Mr. ROWELL: The whole question of the position of all these subsidiary companies, their assets and liabilities, as well as the position of the Grand Trunk itself, its assets and liabilities, will be gone into thoroughly before the arbitration, because all these questions have a direct bearing on the value of the stock of the Grand Trunk and should all be taken into consideration by the arbitrators in making their award.

Mr. DEVLIN: Then do I understand that the Government will come back to Parliament for power to purchase the subsidiary companies, if they deem it advisable to purchase them? Well, the minister need not answer that; I understand that there is a clause in the Bill which enables the Government to purchase any additional stock that they may want to purchase of any other company. But I want to have it clearly before the committee and the country just what we are now being asked to assume the obligation of. We are not asked to assume any obligation with respect to the subsidiary companies, but we are asked for power to purchase the common stock. We are told by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) that the moment we obtain the common stock, we become the owners of the road. The present owners of these subsidiary companies are the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific. We are going to own the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific after certain conditions are fulfilled, but as regards the liabilities of certain other companies owned by the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific, we are not going to assume them if the Government deems it wise not to do so. Is that right?

Mr. ROWELL: There is in my hon. friend's summary so much with which I do not agree that I cannot say that it is right.

Mr. DEVLIN: In what is it wrong?

Mr. ROWELL: I cannot recall all that my hon. friend said, but his statement with reference to the whole position is not as I understand it. Let me repeat. The Government is buying under arbitration the stock of the Grand Trunk railway. That gives it control of the subsidiary companies.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does it give the Government the property?

Mr. ROWELL: It gives the Government the stock which controls the property.

Mr. DEVLIN: We have the statement of the minister the other day that it gave the Government the property. Surely my hon. friend is not going back on that.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not know whether my hon. friend does not know the difference between stock ownership and having a property directly vested in the person.

Mr. DEVLIN: The minister will not get away with what I know or what I do not know. What I am asking for is a clear statement to be placed before Parliament and the country of what we are going to possess and what obligations we are going to assume. We are trying to get that piecemeal from the Government.

Mr. ROWELL: That has been stated so frequently that one statement more will probably not help my hon. friend if he has not been helped by the statements already made. We purchase the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company through this arbitration. That gives us control of the Grand Trunk, it gives us ownership of the Grand Trunk stock, it gives us ownership of the road by ownership of the stock. The Grand Trunk owns the stock of certain subsidiary railway companies. When we acquire the stock of the Grand Trunk we acquire control of the Grand Trunk. The Grand Trunk owns all the others, so that by owning the stock of the Grand Trunk we acquire ownership of the others.

Mr. DEVLIN: Of the subsidiary companies?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. DEVLIN: That is the point.

Mr. ROWELL: The properties of the subsidiary companies will not be vested in the Crown; they will still remain vested in the subsidiary companies just as the property of the Grand Trunk remains vested in the Grand Trunk. As the subsidiary companies are owned by the Grand Trunk and as we own the Grand Trunk, we own the whole thing, directly or indirectly in that way.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does the minister say that we shall not be responsible for the debts of the subsidiary companies?

Mr. ROWELL: I said that if we had guaranteed or assumed any obligations of the subsidiary companies we would be responsible for them. We are not responsible for those that we do not guarantee or do not assume obligation to pay. But if a road is an asset; if its assets are in excess of its liabilities, we have an investment in the road, and we would, of course, discharge the obligations for the sake of getting the benefit of the assets. That is the situation.

Mr. DEVLIN: That is just it. The minister says that if the road is profitable we shall assume the road and pay off the liabilities, but if the road is not profitable we shall not pay off the liabilities.

Mr. ROWELL: Then we would lose the road.

Mr. DEVLIN: The road would then go back, not into the ownership or the possession of the Grand Trunk railway, but of the private owners thereof.

Mr. ROWELL: It would go to the holders of the bonds, the creditors. If we did not pay the obligations, the creditors would take the necessary proceedings to acquire title to the property and have it sold, realize upon it, in order to pay the debts.

Mr. DEVLIN: My last question to the minister is this: Is the Government going to make a careful examination of and have a carefully prepared statement made in regard to the common and preference stock in the same manner as it purposes doing in regard to the stocks and assets of the subsidiary companies, or is it simply going to take the face value of the common stocks and the preference stocks, put that before the arbitrators for arbitration?

Mr. ROWELL: Most assuredly a careful investigation will be made. The members of a government that would do anything else would be fit subjects for a lunatic asylum.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand the minister to say that we are facing a condition by which we may possibly lose all of these American roads.

Mr. ROWELL: I did not say so.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister says that if he finds they are not a paying proposition, he will let them go. That means that each of these respective companies may be put into liquidation and the road sold. That is the condition faced by the Canadian people.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not want my hon. friend to misquote me. I said that there was power to do that; I did not say that we would do it. I pointed out in answer to the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) that these roads had been considered most valuable connections, and on the information I have, it means a very handsome return to the Grand Trunk railway to have these connections. Under those conditions, if, upon investigation, that proves to be the case, it would be suicidal to any government to let them go.

Mr. DEVLIN: But the minister told me that if, after an examination, the Government found them profitable, they would purchase them, but not otherwise.

Mr. McKENZIE: What I mean is this, and it is perfectly clear. The minister seems to refuse to commit the Government as to whether or not they are going to take those American lines. They say: We will become responsible for any of the claims against these respective roads only provided that it is a profitable thing for the Government to take them. I am not misquoting the minister when I say that. It remains for the future to prove whether they will be a paying proposition or not, and the minister says: If it is discovered that the running of these lines does not pay, we will not assume any responsibility. Then comes the alternative of the people in the United States who have bonds and other claims against these respective roads, to put them into the hands of a receiver in the courts of the United States. We are, according to the words of the minister, facing the possibility, at least, of a condition of that kind.

Mr. ROWELL: No. According to the words of the minister, we are not facing the possibility because, unless my information is wholly wrong, these roads are valuable assets. Everything indicates that they are valuable assets, and, therefore, any government, or board of railway management that would not continue their operation would be making a great blunder from a transportation standpoint and would be creating a burden upon the portions of the railway in Canada which they should not be called upon to bear.

Mr. McKENZIE: I hold in my hand a statement handed to me by the Department of Railways showing the earnings of the Grand Trunk railway, and in that statement is an item of $1,639,317, estimated loss on roads in the United States. That is the record we have, and in face of that, the minister is still hopeful that by some wonderful development we are going to make money. Last year the Grand Trunk found they had to send down to the United States $1,639,317, not being interchange of profit as the minister would let us understand, but a loss on those roads. That is the condition.

Mr. EULER: I do not think the minister wishes to create a wrong impression, but the impression appears to prevail on this side of the House that the Government has the option of accepting or refusing to take over the roads which are the property of the Grand Trunk in the United States, through the Grand Trunk owning the stock of these companies. I do not think we have any option. If this proposed purchase of the Grand Trunk system goes through, we will have to take over these roads in the United States whether they are paying or not. We would acquire the ownership of these roads because the Grand Trunk now controls them through holding the stock. Is not that correct?

Mr. ROWELL: Absolutely.

Mr. EULER: Further, the minister states that the Government does not necessarily accept any liabilities or obligations of the subsidiary roads. Now the point I want to make is this: If these roads are losing money, if they cannot satisfy the bondholders by paying the interest or redeeming the bonds as they become due, is it not the case that these roads may be sold for the benefit of the bondholders? If that happens, will not the Grand Trunk system, of which we shall be the owners through holding the stock, lose the investment it has in these roads? I assume the Grand Trunk put actual money into these roads as an investment. Now that investment may become prejudiced in years to come, if it is not now, through want of prosperity on the part of those roads, in which case, the Government of Canada through its ownership of the stock of the Grand Trunk, will lose its investment in these roads. Do we not assume the risk of a loss—I am not objecting to this—proportionate to the interest we have in these roads in the United States?

Mr. ROWELL: Of course. Theoretically, we assume the risk of a loss on the whole transaction. Theoretically, it is conceivable that railways could not be operated at a profit in the United States, but practically the situation is this: By acquiring the stock of the Grand Trunk, which owns the stock in these subsidiary companies, we acquire these companies. Past experience has shown that that stock is a valuable asset for the reasons which I have already given, and it may fairly be assumed that that condition will continue in the future. My hon. friend must draw a distinction between our legal position, what we may legally do, and what from a business standpoint it would be advisable for us to do. As to our legal position, take the case of a company whose bonds or obligations we have not guaranteed—where we have guaranteed, of course, we are committed— if it is found that the operation of the road is unprofitable the stockholders may say: "We are not prepared to put up any more money to keep this road running. We will let it pass into the hands of the bondholders and let them realize upon it." Theoretically, that is the position. Theoretically that is the position with any subsidiary company of the Grand Trunk, where the Grand Trunk has not guaranteed the obligations of that subsidiary company. But it is a wholly different question whether or not as a business proposition that would be a wise thing to do, and as I have said, judging by past experience and on the information we have it would be a most unwise thing to do. The Grand Trunk should continue these roads in operation.

Mr. EULER: I think I understand exactly what the minister is driving at. He draws a distinction between a company whose stock we own and one whose bonds we have guaranteed. In the case of a company whose bonds we have guaranteed, it is perfectly true that if the earnings of the roads are not sufficient to take care of the road's liabilities the Grand Trunk will have to make good the amounts which they had guaranteed. They would, however, come into the possession of certain assets. So is not the minister making a distinction without a difference; because in the case of a company whose bonds we have not guaranteed but whose stock we own, if the bondholders foreclose on the road, is it not a fact that we will lose our investment in that road? What is the difference in the final analysis between losing our investment, and having to pay off certain indebtedness and perhaps obtaining possession of a questionable asset? We lose in both cases, do we not?

Mr. ROWELL: The difference would be this: In the one case we would have no option; we would have to pay the obligation, and we would get an asset whether it was a losing proposition or not. In the other case we would have the option.

Mr. EULER: Of what?

Mr. ROWELL: Of letting the road go to the bondholders.

Mr. EULER: And losing our investment.

Mr. ROWELL: The answer to my hon. friend's question is this: If it is not worth our continuing to pay the cost of operation, the investment is not worth anything. We are not losing anything because we deliberately decide the investment is not worth keeping. However, I think it is hardly worth while discussing such remote contingencies.

Mr. COPP: On Friday evening when this Bill was being discussed in Committee, my hon. friend (Mr. Rowell) was good enough to suggest that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, not having experience in dealing in stocks and bonds were very apt to fall into error in following the discussion. I quite agree there is some danger of an ordinary member falling into error in attempting to follow my hon. friend and the Minister of Railways in discussing the different liabilities which we are asked to assume by the legislation before the House.

Mr. ROWELL: I did not quite state what my hon. friend has said.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend said something very close to that. I will read what he said. Addressing the hon. member (Mr. Mackenzie King), he said:

> He is not, I believe, accustomed to dealing with stocks and bonds in relation to corporation and finance, or he would clearly understand that the position he is taking is wholly untenable.

I think the fair deduction from those remarks was that if we understood the position he takes in dealing with stocks and bonds and finances generally we would be able to follow his meanderings. I think it is important to this Parliament and to the people of this country to know what liabilities we are assuming in taking over the Grand Trunk Railway system. I think we are entitled to that information in plainer and more direct and understandable language than we have had from the Minister of Railways or my hon. friend (Mr. Rowell) or anybody else who is standing sponsor for this Bill. The Minister of Railways read long columns of figures this afternoon which it was impossible for anybody to follow. We cannot remember all these different lines of railway and the different obligations we are assuming on account of each. Let us suppose, if our imaginations will encompass it, that the treasury of the Dominion of Canada was overflowing with money and we were prepared to pay cash to discharge the obligations we are assuming in taking over this road, but which we will not have to pay for until the end of thirty years. Will the minister state definitely now what the amount would be if we were prepared to draw our check to-morrow for the Grand Trunk Railway and the different subsidiary companies, including all the roads which we are taking over under this proposed agreement? Irrespective altogether of the amount that is to be left to arbitration, what is the total amount of the liabilities and obligations we are assuming?

Mr. J. D. REID: I gave an hon. member that information in a statement I submitted this afternoon.

Mr. COPP: Give me in round figures exactly what you would have to draw your check for to meet the obligations that you are assuming, apart from the stock which will be left to the arbitrators to consider.

Mr. J. D. REID: The statement I read this afternoon contained—

Mr. COPP: Give me the full amount, just the totals.

Mr. J. D. REID: On pages 38 and 39 appears the exact amount of the liabilities. I gave a detailed statement, and I cannot put the matter any plainer than I have already done. It is absolutely impossible to make it plainer.

Mr. COPP: The minister gave one statement in reply to my hon. friend (Mr. Cahill), and the President of the Privy Council, taking the same page of the same document, gave absolutely different figures; I took them down. I would ask either the Minister of Railways or the President of the Privy Council to spend a moment or two in an endeavour to give us the exact figures. I do not care where they get those figures from, but I do want those who are responsible for this measure, which will impose upon the people this gigantic obligation, to state in dollars and cents exactly what the check would be if they had to draw it to-morrow. That is a fair question, and one that can be easily answered.

Mr. ROWELL: It cannot be answered.

Mr. COPP: Why?—I mean apart from what the arbitrators will deal with.

Mr. ROWELL: Yes. I will tell my hon. friend why his question cannot be answered. Take the $60,000,000 of guaranteed stock which we discharge by a four per cent obligation. If I said definitely $60,000,000 it would not be true.

Mr. COPP: Why?

Mr. ROWELL: Because, the position would be different if we discharged it in cash. Money is worth to-day five and a half per cent, whereas we are able to discharge it by a four per cent obligation. You would have to discount that by a very substantial sum; I do not know how much. I do not know what four per cent for a $60,000,000 obligation for thirty years is worth to-day, nor can any one say exactly what its cash value is. Similarly take the perpetual debentures. I do not know what they are worth to-day having regard to the rate of interest they bear. What we do know is that so far as the debenture stock is concerned, that is an obligation which we can take up after 30 years and on which in the meantime we pay four per cent interest. We can take that up at the end of thirty years or thereafter.

Mr. CAHILL: Does the minister say "debenture stock"?

Mr. ROWELL: I meant guaranteed stock. No one can say to-day what the cash value of that is.

Mr. EULER: Without reference to the possible discount, can the minister give us the face value?

Mr. ROWELL: The face value and the real value may be very different propositions. The face value has been given repeatedly.

Mr. COPP: Give us in round numbers.

Mr. ROWELL: The face value of the guaranteed stock is $60,000,000, but that is not what the cash value is by any possible means. That is not the obligation Canada would have to pay in cash.

Mr. COPP: We have the sixty million dollars; what else?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend will see on page 38 that the funded debt amounts to $155,373,806.20. The second mortgage equipment bonds and certain other bonds, etc., amount to $18,184,738.42. Then there are certain equipment notes and loans, less credits, amounting to $5,344,207.54. Then there are secured and unsecured notes, $35,548,235.08. This last item includes notes unsecured, $3,916,362.18. If my hon. friend adds these totals together, he will have, leaving out the guaranteed stock for the time being, the obligations against the Grand Trunk railway.

Mr. CAHILL: What about the $22,000,000 or current liabilities?

Mr. ROWELL: Those liabilities are offset by assets vastly in excess. In dealing with the obligations that the road bears you cannot add the current liabilities without taking into account the current assets. Now, my hon. friend has the obligations of the Grand Trunk railway. In addition to that, if he wants the obligations of the Grand Trunk Pacific——

Mr. COPP: I want all the obligations the Government are attempting to take over by this arrangement.

Mr. ROWELL: We are taking over only those we absolutely guarantee. My hon. friend uses the phrase, "taking over." Unfortunately we are already in that position in relation to the Grand Trunk Pacific system. We have had to pay deficits right along on it, or would have had to do so had we not refused. The total obligations of the Grand Trunk Pacific appear on page 42. Principal amounts to $216,253,111, which includes the branch lines.

Mr. COPP: Does that include interest up to date?

Mr. ROWELL: The Government has had to pay interest until recently. It has not paid interest since the road went into the hands of the receiver.

Mr. COPP: What they have paid is included in this statement?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes; what the Government has paid is included in the loans advanced to the company.

Mr. COPP: Do I understand, then, that by adding these items together which the minister has just given we have the total obligation we are assuming by the legislation that is now before this committee, plus whatever sum is allowed by the arbitrators?

Mr. ROWELL: I did not say that. These are the obligations of the roads, off-set by corresponding assets. The obligations we assume are those which we directly undertake to assume under the agreement. It is all an investment, and in order to get the benefit of the investment we must take into consideration the assets and liabilities.

Mr. COPP: To get whatever assets the Grand Trunk Company and the subsidiary companies constitute we are assuming these obligations.

Mr. ROWELL: We get the several constituent companies with the obligations resting upon these several constituent companies and we get the assets with them.

Mr. COPP: I gather from the minister that the par value of the stock that would be arbitrated would be $180,000,000.

Mr. ROWELL: Approximately so.

Mr. COPP: Those are the two amounts. The amount which my hon. friend has just given me and the award that the arbitrators give on the $180,000,000 par value of stock is what this country will pay for the assets we get from the Grand Trunk. Is that correct?

Mr. ROWELL: That is not what we are paying for the assets. These are obligations against the assets we are getting. I think my hon. friend should add to that certain liabilities that are against the subsidiary companies in the United States, and amounting to $26,460,965.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the committee rose on Friday evening the President of the Council gave a reason why this measure should be hurried through at the present time. I want to make perfectly sure that I understand his meaning. As I gathered from his words, it was to the effect that if the measure were permitted to stand over for a short time certain influences would be at work between now and the next session of Parliament to prevent the measure going through. Am I right in understanding that to be the tenor of the hon. gentleman's remarks?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend will see what I said if he looks up Hansard. I gave a number of reasons why I thought it was in the public interest that this legislation should go on through and one was that I believed that powerful interests opposed to it would utilize any short delay in organizing hostility to it. I have no hesitation in repeating that to-night. I believe the Government to-day is fighting the battle of the people, we are fighting in the public interest, and for the benefit of the whole people of Canada. It is one of the most important battles for the people that has ever been fought in the history of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that what the minister has said is precisely what he said the other evening. He also at the same time made the following statement, which appears at page 1419 of Hansard. Speaking in reply to my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) he said:

> My hon. friend has the same right to be opposed to this transaction as I have to be in favour of it. But he will not be any less opposed to it in February next than he is now and my hon. friends opposite will not be any less opposed to it in February next than they are now.

In other words, what the President of the Council has said is that in so far as this side of the House is concerned, it is not likely to change its attitude towards the measure. It necessarily follows that the attitude of Parliament can only be changed because of some change on the part of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. He must see that his remark is a reflection on every member sitting behind him if he leaves it in that form. I want to be quite sure that I know what his meaning is because the powerful corporations to which my hon. friend has referred cannot exert any influence on this side of the House but, according to his own remarks, they can exert influence on hon. gentlemen sitting behind him.

Mr. ROWELL: I am sure the committee will appreciate my hon. friend's very ingenious application of my remarks.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is very obvious.

Mr. ROWELL: I made it quite clear that there would be no change in the men on this side of the House and my statement says so. I further said, that being so and the men on both sides having evidently reached their conclusion as to what should be done, should we not go on with the Bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend, if he is not reflecting on the members of his own side, is reflecting on honorable members in general, because it is a reflection to say that the members of Parliament are subject to the influence of corporations in the matter of this legislation.

Mr. ROWELL: My words speak for themselves. I know what I said. I have nothing to withdraw. I have made no reflection upon any hon. member of this House.

Mr. CAHILL: Is it correct to say that the total funded debt to be assumed is $448,000,000?

Mr. ROWELL: I stated that the total funded debt as it appears at pages 40-41, including the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the subsidiary lines in the United tSates, bonds, notes, and loans is $448,703,356.

Mr. CAHILL: To the liabilities of the Grand Trunk system would be added $35,000,000 of current notes payable?

Mr. ROWELL: My understanding is that the amount is in this statement that I have already given.

Mr. CAHILL: No.

Mr. ROWELL: The moneys advanced by the Dominion Government to the Grand Trunk Pacific because they constitute liabilities of these corporations, are included in these figures.

Mr. CAHILL: Where, in the statement will I find notes payable and current liabilities included in this $448,000,000?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend will find current liabilities on pages 38 and 39 amounting to $22,801,474.35.

Mr. CAHILL: That will be added to the total liabilities of this undertaking?

Mr. ROWELL: No; I do not think so; that is offset by current assets. It should not be included in the bonded obligations or obligations by way of loan?

Mr. CAHILL: If I owe my hon. friend some money and tell him I have assets he will not accept that statement; he will want to know that the money will be paid now. Is the liability against the Grand Trunk which appears in this detailed statement at page 38 a liability against this undertaking which we are taking over?

Mr. ROWELL: It is so stated on this page.

Mr. CAHILL: There is the $35,000,000 and there is also the $22,000,000 representing current liabilities which will be liabilities against this undertaking?

Mr. ROWELL: No, the $35,000,000 or the greater part of it is included in the $448,000,000 but the $22,000,000 is not.

Mr. CAHILL: Where would it be in the $448,000,000?

Mr. ROWELL: I understand it is included in the amount of $202,000,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Does the Minister of Railways say it is in the $202,000,000?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, I gave that statement to-day in detail. I gave the figure $266,000,000 which is made up of this $202,000,000 and the $60,000,000 guarantee. Those added together make the $266,000,000 and that is included in the statement.

Mr. CAHILL: What was included, the $35,000,000 of stock issued?

Mr. J. D. REID: The greater part of the $35,000,000 is included in the $448,000,000, but not the $3,916,362 of notes payable—unsecured; nor the current liabilities of $22,801,474, the sum of $3,455,344 of reserves, or the sum of $7,286,995 representing advances to controlled companies, for this reason: The current liabilities are offset by the current assets, and we have assets on the opposite side of the account to balance at least three of these items.

Mr. CAHILL: There is a total funded debt of $173,000,000 in round figures, is there not?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: And there is an item of $35,000,000 notes, in round figures? What is the total of these two items?

Mr. J. D. REID: Two hundred and nine millions.

Mr. CAHILL: I would also like to know what total the minister has for the item to be found on page 40, "Grand Trunk Railway Company funded debt, bonds and debentures. Notes—Loans?"

[Mr. Rowell.]

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. gentleman has been discussing liabilities taken from the annual statement to December 31, 1917, whereas the statement I gave to-day applied to 1918, and naturally there would be a difference between the two statements.

Mr. CAHILL: Before the House rises for recess I would also like to ask the minister a question so that he can prepare the necessary information in the meantime. It must be quite apparent to the minister and to the committee as well that when we are entering into an undertaking of this kind we should have a statement up to date of the total liabilities that we are to assume under the present Bill and a statement of the total assets so that we may deal intelligently with the subject. It is all very well to say, "You are going to arbitrate," but before you arbitrate it is necessary to see whether or not there is anything to arbitrate. Before we pass this legislation empowering the Government to pay $60,000,000 to certain shareholders, and before any arbitration is entered into, we ought to know what the liabilities against the undertaking amount to, and also what the assets are.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. CAHILL: No.

At 6 o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CAHILL: Just before six o'clock I had pointed out that the amount of the funded debt was given in the statement of December 31, 1918, as $202,000,000. The minister said that the item of $35,000,000 should be added to the amount of the funded debt as given on page 38 of the statement of December 31, 1918. That would bring the total up to $209,000,000; I would like the minister to explain the discrepancy in these figures.

Mr. J. D. REID: In that $35,000,000 there is an item of $3,916,362.18, notes payable unsecured. In reality that should be under "Current Liabilities" or some other heading. The other three items of $12,000,000, $4,000,000 and $14,000,000 represent money borrowed on notes but secured by debenture stock as collateral; and in respect of these three items my hon. friend will see the following note at the foot of page 39:

$50,126,665.98 of Grand Trunk 4 per cent debenture stock further than above has been issued as collateral security for notes indicated thus.

The hon. member asked me a question something like this: Supposing you had the money, what would it take to clean up everything? Well, the $205,190,417.52 represents Grand Trunk debenture stock, some at four per cent, some at five per cent, some at six per cent; so that it would be hard to estimate just how much that stock would be worth if you were going to buy it. The same is true of the guaranteed stock, $60,833,332.51. The amount for which the Grand Trunk Railway Company is obligated in respect to guarantees of its subsidiary companies is $18,936,377.29. Adding these various amounts together, you get $284,980,127.32. Then there is the Grand Trunk Pacific and its branch lines, $216,253,111, so that the total liabilities, including the subsidiary companies, the Grand Trunk Pacific and its branch lines, and the lines in the United States, would be $501,233,238. These are figures which I myself have computed; they are subject to correction by my officials. I think, however, that they are fairly close to the mark. I asked the officials the other day to give me a statement of how the accounts stand right up to date. Of course, in most of these amounts there would be very little change—not enough to be of very serious import in this discussion.

Now, I will sum up these figures in order that hon. members may see how they stand. The funded debt amounts to $205,190,417.52; guaranteed stock $60,833,332.51; guarantees on American lines, $18,936,377.29; total on Grand Trunk and subsidiary companies, irrespective of Grand Trunk Pacific, $284,980,127.32. If you wish to take in the Grand Trunk Pacific and its branch lines, add $216,253,111 to that and you get a total of $501,233,238.

In that amount are included moneys advanced by the Government in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific. In addition to that the hon. member will see that there is an amount of notes payable unsecured, $3,916,362.18 which should be in the current liabilities. If we add that to the item of current liabilities amounting to $22,801,474.35, we have a total for the two items of $26,717,836.53 of current liabilities. But we have on the opposite side current assets amounting to $51,827,879.16 which would go to meet the current liabilities, so that there are no interest charges, the one item being supposed to offset the other. Then there are two other items, $3,455,344.86 and $7,286,995.75 as shown in the statement, but if hon. members will look at the other side of the account, they will find the same amount to balance them up; they are really simple bookkeeping accounts. My officials have not returned, but these figures are pretty nearly accurate. They are, however, subject to correction should my officials find any difference.

Mr. CAHILL: I want to go back to the statement again and straighten it out if that is at all possible. In the Grand Trunk statement on page 40 the total funded debt, etc., is shown as amounting to $202,332,997. On page 39, there is an item of $173,558,544.62, another item of $15,142,633.13 and another item in connection with equipment amounting to $5,344,207.54. These three items would total about $194,000,000. If you add to that the item of $35,548,235.08 less the notes payable unsecured amounting to $3,916,362.18, you get an amount much larger than $202,332,997. I should like the minister to explain the wide discrepancy in those figures.

Mr. J. D. REID: The item of $173,558,44.62 plus the three items of secured notes, that is, the $12,166,666.50, the $4,866,666.60 and the $14,598,539.80, make up the amount I have stated, $205,190,417.52. The other item of $5,344,207.54 is equipment notes against the equipment, and the railways always take that as a charge against the cost of operation. The interest on the equipment, and the deductions each year are taken out of operation and, therefore, that is not included in what we call capital account or what would be charged against the road; it is a liability against the equipment. What is really against the road is comprised in the amounts I have stated, guaranteed stock, funded debt, and so on, amounting to $501,233,238. The other items are liabilities in connection with operation, and there are assets on the opposite side to offset them.

Mr. CAHILL: In order to arrive at an intelligent understanding of this matter, it is necessary to know the total liabilities of the undertaking. We can then find out what the assets amount to. It was stated this afternoon that most of this $43,000,000 item consisted of loans to subsidiary companies that may or may not be of any value to this undertaking. What I want to get at are the total liabilities of the undertaking that the Government is going to take over.

Mr. J. D. REID: The total liabilities comprise the amounts that I have stated, totalling $501,233,238, a lot of which is stock at a low rate of interest, and the current liabilities amounting to $26,717,836.53. Then there are advances to American and Canadian lines amounting to about $18,930,377, but as they are subsidiary companies, that is not considered in the capital liabilities against the Grand Trunk Railway system. I do not think I can put the matter plainer than to say that the total liabilities amount to $501,233,238.

Mr. CAHILL: Is that the funded debt?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes. What you call the guaranteed stock and the funded debt.

Mr. CAHILL: Plus the $35,000,000 item.

Mr. J. D. REID: All of the $35,000,000 item except the item "notes payable unsecured" amounting to $3,916,362.18 is included in that amount.

Mr. CAHILL: Is the item of $15,000,000, advanced by the Canadian Government, included in that?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Grand Trunk loan? No, that is not in at all. That $15,000,000 loan to the Grand Trunk is in the books of the Government without having any interest added to it from the time it was first lent. It stands there simply as a liability, and the arbitrators will have to take it into consideration as a liability against the company when they are valuing the road.

Mr. CAHILL: Do I understand the minister to say that he had a more recent statement than this contained in the blue-book?

Mr. J. D. REID: No. I said I was just reading off the statement I gave to-day.

Mr. CAHILL: Is that being presented to-day for the first time?

Mr. J. D. REID: This statement is of December 31, 1918, and I asked for a statement of all the liabilities right up to date, and the amount is only a little more than the amount shown in this statement.

Mr. CAHILL: About how much difference is there?

Mr. J. D. REID: About $2,000,000 or $3,000,000.

Mr. CAHILL: That is up to date?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: And this is the first time that information has been presented?

Mr. J. D. REID: This is practically the first presentation of it. The blue-book we got out was prepared by our officials from the sworn returns which the railways make at the end of each year as to their financial position. The figures were compiled by the deputy minister and his staff. I asked the deputy minister to bring the statement right up to date the other day. But there is very little difference in the figures.

Mr. CAHILL: The most recent statement was the one you read to-day?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr DEVLIN: What was the total of the statement the minister read this afternoon?

Mr. J. D. REID: It was $205,190,017.52. To that had to be added $60,833,332.51 of guaranteed stock, making a total of $266,023,750.03. All the details were put on Hansard.

Mr. CAHILL: That statement only relates to the parent company?

Mr. J. D. REID: And its subsidiary companies, but did not include the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. COPP: There are two items on page 40 I should like explained, the item of $806,600 common stock of the International Bridge Company held by the public, and $808,900 of common stock of the Central Vermont Railway held by the public.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is common stock held by the public. It was not included in my statement, because it is not a liability.

Mr. COPP: Are those two items included in the $180,000,000 that will be arbitrated on?

Mr. J. D. REID: No.

Mr. COPP: I cannot quite understand what will become of this stock. It must be an asset.

Mr. J. D. REID: We have not guaranteed it. It is held by the public and is not included in the stock that will be submitted to arbitration.

Mr. COPP: This stock must be held by part of the Grand Trunk system.

Mr. J. D. REID: It is outstanding over and above our own stock. We are only purchasing the stock of the original parent company. If there is any stock of the two companies mentioned held by the public, it will continue to be held by the public. The public own a certain amount of common stock in a number of different companies.

Mr. DEVLIN: In addition to the $15,000,000 advanced to the Grand Trunk—page 39—are there any amounts due by the Grand Trunk Pacific which will also be included in the arbitration?

Mr. J. D. REID: No. The Grand Trunk Pacific is a subsidiary company and, of course, its assets and liabilities will all be taken into consideration by the arbitrators, but the only liabilities the Grand Trunk Pacific has are those towards the Government and the Grand Trunk. The arbitrators will take the whole of the Grand Trunk Pacific into consideration, and whatever the losses may be, some $8,000,000 or $10,000,000, they will have to be shown as losses, together with the losses of any other subsidiary companies. On the other hand, the profits will have to be taken into consideration. To clear up a point that was raised the other day I had the officials investigate why the Drayton-Acworth report showed the Grand Trunk to have received $3,413,699.20 more than my statement showed they had received. My statement showed the amount to be $15,142,633.13. The sum of $15,000,000 odd is all that the Grand Trunk ever got. They did purchase some other concerns some years afterwards, which companies had received subsidies at the time the roads were being built. To make the matter clear, I may read the following statement:

Dominion Government subsidies to companies now consolidated with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.

Beauharnois Junction	$ 62,400.00
Victoria Jubilee Bridge	500,000.00
Owen Sound branch	39,744.00
Grand Junction Belleville and North Hastings	21,888.00
Montreal and Champlain Junction	103,600.00
Northern Pacific Junction	1,320,000.00
South Norfolk	54,400.00
Waterloo Junction	32,800.00
Canada Atlantic	282,355.20
Ottawa, Arnprior and Parry Sound	932,512.00
Pembroke Southern	64,000.00
	$3,413,699.20

Drayton report shows total $3,423,699.20, a difference of $10,000 which we cannot trace.

The committee will thus see that these subsidies were all given to the railways prior to their purchase by the Grand Trunk and were not, therefore, paid direct to the Grand Trunk railway. I think it is well to have that point cleared up.

Mr. DEVLIN: On page 12 I find:

First Mortgage Lake Superior Branch	$ 7,533,000
Second Mortgage series A and B	20,169,000
Debenture stock	34,879,253
Loan from Dominion Government secured by debenture stock	15,000,000
Secured notes	9,720,000
Loan from Dominion Government secured by bonds due 1st April, 1919	10,000,000

Will these also be arbitrated?

Mr. J. D. REID: If the hon. member will read further he will see that the total liabilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific amount to $216,253,111. This will all be arbitrated in connection with the Grand Trunk system. There is considerable money already advanced by the Government, and it will be taken into consideration in the arbitration.

Mr. DEVLIN: That $15,000,000 is a loan direct in actual money from the Government to the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Government has vouchers to show for it, and why should that item be arbitrated?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is really a mortgage. In valuing the road the arbitrators will naturally take into account all the liabilities, no matter to whom they are due, and we are entitled to place that as a liability against the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. DEVLIN: Has the minister considered all those figures in the statement he has given us?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. EULER: What is the total amount of the indebtedness of the Grand Trunk Pacific to the Dominion Government?

Mr. J. D. REID: All the items are in the statement on page 42. The last loan from the Government was in 1918, amounting to $7,471,400. Of course, since the 1st of February of this year there would be added to that the amount that the Receiver borrowed from the Government in the Receiver's certificate. This statement, however, shows exactly the amount they got from the Dominion Government.

Mr. EULER: Will the minister give us the items?

Mr. J. D. REID: They are:

Loan from Dominion Government	$15,000,000
Loan from Dominion Government	10,000,000
Loan from Dominion Government	6,000,000
Loan from Dominion Government	7,081,783
Loan from Dominion Government, 1917	5,038,054
Loan from Dominion Government, 1918	7,471,400

Mr. EULER: Has the interest been paid?

Mr. J. D. REID: They kept paying the interest out of the amounts we advanced. No interest has been paid since the road went into the hands of the receiver. I am told by the deputy minister that we guaranteed about $76,000,000.

Mr. EULER: The liability of the Grand Trunk Pacific to the Government by way of cash loans would be something over $50,000,000. The guarantees constitute $76,000,000. I had understood the cash loans to be higher, but in any case the total liability of the Grand Trunk Pacific to the Government reaches $126,000,000. Is that correct?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. DENIS: If I understood the minister correctly, the total amount of the funded debt and guaranteed stock of the Grand Trunk, including the liabilities in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific, is approximately $501,000,000

Mr. J. D. REID: That is right.

Mr. DENIS: Therefore it is only if the assets exceed $501,000,000 that any value at all can be set on the stocks subject to arbitration. Am I correct?

Mr. J. D. REID: Whatever the assets are over and above that will represent the value of the stock arbitrated on; otherwise the $180,000,000 would be worth nothing.

Mr. DENIS: Supposing that the whole of the assets of the Grand Trunk of Canada are valued to the amount, not of $501,000,000, but below that amount, say, at $450,000,000, in what position are we? Are we not in this position, that in this particular case we would be paying $51,000,000 too much for the road because we have $501,000,000 of liabilities? These liabilities we cannot escape, as I intend to demonstrate in a few minutes if I am contradicted on that point. I am contending that we are liable for the whole amount of the liabilities; consequently, the country being liable for $501,000,000 and the whole property being worth $450,000,000, we would be paying $51,000,000 too much for the property. Am I right or wrong?

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member is supposing a case, but I cannot see how the condition he indicates can possibly arise.

Mr. DENIS: Is it not possible that the Grand Trunk would only be worth $450,000,000?

Mr. J. D. REID: You can put it at whatever you like. You might make it $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 just to make an argument. We had experts in connection with the Drayton-Acworth report and they showed that the company were always able to pay interest on this funded debt, together with the interest nearly every year on the first, second and third preference stock. They went into the whole situation, valued the assets of the company and after going over the case they decided, notwithstanding the Grand Trunk Pacific's failure, and the loss that was made there, that the Government should agree to take over the road and pay interest in perpetuity on the funded debt and the interest on the first, second and third preference and common stock. After these experts going into the situation and making that report, knowing that the Grand Trunk is earning this money, I think the hon. member is going far afield when he supposes that the Grand Trunk should only be worth $450,000,000. Of course, if he wishes he can say that it may only be worth $100,000,000. He can suppose whatever he wishes. What we will be liable for is not $450,000,000; the roadbed itself is liable for that. We are not issuing the bonds of the Dominion Government; we are only guaranteeing to pay some $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 in interest on the money invested by the railway company and secured by the bonds of that company.

Mr. DENIS: If I understand rightly the minister has joined issue on the point that we are assuming the liabilities of the company; in other words that we are simply buying the stock of the company, that we are becoming shareholders; but that in this status of shareholders we are by no means responsible for the liabilities of the company. Is that the stand taken by the minister?

Mr. J. D. REID: The shareholders must deposit their first, second and third preference shares and common stock with the Government and transfer this stock to the Government. We are then the owners of the stock and we can do as we like with the company, of course, subject to the bonds against the railway. That stock will be valued, and whatever the arbitrators award we pay interest at four per cent. But we are undertaking to pay the interest only; we are not saying anything about paying the capital. We agree to pay in perpetuity interest on the debenture stock amounting to something like $7,000,000 in round numbers; we agree also to pay the interest in perpetuity on the guaranteed stock amounting to $2,500,000 in round numbers with the right to pay the cash and take it over at the end of thirty years. We are going to give Grand Trunk stock to the first, second and third preference shareholders and the common stock shareholders, as security for the amount we owe.

Mr. DENIS: I said a minute ago that the country is assuming the whole of the liabilities of the Grand Trunk, not technically, not legally, but practically, and this is why I say so: First of all, we buy the whole of the stock of the Grand Trunk which has a face value of $180,000,000. I will not try to find out what price we pay for it. Supposing we get it for nothing or for a nominal price. But we do not get for a nominal price the guaranteed and debenture stocks. The guaranteed stock to the amount of $60,000,000 we assume.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. DENIS: The four per cent debenture stock to the amount of $155,000,000, we assume. The two together form a total of $216,207,138.71. We do not assume the payment of this debt but we pledge ourselves to pay the interest on that debt in perpetuity.

Mr. J. D. REID: You are talking about the Grand Trunk Pacific now.

Mr. DENIS: No, about the Grand Trunk.

Mr. J. D. REID: That amount of $216,253,111 refers to the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. DENIS: I will explain my figures. I have taken, at page 38 of the book, guaranteed stock, four per cent, $60,000,000. There is no question about that. Then I am taking what is under the heading of "funded debt" on the same page:

Funded debt—
Grand Trunk 5% deb. stock	$ 20,782,491.38
Grand Trunk 4% deb. stock	119,839,012.69
Great Western 5% deb. stock	13,252,322.48
Northern 4% deb. stock.. ..	1,499,979.65
Total deb. stock..	$155,373,806.20

The interest on that funded debt, or on what is called the debenture stock, according to the agreement, is to be guaranteed by the Government. Consequently we are guaranteeing the interest on debenture stock amounting to $155,000,000 and altogether we are guaranteeing interest on stocks or debentures to the amount of $216,207,138.71.

Well now, we are guaranteeing the interest no matter what happens to the road. If the road be successful in the future our guarantee will be of no use because we will not have to pay any interest. If the road should not be successful in the future and should not be able to take care of this interest, we will have to pay it; consequently I say we are assuming the liability of paying, or making good, the interest on a capital sum of $216,000,000, no matter what happens to the road. If the road becomes bankrupt we will have to pay the interest in perpetuity just the same. If the road should be destroyed by a cataclysm all of a sudden, we will also have to pay the interest in perpetuity. Therefore, I say we are involved by this Bill to the amount of $216,000,000—not in the sense that we have to borrow any money to pay it, but in the sense that we are liable for the interest; and when we go to the bottom of things being responsible for the interest of a certain amount of money in perpetuity is equivalent to being responsible for the capital. Hence we are in the same position as if we were paying the $216,000,000, with this difference: That we do not have to borrow the money, but in so far as our liabilities, in so far as the credit of the country, and in so far as the putting up of the guarantee is concerned, we are bound to the extent of the sum mentioned. Starting from that point I say that the country has taken an interest in this road to the amount of $216,000,000 plus the award which I am leaving aside for a moment. After we have committed ourselves for this amount of $216,000,000 we can never let the company go into bankruptcy; this everybody will admit. If the argument is strong now that we cannot let the road go into bankruptcy—I do not think it is very strong, but it is put forward as very strong by hon. gentlemen opposite—it will be many times stronger when we have committed ourselves to the extent of $216,000,000. We must take it for granted that in the future the Grand Trunk line has got to live, it has got to subsist, and it has got to run forever. Starting from the basic point that we cannot let the company go into bankruptcy, I say we are liable for the whole of the obligations of the company because every time the company is not able to fulfil its obligations, every time the company falls into arrears, every time there is a debt due on its part, if the company cannot pay the debt the Government will have nothing else to do but to go ahead and pay the money for the company, otherwise the creditors could place the company in liquidation. For that reason, I say that we are involving the country for the full amount of the liabilities of the Company, which is $501,000,000. On the other hand, we need not be too fearful of that, because on the other side of the ledger there are the assets. But what are the assets? That is the point—what is the amount of the assets? The minister said a minute ago "We had this property valued and we had the report from experts." I thought perhaps I was approaching the matter with too critical a mind when I attempted to say that perhaps they were not worth any more than $450,000,000. I hope they are worth more than that; but supposing they are not, I say the country would be losing the difference between the value of the assets and the fixed liabilities to the amount of $501,000,000.

Now coming to the practical point, my idea would be this: I feel that the margin between the assets and the liabilities, as we can understand them now, has been left too narrow. In other words, we are now establishing a minimum price for the assets of the Grand Trunk. In order that the country shall lose nothing, in order that the country shall not pay $501,000,000 for the property that is worth less than that amount, we should have to put the minimum price lower. The minimum price is the amount of the liabilities. If the liabilities are $500,000,000 we are liable for that aount and we cannot escape it. For that reason I call this the minimum price. If the assets are worth more than $500,000,000, then the position is saved, because the difference between the $500,000,000 and the value of the assets will be placed on the preferred and common stocks. My method of dealing with the transaction would be this: In order that the minimum price be not fixed too high, instead of submitting to arbitration the four stocks which I have just mentioned, we should submit to arbitration the five stocks. By taking the latter course the liabilities of the company are lowered by the amount of the guaranteed stock which is $60,000,000. If instead of submitting the four stocks to the board of arbitrators we submit the five stocks, immediately the liabilities of the company are decreased by $60,000,000 in so far as we are responsible for them, and the liabilities instead of being $501,000,000 would be $441,000,000—because out of the liabilities, as we make them now, we leave all the stocks that are going to be submitted to arbitration. If we did not omit those stocks that are to be arbitrated we would have to meet $501,000,000 plus $180,000,000 which latter sum represents the stocks to be valued. But we leave these stocks aside and we make this argument: We say this is not a liability in so far as the commitments of the country are concerned, because we do not have to pay for them. We have got to pay for the fixed charges and for the liabilities which are recognized and which we cannot avoid according to the agreement. Further, we are not obliged to pay any more unless the amount of the assets justify it. Consequently, the argument I am submitting is this: That in order to protect the country the five stocks should be arbitrated and then we would reduce by $60,000,000 what I will call the unavoidable liabilities —that is the liabilities which we have got to pay in any event——and instead of having liabilities to the amount of $501,000,000 they will amount to the sum of $441,000,000.

Then, if the arbitrators come to the conclusion that the assets are worth $450,000,000, a surplus of $9,000,000 will go to the guaranteed stock. If they come to the conclusion that the assets are worth $501,000,000 the whole of the guaranteed stock will be paid, as is proposed here. If they come to the conclusion that the assets are worth more than $501,000,000 then the difference between that figure and the value of the assets will be placed under common stock and first, second and third preference stocks.

Hon. gentlemen have frequently answered this argument by saying, directly or indirectly: "Perhaps that would have been a better proposal, but the Grand Trunk would not have accepted it." Mr. Chairman, I have already answered that objection; it has been answered several times from this side of the House, and I shall not elaborate the point now. But I repeat what has already been said so often during the course of this discussion: It is not for the Grand Trunk to fix the value of this property. It does not belong to a bankrupt company to say: "My terms are these;" it belongs to the Government to say—very equitably, from my point of view—"We are going to have your property valued by arbitrators; we will give you the full value of your property and no more. If that property is worth no more than $441,000,000 nothing will be paid on the guaranteed stock."

Then, Sir, if it should happen that the assets are worth no more than $441,000,000 the country would lose in the deal $60,000,000. What kind of position would the Government be in; what position would those hon. members on the other side who are supporting this measure—indeed, the people of the country—be in if the country, which is itself almost bankrupt, should be obliged to pay $60,000,000 that it did not owe?

I am supported in my opinion on this subject by the Drayton-Acworth report. I quote from the same passage to which the minister referred a while ago, page lxxxviii:

> We recommend that the entire share capital of the Grand Trunk, guaranteed, preference and ordinary, be surrendered to the trustees in exchange for an annuity based on a moderate but substantial proportion of $3,600,000, the average sum paid as dividend in the last ten years; and that this annuity should increase by 40 or 50 per cent after the first seven years.

The Drayton-Acworth report recommended the taking over by the trustees not of the four stocks only, but of the five stocks; and for those five stocks the Drayton-Acworth report recommended the payment of less than it is now proposed to pay for the four stocks. According to this report the annual interest payment should be a moderate proportion of $3,600,000 a year for the first seven years. It is hard to say what a "moderate proportion" would be in this case; I rather thought that fifty per cent would be a moderate proportion. But the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) argues that it should be a higher amount; I thought that he was taking into consideration the interests of the Grand Trunk rather than the interests of the country when he argued so strongly that a moderate proportion of $3,600,000 should be $2,500,000. At all events, that is a matter of appreciation.

To summarize, I contend that to commit the country to liabilities amounting to $501,000,000 without knowing the amount of the assets and without being in a position to reduce these liabilities by a dollar whatever the assets may be, is a very dangerous proposal.

Mr. EULER: As I said the other evening, I am personally in favour of the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway system, provided it is obtained under proper terms and for the right amount of money. It is very clearly established by the figures given by the Minister of Railways that the country will pay at least $501,000,000 for the road.

Mr. J. D. REID: That includes the Grand Trunk Pacific liabilities.

Mr. EULER: If I understood the minister correctly, he stated in reply to the member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) that the only valuation that could possibly be placed upon the $180,000,000 of stock that is to be arbitrated would be in so far as the assets exceeded the $501,000,000 of liabilities. If I am wrong in that, the minister will correct me. That is interesting to me, because the one thing of concern to me now is that a fair valuation be placed on that $180,000,000 of stock. That statement of the minister means, of course, that the matter of whether the assets exceed the liabilities of $501,000,000 is a purely business proposition. I would like him, therefore, to reconcile with that statement his other statement that the arbitrators ought to act generously. The question of generosity does not enter into business transactions, and I would like to be assured that so far as the Government are concerned the arbitrators will not be encouraged to deal with this matter in any other way than the ordinary business way; that, on the contrary, they shall valuate the property according to what it is worth, without any particular reference to generosity. To the extent to which the arbitrators exercise generosity, money is taken out of the pockets of the Canadian people and given to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The company ought to have simply what they are entitled to have; as a business proposition they ought not to get anything to which they are not entitled. Moreover, surely the deal is big enough to justify the provision that Parliament be permitted to pass upon whatever award is arrived at by the arbitrators in connection with the valuation of the stock; the award of three men should not be final.

Mr. ROBB: Considerable stress has been laid by the minister upon the Drayton-Acworth report. My recollection is that Mr. Drayton, now Sir Henry Drayton, with Mr. Smith, general manager of the New York Central railways, made an extended trip over the railways in Canada. Afterwards Mr. Acworth arrived in Canada, and all the knowledge that he had of the railway situation here was gathered from reports submitted to him by the other two commissioners, who had made a trip over the roads. Mr. Acworth agreed with Mr. Drayton in presenting a report which cannot be considered as recommending government ownership. In fact, my recollection is that the Drayton-Acworth report emphatically expressed itself as against government ownership and government operation of railways. What they recommended was a Board of Trustees, but Mr. Acworth had hardly got through with his job here when he went down to Washington and before a congressional committee there he was an expert witness, and the whole of the evidence submitted to that committee by Mr. Acworth went to show that public ownership and public operation of railways had been disastrous to every country in which they were tried. That is the evidence of one of the commissioners appointed by this Government to report upon our railway system, and it is hard to understand how Mr. Acworth can reconcile the report as he presented it to the Canadian people with his evidence before the committee at Washington. While a good deal of stress is laid upon the Drayton-Acworth report in an effort to prove that they were recommending a measure of operation under trustees whereby all those roads could be linked up and operated together, not operated by a government under a minister, there was another member of the commission who, I believe, it will be generally admitted, was the most expert railwayman of all the commissioners. I refer to Mr. Smith, general manager of the New York Central Railway system, a very large system covering a wide extent of territory. Mr. Smith was regarded by railwaymen as ranking with the most expert railwaymen of this continent, and he reported absolutely against public ownership or against the Government interfering in any way with the Government taking over the Grand Trunk railway. His report to the Government was that they should let the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk alone. He stated that the Grand Trunk had been so tightly tied up by the previous Government to the Grand Trunk Pacific proposition that it was crippling their distribution of dividends to the shareholders of the old parent Grand Trunk Railway Company. The evidence goes to show that the Grand Trunk went into the Grand Trunk Pacific proposition willingly with their eyes open, and they accepted the conditions laid down by the Government of the day.

Mr. ROWELL: What did Mr. Smith recommend that the Government should do?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend can find Mr. Smith's report in the report of the Royal Commission. I am not going to weary the House by reading it. It commences at page 91 and continues along. Mr. Smith recommends that the Government should leave the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk alone, and that they should release the Grand Trunk from its obligations as regards the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. ROWELL: Let the Government of Canada take all the obligations and give the Grand Trunk all the valuable assets.

Mr. ROBB: I am not arguing in favour of Mr. Smith's report. I was proceeding to argue that the Government of the day that made the bargain with the British shareholders who own the Grand Trunk railway, protected the rights of the people of Canada by tying the Grand Trunk up tight, and to-day we are not here looking after the interests of the British shareholders who made a bargain with the Government, we are here looking after the interests of the people of Canada. It might be wise for the Government to look after the interest of the taxpayers of Canada and allow Sir Alfred Smithers and his Board of Directors to look after the interests of the British or Dutch or German shareholders or whoever may own shares of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. That is their business. They made a bargain with this country in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific, and they gave certain guarantees. My judgment is that they should live up to those guarantees, and if they cannot live up to them, then let us do the same as any business man would do. Men come out to this country from Great Britain or Germany or Holland, and look for an investment. One man puts his money into railways; another man puts his money into real estate; another man puts his money into manufacturing. Is the Government going to step in and release from his obligations every man who makes a bad bargain? If the Government is going to take care of the man who puts his money into railways, it is just as much bound to protect the man who puts his money into real estate, or mines, or manufacturing, if he makes a bad bargain.

I want to come back again to the subsidiary companies that are not at all in Canada, that are in the United States where there is a large mileage of the Grand Trunk railway. Some of them go down through Vermont and part of New Hampshire; some run through Maine; some go into Michigan, and some into Illinois and Indiana. In this blue-book containing memoranda respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company acquisition, there is at pages 54 and 55, a statement of the deficits on these roads in 1917. In 1917, the Central Vermont railway showed a deficit of $154,729; the Atlantic and St. Lawrence railway showed a deficit of $1,272,496; and the western subsidiary companies—that is, the Detroit, Grand Haven and Milwaukee, the Grand Trunk and Western, the Toledo, Saginaw and Muskegon—showed a deficit of $1,302,154. Adding these together, you get a total deficit of $2,729,379 on the subsidiary companies which the Government proposes to turn over to the people of Canada—subsidiary companies that are operating outside of this Dominion, that are operating in the United States. What does that total deficit of $2,729,379 represent? We are inviting the people of Canada to-day to subscribe to a Victory Loan at five and-a-half per cent, and if we capitalize the deficits on these roads in 1917, we find that we are inviting the people of Canada to subscribe for $49,625,072. That is the amount of money that represents the deficits which this Government is proposing to turn over to the people of Canada in the subsidiary companies of the Grand Trunk railway as of the year 1917. I submit to my hon. friends in all seriousness: Would it not be well to pay a little attention to the taxpayers of Canada? It has been quite apparent this afternoon that even the members of the Government, including the Minister of Railways and the President of the Council who have had this matter before them and have been looking into it for more than a year, are not quite clear on the whole situation. Would it not be well to say to Sir Alfred Smithers: In view of conditions throughout this country and the echoes coming in from the different provinces, we do not feel justified in going on with this bargain; we do not believe that the taxpayers of the Dominion are prepared to shoulder this burden, and you had better live up to your contract made with the previous Government. If they cannot live up to that contract, let them go into liquidation if necessary. It would not be the first time that railways have gone into liquidation on this continent; receiverships are not new in railway experience.

I have a statement here showing that in 1910 thirty-nine railways in the United States went into the hands of a receiver, in 1913 forty-nine, and in 1915, eighty-five railways with a mileage of 23,834. Will any one tell me that the United States suffered because of these railways going into the hands of a receiver? They were able to weed these roads out, and that is the only correct basis of dealing with this Grand Trunk muddle. It is a muddle and the deeper we go into it the more muddled it seems. I appeal to my friends opposite to take a little more interest in the taxpayers of Canada and a little less interest in the shareholders overseas, because their directors will take care of their interests.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can the minister give the House the names of the other companies with which the Government is asking power to enter into an agreement? This clause provides that the Government shall have the right to enter into an agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada and with such other companies and interests as the Government may think necessary.

Mr. J. D. REID: It may be necessary to enter into an agreement with some of these subsidiary companies. That is why those words are there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can the honourable minister give the names?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have given the names of all the subsidiary companies. They will be found on pages 40 and 41 of the blue-book. To mention only one, the Montreal Warehousing Company is absolutely owned by the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Now we might have to enter into an agreement with that company. It would be purely a formal agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not anticipated that the Government will go outside of the companies mentioned on pages 40 and 41?

Mr. J. D. REID: No.

Mr. FIELDING: If the Montreal Warehousing Company is entirely owned by the Grand Trunk there will be no need of making an agreement with that company, because the Grand Trunk through its ownership of the common stock of the subsidiary company controls that company.

Mr. ROWELL: These words were only put in as a matter of extra caution, to make sure we had an absolute title to the stock. It may be that an agreement in some form would have to be made with the stockholders; they would have to be parties to the agreement. These words were put in simply so that the Government could make an agreement with whatever parties were necessary in order to secure title to the stock we are purchasing under the arbitration.

Mr. FIELDING: It is to be presumed in the case of the subsidiary companies either that they are owned entirely, or that the controlling part is owned, by the Grand Trunk. In either case it would not seem to be necessary to make a separate agreement, because if the Government becomes the owner of the Grand Trunk stock all they would have to do would be to call a meeting, invoke what they want, and carry it out. Can the minister tell me to which classes of stocks is attached the voting privileges?

Mr. ROWELL: All these stocks have the voting privilege. My hon. friend will find the different classes of stock, and the voting privileges attached to each, on page 57 of the blue-book.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With reference to the words "and interests" does that term include the possibility of acquiring such properties as hotels that may be owned by the railways?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Government contemplates taking over hotels as well?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, they are assets; the Chateau Laurier, for instance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the Government propose to run the Chateau Laurier?

Mr. ROWELL: The Government, when it takes over the stock, takes all that the stock carries, and it carries all the property of the Grand Trunk Railway.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is understood. The Government, then, is making an agreement not only for taking over the subsidiary roads, but all the hotels and the management of the hotels?

Mr. J. D. REID: We are taking over the assets, and as the hotels are an asset, we shall take them over, too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is the Government going into the hotel business under this agreement?

Mr. J. D. REID: We are taking over all the assets.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister answer my question direct?

Mr. J. D. REID: We are taking over the Grand Trunk system and all the assets of that system. The hotels are part of the system just as the Canadian Northern hotels are part of the Canadian Northern system. We are to-day operating that system. The Canadian Northern has hotels.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The President of the Council the other evening speaking of the haste with which the Government is trying to put through this legislation gave as a reason that the Government was anxious to enter into an agreement with the Grand Trunk at as early a date as possible. I would like to ask the ministers if the Government has contemplated submitting this agreement, when it is entered into, to Parliament for approval?

Mr. ROWELL: No. We are now asking authority to make the agreement. The central terms of it are set out in a letter which has been submitted to the House and are also in the Bill now before us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then what the Government is asking Parliament to do is simply to hand over its function to the executive; in other words, to defeat entirely a purpose for which Parliament is instituted, namely, to have control of the country's expenditure. Is that not the case?

[Mr. King.]

Mr. ROWELL: No. That is my hon. friend's statement of it, but his statement does not make it so. The terms upon which the company is to be acquired and upon which Parliament is asked to pass judgment are set out in the Bill and in the letter which has been submitted to the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the Government does not contemplate submitting the agreement to Parliament for approval, I should like to move to amend this clause by adding thereto the following words:

This agreement shall be submitted to and be subject to ratification by the Parliament of Canada.

In submitting this amendment I would draw the attention of the House to the fact that when the Government entered into a contract with the Grand Trunk Railway for the construction of the Transcontinental it brought down to Parliament the agreement which it proposed to enter into with the Company, and had the agreement submitted to Parliament in the form of a schedule attached to the Act. I have in my hand the Statutes of 1903, 3 Edward VII, Chapter 71, an Act respecting the Construction of a National Transcontinental Railway. On page 9 of the Act there is a schedule which has the following:

This Agreement made the twenty-ninth day of July, 1903,

Between:

His Majesty The King, acting in respect of the Dominion of Canada, and herein represented and acting by the Honourable William S. Fielding, Acting Minister of Railways and Canals, of the first part;

And

Sir Charles Rivers Wilson, C.B., G.C.M.G.; The Right Honourable Lord Welby, G.C.B.,; John A. Clutton-Brock, Joseph Price, Alfred W. Smithers, all of the City of London, England; Charles M. Hays, Frank W. Morse and William Wainwright, all of the City of Montreal, in the Dominion of Canada, and John Bell, of the City of Belleville, in the said Dominion, representing herein and acting on behalf of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, a company to be incorporated by Act of the Parliament of Canada at the present Session thereof, of the second part.

Then follow the terms of the agreement, with the following clause:

50. This agreement shall be submitted to, and be subject to ratification by the Parliament of Canada.

The words which I have suggested as an amendment to the present clause are the identical words that form part of the agreement entered into at the time the contract was made between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Government for the building of the National Transcontinental. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if Parliament is to have any control at all of the expenditure, and have full knowledge of the contract which the country is asked to enter into at the present time, this step is absolutely necessary. May I remind the House, further, that this session of Parliament was called for the special purpose of approving the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Germany. An international contract had been entered into and it was thought necessary to bring Parliament together to obtain its approval to the Treaty before the country should be made a party to it. If that step was a wise one in regard to that international obligation, I contend that a similar step is equally wise in regard to one of the largest transactions which for some time we have been called upon to enter into in this country, if indeed it is not the largest transaction the country has ever had occasion to consider.

Amendment negatived: Yeas 26, nays 49.

Mr. ROBB: Before the clause carries I may point out to the Government and their supporters that they have now refused to the people of Canada the rights which Mr. Smithers, representing the Grand Trunk railway, took good care to preserve for his shareholders. In clause 7 it is distinctly provided that this agreement shall not be valid until it has been approved and ratified by a majority of the shareholders. If we take over the road, will not the taxpayers of the country be the shareholders? And who represent the shareholders but the representatives of the people in this Parliament, including hon. gentlemen who have just voted away the rights and privileges of the people, which rights and privileges Mr. Smithers has taken every care to preserve for his shareholders?

Mr. DENIS: I think I may avail myself of the present fair attendance of hon. members to move a second amendment. A few minutes ago I gave some reasons why the five stocks should all be submitted to arbitration. As I pointed out, when this Bill passes the country will be bound, not according to my figures, but those given by the Minister of Railways, to liabilities amounting to $501,000,000; and if the asests of the company should total only $450,000,000 the country will be the loser to the extent of $51,000,000. In order to prevent this I submit that not only four stocks, but all five should be arbitrated. I pointed out a moment ago, and I shall now repeat the statement, that this is the advice given in the Drayton-Acworth report. What harm could it do if the five stocks were submitted to arbitration? The Grand Trunk Company would not suffer thereby. We would have those assets valued and pay the company their full amount. My amendment is to the effect that we should not be obliged to pay more for the Grand Trunk than the assets are worth. As things stand, we shall commit the country to liabilities of $501,000,000, irrespective of the amount of the assets; and in order that the country may not be bound to pay more for the Grand Trunk than it is worth and shall not pay in advance $60,000,000 for the guaranteed stock, which, after all, may be worth nothing, I think that the guaranteed stock as well as the other four stocks should be submitted to the arbitrators; and—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must direct the attention of the committee and of the hon. member to the fact that he is repeating absolutely the speech which he made a short time ago. That is entirely contrary to the rules, and it is my duty to draw the hon. member's attention to the fact and to request him not to repeat the speech he has already made.

Mr. DENIS: I submit to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I was merely trying to advance the same argument in another form, but if I am following too closely the trend of my previous remarks I will discontinue. However, I will state my point in a few words. We are now binding the country to liabilities which we know, namely, $501,000,000, as against assets which we do not know, I shall now give a new reason in support of my amendment. The Grand Trunk owes a debt to the Dominion directly and indirectly —directly for moneys which the company owes, and indirectly for guarantees which the Grand Trunk Company has given to the Grand Trunk Pacific, which is the property of Canada. If the Grand Trunk Company were to be liquidated this debt would be preferred as against the four per cent guaranteed stock of the company.

If the assets of the company should not be sufficient to pay all the debts, the debt of Canada should be paid in preference to the four per cent guaranteed stock amounting to $60,000,000. Is it not a great advantage for the country to have a preference for the payment of its debt against the Grand Trunk over the $60,000,000 of guaranteed stock? We are simply inverting the position, as a result of which this $60,000,000 of guaranteed stock will have a prefer-
