I sincerely believe that the proposed legislation with regard to sexual offences would meet the objectives I have just indicated, namely the protection of personal integrity and of children, public decency and even elimination of sexual discrimination. Also, it would clarify and simplify the work of police forces, the courts as well as of juries. I therefore recommend that the House pass Bill C-53 on second reading.

[English]

I would like to conclude by urging hon. members to recognize the importance of immediately referring this bill to committee. This will allow for a full discussion by hon. members and for representation by interested groups in Canada which have, for many years, lobbied and presented excellent briefs to make these amendments. I appreciate the interest which the public is taking in these legislative proposals. It is my hope that those who have views to express on them will seize this opportunity to make them known to the committee.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Where is the minister?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I believe there has been consultation between the leaders. I ask for the unanimous consent of this House to return to the item Tabling of reports of standing and special committees in order to table the sixth, seventh and eighth reports of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there has been that consultation, and we understand the nature of what the hon. gentleman wishes to do as chairman of the committee, and we are prepared to consent.

Mr. Knowles: So do we.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO SEXUAL OFFENCES AND THE PROTECTION OF YOUNG PERSONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-53, an Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and the protection of young persons and to amend certain other Acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this particular important piece of legislation. First I want to address a few remarks to the House. When I am saying these things, I do not want the parliamentary secretary to take any personal offence over his participation in this debate. However, I find it passing strange that this particularly important piece of legislation which has been brought before the House and which has received much attention from very significant groups in our country, is not important enough in terms of the priority of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), who has responsibility in this area, for his own personal attendance in this House in order to introduce this legislation. I find it absolutely unacceptable that the minister is not here, for whatever reason, having regard to the fact that the government is in charge and responsible for the timetable of this House. He is not here to introduce, speak on, participate and be in the House with respect to this very important legislation. If he is not really interested in the job, he should submit his resignation to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: This particular legislation is so important that I think hon. members of this House will understand the intensity of my feeling when I say to the Minister of Justice, wherever he may be and whatever he is doing, that if he thinks so little of this particular bill with amendments to the Criminal Code, important as they are, that he cannot find time in his schedule to come forward and speak on it at the time it is brought forward on the initial occasion—even though it is late in the night, even though it follows a number of other pieces of legislation which have been brought forward by the government which, in its own wisdom and judgment, considers it to be less important than such bills as the bill dealing with diplomatic immunity, and bills with respect to the measurement of gold in this country—if that is the attitude the minister takes, then I think it is about time that he decided whether he is really interested in his job, and if not, he should turn it over to someone who is, because that has been the history of this particular piece of legislation.

The priority this government has afforded this legislation is now demonstrated by the absence of the minister in this particular debate. What are the circumstances? This matter has been, in fact, under consideration by the government and previous administrations. It is not a completely novel legislative endeavour on the part of this government. The fact of the matter is that while there have been calls on the government to bring forward the legislation for debate on the floor of the House of Commons—and my House leader has raised this matter in the course of House leaders discussions, asking when the matter will come forward—there have always been other matters with respect to government business which seemed to be more appropriate.

Finally, late at night in the dying days of the session, the government sees fit to bring forward this particular bill. I want the people of Canada to know exactly what we face as far as this particular legislation is concerned. What we face is the prospect of going through this kind of limited debate on the floor of the House of Commons and the matter not surfacing again before this session is ended.

After all, as Your Honour well knows, we have now run since April of 1980 a session which originated after the last election. The custom, tradition and expectation is that there will be a new Speech from the Throne and a new session of Parliament in each year. There is now a lot of speculation in the press that by next fall, after the summer recess, the government will consider its priorities, economically, socially and otherwise, and will prepare and present to the House, very early after our return which will take place some time after Thanksgiving according to the government House leader, a new Speech from the Throne. The effect of that will be that all legislation which is on the Order Paper will then be null and void and we will have to start again from scratch. That will be as a consequence of the delay on the part of the government.

In any event, if we get the bill through now, the House will adjourn within a matter of days; I do not know exactly when. The Prime Minister has not indicated that it will be this Friday, but chances are that it will be either this Friday or possibly a few days into the next week.

An hon. Member: I hope you are right.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I am not commenting on it. I have indicated today that I for one think that Parliament has a responsibility to act on a number of important issues; and the postal dispute is one of them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I do not think we should be recessing this House when the people of Canada are under the burden of carrying a postal strike on their backs. I also think that there are a lot of other important matters which we should possibly consider bringing before this House. Also the government should consider bringing a new budget before the House. I could go on for a long time about the number of things that I think this House of Commons could usefully be doing. However, the reality is that the recess is upon us.

• (2130)

The government House leader has indicated that he will be putting down the motion. This bill will be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs which is now considering in some detail and depth the freedom of information legislation. My colleagues will know that that is an important bill and that much good and hard work has been done by the committee to make it the best possible legislation available to the people of Canada. All this takes time, and members are working very hard to try to get the bill into the best possible form. Who knows how long that will take?

Mrs. Hervieux-Payette: A thousand years.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette) says that it may take some time—a year, she says. I have no knowledge of whether it will take that long but I can say that members of this party are very serious about that bill and are all acting in a responsible manner to try to get the bill through committee. A great number of amendments have been put forward by the government and opposition parties with a view to improving the bill, and they require careful consideration.

Another important social bill must be given serious consideration, one initiated when this party was in government, the Young Offenders Act.

I just want members of the government to understand where all this puts the bill before us, in terms of priority. The committee also has a bill which deals with diplomatic immunity. All these items must be disposed of before the committee can deal with the bill before us which will require the most careful consideration.

In his introductory remarks, the parliamentary secretary indicated areas about which he had some apprehension and which he said the government will want to examine carefully.

Where is the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker? Why is he not here to address this legislation? Is he in Toronto laying charges in the uranium cartel prosecutions? There must be some reason why he is not here. Obviously he was sloughing off that prospect when he was in the House earlier today. Who knows where he is.

An hon. Member: Perhaps he is in Spadina.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Is he at the Tokyo restaurant in Vancouver? I want to know where the Minister of Justice is. I am very concerned that the minister is not here to lead off the debate on this very important piece of legislation and to tell the people of Canada what his priority is. As spokesman for the government he should be here. Parliamentary secretaries cannot speak on behalf of the government. They simply read the notes prepared by departmental officials. That is their function. The government is represented by a minister of the Crown.

An hon. Member: Perhaps he has been appointed to the Senate.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: No matter what the reason is, Mr. Speaker, I am terribly disappointed that the minister saw fit to be absent when such an important piece of legislation is introduced.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I know that the heckling and harping from the government benches is an indication of their acute embarrassment that the minister has neglected or refused to appear.

I want to deal with the provisions of this bill because I have a number of observations with respect to it which I think are appropriate.

This bill is the latest development in a full decade of extended discussions about reform of the law relating to sexual offences. It is over ten years since the Royal Commission on the Status of Women suggested changes be made in the law in this area. It is three years—

Mr. Peterson: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) spoke from anywhere but the seat of his pants, he might be noticed more often, not only in the House but outside the House. I know that members have been referred to as nobodies 50 yards from Parliament Hill, but the member for Willowdale is a nobody on Parliament Hill.

It is now over three years since the Hon. Ron Basford, when he was minister of justice, introduced Bill C-52 which proposed substantial revisions to the relevant sections of the legislation. It was introduced during the third session of the thirtieth Parliament and was not reintroduced in ensuing sessions.

Under the bill, sexual attacks were to be classified as two offences, indecent assault punishable by a maximum of 14 years imprisonment, and aggravated indecent assault, punishable by a maximum of life imprisonment.

In November, 1978 the Law Reform Commission of Canada made its contribution to the debate on the issue of revising the law relating to sexual offences. In passing, I would point out that a very strange situation arose because of the government's introduction of Bill C-52 in May 1978. The government knew that in 1978, the Law Reform Commission's recommendations were forthcoming. It knew, of course, what the very function of the commission was, and is; that is, to provide advice on questions of reform. Yet the government went ahead and introduced major revisions to the sexual offences provisions in the code only a few months before the commission was to report. That ridiculous turn of events is an interesting footnote to this debate.

The Commission's report recommended that reform be based on three fundamental principles: protecting the integrity of the person, protecting children and special groups, and safeguarding public decency.

It suggested that sexual assault be divided into two new categories, sexual interference and sexual aggression, the latter offence, needless to say, being the more serious of the two.

The commission also dealt with offences relating to sexual activities with children, with persons in positions of dependence. In addition, it made recommendations relating to spousal immunity for rape, soliciting and loitering and wandering in public places.

The government's next move, subsequent to allowing Bill C-52 to die on the order paper, came in the Speech from the Throne in April, 1980, that ancient document of which I spoke at the outset of my remarks. That speech indicated that the serious problem of violence against women would be addressed in amendments to the Criminal Code. As a result of that promise, the Minister of Justice introduced this bill on Janaury 12 of this year.

Bill C-53 is, without question, a very significant and very important piece of legislation. It has become known as the sexual offences bill. It must be borne in mind at the outset, however, that it is more than just a bill relating to sexual offences per se. It covers a wide range of issues. Not only does it concern issues relating to the substantive definition of sexual offences in the code, but it proposes changes in the law of evidence; it deals with the exploitation of young persons for pornographic purposes; it redefines assault; it proposes changes in the law affecting kidnapping, and it deals very briefly with some aspects of prostitution.

The bill has the appearance of being a kind of sausage factory production by the government. It got so far with respect to certain issues in amending the Criminal Code but did not consider some of the important issues that face us today with respect to sexual offences.

One area which my colleagues and I want to address is the absence of a definitive provision in the code or statement by the government about the problem of prostitution. This is an important problem in many areas of our country, particularly urban areas. It has been avoided except for a brief reference.

We must bear in mind the omnibus nature of Bill C-53 because there is more to it than the provisions which deal with sexual offences. Bill C-53 is an important legislative initiative. It deals with some of the more serious crimes in our society. The issue it raises relate to the most intimate and sensitive aspects of human relationships. It must be considered carefully and deliberately by this House and the committee.

I have a number of comments to make about the legislation and I should like to arrange them in several different groups or categories.

The first area of concern is offences relating to sexual relations with consenting young people. We all know that as it now stands, the Criminal Code defines several offences based on non-consensual sexual contact. Rape and sexual assault are, of course, the two examples of this type of offence that immediately come to mind. There are a number of other offences which deal with sexual relations that are essentially consensual in nature. Most of these offences are concerned with sexual activity involving young persons. There is a rather bewildering array of offences of this kind.

Section 146(1) of the code absolutely prohibits sexual intercourse with a woman under the age of 14. Section 146(2) prohibits sexual intercourse with a female of previously chaste character aged 14 to 16. Under Section 146(2), an accused may be found not guilty if the young woman was "more to blame" than the male for the sexual contact. Section 151 of the code presently makes it an offence to seduce a woman of previously chaste character aged 16 to 18. Section 152 states that it is a criminal offence to seduce a woman under 21 years of age under promise of marriage.

Bill C-53 promises to wipe away these existing categories of offences and to replace them with a much simplified regime.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall read two sections of Bill C-53 that it is proposed should, in effect, replace the present code provisions I have just summarized. There is no proper way to analyse these provisions without first looking at them in some detail. The bill contains two sections that deal with sexual exploitation of young persons. On page 3 of the bill section 166, subsection (1) reads:

166. (1) Every one who engages in or procures sexual misconduct with or by a person who

(a) is not his spouse, and

(b) is under the age of fourteen years, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years.

(2) No one shall be found guilty of an offence under subsection (1) if he establishes that

(a) at the time the sexual misconduct took place, he was under fourteen years of age; or

(b) he is less than three years older than the complainant.

(3) Where an accused is charged with an offence under subsection (1), it is not a defence to the charge that the complainant consented to the sexual misconduct or that the accused believed at the time the sexual misconduct took place that the complainant was fourteen years of age or more.

Clause 167 reads as follows:

167. (1) Every one who engages in or procures sexual misconduct with or by a person who

(a) is not his spouse, and

(b) is fourteen years of age or more and is under the age of sixteen years, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years.

(2) No one shall be found guilty of an offence under subsection (1) if he establishes that

(a) at the time the sexual misconduct took place he was under sixteen years of age;

(b) he is less than three years older than the complainant;

(c) he believed at the time the sexual misconduct took place that the complainant was sixteen years of age or more; or

(d) he is less responsible than the complainant for the sexual misconduct that took place.

There are a number of aspects of those sections that seem clearly meritorious. First, they provide equal protection to both males and females. The code as it now stands reflects nineteenth century attitudes that young women are passive and must be protected from males and that young boys can or should protect themselves. I think we all welcome changes which bring the law into the twentieth century and puts persons of both sexes on an equal footing.

The bill can also be commended, I think, for undertaking to repeal some of the anachronisms that presently haunt the law in this area. I think now of present Section 152 which makes it an offence to seduce a woman under promise of marriage, and Section 154 which prohibits "illicite intercourse" with the captain of a vessel. Again, such provisions reflect the societal values that held sway in the nineteenth century. They are now out of synch with contemporary thinking in Canada and should be modernized. These laws are never enforced, and the rule of law can only suffer if they are allowed to sit on the books.

One can also argue that this bill deserves commendation for the simple reason that it simplifies the law. As my earlier review of the present Criminal Code revealed, there is currently a rather confusing and complex series of offences of which citizens must be aware. Many people argue that simplicity in the law is itself a virtue.

Bill C-53 also abandons the difficult concept of "previously chaste character". For the benefit of the parliamentary secretary I point out that "chaste" is spelled c-h-a-s-t-e and not c-h-a-s-e-d. It is a troublesome phrase that is now found in Sections 146(2) and 151 of the code.

In addition, these two sections make some attempt to be sensitive to what might be called the normal sexual activities of teenagers. Such provisions are found in Sections 166(2) and 167(2) as proposed in the bill.

Finally the bill takes what is, in principle, a very sound approach in that it endeavours to protect young persons not simply from sexual intercourse, as is the case with the present code but also to protect them from other forms of sexual interference. The bill prohibits what is termed "sexual misconduct", a term about which I shall have more to say shortly.

On the negative side of the ledger there are some very significant questions and problems that must be addressed concerning new clauses 166 and 167 proposed in the bill. Perhaps the most troublesome aspect of these sections is the use of the term "sexual misconduct," to which I have just referred. Sexual misconduct is a term of imprecision. It carries with it the connotation that there is some sexual activity that is not misconduct. This notion is reinforced if one looks at what would become new Section 168(2). It refers to sexually explicit conduct. It is by no means clear where misconduct begins and conduct ends. Is holding hands sexual misconduct? What about a kiss, necking or fondling a breast? The criminal law is supposed to be characterized by precision and clear meaning. It is patently unjust to expose people to criminal liability when the nature of that liability cannot be readily determined in advance.

We in this House must look very carefully at the term "sexual misconduct" as it is employed in Bill C-53. We must investigate alternative wordings. The Law Reform Commission for example, defined offences in its report in terms of "touching for a sexual purpose". There are many other possibilities that need to be considered. I know, for example, that one of the reasons proposed by the minister in terms of changes in the Criminal Code involve the fact that the government wanted to get away from imprecision in terms of definition.

In December, 1980 the minister attempted for the first time to table this bill in the House of Commons, and was prevented by lack of unanimous consent, but I will not go further into that. Some other members may have observations to make with respect to the reason why they want to withhold their consent.

On page 13 of the information paper set up by the minister there is a criticism of the imprecision of some of the definitions in the existing code and suggestions that clear definition would be appropriate. There is some concern with the word "indecent". It points out in this paper that "indecent" involves judgments as to what is decent. I suggest to the parliamentary secretary, to members of the government and to the Minister of Justice, whoever he is and wherever he is, that he consider whether the definition of the term "sexual misconduct" should not be more clearly set forth in the Criminal Code.

There are other aspects of those provisions of the bill with which I am now dealing that deserve careful study. For example, certain age groups, and in particular persons aged 16 to 18, would no longer receive any special protection from sexual exploitation. One can argue that in today's society it is not necessary to extend special provisions beyond the age of 16. However, that is certainly a proposition that is open to challenge. We must look at the issue very thoroughly.

Another feature of Sections 166 and 167 that needs thought and investigation is the system of exemptions from liability based on the age of the accused or the age difference between the accused and the other party to the sexual activity.

Under the terms of Section 166, for example, conceivably, a person aged 13 could initiate sexual relations with a person much younger, a young child, and not be subject to any prosecution at all under the provisions of this particular legislation.

While I understand the purpose and purport of the legislation, these provisions must be looked at very thoroughly by the committee. This is not going to be an easy bill to get through. There are a number of provisions which deal with a number of aspects; of sexual offences, other criminal offences and other considerations. The minister decided in his wisdom to bring forward an omnibus bill which includes all of these matters.

One of the difficulties is that while there are particular issues to be dealt with, it may have been advisable for the minister, if he had given consideration to this legislation in advance, to divide the bill into separate sections dealing with different subject matters. We could then have dealt with it more expeditiously. That was not his decision. He decided to proceed on the basis of an omnibus bill. Knowing how things operate in this House, I can well understand that there may be something more to it than an interest in getting a bill through.

The penalties provided for in the bill also have to be looked at closely. For example, the sanction provided for a violation of Section 166(1) is ten years. The Law Reform Commission recommended a five-year term for an equivalent office. Under the code as it stands today, the penalty is life imprisonment. It will be necessary to look at the very substantial divergence in those options and to consider what is the appropriate sentence with respect to this offence.

Another aspect of Section 166 that I consider worthy of further discussion concerns the fact that it is an offence of absolute prohibition if a person has sexual relations with another person who is under age 14. It matters not that there was a belief that the young person was over 14. Indeed, under the terms of the bill as it now reads, the young person could consciously mislead the party and still that first party would have no answer to a charge under section 166.

Provisions of strict liability such as this do not sit well with the basic tenets of our criminal law system. People are supposed to be punished, particularly so for serious offences, only when they intended to commit a wrong. Therefore, I would suggest that we look at the Law Reform Commission's proposal that a defence of "reasonable diligence" be available. The accused would be found not guilty when, to use the commission's words, "After the exercise of reasonable diligence, proof of which lies upon him, he believed at the time of the offence the person to be older than the age specified".

Finally, I want to refer to Section 167(2)(c) which does provide for a defence when the accused "believed at the time the sexual misconduct took place that the complainant was 16 years of age or more". I simply point out that the wording used in the subsection leaves the door open to another Pappajohn controversy. The bill does not indicate whether such belief need only be honest or whether it must be honest and reasonably based.

Let me now turn to those parts of Bill C-53 which deal with non-consensual sexual relations, the sexual assault provisions. This is of some particular interest across the country. It is this aspect of the bill that is generating the most press coverage, the most general interest, especially from the women's groups across the country.

There is a very good reason for this concern and interest that has been expressed both publicly and by interest groups across this country. Rape and sexual assault are terrible crimes and are mournfully widespread. It has become a part of our way of life unfortunately that women must at all times take precautions against sexual assaults. They must be careful when at home and when in public. They must be alert and wary at all times. Because males do not have to live with what is in many cases a very real blanket of fear, it is a state of affairs that is often overlooked.

Let me quote very briefly from a fact sheet prepared by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women. The fact sheet, entitled "Rape and Sexual Assault", indicates that in 1979 alone there were 3,388 rapes reported to police in Canada. Studies, by the way, show that only one in every eight rapes is ever reported. The advisory council says that a woman is raped every 29 minutes in Canada and a woman is sexually assaulted every six minutes. The other great issue surrounding the question of sexual assaults is, of course, the treatment that complainants receive at the hands of police and in the courts. Trials are genuine ordeals for complainants. We often hear of rape trials described as proceedings that actually put the complainant herself on trial.

This bill proposes a major and fundamental reformulation of the sexual offences in the Criminal Code. The code at present contains Section 143, the section which defines rape, Section 149, indecent assault on a female and Section 156, indecent assault on a male. There are also sections dealing with bestiality and buggery.

Bill C-53 would replace these sections with a simplified regime composed of two offences; sexual assault and aggravated sexual assault. To accomplish this, the bill would create new Sections 246.1 and 246.2. These would read as follows:

> 246.1 Every one who commits a sexual assault is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years.
> 246.2 (1) Every one commits an aggravated sexual assault who
> (a) uses a weapon during or at the time he commits a sexual assault; or
> (b) commits a sexual assault that causes seriously bodily harm.
> (2) Everyone who commits an aggravated sexual assault is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

The Minister of Justice states in his information paper that in making these changes "the law would focus on the violent nature of sexual crimes." The orientation of the offence would certainly be changed because of the fact that penetration, an element of rape that must now be proven, would not need to be proven to establish an offence of sexual assault or aggravated sexual assault. Penetration is not a required element of either offence.

However, we must not be too confident that the amendments proposed in this bill will mean that the sexual element of the crime will be ignored. Complainants will still have to explain specific incidents. Penetration and other details of an intimate nature will be highly relevant to the charge. I would expect that largely the same evidence would be led under the proposals contained in this bill. I say this simply as a cautionary note. It is my personal view that it is wise and advisable for the law to recognize that sexual assaults are crimes of violence and that their sexual character is a secondary feature.

There are some aspects of proposed Sections 246.1 and 246.2 that we need to look at closely. First and foremost is the notion of "sexual assault". While the concept of "assault" per se is defined in Clause 18 of the bill, sexual assault is not defined.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I note that you are about to call it ten o'clock. Before you do so, I wonder if I might direct a question to the government House leader with respect to the business that we will be dealing with tomorrow. I wonder if he could be specific with respect to the bills he intends to call tomorrow.

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Earlier this evening I spoke to the House leaders separately about the business for tomorrow. I indicated to them that we will deal with Bills S-10, C-79, C-81 and, if there is time, Bill C-14. We had a meeting at which we talked about those bills at the beginning of this week. It looks as if we will be able to get three of them, and maybe four through all stages with a minimum of speakers. Tomorrow should be a beautiful day for House business and the precise order of business will be S-10, C-79, C-81 and C-14.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, it is correct that the government House leader discussed with each of us separately the business for tomorrow. He also knows I registered as strong a protest as one can to a good friend about the business being handled in this way with the result that on this important bill, C-53, there have been statements by the spokesman for the government and the spokesman for the Official Opposition, but our spokesman is frozen out. It could be that if this bill is not called again tomorrow, it will not be called again before the recess, which means that the Liberals spoke on July 7 and the Tories spoke on July 7 but the NDP does not speak until October. There is an element of unfairness in that, and I think at the very least we should continue with second reading of Bill C-53 tomorrow until the hon. member for Burnaby has spoken. Maybe at that point we could conclude the debate and send the bill to the standing committee, but if my friends to the right will not agree to that, the debate could be adjourned at that point. I think in all fairness one spokesman for each party should have the floor at this stage of the debate.

Mr. Pinard: In all fairness to my colleagues, Mr. Speaker, when I spoke to them about the business for tomorrow it was before the debate on Bill C-53 had started. When I spoke about the order of business for tomorrow to both the House leader for the Tory Party and the House leader for the NDP, we were in the midst of debate on C-67. There was no clear indication when we would get second reading of Bill C-67. We got second reading at about nine o'clock tonight. Therefore, we have to stick to the order of business that had been announced last week. We started debate on C-53. I have to respect, in all fairness, the word I gave to both House leaders. If I am relieved from keeping that word and there is an agreement by the House leader of the Tory party on this point, I might consider the request by the hon. member, but if I do not have such an agreement, I am sure he would not want me to go against the word I have given him.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think those discussions we had earlier are important. They are important with respect to planning. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has indicated, there will be other opportunities for the contribution of their critic, which we look forward to hearing. I think the order of business should stand. That was our understanding and our arrangement.

While I am on my feet, there has been a considerable amount of discussion about the adjournment of the House. I do not know what the government House leader's intention is with regard to the planning of their individual business both here and in their constituencies if the government House leader could give some indication of the government's intention in respect of adjourning the House.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be useful to have a meeting tomorrow to discuss the possibility of adjourning soon. I might give notice of the motion tomorrow. This is not decided yet but it will be decided very soon, as I told my hon. colleagues earlier. Maybe during that meeting we could discuss the possibility of not debating that motion, and then maybe allow the NDP speaker to say what he has to say on Bill C-53. I do not know, but all this could be discussed at the meeting I propose to have tomorrow afternoon.

● (2205)

Mr. Knowles: I shall certainly be glad to attend the meeting tomorrow where we can discuss these matters. I regret that my friend, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), was not prepared to agree at least to have three speakers before we leave this debate. However, the matter is in a sense still open if we can find some opportunity for the hon. member for Burnaby to speak this week. So I have no option but to accept what the House leader has announced, but we can discuss it further when we meet tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AVIATION SAFETY: (A) CURTAILMENT OF AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL SERVICES AT CALGARY INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT; (B) SHORTAGE OF AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, the question I wish to raise tonight arises out of the curtailment of air traffic control service at Calgary International Airport effective July 4, between the hours of midnight and 6 a.m. as recorded at page 11133 of Hansard of July 2, 1981.

This curtailment has been caused by a shortage of qualified air traffic controllers in Calgary, which is in turn part of a much larger problem, namely a very serious and critical shortage of air traffic controllers throughout Canada. Dealing specifically with the Calgary Internationl situation, there can be no doubt that this curtailment of services will cause inconvenience and disrupt traffic. As I am sure you are aware, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the negative aspects of the NEP, Calgary is a very dynamic and active city with a lot of air traffic which will be disrupted. More important, it will impair safety. That is a very important question.

Furthermore, it has been pointed out by the Air Traffic Control Association that it could raise some very serious and important legal implications with respect to the people on duty. To summarize what Mr. Robertson, president of the Canadian Air Traffic Control Association, said in a press release dated July 2, he indicated the flight advisory services to be put in place cannot provide for positive separation between aircraft, or aircraft and vehicles on the surface of the airport. This is now provided by air traffic control. Despite the fact the advisory services will be provided by air traffic control supervisory personnel, it still remains only an advisory service. Mr. Robertson was also critical of the fact that although some of the personnel were familiar with the Calgary airport, others were not. In addition, none of those selected have been given training for their advisory duty. In addition to the obvious safety hazards of the proposed operation, he noted there are also serious questions of legal liability for both the individual supervisor involved and the Department of Transport in the event of an incident or accident.

Now, Mr. Speaker, at the time I raised the question I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to kindly confer and consult further with the Calgary Transportation Authority. That authority is indeed a very progressive, responsible and dynamic organization which has done a lot to further the development of aviation services in Calgary, indeed in all of Canada. I hope the parliamentary secretary will give this House tonight an indication of what further consultation and discussions have gone on with that authority in order to resolve this problem because the minister did undertake personally to me that further discussions would take place. It should be noted as well that while there is an over-all shortage and difficulties in staffing control towers with sufficient numbers of qualified personnel, the situation in Calgary is somewhat unique given the high pay scale and other difficulties with respect to the acquisition of adequate personnel. This is a unique situation which should be looked at, perhaps in isolation.

As I said earlier, there is a chronic and very serious shortage of air traffic controllers throughout the country. The Minister of Transport does not agree with the observations of CATCA. I must say that the officials of CATCA have warned the Minister of Transport and Transport Canada on a number of occasions.

In answer to a further question which I directed to the minister on July 3, he indicated:

The problem is not of the magnitude my hon. friend says it is. I observe that he has bought the CATCA figures as to the number of air controllers that are needed.

They are suggesting that we need 250 additional air traffic controllers right now. On May 19, during the appearance of CATCA before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Transport Mr. Robertson, the president, said that there was a serious understaffing problem at Calgary and that a curtailment of services would take place. It is passing strange that the minister would reject that testimony when in fact during the Dubin inquiry on aviation safety in November, 1980, the Department of Transport, in its report to Justice Dubin, drew attention to the serious problem of understaffing in air traffic control services. In the estimation of the Department of Transport, 1,036 additional controllers would be required by 1985-1986. Also serious problems were designated in Vancouver where there was a shortage of 22 controllers, 12 in Calgary, 15 in Edmonton, 58 in Toronto, 50 in Montreal, 20 in Gander and 75 in other points.

In his response the minister indicated that they are accelerating the process of turning out controllers and that there would be 120 to 150 controllers processed commencing September of this year. This is an improvement over the 50 to 60 per year which are currently being turned out, but it will not be sufficient to meet the demands of 250 at the present time and it will not be sufficient to meet the 1,036 required by 1985-86.

The minister must accept the magnitude of the problem. He must be prepared to act. It is the government's responsibility to provide the financial and human resources to protect and preserve the integrity of the air traffic control system in Canada.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the curtailment of the airport control service at Calgary airport between midnight and 6 a.m., the only traffic movements which are being curtailed are those operating under visual flight rules. Approximately 80 per cent to 85 per cent of flights using the Calgary airport between midnight and 6 a.m. do so under instrument flight rules. For those two to three flights per hour, IFR control service is still available as are advisory and emergency services.

The Calgary Transportation Authority expressed some concern that the Calgary airport could not retain international status if full air traffic control services were not available 24 hours a day. This, however, is not true. For example, Windsor is an international airport designated for regular use by international scheduled air transport, as is Calgary. In the case of Windsor, the tower is closed between 10.45 p.m. and 6.45 a.m.

With respect to the broader question of a national shortage of air traffic controllers, currently the numbers of qualified controllers coupled with on-the-job trainees are in accordance with the number of approved positions. However, at any given site a combination of factors such as illness, training failure rate and availability of overtime staffing may lead to periods when normal control services may no longer be possible. In the longer term, the predicted shortages of qualified air traffic controllers is a problem which is being addressed on a priority basis.

A realistic estimate of the situation is that approximately 520 controllers will be lost due to attrition over the next five years. In addition, there will be at least 150 new operational air traffic control positions created as a result of increases in traffic and the opening of new traffic control towers across Canada. The new air traffic control training system being put in place later this year is expected to produce between 120 and 150 newly qualified controllers each year.

To restate the situation, for comparison, over the next five years we expect to produce between 600 to 750 controllers to meet an estimated requirement for 670 positions. These figures are intended for planning purposes only. The actual number of controllers trained can be adjusted to some extent to meet the actual needs.

POST OFFICE—TIMING OF PARLIAMENTARY SUMMER RECESS—EFFECT ON POSTAL STRIKE—(A) EFFECT OF STRIKE ON SMALL BUSINESS; (B) ROLE OF POSTMASTER GENERAL

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I was thinking about finishing the speech I started earlier today, but in view of the fact that I have another important issue to raise, I will not do that but, rather, I will continue at another time to speak on Bill C-53.

What I wish to talk about tonight is the peculiar attitude—and one can only describe it as peculiar—taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with respect to the question of the postal strike. Any thinking Canadian or legislator in this chamber must have deep concern about the consequences and effects of a postal strike on the average citizen. I am not talking about big business or medium-sized business, but about the average, so-called well-defined little guy who lives in each and every one of our constituencies. I am talking about the pensioner, the person who does not necessarily receive a government cheque, but many of whom rely on the mails for whatever little income they receive from some trust company or some small investment. I am talking about the little businessman. In an area such as mine, in Saskatoon, which is not a large city, and in the surrounding district I represent, substantial inconvenience is caused to those people who rely on the mails by virtue of a postal strike. I raised this matter in the course of question period yesterday. I tried to bring to the Prime Minister's attention some of the serious consequences which will flow as a result of this strike. I called on the government and the Prime Minister to take some action to deal with this strike before the House adjourns, which has been anticipated to be this coming Friday.

Regular mail delivery is an essential service for millions of individual Canadians, particularly for those in remote areas, for the pensioners and small businessmen I referred to. Pensioners who do not live in major urban centres are faced with the prospect of either a long period without income or a long and difficult trek to a distant town. I suggest that Canada's senior citizens should not be forced to be pawns in the government's game of chess with the Post Office. Those in remote areas lack the same access to couriers as those in major urban centres. They rely heavily on the mails for communication with the rest of Canada.

I pointed out to the Prime Minister, as has been pointed out to him a number of times before, it is estimated that some 1,000 to 1,500 small businesses will go bankrupt for each week the strike continues. The cost to the Canadian economy will be between 6,000 and 9,000 jobs. The Canadian Direct Mailing Association estimates that its members will lose $2.9 million for each day the strike continues. This matter cannot be allowed to continue to drift without some government action. At the moment the two sides are not even talking, which I suggest is primarily due to the failure of the Treasury Board to bargain in good faith.

An interesting article appeared in the Toronto Star last weekend in which the labour reporter John Deverell suggested that on the basis of his information an examination of the attitude of the federal government with respect to the postal strike is one which is a kind of scenario situation. The only similar situation I can liken this to is with respect to the infamous cabinet document which dealt with the constitutional strategy which we all remember so vividly. In the case of the postal strike there was a scenario set down as to how the minister and the government could be perceived as being tough, holding the line and curtailing inflation. In other words, the kind of government cynicism toward the consequences which the postal strike will have on the Canadian people, in effect, turns out to be the second prong of its anti-inflation program. I remind the House that the first prong is the high interest rate factor. The second prong is a sort of facade which it is now putting on to be tough on a high profile union which does not have any popularity in Canada. In fact, it is one of the least popular unions in Canada.

However, this is a kind of facade which I suggest the government is putting up. It says, on one hand, "We will not go back to bargaining. We will not take any initiatives with respect to negotiations. We will sit back and let Canadians suffer through a long strike."

On the other hand, it says it will not take any legislative action. It is not going to negotiate. I suggest it is an obligation for the government to legislate. Either the government must return to the bargaining table to bargain in good faith, or it must take action to legislate an end to this strike. I would be most interested in hearing the views of the government as to why—and it cannot be serious—it is going to have this House adjourn without taking some steps with respect to the resolution of this matter. We cannot have Parliament adjourned, the only instrument which can allow the matter to be brought to resolution, until the middle of October, which is the proposed time for the adjournment according to the government House leader. We have a responsibility as legislators here.

I will be interested in hearing whether the response of the government is really and truly serious about its determination to cause the people of Canada the suffering that it intends to cause them by sitting back, doing nothing and taking no action either by negotiation or legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Serge Joyal (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, allow me to make a correction. I am not Parliamentary Secretary to the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) but to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). I listened carefully to the comments of my colleague from Saskatoon West and I also heard the remark of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I would ask him to listen, because I think he could agree on some points. The hon. member for Saskatoon West started out by pointing out the disastrous effects of any strike in the public sector on the underprivileged or on those with fixed income which they receive in the form of pensions or proceeds from income they saved throughout their life. It is true that any strike in the public sector has disastrous effects, and they can be more disastrous in some sectors than in others. Let me simply remind the House that strikes in the hospital sector, to name only one, have even worse consequences than strikes in the postal service. Strikes in the education system are also felt very strongly by parents who see their children lose their school days on playgrounds or other public places. Therefore, no strike in the public sector should be taken lightly by legislators. However, when they recognized the right to strike to employees in the public sector, they did so responsibly in the hope that unions would also use it responsibly. Moreover, any union which must continue to serve the public and to negotiate with public support, especially when trying to negotiate working conditions in the hope that they will be extended to all other sectors of public administration, must also do so with public support. This is why an unmotivated strike, which seems without merit or motive called at first glance to challenge a principle, will not find public support, as we can see once again today in this House. Most opposition spokesmen during Oral Question Period urged the government to put an end to this strike immediately. Last week, the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), asked the government to accept all the recommendations in the conciliation report. However, in 1978, the Union of Postal Workers itself turned down the report of the conciliation committee.

Today the same union criticizes government negotiators for not accepting the conclusions of the conciliation report. The hon. member must know that the conciliation procedure is not the same as the arbitration procedure. A conciliation report can be accepted or refused by one or the other of the parties to the negotiations, and no ill will is alleged in such a case. It happened in 1978 when, by refusing the report of the conciliation committee, the union called for a strike and this Parliament had to legislate the strikers back to work by introducing Bill C-8. Therefore, at this time, in order to reach an acceptable settlement of this dispute while preserving what we consider as a fundamental principle, that of the right to strike in the public sector, exercised with a sense of responsibility, both parties must come back to negotiation. Government negotiators have accepted a great number of the recommendations contained in the report of the conciliation committee. There is a problem with the number of annual holidays, the number of weeks of leave after five or ten years of continuous service and the increase in shift and week-end premiums. I shall be able to reply to the hon. member for Burnaby if he wants to ask me questions during Oral Question Period.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—STATUS OF ROBERTSHAW STUDY OF CHILD FATALITIES CAUSED BY PARENTAL NEGLECT; RESPONSIBILITY CENTRE FOR CHILDREN

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking tonight to protest the termination of the federal child abuse study. Initiated in 1978, this study has been conducted by lawyer Corinne Robertshaw, who was seconded to the Department of National Health and Welfare for this purpose.

From the beginning of the study, Mrs. Robertshaw has involved leading human service professionals from across Canada who are working in the child abuse neglect area in the discussion of the issues arising from her research. She has conducted this research by means of intensive study of legislation and relevant literature. She has travelled to major treatment centres for observation and interrogation of child abuse teams and for interviewing related personnel. Professionals in the private and in the public sector have been aware of and supportive of her mandate since its inception and have welcomed her visits and her requests for consultation as the first clearly visible federal interest in the most malignant of the nation's growing child welfare problem.

Following two interim discussion papers, each leading to a meeting in Ottawa of all the involved professionals with the resulting transcripts of their deliberations, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), in spite of the overwhelming support expressed by these professionals for the completion of the study, suddenly moved to terminate the child abuse study, thus eliminating the crucial final stage in which Mrs. Robertshaw's findings and the input of the multi-disciplinary groups of professions would have been synthesized by Mrs. Robertshaw.

Out of this was to come a final report with recommendations, the outcome of which the consulting professionals have an understandable considerable investment in terms of time and energy, not to mention the widespread appreciation of Mrs. Robertshaw's research expertise and study methodology, concern for the taxpayer's money and, most important, the hopes that many had about the potential impact of this study on the welfare of Canada's children.

Adjournment Debate

On April 21, 1981, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) questioned the Minister of National Health and Welfare in the House following the initial announcement of the termination of the child abuse study. The minister insisted that the study was in fact complete. In this she misled the House. The papers produced prior to the minister's statement were simply interim papers marked "For discussion only", and not for circulation because of the sensitive nature of some of the material and the tentative aspects of some of the recommendations which Mrs. Robertshaw expected to be modified following group discussion.

On May 29, 1981, Mr. E. M. Murphy, assistant deputy minister of the Policy Planning and Information Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare, wrote all the professionals with whom Mrs. Robertshaw has been working, requesting that they sign a release to allow the government to distribute the two interim papers and the transcripts from the two Ottawa meetings convened to discuss them. It was obvious to most of the people contacted that the move was a ploy to get them to sanction government publication of the suddenly complete child abuse study, with the equally obvious result that Mrs. Robertshaw would not thus be allowed to write the expected final paper representing a synthesis and resulting conceptual extension of all the previous documents.

Since it is this final paper that represents the pay-off for all the combined efforts, many of those most closely associated with the project refused to sign the requested releases in protest, urging, instead, that Mrs. Robertshaw be allowed to complete the study, which she had indicated she can do in six months' time, working alone.

We in the NDP want to see this study completed. We will not be satisfied with the Badgley report on sexual offences against children, because it only covers one aspect of child abuse, nor will we be satisfied with a half-hearted release of a handful of background papers such as the minister proposes. There must be a revival of government support for the completion of this study and an extension of the life of the child abuse study to completion. Only this can prevent the demise, the extreme abuse and neglect of an exceptionally important and well executed study which is vital to the welfare of Canada's children.

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I would like just the same to take this opportunity to clear up somewhat the confusion about the status of Mrs. Robertshaw's study on some points of the act dealing with child abuse and neglect. The next few minutes will be used to clear up the matter.

As has already been said in this House by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), the department agreed to sponsor that important study in 1978. Under the first contract entered into with the researcher, Mrs. Robertshaw, who was seconded to the Department of National Health and Welfare to undertake that work, the study was to extend over an 18-month period. In May, 1980, or at the end of the initial period, a ten-month extension was granted to the researcher to allow her to go on with her work. At the end of that period, in March 1981, two further extensions were granted, the first one to allow Mrs. Robertshaw to prepare the transcripts of the second national consultation held in March 1981, which had attracted the participation of prominent doctors, lawyers, sociologists and other professionals involved in the problem of child abuse, as was the case during the first consultation held in 1980. The second extension was granted to Mrs. Robertshaw to allow her to pursue the question of publishing the transcripts of proceedings of these two national consultations, since the Department of National Health and Welfare had the intention to publish not only the two discussion papers referred to, but also the proceedings of the national consultations themselves. As it happened, a number of participants in the national consultations declined to have their comments made public, pointing out the confidential nature of the meetings. Quite obviously, the Minister of National Health and Welfare went along with that decision and therefore, at their request, the transcripts of the proceedings will not be made public.

However, as the minister pointed out, the House has already been given the assurance that both discussion papers will be made available to all interested parties as agreed. I have been told by the department that the two documents have been translated and that they will be printed as soon as possible. I understand they will be available soon. I must say to all hon. members who have shown their interest in those documents that they will be given copies of them as soon as they are ready.

As the Minister of National Health and Welfare has already told the House, the Department of National Health and Welfare intends to continue working with the public and private sectors, particularly with the provinces, to find ways of controlling and eventually eliminating the very serious problem of child abuse.

The minister intends to urge her provincial counterparts to renew the efforts which have been made within families which are guilty of such offences, and to draw full benefits from the federal cost-sharing program which is available to them for that purpose.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

At 10.34 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

FORESTRY

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY ON INDUSTRY IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that a recently released study directly attributes the disastrous financial losses suffered this year by British Columbia's southern interior forest industry to high interest rates, and because the forest industry is a critical component of the country's economy and a major employer in Canada, and because the government's inaction demonstrates an astounding inability to solve today's economic problems, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That this House condemns the government for the lack of an effective economic program for these difficult times.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE JUDICIARY

ACTION TO NOMINATE WOMEN AS SUPREME COURT JUDGES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, yesterday President Reagan announced that he was entering the name of a woman, Sandra O'Connor, into nomination for the Supreme Court of the United States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McLean: It will be noted that it took a conservative administration to break with two centuries of male exclusivity. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the Minister of Justice waste no time in naming an earnest committee of Progressive Conservative members to consult with bar associations and womens' groups in order to develop a list of suitable female candidates for high court membership, with the aim of removing the age-old phobia of the Liberal party against progressive action in the area of female appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

COMBINES

STUDY OF URANIUM INDUSTRY CARTEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, it took the Liberals years to move on Your Honour's important position. I hope they will follow the suggestion made in the preceding motion with despatch.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House urges the government to make public the results of the four-year study by the Combines Investigation Branch into a cartel in the uranium industry, and further, that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources make a statement on motions explaining why responsible political ministers have not been named in the organization and operation of this uranium cartel.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN SOCIAL HOUSING UNITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In 1980 apartment vacancy rates were running between 2.3 per cent and 2.8 per cent across Canada. The government's response was to allocate an additional 5,000 units under the non-profit and co-operative housing program. Yesterday the Minister of Finance announced the addition of 2,500 units under the program, even though vacancy rates are now at a critical 1.8 per cent. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean):

That the government increase the allocation of units under the social housing programs to at least 5,000 in order that the vacancy rate problem in Canada will be alleviated immediately.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLITICAL PARTIES

PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY POSITION ON TWO-PRICE WHEAT ACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, I rise under the usual provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In this House we have had a long debate on Bill S-6, an act to amend the Two-Price Wheat Act. This delay was occasioned mainly by obstruction from certain Conservative members of this House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peterson: This delay was occasioned by obstruction from the hon. members opposite—

Mr. Andre: Your wheat farmers are upset, are they?

Mr. Peterson: —and particularly the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor), who indicated that this bill would be harmful to western wheat farmers. In light of this I move, seconded by the hon. member for Guelph (Mr. Schroder):

That this House urge the Conservatives to be more consistent in their policy applications, because this Bill S-6 is exactly the same bill as was presented by the previous Conservative government.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE ADMINISTRATION

LACK OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND REPRESENTATIVE IN CABINET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Prince Edward Island is the only province in Canada not represented in the cabinet of the present federal government. Given that this situation will have existed for a full year by the time Parliament likely reconvenes in the fall, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That this House call on the Prime Minister to rectify the problem before the end of the summer so that government decisions can more fully reflect the concerns of all Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

COMMUNICATIONS

APPLICATION BY B.C. TELEPHONE COMPANY TO INCREASE RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Four months ago the B.C. Telephone Co. socked it to B.C. residents with a 12.5 per cent increase. Now the company has just applied to the CRTC for a further increase of 25 per cent for residential subscribers, a 28 per cent increase for business rates, and the cost of pay phones would rise to 25 cents from ten cents. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen):

That this House instructs the CRTC to reject the exorbitant rate increases demanded by this foreign multinational, and to stand by its decision to reconsider the last rate increases if B.C. Tel does not improve its services by the end of 1981.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

IMPACT ON ECONOMY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko):

That this House condemn the government for its failure to reach an energy agreement in an 18-month period, costing the taxpayers of Canada $8 million per day in imported oil, $1 million per hour in losses to the economy, and putting thousands of people out of work while the national energy policy of Canada does not address itself to the production of oil in this country; and that this House call on the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to redress immediately the negative impact the national energy policy is having on this country.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

POST OFFICE

DURATION OF POSTAL STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, since the government does not want to legislate or negotiate the postal strike, but is willing to let small businesses suffer and die and letter carriers be unemployed, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley):

That the government declare with some precision how long it is prepared to live with the strike, so that letter carriers can get other employment and business people may develop alternate and sure delivery systems.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

HEAD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM—ADJUDICATION OF APPLICATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas many farmers in western Canada have maintained their cattle herds by incurring considerable debt in order to continue their eligibility for assistance under the herd maintenance program; whereas these farmers have been left in limbo, wondering whether they will receive assistance at all, and whereas the hard line, and unfair adherence to bureaucratic rules and regulations by the government has meant that numerous requests for herd maintenance assistance have been denied to some farmers, even though their townships were declared eligible for assistance after the original application deadline had passed, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the government display some compassion for those farmers who have legitimate claim to herd maintenance assistance and adjudicate all applications, late or not, as quickly and as fairly as possible.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

ANNEXATION OF ARABLE LAND FOR URBAN DEVELOPMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Urban sprawl is continuing to take vast tracts of Canada's prime agricultural land out of food production. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That the government establish a federal-provincial municipal task force to evolve new policies to minimize the amount of class No. 1, class No. 2 and class No. 3 farm land that is being annexed for urban sprawl and development.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INTERNATIONAL YEAR OF DISABLED PERSONS

FUNDING FOR PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since the B.C. Committee for the International Year of Disabled Persons has received an overwhelming number of requests for program funding and estimates it would require another $12 million to meet those requests and since other areas of the country are experiencing the same enthusiastic response, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House instruct the government to recognize the obvious desire of Canadians to be actively involved in this international year and that it increase the $1 million already allocated to an amount that equals the moneys being contributed by provincial governments.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

DEFINITION OF 50 PER CENT CANADIAN OWNERSHIP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the objective of 50 per cent Canadian ownership of the oil and gas industry in Canada is a worthy objective, providing this means that 50 per cent foreign ownership will be replaced by 50 per cent private ownership; and whereas the last budget of the Liberal government is silent on this matter, leaving many to suspect that it is a smokescreen, enticing the public into something they do not want, that is, nationalization of the oil and gas industry, therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Thomson):

That this House urges Prime Minister Trudeau to define immediately the term 50 per cent Canadian ownership.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

COMBINES

PUBLICATION OF REPORT ON URANIUM CARTEL

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and Attorney General. It concerns the information which has been sworn regarding the uranium cartel, an action flowing from the report of the director of the combines investigation branch and from independent legal advice which the government sought.

The minister will remember that on March 4 his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, promised that the full report of the director of the combines investigation branch would be made public. In order that Parliament may have all of the information about the uranium cartel and may understand why certain corporations and individuals were named and certain others, including past or present ministers of this government, were not named, will the Minister of Justice and Attorney General agree now to publish immediately the full report of the combines director and the full context of the independent legal advice which the government sought?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs never made such a promise to the House.

Mr. Stevens: On March 4.

Mr. Chrétien: I have, however, received a report from the combines director, who was advised by a Toronto lawyer named John Brown. I also asked the same firm of lawyers to advise me on this matter. I have asked Mr. Brown to act as prosecutor in the cases he recommended that I prosecute, whose recommendation I have accepted. All of Mr. Brown's recommendations are included in the action which has been launched before the court, which will now be disposed of by the court.

REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL PROSECUTOR

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, what the minister is saying is that some lawyer he has chosen in Toronto has a right to see this report and has a right to knowledge of the independent legal advice that was made available, but the minister is hiding that report and that legal advice from the House of Commons of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The minister will know that among the unindicted co-conspirators are former public servants. The minister will also know that the cartel involved a "gag" order in council and other direct policy decisions taken by the Government of Canada. Since the Attorney General and Minister of Justice was a member of the government which set up that cartel, and which was involved in taking other decisions leading to this legal action, will the minister act to avoid any appearance at all of a conflict of interest and have this legal action pursued by a special prosecutor or by attorneys general who have no association whatever with the actions that will be considered by the courts?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I would like to clarify the statement made by the hon. member. The lawyer to whom I have referred is the same one who was hired by Mr. Bertrand and who has worked for four years on the case. He is the lawyer who made the report to Mr. Bertrand.

After I received the report from Mr. Bertrand, I asked the same lawyer, who had worked on the commission for four years, to be the prosecutor. This lawyer who worked on the inquiry for four years is the same one I have hired to be the special prosecutor in this file. Both in the report made to Mr. Bertrand, which was transferred to me, and in the special report that was made to me after I hired the same lawyer, that lawyer recommended that I prosecute the same companies. I have accepted his recommendation. This prosecutor is the same person who conducted the inquiry. He has accepted the position of special prosecutor in this case, and I am very pleased that he has done so.

NAMING OF UNINDICTED CO-CONSPIRATORS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, now we know who they are. They are Mr. Brown and Mr. Bertrand. But we do not know what they said. This House of Commons has a right to know what was said in those reports, which involved information being laid against certain corporations and individuals but not information being laid, for example, against the Minister of Justice, against the former minister of energy, mines and resources and against the Prime Minister. He points to himself. He has perhaps read the report. The members of the House of Commons would like the opportunity to read the report.

● (1420)

My question stands as to whether the minister will now end the secrecy and publish the report. While he is considering that question which was asked some time ago, let me ask him a question which goes to the heart of our system of responsible government in this country. Two former public servants are named as unindicated co-conspirators for actions taken during the period that they were public servants. One was an ADM at the time. Obviously they had to be acting on the instructions of the cabinet to which they were responsible. Will the minister explain why, when former public servants are named, the Prime Minister and present and former ministers of the government to whom those public servants were responsible are not named?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): In my opinion, Madam Speaker, the answer is very easy. Mr. Brown and the other lawyers who worked with him on this case made recommendations to me and I followed all of them. I ordered that legal action be taken against the companies, as recommended by Messrs. Bertrand and Brown, and I accepted their recommendations exactly as they were. At no time did the commission or the director himself feel that there had been anomalies in the conduct of the ministers or of other persons, except those referred to in the lawsuit. I therefore accept Messrs. Bertrand's and Brown's report, and I have launched proceedings in line with their recommendations. I cannot do any better than to follow the advice of people who have spent the last four years scrutinizing thousands of documents and pages of evidence they received. They have recommended that the six companies be prosecuted and that is exactly what I have done.

KNOWLEDGE OF SENIOR OFFICIALS AND MINISTERS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Justice and, most important, the Attorney General of Canada. The essence of the information of the charge that has been laid is the fact that it has apparently come to the attention of the combines investigation people that the accused had knowledge that the cartel activities affected the Canadian market. In particular, Mr. MacNabb, a co-conspirator, and Mr. Runnalls, a co-conspirator, according to the information, had knowledge that the cartel affected the Canadian market. Will the Attorney General indicate to the House how he determined that nobody senior to Mr. Runnalls or Mr. MacNabb had similar knowledge that the cartel had affected the Canadian market, including Mr. Austin, the deputy minister, Mr. Macdonald the minister, and the Prime Minister who, of course, presided over the whole cabinet deliberations when the conspiracy was put in place? Why were they not joined as co-conspirators?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, Mr. Bertrand and the outside lawyers worked on the files for four years. They examined thousands of documents and talked to a lot of witnesses. They concluded that the charges should be put in front of the court the way they have been. I am not about to have a trial in this House of Commons when we decide to prosecute companies or individuals. The matter is being decided before the courts. If the hon. member is very interested, when the case is being heard in Toronto he might sit there and learn a little more.

INFORMATION CONTAINED IN CABINET DOCUMENTS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the Attorney General of Canada, and I emphasize Attorney General of Canada, who should at least be neutral in this case. Will the Attorney General confirm to the House that, first, Mr. Bertrand was denied access to cabinet minutes and other cabinet documents that have shed some light on who was aware of the effect of the cartel in Canada and, second, whether he personally in his role as Attorney General reviewed those cabinet minutes to determine whether others within cabinet were implicated, as has been indicated today?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I must say that there are rules and customs with respect to minutes of the cabinet. Mr. Bertrand did contact the cabinet officials at the time and he himself declared that the minutes of the cabinet meetings were not essential to carry out his mandate. In the circumstances, they completed their inquiry. They also made recommendations to me and I accepted them as they were. The case is now before the courts and it will be up to them to decide whether or not the six companies involved broke the law of Canada.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL STRIKE—OFFER TO HAVE NEW CROWN CORPORATION PRESIDENT ENTER NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of Treasury Board. Considering that this morning the postal workers took an important conciliatory step in terms of reaching, one hopes, a settlement that will stop the postal strike, the step being the proposal that the president-designate of the new Crown corporation to run the post office be included as part of the government's negotiating team, I would ask the minister whether the government will match this good will offer of the postal workers by agreeing to it?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, indeed I am very pleased with the conciliatory step which has been taken by CUPW in suggesting that the pre-conditions will be removed before we return to the table. The additional condition which it has stipulated, the presence of Mr. Warren, causes us, I must say frankly, some reservations which I have been discussing with my colleagues. I can assure the House that I have responded to Mr. Parrot's letter in the most positive terms, thanking him for their efforts at conciliation and hoping to provide some other means of establishing the conditions which would not be as difficult for us to accept.

POSSIBLE RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, will the minister elaborate on the last part of his answer? Considering that Mr. Warren is a man with considerable industrial relations experience, would it not make perfectly good sense, given that background on the one hand, and considering that he is about to run the new post office on the other hand, for him to be involved precisely at this point in the negotiations, especially if this can get negotiations under way again in order to put an end to the postal strike?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, it is essential that the position of Mr. Warren, the long-term interests of the post office, and relationships between the union and the post office be on the best terms possible, and it is important that such position not in any way be prejudiced. Accordingly that is why my colleagues and I have been consulting on this request that has been made. I must say we find it somewhat unusual that CUPW would suggest that it should determine who the members of our negotiating team should be.

REASONS FOR GOVERNMENT'S POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, with regard to just the last part of the answer from the minister, that is the disturbing kind of note that hopefully everyone on both sides of this House, as well as the post office and postal workers, wants to avoid. If the postal workers have withdrawn an important pre-condition which they have laid down for the past week or so, then they have taken an important step forward. What I am at a loss to understand is why the minister is not prepared to match this good will gesture by saying, "Yes, given Mr. Warren's past negotiating experience, and given the importance of resolving this dispute to all the people of Canada who are affected by it, especially the postal workers, we will go ahead and do that"?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I thought I had answered that question in the first instance. I do not think the hon. Leader of the NDP has considered all the implications of that particular request. I believe it is our responsibility as a government, not just as President of the Treasury Board, to hold consultations with the Postmaster General and other colleagues who should be consulted on this matter, and I can assure the hon. member that I do accept with gratitude that there has been some movement on the part of the union. I have responded in writing to Mr. Parrot's request, but I do not think the floor of the House of Commons is the proper forum within which to carry on this kind of negotiation.

COMBINES

URANIUM CARTEL—NAMING OF UNINDICTED CO-CONSPIRATORS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice, who is behind the curtains. I wonder if I could await his arrival.

The Minister of Justice is the only individual in this House who knows why Mr. Brown recommended that these six corporate accused be charged. In light of the fact that, according to the indictment, the conspiracy took place partially in Ottawa, and two senior officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, Gordon MacNabb and John Runnalls, are named but as unindicted co-conspirators, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice why they have been named but not charged.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, this is not unprecedented. It has happened on many occasions in the past that decisions like that have been made. It was the recommendation of the commission and of Mr. Brown, as he acted as a special prosecutor for me in that case, to proceed that way, and I have accepted this recommendation.

Mr. Speyer: Madam Speaker, what I want to know are the reasons Mr. Brown gave to the Minister of Justice for not charging these individuals and yet naming them in this indictment.

REQUEST THAT ORDER IN COUNCIL BE RESCINDED

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Justice. As Minister of Justice he is aware that one of his most fundamental roles is to protect the rights of accused by a full answer and defence. That is in the Criminal Code. In light of the fact that demands, if they have not already been made by lawyers representing the accused, will be made, will the minister have the Prime Minister and the cabinet rescind the gag regulation with respect to the 100,000 documents which would enable these accused to get a full answer and defence?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, with respect to those regulations, the Appeal Division of the Federal Court rendered a decision in the case of McNamus. As for activities within Canada and under Canadian legislation, the regulations do not apply. In any event, the debate will take place before the courts and the government will act in due time as required, but the Appeal Division of the Federal Court has already rendered its decision.

LEGISLATION TO PROTECT CANADIAN CONSUMERS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is quoted today as having said that the international marketing arrangement was set up as a defensive action. He said, "Canada joined the cartel to protect the domestic uranium industry against U.S. restrictions". When the government set up this cartel, why did it not bring in legislation to protect Canadian consumers against these fixed prices? He could have done that by bringing in legislation establishing a marketing board, as other members of the cartel have done.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, Canadian consumers are protected by the combines investigation branch. It has reported to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General. The result of Mr. Bertrand's decision as head of the branch was to refer the matter for prosecution precisely because it is his role to protect consumers against this type of combine. That is the way the law proceeds.

We do not pass laws—and I think the hon. member is a witness to the difficulty in many cases to passing laws, even if they may be desirable—to protect consumers. We have overall laws like the anti-combines law to protect consumers.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, by circumventing the combines law the government has in fact broken the law, and as a co-conspirator in this—that is what it is; it stands indicted by its own action as a co-conspirator—has milked Canadians of millions and millions of dollars. During the period of the cartel uranium prices in Canada went up by 500 per cent. Electricity prices in Ontario—electricity in Ontario is dependent by one-third on nuclear energy—went up by 500 per cent.

REQUEST FOR COMPENSATION TO CONSUMERS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, since no government is above the law, not even the government of the Prime Minister, and since this government failed to protect Canadian consumers by establishing legislation, does the government intend to make compensation to Canadian consumers—or should I say restitution?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am sorry to say that the hon. member does not understand the situation and therefore misrepresents the reality. When he says the government broke the law by creating a combine against Canadian consumers, he does not understand what happened. The Minister of Justice just quoted a decision which indicated precisely that that did not happen, that that was not the law and that that was not the intention of the government. The intention of the government was to create an international trading agreement.

Mr. Clark: Illegal.

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition says "illegal". I wish he would stop making assumptions like that. What proof does he have that we have done it illegally?

Mr. Beatty: Release the documents.

Mr. Trudeau: Hon. members opposite should stop shouting and try to understand what happened. An international agreement was set up between many countries as a defensive mechanism against the United States action. It was set up to reach an understanding on prices in international trade. It was not set up to create a combine in relation to the sale of uranium in Canada. As a matter of fact there was at that period no, or very little, uranium being sold in Canada. It was the international markets we were protecting. That was the purpose of the cartel. It was only years later—

Mr. Stevens: What happened then?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, if hon. members opposite are willing to give me time, I am happy to explain it once again. There was nothing against the law, contrary to what the Leader of the Opposition says, in creating an international cartel. That is not against the law of Canada, and I challenge him or anybody on his side who knows anything about the law to say it is.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Bertrand.

Mr. Trudeau: In answer we have a judgment of the Federal Court saying that the agreement, the cartel or the combine did not apply in Canada. That is the reality. We were protecting the Canadian uranium industry and the workers against an American action as it affected—

Mr. Stevens: Why are you charging them then?

Mr. Trudeau: Be quiet, and you will find the answers. I cannot say everything at the same time.

Mr. Olivier: Listen and learn.

Mr. Trudeau: One has to listen to one idea and try to digest it, and then listen to the other one. I am trying to go as slowly as I can for the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: The Prime Minister might have another occasion, but I think that is long enough for one answer.

Oral Questions

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REFORM OF CHILD TAX CREDIT SYSTEM

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and it concerns a non-renewable resource, Canada's children. Since poverty is the single most damaging factor affecting both native children and non-native children, and since the Minister of National Health and Welfare has indicated on a number of occasions her desire to change the inequities in the child tax credit system, will the minister tell us, please, when she intends to do this and what reforms she will be undertaking in order for this to affect the future of 13 per cent of Canada's children who are poor?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I suppose the hon. member is referring more particularly to the report of the Standing Committee on Health and Social Affairs following the International Year of the Child, which, if I am not mistaken, will be tabled a little later in the House. The hon. member is a fine politician, and she is trying to draw the public's attention to that report. When it is tabled and I have a copy, I will read it, of course, and we will carry on the very serious work already started. We will discuss the issue with the Canadian people in an attempt to show that the present tax system is unfair with regard to credits allowed for children. However, as I have often stated, it means that some Canadian families would lose tax credits for the benefit of poorer families. Such a decision will be taken in due time by the Minister of Finance and the entire cabinet.

[English]

Mrs. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I think the minister did not clearly hear the question. Her answer was not specific about what she intends to do to reform child tax credits for poor children.

● (1440)

SPONSORSHIP OF COMMUNITY PROGRAMS TO HELP CHILDREN

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): My supplementary concerns a proposal made in an alternate report for a preventive program for children. Federal leadership is needed if we are ever going to reverse the poverty cycle for the next generation. It is incumbent upon the federal government to take leadership, particularly in regard to preventive programs for young children.

Will the minister consider initiating a federally sponsored program, similar to the New Horizons program for senior citizens, which could encourage self-help programs at the community level for preschoolers and their parents, to strengthen families and give children a better start in life?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the minister completely and clearly understood the question. I point out to the hon. member that her colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, asked me the same question Friday morning. If she will please read Hansard, she will find the answer regarding the child tax credit.

As to the second question, which is also I suppose a recommendation of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, which is going to table its report in 20 minutes, I will prefer to read the report first. It would help me to study it so I can give a complete plan of action to members at the appropriate time.

HEALTH CARE

EFFECT OF POSTAL STRIKE ON MEDICAL TESTS FOR INFANTS

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. There are two preventable conditions present at birth which can lead to mental retardation. One is a poorly functioning thyroid gland in the newborn, the second is a disturbance of cellular chemistry as evidenced by phenylketones in the urine. If the present postal strike persists for one month, it has been estimated by competent authorities that approximately nine such cases will be missed due to failure of delivery of blood samples from maternity hospitals to appropriate screening laboratories. Nine infants will go on to mental retardation that could otherwise be treated and cured. Can the minister advise whether steps have been taken to provide alternate means of transportation of blood samples from nurseries to the laboratories?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I guess all I can do today is acknowledge the problem to which no solution, to my knowledge, has been found. I advised Dr. Charles Scriver, who heads that research team, to put the problem to Mr. Parrot, the president of the union, prior to the strike. I did that as soon as I was informed of that very serious problem. I wish the union could find a solution so as to save several Canadian babies from being seriously handicapped for life.

REQUEST FOR RELEASE OF REPORT ON URANIUM CARTEL

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the Prime Minister with respect to the uranium cartel prosecutions. The Prime Minister has attempted to indicate to the House that no illegal acts took place with respect to this cartel, which is patently absurd because the combines investigation branch has now recommended charges. What he is saying to this House and the people of Canada is, "I am no crook." He will remember that particular statement was made before by another leader.

The Prime Minister refuses to allow us to see the recommendations that lead to the prosecutions. Why is he covering up? Why does he not allow the release of the report so the people of Canada can be satisfied that the Prime Minister is in fact no crook?

An hon. Member: That is dirty, Ray.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am rather happy to answer that rather nasty question, but I wish the House would hear me to the end because I only gave the first half of my answer.

When I said there was no illegality, I said there was no illegality in creating an international cartel, agreement, combine, or whatever it is. That is what I said. That is why the Leader of the Opposition is dead wrong in saying we did something illegal. We set up an international agreement with effects on the markets of the world.

Under the existence of that international agreement, Madam Speaker, it appears, according to the combines investigation people, that people in Canada used it to create a combine and fix prices in Canada. That, as I understand it, is the allegation made by Mr. Bertrand in a report which I personally did not read.

Once again, Mr. Bertrand had two choices, Madam Speaker, and I hope the opposition will be patient and hear me out. After they had been working on this since 1978, one choice was to refer their findings to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. The other was to refer their findings to the Attorney General of Canada. Sometimes they do one, sometimes the other. In the case of the petroleum inquiry they took the first choice, they referred the matter to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission which, as we know, made it public. Then we were summoned, indeed we were accused in this House of having followed that rather lengthy route which would take years in front of the commission, rather than giving it to the Minister of Justice so he could attempt prosecutions.

Now, by accident, Madam Speaker, or by design—I do not know—Mr. Bertrand in this case reached the other alternative provided to him under the law to refer it to the Minister of Justice rather than make it public via the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. Now the opposition have changed their song completely—

Mr. Andre: Because this—

Mr. Trudeau: Shut up, my friend. Shut up a minute.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Who the hell do you think you are, you arrogant pup?

Mr. Trudeau: So in one case—

Mr. Andre: I am sorry to interrupt your lies.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Order, please. I think it is important that the House hear this answer to the end, and I will recognize the Right Hon. Prime Minister to terminate his answer. However, I would hope that he could do it and be heard.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I want to raise a—

Mr. Clark: Hide the evidence and shut up the House.

Mr. Trudeau: —a question of privilege. The hon. member for Calgary Centre just said "I was shouting because I didn't want to hear your lies". I wish he would withdraw that accusation, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw! Withdraw!

Madam Speaker: First of all, if the Right Hon. Prime Minister wants to raise a question of privilege, he may do it at three o'clock.

Mr. Clark: He wants to break that rule, too.

Madam Speaker: The Chair has not heard an unparliamentary expression and therefore I cannot ask the hon. member to withdraw as the Right Hon. Prime Minister requests. If I read in Hansard that there is an unparliamentary expression, of course I will have to ask the hon. member to withdraw, unless he chooses to do it immediately if he recognizes that he said that unparliamentary expression.

Some hon. Members: Stand up! Stand up!

Madam Speaker: The Right Hon. Prime Minister has the floor to terminate his answer.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I merely wanted to conclude that Mr. Bertrand had these two courses of action under the law. In one case he followed the first course to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, for which we were condemned by the opposition. Now he has followed the other course. The Minister of Justice has made it quite plain that, in order to avoid the suspicion that we would in some way not be following Mr. Bertrand's recommendations or conclusions, he did not ask the officials of his department to see if there was cause to lay charges; he went to the very lawyers who since 1978 have been working on this case, the lawyers who were left on this case during the period when the Leader of the Opposition was Prime Minister of Canada.

These lawyers were not changed; they are the ones chosen way back by Mr. Bertrand himself. They know more about the case, I suspect, than anyone on this or that side of the House. They have been working on it for over three years. These are the very lawyers to whom the Minister of Justice has said, "Please, you recommended something to Mr. Bertrand. Your findings led him to ask the Minister of Justice to prosecute." The Minister of Justice turned around and said, "Please, you do the prosecutions. You know the facts. We do not want to be suspected of hiding anything. You prosecute those very people that you said might be guilty."

REQUEST THAT INDEPENDENT PROSECUTOR REVIEW EVIDENCE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, there are two very substantial distinctions which must be made. One is that in this particular case, unlike the oil inquiry, the government itself is implicated. In fact the combine affected domestic prices in that Canadian utilities were told by the government and by the producers that they had to follow world prices which, in turn, had been influenced by the cartel.

The government is now engaging as a prosecutor the person who helped prepare the report of the combines investigation branch. It is inconceivable to me that there is not an involvement on the part of the government and the minister when there are public servants charged. Will the Prime Minister not have an independent prosecutor, or the provincial attorneys general, review the evidence independently? There is a conflict of interest here with the government; it is implicated whether it likes it or not. There is an allegation of illegality. Will the Prime Minister not put this matter into the hands of an impartial, special prosecutor, or the provincial attorneys general, so that they can review the matter, and make their own assessment as to who should be prosecuted and who should be named in the conspiracy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I understand that under our system the opposition is paid, as it were, to attack the government and not to trust it in its decisions. That is fine. But surely somewhere, somehow, in some place, they have to trust somebody. That is the basis on which we live in society. Just a few months ago they were trusting Mr. Bertrand as an honest man who, in some way, had been maltreated by this government.

Mr. Stevens: You didn't trust him.

Mr. Trudeau: Now we have the hon. member for York-Peel trying to get into the act. This is a common tactic of the opposition. They ask questions but they never want to hear the answers. They would rather heckle.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR RELEASE OF CABINET MINUTES

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has raised the question of trust. One of the matters which is disturbing us is that neither Mr. Brown, Mr. Bertrand, nor anyone outside the members on the treasury benches has seen those cabinet minutes. There may be details in those cabinet minutes which, if shown to Messrs. Brown and Bertrand, may not only change the information but change the basis of the court action. In order that we can have the trust in the government which the Prime Minister asks for, will he release those minutes?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, coming from a Privy Councillor I find that an astonishing suggestion. Mr. Bertrand made it clear that he had reached his findings without the help of the minutes and that he did not need them. The hon. Privy Councillor opposite is suggesting that we release Mr. Bertrand's report, which did not have the minutes and which he said he did not need. Now the hon. member wants the minutes released. Could I have the undertaking of the hon. member that his party will release all former minutes of its cabinet and of previous Conservative cabinets, in which case we might be able to discuss this further?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I point out to the Prime Minister that even with respect to his government the release of minutes is not unprecedented. I would point to the release of cabinet minutes to the McDonald commission, which was also a commission of inquiry into the truth.

ACCESS TO MINUTES

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I would like to put my question again to the Prime Minister, and never mind his dancing. In order to obtain the element of trust which he seeks will he release the cabinet minutes, which Mr. Bertrand did not see, to another kind of inquiry, an inquiry under the Combines Investigation Act, respecting a specific matter, as was done with respect to the McDonald commission? Even the prosecutor, the counsel for the government, has not seen these minutes.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Bertrand commission is over. It has been its recommendations on the basics of findings it made. It said its findings were sufficient without access to the minutes. The commission did not insist on the production of those minutes as a condition of making its report. That is the situation, Madam Speaker. I have the clear impression that the hon. member is just bringing out a red herring.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Trudeau: He is changing course now. He is no longer talking about making the report public, because he now admits that the commissioner had two choices—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: He made one of the two choices. Now we are onto the minutes. I find it quite unbelievable that a Privy Councillor would ask that, on suggestions like that, cabinet minutes should be made public. Why not your own minutes? Give us the example—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We are not accused. You are.

Mr. Trudeau: I accuse you of all kinds of nonsense, your Jerusalem nonsense—release those minutes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I will make a deal. If the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is prepared to release all the minutes of his cabinet dealing with Petro-Canada and the Jerusalem incident, I will be prepared to show our minutes to Mr. Bertrand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ACTIONS OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister said the opposition is paid to attack the government. The government is paid to obey the laws of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that two senior officials in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Runnalls and Mr. MacNabb, one of whom was an assistant deputy minister, have been named as unindicted co-conspirators, does the Prime Minister allege that Mr. MacNabb and Mr. Runnalls acted without the knowledge or consent of their superiors?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I make no such allegation because I have not either gone back to read the minutes or study the report of Mr. Betrand, which I have no right to see, since it is transmitted to the Attorney General, I make no such allegation. All I am saying is that we have done exactly what the opposition demands when they say we should give the matter to an independent counsel. These counsel are not only independent of the government, they were not chosen by the Attorney General but chosen years ago. They were kept by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. They are independent counsel of the firm of Blake Cassells; they are Mr. John Brown and Mr. Calvin Goldman. They are not known to me. I doubt whether they are known in any real sense to the Attorney General. We have chosen independent counsel.

Once again I put it to the opposition, if they want to live in society they must trust somebody.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: Not you.

EFFECT OF CARTEL ON DOMESTIC PRICES

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, in this society if you want trust you have to deserve trust.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: The Prime Minister has said that this cartel was acceptable—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister said that this cartel was acceptable because it was designed to raise prices internationally as opposed to domestically. Does the Prime Minister now tell the House that his government was unaware, at the time that it encouraged the companies to enter into the cartel, of the effect it would have on domestic prices? Does the Prime Minister allege that his government instructed the other participants in the cartel to ensure that the domestic prices were not affected?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member prefaced his question by saying that we have to deserve trust. I was not asking for trust for myself. I know I do not have it from the hon. member. I was asking him to trust Mr. John Brown and Mr. Calvin Goldman. Can the hon. member make the allegation that he does not trust them? Is that his position?

Mr. Beatty: Release the documents.

Mr. Trudeau: If that is his position, then there is nothing I can do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXERCISE OF PRIME MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister on the same subject. If I heard the Prime Minister correctly, he just said that the report he alluded to was referred to the Minister of Justice and that he had no business looking at it. A very serious question has been raised, not necessarily about legal culpability here, but perhaps more important, about cabinet responsibility. Could the Prime Minister explain to us, since two senior public servants have been named, why it would not be entirely appropriate for the Prime Minister, in exercising his responsibility, to look at the report to find out if in fact the ministers who had authority over those civil servants were cognizant of the events? Surely it is the Prime Minister's responsibility to find out about what his ministers knew.

• (1500)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, my answer to that is my previous one. That is the duty of the Attorney General. He must look at it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: He must look at it and see if, in his view, there are people who should be charged, including ministers, including civil servants, and so on. That is his duty. He discharged it, not by asking himself or his own legal advisers; he discharged it by asking independent lawyers who had been working with the case for three or four years.

Mr. Clark: Who had not seen cabinet minutes.

Mr. Trudeau: And they have not seen yours on Petro-Canada, either. Therefore, that is the duty. It is not even as the Minister of Justice, but it is as Attorney General that he must decide to prosecute or not, whether to prosecute ministers or members of the opposition or civil servants. He could make an independent judgment but he preferred to leave the judgment in the hands of the very people who had written the combines report, the very people who had worked at it. That is the situation, Madam Speaker.

MINISTERS' KNOWLEDGE OF CERTAIN ACTIVITIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): I have a final supplementary question. I will pay the Prime Minister the courtesy of suggesting that he did not understand the question. The question, to me, is a very serious one. There is a distinction between legal culpability and cabinet ministers' responsibilities. It is a very important distinction.

I would therefore like to ask the Prime Minister, since very serious legal allegations have not only been made, but charges are being processed, is it not a basic responsibility of the Prime Minister, in the cabinet system, to find out if his ministers knew of certain kinds of activity, whether or not they were doing anything illegal? Surely there is a basic collective responsibility of those ministers aiding the Prime Minister, to both the House of Commons and to the people of Canada. The Prime Minister, in exercising his responsibility, must be seen to be determined to get at the truth. Surely that is the issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I could understand that the hon. member would suggest that at some point in the proceedings I might want to do that if a charge is made against civil servants, of which there has been none, for the time being. If a charge is made against civil servants, if there is something of a proof in the courts that, indeed, they may be guilty, which I do not presume, but as seems to be the case across the aisle, then perhaps I would have to give consideration to the point raised by the hon. member. However, for the time being, there is no civil servant charged, and there is certainly no proof, of which I know, that anyone was guilty in this.

I must remind the House that there are hundreds of investigations every year by the combines investigation board. There are hundreds. They are not made public, and we never hear these screams. We are hearing them in this particular case, and because of that I repeat that the Attorney General, without consultation with cabinet, decided—and I think it was the right decision—to take the lawyers who prepared the case for Mr. Bertrand.

I come back to the question, and I repeat that if it appears that some civil servants are, indeed, guilty of something, I imagine then the suggestion made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party would follow, and I would certainly have to consider it very seriously.

DATE WHEN GOVERNMENT BECAME AWARE OF CARTEL'S DOMESTIC EFFECT

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. I wonder if he could tell us at what point in time did the government of which he was head become aware that the activities of the cartel were affecting not only the international price—which he quite rightly said is not illegal—but at what point in time did he become aware that those activities may have also been affecting the domestic price?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I cannot say this out of knowledge or out of memory. I can say, out of subsequent information I received, that it was likely around 1975. It was several years, I think three years after the international agreement had been made, that this international cartel began to have some possible effects within our country. Once again, I am repeating information I received at the time, and which would have to be checked for accuracy of dates. Until then, there had been no demand for uranium in Canada. It was only around the mid seventies that this demand arose.

Once again I refer to the judgment cited by the Attorney General earlier in this Question Period. It was judged that the regulations that we had made regarding the international cartel did not apply to actions to fix prices in Canada. That is the whole essence of the case, if there is one, made by Mr. Bertrand.

At some point, long after the government had created this international cartel, there was a possibility of fixing prices in Canada. From the beginning we have taken the position that illegal activities were carried on in Canada to the detriment of consumers under the umbrella of some international cartel which was legal—I note the hon. members words, which are contrary to that of his own leader—under the cover of an international cartel which was legal. Then, if illegalities were committed in Canada, it is indeed the job of the combines commission to investigate into them, and to decide whether to prosecute or not. That is the situation, Madam Speaker.

FILING OF COMPLAINT BY ONTARIO HYDRO

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): What is disturbing about the chronology, in my supplementary question to the Prime Minister, is that if he became aware in 1975, he was surely aware of the enormous purchase in 1977, in Ontario. I believe that Ontario Hydro filed a complaint at some time during that period. I would like to know what the government did, if anything, in that regard. More particularly, what is disturbing me is that if the named but unindicted co-conspirators, a deputy minister or assistant deputy minister, and another official of that department, were aware that the activities were affecting the domestic price and were therefore illegal, are we to be led to believe that the then deputy minister and the then minister or ministers were unaware of this?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member cites the chronology and I think he said that—was it 1975 or 1976 that the hon. member said the hydro—

Mr. Jarvis: I think it was 1977.

Mr. Trudeau: It was 1977. The hon. member asks about what we did when someone complained. I do not remember that complaint, but the answer is quite obvious. In that very year, in 1977, the then minister of consumer and corporate affairs, and I believe it was the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East, asked Mr. Bertrand to investigate; and it was as a result of that investigation, started in 1977, at the very time that the hon. member says we should have started doing something, that we started, at that time, the inquiry—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): 1975.

Mr. Trudeau: —about which we are now talking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

USE OF UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE BY MR. ANDRE

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not know if Your Honour has yet had a chance to see the blues. I have not seen them myself, but I think this would be the point to remind the House that we distinctly overheard the hon. member accuse me of lying, or telling lies, something to that effect.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated that during the course of his remarks I shouted over something along the lines of interrupting him in the course of a lie. He is correct. That is what he heard. I will remove the word "lie" and substitute "cover-up".

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services) moved that Bill S-10, to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, as amended, be agreed to.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Blais moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

[English]

He said: Madam Speaker, in moving that Bill S-10 receive third reading at this time, I should like to call attention to all the co-operative effort that has gone into getting the bill to this point in the legislative process. I have in mind the recent deliberations at second reading, slightly more than two weeks ago, when a number of hon. members from the other side rose to express their views on this bill to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act or, as we call it, CALURA. The same spirit of participation continued to manifest itself as the bill received further review and study before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

During the last two days of June the committee worked hard to further improve the legislation wherever possible.

Thanks to those exhaustive deliberations the committee was able to complete its work rapidly and tabled its report last Thursday, July 2.

Mr. Speaker, according to the report, the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates had adopted two rather significant amendments. The first, under clause 3(1)(a), raises the threshold of corporate returns from $5 million in assets, as was originally proposed, to $10 million, and from $10 million to $15 million in gross revenue. The second, under clause 3(1)(b), also raises the threshold of corporate returns on the basis of equity or long-term debt obligations of persons not resident in Canada from a total amount of $100,000 to a ceiling of $200,000 for various equities and long-term debt obligations owing to persons or associates not resident in Canada.

[English]

I have cited the substance of these two amendments so that the considerable benefits that flow from them will be fully appreciated. The overriding benefit is relief from paperwork for more than—would you believe—96,000 Canadian-owned corporations, 6,000 more than was the case before the committee began deliberations a few short days ago.

When this legislation was first introduced in the House some three and a half years ago—it has been a long time coming—as Bill C-7, it was estimated that some 70,000 relatively small Canadian-owned corporations would be exempted from reporting under CALURA.

The threshold for reporting now proposed—that of $10 million in assets or $15 million in sales—is more in line with the conditions prevailing today and the original intent of the act.

It is a source of satisfaction to me that, numerically, the greatest relief from reporting will take place in those industries where the smaller, Canadian-owned company is most prevalent. Coming from northern Ontario where most corporations are small, I am pleased that the impact of this bill will be felt in rural regions, including the northern region of this province.

Based on estimates related to corporate activity in 1978, we find that 11,420 Canadian-controlled companies in the construction industry will be exempt; only 526 will be obliged to report, along with 205 foreign-controlled companies. Similar generous exemptions will prevail in the wholesale, retail and services industries. The most dramatic decrease in the reporting requirement will come within the agriculture, forestry and fishing segment. On the same basis, there will be exemptions for 5,113 Canadian corporations, leaving only 56 corporations to report.

Overall, 96,800 Canadian-owned companies will be exempt from reporting if Bill S-10 is passed in its present form.

And now, Mr. Speaker, given those significant figures, we have every right to ask the following question: Will there be enough companies left to report under CALURA so as to appropriately meet our needs? In other words, will CALURA have the same impact and the same raison d'être after those exemptions? Let me assure the House that the integrity of CALURA will not be jeopardized in any way.

[English]

We have made an analysis based on the new threshold. It shows that in terms of assets, over 81 per cent of all corporate activity in Canada will be recorded on the CALURA questionnaire. Notwithstanding the 96 corporations that we have eliminated, I repeat, 81 per cent of corporate activity will be caught by the statute.

Pursuing the analysis industry by industry, we discover that future reporting under CALURA will include companies with over 85 per cent of all manufacturing assets, in mining, approximately 95 per cent and in utilities about the same percentage. In the entire non-financial segment, over 76 per cent, and in the finance sector 85 per cent, will be required to report. We, therefore, have a happy situation whereby through Bill S-10 we can exempt all but 17,000 Canadian-owned companies and at the same time capture the information considered essential.

To conclude this review of the new thresholds and their impact on business, I should like to point out that under the bill before us today there will be slightly more than 9,000 foreign-owned companies that will be liable to report ownership data—and I do stress, ownership data. Canadian-controlled corporations that also have to report would total just under an; under an amended CALURA and under the proposed amendments, less than 8,000 companies will have to report consolidated financial information. Only about 2,000 companies will have to complete the schedules on technology transfer.

In other words, with passage of Bill S-10 we will have a streamlined, up-to-date piece of legislation providing us with the information we need with the least possible amount of paperwork.

I hope that we can conclude third reading of this bill today. These amendments, having been in the legislative process for years, are now ready. As I have indicated, their time has come. I reiterate what I said earlier, that I appreciate the co-operation and the contribution that has been made in improving this bill by members of the committee. The bill has come out of committee improved, although at the outset when proposals were being made I had some doubt. We now have an up-to-date bill which we have been trying to get through the legislative process for about three and a half years. Hopefully, we are now in the last 20 or 25 minutes of debate on it. I would be very pleased if it were possible for this bill to be passed this afternoon.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, I have a few brief comments to make on third reading of Bill S-10. In many ways I support what the minister has said. In fact, I think we have before us today an example of what can happen in this place sometimes when there is some co-operation between the government of the day, the minister of the day and all members of the House of Commons. I do not think there has been any serious disagreement that some bill in the form of S-10 is overdue. The main disagreement was whether we were sure that the threshold limits as originally proposed in Bill S-10 are low enough to ensure that many of the comparatively small businesses will not be caught up in this unnecessary paper burden in the future.

As the minister indicated during the committee hearings, there was discussion and then agreement that there should be amendments raising the threshold in the case of revenue in each company from $10 million to $15 million a year and in the case of assets raising the limit from $5 million to $10 million per year. In the case foreign subsidiaries, there was a rather complicated section which would have required companies doing business here who happen to have a mere $200,000 of foreign investment to file in accordance with the act. We were able to get the minister's agreement and also the committee's agreement to have that requirement amended so there is a much more reasonable threshold limit all round.

In short, I see no reason to delay the bill further. I hope the Senate will agree with the changes that have been made in this House.

In handling this bill in future months and years, I hope the minister will always bear in mind, and he gave us his undertaking in committee, that if there is any suggestion of an undue paper burden remaining on small businesses, he will take the steps provided for in the bill to relieve that paper burden still further, and perhaps raise the threshold even higher. He has indicated from across the House that he is writing it in blood today. I am sure if we can get this minister to write such a commitment in his own blood—

Mr. Blais: I was touching wood!

Mr. Stevens: The minister says he is touching wood. Perhaps that is something like what he has in his veins, I am not sure.

In short, I do not think there is any particular difficulty on our side of the House with the bill in its present form. I hope that in future years whoever has responsibility for this bill will always bear in mind that if it can be altered to relieve business still further from the necessity of having to file unnecessary paperwork, then at the earliest opportunity that will be done.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we too are pleased that the government was willing when this bill was in committee to make a number of amendments to it and to make it a bill that is generally more acceptable.

Speaking on behalf of trade unions in this country, I can say that in general they do not like the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, but they would rather have it with the amendments proposed in Bill S-10 than as it stands at the present time.

Therefore, we are prepared to give third reading to this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that Bill C-79, to amend the Veterans' Land Act and to amend the Veterans Benefits Act in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to introduce this bill today. It is a very complex bill in that it took about four or five years to get through it, legally and otherwise.

In proposing these amendments to the Veterans' Land Act, the government is acting to bring this legislation into accord with current social conventions. This legislation has been a valuable ally of veterans and their families for almost 40 years. Now, however, the act needs to reflect the changes that are taking place in our society.

Our amendments will ensure that the Veterans' Land Act no longer frustrates the aims of family law legislation in many provinces. In addition, these amendments will allow the veteran greater freedom in planning his estate. But as we move to amend the Veterans' Land Act, let us pause to review its benefits.

Close to 144,000 veterans have been getting these benefits. In excess of $1.34 billion in public funds have helped to set up veterans on farms, on small homesteads or as commercial fishermen and trappers. They have also been helped in continuing to be real Canadians and to be very active in today's society.

Even now, close to 38,000 veterans still live on properties which come under the Veterans Land Administration. Our country has gotten its fair reward. We also have gotten ours since so many gallant people have been able to settle on the land for which they had fought. Very few parts of this country have not benefited from the Veterans' Land Act, and this has resulted in a healthy growth for Canada.

Moreover, many of these small homesteads are now prosperous farms that are in a position to feed thousands of people overseas and to make a major contribution to our gross national product. However, in spite of its acknowledged success, the Act is now seen as inadequate by groups or individuals who are concerned about women's rights.

[English]

The spouses of veterans, the vast majority of whom are women, enjoy no legal interest in the land on which they live. And as more than 90 per cent of all outstanding VLA agreements represent the matrimonial home, it is little wonder that our present legislation has been termed unjust in this area.

However, any shortcomings in the act have developed accidentally. The first priority of those legislators back in 1942 was to protect the veteran. The earlier Soldier Settlement Act had met with mixed success. The legislators wanted to restrict individual failures to a minimum. They surrounded the veteran land holder with safeguards.

As a result, whenever a veteran went to apply for a conditional grant and a subsidized interest rate loan, he also received protection. In a typical situation, the director of Veterans Land Administration purchased a property for the veteran and held title to it until the debt was repaid. The veteran was designated as a tenant at will and on a direct legal basis was considered to have no recognized financial interest in the property during the period of the contract. This arrangement ensured that the veteran was immune to any action taken by would be creditors.

In the early days of the VLA, such agreement was most beneficial both to the veteran and to the Crown. Both received considerable benefits. In the case of the veteran, the land was protected against any lien which could have represented a very heavy responsibility for the veteran leaseholder. As for the Crown, it merely could regain possession of the property and hand it back to another eligible veteran if need be.

However, Mr. Speaker, the spouse, the wife in most cases, had no right to any of the benefits provided in this mutually profitable agreement. Let us think for a moment of the case where the young wife had helped her husband with the down-payment for the purchase of the family home. Let us think also of the rather frequent case of the wife bringing along property which would make the couple's farm more productive. If the husband was a veteran and if the couple decided to avail themselves of the benefits available under the Veterans Land Act in order to expand or improve their property, the wife had to waive any property right she had even to whatever assets she had personally contributed. Such a situation is not good enough today in 1981, but in 1942, the legislators did not see any harm in it. Times have changed.

[English]

But as we well know, society has changed and veterans are not isolated from the joys and disappointments of marriage. There has been a dramatic increase in the number of cases before the courts for divorce, legal separation and property settlement. And along with the increase in marital breakdowns has come the valid charge that the Veterans' Land Act is not in concert with today's realities.

The reason is that with no dower, homestead of family rights in the veteran's property, the spouse is clearly at a disadvantage. Such a situation contradicts the purpose of the far-reaching changes that have been made in family law legislation in a number of provinces.

Such provincial legislation states, in effect, that irrespective of who holds title to the matrimonial home the statutory presumption is that on divorce or on marriage breakdown each spouse is entitled to a one-half interest in the matrimonial home.

Even in provinces where such legislation exists, the VLA property is virtually immune to the joint ownership principle. The wife can ask the court to declare that she has an interest in the property to be held in trust by the veteran, but this involves expensive legal action and many spouses are unaware of the legal intricacies. In addition, any interest she may receive will be of no benefit until the loan is repaid.

Away from the unhappiness of a family court, our present legislation can be a source of irritation for those many couples who still enjoy a happy marriage. By restricting the property agreement to the veteran alone, and by making him, in effect, a tenant on his own land, the legislation hampers estate planning.

[Translation]

The Government has been trying for some time now to find an honourable and efficient way of solving this problem. We had to protect the vested interests of veterans in wartime while acknowledging the justified claim of the spouse who was not a veteran. More specifically, the properties involved are as much owned by the Crown as this Parliament. Mr. Speaker, I think that this amendment is the logical and acceptable solution under the circumstances.

[English]

First, we are proposing to amend Section 37 of the act in order that the spouse has rights in the matrimonial home as provided by provincial legislation.

[Translation]

For equity's sake, Mr. Speaker, we also suggest a second amendment. It would allow the voluntary conversion of the sale contract to a mortgage when a 10-year conditional grant had been received. There is no change whatsoever in the interest rates provided for in the contract. Such a conversion to a conventional mortgage is acceptable to many veterans and their spouses anxious to hold the titles on their assets and funds as well as their ownership rights.

[English]

Before concluding, I would like to state that prior to introducing this legislation we consulted with the Royal Canadian Legion, the veterans' association and the commission on the status of women who reacted favourably to this bill. I am sure we can agree that this is a good bill and that it should be passed quickly.

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to reply on behalf of Her Majesty's loyal opposition with respect to Bill C-79. As a veteran I have a personal interest in veterans' legislation and it is with real interest and concern that I address this bill. It is a bill I think veterans will approve and it is one lawyers will also applaud. I shall return to this aspect later in my remarks.

Before I address the various provisions of this bill—and I say this for the interest of the Chair—I would like to make a few favourable and complimentary comments on the Veterans' Land Act, its implementation, application and administration. These comments should make it clear why the PC party supports the proposed legislation.

It is a sad fact of life that memory is imperfect. Few, if any, could reconstruct with accuracy what it was like to return to Canada following the Second World War, or, conversely, what it was like to welcome home the veterans of foreign wars. Major readjustments were necessary for both veterans and civilians.

Fortunately, Parliament had acted three years earlier to pass the Veterans' Land Act, a major rehabilitation program designed to assist veterans in their return to civilian life. Under this act a veteran could receive financial assistance to purchase land for the purpose of full or part-time farming or commercial fishing. The financial assistance received would be repayable in the same way a mortgage would, save that title to the property would be held by the director of the Veterans' Land Act until such time as the veteran had repaid the loan.

Subsequent amendments to this act extended its provisions to include veterans of the Korean war and to assist those veterans wishing to construct their own homes.

By making funds available to veterans to acquire land, the Veterans' Land Act enabled some 144,000 of our veterans to re-enter civilian society quickly and productively. Indeed, in 1980 there were still over 40,000 veterans covered under the act.

With the passage of time it became necessary for Parliament to commence the phasing-out of this program. As a result, in March, 1977, loans under the act came to a halt, meaning that we have entered the final phase. Once all loans have been repaid and all titles to the various properties transferred, the Veterans' Land Act will for all intents and purposes have completed its job. This is expected to occur in the year 2007, 26 years from now.

Over the years since its enactment in 1942, the administration of the Veterans' Land Act has been excellent. The Auditor General's report spoke highly of the program and, to my knowledge, the Royal Canadian Legion has never had a serious complaint with the administration of the program. Hence, it is to the credit of the department that we can attribute the success of the Veterans' Land Act. All of which is not to say that updating amendments are not necessary, and it is to the legislation before us that I would now like to direct my comments.

Bill C-79 will be welcomed by many segments of our society. Lawyers will be happy to see the end of the cumbersome and long forms of agreement they were never able to explain to veterans. By virtue of the changes in this bill, veterans will be enabled to acquire title in their own right to the land which they occupy by way of deed. They will be able to show whatever debt or encumbrance is registered against those lands by way of charge or mortgage, just as any other person can do.

Spouses of veterans, most of whom are women, will welcome the bill, bringing as it does today's concept of spousal rights in property that she probably spent years in assisting to improve. This was a major recommendation of the Progressive Conservative Party and this minister's predecessor in office, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon). Only in one area do I have a question, and that question relates to Clause 7 which repeals former Section 24 and substitutes a new Section 24. This section refers to the sale of lands held by the director under a contract with the veteran and where, as a result of that sale, there are moneys owing to the veteran, a surplus if you will, after the payment of debts and costs accruing to the veteran. That surplus is due and owing to the veteran.

The section goes on to provide that where the sale is made on a term basis, the director may make payment to the veteran, as the director determines payment to be warranted. I know what is intended here. It is that payment cannot be made to the veteran until payments under that term agreement are received by the director. However, it seems to me that the section could have been phrased differently to avoid what appears to be an absolute discretion in the director to pay over the surplus moneys dues and owing to the veteran, at a time when the director at his own discretion feels payment is warranted. The clause could even go on to say that the director should make payment to the veteran as payments are received by the director, and I trust that the minister will find time to take the opportunity to give the House some assurance on that particular point.

As I stated earlier, the Veteran's Land Act was a singularly good one, as has been its administration. The long-standing complaint of the Conservative party, that the act did not address itself to the rights of the spouse, has now been answered and, as such, we are happy to lend our support to the bill.

It would be remiss of me, however, amid all the magnanimity, not to say that, with the spirit of co-operation which the government now sees from the Conservative party, we expect additional veterans' legislation to follow. Specifically, given the advancing age of our veterans, the phasing-in period of the provisions of Bill C-40 regarding widows whose husbands were in receipt of less than 48 per cent disability pensions should be shortened. The lengthy pension application delays are fast approaching the level of a national disgrace and we would expect the government to act quickly on this matter.

Further, the payment of prisoner of war compensation should be changed to add to, not subtract from, disability pensions veterans might be seeking. It is ridiculous to speak of prisoner of war compensation when in fact the resultant payment is not better or worse than a disabled veteran would ordinarily receive.

Finally, in these troubled financial times pension increases should be based on a meaningful index that will reflect current inflation rates, not the government's chimerical hopes. We hope the amendments presented will remedy some of those complaints. Bill C-79 is a good bill. It is one that follows the recommendations of this party and I look forward to the introduction of those further amendments in the very near future. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the minister through you.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to indicate our full support for Bill C-79 which is now before us. If it is possible to be happier still, that is what I shall be in a day or two when we have before us Bill C-82. It will be a day to which I look forward.

My hon. friend, the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid), expressed a hope about Bill C-82. The only advantage I have over him is that it got first reading today and I have seen it. I notice he was asking for the phasing-in period to be shortened. It has been wiped out altogether. That is not related to this bill, Mr. Speaker, but it is pretty important news and that bill will get speedy passage in this House of Commons.

What is before us now is Bill C-79 which has to do with the Veterans' Land Act. Like the minister who spoke in introducing this bill, like the hon. member for St. Catharines who spoke in support of it, I too want to say this has been a very important piece of legislation, passed back in 1942, the year I was first elected to this House, though it was passed before I got here. It has been of great benefit to veterans and their families across the years.

We were pleased during a certain period in the life of this Parliament, 1972 to 1974, known as the minority period, that we were able to get an extension to the lifetime of the Veterans' Land Act. We wish we could have had it extended longer, but at least it did delay a bit the cutting off of the benefits under that act.

As the minister has pointed out, there are still 38,000 cases where the title is still in the hands of the director, and that makes the two changes which are presented to us today very important.

The first one makes this a great day for veterans. It also makes it another great day in a series of days that it seems to take to achieve equality between men and women. We make speeches about needing equality. We want it right away, but the facts of life are such that we have to take a step at a time. This is an important step, and I was glad to hear the minister say that not only had he been in consultation with the Legion and other veterans' organizations, but he had also been in consultation with women's groups as well.

One understands that 40 years ago the legislation provided for the land to be that of the veteran without any special rights for the spouse, especially if there was a breakdown in marriage or if the spouse was left a widow. But times have changed and it is good that we have caught up with one of those changes. In other words, the main thing this bill does is to establish for spouses of veterans, so far as the ownership of the land is concerned, the same rights in respect of VLA land that apply in the province to properties held under civil contract. This means that if there is a breakdown in marriage the spouse who has put a good deal into the development of the property can claim her share of it. It also means that if the veteran dies and leaves the spouse a widow, her rights to that property are continued.

The other main aspect of the legislation is to provide that for a veteran who is alone, or a veteran and a spouse, the ownership of the property, instead of continuing as though he or they were just tenants on land owned by the director, would have the conventional mortgage relationship, so that a veteran or the survivor could make a sale or use the value of the VLA holding in planning the estate, planning retirement or transferring it to somebody else, and so on.

All told, this is a good piece of legislation. Though the motion before us calls for the bill to be referred after second reading to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, I am sure I speak for all of us in the House when I say I would be quite happy to have it go into a Committee of the Whole in order to complete the full passage of this bill at this time.

I say again how important the Veterans' Land Act has been as a piece of veterans legislation. We are glad we are making these improvements to it. As the last speaker said, there are other matters still to be dealt with. We will deal with one of them when we get to Bill C-82, whether tomorrow or Friday. Then there are other questions, such as the speeding up of the handling of cases by the Canadian Pension Commission, and the fundamental issue of tying the rate of the 100 per cent war disability pension to the level of those five designated categories so that the increase of those pensions is automatic.

Those matters are not before us today, but the last thing I would want to do would be to give my friend the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs the impression that the job is done. He has done well to have these two matters before us now, second reading of this bill and first reading of Bill C-82 on the same day, but there are other things to do. I am sure he has the interests of veterans and their families at heart and, when we get these bills out of the way, we will be ready to move on.

As I say, we are quite prepared that this bill now be given second reading, that it be considered in Committee of the Whole and that it be given third reading this afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Pursuant to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I understand there may be a disposition in all parts of the House that this bill proceed through all stages immediately.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I join with my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). We are anxious to see the matter completed and sent to the Senate as quickly as possible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): With the unanimous consent of the House the minister's motion will be altered so that Bill C-79 will, by unanimous consent, be referred to the Committee of the Whole. Is there unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon—Mr. Blaker in the chair.

On Clause 1—

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct a question to the minister. Could the minister tell us when these various clauses come into effect? Is it upon proclamation or immediately upon Royal Assent?

Mr. Lamontagne: As soon as Royal Assent is given.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 9—Priority of Director over mechanics' lien and other liens

Mr. Neil: Mr. Chairman, I have a question in connection with Clause 9. I would like to ask the minister whether, by virtue of Section 37(2), the rights of a mechanics' lienholder are defeated. In other words, does the order that a wife or a dependant obtains in court giving her a claim to a property give her priority over the rights of mechanics' lienholders and thus defeat those rights?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mechanics' liens apparently do not apply until the court order is made.

Mr. Neil: It seems to me that if there are mechanics' liens registered against the title and then a wife or a dependant gets a court order against the veteran husband, then by virtue of subsection (2) the rights of the mechanics' lienholders are wiped out. I want to find out if that is correct.

Mr. Lamontagne: When a spouse goes to court, only her property is involved in this court procedure.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, there is a little difficulty here since property rights are a provincial matter. There is nothing in the federal act which could defeat, for instance, a spouse's dower rights in a property occupied by a veteran and his spouse, although the property was in the name of the director. I am confirmed in that.

Subsection (2), appearing at line 28 says, and I quote:

> Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, an order made or a judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction to recognize or enforce the rights, interest or estate of the spouse or a dependant of a veteran in land that is the subject of a contract of sale, mortgage or hypothec under this Act applies to and is binding on the land subject to the rights, interest or estate of the director in the land.

So therefore those dower rights and what have you are not wiped out. The director has an interest in them, just like a mortgage company has an interest in land which is ahead of dower rights, provided the spouse has signed her consent under dower legislation. In any event, with the greatest respect, I cannot see how any federal act dealing with land could affect property rights in any of the provinces. Therefore, such spouse interest that arises under a dower act, as in the province of Alberta, my own province, could not be defeated by any legislation in this House. However, there is, in my humble opinion, no such attempt here. The legislation here only confirms what is in existence.

Mr. Lamontagne: According to officials the hon. member's reasoning in the way he states it is not exactly correct. It does not change anything because at the moment the wife has no recognized interest in the property itself. However, this will give her a right with respect to the property, so it is completely changed instead of retaining the status quo.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, the new provisions in this particular bill will be advantageous with respect to current cases and cases in the future, but our veterans are largely from the Second World War. It has been quite a while since 1946, and there has been a number of cases in which these provisions were not applicable because they were not in the law. Is there any provision whereby these provisions, which would have been applicable had they been the law, could now be made applicable to such persons?

Mr. Lamontagne: Would the hon. member repeat his question so that my official can understand exactly his meaning?

Mr. Taylor: I would be glad to, Mr. Chairman. The provisions of this bill now make certain benefits available to spouses. These benefits have not been available to spouses since 1946 and will not be until this bill becomes law. Consequently, there have been some very sad cases. Is there any provision in this bill which would make it possible to go back and rectify some of the things which have happened?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Chairman, there is no retroactivity, but the cases which are in court now can come back in new court cases under the new bill.

Mr. Taylor: But any case not in court now is out?

Mr. Lamontagne: Yes, it is out.

Mr. Taylor: That is rather sad because the bill comes in just about 30 years too late to help many people. I do not know whether the minister and his officials are aware that there may only be a handful, but there have been some cases which have been very unfortunate and sad.

• (1600)

We like to treat our veterans and their spouses in a way we can be proud of. Since almost 40 years have gone by since the end of the war—there are very few veterans left from the First World War—it seems to me that where there is definite evidence that something has been done which should be rectified, if that could be done it would certainly be appreciated by veterans all over Canada who do not have any particular interest in this bill at the moment.

In many cases civilization is recognized by the way we treat our senior citizens and our veterans, particularly our veterans, because they are a particular class in this country. All veterans offered their lives to the country and so they are in a particular group. Their wives and children have suffered in a particular way over the years because many veterans left part of their lives on the battlefields. I realize retroactivity is difficult, but I would greatly appreciate it if the minister could at least look at some of these cases to see if something can be done for the very sad cases that occurred because these provisions were not available.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member for Bow River that I will see if any cases can be treated with compassion. Being a veteran and former POW myself, I can appreciate his concern and I assure the hon. member I have the same concern for these cases.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, coming back to the question I raised before, I wonder if the minister has considered the situation of a mortgage, for instance, or any transfer from a veteran to the director on a financing transaction. If in the province of Alberta it did not contain a consent under the dower act, I am afraid the director would have been in very serious trouble. There is no way a federal law could unilaterally set aside that right of dower. That applies to anyone and everyone.

I may come back to that question because I do not think, in essence, there is very much difference now. If there had not been consent by the spouse under the dower act, or if the veteran was single at the time he sold or financed the property, with the director, then possibly the law is now being changed somewhat, but not that much.

The other very interesting point, one that no one has yet raised, is in clause 9 at the top of page 7, the definition of "spouse". Perhaps the minister would like to indicate there whether this is recognizing the, shall we say, social consideration of the so-called common law spouse in that there is provision that if her interest is recognized under the laws of a province concerning land, then naturally such an interest is recognized under the Veterans' Land Act. I think that is a step forward, although I must say I have taken grave exception, and still do, to the changes in the Veterans Insurance Act and other veterans' benefits. A veteran living common law for, in one case, one year, in other cases for three years, can set aside all the rights of a legitimate spouse who has raised a family and lived with the veteran for many years. Then the veteran for one reason or another decides to cultivate greener fields and perhaps recycle himself with a younger woman, and thereby defeats all of the legitimate interests of his spouse. I was absolutely astounded that my good friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, did not raise an objection. I voted against it as I would right now if it were up to me because I think this is an absolute disgrace in our veterans legislation.

There are two areas of disgrace in our veterans legislation. One deals with the interests of the legitimate spouse of a veteran. Under the disability act, the Veterans Insurance Act and possibly one other act, a veteran living with a woman who is not his legal spouse gives her rights which extinguish the rights of the legal spouse. I think this is bad law, and I would hope some time to have the opportunity of discussing this with the minister so we can go back to what it was before, namely living together openly for seven years. That made it much more difficult. Frankly, right now far too much of it is open to what I might call gold digging, if that is worth anything.

I hope when we get to Bill C-82 that the minister, a former prisoner of war, will see the grave injustice done to POWs under the prisoners of war compensation act, more than 70 per cent of whom are pensioners and who find themselves disentitled either to a portion of their disability pension or of their compensation. The two are supposed to be separate, yet in the minds of the department they have been melded for these years. I hope we will have an opportunity to discuss that.

In this particular instance I think there has to be a consideration. There is no indication as to the time involved in this common law arrangement, or under what circumstances it would apply. That interpretation is left to provincial law. I think I would like to have an explanation of this. Of course, in some provinces this would not be allowed. In others it would. I suppose it is a case of the federal statute bowing before provincial jurisdiction in property and civil rights, but I wonder if I can have an explanation of the circumstances in which this definition of "spouse" is applicable.

Mr. Lamontagne: As far as the definition of spouse or dependant goes, I think, as we say in French "autres temps, autres mœurs". As the hon. member for Edmonton West has mentioned, we are living in another time and today "common law wife" is often defined by the courts. In cases where veterans have some problems regarding the question of marital status, we must go to the provincial court which will decide on a solution to the problem. In other words, we submit ourselves the provincial court which will eventually decide these cases.

Clause 10 to 12 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 13—Persons qualified to participate

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, since this is the last clause of this bill there is one other word I should like to say. We welcome this bill because of the recognition of equal status between men and women. I think we should add to that that the equality set out in this bill really goes all the way. For the most part we have talked about the spouse as though in all cases the spouse were female. As a matter of fact, it works both ways. If the veteran is the female then the spouse is a male and he draws the same benefits as would be the case the other way around. In other words, in this piece of legislation we have taken equality all the way. I hope we will do that in some of the other cases. I hope we will reach the point where the survivor's pension, when it involves a female, will be the same as when it involves a male. I am grateful for this provision. I can tell by the smile on the face of the hon. member for York-South Weston that she is agreeing.

As I said earlier, we welcome every step toward equality and I am glad the minister in charge of veterans affairs has taken this important one today.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make two comments. It is too bad that the present minister was not the minister 25 years ago, since a lot of heartache would have been avoided. It is nice to have a minister who has gone through the toughness of war. I think it does something for a person. I would like to commend the minister on his very compassionate views on veterans and others.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: There is one other point I would like to add. The minister is also very interested in veterans' children and other people's children who do not have money enough for a holiday. I would like to thank the minister personally for the part he has played in helping some 150 boys last year, and again this year, to have a holiday. We appreciate that very much.

OFFICIAL RESIDENCES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (for the Minister of Public Works) moved that Bill C-81, to amend the Official Residences Act, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Raymond Savard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I sponsor today Bill C-81, to amend the Official Residences Act. Since the act was implemented in its amended form in 1970, the Department of Public Works has been responsible for providing the services required for the official residences, and the National Capital Commission has been in charge of the maintenance and improvement of the grounds on which these residences are located. As parliamentary secretary, and speaking on behalf of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove), who is also responsible for the National Capital Commission, I believe that Bill C-81 contributes to reinforce the truly democratic parliamentary process which has long attested the strength of Canada.

Throughout the years, parliamentary proceedings have dragged on because of the increasingly complex issues brought before Parliament. In the past, sessions were shorter and recesses longer. However, our country's business now requires a total commitment on the part of parliamentarians.

The present government believes, and I am sure that all members here will agree, that the task of governing the country is a source of ever-increasing pressures and requires a greater involvement in terms of time and energy from all of us. The government also believes that one of those who has the most difficult task to perform is the Leader of the Official Opposition. In order to ease the problems associated with his office, the government has introduced this bill.

This bill, to amend the Official Residences Act, deals with many issues which I would like to address. First of all, it provides for the establishment of a summer residence for the Leader of the Official Opposition. Other amendments deal with the provision of the residence, on land allocated by the National Capital Commission, and of furnishings as well as with the maintenance and repair of such residence; second, the bill provides for the appointment of a steward or housekeeper and up to three other employees for Stornoway, the residence of the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Section 6 of the existing act would be amended to provide for the appropriation of moneys by Parliament for the payment of the remuneration of persons so employed and the payment of other expenses related to their employment. This measure was discussed in detail and unanimously approved by the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that members on both side of the House will be happy with this move and will give their unanimous support to this bill.

[English]

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, as the parliamentary secretary has pointed out, this bill deals with the allocation and refurbishment of a summer residence for the Leader of the Opposition together with a provision for staffing Stornoway, which is in the City of Ottawa, the Village of Rockcliffe.

By way of background, it is useful to note that at the request of the Privy Council Office the National Capital Commission has conducted a survey of properties within its inventory which could be considered appropriate for such purposes. The National Capital Commission has been looking at this project for some time and the present government has now seen fit to take the sponsorship of this project with respect to the Leader of the Opposition at this particular point in time.

I guess I should point out that it will be up to the government to make an assessment, and that will be another matter again, with respect to the kind of facility and the location which will be decided upon. It is exclusively within the prerogative of the government to make that kind of assessment, and it will be a matter which I suppose members of Parliament will have an opportunity to examine in the course of committee considerations. However, I assume that prior to making any decision the government will consult the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

The parliamentary secretary mentioned that Clause 3 of the bill provides for the appointment of a steward or housekeeper and up to three other employees to be employed at Stornoway. I think it will be also helpful to note that prior to the 1979 election no staff was provided for the Leader of the Opposition at Stornoway. When the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was Leader of the Opposition, he made a request through an emissary to the present Leader of the Opposition, who was then the Prime Minister. The request was granted and the staff provided to him. This bill, therefore, regularizes that arrangement on behalf of the present Prime Minister when he occupied the position of Leader of the Opposition.

I will not succumb to the temptation to suggest that the government is bringing forward this legislation in order to ensure that the leader of the Liberal party, after the next election, will have a suitable residence somewhere in the Gatineau Hills! I will not succumb to that particular temptation.

An hon. Member: Wishful thinking!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I will only say that we, of course, have no objection to this bill proceeding, and we will consent to the matter going through all stages, including Committee of the Whole stage and third reading today, so that the matter can be referred to the Senate.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that Bill C-14, to amend the Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities Act, be read the second time and by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the bill which is before the House this afternoon deals with the establishment and operation of proposed embassies or consulates in Canada by persons not representing a sovereign state or not representing a government recognized by Canada.

The new legislation would make it an offence to engage in such conduct, enabling the courts to prohibit the representation of such premises as a diplomatic mission or a consular post. Actually, this bill seeks to resolve a sensitive problem which may occur at any given time and create for Canada some embarrassment on the international scene. Furthermore, such a situation would most likely create tension in Canada's bilateral relations with the country concerned.

I should point out that the Vienna conventions on diplomatic and consular relations annexed to the Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities Act are declaratory of customary international law and have the force of law in Canada. It is clear in the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Regulations, Article 2:

> the establishment of diplomatic relations between states and of permanent diplomatic missions takes place by mutual consent.

Article 4(1) of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations provides that > "a consular post may be established in the territory of the receiving state only with that state's consent."

It would certainly be consistent with the spirit of Canada's obligations under the Vienna conventions to take the necessary measures to prevent the opening of such so-called embassies or consulates when they are opened without Canada's consent, and when they purport to represent a country or a government not recognized by Canada.

Let me point out, in conclusion, that the legislation is not directed against any particular group by name. It therefore should not affect the present representation of Baltic States in Canada.

Diplomatic Immunities

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-14, an act to amend the Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities Act, has the support of members of my party. We would like to see speedy passage accorded to it through all stages of legislation. The bill has emerged several times on the legislative docket in previous Parliaments, and, indeed, was introduced into the other place by the Clark government as Bill S-11 and given first reading on November 29, 1979.

The major thrust of the bill is to make it an offence to establish or to continue the operation of an embassy or consulate in Canada by persons not representing a sovereign state or a government recognized by Canada. From time to time, as we are aware, political groups and movements emerge which claim the right to full diplomatic recognition by other states and all the perquisites and prerogatives which accompany such an action.

It is proper that Canada state in legislative terms that no person or group of persons who do not represent a sovereign state shall have those privileges, so that any questions of doubt which linger in the minds of persons or organizations that do not enjoy legislative sovereign authority shall be laid to rest once and for all as far as this country is concerned.

As the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Duclos) has said, the Vienna Conventions on Diplomatic and Consular Relations set out the premises on which missions can be established, and Bill C-14 reiterates those understandings.

We would not want to see diplomatic or consular rights accorded to representatives of other than a sovereign state in this country, and in the same manner we would not tolerate that such recognition be given by other countries to groups or movements which might originate in Canada.

The bill makes it an offence to represent one's country illegally, an offence which is punishable on summary conviction. This bill then, denies diplomatic recognition to those who do not merit such status because they are not representatives of a sovereign state or government. We agree with the premise set out in Bill C-14.

We have been talking about groups to which diplomatic privileges should not be extended. I should like to take this opportunity, because so few opportunities are afforded us, to say a few words in appreciation of the tremendous work done by the person to whom diplomatic and consular status is given.

Canadians serve their country abroad in 117 countries, in positions ranging from high commissioner, ambassador to clerk. They put in long hours, often under difficult and trying circumstances, and in increasingly dangerous and uncertain conditions. They do so exceedingly well. The men and women sent from Canada to whom diplomatic and consular privileges and immunities are extended, generally play an unsung role, though from time to time they receive the well merited thanks of thousands of Canadians who journey to other countries.

Because the good deeds of our diplomatic and consular personnel largely go unnoticed by the majority of Canadians, it was indeed a good thing that an event such as the Canadian caper came along, that is the successful escape of six Americans from Tehran, which was engineered by the Canadian Embassy—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: —so that we can be reminded by an event such as that of the excellent work done by our overseas staff.

In the Iranian Embassy episode, not only the work of Ambassador Ken Taylor can be highlighted, but also that of all those who served in Iran during those days. I would just like to mention their names so that they will go on the record of Parliament. They are: Ken and Pat Taylor, John and Zena Sheardown, Roger Lucy, Mary O'Flaherty, Laverna Dollimore, Sergeant Claude Gauthier, Sergeant J. G. Edward, Master Corporal George E. Brian, Corporal J. A. Goss and Corporal Allan B. Haley.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Naturally, not all the work undertaken by Canadian government personnel overseas can be quite as dramatic, but it does merit our thanks and commendation, and I take this opportunity to do so.

I notice that a technical error has been corrected in Clause I of the bill. That clause states that if it appears the privileges and immunities accorded to the Canadian diplomatic mission in any country are less than those conferred by this act on the country's diplomatic mission or consular post here, the government may withdraw the privileges and immunities so conferred. In other words, through Clause 1, we are exchanging reciprocal privileges.

But that raises the very real question as to whether reciprocal privileges are, in reality, being accorded to all Canadian missions abroad at the present time, in the same way that privileges and immunities are extended to foreign missions here.

For instance, are there no restrictions on travel within the Soviet Union and perhaps in other Eastern bloc countries imposed on Canadian personnel in a manner that is not imposed on those countries' representatives here? Do all countries where we have missions extend the same opportunities for spouses to be gainfully employed as are accorded in this country? Are there reciprocal arrangements regarding tax exemptions, convertibility of funds, and the right to purchase or dispose of certain personal effects? I not only doubt it, but know that in some cases the same privileges and immunities are not extended to Canadians serving abroad as the host country receives here in Canada, and I would like to hear from the parliamentary secretary during his concluding remarks how strictly the government is going to adhere to the letter of the law.

It is important, both for the morale and convenience of our personnel serving abroad, from whatever department they originate, that they receive the benefit of all the privileges and immunities to which they are entitled.

Having stated that, Mr. Speaker, I would indicate that we are in general agreement with the purposes of Bill C-14.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of our House leader who is at the House leaders' meeting I wish to state that we endorse speedy passage of Bill C-14. This was agreed today at a House leaders' meeting and I have been asked to relay this message.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO SEXUAL OFFENCES AND THE PROTECTION OF YOUNG PERSONS

The House resumed from Tuesday, July 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-53, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and the protection of young persons and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair has no understanding that there may be any disposition—

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, due to the co-operation received from the other side of the House this afternoon, we have gone through the legislation rather quickly. The hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) was to reply on behalf of his party on Bill C-53. I sent an urgent notice to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to have him come to the House. I understand that he will be here shortly, and I hope we could have agreement that if there are other speakers for the Official Opposition, they could speak now and then and extend to the hon. member for Burnaby the normal courtesy when he appears.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) had the floor the last time the bill was being debated.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I had the floor. The parliamentary secretary was probably not aware of the fact that I was just clearing my throat last night and was getting warmed up for a further dissertation. He is quite right, however. I made an arrangement with the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) that the next person to be called, because he is tied up in committee, would be a member from our side. I think the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean) is on his way over to ensure that there will be a continuation of this debate following my remarks.

• (1640)

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, so as not to deprive any hon. members of the right to participate, perhaps we can agree that the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) can continue until the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean) arrives so that we do not find ourselves in the embarrassing situation of having members wanting to speak on the bill not having the right to do so because the time of the hon. member for Saskatoon West has expired.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair needs further explanation. It seems to me that the parliamentary secretary is proposing that an hon. member be ordered to continue speaking regardless of his wish.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that by the time we get over these points of order, the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) will have had an opportunity to fly to Burnaby and return. As to the suggestion of the parliamentary secretary, it reminds me of an observation that Sir Winston Churchill once made. He suggested that if someone wanted him to speak for ten minutes, he should be given two weeks' notice, and that if someone wanted him to speak for half an hour, he should be given two days' notice, but if someone wanted him to speak for three or four hours, all that was needed was for that person to stand up on the floor of the House of Commons and suggest he carry on, thus giving him one minute's notice. I believe that is what the parliamentary secretary is suggesting.

However, I think the parliamentary secretary can assess the situation at the appropriate time. If I happen to complete my remarks and it so happens that the hon. member for Burnaby is not here, the parliamentary secretary can think about what he will do then. I do not know whether we can commit ourselves at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised to be speaking again this afternoon. I thought we had a lot of business, and the House has indicated, by passing a number of bills that Parliament does live and that occasionally we do get through many pieces of legislation.

Last night I made a certain observation, and I am sorry that I have to make it again this afternoon in a different context. The fact that the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) has finally shown up does not mean I will terminate my remarks now, after all those points of order. I intend to conclude my remarks. This bill is an important piece of legislation, as I said last night. I say it again today and I have said it before. I have said it on a number of occasions, as have other members of our party and other members of Parliament and as has been indicated by many members of the government party. I know that ministers from time to time have obligations and appointments to keep and occasionally they find it impossible to be in the House. This afternoon we have seen examples of parliamentary secretaries coming to the House on what I would term not major bills, but bills that have received general consent in the House, technical bills on matters of lesser importance in terms of issues, but rarely do we see a situation when a major social or economic bill comes forward and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) refuses or neglects to be in the House of Commons during the course of the debate. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Irwin) is not even here to represent the minister. I thought it was bad enough last night that the parliamentary secretary led off this debate because there are important issues involved and there are important questions which arise by virtue of this legislation. The minister should be present to get the sense of the representations being made by members of Parliament who are dealing with this matter. I think it is incumbent on the minister himself to be present during the course of this debate.

I see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice is now entering the House and I will retract my observations of him. But the minister was here today. His parliamentary secretary cannot say that the minister is not in Ottawa. The minister was present during question period. Maybe he is a little cowed or feeling somewhat hesitant about coming back to the House after the way he performed during question period. But the minister should be here for this legislation. I take particular exception to the fact that the minister is ignoring this legislation, and I reiterate that when we are talking about an important bill he should make up his mind whether or not he is interested in this portfolio. If he is not interested, then he should tender his resignation to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) so that we can have someone on the treasury benches who is interested in the legislation.

Last night when I was interrupted by the bell, I was addressing some of the provisions of the bill before us relating to the amendments to the Criminal Code, particularly Sections 246.1 and 246.2. I was pointing out some of the concerns I had with respect to the operation of those new provisions. I generally support the thrust that is being taken, but I think we have to be careful, in our consideration of this legislation, to make sure that the best possible legislation is produced by the House of Commons and that it is legislation which will have the proper effect in carrying out the intentions of Parliament. I was talking about my concern with respect to some of the definitions and the precision of the definitions within the bill itself.

At the conclusion of yesterday's proceedings I pointed out that the term "sexual assault" is not defined in this legislation. The bill simply says that everyone who commits a sexual assault is guilty of an indictable offence.

There are real questions as to just what sexual assault is. The elements of the offence are not laid out within the legislation. For example, if a person, in an effort to strike another in the stomach, misdirects that blow and it lands in the groin area, how is that defined? Is it sexual assault under the definition of the bill? I point out that the Law Reform Commission's recommendations contain a clearer statement of the requisite mental attitude in committing the crime of sexual assault. I think that is important. After all, in the context of criminal law we are dealing with the intention of the accused in each instance. That is the general principle we have in criminal law under our system. The commission suggested that the code should read:

> Everyone who, for a sexual purpose, directly or indirectly touches a person—

It goes on to say then that that person commits an offence. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that when we have an opportunity to look at this matter in committee, if that is possible during this session of Parliament, we will have to look carefully at the wording of Section 246.1 when studying this bill.

There is also considerable room for questioning the merits of the way in which the term "aggravated sexual assault" is defined in Section 246.2. This most serious offence comes into play only when a weapon is used during the assault or when serious bodily harm is caused. This formulation ignores entirely the issue of psychological harm as far as the complainant is concerned and it also ignores the conduct of the assailant, short of that which causes serious bodily harm. Let me deal with those two questions.

I think we should consider the inclusion of the notion of psychological harm under Section 246.2. Women are often advised not to resist a sexual attack so as not to suffer physical injury. That is not to say, however, that they may not be injured in a very real sense. An assailant who uses verbal threats or abuse can severely traumatize a victim and cause profound and lasting emotional damage. Statistics indicate that in 70 per cent of the cases that is the situation. It seems strange that an attacker who carries a knife but causes no physical injury would be liable to prosecution under Section 246.2, but an attacker who completely terrorizes a victim with verbal abuse and threats, and perhaps even forces a woman, through these threats, to commit particularly perverse or degrading acts would be liable only to punishment under Section 246.1.

These problems have to be looked at to make sure that we are not getting ourselves into the preposterous situation where the law is attempting to do one thing but has the consequence of reducing the kind of charge that may be placed against a person in a very serious set of circumstances. The specification of serious bodily harm in Section 246.2 must also be examined. This is a new and novel concept. The code presently uses the phrase "bodily harm" in Section 245. It does not contain any reference to serious bodily harm. This is a new term which takes us into uncharted waters. This is something which should be considered by the committee.

This bill changes the sentence for punishing persons who commit equivalent offences under the existing code. In some instances the penalties are higher under this bill and in some they are lower. For example, rape is now punishable by life imprisonment. Under the new system, sexual assault would carry a ten-year penalty. These are serious matters. I am sure that the members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will want to consider the extent and nature of the penalties and sanctions placed in the code in respect of these offences.

I understand the rationale behind the remarks of the parliamentary secretary and indeed behind the material sent out by the Department of Justice. These are serious offences. We must look closely at them and be able to satisfy ourselves that the appropriate penalty is being placed with respect to each of the offences that are created under this bill and in the subsequent amendments to the act.

Another area of the bill I want to consider today deals with the way in which complainants are dealt with during trial proceedings. As I remarked yesterday, rape trials in particular often take on the appearance of being an inquisition into the private and personal life of the victim rather than an assessment of the case against the accused. This situation is most regrettable and no doubt it accounts in large measure for the fact that only one out of eight rape cases are reported.

Victims simply do not want to subject themselves to the trial process. That is understandable. It is a very traumatic experience for many women. They have to go through the process of a lengthy trial. They are placed on the stand. They find this a very trying time, as well as the preliminary investigation where questions are asked by the police and others in positions of authority.

On the other hand, we must not lose sight of the rights of the accused. Sometimes it is very easy to miss the balance that is required in these matters. In attempting to solve one set of problems, other problems are created with regard to the basic and fundamental rights that an accused has traditionally had in this country. A delicate balance must be struck between the right of the accused to have a full and fair defence and the necessity of complainants not to be subjected to degrading or unreasonable treatment.

This bill contains a number of features aimed, to a greater or lesser degree, at the question of protecting the complainant and eliminating unrealistic roadblocks in the path of the prosecution. The bill specifies that corroboration is not required to obtain a conviction for a sexual offence. This provision is found in proposed Section 246.2. There is a further stipulation that no corroboration warning is required. However, subsection (2) makes it clear that a judge can still comment on the credibility of the witness. There are some troublesome problems associated with this proposal. First, it is badly drafted. Some simple but important changes are required to make the section clearer. More important, it is uncertain how this section will affect Section 586 of the code as it now reads. Section 586 states:

> No person shall be convicted of an offence upon the unsworn evidence of a child unless the evidence . . . is corroborated in a material particular by evidence that implicates the accused.

This section particularizes in the criminal law context the general provision contained in Section 16(2) of the Canada Evidence Act.

The problem is this. Section 586 and the proposed Section 246.3 are not compatible. Since victims of sexual attacks are often children and since attacks often take place in situations where there is no corroborative evidence, the corroboration requirements in Section 586 is an onerous one. Since Section 586 is more particular than the general provision advanced in this bill, it may well be interpreted as overriding the amendment proposed in Bill C-53. This issue will have to be taken up and an explanation given. Possibly there should be an amendment by the officials of the department and, hopefully, by the minister, if he sees fit to attend the committee meetings.

The second feature of Bill C-53 that relates to improving the lot of the complainant and streamlining the law to some extent is contained in what would become the new Section 246.4. This section in the words of the minister's information paper "abolishes" the doctrine of recent complaint. The section itself uses the word "abrogate". We must look closely at subsection (3) of Section 246.4. It provides that in certain proceedings where consent is an issue and where by virtue of subsection (2) evidence of a complaint could still be heard, a judge "is not required" to give the jury any direction respecting the lack of a complaint. There is a real possibility that this subsection will resurrect the present state of affairs whereby the fact that no complaint was made immediately after the incident can lead to an inference of consent.

The third matter I want to deal with in this part of my remarks concerns questions posed at trial about the previous sexual conduct of the complainant. Under the common law a denial of sexual contact with others by the complainant precluded any further inquiry into what was considered a collateral issue. It was also open to an accused to ask questions as to the complainant's general reputation for chastity as a matter going to credibility and consent. The accused was entitled to bring evidence to contradict an accusation of lack of chastity.

In 1976 the government attempted to put limits on questions about the complainant's sexual relations with persons other than the accused. Section 142 of the code was introduced to achieve this end. It provided for notices of questions and an in camera assessment by a judge as to whether the questions should be asked in open court. However, the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Forsythe v. The Queen (June 27, 1980) had the effect of making Section 142 much less effective than had been hoped. Under the terms of the Supreme Court's ruling, an accused can now force a complainant to answer questions in open court and can adduce evidence to contradict her answers.

This bill contains a section which is aimed at narrowing the scope of questions about a complainant's conduct with persons other than the accused. Section 246.5 would require written notice of questions and would require that a judge assess their merit at an in camera hearing at which the complainant would not be a compellable witness. Questions could only be asked in certain specified situations.

I think that these are welcome changes. They do, however, raise an issue which will need to be canvassed. It has been suggested that a complainant's sexual activities with persons other than the accused should be facts that are simply not admissible. The argument is that a person's activities with third parties are quite irrelevant to the question of consent with the accused. I am sure that this is a matter that will be convassed not only on the floor of the House, but also in the course of the committee hearings.

Another issue that has sparked a good deal of public debate in recent times concerns the defence of mistake of fact. In May, 1980, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the defence of mistake of fact was available to persons charged with rape. That is the Pappajohn case. The Pappajohn case held that an honest belief was sufficient and there was no additional requirement that it be reasonable. The decision prompted many people, women's groups in particular, to declare that Canada's rape laws had been eviscerated.

On the other side of the question, people argued that triers of fact are not so gullible as to believe pure fabrication and that the basic principles of criminal law as delineated in cases like Regina v. Beaver required that an honest belief must be sufficient.

This bill does not change the law and demand that a mistake of fact be reasonable. Rather, in Section 244(5), it provides that, where the defence is raised, the trial judge shall direct the jury when it determines the honesty of the belief to consider, inter alia, the presence or absence of reasonable grounds for that belief.

It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that we will have to submerge ourselves in the problems and controversies generated by the Pappajohn decision. I would suggest, however, that there are more than just two sides that can be taken. I think we may want to give some consideration to a third option which would involve a reverse-onus clause. Such a position would involve leaving the defence of an honest but unreasonable mistake open, but would force accused persons who want to avail themselves of such a defence to establish the existence of the mistake on a balance of probabilities. This is a middle-of-the-road position. Although it does not give accused persons the benefit of the doctrine whereby criminal offences must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt, it does leave the "mistake of fact" defence open, and at the same time it should answer most of the concerns of those who see the Pappajohn decision as a threat. The committee will hopefully consider this option when it grapples with the issue of mistake of fact, which was raised by members of the Senate in respect of this legislation.

As I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, this bill deals with more than just sexual offences. I want to look now at those parts of the bill which deal with the abduction of children. We are all aware, I think, of the tremendous problems and heartbreak of many parents when a spouse abducts a child during the course of, or after, a custody dispute. Such actions are generally considered by the police to be matters for resolution in the civil courts. As a result, many people are simply left helpless. They lack either the resources or the legal recourse to recover their children by way of civil process.

The code does presently have a provision that covers abduction or harbouring of a child under 14. However, Section 250 is defective because it does not apply to persons "claiming in good faith" a right to possession of the child.

Bill C-53 proposes to deal with the problem of parents abducting children by introducing new Sections 250.1 and 250.2 to the Criminal Code. These provisions make the force of the criminal law available to persons faced with parental kidnapping. I welcome this attempt to combat a problem of growing seriousness in this country.

I should mention that one of my colleagues has taken a leading role in respect of encouraging this House to pass legislation, through many private member's bills, on this particular topic, and I refer to the hon. member for Surry-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen). Since the time he has been elected as a member of Parliament in 1974, he has continuously pressed the House of Commons through private member's bills to pass legislation which would afford some protection to parents in the case of parental kidnapping. I compliment the member because I am certain that it is because of the persistence he has demonstrated with regard to this particular change that the government has now seen fit to bring forward legislation in the course of these amendments which in effect try to deal with the problem.

I am not going to read Sections 250.1 and 250.2 into the record. However, I do want to point out one matter which should be looked into at the committee. I think we will want to re-word Section 250.1(1). It does not apply in cases where the parent with lawful possession of a child consents to the taking of the child from him or her. In many situations of kidnapping the parent in lawful possession does agree to the taking of the child by the other parent. Visits and outings are common. It is only when the other parent retains custody of the child that the problem arises.

My point is that the word "taking" as it is used in Section 250.1 is arguably not broad enough to cover the situation where a parent obtains permission to have the child for a period of time and then never returns that child.

I now want to speak about the provisions in the bill with regard to child pornography. So-called "kiddie porn" is a major concern in Canada. It is a problem that has been spreading and growing. The Criminal Code has no provisions aimed expressly at preventing the exploitation of children for pornographic purposes.

I am pleased to see that this bill makes an effort to hit directly at the problem. Happily, Mr. Speaker, the bill takes the right basic approach. It focuses on the aspect of exploitation and properly treats the children involved as victims.

This bill, C-53, proposes that a section 168.2 be added to the code. The section would make it an offence to induce, coerce or use a person under 16 years of age for the purpose of producing visual material containing what is referred to as "sexually explicit conduct". The bill would also create offences relating to the sale and distribution of material containing depictions of such conduct.

There is just one point I want to make about these proposals. As I indicated, these changes in the law are welcome indeed. There are, however, some problems I wish to point out. The section only relates to conduct of a sexual nature. I think we must deal with the question of violence in this regard. A child can be portrayed as a participant in scenes of violence that are as obscene as those of a sexual nature. Sometimes I think we tend to become preoccupied with sexual matters in our society and concerned about that, and not in terms of criminal legislation having regard to the kind of programs now available generally through television and other forms of publication, theatre and movies. It often occurs to me, as I am sure it occurs to many other members, that the most repugnant kind of obscenity that can be observed in terms of television, theatre, movies and so on, is not necessarily that with a sexual connotation, strangely enough, but in terms of violence now being portrayed in our country in this way, and easily available and accessible to our children. This is something to which we may want to turn our attention to see whether there is something which can be done in this area in terms of amendments to the Criminal Code. We might address ourselves to what I consider to be an equally disturbing aspect affecting our society today.

The bill before us is, indeed, a very important one. I want to sit down soon in order that my colleague, the hon. member for Waterloo, can carry on in accordance with an agreement made in the House earlier and address his remarks to the House.

I simply want to reiterate the fact that the bill has been the product of good intentions. The fact is, as I have tried to point out on a number of instances, and occasionally in some detail, there are some very serious problems in terms of the draftsmanship and in terms of accomplishing the best legislation which has to be looked at by the committee. There are some very serious questions about some of the provisions of the bill which cause concern to members on both sides of the House. The parliamentary secretary pointed out yesterday that he has some concerns at this stage, and that the government has had some concerns that will cause the government to propose some amendments to this legislation.

I am very much concerned that what is happening here is somewhat of a charade. The government has introduced this bill in the dying moments of this part of the session, late at night, an afterthought after a number of less important bills have been dealt with and disposed of or debated, as the case may be. Under all the circumstances, I really wonder whether this will get the attention it should get in terms of the public media. It is important that there be public input into the provisions of this bill and a public understanding as to what is being attempted. I personally have tried to communicate with a wide range of interest groups across the country in my role as justice critic for the Official Opposition. I have tried to hear from them as to what their attitudes are with respect to this legislation. Many of the points I have made in my presentation today are the result of direct representations and observations made by people involved in this area either through counselling, involvement in child welfare or involvement in the administration of justice generally. In this latter respect I refer to lawyers and bar associations. I want to extend to them publicly my appreciation. I have received excellent co-operation from many people across the country who have taken the time either to come and see me and my colleagues in my party or to write to me about this legislation.

I think we will be faced again with the prospect of having this bill debated on the floor of the House of Commons, referred to a committee and stacked up with other legislation which is now before the committee or awaiting conclusion of consideration by the committee. The point is that the bill will not in the course of this session of Parliament receive the full attention of the committee. We will be faced again with a new Speech from the Throne and a new Parliament and with starting again the process of trying to get this bill brought forward so that we can have the legislation dealt with, improved and passed. I simply say to those who may be following this debate by watching it or reading Hansard that my concern is that we may have just started on the first leg of a journey. I am under no illusions that there will be a conclusion of the consideration of this bill. I am very disappointed in the way it has been handled and in the lack of priority. I am disappointed that the minister did not even think it important enough to appear in the House at any time that this matter has been discussed or to participate directly and listen to some of the suggestions made. I and other colleagues will be speaking further about the bill. It is a terribly important bill to which we want to give careful consideration.

I simply say to the government that I am disappointed very much in the way in which this has been handled and in the ad hoc arrangements the government has made with respect to the introduction of the bill. I simply tell the minister that if he does not appear before this debate is over in the course of the committee deliberations—if we are able to have those—he does not know what trouble is, uranium cartel or no uranium cartel.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have the honour to inform the House that messages have been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed the following bills without amendment:

Bill C-50, an act to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal the Irish Free State Trade Agreement Act, 1932, the Union of South Africa Trade Agreement Act, 1932, and the United Kingdom Trade Agreement Act, 1937.

Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas.

Bill C-70, an act to amend the Animal Disease and Protection Act.

Bill C-71, an act to amend the International Development Association Act.

Bill C-72, an act to amend the National Housing Act.

Bill C-73, an act to amend the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act.

Bill C-74, an act to authorize financial assistance to be provided to certain international financial institutions.

Criminal Code

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO SEXUAL OFFENCES AND THE PROTECTION OF YOUNG PERSONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-53, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and the protection of young persons and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak about Bill C-53, which is certainly one of the most important bills to come before this House. It is a bill for which the women of Canada have been waiting far too long.

Before getting into the substance of my remarks I would like to associate myself with the concern expressed by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) about the absence from this House of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) during consideration of this important bill. There is no question that that is regrettable and is an indication, unfortunately, that the minister does not take seriously the fact that this is a bill of considerable substance to the women of Canada. It is such not just to the women of Canada but to all Canadians.

I would also say as a preliminary matter, speaking as the justice critic of the New Democratic Party, that we believe this bill should be dealt with quickly in the House and referred to the committee where it can receive the very careful study and consideration it needs. While we support the principles underlying Bill C-53, there is no question that there will have to be improvements made in the committee. Having said that, I should note that we have agreed that we should be prepared to see this bill go to committee after one speaker from our party—namely me—has spoken, and in view of the fact that the hon. member for Saskatoon West has recognized the importance of the bill, I certainly hope he will permit this bill to go to committee where it might be considered at an early date.

I note that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs is presently involved in consideration of freedom of information legislation and also, as I understand it, it will be dealing with legislation respecting young offenders, but I hope we will see this bill go to the committee at an early date and that following the needed amendments to the bill we will see it passed into law.

As I said, Canadian women have been waiting for some time for changes to archaic laws with respect to sexual offences. Hon. members will know that there have been two bills in the past three or four years, Bill C-52 and Bill C-51, and in addition, in the fall of 1978 there was a very comprehensive report on the subject of sexual offences issued by the Law Reform Commission. That report made a number of important recommendations, some of which are reflected in the content of Bill C-53. Others, unfortunately, are not. I will note just a couple of matters which, unfortunately, are not dealt with in the bill. There is no reference whatsoever in this bill to the important issue of sexual harassment. This has become increasingly prevalent in Canada in recent months and years. The Canadian Human Rights Commission in its most recent annual report urged the goverment to take action quickly to deal with concerns about sexual harassment and particularly sexual harassment on the job. Unfortunately, the federal government has remained silent and has not responded to these concerns about sexual harassment in the workplace. There has been some indication that perhaps there may be changes to the Canada Labour Code, but there is no question that until legislative steps are taken, Canadian women will be subjected to sexual harassment. There must be an end to this practice very quickly.

I also note that there is no reference in this bill to Section 179(1) or Section 193 of the Criminal Code. These are sections of the code dealing with laws respecting what are known as common bawdy houses. I urge that in the context of our consideration of this bill, a bill which should deal comprehensively with sexual offences and matters relating to sexual offences, we review these provisions of the Criminal Code. Unfortunately there appears to have been a sweeping abuse of this law recently in the city of Toronto, in the city of Edmonton and elsewhere. When we review these provisions of the Criminal Code with respect to common bawdy houses, we should examine very carefully the definition of a common bawdy house and particularly whether the concept of an act of indecency—whatever that may be; it may very well be an act which is entirely legal in private—should continue to be included in the definition of a common bawdy house.

Finally, a matter which has been touched on only peripherally in the context of Bill C-53 is the matter of prostitution. This bill purports to attempt to equalize provisions of the Criminal Code and bring sexual equality to bear in the Criminal Code with respect to sexual offences. However, there is still a glaring inequity in the area of prostitution. While on the one hand a woman who is deemed to be pressing and persistent in attempting to seek a sexual liaison can be charged, a man, the prospective John as he is called, is immune from prosecution. So a man who harasses persistently and pressingly a woman going about her business, asks her if she wants to have a good time or solicits her for the purposes of sexual relations, is not covered by the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to prostitution. Surely that kind of double standard must be addressed in a bill purporting to bring equality to this area of the law.

I note there is a single reference to prostitution in the legislation which would clarify that the prostitute can be either a man or a woman. That is as it should be if there is to be equality in the law. At the same time we must recognize that the behaviour of a man who pressingly and persistently bothers a woman for the purposes of prostitution should be covered.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, the bill attempts to overhaul a number of areas of the Criminal Code, not just with respect to sexual offences. The first major provision of the bill is with respect to the sexual exploitation of young people and child pornography. There are changes with respect to the gross indecency provision and others of a similar nature. There are changes relating to child abduction by a parent, indeed by another person. Of course we all know the great anguish that can be caused in circumstances such as this. There are changes with respect to evidentiary provisions in trials of sexual offences. Finally, and most important, there are changes with respect to rape laws, namely, a redefinition of the offences of rape and indecent assault. I say without hesitation that we welcome the changes to redefine rape as a crime of violence and aggression, not one of lust or passion. It is a violent crime, and to the extent this law recognizes that, the changes are welcome.

I also note a very significant change from earlier bills submitted by the Liberal government, a change in response to representations from many groups and individuals across Canada. That is the removal of the so-called spousal immunity, the doctrine that says a wife cannot be raped. In this day and age we must recognize that marriage should not mean forced sexual submission and to the extent that this bill removes spousal immunity from the law, we welcome the principle.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, also deals with certain archaic and, in many ways, sexist provisions of our rape laws. It gets rid of the outdated notion that rape can only take place if the penis penetrates the vagina and that a man can only rape a woman. It recognizes that as a sexist provision and that there can be a variety of forms of sexual assault.

Now I would like to return to some of the areas I dealt with in passing earlier. Naturally I will be elaborating in detail on some of the important aspects of the bill which require amendment if it is to reflect truly the views and concerns of all Canadians, not just of women. All members of the House will welcome the general thrust of the provisions concerning the sexual exploitation of young people. We recognize it is necessary to eliminate the sexist nature of the present law. There are many archaic notions in the Criminal Code with respect to sexual offences against young people, such concepts as the notion of a previously chaste character and others which discriminate on the basis of sex. However, there are still a number of problems with respect to the government's proposals in this area. The key concept is that of sexual misconduct. What is meant by that? Nowhere in the bill do we find any definition of sexual misconduct, whatever that may be. The Law Reform Commission suggested, for example, that the that concept of sexual contact should be invoked. By that they meant we would be referring to any touching of the sexual organs of another, or the touching of another with one's sexual organs that is not accidental. At least there we have some specific definition.

Of course, there may be problems with that as well. One can question, for example, whether we might wish to prohibit certain other conduct that does not involve specific contact of sexual organs, such as what has been known as french kissing, and other forms of sexual contact. In any event, there is no definition of this central concept of sexual misconduct. We will be seeking further clarification of it in committee. Similarly, Mr. Speaker, clause 167(2)(d), the reference to young people between the ages of 14 and 16 being, and I use the words of the clause, states:

What does this concept mean? This is a new concept in our law and one which may unfortunately involve in many cases, in effect, the placing of the young person on trial, questioning whether or not a 14 or 15-year old was more responsible for the sexual contact, whatever it may have been, than the older person.

There must be clarity in the law. This would appear to bring into force the old concept of "more to blame" an archaic concept which should be repealed in this day and age. No one questions that there must be tough and effective protection from sexual exploitation of young people. In this regard we welcome the establishment of a study committee on sexual abuse of children to be chaired, I believe, by Dr. Robin Badgley. However, the time-frame of two years for this particular study is far too long. Sexual abuse of children is rampant and widespread in Canadian society and must be put to an end quickly.

In this connection I would certainly hope, Mr. Speaker, that this important study, which hopefully will not take the full two years, will not be cut short the way the study of Corinne Robertshaw was cut short. In a disgraceful act, the hard preliminary work of a group of dedicated experts was brought to an end and Corinne Robertshaw was told to turn over to the government the raw material she had before she had written her final comprehensive report. This kind of contempt of a committee studying the important issue of child abuse must be recognized as such by members of this House. I strongly urge all members to encourage the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to permit Corinne Robertshaw to continue her study.

I also note, Mr. Speaker, that the bill does not accept the recommendation made by the Law Reform Commission in 1978, a recommendation endorsed by the National Association of Women and the Law, and a number of other groups, that sexual intercourse with an adult blood relative should not be a criminal offence in this day and age. Without taking a firm position on that question, we will certainly want to hear witnesses as to whether or not it is appropriate that within the Criminal Code we define that kind of consensual adult behaviour in private as being of a criminal nature.

I mentioned the provisions of the bill related to the serious problem—and there is no question it is a serious problem—of child pornography in Canada. All members share the revulsion at the exploitation of children for the purposes of the production of pornography. I would note that in 1978 the unanimous report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs recommended toughening the sanctions in this particular area. Without endorsing this time all of those recommendations, I would certainly say this is an area we will want to examine further in the committee to ensure that the provisions are drafted in a way which would effectively meet the very real concerns about this "kiddy porn", as it is known, which is, unfortunately, all too prevalent in Canadian society.

Another area which is touched upon in the bill, although not referred to by either the speaker on behalf of the government or of the Conservative party, is sections of the bill with respect to gross indecency. As the House will know, these provisions are very vague and in many ways archaic. I would point out that gross indecency has been judicially interpreted as covering conduct which "violates the general instinctive sense of Canadians as to what is decent and clean as distinct from what is indecent and dirty." Those words are from the leading decision on the subject of gross indecency.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, that definition is very broad and has been abused in a fashion which really constitutes discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. I would urge that these provisions be repealed, as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney) has urged in this House through a recent bill, that this particular provision be recognized as archaic, and that the behaviour which is attempted to be dealt with in this provision should, indeed, be covered by other sections of the proposed sexual offences legislation.

In this day and age it is most improper that there should be any laws which discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation. I would have hoped that a government, which talked in terms of a charter of rights for all Canadians, would recognize that provisions of the Criminal Code which discriminate on that basis, as does the provision with respect to gross indecency as it is applied in Canada, must be repealed. As I have said before, this is a provision which is archaic and discriminatory. Young people are adequately protected by other provisions in the sexual offences bill. I would urge the government to consider seriously repealing Section 158 of the Criminal Code.

I would like to say that the child abduction section which is included in the bill is a step in the right direction. Many of us are aware of the very serious problems which have been caused, and the great anguish which results, when children are abducted from the lawful custodial parent. They may be taken from province to province or, indeed, out of the country. Naturally, we will want to examine carefully whether the proposed penalties which are contained in this section are not excessive and whether the appropriate response in this area is, indeed, lengthy jail terms or whether, in recognizing that we must combat, and combat effectively, this serious problem of illegal child abduction there are other alternatives and other methods. I look forward to hearing from witnesses from a number of different organizations on this important question.

There are a number of evidenciary changes which for the most part we welcome, such as the overruling of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Forsythe case, which in many ways reverted back to the pre-1976 period and put a woman on trial, treated the complainant, as it were, as essentially being a compellable witness. But the bill does not go far enough. The bill still states that the previous sexual history of that woman with a person other than the accused should be admissible in evidence. I say very clearly that the evidence of a previous sexual history of a woman with a person other than the accused should not be admissible in a court of law when dealing with these sexual offences. Quite simply the issue is: was that woman assaulted on that particular occasion? Her history of sexual involvement with other men on other occasions must not be considered as relevant. Unfortunately, it has been the case on too many occasions that juries, and in some cases trial judges, I suspect, have failed to distinguish between the alleged purpose of such questions, which is allegedly to go to the issue of credibility. There is the general suggestion that somehow because a woman has had other sexual involvement, it was not as likely that she was sexually assaulted on that particular occasion.

Some months ago I raised in the House the case of a woman who was raped here in the Ottawa area. The man who was charged was ultimately convicted of that rape and was given a very light sentence. Mr. Justice Pennell stated that the woman who was raped was a "woman of the world", as he put it, and because she was a woman of the world that fact should be reflected in the sentence. That kind of judicial idiocy must be put to an end.

The doctrine of recent complaint, which is repealed by this bill, should have been repealed a long time ago. We welcome that repeal provision.

Clause 31 of the bill would make spouses competent and compellable witnesses in cases of violence against children. As I said earlier, we recognize the serious problem of the abuse of children. We welcome this change to the evidenciary provisions of the Canada Evidence Act. I hope this provision will cut down on the incidence of child abuse.

There is one final change in the trial procedures which allegedly deals with the Pappajohn decision, a decision handed down by the Supreme Court of Canada in June of 1980. This decision caused a serious setback to all Canadian women. I would briefly like to explain the effect of that decision. What the Pappajohn precedent made very clear was that if a man came into court and claimed that he honestly believed that a woman was consenting to an unwanted sexual assault, even if there were no reasonable grounds for that belief, he must be acquitted. In this decision, the Supreme Court of Canada followed the Morgan decision of the English House of Lords.

I would like to give one example of the devastating effect of the Pappajohn precedent in Canadian law. Shortly after the Morgan decision there was a decision known as Regina vs. Coggin in which a man, Mr. Leek, brought home a friend named Coggin. Both Leek and Coggin had been drinking. Leek's wife was at home and he told her that Coggin wanted to have sexual intercourse with her and that he, Leek, would also have sexual intercourse with her. The husband had sexual intercourse with his wife, after having beaten her, and then he turned her over, as it were, to his friend Coggin who had sexual intercourse with her. The whole time this was going on, Mrs. Leek was sobbing and she tried to turn away from Coggin. Coggin gave evidence at trial that he thought Mrs.

Leek had consented because her husband had said she would really enjoy the intercourse. This was the only basis for his belief that she was consenting. He was also drunk at the time.

Mr. Coggin walked out of the courtroom a free man on the basis of his belief, even though it was perverse and without any reasonable grounds, that Mrs. Leek was consenting to this act of violence, even though she put up resistance and cried. He was acquitted. This is the effect the Pappajohn decision will have on Canadian women.

Canadian women have clearly stated that no must mean no when dealing with rape law in Canada. I wish to give credit to the North Shore Women's Centre which has worked together with me to launch a national petition campaign to overturn this very dangerous and regressive precedent. Men and women, women's groups and other organizations, including the Canadian Association for the Status of Women, have signed this petition. Each day more people come into my office to sign it. At last count, there were over 20,000 signatures on the petition which demands that the government take action to reverse the Pappajohn decision.

What kind of impact will this bill have on the precedent? Unfortunately, it in no way changes the Pappajohn decision. I can assure Your Honour that we will be fighting, and fighting hard, on behalf of Canadian women and on behalf of the many organizations and individuals which have urged the government to reverse this precedent to ensure that in committee this kind of change is made and that this regressive Pappajohn precedent is, in fact, overruled.

The final area which is covered by this bill, and which is, in many respects the most important area of the bill, is clause 18. Clause 18 would redefine the crimes of rape and indecent assault as sexual assault and aggravated sexual assault. It would also eliminate spousal immunity, as I indicated earlier, and it would put an end to the sexist nature of this crime. I need give only one example. As it now stands, an indecent assault on a women is punishable by a five-year maximum sentence. An indecent assault on a man is punishable by a ten-year maximum sentence. It is that kind of inequality in our law to which we welcome changes, and this bill does, in fact, move in that direction. So there be no doubt, I immediately say that we welcome the changes with respect to the elimination of spousal immunity.

We recognize the important advance in redefining rape as a crime of violence and as a crime of aggression, and not as a crime of passion or a sexual crime. We welcome an end to the sexist nature of many parts of the Criminal Code. It has been said by a number of commentators that as often as every six minutes somewhere in Canada a woman is sexually assaulted. That works out to one out of every five Canadian women who will be assaulted against her will. I am now quoting that figure from an excellent series of articles by a Toronto journalist, Michele Landsberg. That figure does not even include the figure of rape, a crime which is inflicted on one out of every 17 women.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Which series is that?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): This was a four-part series written by Michele Landsberg appearing in the Toronto Star in May of this year.

It is also estimated that some 94 per cent of rapists go right on raping and, in fact, are not reported. I would like to give again one example from Toronto about the conviction of rapes in the rape area. In 1979, in Toronto, there were 207 alleged rapes which were reported. Of course, many more rapes occur than are reported. Of those 207 reported rapes, 87 men were charged. Of those 87 men who were charged, only 16 were brought to trial. Of those 16 who were brought to trial, only 12 were convicted of rape or, in some cases, of a lesser charge. Ultimately, out of 207 reported rapes—and, in fact, there is a far larger number of rapes—only 12 convictions were recorded.

To the extent that this bill attempts to encourage women to report rape, and to the extent that it will facilitate the conviction of those persons who are guilty of sexual assaults, we welcome these provisions. However, I urge the government to reconsider seriously the present classification of sexual assaults which is proposed in this bill, namely, only two broad categories: the category of sexual assault, with a maximum of ten years; and the category of aggravated sexual assault with a maximum life sentence.

I would point out that the category of sexual assault includes everything from unwanted grabbing and fondling which, indeed, must be considered to be a criminal offence, to what we now know as rape. Within that one broad, sweeping category there is far too much behaviour which I would urge should be broken down into at least three, and preferably four categories. The Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women recommended in 1978, and recently repeated the recommendation, that there should be four categories. While these may not be the final categories which are recommended certainly for the record, I would like to put them forward. The council proposes there be a category of sexual assault which would be an electable offence punishable on summary conviction or by indictment; sexual assault while armed with a weapon; sexual assault causing bodily harm; and finally, sexual assault with intent to maim or endanger life which would have a maximum sentence of life imprisonment.

However, in any event, many groups, and many women's groups in particular, have urged the government to change this section of the bill to broaden the category, and not to have only one sweeping category of sexual assault and another sweeping category of aggravated sexual assault.

I would also note that a concern has been expressed, one with which I associate myself, that in amending the Criminal Code in the area of sexual offences, we should not remove the all important right to trial by jury, wherever that right is presently afforded the accused. I would also point out that the bill, as it is now worded, would eliminate the offence of wounding and would rewrite the assault provisions of the Criminal Code. A number of concerns have been expressed to me with respect to the elimination of that particular offence, and we will want to hear carefully from witnesses, such as the Canadian Bar Association, and other witnesses, as to whether this is a wise course to take.

I know that there has been some suggestion by some commentators that it is a mistake to change the name of the offence from rape to sexual assault or, indeed, to simple assault. Naturally we want to hear further evidence on this issue in committee, but on balance, though I certainly have an open mind on it, I am persuaded at this point that we should maintain the suggestion that we redefine the offence of rape as a crime of assault, and that in doing so, we call it that and recognize it as an assault.

Therefore, we welcome those changes to the provisions of the Criminal Code with respect to rape and the redefinition of rape. While those changes are important, there are at least a couple of other areas on which I would urge the government to take action, and it does not have to wait for the passage of this bill to do so. The first is with respect to increased education in the area of sexual offences and response to sexual offences on the part of the police and other individuals.

I would urge, as the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women has urged, that specific educational programs be developed for persons involved in the prevention of crimes of a sexual nature, and that there be assistance both to the victims of these crimes and also assistance to encourage people who are involved in them to undertake research to find out what it is that leads people to commit these crimes.

In addition, I would urge that the government consider funding programs which would assist persons who are specifically trained to deal with and provide information to victims of sexual offences, that there be such persons in all police departments, for example, and also that specific education be provided. There is a great mystique around this area, but there should be specific education for other professionals such as doctors and lawyers, to ensure that they are qualified to provide legal, physical and psychological assistance and information needed by victims of sexual assault and, as well, by offenders.

I would urge that there be far greater funding for rape relief centres in Canada. These centres often operate on a shoestring budget, and they do perform a very valuable service in assisting the victims of sexual assaults. I would note that in my own province, for example, the province of British Columbia, there are very few halfway houses which presently assist women in these circumstances, and they cannot even begin to accommodate the demand in this area. Therefore, I would urge the government substantially to increase its funding, on a cost shared basis where necessary, of rape relief centres.

Finally, I would suggest that the government seriously examine a precedent in the United States. In 1976, the U.S. federal government established a national centre for the prevention and control of rape. As we know, rape is the fastest growing violent crime in Canada and in the United States. In view of this, I would urge the government to consider seriously the possibility of establishing such a national centre, a federal centre, for the prevention and control of rape. The American centre supports research into the causes of rape. It examines laws dealing with rape, laws dealing with the treatment of victims, and the effectiveness of existing programs to prevent and control rape. It involves itself in research and demonstration projects. It assists, through research and demonstration grants, local communities and mental health centres. Finally, it is involved in the dissemination of information with respect to the area of rape.

This is a serious offence. As I say, we welcome the changes in this law to the extent that they will reduce the incidence of sexual assaults of all nature in Canadian society. I would conclude by saying that we strongly support the principles underlying this bill. As I have indicated during the course of my remarks this afternoon, we seek a strengthening of a number of key positions. I mentioned the Pappajohn decision and the repeal of the sections with respect to gross indecency and an end to discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in all sections of the Criminal Code. I mentioned the strengthening of the provisions on sexual exploitation of young persons and, of course, there are a number of other areas on which we will hear from witnesses at committee.

We want this bill to go through and be improved in committee before the end of this session. The women of Canada have waited far too long for justice and for equity and for an end to sexist race laws.

I challenge the government to take seriously its commitment made in the Speech from the Throne to reducing the incidence of violence against women. In the event that we are not able to get this bill through before the end of this session, and that would be unfortunate, I urge the government to bring back before the House, as a top priority, another, stronger bill containing the same principles, at the earliest possible time in the new session.

This party is prepared to see the bill go to committee now. We have agreed to having one speaker on behalf of this party; we have heard one speaker from the Conservative party and one from the government side. I hope that all parties will recognize the urgency of overhauling the archaic laws of Canada with respect to sexual offences and would be prepared to see this bill go to committee now.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the debate and I want to commend hon. members for the high quality of their contribution on a matter of some considerable importance, not just to Canadian women but as well to the evolution of criminal law in Canada.

I do not want the parliamentary secretary to take any offence at my next remarks because I know the position of parliamentary secretaries. They have to do what their ministers tell them or else they do not get reappointed. There are a number of hopefuls sitting on the back benches who would be quite happy to take their places. In fact, they are waiting for the opportunity to advance if a parliamentary secretary does not do what his minister tells him.

I think it is rather important that on a matter which is so significant, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) should present the bill, and that the Minister of Justice be present during the course of the debate. I want to commend ministers who have sat through long debates doing their duty and I want to contrast for members of the House on all sides, what has occurred in the passage of this bill.

In the first place, it was introduced by a parliamentary secretary reading from notes that were likely prepared in the Department of Justice. They may or may not have been prepared for the minister. The Minister of Justice was in the House during Question Period yesterday. His bill was introduced last night but he was not in the House then. He was present during Question Period today and answered questions on the uranium cartel matter which, quite rightly, seems to be engaging the attention of the House. However, rather than remaining to deal with this bill, the Minister of Justice disappeared. I do not know if he has involved himself in the investigations with respect to the uranium cartel, but he does this House, the women of Canada and his own portfolio a great disservice.

I believe I heard a knock from the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, Mr. Speaker.

And being returned:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber, the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

Bill C-50, an act to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal the Irish Free State Trade Agreement Act, 1932, the Union of South Africa Trade Agreement Act, 1932 and the United Kingdom Trade Agreement Act, 1937.

Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas.

Bill C-71, an act to amend the International Development Association Act.

Bill C-72, an act to amend the National Housing Act.

Bill C-73, an act to amend the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act.

Bill C-74, an act to authorize financial assistance to be provided to certain international financial institutions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. tomorrow, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6.10 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TRIBUTE TO PARLIAMENTARY PAGES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Turner (London East): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 for which I ask the unanimous support of this House. Inasmuch as it appears this House is expected to adjourn soon, and noting that the parliamentary pages will leave the House of Commons in September after a year of service to this chamber, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling):

That this House thank the pages for their outstanding service to the members;—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner:

—express the hope that some of them will return at a future date as members of Parliament; provide each with copies of Hansard for the balance of this session of Parliament, and with a copy of today's Hansard autographed by Madam Speaker, the Right Hon. the Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, and the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

Madam Speaker: Since we are about to lose our pages, I suppose this motion is urgent and pressing. Does the House give its unanimous consent to the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

VIA RAIL

PLANS TO CANCEL SERVICE IN ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, I hope I will have the same good luck with my motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

VIA Rail is planning to cancel rail service on the Edmonton-Jasper-Vancouver run which is an essential part of the historic link in transcontinental service. Further, rail service to Drumheller will be cancelled, and to Prince Rupert reduced. Since this would be an incomprehensible act economically damaging a trading area of one million people, and which represents a growth area second to none in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert):

That the cabinet, under Section 64 of the National Transportation Act, direct VIA Rail to conduct public hearings before any reduction in present rail service is imposed on Edmonton, an act that would have the gravest repercussions on the attitude of northern Albertans maintaining a sense of national unity.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED CANCELLATION OF SERVICE IN NEW BRUNSWICK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas the cabinet is considering cancellation of the Atlantic Limited the only national passenger train service operating in south central New Brunswick; and whereas the ridership of the train has increased substantially in the very short time it has had to prove itself and despite the aged equipment it is required to use, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That this House urge the government to press for an improved service and give the VIA operation a reasonable chance to fulfil its mandate before referring the matter to the CTC for an adjudication on a matter on which it ruled only two years ago.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE AND OF GOVERNOR OF THE BANK OF CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that, including today's announcement by the Bank of Canada, Canadians have for the past eight months been forced to live with record high interest rates, for which the government admits there is no end in sight, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo):

That this House urges the Prime Minister to call for the resignations of the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada who do nothing to lower interest rates but continue to allow banks to increase their record profits while all Canadians suffer as a result.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

SUBSIDIZATION OF AUTOMOBILE DRIVERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that under the provisions of that horror story known as the National Energy Program, Canadians are subsidizing the automobile driver at the rate of over $400,000 per hour, and because the government's unrealistic and indeed ridiculous energy policy has put us in the ludicrous position of subsidizing American drivers to the tune of some $256 million per year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche):

That this House instructs the government to start telling the Canadian public the truth by describing the energy program for what it really is, that is, not NEP but NED, a program for national economic disaster.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL STRIKE—DEMAND FOR INTRODUCTION OF BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): I rise on a matter of extreme urgency under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion which I urge all members to support. Whereas a prominent Montreal doctor has warned the government and the union that the postal strike could well mean the retardation or the permanently handicapping of children if blood samples do not get delivered to the laboratories; and whereas farms and businesses through loss of cash flow are on the verge of bankruptcy, and millions of people are being inconvenienced to the point that their whole future is being jeopardized; and whereas some 20,000 postal workers should not be allowed to paralyse the whole nation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this House demands the Trudeau government assume its responsibilities to the nation by legislating the postal workers back to work immediately with heavy penalties for any disobedience to the said law and resuming negotiations once they have returned to work.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR ACTION TO END DISPUTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Kushner (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Postal employees were given the legal right to strike in 1967. Since then there have been 12 strikes, almost one every year. That in itself tells us quite clearly something is wrong, that the government has failed to co-operate with management and labour to make it work, instead hoping problems will go away by dumping them onto a Crown corporation. The current postal dispute is now in its eleventh day. The government has failed to provide leadership and management. The strike is causing very, very serious hardship for many Canadians. Therefore, Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko):

That this House urge the government to take these problems seriously and to live up to its responsibilities and obligations by either negotiating in good faith or legislating the striking employees back to work.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

FUNDING REQUESTED BY CANADIAN COUNCIL OF THE BLIND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport has seen fit to turn down a request for funding from the Canadian Council of the Blind for recreational curling and bowling activities, and whereas this is the International Year of the Disabled, and whereas it should therefore be the policy of this government to encourage rather than discourage these special people, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport be instructed by this House to reconsider immediately his decision and extend the minimal grant which the Canadian Council of the Blind requested.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST THAT OCTOBER 16 BE PROCLAIMED WORLD FOOD DAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion of pressing and urgent necessity. I move, seconded by the former Minister of Agriculture, the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That Canada, being fully aware of her responsibilities within the world community as a member of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization, undertake to celebrate, from the year 1981 onwards October 16 as World Food Day.

ENERGY

CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas it is now very obvious that Canada will not attain the goal of energy self-sufficiency because the Liberal government's ridiculous policies continue to cause supply disruptions and now postponement of the Imperial Oil Cold Lake project; whereas the Cold Lake project alone had the potential to produce 140,000 barrels of oil per day or the equivalent of $2 billion worth of energy production in one year at today's prices, and whereas this single work suspension at Cold Lake will have a devastating effect on thousands of families in my constituency of Athabasca, as well as on the security of our country and the economic prospects of the entire nation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That this House direct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to recognize his failure as minister of energy, swallow his pride, and for the good of this nation, resign.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

IMPERIAL OIL PROJECT AT COLD LAKE, ALTA.—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday's cancellation of the $12 billion Cold Lake project is the largest single casualty of the Liberal energy program to date. Until now the minister has been able to ignore, or has ignored, the 165 rigs which have left the country. He has ignored the 20 to 30 per cent drop in employment in the service industry in the west. He has ignored the large increase in imports. However, he cannot ignore the cancellation of a $12 billion project. The national interest is seriously at stake. Since this decision resulted directly from the impasse between the federal government and the province of Alberta, and is also related directly to elements of the National Energy Program, what action is the minister proposing to take since both of those reasons are within his control?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member must have spent the morning priming his rhetoric, but I wish it were accurate. There has been no cancellation of the Cold Lake project. The project is delayed until an agreement is reached between the government of Alberta and the Government of Canada. The company expressed its intention to proceed with the project if there is a satisfactory agreement between the two governments, which both governments are hoping for. As a matter of fact the statement says, "We will reassess our position on the Cold Lake project as soon as a federal-provincial agreement is reached". Therefore there is no cancellation.

There is a delay or a suspension of the work being done on this project.

As far as the project is concerned, the two governments are having discussions at the present time. I hope we will reach an agreement. It will obviously depend on both sides. I remind my hon. friend that the decision not to approve these projects proceeding is not in the hands of the federal government. It is in the hands of the Alberta government.

REQUEST FOR MEETING BETWEEN FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, the casual attitude of the minister is just incomprehensible. This is a $12 billion project which will affect all of the country. I cannot understand the minister sitting there and saying it is just suspended, it will get started again. It will take two years to get it going again. The cancellation of this project will, in 1990, result in an increase in imports of about 10 per cent, or $2 billion a year at current prices. It will result in economic opportunity lost in Ontario and Quebec. About 30 to 35 per cent of the cost of the project will be spent in those parts of the country. The minister has a responsibility to all Canadians to get these projects going. Will the minister call a meeting with Mr. Leitch at the earliest possible date to press for a conclusion of these negotiations in order to avoid further failures such as the cancellation of the Alsands project? Having meetings once a month or every couple of months is just not good enough. We have to get this project going.

• (1420)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member must not have heard the first answer. There has been no cancellation. There has been a suspension of the activities in this particular project.

Second, Mr. Leitch and I have agreed that we should meet in the latter part of July or the early part of August. We have both agreed that this is the most convenient and appropriate time to do so. The president of Imperial Oil has been advised of this situation, and he recognizes better than my friend that these difficult negotiations cannot be resolved just by a meeting called suddenly. There is a lot of work to be done.

I have proposed in the past that we try to resolve the issue of the tar sands independently for the other, more difficult issues which are still dividing us, but the government of Alberta has taken the view that there should be a global settlement and not a settlement only on the tar sands.

There is not much more I can do in that sense to speed up a resolution of this issue other than to keep on working at it and to hope that we will arrive at a satisfactory arrangement for Canadian consumers as well as the industry.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, let me just comment one more time that there is no sense of urgency evident on the part of the minister at all. The failures of the Liberal energy program just cannot be allowed to continue. The sixteen months of failure we have had to date have to end.

FUTURE OF ALSANDS PROJECT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I will repeat the question I put to the minister in my last question. What is he proposing to do to stop another disaster in relation to the Alsands project, which is coming up to a critical decision date toward the end of July? I am sure hon. colleagues on the minister's side of the House are wondering what is going on in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources that the minister can act so casually about a major disaster like the cancellation of a $12 billion project.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am afraid my colleague has not understood or even heard my second answer. I repeat to him that there is no cancellation. Only some of the work on the project is being suspended.

Mr. Wilson: All of the work.

Mr. Lalonde: I wish my friend would read the press release put out by Imperial Oil.

My friend talks about failures. The only thing I can tell him is that his party is no doubt an expert on the subject of failures. We believe that the National Energy Program is what is best for the citizens of this country in terms of the rights of consumers, the rights of the producing provinces and the rights of consuming provinces.

We are trying to work out an arrangement with the government of Alberta and the other producing provinces which will be fair to the producing provinces and fair to the consumers of this country. We will try to arrive at an arrangement which will be better than the one even the hon. member's leader could not get in 1979.

EFFECT ON PEOPLE OF NORTHEASTERN ALBERTA

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The announcement yesterday by Imperial Oil to close down the Cold Lake project was a suspension. I hope the minister will listen to my question. We are listening to his answers. Imperial Oil indicated to me this morning that because of the suspension it is moving its people to other projects. It has let its contractor go. It has cancelled the contract, which means that to get started again it will take two years. That is a cancellation for two years.

The minister talks about the Canadian economy, about the Canadian people, and about justice for them. What in the hell justice is that to the people of northeastern Alberta? Are they not Canadians?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I certainly heard what the hon. member said. I have had meetings with the president of Imperial Oil. There is no justification for the conclusion that the decision announced yesterday meant that it would take two years to start the project again if there was an agreement reached with the government of Alberta. There does not appear to be justification for that conclusion, certainly not from the discussions I have had with the president of Imperial Oil.

● (1425)

As far as the project is concerned, I repeat to my hon. friend something he knows very well. It has not been the Government of Canada that decided to refuse approval of those projects last year and since then.

QUERY RESPECTING DETAILS OF PROPOSED AGREEMENT

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, before the oil companies proceed they want to know what the commercial arrangement will be. In other words, they want to know what the production price will be, the tax regime, and the royalties. Under the present national energy policy they do not find it commercially viable to proceed with those plants. They have indicated that to this government many times. I cannot believe the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will deliberately lead this House as he is obviously doing, and I cannot believe he will continue to do so.

As to the suspension of that project, Madam Speaker, Imperial oil is today assigning employees to other parts of their operation; the contractor, Fluor Canada Ltd. has been cancelled and they are reassigning their people. If this continues beyond this month, the project will not proceed for at least two years. Now, the minister cannot continue to lie to this House like he is doing.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I ask the hon. member to withdraw his allegation before I will entertain his question.

Mr. Clark: What do you call what you are doing?

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, I will—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It is an unparliamentary expression—

Mr. Clark: It is unparliamentary behaviour.

Madam Speaker: —to say that a minister has lied. The hon. member should rephrase the question and not use those words. However, the question should be extremely short because the hon. member has taken some time to ask that question.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, I will withdraw the term "lie". He is obviously deliberately misleading this House. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Order! Order!

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I ask that he also—

Madam Speaker: Order. Another member was speaking.

Mr. Andre: How about "tongue in cheek"?

Madam Speaker: Another member was speaking to me, but I understand now that the second expression used by the hon. member is not parliamentary either. If the hon. member could use another one, that would be helpful.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, I will use an Indian term and withdraw that one. The minister is obviously speaking with a forked tongue. How does that suit you?

An hon. Member: With his nose? That is something!

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, my hon. friend is making some difficult progress and it is interesting to see him evolving in his questions. I invite him to read the statement issued by Imperial Oil yesterday. It is all set out very clearly there. He will find his rhetoric has no foundation, that he should look at what has been stated by the company itself.

As far as arriving at a price that will be adequate to ensure this project is going to proceed is concerned, that is something that we, as well as the government of Alberta, have very much at heart. However, we also have to remember that the Canadian consumer will have to pay for any such deal over the next 20, 30 or 40 years. We want to have a fair deal for the companies, but a fair deal for Canadian consumers.

An hon. Member: What about Mexico?

Mr. Lalonde: And this government is not going to be blackmailed by any oil company.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order! Order!

Mr. Shields: How about the Canadians in northeastern Alberta?

Madam Speaker: Order! Order!

Mr. Shields: You are a bloody liar.

Madam Speaker: Order! Order! The hon. member for Athabasca will have to withdraw that interjection as well, because the Chair did hear it. I would ask the hon. member to withdraw it.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, I respect your position and I respect this Chair, but the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is obviously lying to this House.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I need no explanation. The Chair did hear the expression. The hon. member will co-operate with the Chair and withdraw that expression.

Mr. Shields: Well, I wish he would tell the truth, Madam Speaker. I withdraw it.

COMBINES

URANIUM CARTEL—RESPONSIBILITY OF PRIME MINISTER RESPECTING BERTRAND REPORT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday concerning the question of the uranium cartel there were many important questions pertaining to the legality of that issue. There is an equally important question concerning ministerial responsibility. I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question following a quotation from a former Prime Minister on the nature of ministerial responsibility who said that a minister of the Crown is responsible, under the system in Great Britain or Canada, for the minutest details of the administration in his department; he is politically responsible, but he does not know anything at all about them, and that when anything goes wrong in his department he is responsible therefor to Parliament. That is a quotation from a former Prime Minister in one of the standard works on parliamentary government.

Yesterday the Prime Minister said:

—I have not either gone back to read the minutes or study the report of Mr. Bertrand, which I have no right to see, since it is transmitted to the Attorney General—

Given the notion of ministerial responsibility which is widely accepted by all authorities in the field, as well as by members of this Parliament, why did the Prime Minister not request to see Mr. Bertrand's report, let alone assert yesterday that he had no right to see it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, like everyone else I learned only yesterday that there were a couple of public servants who were named but not charged. That is the first news I had of it, so I obviously could not have seen Mr. Bertrand's report before that.

In so far as the concept of ministerial responsibility is concerned, I think the hon. member would recognize that this means responsibility for administrative acts done under the direction of the minister. Obviously it does not cover the area of acts against the law, if any, committed without the minister's authorization.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER READ REPORT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, with respect, that is not precisely the issue I am getting at, the question of legality. The Prime Minister always wants to shift it off to that. The issue at stake is ministerial responsibility concerning decisions which may not have been illegal but might have been wrong or entirely inappropriate.

Since the Prime Minister said that he only became aware of this report yesterday as it pertained to the naming of certain senior public servants, will he now assure the House that he will look at the report to assess it in terms of the culpability, in any sense of that word but particularly in the sense of ministerial responsibility, of the number of ministers who had positions under the Crown at that time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I repeat what I said yesterday. I am not at all convinced that I would be acting within the law to look at that report. Certainly I would not—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: We are getting into the same situation as yesterday.

An hon. Member: You gave the same lousy answers yesterday.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You did not look very good yesterday either.

Mr. Trudeau: There is such a thing as natural justice. I intend to respect it.

Mr. Beatty: There are cover-ups too.

Mr. Trudeau: The director of combines made a report. His intention was to give it to the Attorney General in view of prosecution. I imagine that in the report there are certain allegations against certain people, since charges were brought. Those charges will be heard before a court. The allegations will be sustained before a court. The defence will have its right and natural justice, under every concept of our law, to defend itself against those precise accusations. That is the way Mr. Bertrand chose to proceed; not a trial by public opinion, not a trial by Parliament, not a trial by the Prime Minister or by the Leader of the New Democratic Party. That is the way he chose to proceed, and I intend to respect the law in that regard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, Hear!

EXERCISE OF PRIME MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister knows full well that the issue at stake here is not legality. No one is saying that the wrong course of action was taken in terms of the law. The question is political responsibility, and it is time the Prime Minister lived up to that political responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: What he has just said about not knowing whether he had the right to look at the document is complete and utter rubbish, and he should know it.

Since a minister of the Crown who is still a minister of the Crown was directly involved because of ministerial responsibilities at the time, does the Prime Minister not think it is his responsibility to look at the report to see if there are any accusations, not about illegality but about ministerial wrongdoing? Why does he not live up to his responsibilities and look at the report?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member sustains that it is rubbish that I have no right to look at the report. My understanding of the law—and until I am corrected I wish the hon. member would not describe it as rubbish—is that the Attorney General is the sole person in power to receive that, not the Prime Minister, not the cabinet, but the Attorney General of Canada. That is the way we followed that strictly, lest we be accused, as we would have been, of trying to influence the decision of the Attorney General or of trying to get him to take some other lawyers. That is not rubbish.

We have observed the law as it stands. If I can be corrected on that, I will accept it. If I have a right to look at it, I may, but my understanding of the course chosen by Mr. Bertrand was to go through the Attorney General of Canada and the law process, not the political one.

The hon. member is giving me lessons about political responsibility. For what? For what wrongdoing? There is no allegation of wrongdoing. There is an allegation of criminal action, and that is before the courts.

Mr. Broadbent: Find out if there is.

Mr. Trudeau: What political wrongdoing is the hon. member talking about? I would like to hear him make an accusation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CARTEL'S EFFECT ON DOMESTIC PRICES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. Perhaps he could shed some light on the wrongdoing. Yesterday the Prime Minister was asked at what point in time did the government of which he has been the head become aware that the activities of the cartel were affecting the domestic price in Canada. The Prime Minister answered that it was likely around 1975.

Now that the Prime Minister has had a chance to refresh his memory and to speak to his officials, could he be more specific on two points? When did he have knowledge for the first time that the cartel, in spite of whatever the government thought it was going to do, actually started to have an effect upon domestic Canadian uranium prices? Second, what was the nature of his knowledge? What did he discover to which he referred yesterday?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I was answering a question by the seatmate of the hon. member. It was to the effect: when was this brought to my attention? I believe the date mentioned was that Ontario Hydro began to object around 1977. I do not have recollection of that.

Miss MacDonald: 1975.

Mr. Trudeau: I take the hon. member's date. If that is the point when there were some objections from consumers, that is the date at which it was brought to my attention, not before, and there is no wrongdoing in there.

GULF MINERALS CONTRACT WITH ONTARIO HYDRO

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Perhaps I could refresh his memory. I was wondering whether the Prime Minister can recall that Gulf Minerals signed a contract with Ontario Hydro on May 31, 1974. That was immediately after cabinet approved a new pricing arrangement with respect to the export of uranium under the cartel arrangements of $12.20 per pound. The Gulf price was $12.50 per pound for Ontario Hydro, with escalation.

Was the Prime Minister aware of that Gulf transaction involving 3.7 million pounds of uranium? Was he specifically aware that Gulf in a memo of March 8, 1974, indicated:

> The EMR staff does, however, recognize that Canadian utilities must be prepared to pay the same prices that we could achieve from export sales.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Was the Prime Minister not aware of what was happening in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and, if not, why did his former principal secretary, who was then the deputy minister of that department, or the minister himself, not inform him of the impact which was affecting Canadian domestic consumers?

● (1440)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the combines investigator, Mr. Bertrand, who has a very high standing in the opinion of the opposition, and two independent lawyers, looked into those facts. I did not. I do not remember the facts. They may have been brought to my attention at the time; I do not remember. I know they looked at these facts and this type of allegation, for four years.

Mr. Wilson: How do you know that?

Mr. Trudeau: Now I hear from another hon. member who asks how I know that. I presume they did their job.

Mr. Wilson: You presume.

Mr. Trudeau: I presume. So what are you going to make of that?

Mr. Wilson: How do you know that?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, we have an investigator, Mr. Bertrand, and his people who worked at it for four years. Am I not justified to presume that they would have looked at this type of document, since it is in the hands of the hon. member? If they did look at it, I presume they also made a judgment on the basis of it, and the judgment was not to allege any ministerial wrongdoing, any cabinet wrongdoing, or even any official wrongdoing, since there are no charges against the officials. That is all I can say, Madam Speaker. If the House wants to proceed in some other way, let hon. members suggest what it is.

An hon. Member: We do.

Mr. Andre: Release the report. Have Ouellet keep his word.

Madam Speaker: I believe one question has been answered.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

EFFECT OF EXPORT PRICES ON DOMESTIC PRICES

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister whose government was responsible for setting up this international cartel. At the time the cartel was set up, what reason did the Prime Minister have to believe that a several-fold increase in the price of uranium on the international market would have no effect upon the domestic market?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I had no reason to believe that. The reason the cartel was set up was precisely because the bottom was falling out of the uranium market. It was falling out because the Americans were preventing other countries from selling to the Untied States, which was practically the sole consumer of uranium in those days. That was the situation. Prices were falling low, and workers were being unemployed in Elliot Lake, and companies were going bankrupt. That is why several countries got together to say, "Look, if the Americans think they are going to squeeze us and get cheap prices by bankrupting our companies, they won't. We will get together to hold prices up."

It just happens, and the hon. member was perhaps too young to remember, that in 1973 there was an oil crisis—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Perhaps you are too old to remember.

Mr. Trudeau: —and there was a vast increase in the price of energy. Then uranium began to go up, and it went up very fast. I had no means of knowing in 1971 that there would be an OPEC crisis of the proportions we now have.

CREATION OF CARTEL—EXPECTED EFFECT ON DOMESTIC UTILITIES

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Perhaps, Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister is getting old enough that his memory is beginning to fail him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: If we could have order, Madam Speaker, I would ask if the Prime Minister now, for the first time, is telling the House of Commons and the Canadian people that at the time his government encouraged the creation of this international cartel, with the design of increasing international prices, he had no reason to believe that this would not have an effect upon prices paid by domestic utilities in Canada?

Second, may I ask the Prime Minister, if a request is received from the attorney general of any province for documentation relating to this incident, will the Prime Minister give the undertaking that all such documentation requested, including the full Bertrand report, will be turned over to provincial authorities?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is surprised that I had no means of knowing in 1971 that there would be an energy crisis.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member asks me if I should not have known in some way that the cartel would have an effect on prices in Canada. The whole point, Madam Speaker, is that nobody was buying uranium in Canada. That is the whole point.

Mr. Stevens: Ontario was.

Mr. Ouellet: Not then.

Mr. Trudeau: The one real buyer was the United States. The cartel was set up in order to prevent the American market from squeezing prices all over the world and keeping them down. That is why we took a defensive cartel arrangement, in order to keep prices up. It is as simple as that, to keep them up in the markets of the world.

I explained yesterday that years later when there was a significant domestic consumer, and if it is true as the combines investigator seems to have found, that some people in Canada used that international cartel to force higher prices by combines action on the Canadian people, then if they are found to have disobeyed the law, they will be punished. You cannot assume that in 1971 everyone would know that in 1977 the price of uranium would be very high. If everyone knew that, everyone would have made a killing on the stock market, including the hon. member.

REQUEST THAT BERTRAND REPORT BE MADE PUBLIC

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, may I address a further question to the Prime Minister on this subject. I hope he will realize that at least as far as this party is concerned we are not on a fishing trip for illegal acts on the part of any member of the government, but we do feel that having information just come out bit by bit is not satisfactory. Now that a couple of civil servants have been named, would it not be common sense and good in the interest of general understanding if the Bertrand report were made public, on the understanding that if there are any innocent names in there, outside of the politicians, they could be blocked out?

Virtually, we are asking the Prime Minister to look at the report, to realize that the information is coming out bit by bit and the whole country wonders what is going on. Would it not be cleared up if we had the report and if there are any names there that should be kept from us, that could be done?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, on this side of the House we believe that everyone in Canada is presumed innocent until found guilty by the courts. Who does the hon. member want us to leave in the report that we would publish? Who does he presume guilty? I presume nobody is guilty, and that is why I am not releasing the report.

QUERY RESPECTING POLITICAL DECISION-MAKERS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I am sorry that I did not make my first words clear enough to the Prime Minister. We are not looking for legal culpability. We want to know who made the political decisions. The only way we can know who made the political decisions, whether the people of Canada approve or otherwise, is if we get all the information. That is why we asked for the tabling of the Bertrand report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it has been clear, I think, from my answers that we made a political decision to set up an international cartel. It is as simple as that. We made the political decision. We are prepared to stand accused, if it is a crime to protect the workers in Elliot Lake—

Mr. Shields: What about Fort McMurray and Cold Lake?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the combines investigator—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I will wait until the hon. member has the attention of his seatmate.

CHOICE OF CARTEL VERSUS MARKETING BOARD

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has just admitted that it was his government which took the policy decision to proceed by way of an international cartel. Earlier in this question period he has admitted that he knew that at the time the cartel was formed to influence foreign prices, it would influence Canadian prices. He has admitted that. It is on the record.

My question to the Prime Minister is the following: why did his government take the decision to proceed to protect the Canadian uranium industry by way of a cartel rather than by a way of a marketing board or some other agency in Canada that would not have run the risk of breaking the law of Canada?

• (1450)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am not quite sure how a marketing board would be set up between the countries of Great Britain, of France, of Germany, and of Australia. If the hon. member could suggest how that kind of a marketing board could have been set up and in what way it would differ from the international agreement that we actually reached, well, maybe I would plead that I made a political misjudgment. However, I am glad that the hon. member is suggesting that a marketing board would have been okay, and fixing prices would have been okay if it had been called a marketing board—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —but if it was called an international agreement, then somehow it meets with the distaste of the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REFERENCES TO PEOPLE IN BERTRAND REPORT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister is indicating that he cannot quite remember the details of things which happened some time ago. There are a couple of matters that I would ask him to look into so he could report back later to the House. One is to explain to the House why he chose the route of a cartel when he knows that, for example, in the case of Australia, that Australia chose a marketing board or used a marketing board. He can consult his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, on the efficacy of marketing boards in terms of international as well as Canadian practice.

The Prime Minister has also heard, quoted in this House today, a letter from Mr. N. M. Ediger, then a senior official of Gulf, one of the companies now charged, saying:

> The EMR staff does, however, recognize that Canadian utilities must be prepared to pay the same prices that we could achieve from export sales.

That indicates that officials under his responsibility knew at that time that there would be an effect upon domestic prices.

I would ask the Prime Minister to refresh his memory and to find out why, if the officials of the department knew, the deputy minister did not know; or, if the deputy minister did know, to advise the House that he did, and to advise the House of the state of knowledge of the minister and the Prime Minister at the time. I would like him to do that for tomorrow, because it will give him a chance to look into the record.

Let me now ask the Minister of Justice a question about—

(The Prime Minister rose.)

Some hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Clark: Let me ask the Minister of Justice about the contents of the—

Madam Speaker: Order. For the time being the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has the floor.

Mr. Clark: Thank you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Pierre, you are not above the law.

Mr. Clark: Let me ask the Minister of Justice, the Attorney General of Canada, who has seen the Bertrand report, which he refuses to make available to the people and the Parliament of Canada, whether there is any reference in that report to the Hon. Donald Macdonald or to Mr. Jack Austin, as he then was?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Attorney General and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the report has been given to me by Mr. Bertrand, and there was some recommendation made in that report by the lawyers whom he had retained for the inquiries. After analysing all the documents they had in their possession, they decided to recommend that I prosecute, and that is exactly what I have done. The report is now in the hands of Mr. Brown, who was the author of it, and it has gone to be the base toward presentation in court. I have received that. I have accepted his recommendation. The matter will be dealt with in front of the court.

As far as my responsibility as Attorney General of Canada to decide if there should or should not be prosecution, I have accepted the recommendation that there should be prosecution, and the matter will be dealt with in the court. It was my privilege to have accepted this recommendation. I have nothing else to add.

QUERY RESPECTING HON. DONALD MACDONALD AND SENATOR JACK AUSTIN

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): The minister neglected my question. Was there reference in the Bertrand report—

Miss MacDonald: He did not say no.

Mr. Clark: —to the Hon. Donald Macdonald or to the now Senator Jack Austin, then Jack Austin, deputy minister of Energy, Mines and Resources? Was there reference in the Bertrand report, which he refuses to publish in this House of Commons, to either of those two individuals?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Attorney General and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I do not intend to answer that question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: —because I received a confidential report from Mr. Bertrand.

An hon. Member: Taking the fifth amendment.

Mr. Chrétien: He put in front of me the evidence that they have gathered to go in front of the court. It is a case that will be heard in front of the court. It is now in the hands of the court, and I will not add anything. It is the responsibility of the court to decide what to do with that case.

AGRICULTURE

STABILIZATION OF PORK PRICES—DELIVERY OF CHEQUES TO PRODUCERS

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. With respect to the pork prices stabilization program, in view of the fact that the government has announced a subsidy and that hog producers had the opportunity, before the postal strike, to apply for a stabilization payment, can the minister tell the House, since the cheques should have been sent a few days ago, what he will do to forward the cheques to producers? Will special agencies be set up so that the cheques will be sent to producers as soon as possible?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, we have received, I believe, about 7,000 applications from farmers for a stabilization payment. They are being processed as we receive them. Some of them are using other ways and means to get them to us. We will use our agriculture offices and any facilities that we have at our disposal to distribute the cheques to the farmers.

COMBINES

URANIUM CARTEL—PROTECTION OF CANADIAN CONSUMERS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman a question dealing not only with political responsibility but with legal culpability as well. Since yesterday the Prime Minister admitted in the House that he only became aware, three years after the establishment of the cartel, of its impact on domestic prices for uranium—in other words, he became aware of it in 1975—I would like to ask the Prime Minister what did he do in 1975 when he became aware of the fact that the cartel was impacting on domestic prices. What steps did he take or what sanctions, if any, did he put in place to protect Canadian domestic consumers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, when I was saying I had no idea of any particular complaint of consumers, I had reference to the 1977 date provided me by the hon. member's colleague.

Miss MacDonald: 1975.

Mr. Trudeau: 1977 is when the hon. member said that Ontario Hydro complained, when they complained we created a combine.

I was not following the uranium market in Canada or abroad. Everyone knows that, as a matter of theory and practice, international prices do affect domestic prices. So, here we are. I mean there is nothing new in that. Even the hon. member would know that international prices affect Canadian prices for petroleum. They have even been arguing that the international prices should be the Canadian prices. Certainly Premier Lougheed has been arguing that.

Mr. Clark: That is not true, either.

Mr. Trudeau: Therefore international prices do affect prices in Canada. That is obvious. The issue is not whether the international cartel affected prices in Canada. The issue is whether there were cartel actions in Canada, price fixing, in other words, among the sellers, among themselves, so that they would control the market in Canada as they had been authorized to control the international markets by—

An hon. Member: That is ludicrous.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, what is ludicrous in that? I interrupt my answer, and let us hear what is ludicrous.

TIMING OF GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): As the Prime Minister, as the chief law enforcement officer of the country, or the one responsible for the rule of law in the country, is the Prime Minister now telling the House that he had to await a complaint on the operation of a cartel that was contrary to the Combines Act in Canada before he took his responsibility and took action as a government under the Combines Act? Is that the position he is putting to the House?

Further, I would like to ask the Prime Minister what happened between 1975, when he first became aware of the cartel operating on domestic prices in Canada, and the triggering off of the Combines Act in the fall of 1977. What happened during that two-year period when the Prime Minister, by his own admission, know that there was an illegal cartel operating in this country? Unless he is prepared to answer that question, he stands guilty of a massive cover-up and an illegal act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I must have some kind of question of privilege arise here. The hon. member says that I knew that there was an illegal cartel operating in Canada.

Mr. McGrath: You said so.

Mr. Trudeau: That is not true, Madam Speaker.

Mr. McGrath: You said so.

Mr. Trudeau: I wish the hon. member would support his allegation. I have been explaining, until I am blue in the face, that there was an international cartel—

Mr. McGrath: Yes.

Mr. Trudeau: —operating internationally.

Mr. McGrath: Yes.

Mr. Trudeau: I never—and it was legal.

Mr. McGrath: You said you knew in 1975 that it was operating in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: I did not say that.

Mr. Clark: Sit down, Pierre.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I would appreciate it if hon. members on the opposition side would allow hon. members on the other side to answer the questions, and not engage in a dialogue. It is just impossible to conduct a question period in that manner. I will ask the Right Hon. Prime Minister if he can now answer the question, hoping that he will be able to go to the end of that answer.

Mr. Trudeau: The point is that if I had known a cartel was operating illegally in Canada, and if I had not asked for an investigation, and if the Minister of Justice—and all these "ifs"—of course I would stand condemned. But nobody knew there was cartel action in Canada. We knew that the international prices naturally affect the price in Canada. That does not mean there is price fixing. Just because Alberta is asking more than we are prepared to settle for does not mean that they are price fixing in a way which is illegal. They are trying to get international prices. I imagine that the companies in Canada were trying to sell to Ontario Hydro or to any other buyer for as much as they could get. That is what a seller does, try to get the best price. That is not illegal. What is illegal is when they combine to fix the market in Canada.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Trudeau: Now I have another view of the law. That is my view of the law, Madam Speaker. We have no evidence that they were. Mr. Bertrand looked into the matter and after four years he found that he had some evidence against some people, which he put in a report. These people will have to answer before the courts. What is so complicated about that? Why do they not try to understand?

ACCEPTANCE OF POLITICAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR ACTIONS OF CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It is not a very complicated question. It is a fundamental issue of political responsibility.

In view of the fact that the Bertrand commission suggests by naming two civil servants as unindicted co-conspirators that they may have been involved, that they may have been involved wrongdoing, does the Prime Minister accept some political responsibility for the actions of those civil servants? Was his government aware of their actions during the relevant time, or is the Prime Minister going to hang these civil servants out to dry and refuse to accept any political responsibility for their actions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, they have not even been charged. The hon. member is making some suggestion that they must be guilty and, therefore, we are guilty by association. They have not even been charged. Why do we not let the matter come before the courts? Some defendants want to make allegations. If they have to call for Mr. Bertrand's report or some other report, maybe they will. But I am not going to conduct the trial.

An hon. Member: Oh?

Mr. Trudeau: Don't be an ass.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PROVISIONS IN COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, Mr. Bertrand has stated, in submitting this report to the government before he was appointed to the Anti-dumping Tribunal, that he was quite prepared to have at least a summary of the report made public. I have a copy of the Combines Investigation Act before me. I would challenge the Prime Minister to indicate any provision in this act which states that he has no right to view the particular report in question and determine whether or not his ministers had some responsibility for the actions that are referred to in that report. Where in this act is the Prime Minister denied the right to view that report?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): In my opinion, Madam Speaker, it is absolutely essential that hon. members opposite understand how the investigations are conducted under the competition legislation. It is absolutely essential that all such investigations be made in secret because, the moment we begin making public and tabling the contents of those investigations, we significantly reduce the ability and the efficiency of the Director of Investigations. Second, we would cause serious prejudice to those who have been subjected to an investigation and against whom no charge has been laid. We are then victimizing those people by publishing the reports. I can say to the hon. member that indeed the competition policy agency has made its investigation and that the accusations now made public as a result of the decision of the Attorney General faithfully reflect the summary of the proof as well as the recommendations submitted by Mr. Bertrand to the Department of Justice.

DISPOSITION OF BILL C-83

Mr. Pinard: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I have had the usual consultations with my colleagues. Since today is Thursday and since perhaps we would like to adjourn tomorrow, I should like at this time to inform the House about an agreement which was reached after the usual consultations concerning the business of the House and which is as follows. I drafted the text of the motion as follows:

[English]

That a bill entitled an act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Parliamentary Secretaries Act, the Salaries Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act shall be considered this day at the first reading stage, at the second reading stage, at the Committee of the Whole stage, the report stage, the third reading stage, provided that all stages shall be completed by 9.45 p.m.; and further provided that a division shall be ordered at the third reading stage.

That last request has been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It was also our intention to make the same suggestion.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Motion agreed to.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. McGRATH—ALLEGED MISREPRESENTATION OF REMARKS OF MR. TRUDEAU

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not believe the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is in the House, but during the course of the question period he did suggest that I had misled the House in misintrepreting or misquoting what he had said. I will delay my point of order until tomorrow when perhaps the Prime Minister will be in the House. I understand he will be absent tomorrow, but I can speak from the record as to what the Prime Minister said yesterday. As reported at page 11326 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said:

> It was several years, I think three years after the international agreement had been made, that this international cartel began to have some possible effects within our country.

The Prime Minister said that I was guilty of misrepresenting what he said when I said that he was aware of the impact of the cartel in 1975. The record speaks for itself, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I want to rule on this point of order. It seems to me that the hon. member is debating the question. Interpretations of what is said on both sides of the House does not constitute a point of order and cannot be used to continue the debate once questions have been answered in the House.

If the hon. member wants more clarification about what the Prime Minister said or the interpretations put on whatever he said or whatever the Prime Minister said, he can pursue that matter in question period or at some other time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I have a question for the government House leader relating to House business. The government House leader has given notice of his intention to introduce a motion to adjourn the House of Commons.

He will know, as the country does, that we are now in the grips of a very serious postal strike. It is a postal strike that we all hope can be resolved very quickly by negotiation. I think it is certainly clear that we on this side of the House do not want to go home, and do not propose to go home, until mail service has been restored in this country.

Would the government be prepared to interrupt any adjournment proceedings or any other legislative plans it might have in order to ensure that the House of Commons, if necessary, could consider back to work legislation if the postal strike is not solved by means of negotiation? Can we be assured that the House of Commons will not go on holiday before postal service is restored in this country?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I am rather surprised at the suggestion of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. There were discussions among House leaders and we talked about moving the motion of adjournment tomorrow. There was no firm agreement, but there was a clear understanding that we would adopt such a motion before the end of the afternoon tomorrow. Maybe I misunderstand what he is saying, but it is clearly our intention, after having dealt with Bill C-82 tomorrow—

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pinard: —a bill cherished by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, to move the motion to adjourn. We hope that the understanding we have will be carried out and that we will be able to leave tomorrow. If this is a notice of some kind of filibuster on the motion to adjourn, I take good note of it. There is nothing much I can do.

Mr. Clark: What the government House leader can do is respond to my question. Naturally we would approve of priority being given to Bill C-82. I think the government House leader will agree that there had been no agreement that a motion to adjourn the House introduced tomorrow would terminate tomorrow. There has been no agreement on that point. I am serving notice to the government House leader now that we do not intend to leave this House of Commons, to let the House of Commons adjourn, until postal service has been restored. We would like to see it restored by negotiation.

My question to the government House leader, which he has not answered, is whether he is prepared to interrupt his plans for adjournment or for legislation other than Bill C-82, to introduce and allow the House of Commons to deal with back to work legislation if that is necessary, in the event of a failure in negotiations in order to ensure that Canadians can have their mail delivered before they have their members of Parliament home.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the answer is no, we do not intend to legislate the workers back. It is their right to strike and that is what they are doing. We are hopeful that they will negotiate a settlement. That is their right. We hope there will be an end to the strike by negotiation. The Prime Minister has been stating very clearly since the beginning of the week that we do not intend to legislate the workers back to work. I reiterate that I am very much surprised by that kind of question because it was never raised with me when we talked about the motion to adjourn. On the contrary. There was no firm agreement, but there was a clear understanding that we were to adjourn tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Clark: No firm agreement.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARIES OF SENATORS AND MEMBERS

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-83, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Parliamentary Secretaries Act, the Salaries Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Madam Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Some hon. Members: Later on today.

Madam Speaker: Pursuant to the order passed earlier, the bill shall be read the second time later on today.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE

AUTHORIZATION OF TRAVEL FOR SUBCOMMITTEE

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, following consultations with the other parties, I request the unanimous consent of the House, without debate in support of the following motion, seconded by my colleague the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau):

That the sub-committee on Canada's Relations with Latin America and the Carribean of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence and members of the sub-committee, be authorized, whenever the sub-committee deems necessary to do so, to adjourn or travel from place to place inside or outside Canada when the House is not sitting, and that such travels be completed before October 14, 1981; and that, whenever it is deemed necessary, the sub-committee or its members, as the case may be, be accompanied by the necessary staff.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

COMBINES

URANIUM CARTEL—ALLEGED FAILURE OF MR. TRUDEAU TO EXERCISE RESPONSIBILITIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move a motion for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the failure of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to exercise his responsibilities in the serious question of potential ministerial culpability in the establishment of a uranium cartel in Canada.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) has given me notice under the terms of Standing Order 26 of his intention to move the adjournment of the House to discuss the alleged failure by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) "to exercise his responsibilities in the establishment of a uranium cartel in Canada".

It seems to the Chair that the hon. member's motion is couched in the terms of a non-confidence motion in the Prime Minister, which is not envisaged by the provisions of Standing Order 26. I need not quote any rulings by my predecessors as hon. members are aware that there are ample precedents to this effect.

Furthermore, the motion raises a substantive matter which can only be dealt with by a distinct motion after due notice. In my view, the motion relates to the conduct of a minister and to that extent it is excluded from the operation of Standing Order 26. I refer hon. members to Section 16(f) of the Standing Order, and I quote:

—the discussion under the motion must not raise any question which, according to the Standing Orders of the House, can only be debated on a distinct motion under notice.

In other words, the motion is essentially of the nature of a censure motion and as a substantive motion it cannot be considered under the provisions of Standing Order 26.

I might add that the logic of this rule is that it would be unfair for the members or the ministers concerned to have their conduct debated under a motion to adjourn the House rather than a specific motion dealing with the substantive question upon which a decision could be taken by the House.

A motion pursuant to Standing Order 26 is not subject to a decision by the House; it is merely a vehicle for debate. Even if it were subject to a decision by the House, the decision would only be as to whether or not the House was to adjourn. Therefore, I cannot allow the debate under Standing Order 26.

FIRA—HOUDAILLE INDUSTRIES INC.

Question No. 1,483—Mr. Deans:

1. Did Houdaille Industries, at the time of approval by the Foreign Investment Review Agency, make a number of short and long-term commitments and were some of the commitments made public and, if so (a) has FIRA conducted a yearly review to determine the fulfillment of all commitments (b) in each year since approval, did the company live up to all public commitments and, if not, which commitments were not lived up to?

2. (a) What action was taken by FIRA, if any, to insist that the original commitments were fulfilled by the company (b) were new commitments agreed to by FIRA and, if so, what were they and have they been kept?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Foreign Investment Review Agency is concerned: 1. Houdaille Industries Inc.—Acquisition of control of Houdaille Industries of Canada Limited:

Yes.

No.

(a) and (b) The investment was allowed on December 6, 1979, and the annual review would normally commence on or about December 6, 1980; however, because of the closure of the Oshawa facilities, an early investigation was conducted.

2. (a) and (b) The investigation revealed that there was no non-compliance with the original commitments. The plant and equipment of Houdaille Industries of Canada Limited have been purchased by A. G. Simpson Co. Ltd., a Canadian-controlled company.

OFFICE OF SENATOR R. J. PERRAULT

Question No. 1,557—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. Is the hon. Senator Perrault entitled to exempt staff and, if so, how many?

2. Did the hon. Senator Perrault fill any positions by appointment and, if so (a) which positions (b) what was the job description and qualification for each position (c) what is the salary for each position?

3. What duties have been assigned to the exempt staff and appointed members of the hon. Senator Perrault's staff and what is the name of each person appointed?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. Senator Perrault is entitled to exempt staff. He may have as many such persons as he deems necessary within the limitation of the over-all manpower budget prescribed for every minister of the Crown.

Dewit, A.	CR-3	$12,815—$15,875
Dormer, M.	Special Assistant	Up to $30,000
Dowling, S. A.	ST-SCY-1	$ 9,424—$13,423
Hanson, C.	Special Assistant	Up to $30,000
Higgs, G. F.	Special Advisor	Up to $35,000 or more with T.B.'s approval
Ladouceur, P.	Private Secretary	Up to $23,000
VanRoggen, P.	CR-2	$10,740—$13,212
Whyte, A. M.	CR-3	$12,815—$15,875
Ritchie, T.	CR-4 Registry and Library Clerk	$12,933—$17,633
Gautam, M.	CR-1 Junior File Clerk	$ 9,071—$11,745

The Office of the Leader of the Government in the Senate had one classified public service position with an incumbent at the time Senator Perrault was appointed (Registry and Library Clerk).

In addition, a term position (less than three months) was established and staffed (Junior file clerk—August '80—November '80). All other positions are exempt staff.

3. The duties of exempt staff are to assist their minister as directed.

"SHOP CANADIAN" PROGRAM

Question No. 2,348—Mr. Dinsdale:

Since the inception of the advertising program "Shop Canadian" (a) how long has the trailer been travelling and for how much longer will it be travelling (b) which communities has it visited (c) what is the cost to date (d) will it be in operation next year?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Supply and Services and the Canadian Unity Information office have no knowledge of such a trailer as identified by the hon. member. For additional information, the hon. member may wish to refer to question 2,297 answered May 19, 1981.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—SUMMARY TRIALS AND COURTS MARTIAL

Question No. 2,394—Mr. Robinson (Burnaby):

1. For each of the past ten years, what was the number and type of summary trials and courts martial held (a) in each region of Canada (b) overseas?

2. For the same years, what number of cases involved civilians and what number were family as opposed to civilian employees?

3. For each of the past three years, what were the (a) charges (b) penalties at courts martial?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Statistics on the number of summary trials are not kept. However, a survey of all the commands of the Canadian Forces shows that approximately

Order Paper Questions

8,000 summary trials were conducted in 1980 and since this figure for last year is not considered unusual, the figures for past years would be in the same range.

(a) and (b) The number of courts martial for each of the past ten years by region of Canada and overseas is listed below.

2. The number of cases which involved civilians, listed as employees and dependants, is presented below.

3. (a) The most commonly used charges were as follows:

National Defence Act	— Sections	74; 80; 87; 101; 104; 106; 107; 114; 115; 119.
Criminal Code of Canada	— Sections	149; 156; 203; 228; 233; 234; 236; 245; 294; 306; 387.
Narcotics Control Act	— Sections	3; 4.
Food and Drug Act	— Sections	41; 42.

(b) The most widely used penalties were fines and incarceration (i.e. imprisonment or detention).

SOVIET AIRCRAFT IN CANADIAN AIRSPACE

Question No. 2,473—Mr. Greenaway:

1. Did the Department of National Defence or any government agency record incidents of MIG-25s or other Soviet aircraft flying into Canadian airspace and, if so, in each year 1975 to date (a) how many incidents (b) at what location were the recordings noted (c) for what purposes were the aircraft in Canadian airspace?

2. Did the government make representations to the government of the U.S.S.R. regarding the flights and, if so, what was the nature of the representations and of the responses thereto?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. (a), (b) and (c) The Soviet airline, Aeroflot, fly IL62 type aircraft on a scheduled route between Moscow, Gander, Montreal, New York and Washington and with the exceptions of these flights, Soviet aircraft have not flown in Canadian sovereign airspace. However, since 1975 there have been occasions when Russian Air Force TU-95 aircraft (NATO name: Bear) have flown through a portion of the Atlantic coastal Canadian air defence identification zone while en route from U.S.S.R. bases to Cuba but these tracks have all been east of Gander, Newfoundland, and well beyond Canada's 12 nautical mile territorial limit.

2. Not applicable.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE—PRATT & WHITNEY

Question No. 2,553—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce pay Pratt & Whitney, Longueuil, $10.7 million to design, build and test an engine known as PT7A-2R and, if so, for what purpose is the engine being designed?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The Crown, through the Defence Industry Productivity Program of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, will pay 50 per cent of the actual costs reasonably and properly incurred for the development of the engine but not exceeding $10.7 million. The manufacturer is paying for the balance. Concerning the purpose for which the engine is being designed, see question 2,554, part (a), answered today.

Question No. 2,554—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce pay Pratt & Whitney, Longueuil, $39,484,000 to design, build and test an engine known as PT7A and, if so (a) for what purpose is the engine being designed (b) was the engine built and tested to the satisfaction of the department?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The amount of $39,484,000 represents 40 per cent of the actual costs reasonably and properly incurred for the design, development, performance testing and certification testing of the engine. The Crown's contribution is not to exceed the above-mentioned amount and Pratt & Whitney is financing the balance.

(a) The PT7 engine is a new advanced technology, three shaft turbo propeller engine in the 2000 shaft horsepower class, and the PT7A is a variant of it. The market requirement is for powering the new 30 and 40 passenger class commuter aircraft, such as the de Havilland Dash-8 and the Brazilian Embraer EMB-120 aircraft. The PT7 represents the beginning of a new family of engines in a power range above that of the highly successful PT6 engine.

(b) The engine is being developed and has not yet reached the testing stage.

1981 CENSUS—ADVERTISING EXPENDITURE

Question No. 2,582—Mr. Cossitt:

What was the total cost of all government advertising for the 1981 Census, including a breakdown of the amount allotted to (a) daily newspapers (b) weekly newspapers (c) magazines or other periodicals (d) radio (e) television?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports: the total cost of all government advertising for the 1981 Census is estimated to be $1,700,000. The amounts allotted were:

(a) to daily newspapers:	$374,194
(b) to weekly newspapers:	$265,703
(c) to magazines or other periodicals:	$ 33,143
(d) to radio:	$456,898
(e) to television:	$301,480
(f) to other media:	$ 68,615

Production costs of approximately $200,000 are not included.

1981 CENSUS—ADVERTISING AGENCIES

Question No. 2,583—Mr. Cossitt:

Were advertising agencies used by the government in connection with the 1981 Census and, if so, in each case (a) what was the name (b) how was the agency selected (c) how many contracts were let and what was the amount in each case (d) were competitive bids or presentations requested at any time and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports: the government did use advertising agencies in connection with the 1981 Census.

(a), (b) and (d) See question 2,036, parts 7(a) and (b), tabled April 23, 1981.

(c) Three contracts were let as follows:

Palmer Jarvis and Associates Advertising Limited	$532,000
Gordon Hill Advertising Limited	$746,000
Publicité Média Ltée	$497,000

DOT—CONTRACT WITH DSMA ATCON LIMITED, TORONTO

Question No. 2,618—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Department of Transport contract with DSMA Atcon, Toronto, for $129,578 for an evaluation of a hybrid experimental vehicle and, if so (a) what is the purpose of the vehicle (b) what were the results of the evaluation?

Order Paper Questions

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Supply and Services and Transport as follows: the Department of Supply and Services on behalf of Transport Canada awarded a contract valued at $129,578 to DSMA Atcon Limited for an evaluation of a hybrid experimental vehicle.

(a) The purpose of the vehicle is to serve for the evaluation of the potential fuel saving in a hybrid electric/internal combustion engine configuration under actual road conditions.

(b) The results of the evaluation will only be available during the winter of 1981-82.

Mr. Blackburn: Madam Speaker, my question of privilege is very important and cogent. Question 2,250 relates to the hunting down and bringing to trial of suspected—

● (1520)

Madam Speaker: Order. I presume the hon. member is raising a point of order and not a question of privilege.

Mr. Blackburn: I am raising a point of order. I am sorry, Madam Speaker.

I asked this question four months ago, and the reason I asked the question was that about a year and a half ago the Solicitor General said he would make this one of his top priorities and that an effort would be made to root out and bring to trial suspected Nazi war criminals allegedly living in this country. My question addressed itself to that.

The parliamentary secretary has had four months in which to answer this question, which requires a "yes" or a "no". Is the government actively searching, through the RCMP, I presume, for suspected Nazi war criminals, members of the Nazi party of Germany, the S.D., the S.A., the S.S. and so forth. If so, all the parliamentary secretary would have to say is "yes" or "no".

I think this question is extremely important because it relates to purported government policy of which we have heard absolutely nothing since this government came into office.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I will have to take note of the hon. member's representation, and I will try to ensure that he gets an answer before the end of the session. This is the first time he has raised the matter of the urgency of the question. I will look into it and try to get back to him.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARIES OF SENATORS AND MEMBERS

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council) moved that Bill C-83, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Salaries Act, the Parliamentary Secretaries Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

He said: Madam Speaker, today the House is studying a bill aimed at raising the salaries of members of Parliament. Some people will say that the timing is wrong, but there can never be a right moment! We are always expected to study and solve only the problems of the nation. The public always forgets that we are men and women who of course accept this difficult and demanding way of life but who must also look after their family and be able to lead a decent life. Above all, the public forgets that our institutions force them to shoulder the much heavier responsibility of having to vote for themselves the salary they will be paid. It may look like a marvellous freedom, but in fact it is a thankless task which no one other than parliamentarians can do in their stead. The last time the salaries and allowances of members of Parliament were examined was in 1974. And if I may make a short review, Mr. Speaker, it will be readily understood why a salary increase has now become urgent and absolutely necessary.

In 1974, members of Parliament wanted to raise their salary because they considered that they were paid less than the amount to which they might have been entitled. A group of members from both sides of the House was then formed to examine the subject and make recommendations. After a serious study, that committee came to the conclusion that the salaries of parliamentarians ought to be 50 per cent higher than what they were on July 8, 1974. The committee also recommended a certain adjustment formula applicable on an annual basis. Then there was a debate in this House and, since those recommendations had been made by members of Parliament who happened to be directly concerned with the issue, after a rather lengthy debate it was finally concluded that there had to be a still deeper cut so that parliamentarians ended up with roughly 30 per cent instead of the 50 per cent hike which had been deemed to be the acceptable minimum.

Mr. Speaker, we are caught in a sort of vicious circle. Every time the issue of higher salaries for members of Parliament comes up, we always want, because of the delicate situation I have just mentioned, that parliamentarians themselves introduce the appropriate legislation to be able to catch up so that we will not have to seek substantial raises in the future. However, since we are always ill at ease to endorse the full recommendations made to us by commissions of members of Parliament, we never did manage to catch up so as to get the minimum recommended by those study groups. On the contrary, we always drop lower and thus aggravate the problem and make it even more difficult a few years later to make the adjustments which by then have become more than necessary. That is what happened once again in 1975 when finally, after a long debate, we reached a compromise so that the increase was only about 30 per cent, not the 50 per cent which had been recommended, and there has been no increase since.

I would add also that this 30 per cent adjustment, which was decided on by way of compromise, was to be equivalent to the industrial composite up to a maximum of 7 per cent. Now we all know that 7 per cent was substantially less than the actual increase in the cost of living and in the industrial composite. Since 1975, members have only received 30 or 33 per cent of what was then considered a basic minimum. Their allowance was not indexed but was adjusted to a rate which was out of line with reality, that is a maximum of 7 per cent; not only that, but for two years, under the Anti-Inflation Board, there was absolutely no yearly adjustment. So in real terms, since the 1975 increase which was retroactive to July 8, 1974, members received only a 30 per cent increase compared to the 50 per cent which was recommended, and an average year adjustment of 4.4 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, these are the facts which must objectively and honestly be made public and understood by those who might be tempted to criticize members on both sides of the House for considering after six years, or rather six and a half years, a reasonable and decent salary adjustment. What happened also, and I think it is appropriate to mention this, is that in 1975, when a compromise was reached to limit ourselves to one third or 30 per cent and 7 per cent, which actually became 4.4 per cent because of the two lost years which I mentioned, was that a section, Section 34(7) I believe, was added to the act so that in the future members would not be put in the awkward position of using their own recommendations as a basis. The act will include a provision so that the government of the day will refer the issue of parliamentarians' salaries to an independent commission; that in fact was what made members accept the compromise despite the fact that they found the 30 per cent increase unsatisfactory and the 7 per cent yearly adjustment laughable. But members bought this deal in 1975 because they believed that four or five years down the road, after the next election, there would be an independent commission established under the statutes of Canada, which would review the issue of parliamentary salaries and report to the government within six months after its appointment, and the commission itself was to be established two months after the election.

The members took that for granted and that is in fact what happened. There was a provision included in the legislation and the facts show that after the 1979 election, under the act, under this statutory obligation, a commission was established, the Hales Commission. The commission did report within six months; however, when it did report, another election had taken place. We all know that there were two closely held elections. Therefore, the government, under a statutory obligation, set up another independent commission, the McIsaac-Balcer Commission, to review the salaries paid to parliamentarians, in the light of the Hales report which was produced in due time but which could not be implemented because of these two successive elections. The important thing to note now, as I am speaking to you today, is that the report of this independent commission established under the statutes of the land has been produced and tabled by the government. I had the opportunity to table that report in December last, and it is precisely that kind of report of an independent commission analysing responsibly and objectively, fair-mindedly and without any conflict of interests, the conditions of members compared to other sectors of economic activity in Canada. It is precisely on that kind of report that the legislation now under consideration is based.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, as I said, the last major increase in compensation for MPs and senators was made under an act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Salaries Act and the Parliamentary Secretaries Act, passed in May, 1975, retroactive to July 8, 1974. This act introduced an annual adjustment formula based on the industrial composite, but limited to a maximum of 7 per cent.

The 1975 amendment added Section 34(7) to the Senate and House of Commons Act. This subsection stipulates that within two months after the date fixed for return of the writs at each general election, the governor in council shall appoint commissioners to inquire into the adequacy of the annual variations of sessional allowances payable to MPs and senators, and to report thereon to the governor in council, with such recommendations as they consider appropriate, within six months after the time of their appointment.

In August, 1979, Mr. Speaker, the government appointed Mr. Hales a commissioner under Section 34(7). His report was tabled in Parliament April 23, 1980. No substantive action was taken by the government on this report as another commission had to be set up because of the last election. On May 9, 1980 under Section 34(7) the governor in council set up a commission composed of Dr. J. Clifford McIsaac as chairman, and the Hon. Leon Balcer. The new commission took Mr. Hales' report into account, and its report was tabled in Parliament on December 2, 1980.

On April 30, 1980, the subcommittee on matters pertaining to members, staff, staff allowances, constituency offices and members' pensions, salaries and allowances recommended that severance pay be given to a member of Parliament who is not re-elected and that the MPs pension plan be modified. The McIsaac-Balcer report deals with the whole subject and some aspects of it are excellent. It is based on logical and specific arguments, and it draws on extensive and pertinent information to support its recommendations. Most important, it is the first time in history that we can base such legislation on a report made by an independent commission based on the statutes of the land.

Mr. Speaker, I said that the purpose of the bill is to increase the salaries of parliamentarians, but allow me to be more specific. It would be misleading to focus our discussion on a mere percentage increase. Indeed, the thing is to set the salaries of parliamentarians and to figure out the compensation to which they are entitled. The Canadian people want to be represented and governed by the most consistent and devoted people. They do not want politics to be the privilege of those of independent means and they want above all that those who make decisions affecting our collective future to remain financially independent. The sessional allowance, Mr. Speaker, because the legislation carefully refrains from referring to salaries, is designed to allow the member to live decently but not in luxury, so that he may devote himself to state matters. The member gives up his private life. He has often to keep two houses between which he travels most of the year. No one surely goes into politics to become rich, but no one should ruin himself either in the process. Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to note yesterday the comments made by leaders in their respective sectors in Canada. They are not parliamentarians and had nothing to say about the advisability of legislation designed to increase the salaries of parliamentarians.

I was pleased to see that union leaders favored such an increase, and made very interesting comments in support of the case of hon. members who have not had any salary increase for six years and a half and who have only received a yearly adjustment of 4.4 percent for seven years. They recognized that was a case of glaring injustice and that there was a danger that hon. members or people in general would take no further interest in public life, and that we might end up by having here only people who are very well-off, excluding those who have to leave their businesses or professions behind, who have a low income, because parliamentary life is too exacting and the salary is inadequate. Let me briefly read the comments of three of those people, quoting from an article which appeared yesterday on page 8 of The Gazette under the title:

[English]

Canada's MPs need a raise, panel agrees.

The first one who was asked about this is Mr. Dennis McDermott, the president of the Canadian Labour Congress. He said:

There are a lot of talented people out there who are not individually wealthy and who are not professionals and who are probably not running because they cannot afford to. A raise might attract them.

It is a very demanding job. And what you have now is the spectacle of some independently rich people treating it as some sort of game.

Louis Laberge, a well known person in Quebec, head of the powerful Quebec Federation of Labour, in the same article of yesterday's Gazette is quoted as saying about the need for a raise for MPs:

I have lived through quite a few governments—and I intend to keep doing so—I'm more useful to governments and my members where I am—but if you want people who know what they are talking about and who will devote their time then you've got to pay them.

The timing—there's never a proper time. They should do it now.

There are ten people quoted, but I will only quote one more. As opposed to the union sector, I will deal with the small business sector. Businessman John Bulloch, president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, is quoted as saying:

But their whole job is a social disaster—late hours, travel, unfair demands. Their personal life is a nightmare—I would give them more, of course—they should get an extra $20,000 in harassment pay.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I was happy to see that at last leaders of opinion in this country have realized and support the need for a decent raise for members of Parliament.

● (1540)

As I was saying, our salaries have been increased by only 30 per cent when they should have been increased by 50 per cent over the last seven years to catch up. We have received an average annual adjustment of 4.4 per cent in the last seven years; no worker in the country has suffered that treatment. This is why I can understand that Mr. McDermott, Mr. Laberge and Mr. Bulloch speak so loudly in our favour.

[Translation]

The McIsaac-Balcer report, Mr. Speaker, recommended a minimum of $45,000 a year for each hon. member in recognition of the demands of his duties, the very long working hours and the necessity to be both in Ottawa to discuss the problems of Canada, and in his riding to listen to his constituents' concerns. The government has very seriously and for a long time considered the recommendations in the report. The increases in the bill could come into effect from July 1, 1980.

As a matter of fact, the McIsaac-Balcer report considered the salaries as of January 1, 1980, and it would be unfair if the delays which were necessary to draft that bill were to postpone the implementation of these legitimate recommendations.

Mr. Speaker, the government, the majority of members on this side of the House, most members of the Progressive Conservative Party and most members of the NDP to-day recommend that we take only two thirds of the increases suggested in the McIsaac-Balcer report, even though, in the last seven years, parliamentarians have received much lower salary increases than those received by many of their constituents, and even though they have had only a ridiculous average annual adjustment of 4.4 per cent. Mr. Speaker, I have here a chart which shows what has been the salary of parliamentarians in the last ten years, from 1971 to 1981, in relation to the consumer price index, the composite industrial index and the manufacturing sector. It is important that people know to what extent those who govern this country, those who try to improve the situation in this country, those who aim only at improving the welfare of their fellow citizens, have lacked in self-indulgence and to what extent what they have obtained in the last few years has been less than what ordinary citizens have received on the average.

Mr. Speaker, if we compare the salary increases for members of Parliament in the last ten years to the consumer price index, we note a difference of 40 per cent. Over ten years, we have received 40 per cent less than the consumer price index increase in Canada. I know of no worker in my constituency, and there is probably none in Canada, who has received wage increases 40 per cent lower than the increase in the consumer price index. Yet this is the case of Canadian parliamentarians, and I am speaking about federal parliamentarians, Mr. Speaker, not of those of Ontario, British Columbia or Quebec, who, as we know, have different salaries which are in certain cases much higher than ours.

If we compare the salary increases of parliamentarians since 1971, that is for the last ten years, to the composite industrial index, the difference is no longer 40 per cent, but rather 55 per cent. This means that organized workers have on the average, over the last ten years received 55 per cent more in increases than we have. If we compare our salary—and this is important—to industrial wages in Canada, the difference is 75 per cent. This is completely ridiculous; it is outrageous! And I could add that the difference between our own increases and those of postal workers, for instance, for whom I have the figures here, is even worse, as much as 85 per cent. Over the last ten years, postal workers' salary increases have been 85 per cent higher than parliamentarians.

What we are proposing today is that we accept two thirds of the increase recommended in our own conciliation report, because we, members of Parliament, do not have the privilege to negotiate a collective agreement every year. We are subject to an act which provides for a review of our salaries by an independent commission every four or five years. However, this is the first time in our history that an independent commission presents a report as required under the act, and we are not even accepting 100 per cent of what is recommended in this report, in what might be called a conciliation report. We are accepting only two thirds. I challenge any worker in Canada to accept only two thirds of the increase recommended in a conciliation report. This has never happened in the past, and we do so today in spite of the fact that we are now 40 per cent behind the increase in the cost of living index, 55 per cent behind the composite industrial index, 75 per cent behind the manufacturing sector and 85 per cent behind postal workers' salary increases. Then again, only two thirds of the conciliation report is reflected in the bill before us today.

Mr. Speaker, if I get worked up at this point, it is because when I had to study that report, I understood why Messrs. McIsaac and Balcer were offended by the present. When they made comparisons with workers in other sectors, with industrial workers, with workers in the manufacturing sector, when they analysed the cost of living, when they considered the salaries paid in the public service, I understood why many people in this country do not respect the members of Parliament. We should start by setting an example and respecting ourselves. I feel that what is proposed in this report is a decent minimum and once again, it is thanks to the good faith and the good will of members of the three parties in this House that we agreed to introduce this bill that will be voted on tonight at 9:45. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying that this is indeed so and that we have agreed to say publicly that it is as a result of an agreement among the three parties that we proceed in this manner. It is an agreement made not only with the Progressive Conservatives but also with the New Democrats.

Petitions have been signed by a majority of members from each party, a very substantial majority of each party, on the issue of pensions. A petition has been signed by a majority of Liberal and Progressive Conservative members on the salary issue, and the New Democratic Party assured us that a majority of their members support all the provisions of this bill, including those on salaries. We have their assurance that a majority of their members will vote in favour of this bill tonight, and these were the conditions under which we have decided and agreed to introduce this bill that I am now discussing. So let it be quite clear that this is not a unilateral move on the part of the government. The need was so obvious, the injustice so blatant that for the first time, I think, in a spontaneous manner, we were able to win a substantial majority in each caucus to restore some order and bring to a decent minimum the salaries of parliamentarians. I am grateful to the two opposition House leaders, my colleague for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who both spoke in good faith for their respective caucus and negotiated the agreement which will enable Parliament to implement two thirds of the recommendations on salaries contained in the McIsaac-Balcer report.

● (1550)

[English]

I wish to congratulate hon. members on both sides in the three parties who, after long debate in their respective parties, including ours, have finally come to an agreement, an agreement put on petition and an agreement made by word given, that this legislation could be dealt with today, and the way it will be dealt with, and that a majority in each caucus will be here tonight to vote in favour of legislation which, in fact, will give to the members of Parliament a proportion of two-thirds of the recommendations made by the McIsaac-Balcer report.

[Translation]

No hon. member would want the House each year to add to its already heavy work schedule with the consideration of Senate and Commons salaries. This is why the act already provides for a yearly adjustment formula. This fills the vacuum caused by the absence of any partner with whom to negotiate salary adjustments. That is not a hard-and-fast formula; its value and efficiency are reviewed after each general election. As I said, following the next election the government will be required to establish a new committee that will start afresh looking at this question of members' salaries.

[English]

Today we suggest that we adopt, as I have just mentioned, two-thirds of the indemnity suggested by the McIsaac-Balcer report. We all know that the report recommends increasing the indemnity payable to members of Parliament to at least $45,000. Recognizing the impact of this sudden increase of $14,400, or 47 per cent, based on the indemnity payable to members on January 1, 1980, which was $30,600, it recommends dividing the increase into four annual increments, to be payable as follows: $3,600 on July 1, 1980; $3,600 on July 1, 1981, 1982 and 1983.

In addition to these increases, or to a single increase of $14,400, the report recommends for 1981 and the years to come an adjustment formula established by Pay Research Bureau, abolishing the 7 per cent ceiling currently imposed under the annual indemnity adjustment formula provided in the act.

The increase in the indemnity to $45,000, which will be two-thirds of that increase, is based on two arguments: one, the relative loss members have suffered since 1974, if one compares the increases in their remuneration with the Consumer Price Index and the average increase in salaries of managers in other sectors of the economy. I have already spoken of this earlier. Two, an attempt to bring the indemnity for members of Parliament into line with the salaries of managers and other professionals in Canada, including public servants.

The statistics speak for themselves. If the indemnity of members of Parliament had followed the trend of the consumer price index between 1974 and 1980, it would have exceeded $40,300 by 1980. Without the 7 per cent maximum for the annual adjustment increase based on the industrial composite, it would have been higher than $42,700 by 1980. Finally, an adjustment formula based on PRB studies, as recommended by the report, would have raised the indemnity to over $38,000 by 1980. It should be remembered that in 1980 the indemnity was $30,600 following the 1974 increase and annual adjustment under the act, and as a result of the government's 1976 wage controls.

The comparative argument is also very strong. In the report, for the first time a detailed attempt has been made to situate the work of a member of Parliament in relation to other sectors of activity in Canadian society. The commissioners have attempted to describe the work of a member of Parliament by studying the various factors, some of which—level of contact, knowledge and the managerial factor—are common to all studies of this type.

Mr. Speaker, the McIsaac-Balcer report recommended, as I just said, that the yearly adjustment of Senate and Commons salaries should be based on a complex process of comparison and assessment of average increases in a number of areas of the economy. Instead of resorting to such an approach, which would be quite involved and open to various interpretations, this legislation proposes to improve the existing formula. The yearly adjustment would be 1 per cent less than the consumer price index or the composite index of economic activities, whichever would be the lower. This would tend to ensure a more normal adjustment of parliamentary salaries, without overloading the agenda of the House.

In order to eliminate an unfortunate aspect of the pension provisions for members of Parliament, who are not entitled to a retirement allowance unless they have been sitting for six years in the House of Commons, and to make sure that defeated members would not be forced to fall back resourceless to the occupation which they had to leave in order to serve the country as a member, the McIsaac-Balcer report suggested that a defeated member should be paid a withdrawal allowance. The report specified that a similar allowance, at a smaller rate, however, should also be paid to defeated members entitled to retirement benefits. This legislation moves to grant a withdrawal allowance along the lines of the McIsaac-Balcer report, but only to those members who were not entitled to retirement benefits at the time of their forced departure. Such an allowance would also be payable to those who must retire from politics because of ill health, at a rate equivalent to half the taxable gains to which the hon. member was entitled.

Mr. Speaker, this bill also proposes to amend certain provisions of the retirement plan for members of Parliament. Contributions from members would be increased from 7½ per cent to 10 per cent. Since it seldom occurs that a member nowadays can sit here for 25 years or more, and therefore enjoy the maximum allowance, it is important that the qualifying period be reduced to a realistic duration, namely 15 years. This legislation also provides for the payment of supplementary retirement allowances to parliamentarians receiving a salary for extra responsibilities.

As far as the retirement pension allowance or pension is concerned, clearly no comparison can be made with pensions paid in the private sector. Such a comparison cannot hold, for the simple reason that in order to serve in this House, the overwhelming majority of members have to jeopardize, and very often indeed cut themselves off from their profession, business or other occupation. This is a unique feature of parliamentary work, an exclusive condition that is inherent to the nature of our functions. As a member of Parliament I can give an example picked out of many. I am talking about a young MP who had just set up a legal office in his or her home town, hired staff, established social contacts, gotten involved in his community, cared for people, went into debt to start his business and build up his practice, kept up to date on the law and is aware of every change in the existing laws in order to give good service to his clients and who suddenly, because he has been a success for ten years as a lawyer or for that matter as a doctor, engineer, notary, or member of any other profession, and has built a reputation for himself through hard work and made many friends, is asked to serve in the national or parliamentary legislative assembly to take care of the interests of the public instead of just his own patients or clients. He then has to make a big sacrifice and come to Ottawa, only to find out that as a member of Parliament he has not only to take good care of his riding but also to live in Ottawa, to pass new laws, sit on committees and in the House of Commons, work as a legislator and meet with lobby groups and try to have the legislation reflect the popular will. It is a full-time job. In order to do this, he has to find someone to look after his business or office, but he is still requested to run.

Yet we all have generously accepted this call to serve our country. A number of us in so doing suffer a great financial loss. As I was saying a moment ago, nobody comes here expecting to get rich, but we do not want to get broke either if, and after serving five, six, seven, eight, ten or fifteen years, the hazards of politics cause us to be defeated or if our health gives in because our obligations as a public man or woman are so taxing that we are no longer able to travel regularly between Ottawa and our riding to fulfil our responsibilities ably and conscientiously. If at that stage we are forced out of public life because of ill health or election defeat, we find ourselves with nothing to fall back on.

I was giving the example of a professional. He no longer had an office because he had to sell it, then he had to pay tax on it because he could not incorporate. His loss was substantial. Now he has to start from scratch after an absence of 8, 10, 15 or 20 years. He has to begin anew, to get new clients, to update his knowledge, whether it be in law, medicine, or engineering or whatever, and this is not the same situation as those in private enterprise experience when they lose a job in a community, they look for another one for a few months to finally get one in the same community. They can do it much more easily that we can ourselves.

Therefore it is important to mention publicly those particularities of parliamentary life. This is true for professionals, tradesmen, for those in the field of education and it is true also for former public servants, because as soon as you get involved in politics, it is not easy to try to get back into the Public Service. More often than not, it is not an asset, it is a liability. That should not be the case but it is. Some will argue that the sacrifice men and women make to come here was their choice. However, you will agree also that if you want to serve your country, we must have the opportunity to do so not for the purpose of making money, but not to go broke either. This opportunity should not be the privilege of the rich only but should be given to the little man, either lawyer, notary, tradesman, teacher, to all those with a low or medium income, those with a very average social status.

This is the justification, Mr. Speaker, for the difference in the pension plan for members of Parliament as opposed to the private sector. We talk about being eligible to receive 75 per cent of the salary after 15 years instead of 25. I know they have such a plan in Quebec, and I am even told that it is after eight years or at any rate it is less than 15 years.

An hon. Member: It is eight years.

Mr. Pinard: It is eight years. I am told it is 15 years in other legislatures. That seems to be the norm in legislatures where one serves one's country as an elected representative. The reason for that is that the members of Parliament are in a very special situation in that if defeated, or if they retire from public life for health or some other reason, it is extremely difficult for them to maintain the standard of living they enjoyed at the time of their retirement from politics 10 or 15 years earlier when they worked in the private sector. And I think that nobody wants such injustice in Canada. Furthermore, I am convinced that if we did not bring in these amendments to entitle members of Parliament to a pension after 15 years, we would deter responsible people from going into politics and serving in this place.

Many people, it happens at each election, refuse to leave their business or to quit their job to enter public life, not only because the salary is extremely low compared to what it should be, according to reports made to us. That is not the main reason, but they refuse because they are afraid, and rightly so, of the insecurity in store for them. Regardless of family and health problems, strictly from a personal point of view, anyone who decides to enter public life and makes a decision which brings him insecurity and uncertainty all the time he is in politics very often for the rest of his life. Because, as I said earlier, none of us enjoys job security, none of us can be sure of being re-elected, none of us can be assured that for 20, 25 years, he will be able to set aside enough money to provide himself with a decent pension fund on which to live if he were handicapped or unable to return to his previous job if he does not have the money required.

Mr. Speaker, in closing on this subject let me add that a pension is not exactly an outright gift because members of Parliament will be paying for theirs. They will contribute 10 per cent of their salary each year towards it. For purposes of clarification and for the benefit of those who write about us and those who would be tempted to depreciate what we are doing, I would say that on the average a member of Parliament will serve for less than six years, and to be eligible for pension, one has to serve a minimum of six years. Therefore theoretically, nobody is entitled to the pension.

It is a fact that a rare few sit for twenty five years, and that a few more, not too many, sit for fifteen years. Not many sit for ten years, but the greatest number, the vast majority, sit less than ten years. And as I have just mentioned, those who serve an average length of time do not qualify for a pension; the average stay in Parliament is less than six years. Therefore, from the point of view of the cost to the Treasury, considering the 10 per cent contribution that we are going to make, considering what we will pay and the number of those who will in fact qualify, judging from past experience the cost to the government, to the taxpayer, will be negligible, practically nil. This is something which should be emphasized and publicized because this is not a gift that members of Parliament are offering themselves, Mr. Speaker, it is the very basic minimum a person will accept to enter public life and to serve conscientiously and without anxiety his constituents as fairly and as objectively as possible, without fear of finding himself one day in the poor house and in poor health and without any decent pension. Therefore this is the main justification for our pension system. This proposed pension plan is already applied elsewhere, sometimes much more generously, but in fact very few members will benefit from it.

I might tell you that there are now in Canada about 133, take or leave two or three, persons receiving a parliamentary pension, the overwhelming majority of them receiving a pension of less that $5,000 a year. The highest pension now received by a former parliamentarian amounts to about $17,000. I am referring to federal politicians. Some would argue that on the provincial level some former MLAs get more, but I am referring to the federal level. The highest pension now being paid in Canada amounts to about $17,000. There are only about 133 persons on pension, and most of them receive less than $5,000 a year. It is therefore an inequity, a blatant injustice, and I am glad to see that the majority of NDP members, the majority of Conservative members and the majority of Liberal members have accepted once and for all to lay aside any partisanship and endorse with such spontaneity a piece of legislation long overdue which was recommended in an independent report published and tabled by myself in the House last December. In conclusion, I would say that a bill of this nature, a bill that concerns each and every parliamentarian, should not be drafted according to ordinary rules. It is essential, under similar circumstances, that members be consulted, which was done, as I pointed out, and it is essential too that their views be taken into consideration; this too was done as well. Again, I appreciate the sustained support of my colleagues, the House leaders, in the past several weeks, I should say the past several months, to ensure that all members were consulted. As a result of our joint efforts, a large majority of members of all parties have endorsed the provisions of this bill and I hope they will come out openly and frankly for it this evening.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by saying how much I appreciate the review made by the President of the Privy Council and the government House leader (Mr. Pinard) of the sections and the principles of the bill. I will be speaking with respect to some parts of the bill, but not to the same extent in view of the government House leader's statement. He has saved me the trouble of quoting various opinions from the article to which he referred. These were opinions on the level of members' salaries and allowances expressed by labour leaders, business leaders, professional people and leaders. As a parliamentarian I read the article with a sense of gratefulness that there was some recognition of our work outside of this House, which is important.

I am pleased to speak on behalf of my party in favour of an increase in the indemnity for members of Parliament. I believe the increase to be fair and reasonable in the bill presented by the President of the Privy Council but I want to put it in this context, that no member in this House asks for anything more on his behalf than what the job is worth. We all ask on behalf of this institution the salary level needed to continue to attract and keep people with the skills and ideas required to make this institution function as it should. I doubt whether there is any other group of Canadians who make as many sacrifices to occupy a job than those who offer themselves as candidates to the federal House of Commons.

I want to defend as energetically as I can the pay bill that is before us, and deal with the arguments put forward by those who say that whatever MPs are paid is too much.

Most of us are here because we want to be here. I say most because a few of my colleagues representing all sides of the House are heard to mutter from time to time after a hard day that they must have been crazy to run in the first place. But that goes with the territory and usually the next morning they feel a little better. MPs go to a lot of trouble to build a political reputation which leads to nomination and then a campaign fight which brings them here. We all like politics. We followed politics before becoming full-time politicians.

I wonder how many of us would be here if we had come across a job description for an MP in the career section of a national newspaper. I suggest that the description would be intriguing but not very attractive. It might read this way:

Wanted: Person to act as member of Parliament. This exciting, management, professional, scientific, accounting, public service, public relations, clerical position offers endless challenge. You will represent 75,000 to 100,000 or more Canadians who have the right to phone you up at any hour of the day or night, criticize your performance on the job, fairly or unfairly, and write letters asking that you intervene with the Prime Minister or any minister on their behalf. You will be flown every week to Ottawa, which is a lovely city, except in July. While you are there you will put in a 70-hour week talking, arguing, reading and, wondering where it is getting you or anyone else. You will attend meetings from 8:30 in the morning to 11:30 at night. When you return to your riding you will be able to say hello to your spouse, if you are married, and to your children, if you have any, before departing to your constituency office, riding functions and more meetings. Fully rested, you will fly out Sunday night for another week in Ottawa. If you work hard, take chances, stay out of trouble and get lucky, you might end up as a cabinet minister, or even worse. Pay: $32,700 per annum, falling further behind inflation every year. The successful candidate must have extensive personal savings or be single.

Most people reading that ad might consider $32,700 a little low for the skills demanded and the workload expected.

But I want to say that the job of a member of Parliament can be challenging. Being an MP can be worthwhile, which is why most of us came here. The job can be absorbing, which is why most of us stay. In the long run it can be exhausting, discouraging and fruitless, which is why many leave. For the last two decades it has been what it was not previously, and that is a full-time occupation.

For the last four or five years, MPs have been badly underpaid. For many members of this House the frustrations of parliamentary life have been compounded by the rising anxiety over family finances. That is a matter which this House must face.

The House of Commons does not exist to offer monetary rewards for those who may come here on the make. Equally, it should not penalize those who come to the House at the peak of their careers when their energy and stamina are at their greatest. The salary level should, in fact, be a neutral factor. It should not be high enough to constitute the principal attraction to the job, but equally not so low that it is the main deterrent against running for Parliament or staying here. The job should be accessible to any Canadian who feels he has something to offer, whether married or single, old or young, rich or poor, with or without children, male or female. As is often said, this is supposed to be a representative institution and a low salary level should not act as an unintended social filter to those who would like to come here. That is the purpose, as I see it, of this bill.

The important question that we and the country have to face is quite simply, how much is the job worth? McIsaac and Balcer based their proposal for a salary level of $45,000 per year on a comparison of MPs' jobs with others requiring similar skills. I do not think there are others demanding similar hours. McIsaac and Balcer looked principally at comparable bureaucratic salary levels, which are substantially below those of the private sector since, in a bureaucracy, it is difficult to measure performance. That difficulty applies to ourselves as well as MPs.

Having made that comparison, the McIsaac and Balcer report called for a minimum salary of $45,000 per annum to be reached in four increments of $3,600, with an annual adjustment based on the findings of the Pay Research Bureau on the average salary changes for supervisory, managerial and professional employees.

Most of us in this House thought that that was a fair approach. We hoped it would solve both the immediate and the long-range problems. We all wish that we had a boss we could go to on an individual basis and argue the merits of our own case, as we would if we were in the private sector or if we belonged to a union or employee association where we could go as a group. We would rather have almost any other arrangement than the one we have now.

We support the adoption of a fair salary level and a formula to more or less maintain it. I will come to the "more or less" in a moment.

What we have in the bill before us is substantially less than the minimum recomended by McIsaac and Balcer. However, we can accept the importance of a package which can be accepted by everyone as representing a substantial majority of the three parties in this House. Instead of $45,000, it will be $40,200 effective July 1, 1980 with the first cost of living increase coming in January 1, 1981. As a yearly increased index, instead of the Pay Research Bureau reports as recommended by McIsaac-Balcer, it will be the lesser of the consumer price index or industrial composite, minus 1 per cent of that lesser figure. The expense allowance will remain as it is now, instead of being divided into an expense allowance and housing allowance, as recommended by McIsaac-Balcer.

I know that certain segments of the country of the country will soon emerge—I hope they won't but they will—in full cry against this reduced figure, even though it is well below what many of us in the House could make elsewhere and well below that of most of the people we deal with daily in the Ottawa bureaucracy and as representatives of the private sector. Nevertheless, the suggestions made in this bill go some way to correcting the imbalance. On behalf of my party, we accept it.

I believe the new salary level is within the range of what the job is worth, if perhaps at the low end of the scale. I also know that a great many arguments are made against any raises at all which have nothing to do with a fair salary level. I wish to deal with them in the next few moments because I do not believe that those arguments which are raised are as unanswerable as their proponents would have everyone believe.

One argument which is more often alluded to than openly avowed is the one I call "for the honour" argument. This line of reasoning suggests there should be a measure of sacrifice in the job of being a member of Parliament and that it is somehow unworthy to ask for a raise in pay in the same manner as anyone else would. The suggestion is that an MP lacks patriotism in expressing dissatisfaction with the pay that exists.

I believe that this argument mistakes the nature of the sacrifice an MP already makes. It ignores the changes in the conditions of employment over the past two decades, and in the bargain it argues that a family can be fed with honour. Even if an MP's pay were doubled, it could be argued effectively that an MP puts up with long hours, tedious travel and family separation which would drive people in the private sector either to premature ulcers or premature retirement. There are very real sacrifices undertaken willingly in the line of public duty. If anything, they are more tangible than the monetary penalties which can be staved off by dipping into savings, if one has then, or by regarding the position of an MP as a temporary venture.

In previous eras, going back to confederation, the job of the MP was perhaps more prestigious than it is now. It was undertaken mostly by people who, when they came to the House, where older than the member today. They were already leaders in their communities before coming here. Many had substantial wealth and did not need a salary. For those not in the fortunate position, the sacrifice was marginal since Parliament sat only a few months, often at a time when there was little to be done on the farm or when the business or professional office could be run by associates for a short period of time. The sacrifice, such as it was, was made by those who had a great deal to sacrifice.

Today parliamentary business is a full-time occupation. All of us frown on those who try to take the money as a parliamentarian and then go out and attempt to make more money somewhere else. We look upon this as a full-time occupation. The reason we frown on it is because that kind of member, and there are a few, is not here when he is needed. He cannot be counted on. We here and the public generally have to come to regard this job, quite rightly, as a full-time occupation.

Those in this House who do not need their parliamentary salary are in a minority. Needless to say, those people are not asking for this raise except in recognition of the position of their colleagues. Increasingly, MPs who come here are exactly the type that the public clamours for: young, energetic people, representatives of the bulk of the population, both men and women.

More and more of our MPs are young or middle-aged. More and more have growing families. They do not expect the people of Canada to give them the kind of incomes they could have expected had they continued in private life. They do ask people to understand that a young family cannot be raised on the honour of having a parent as an MP. The expense and the natural strain of raising a family are increased, not diminished, by constant separation, a duplication of residences and the stress of political life.

Another frequent argument against a raise for MPs is that they should set an example in the fight against inflation. Aside from the point I just made, that MPs increasingly are subject to the same or more serious pressures as anyone else, I would argue that parliamentarians have already made significant sacrifices in the inflationary fight. Even with this raise and the yearly increases, as was put by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), we have not seen the last debate in this House dealing with the way in which MPs' pay has fallen behind. I ask my friends to mark those words.

In 1975 the salary level was made retroactive to 1974 and set at $24,000. It was to be increased in each year, beginning January 1, 1976, by the amount of increase in the industrial composite index or 7 per cent, whichever was the lesser. The 1976 escalation was cancelled by this House so that the salary level was frozen at the same level for 1974, 1975 and 1976. How many groups in the economy can point to a total voluntary freeze for three years?

The 1976 freeze cost members of Parliament not only for that year but also for every successive year, since the base upon which escalation would take off thereafter was smaller for each subsequent escalation. The present salary is $32,700. If we had increased it by only 7 per cent each year—and neither the industrial composite index nor the consumer price index registered that low in that period of time—we would now be at $36,336.

Some people—and I suggest there are a number—accuse us of trying to keep up with inflation. If our salary had kept up with the consumer price index, it would now be approximately $40,000. If it had kept up with the industrial composite index, it would now be almost $43,000 and the expense allowance would be even higher. As McIsaac-Balcer showed, if it had kept its position relative to comparable professional or managerial jobs, it would be higher still. Throughout this period of escalation when the escalations were running behind, the job of the member of Parliament became more demanding, the hours longer and the sessions more dragged out, as this one is dragging out. Compared with any measure of inflation we lost ground in terms of salary every year. Both the cumulative total loss and the loss in salary position has been substantial. I have to ask myself a question: How many of those critics, however well-intentioned they may be, have made similar sacrifices over the past seven years.

The new salary level puts us roughly at where we would have been, but of course it does not take into account the accumulated loss on the escalation, the loss which has forced many members to dip into their savings and into other resources. The new formula refers to the lower of the consumer price index or the industrial composite minus 1 per cent. That is obviously a better arrangement from our point of view, but the 1 per cent will accumulate—this is what I meant earlier when I said "Mark my words"—and after 10 or 12 years this time, instead of seven, we will find that we have fallen seriously behind. How many other groups in the economy have accepted a wage package which locks them into a salary scale which guarantees now that in a decade they will be 10 per cent to 15 per cent behind then current salary levels?

But some say as an answer: "It is your own fault as a member of Parliament that inflation has risen and will rise so much. You promised to fix inflation, and you did not. You do not deserve a raise for failing." Let us leave aside in answering that attack the fact that very few of us promised our constituents we could stop inflation. Let us leave aside the complex factors causing inflation and the myriad of cures which have been advanced for ending it. Let us just look at our system of government and the party system which animates it.

We are not elected as individuals to solve Canada's problems individually. As much as we all hope we are the ones to have to cure revealed to us, that is not our lot. We come in large part as party politicians supporting a party platform. Those opposite me now support an anti-inflation program put forward by the executive which consists of most of the ladies and gentlemen in the two front rows. They as a government have made their choices and, with luck, the people of Canada will hold them responsible as a government for the failure of their policies. When we are in office, we would be held responsible for our policies. That is how the system works. It is wrong in practice and ludicrous in theory to put members of Parliament individually on a commission basis and say, "Your pay is frozen until you cure inflation." Members of Parliament should be paid for the job they are constitutionally called upon to do, which is either to defend the government on the one hand, or to oppose it on the other and propose an alternative. That is our job.

Another line is to say that members of Parliament want a raise to attract better people. There must be an admission that they themselves leave a lot to be desired. I think we recognize the qualities of the people most responsible for making this Parliament run and we wish there were more of them. We know the demands put on people who finally reach the cabinet. Some of us have been there and we hope more people with the necessary qualities reach Parliament. To be honest, we all count ourselves as the sort of people we should be attracting. We all have our own nominees for colleagues who could be replaced for the benefit of this institution. That is not really the point any more. Parliament has been successful in interesting more and more qualified people in running, and the raise in pay and benefits which has paralleled the increase in demands made has been one of those factors. This does not apply simply to the increased number who have left the recognized professions such as medicine, law, business or teaching, but also to the larger number of non-professional people who have established themselves as strong leaders in their communities or strong leaders in their unions and who felt a parliamentary career was a logical next step. The real point is that once we get them here we must keep them—within the bounds, of course, of party competition.

It does us relatively little good if we get better and better people who spend less and less time here in the work of this Parliament. There are already enough non-salary incentives to leave, but a discussion of these belongs in a debate on parliamentary reform. It takes time to reach maximum effectiveness as a parliamentarian. As a Parliament and as a country we cannot afford to have most of our promising new recruits leave in disgust after one term of financial sacrifice or political frustration. We can do something about the former now and perhaps about the latter when my friend, the President of the Privy Council, brings in his reform package in the fall.

There is another argument, and the argument goes this way: Members knew what they were getting into, so why do they not just get on with it? That applies to both salaries and conditions. I really have to ask myself how many employees in this country would accept the argument that, because they wanted the job they were in and knew roughly what the salary and the conditions were, they have no right to ask for a change if a case can be made. If anyone suggested that to a union leader in this country, he would be subjected to a string of epithets of which "reactionary" would be the mildest. I doubt that many really did know what the job would entail, but that is another story.

We run as members of Parliament because we want to do things for our country, not because we tacitly accept that everything about the job is perfect. Certainly there will never be a shortage of candidates, but so what? It is just as important for the health of our democracy to ensure that the candidates are qualified and will try to earn the right to stay in the House as to ensure an unlimited supply.

We are told that it is not reasonable to count only our salary and that we should count our allowances as well. In fact, we are told, since the allowance is not taxed we should count it at more than its face value. Members who are struggling to make ends meet at just over $30,000 are finding sources outside quoting their salaries at figures such as $50,000. It is a specious figure and reflects poorly on those who use it.

Members of Parliament have a wide range of expenses, including the tax-free one, because they are needed to do the job. The most obvious expense is maintaining two homes, but to the cost of housing can be added the cost of family separation, the cost of having almost no leisure time for do-it-yourselfing, the ceaseless demands for donations, dinner tickets and the incidentals of constant travel and public appearances. Sure, some members may make a bit on the expense allowance. Lots of others, however, dip into their savings or investments to subsidize their position as an MP.

The allowance of $14,000—$14,400 as of today—is a compromise which has been traditionally supported by all parties. It is for expenses, and for the great majority of members of Parliament it is necessary for expenses. If an executive officer or an employee of the public service or any business was sent to Vancouver in the course of his work, his travel expenses would be paid. This job calls us from Vancouver and elsewhere to Ottawa.

A final argument holds that if we wish to use as an argument the salary we can make outside this House, we should work outside the House. Well, there are two replies to that argument. The one I have already made is the fact that we wish that a more realistic salary does not in any way diminish our sense of public duty in being here. It simply means that we are not monks or janissaries; rather we are ordinary men and women with ordinary requirements. Second, no one is asking for the money he might have made elsewhere. A substantial number of members gave up high salaries from a sense of duty. They did not and do not expect to attain the same earning levels as they had before they became members of Parliament. They do not ask that the indemnity be lavish, merely that it not be derisory. This is the situation we are in if this bill is not passed.

There is only one valid argument, Mr. Speaker, in assessing the salary levels: What is fair for the job to be done? That is an argument put in this House of Commons, in the legislatures across the country, but it is more fairly and honestly put and recognized in every job occupation outside this place. What is fair for the job to be done? The political process can only be harmed if we try and take legislators and say they must be the whipping boys or must set an example beyond what is reasonable. All the arguments I have referred to sound impressive unless you stop to think about their implications. if followed through, the best people would be discouraged from coming to the House, and those here would seek ways to leave if we do not address the problem now.

In every occupation the salary level speaks for the employer in expressing the regard he has for his employees and the extent to which he values their services. It speaks to the question of what the job is worth in every occupation. A low salary, permanently held low, would serve to devalue this institution and we could not expect it to attract the people who should be here.

As MPs we are targets, but that does not mean we have to sit meekly in the face of some of the nonsense and hypocrisy that is from time to time hurled in our direction. I would have been happy to have had the opportunity to defend the salary proposals put forward in the McIsaac-Balcer report. The salary set there was a defensible and appropriate one, reached after great consideration by some people who know. Having said that, I have even less hesitation in speaking in support of the proposal of the government, which is considerably lower.

Now, before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about the pension proposal in this bill. It would raise our contribution from 7 per cent to 10 per cent of salary, with an additional 1 per cent for later indexing, and another 1 per cent for a surviving spouse provision.

We support this provision for several reasons, including the assurances given us by the government about the finances of the fund. That assurance has been extremely important in our minds and in our decision to accept the proposals. There have been criticisms about the pension arrangements for MPs. However, I put in to the House that this new scheme is not a departure in principle from what has gone on before. It is a straightforward exchange of higher contributions for higher benefits. Under this scheme the maximum benefit level is reached after 15 years, when it is 75 per cent of the six best years. It should be noted this refers only to salaries. The allowances and so on do not enter into this consideration at all. I make that point so that we do not get the same distortion on that coupling as could occur if it were done with respect to pensions.

I think more people are familiar with the rationale for a pension scheme for members of Parliament. Many of the arguments against the pension are made against what might be called the "worst cases". Whenever an argument is made against the pension plan for MPs, it is always the worst case that could possibly be picked, ignoring the fact that for most members the provisions are reasonable and in fact the actual payment levels are really quite low.

Most MPs come into the House over the age of 35 or 40. A 15-year chunk out of their career at this point, with very little extra salary to contribute to an RRSP, means that the prime contributing years have been removed. Not many people could leave the House and re-enter the employment market at 50 or 55, and in the next decade or so not only re-establish themselves in an interrupted career, but make an adequate provision for 20 or more years of retirement. That is the reason the plan was conceived in the first place, and for the way it was conceived.

Similarly, someone who only meets the minimum qualification of six years and gets a small pension entitlement is not being pensioned for life but is simply receiving a proportionate contribution to their eventual retirement plan. You have only to look at the levels that are paid after six years of service as a member of Parliament. Perhaps when we reach the stage as a country of complete pension portability, none of this would be necessary. However, we have not yet reached that point.

There is an impression that former members are already receiving luscious pensions and I would like to repeat some of the figures mentioned in the McIsaac-Balcer report, which were in term taken from the annual report on the administration of the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act for 1978-79. There were 218 MPs receiving pensions along with 34 surviving spouses and one dependant child. Of the MPs, one received between $21,000 and $21,999; one received between $20,000 and $20,999; and one received between $19,000 and $19,999. Altogether, 24 received more than $10,000 and 144 received less than $5,000 a year. That is not a picture of a pension scheme run wild. Given the assurances of the soundness of the increased deduction and benefit levels, I do not believe there should be any problem in the future. However, that is something this Parliament has a duty to watch, review and monitor constantly. The situation of MPs is different from others in the economy, and the pension plan for which they pay a high rate reflects that difference.

I believe this bill is supported by almost all hon. members of the House. It does not have this support because a theoretical figure has been plucked out of the air to be embraced and held to the bosoms of a group of rapacious members of Parliament. It is supported because members of Parliament know by their own day-to-day experience and that of their colleagues that the present pay level is far too low to meet the expenses encountered, to compensate for the skills which are required, and to encourage the interest in a parliamentary career needed to maintain the effectiveness of this institution. This is why the bill is before us.

I want to close by saying that the overwhelming majority of my party and I support the proposals in this bill. For that reason we agreed earlier today to the order of the House which would allow this matter to be considered.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As the House knows, there will be private members' hour at five o'clock; it is already scheduled. In order to allow the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody to complete his statement as official spokesman for the New Democratic Party, I am wondering whether there will be the consent of the House to allow him to finish his remarks into private members' hour and then we could start the full hour of private members' hour at the point the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody resumes his seat.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Hon. members have heard the proposal. Is there unanimous consent to hear the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just want to make certain that there will be ample opportunity to proceed at some point in the proceedings with private members' hour in order to ensure that the projects I have in mind will be dealt with.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Perhaps the hon. member was entering the chamber somewhat late to hear all the remarks of the parliamentary secretary. Private members' hour has been assured.

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, as the NDP representative on the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services, it is my duty to present the position on this bill taken by my caucus. I am neither a hawk nor a dove on the pay issue, although by speaking first and in favour of the package I may be a pigeon, but at least I would like people to know that I am not a chicken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: I believe the position taken by my colleagues in the House of Commons and I is a responsible one. Like most other occupations, members of Parliament face the ravishes of inflation. Members of Parliament have children in schools and colleges. Members of Parliament have to renew mortgages at 20 per cent interest rates. They pay taxes too and purchase automobiles which today cost about as much as a house cost when I first bought a home. Some members require two homes because of the distance they live from Ottawa. If they are unlucky, this means two 20 per cent mortgages.

My party and I do not support the total package as presented in the Balcer-McIsaac report because we feel it was too rich a proposal in a number of ways. Balcer-McIsaac called for a $3,600 per year increase over four years. My party rejected this. Balcer-McIsaac called for a $500 accommodation allowance, but this was rejected as well on the ground that members of Parliament already enjoy a tax-free, non-accountable expense allowance. Therefore, we believe we should pay our rent out of what I would describe as this adequate tax-free portion.

While I am certain that we will not be thanked for it, either by some of my own colleagues, some members of the other parties or some members of the general public who think that any raise for MPs by any definition is too much, I believe it is a responsible act to scale down the recommendations of Balcer-McIsaac by one third or approximately $5,000 envisioned in the fourth year of their report and one third across the board along the same lines.

There will be some who claim that this is a bad time to have a pay hike, that this is a bad time to discuss a pay increase or the benefit package of members of Parliament. Of those who claim this I should like to ask: When is a good time? There are no good times; there are only bad times as far as some are concerned.

I was here in 1970 when salaries were readjusted and, except for one New Democratic Party member of Parliament, my party opposed the pay raise then. Again in 1974, which was the last time the salaries of members of Parliament were revised, my party, except for three of its members, again opposed the pay bill. It is in our tradition to oppose pay raises, especially if we consider them to be unreasonable.

Some of the newer members in all corners of the House should realize that if my party had been successful in blocking the pay hikes of 1970 and 1974, members would still be earning what they were earning when I came here in 1968. For those members who might not remember, it was the staggering sum of $12,000 taxable salary, supported by a $6,000 tax-free allowance.

Some people would argue that being a member of Parliament is a calling somewhat like the ministry and that we should all be prepared to accept the long hours, the travel, the weekends packed full of meetings and public appearances, the resulting family tensions to which others have referred and so forth, as part of our sacrifice for having the privilege of serving the people of Canada.

Members of my caucus do not accept the argument, however, that high pay is the single most important criterion for attracting so-called good men and women to Parliament. We know that there are hundreds of good men and women serving communities all across Canada who are not particularly highly paid, so we totally reject this "attract good men and women" argument. No one goes into politics to get rich, but it is equally true that members of Parliament are not poor compared with the rest of the country. Speaking for my party, we do not expect to earn what doctors earn, what top deputy ministers earn at $85,000 to $91,000 in government ministries, or even what hockey players earn at $100,000 per year on the average. But we think it is irresponsible to encourage MPs to take home a salary which is less by $5,000 than that of an elementary school principal in my riding or roughly equivalent to that of an interior IWA tradesman in my province if we add a bit of overtime. This is not said to demean in any way either the elementary school principal or the tradesman. And surely the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), whatever we might think of him, is worth at least somewhere near the financial reward earned by the average NHL hockey player.

Since 1974 members of Parliament have averaged a 4.4 per cent increase in their indemnities, while the consumer price index climbed 68 per cent by 1980 and the industrial composite jumped 78.2 per cent by the same year. Essentially the salary proposal before us does little more than catch up to where MPs were in 1974. That fact in itself makes the package worthy of serious consideration. Other people as disparate as John Bulloch of the Federation of Independent Business, former British Columbia Supreme Court judge J. V. Clyne and Dennis McDermott of the CLC all agree that members of Parliament need better salaries.

My friend, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen), has figured out that this package is worth about 21 per cent over 11 years, plus COLA, if spoken and defined in union terms. No one, unless he has been elected to the House of Commons at least once, has any conception of the hourly demands placed upon members of Parliament. Absolutely invisible to members of the public is the time that MPs spend on such things as party policy decisions, the hours we spend on the committee work of various kinds, such as estimates, annual reports, task forces which sit in the summer, as the alternative energy one did last summer, and as the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements task force intends to sit this summer. No one knows the time it takes to study legislation before the House. Equally invisible is the preparation of speeches, the phone calls, the letters related to constituents' problems, or for that matter, the time spent on travel to and from our constituencies. We are busy people and, I think, effective people. In the main, I think it is time the public heard that statement in complimenting MPs once in a while.

If I may be permitted a brief or perhaps even a lengthy personal note, I represent a British Columbia constituency. I go home virtually every weekend. If any listener or viewer thinks flying across Canada and back once a week is a real treat, I would like to disabuse them of that misconception.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: It takes at least an hour for me to get to the airport Friday evenings, and if my plane is not late, as it usually is, we leave for Vancouver at 7:05 p.m. The plane, if it gets to Vancouver, arrives at about 9:30 p.m. Vancouver time, but that is 12:30 a.m. Ottawa time. By the time I get to my home in Mission, after driving about 60 miles—I think that is about 100 kilometres—it is two hours later. By the time I get home, it is 2:30 a.m. for me, because I remain on Ottawa time. For me, that travel is tough. But for B.C. members, like my colleagues here and some from the other parties who do not live in the lower mainland, it is terrible. Consider for a moment the travel problems confronting the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) or the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), or the Okanagan and Vancouver Island members.

An hon. Member: Try Newfoundland!

Mr. Rose: These individuals must catch local connecting flights later on that evening after they reach Vancouver or spend the night in Vancouver as a stopover before completing their journey or their trip home. These members like to get home and keep in touch with their constituents too, but the vast size of Canada makes that extremely difficult. The travel time and the expenditure of energy in such travel is immense, and I do not think very many people realize that.

Of course, there will be people who will say that if the work is so tough and the travel is so rough, why does one run in the first place? I think that is a reasonable question, and it is a good question. However, I think it begs the real question whether our salaries are falling behind the cost of living or not; and it also ignores the hours members of Parliament spend on travel, as well as time they spend on their jobs in Ottawa and their jobs in their constituencies, whether it is on weekends or in the summertime. There is seldom a weekend I do not attend some public function in my own riding.

So all in all, in discussing the matter with other MPs, we find that it is a rare week when most MPs do not work from perhaps 9 a.m. in the morning to 10 p.m. in the evening. If one multiplies that by about six days, the total amounts to roughly between 75 and 80 hours per week. That is the number of hours at straight time, say at $12 an hour. I am not talking about overtime, time and a half, or double time. Incidentally, an interior tradesman in the IWA in my province has just received an offer of $16.95 an hour. This is what a tradesman can receive. However, if one multiplies 75 or 80 hours by $12 per hour, one cannot get very far away from $1,000 a week. If one says $1,000 a week, one has to say that amounts to roughly $12,000 per year more than what we are asking for in this package.

Some of us might wonder again why someone like me would speak in favour of this legislation, given my traditions. Unfortunately, we seem over the years to have been saying two rather contradictory things. On the one hand, we have said that since we do not want Parliament to become the exclusive preserve of the privileged classes and the wealthy, we support decent salaries, pensions and benefits to enable even those of modest means to stand for public office without undue sacrifice to themselves or their families. On the other hand, our voting record indicates that we do not really believe this at all, and we have acted over the years to keep salaries relatively low. I think we have been responsible historically. The result of this action, nevertheless, has meant that at least some able people of all political persuasions have been discouraged from seeking public office because their personal financial responsibilities preclude them from standing for Parliament. I think that is a fact.

It is probably true that I personally, as an individual, would not be unduly damaged if there were no revision of our salaries, other than the benefits which would come about under the normal course of the 7 per cent. However, I believe that the position of the MP deserves to be recognized, and the position of the MP as related to salary paid to the office, cannot fall behind unduly. I have no children at home any more, personally. My obligations to my wife and family are not nearly as great as they once were. If Parliament granted no increase beyond the 7 per cent annual increase, I personally would not feel persecuted financially.

However, I remember with great clarity how things were in 1968 when I was first elected. My first term was in 1968-1969. I took home $12,000 taxable and $6,000 non-taxable. I was paying on a house in Coquitlam, where my wife remained. I had one child in junior high school. I had two others in two different universities, and I was so broke that I could afford no apartment. Never mind the accommodation allowance; I recall sleeping in a room with a couple of other members of Parliament.

An hon. Member: Move into a tenement.

Mr. Rose: Well, I would not want my plight to sound too bad! However, I will say this. I certainly had no automobile in Ottawa. A second automobile for use in Ottawa was naturally out of the question.

The following year we sold our house in Coquitlam so we could afford to buy something here, and we moved to Ottawa. I brought one wife, one child and one car. We all moved to Ottawa. I do not mean to be funny about this; I do not think it is funny. I do not want anyone to weep too much, but I do not think it is funny, either.

Our move to Ottawa, of course, meant that I no longer had a home in my riding. Therefore, each time I visited I had to rent a car and maybe sleep at my mother's house or crash the home of some political supporter. I do not want hon. members to weep over this. I got by. I am still here. I was defeated but later I was re-elected. The shock to my system was not that great. I got by and so did my family. I had to give up my UBC pension for six years, because becoming an MP meant I would have to pick up both the university's portion plus my own and I could not afford the cost.

I was first elected in 1968. I was out for five years. Therefore, I can anticipate a proportionally minimal retirement allowance, based on four years of low salary when I first came here, if and when I am next defeated or retire.

Again, I say I will get by; but it can be argued that Parliament is no longer the private preserve of the wealthy, neither is it any longer the private preserve of the elderly. There are now dozens of young MPs here with growing families who intend to make a career out of politics. For them, serving in Parliament is far more than a calling; it is a career with rather risky job security provisions.

These young members need decent salaries, decent pensions and decent severance pay once they are defeated—as they surely will be. Since 1968, 218 members have failed to win election. I believe the average term of an MP is less than six years. If their terms are less it means that most MPs fail to qualify for even the minimum pension. They will not qualify under this bill either, so I repeat, this package is not overly generous. It is both reasonable and responsible. Even if some of the more senior MPs do not need more money, some of the younger ones with families need the improvements badly. On behalf of this party, I support the recommendations contained in the bill.

Let me speak briefly now about severance pay, and again I call upon my own experiences to illustrate the need for some form of severance pay for those MPs who are defeated, as most are, before they qualify for a minimum pension after six years.

I was defeated in 1974, but while serving here I was on political leave from an enlightened institution called the University of British Columbia and I still am. The day after I was defeated in 1974 I went back on staff at UBC, so the lack of severance pay was not an issue for me. I had security and I had tenure, but hundreds of others do not. The readjustment to "civvy street" is much more difficult for them.

My four NDP colleagues who went down to defeat in 1980 were not so lucky. Three of the four had seven distinguished years as parliamentarians. All were good MPs, but as so often happens when vote shifts occur, being a good MP is like being a spectator at a shoot-out. You can be gunned down anyway. Of the four, not one had a job to go back to the day after the election. One though, after some months, was reluctantly taken back by his school district because the contract demanded it. Two others still cannot find jobs equal to those they left on first becoming elected and the third started his own business and is in debt to the bank for thousands of dollars.

I have said nothing about lost promotional opportunities in the prime of one's career life. I have not spoken of catching up professionally after an extended absence from a job or profession. After an absence of six years, I felt I did not know the literature; I was dated, and it took a long time to get back where I was professionally when I left. I do not mean financially because I was covered financially. I have not spoken either of housing and domestic factors that make the readjustment of a defeated MP extremely difficult.

I think, tough, I have said enough to make a fairly convincing case for severance pay for defeated MPs, and I think I can say, despite our differences on certain parts in the bill and its benefits, that this party agrees that severance pay is essential and supports it 100 per cent.

Now let me turn to pensions. Many people think that upon retirement or defeat all MPs receive pensions bountiful enough to enable them to take numerous world tours, dine only in the finest restaurants and stay at the best-hotels. From the laughter, I notice that some hon. members are not convinced; but most of the general public believes that.

As I have already stated, most MPs do not receive any pension whatsoever because they are not here long enough to qualify. If you do not believe me, just ask some of those nine-month MPs who came and went with the Clark government. How many? Too many, say the Tories.

As the Balcer-McIsaac report points out, in 1979 there was a grand total of 218 former MPs receiving pensions. Of these, 101, or virtually half, receive pensions less than $3,000, which is lower than the basic old age pension today. There will be no world tours for these pensioners.

The next highest group includes 93 former MPs and they receive between $3,000 and $10,000 per year. This is not lavish when one considers that a pensioner on old age security and with the guaranteed income supplement today receive $5,160 per year. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is known far and wide for his achievements on behalf of the pensioners of Canada. I am not saying that our elderly receive too much. I am saying that if you put it in the proper perspective, the 93 former MPs who receive pensions of between $3,000 and $10,000 per year paid their share of their premium. It was not a gift.

Our present pension requires a 7.5 per cent premium to be paid and the one we are considering will require a 10 per cent premium at the minimum. As was pointed out earlier, the indexing portion will cost another 1 per cent and if one wants a decent spouse's allowance for a survivor, the premium will cost an additional 1 per cent. The contribution, therefore, is between 10 per cent and 12 per cent annually.

This is a pension to which MPs will contribute probably more than the government's share. It is no gift. It is a pension like any other pension and takes 15 years to mature. How many members of Parliament last for 15 years? Very few.

I spoke on this subject of the pension ten or 11 years ago, Mr. Speaker. At that time I believed that no one should be eligible for a pension under the age of 55. In fact, I regret that this bill does not include this provision. When we last discussed pensions I was 46, and I moved a motion to that effect. Of course, it was defeated. I cannot move that motion today since I would hardly be considered objective, being past that magic age, but I would not object if another member moved such a motion. I do not want to move it because it could be considered favouring my own age group over some of the other members and their interests, so I will not do that.

I hope that this has not sounded like a litany of gripes, Mr. Speaker. As has been said earlier, this is an exciting and important place to be. People are not here just for the money, they are here for a lot of reasons. Among the most important of the reasons is the fact that they like politics, they like serving their country, they like the variety and the challenge.

I should like to pay respect and show my gratitude to the people who have sent me and my colleagues here and have given us an opportunity, which comes to very few people, to serve our country in this institution. It is an experience available only to few people and I am grateful for it. I do not want any defence of the bill to sound like I am sick of my job, therefore.

In conclusion, I am supremely aware that, as humans, we are all prone to cloak our actions in the most noble of motives, and probably I am guilty of this human foible today, I do not know. What I do know is that in 1970 I typically voted against the pay raise and later took the money. At that point I decided that, if I ever intended to take the money again, I would vote for a package if it was fair. I think this package is fair and I intend to vote for it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill S-23, an act to incorporate the Jules and Paul-Emile Leger Foundation, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, we neglected to inform you earlier that following discussions among the parties, in a few moments we will deal with private members' private bills in the name of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. Following that, instead of moving to motions for papers in the name of the hon. member for Vaudreuil, there has been agreement that we proceed with motion No. 40 in the name of the hon. member for Davenport.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I thank the parliamentary secretary for that information.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have a further message from the Senate. I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has agreed to the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill S-10, an act to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, without amendment.

May we consider that private members' hour started at 5.22 p.m. It being 5.22 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notices of motion, papers, public bills.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think that you will find that with respect to Bills S-20, S-21 and S-22 there is agreement in the House of Commons to take these bills through all remaining stages and pass them within the time-frame that we have available today.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I confirm that those discussions have taken place as described by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. Perhaps we should deal with those matters early in private members' hour, which I think would be quite appropriate and agreeable to all members.

Mr. Knowles: Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

THE ENVIRONMENT

ESTABLISHMENT OF ENVIRONMENTAL BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing an environmental bill of rights which would, with respect to federal matters:

1. emphasize the right of an individual or group of individuals to initiate court action when in their judgment the environment is in danger, without first having to prove that they have suffered personal or economic damage;

2. shift the burden of proof to the polluter after the individual or group has established that damage to the environment is likely;

3. make information held by private companies and governments on the handling, storing and treatment of hazardous products and related manufacturing processes accessible to the public, with certain exceptions to be defined in regulations;

4. give the court the power to set interim or permanent injunctions in an action commenced under the act; and

5. give the court the power to set standards where there are none and order a polluter to comply.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in this motion I am asking the government to introduce legislation that would protect the environmental rights of Canadians for the following reasons.

With science and technology advancing in leaps and bounds and with a life style that still encourages consumption rather than conservation, the environment is increasingly coming under attack. As citizens, we need the means to act so that we can prevent damage caused by pollution. We need this legislation because today the citizen does not have real recourse in attempting to prevent an initiative that might seriously damage his environment and even his livelihood. Usually he can only claim for damages after the fact.

We need legislation to protect environmental rights because present laws and practices have the effect of putting the citizen in a much weaker position than the industries that pollute. As described in a book entitled "Poisons in Public" by Ross Howard, an environmental journalist who wrote for the Canadian Environmental Law Research Foundation:

The polluter's use can stop the swimmer from using and enjoying a lake, but the swimmer's use cannot stop the polluter from polluting the lake . . . Even in a world with rules against pollution . . . the leverage inherent in resource consumers means that they can continue their conduct until sued. In short, they almost inevitably will be defendants (of the right to use and pollute) and those whose uses preserve rather than deteriorate will ineluctably be plaintiffs.

What recourse have the people suffering from mercury poisoning in the Wabigoon River against control orders which have been delayed for a decade, or against the company that threatened to shut down rather than clean up? What recourse does the small resort owner have against the polluters causing acid rain which is slowly killing the lake on which his business depends? What recourse do the Nishga Indians, the B.C. Medical Association, the B.C. Federation of Labour, the Anglican Church and environment groups in that province have against the dumping of toxic waste into Alice Arm Inlet by the Amax Corporation?

These examples support the argument that it is no longer enough to compensate the victims of pollution. This is why preventative legislation is needed in the form of this proposal or something similar to it.

Environmental protection is not a new concept. This and past Liberal governments have taken many positive steps. There is the Environmental Contaminants Act which among other things has led to the banning of PCBs and chlorofluorocarbons in many products. It allows for "interested parties" to initiate boards of review into regulations and I am told that "interested parties" is being interpreted widely.

Under the Clean Air Act, the public now has 60 days to comment on new regulations. The results have been positive. Mercury air emission regulations made in 1976 were strengthened considerably after public comment. This act has been amended recently to strengthen the fight against acid rain. Since 1973 review panels have been set up to ensure that environmental effects are taken into account as early as possible in federal programs, projects and activities. We have had an independent environmental advisory council since 1972 to provide the Minister of the Environment with informed advice on problems and policies respecting the Canadian environment. Encouraging developments are under way regarding the testing of toxic chemicals used in industry, and I welcome recent statements by the minister which support the advantages of pulling together into one piece of legislation the various acts which deal with environmental protection. The list could go on.

The motion today proposes another step towards ensuring a clean and healthy environment. How? By opening up the system, by encouraging public action to a much greater extent. Under present procedures citizens are not told in advance what standards of pollution control the government intends to apply to polluters. In fact, in Canada pollution control is accomplished through established standards and emission rates negotiated privately between the polluter and the regulator. Without well researched and well organized comment and analysis by public interest groups and independent experts, issues do not receive a full and fair hearing. Therefore, affected groups feel alienated. With consultation, the better the standards are likely to be, the more public support they are likely to gain.

Traditionally Canadians have relied on their governments to protect the environment and regulate industry. By encouraging public action, citizens too will have a responsibility in protecting the environment.

We are proposing that individuals or groups of individuals be given the right to initiate court action when in their judgment the environment is in danger, without first having to prove that they have suffered personal or economic damage. In essence, this right would permit a citizen to sue for a violation of environmental quality rights in much the same way that one has always been able to claim that a property or contract right has been violated.

It is important that the suit be initiated without first having to prove personal or economic damage because this can be either impossible to prove conclusively or it might be beyond the means of a private individual to produce sufficient technical evidence to support his complaint. The citizen would have to establish first that damage to the environment is likely. The burden of proof would then shift to the polluter. This is the second point in the motion. Today, under present legislation, the major burden of proving even the most basic issues, such as pollution source and impact, is on the plaintiff—in other words, the victim—in almost every lawsuit, and this is virtually an impossible task.

For example, anti-pollution action under the federal Fisheries Act often ends up in court. The onus is on the government to prove beyond any reasonable doubt that a polluting substance is "deleterious to fish". However, if sublethal effects are suggested but not confirmed, it is hard to find expert witnesses to testify. The case is therefore lost and prosecution cannot be carried out.

Under the Environmental Contaminants Act, government officials must be satisfied that a substance is or will constitute a significant danger before it can be regulated. The government must prove its suspicions before it can move in reaction to a chemical already on the market. Unfortunately, the most definitive proof is a victim.

As an aside I would like to add that the initiatives that the Canadian government has taken at the OECD to enforce on all member nations standard tests of toxic chemicals are commendable. It is unfortunate that these efforts have been "shot down" by the Americans. However, even if successful, our action would not have protected the ctitizen against any of the 50,000—I repeat, 50,000—chemicals on the market today.

The third point in the motion calls for access to information on the handling, storing and treatment of hazardous products, and it has already been addressed by Bill C-43, the access to information bill. Once it is enacted, the bill will enforce the principle that government information be available to the public and specifically provide for public access to records containing the results of product or environmental testing carried out by government institutions.

The fourth point in this motion, to give courts the power to set interim or permanent injunctions in actions commenced under the act, would have the advantage that damage or threats of damage to the environment would not continue unabated during long court cases. It supports the principle that toxic chemicals should be regarded with suspicion and "guilty until proved innocent". This power would be similar to powers given to the courts under the Fisheries Act where the court can order a polluter to refrain from committing further offences.

The fifth and final point dealing with judicial review flows from the Michigan environmental protection act of 1970. Quite frankly, I would prefer parliamentary review on a continuous basis combined with prior public consultations, but I have included this point of the purpose of stimulating debate and arriving at a better conclusion.

I am fully aware that this motion involves provincial as well as federal jurisdictions and that in legalistic terms the motion may seem impractical or unenforceable at the federal level. However, I believe that the environmental issue of the day and of years to come which this motion attempts to address, namely, the survival of life on this planet, is of such fundamental importance that Ottawa cannot afford to abdicate any aspect of environmental protection in the name of federal-provincial divisions of power. Pollution problems do not respect political boundaries. The federal government has the advantage of the larger total view of this issue including the long-ranging aspect with will face us at the turn of the century—and perhaps earlier—namely, the disposal of waste.

Furthermore, there are certain questions which all in this country have to address, no matter what implications they might have on such matters as the division of power under the Constitution or the role of the courts. For instance, how much longer can we continue to dump toxic waste into rivers, lakes and oceans before they will be completely unable to regenerate themselves? How much longer will the air be able to cope with pollution from industry, traffic and other sources of pollution? How much longer will the soil be able to absorb increasing amounts of pollution deposited by rain before being irreparably poisoned by man? And who is to blame? We can blame industry for being the villain, we can blame governments for inaction, but in the end it comes back to the inevitable conclusion that the polluter is man. Blame it on the consumer, on western world affluence or on the wasteful society; the fact remains that individually and collectively we are the polluters.

We have conflicting social values here. In each one of us there is the environmentalist who wants to breathe clean air and drink pure water. In each one of us there is also the consumer. Our lifestyles depend on goods and services whose production endangers the very environment we want to protect. These conflicting values find expression in the legislatures and parliaments. Some laws protect the environment, some the consumer and others the capability of industries to make the products we are so eager to buy.

It is for reasons of this kind that I have introduced this motion asking the government to introduce legislation to protect environmental rights. The intent of the motion, in recognizing that as citizens each one of us needs to accept some of the responsibility for the protection of the environment, is to equip the citizen with the tools he or she needs to exercise his or her responsibility, especially when facing big industries, big governments and the consequences of decisions made in far-away places.

Barbara Ward summarized this very well when she wrote a few decades ago:

> —the warning remains . . . if man continues to let his behaviour be dominated by separation, antagonism and greed, he will destroy the delicate balances of his planetary environment . . . once destroyed, there would be no more life for him.

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to lend my support and, I think, the support of many of my colleagues for the main thrust of this particular motion, which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing an environmental bill of rights which would, with respect to federal matters—

—accomplish certain ends. I have listened with some real interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) and can agree almost wholeheartedly with the elements which he would like to see in such an environmental bill of rights. They parallel those which have been recommended by various non-government environmental organizations, including the specific recommendations of the Canadian Environmental Law Association in its excellent publication "Environment on Trial". I am referring, in particular, to the chapter on an environmental bill of rights. I take issue with some of the points in the chapter to which I have referred, just as I take issue with a number of those raised by the hon. member for Davenport. But, on the whole, I support the thrust of the suggestions made both by the hon. member and by the Association.

Like the hon. member who has just spoken, I think we do indeed need a bill of environmental rights which, among other things, would state clearly and explicitly that the citizen has the right to a healthy environment, that government has an obligation to protect the environment against individuals or groups who might be predisposed toward violating the environment and that government's first priority in accepting or rejecting any proposal must be the protection of the public interest as far as environmental matters are concerned.

I think such a bill of rights should be backed up with mechanisms and procedures which would make it possible for citizens to participate in all kinds of processes—whether they be tribunals or whatever—established to protect the environment. Just as important as anything else, it is essential that any environmental bill of rights, be it that of the hon. member for Davenport or another, be applicable both federally and provincially.

The fact is that, when the Fathers of Confederation met between 1864 and 1867, they did not see the environment as a matter of great urgency. That was not a failure on their part; it was just a reflection of the reality that environmental issues were not as important then as they are today. The Fathers did not make the relevant provisions; so we have shared jurisdiction over the environment by the federal and provincial governments, with all sorts of attendant problems. For that reason, I think the bill of rights should have application at the two levels.

Some elements I would like to see in an environmental bill of rights parallel those contemplated by the motion of the hon. member for Davenport. They include the following. First, a clear statement that the public has an inalienable right to a healthy and attractive environment. That fundamental right should be recognized in legislation that would have a degree of paramountcy. At present the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts), however well intentioned, has discretion in the application of environmental law. The discretion should be removed or at least severely restricted.

At present, too, the two levels of government may take certain actions to protect the environment, but rarely does legislation state that government must take action. The environmental bill of rights I have in mind would address that problem in such a way that the owner of a particular piece of land or property would be seen to hold it in trust for the public. He or she would handle it knowing that it is not for his or her use only. The individual has an obligation to protect the environment, and failure to respect that public trust would make him or her liable to legal action by the state or by other individuals.

The second element needed is the right of standing. My colleagues in the legal profession could elucidate that concept more eloquently, than I, but let me simply refer to what I envision. It is the right of a citizen to use the law to uphold his common law rights to defend the environment in courts and tribunals. As I see it, members of the public should have the right to enforce the law, a right known as standing. Government should not have a monopoly on enforcing environmental protection laws. Certain provisions should be made so that citizens can sue to stop any project, program or policy—or proceeding, for that matter—which is not conducted legally and which harms the environment in some way. Members of the public, individuals or groups, should have the right to appear before government boards, commissions and agencies for this purpose.

A third element is that of environmental impact studies, a requirement that they be done on projects which might endanger the environment before those projects are allowed to proceed. I need not tell the Minister of the Environment how the existing process works; he is across the floor and knows as well as I do. However, for the benefit of other members, there is an initial environmental screening process to determine whether a particular project might have detrimental consequences for the environment. If after that is done there is reason to believe a project would hurt the environment, a more formal review and assessment is done. It is all co-ordinated by the federal Environmental Assessment and Review Office of the Department of the Environment.

The problem is that the process is all discretionary. All of it is done or not done at the whim of the minister or the cabinet, or perhaps on the recommendation of the minister's officials. Even if the minister is well intentioned and has all the goodwill in the world, the fact is that in certain circumstances abuses may happen under the present system. We have already seen how abuses have been allowed to creep in with respect to the Beaufort Sea. Both the Arctic Waters Advisory Committee, AWAC as it is known, and the Regional Ocean Dumping Advisory Committee, RODAC as it is known, recommended in the strongest terms that certain projects in the Beaufort Sea region not be allowed to proceed until full environmental assessments have been done. I am referring to the circumstances surrounding applications in 1979 for permits for harbour facilities at McKinley Bay and Tuk Harbour.

Well, despite the fact that the government's own advisory committees recommended environmental assessments be conducted, the government proceeded with approval of those permits within only days of the applications being made. Clearly, Mr. Speaker, discretion was exercised without much concern for environmental principles. The inclusion of this particular element in a bill of environmental rights would prevent such an abuse of discretionary power. Governments are always vulnerable to lobbies, special interest groups, and high-powered and well-financed private interests which can manipulate and twist and move the government in one direction or another in their own interest. As a result, the discretionary power of a minister of the environment can sometimes be exercised against the public interest. I think we need public hearings connected with all environmental impact assessments, wherein members of the public who do not have a vested interest in a particular project would have the opportunity to participate fully and without encumbrances. For example, it might be that money will have to be made available for these groups to enable them to take part because it can often be prohibitively expensive to do so otherwise.

There are other provisions, Mr. Speaker, in a bill of environmental rights that I would like to see included. I have already referred to public hearings. In that context, I think freedom of information is vital. The public cannot participate usefully and productively if it is denied information. At present, practically without exception, all information in the possession of government is released to the public at the whim or discretion of a politician or civil servant. No matter how innocuous the information, it requires their approval to be released. Members of this House know from experience that, more often than not, even innocuous pieces of information are marked secret, confidential or restricted.

We need a provision in an environmental bill of rights which opens up the process to the public and allows citizens to have full access to information, with restrictions clearly specified and limited and perhaps with some deterrents to ensure that the system is not abused by the public. Sunshine should be shed on government at a time when all too often darkness prevails.

Public participation should be extended also to the setting of standards. Environmental standards are now largely found in regulations, provided for in some piece of legislation but not detailed there. But practically no one knows what the regulations are because, after the legislation is passed in Parliament, public servants get together, draw up the regulations, and no one ever hears of them. The process needs to be opened up. If there are to be regulations, let them be made public and let them also be devised only after members of the public have been allowed an opportunity to participate in the drafting of them.

My argument is particularly true, for example, in relation to Bill C-48, which is now before committee. Clause 49 will establish an environmental studies revolving fund. Millions of dollars will be disbursed to fund environmental studies to protect the environment against certain resource activities on Crown lands. The regulations which will govern the operation of the fund are not now known to members of Parliament. The specific regulations are not being discussed in the standing committee. They will perhaps never be known to the public. In any event, when they are finally drawn up, they will not reflect any input from the public. An environmental bill of rights needs to take into account that kind of problem.

Also, an environmental bill of rights should make provision for an ombudsman, either an individual or a group. If it is to be a group, it could be an existing environmental body restructured to do a number of things. It would advise the government and the public on environmental matters. It would act as a watchdog on the environment, and it would report periodically on environmental issues.

A further environmental bill of rights provision would give the right to pursue class actions to the public, non-government environmental groups and others. Any citizen or group of citizens would then be able to sue on behalf of similarly aggrieved citizens for any damage resulting from environmental destruction. This might be particularly relevant in connection with hazardous wastes, as the hon. member for Davenport implied.

Another provision in an environmental bill of rights should be the right to defend the environment at reasonable cost. Public participation in tribunals can be prohibitively expensive, as I have already indicated. Individuals and groups will have to be assisted with their participation. We need a mechanism to allocate funds to members of the public who wish to defend the environment through the courts or tribunals.

A further provision should be a restriction on the discretion of environmental agencies. Too often environmental agencies are able to operate unfettered, unbridled and in secret without their decisions being made public or without any provision for public participation in those decisions.

The hon. member for Davenport referred to a judicial review of administrative action. I wholeheartedly concur with his suggestions along those lines. Decisions by government environmental agencies should not be unfettered. These agencies are now allowed to operate almost ex cathedra; they have the last word on the subject and their decisions are usually beyond the reach of courts. I do not think the courts should be allowed to trample upon government agencies or departments. These agencies must be allowed a certain amount of independence. But surely their decisions should not be totally beyond the purview of the courts. The courts should have some role in ensuring that at least due process is followed.

Finally, I think the burden of proof in environmental matters should be on the polluter. I agree with the hon. member for Davenport in that respect. Anyone who wants to introduce a new product, process or substance into the marketplace should be required to demonstrate that it respects the environment. The onus should not be on the public to demonstrate that a certain product or substance will violate the environment. The onus should be on the industry or the company introducing the product into the marketplace to demonstrate clearly beforehand that the environment will be respected.

May I conclude by expressing some regret that the government opposite did not see fit to include environmental rights in its constitutional reform package. It is an irony, with all due respect to the minister, that the Minister of the Environment was asked to assume special responsibilities for piloting the constitutional program through the House and ultimately through Britain, yet the same minister apparently has not had enough clout in cabinet to ensure that the reform package included, if not an environmental bill of rights, then some environmental provisions. Nevertheless, I respect the minister's dedication to the environment and am sure it will be reflected in his remarks this afternoon to which I very much look forward.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): For the benefit of some hon. members who may not have been present at the time, the House agreed earlier to commence private members' hour at 5.22 p.m. The Chair will recognize the end of private members' hour at 6.22 p.m.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first I congratulate the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) for a passionate and compelling speech. Also I congratulate the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan). I do not agree with all the interpretation which he places upon the present situation, but nevertheless I think his speech was constructive and useful and one which I will study with great interest.

I want to particularly congratulate the hon. member for Davenport for bringing this motion before the House. Surely it is an appropriate time, when the country is on the threshold of the establishment of a constitutional entrenchment of the protection of our rights, that our attention should be directed by him to the notion of applying the idea of rights to an environmental bill of rights.

It is a pleasure for me to welcome his motion and to indicate that it has my complete and loyal support, even though in one or two places of detail there may be a certain reservation on my part, at least until we have had a chance to examine further and reflect upon his proposals. Both he in his motion and the hon. member for Hillsborough have stressed the point that we are dealing with an area of responsibility in which there is a shared jurisdiction. I want to touch upon that point for a moment.

The provinces enact environmental protection laws under the property and civil head of the Constitution, the federal government primarily under its peace, order and good government powers, fisheries, criminal law and the trade and commerce powers. Thus, both levels of government may enact environmental protection laws. In so far as we are able, we would like to act co-operatively with our provincial colleagues in ensuring that in our jurisdiction our actions complement one another and lead to effective action to combat polluting effects.

A few days ago in the House, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn), speaking on behalf of the New Democratic Party I think, expressed the concern that there is not a sufficiently clear definition of federal responsibilities in those areas and that there may be some difficulties in leaving such extensive powers in the hands of the provincial governments as there are at the present time. I think that the reference was particularly to the Clean Air Act and the question of transboundary, that is to say, cross-provincial boundary situations of airborne pollution.

I have taken seriously the comments of the hon. member for Brant, and also the kinds of representations which have been made by my colleague, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia). I would like to say to them and to all hon. members of the House that we have seriously under consideration the question of how the various environmental laws on which federal responsibility is based might be improved, strengthened and clarified, not only in terms of provincial and federal jurisdictions but also in terms of the responsibility for that mandate among the various departments of the federal government. Therefore, it is particularly helpful for me to have the kind of comments which have been expressed today, because within my department, and certainly in my own thoughts, active consideration is being given to exactly how we can strengthen the environmental base for the federal government's action.

The motion that the hon. member for Davenport has brought forward implies that Canadians are denied, or at least may find it difficult to assert, because of the procedural barriers in civil law, the right to seek redress for harm done to them based on environmental wrongs. I can tell your Honour that my departmental officials and I have been examining the difficulties which citizens encounter when they want to make their views known on environmental issues and when they seek redress in the courts. As well, as I have mentioned, examination is being undertaken of the existing federal environmental protection legislation with a view to designing a better, more enforceable and more relevant legislative basis for Environment Canada's environmental protection authorities. Those studies, which are nearing completion, deal directly with many of the issues which the hon. member for Davenport has usefully drawn to the attention of the House today.

First, I should say to the hon. member that Environment Canada expects to implement a department-wide policy which was first proposed last summer, under which the Department of the Environment will provide for regular and continued consultations between my officials and any and all members of the public. Both of the previous hon. members who have taken part in the debate have stressed the importance of consultation and of widening the basis of consultation. As part of our new proposals, all our important regulations will be reviewed, using clear, equitable and written procedures which will ensure full opportunity for public input at various stages in the regulation-making process.

There is an important principle which goes far beyond our desire to ensure that the processes of government, such as regulation-making in the environmental protection area, are open and accessible to the public. Let me elaborate on that. When our approach to developing environmental protection regulations was formulated in the early seventies, Environment Canada took great pains to initiate detailed technical discussions with industry in order to identify regulatory requirements which were feasible and which represented the upper limits of good industrial technology and environmental design. The hon. member for Davenport has referred to that process and expressed some skepticism in regard to it, and I think he is right.

In an era when technical requirements established by governments tended to be formed somewhat in a vacuum, there was a risk of legal challenge. I think that in that context, the approach of government-industry task forces was a significant step forward. However, with the benefit of hindsight, I think we can now recognize that that earlier approach, however innovative and progressive it may have seemed in the early seventies, opened the door to the criticism, which was exactly that which the member made, that polluters had a disproportionate influence in the decision-making process, and that the regulations which were issued sometimes may have had the appearance of—and may, indeed, have not only had the appearance but have in substance simply accommodated the needs of industry while providing a kind of symbolic reassurance to a concerned and apprehensive public. I think that the hon. member's criticisms from that point of view are very well taken.

Our new approach to public consultation will welcome and, indeed, will see participation from all concerned public groups. It will provide a much better balance, and, in my view, constitutes a significant feature in Environment Canada's contribution to regulatory reform. I hope that more effective consultation at the rule-making stage will breed better regulations and may reduce the number of occasions on which the enforcement of activity ends up in the courts. I appreciate that public consultation requires calls for innovative approaches. We need to look for and to create new opportunities and discuss policies and programs with those who are either directly or indirectly concerned. We need to have that open dialogue at earlier stages than we have had before in the development of new policies and programs.

I recognize as well that travel costs to effect this consultation can be a burden for some interest groups. I might add that I am pleased to have read that the parliamentary task force on regulatory reform, chaired by my colleague, the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) was encouraged by, and saluted the progressive approach to regulation-making which was being put in place by Environment Canada officials.

My department's new public consultation policy will also include a section on information availability which will be enforced until supplemented by new legislation such as is embodied in the access to information bill which is currently before the committee of the House. I am particularly proud of these initiatives of Environment Canada and feel that they present the vanguard of open and accessible government procedures.

The second point I would like to make is that I am pleased to report that Environment Canada has commissioned a study, which is almost complete, on the general problem of citizen access to the courts in environmental matters. By way of background on this study being done for us, let me remind Your Honour that environmental protection laws have been broadly characterized as common law or statute law. Common law consists of a compilation of reported decisions of judges on disputes resolved earlier, as Your Honour knows. Statute laws are creatures of the legislature and are usually seen as society's legislative statements of a problem. They generally propose a cure for that problem, aimed at controlling and shaping individual behaviour to conform with acceptable societal norms. The controlling devices used are normally regulatory or quasi-criminal in nature. Statute laws are seldom concerned with the rights of a single individual as these have been historically established through the case law associated with civil and property right.

The public should be able to play an important pollution control role at the enforcement level. In Canada, the courts have recognized the right of the individual to enforce the quasi-criminal provisions of regulatory statutes and private prosecution. Your Honour may be aware of the facts associated with a private prosecution concerning pollution problems in the Fraser River in British Columbia. That public action was initiated pursuant to pollution provisions of the Federal Fisheries Act.

I am encouraged that public concern has the outlet, through features of the Federal Fisheries Act, which facilitates the private initiation of legal action. The work on this matter tends to convince me that there should be an increased role for citizen actions on behalf of the Crown to help draw immediate attention and, indeed, to permit the citizen, or any group of citizens, to commence a legal proceeding for the violation of environmental legislation or regulation. I believe that this is a very important principle which the hon. member for Davenport wishes to have us affirm.

One can argue that it should also be possible to use common law causes of action in instances of environmental degradation in order to advance the broader community interest in environmental protection. The prospect of success in privately initiated litigation may be remote due to differing bases of liability, a potpourri of different defences and many procedural evidentiary difficulties. For example, in some actions the responsible party's fault is relevant, while in others, liability follows irrespective of whether there is any fault. Often, in order to be successful, a plaintiff must prove that it was the defendant's activity that caused the injury being claimed; or the injuries suffered must be material. In an effort to characterize the injury as material, the plaintiff seeking to advance community interests finds himself on the horns of a dilemma because many of the more pervasive environmental concerns relate to quality of life, to air quality, to quietness, to aesthetics, the lack of which will tend to be characterized by the courts not as material but as little more than personal discomfort. In an attempt to elevate those concerns to the status of material injury, plaintiffs are frequently forced to relate the injuries to their property by showing a general decline in property value.

In spite of some relatively strong judgments from some judges, the trend in Canada seems to be that courts are reluctant to tackle what they regard as the broader social issues. This means that they will tend to favour the economic interests of those who have invested heavily in a project and look to some other agency to strike the appropriate balance of environmental protection and economic development; that is to say, that they will push the determination of that issue outside the context of legal decision. Generally speaking, common law actions are designed to protect property interests, so it follows that one needs some interest in the affected property to maintain the action of a plaintiff under common law.

I would like to abbreviate my remarks on this point, because my simple point is to establish some of the difficulties that we might have if we pursue the objective of relying upon the courts to make some of these decisions concerning the public interest in environmental matters. If we wish to facilitate civil action in the area of environmental protection, we must address those procedural impediments, making it difficult or impossible, and I will quote from the hon. member's resolution, for: —an individual or group of individuals to initiate court action . . . without first having to prove that they have suffered personal or economic damage.

In view of the constitutional considerations, I believe it is the provinces that must take a lead role, since property, civil rights and the administration of justice including civil procedures, are clearly within their domain and constitutional responsibility. I mean that the provinces must take the lead role in relation to the first matter brought to our attention by the hon. member in his resolution.

The second feature of the hon. member's motion proposes as follows:

2. shift the burden of proof to the polluter after the individual or group has established that damage to the environment is likely;

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Because it was not possible for a member of this party to get the floor to participate in this debate, may I be permitted simply to say that we congratulate the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) on bringing in this resolution. We are glad to see the reasonably favourable response given by the minister. I hope he can proceed even further.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.23 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARIES OF SENATORS AND MEMBERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pinard that Bill C-83, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Salaries Act, the Parliamentary Secretaries Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Essex-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening following three speakers who have fortunately, or unfortunately covered the waterfront. As is the case when partisanship falls by the wayside and members on all sides of the House deal with an issue in which they have conviction, the first few speakers usually deal with all the vital issues involved.

Let me say that I support this bill. But I want to share a few thoughts and make a few comments on this bill. I have had the privilege of working with some of the members who have spoken who serve on the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services. I recognize the non-partisan kind of work and the sincere attempt which was made by all parties to come up with a solution that is represented in the bill we have before us this evening. The matter has been of concern to us and it has been gnawing away at many members for a considerable period of time. We have already heard about the justice that is represented by this bill.

Not long ago I had the honour to be elected by my peers from my caucus to represent the Ontario members who have a sub-caucus on this side of the House. Sitting as their chairman, I have had the opportunity on many occasions to discuss with members, particularly the younger ones who have come to the House recently, some of the difficulties that we endure together. I might mention some things that have already been talked about. Collectively we have to come up with second homes. But there are other small and insignificant things which create a need far greater than is apparent to most people from the outside looking in. Any home, no matter where it is located, requires the ordinary upkeep, such as, for example, the cleaning of downspouts, the repairing of sidewalks and painting and fixing of windows from time to time. These may seem insignificant tasks, but when one considers the life of a member of Parliament, if he or she is doing what that member is required to do, which is to be here in Ottawa for the sittings of the House, for committee meetings, for meetings with lobby groups and, when they get home, to attend meetings with their constituents, one realizes that there is very little time to do these extra things. As a consequence, one finds oneself paying someone else to do them.

I have no difficulty in explaining to my constituents as do others, where the tax free allowance goes. When I talk to my constituents who are salesmen, businessmen, junior executives or farmers, and I have a large farming community in my area, people recognize they have certain tax deductible expenses that a member of Parliament does not have available to him. What salesman or trucker does not have some kind of expense allowance while on the road? Does anyone suggest that that person is augmenting his salary or wage by the amount spent while on the job? I think not. Therefore, I believe that the all-party agreement represents an understanding by this House that there is a definite need and an element of justice that is being responded to. That is represented as well in terms of the agreement on a limited debate. It is probably represented as well by the few exceptions we will hear to the general agreement that we move forward.

I have had the opportunity, as have many members, to examine in depth the McIsaac-Balcer report. This report set out a middle of the road approach which was neither niggardly nor excessive. Notwithstanding that happy middle ground which the McIsaac-Balcer report came up with, we in the House, recognizing that there are still examples to be given by the representatives here and willing and prepared to give that kind of example, agreed to accept something considerably less than what McIsaac-Balcer recommended.

Hon. members will recall the last time we dealt with this issue in 1975. We are now trying to bring at least the base back up to the point where it should have been for the last three or four years. In 1975, salaries were brought to the point where they were at a level where they probably belonged. We then decided that we were going to do without the first increment given to us by reason of the conditions which existed at that time and by reason of the example we were prepared to give.

Few people remember that, except for those who continue to suffer from the fact that we gave that example. It is important that we raise it again. A full year of increment has been missing since 1975 when the legislation was passed. Although we may not suffer in terms of what is in our pockets now, we make those people suffer whom we have either brought with us to Ottawa or who support us in our ridings, be they wives or husbands.

At the time of entering politics, we had a certain standard of living. We had no right to expect our spouses or families to suffer a deteriorating standard of living because of our being here. We did not believe that by coming here we would increase our standard of living. I ask the question rhetorically: would it be fair to expect them to sustain a decrease in that standard of living because of our commitment and their commitment to allow us to come here and offer our services, whatever value they may be, to our country?

My final point by way of delineation is I do not believe that by salary alone we would attract people to devote their time and indeed their lives to the service of their country by serving either this Parliament or another legislative house. I firmly believe it can be a deterrent to persons whom we want to be here making the judgment. As other speakers before me have stated, there should not be a financial impediment to attracting people or at least to making it unattractive for them to present themselves as candidates.

Members on all sides of this House want to do the very best for Canada. We want the best in terms of representatives who will be attracted to this place. The fact that we are dealing with salaries and pensions will help. We do not put at risk to as great an extent, even though there is a sacrifice to be made, the lives of individuals who choose to come here in the future. Without this, those who give it a lot of thought may not come.

I would not want anything I have said to be misinterpreted by my colleagues here or anyone outside this House. I would not want anyone to think I wish I had not done what caused me to come here nor anyone to believe that I am now somehow crying sour grapes. Like every member of this House, I am extremely proud to have been sent here. I came of my own free will after a lot of hard work, not only on my part but on the part of many people in my constituency. I continue to take pride in that and to appreciate it. However, I say at the same time that what we do tonight will permit someone to follow in my footsteps and the footsteps of my colleagues who will be replaced as time goes on by, hopefully, people of even better calibre and quality. They will not be, among other things, jeopardizing the standard of living which they and their families will have.

I will be supporting this bill. I compliment the House leader for having brought it forward and I compliment my colleagues on both sides of the House who worked so hard to draft what has ultimately come before us this evening.

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I will speak briefly on this bill because many of the points I wish to enunciate have already been covered. At the outset I will state my position because I think it is important. I feel very strongly that this bill is long overdue. I am going to support the bill. I am going to vote for the bill.

I want to say publicly what I have said privately in the corridors and outside this House. I do not believe that members of Parliament are adequately paid. At the same time I am in a distasteful position. I find it distasteful to speak to a matter where I am the arbiter in which I have a personal interest. There is a certain sense of unfairness. As members of Parliament, we must do something to ensure that this does not occur time and time again.

This problem has been before us on numerous occasions. Many members of Parliament thought there was some type of panacea or solution in having a report prepared whereby independent people would provide us with suggestions as to amounts for our salaries, pensions and other matters. Unfortunately what happens with respect to these matters is it is always a source of political embarrassment.

Every political party in this House has a certain concern about what the political fallout will be when we begin talking about matters in which we have a direct personal interest. If we learn anything as a result of this bill and what has preceded it, it is that the type of reform we need, not only for members of Parliament but judges and deputy ministers, is a different process for determining the proper amount of salaries and benefits to be afforded senior officials of government.

This problem is not new in the world. The Australians have a far more preferable system than the one we have to endure tonight and throughout the ages of Parliament when it comes to this issue. The Australians appoint a tribunal. It is not made up of civil servants but of people who have been out of politics in an elected way for more than seven years. They meet every year and advertise their hearings. The government actually makes representations as to what the proper amount of salary and additional benefits ought to be. Then within 15 days of a decision being made, unless 50 per cent of the house signs a petition and puts it before the house in Australia, that is what the salaries are.

It is high time this Parliament stopped spending its time dealing with matters which involve not only our own salaries but also the salaries of judges. I think that is not the proper course Parliament should adopt, and we ought to do something constructive about it. I think the Australians are on the right track. The people of New Zealand have adopted the Australian course of action. We should seriously look at that as a pattern, not only for establishing our own salaries but also the salaries of judges and the salaries of senior civil servants.

With respect to the amounts we are talking about, may I say that the government has not arbitrarily set our salaries. Salaries were suggested by a commission established for that purpose. The amount we are about to receive, as the last speaker so accurately pointed out, is two-thirds of what this independent tribunal assessed, and still within this House there is a sense of embarrassment because we have to speak about it in terms of our own personal interests. That is just not right.

I was very much impressed when we were discussing the Judges Act. Representations were made to all of us with respect to what the proper salaries of judges ought to be. I was one of the members of Parliament who spoke to judges. They pointed out the hardship they were personally enduring as a result of making $60,000 a year. We know what judges make now, close to $80,000 for judges at the superior court level and $70,000 at the county court level. Yet complaints were made to me in good faith that they could not send their kids to college and that they were finding it financially embarrassing. In addition to that—and every member of this House is aware of it—they wanted a pension to which they would not have to contribute. That matter was a source of deep contention in this House. We hived off that bill, and that matter will now be decided within committee. I put it to the House that if judges found it hard to support their families at $60,000, how is a member of Parliament to carry out the responsibilities of supporting his family at $32,000?

There are certain members of this House who are independently wealthy and do not worry about salary. There is a good number of us who have to worry because it is now our only source of income. I am a lawyer by profession, but I do not practise law any more because the responsibilities of a member of Parliament are such that I do not have the time. It used to be different but it is not that way now, and I think our constituents demand that we spend full time in this House. I do not want to be handsomely paid; I want to be adequately compensated.

As I see the suggestion in the bill before us, which is two-thirds of what an independent tribunal assessed, I think there can be no argument in this House that we are being overpaid that meets the test of reason. There is no just way we are. With respect to the matter of salary I wholeheartedly endorse this bill.

Let me speak about a matter which I find in the newspapers constantly, the fact that in addition to the $32,000 we receive as salary we also receive a tax-free allowance. People say that is part of our salary. I for one want to tell those people who think that is the case that it is just utter nonsense. I believe there are members in this House who will agree with me when I say that we spend every cent of our tax-free allowances and more. I do not consider that to be salary at all. I hope the public understands that members of Parliament actually do use that for maintaining homes and for the expenditures pointed out by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) which are incidental to our being members of Parliament. I think everyone in this House is proud of the privilege of representing his own constituency. It is a good feeling to wake up in the morning and to like going to work, in spite of the frustrations.

Nobody here is a member of the House of Commons for the money. That is clear, but what is not clear to many people is that members of Parliament in many cases are hurting a great deal, and they ought to be adequately compensated.

The final point I wish to make is in relation to the very interesting and useful part of this bill respecting severance. To me a 50 per cent severance allowance is a welcome addition. I had a pretty good law practice when I was practising in Cambridge in southwestern Ontario, but if I were to go back to the practice of law and take up where I left off, it would take me at least a year to establish my clientele again. No matter how prominent a member is, when he goes back into business, law, medicine or dentistry, it takes time. To my way of thinking, one-half of the salary is certainly a welcome addition.

The last matter I would like to address is the question of the pension. I re-emphasize what the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton stated. I make a certain assumption, and that assumption is that the pension is responsibly funded. We have the assurance of the government on this matter and, that being the case, I lend my wholehearted support to this bill, which I think is long overdue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin my remarks by expressing my thanks to my colleagues for agreeing that I might be the second speaker of this party for, as will be expected by almost everyone, it is my intention to speak against this bill and to vote against it when the debate ends.

I want also to thank the government House leader for suggesting this afternoon that both the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and I have been co-operative in arranging for this debate to take place. That is true for both of us, but I would like it to be clear that my co-operation was because I believe in the right of the members of this House to discuss the matter if they wish to do so, and I was happy to lend my co-operation to make that possible. That does not mean I am co-operating for the purpose of getting the bill passed. It was understood—and I am grateful for this—that even if only one member were to stand at the end of the debate to request a recorded vote, there would be such a recorded vote.

Another complimentary word I should like to offer is to my friend, the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose), for the speech he made this afternoon. He knows I do not agree with him, but I thought he made a well stated and excellent case for the bill and for the position of members of Parliament. I thought he did it—and I say this very deeply and sincerely—without giving any offence to those of us who might take the other side of this issue.

Nevertheless, having said that, I disagree with most of the arguments which have been put forward and, in my view, Parliament ought not to be passing this bill at this time.

● (2030)

I suppose I am a different breed. A couple of years ago the Prime Minister referred to Tommy Douglas and me as leftovers from the depression. Tommy Douglas had an appropriate retort. I made none. I did not mind the suggestion the Prime Minister had made, namely, that some of us have not forgotten the experience people went through in that decade. I suppose if I tell you that I also was born into depression in 1908 and that I graduated from university in 1930 into another depression, members will say: Oh, that explains Stanley. He has had too much of that kind of background.

Mr. Paproski: That is not true. We all went through it.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad to hear that, and I am glad I have not forgotten those experiences. However, I also feel that I must never forget why I came to this institution. I must never forget the conditions under which so many of my constituents still live. I like to think my constituents are not just those who live within the boundaries of Winnipeg North Centre, but they are pensioners, veterans and people in need right across Canada. I feel I must not forget them.

As I say, it was because of what I went through, what I saw people going through in the 1930s, that I decided I had to move from the pulpit into politics, and eventually found my way here in 1942 for the purpose of achieving greater equality amongst the people of Canada, and to solve some of the economic problems our people face. In my view, Mr. Speaker, and I hold this very deeply, if I am going to remember the people out there, there must not develop too wide a gulf between my standard of living and theirs. I speak only for myself, I do not ask anyone else to agree, but I feel if I am going to represent the people in need, the pensioners, the veterans and all the rest, they must not feel there is such a gulf between us that I cannot really mean it. I am not suggesting members of Parliament have to be poor or go into debt and all that sort of thing. But I am suggesting it does not hurt one whit for us to experience a few difficulties and know what life is like in economic terms if we are to represent faithfully the people out there who are suffering economic difficulties.

I recognize the case that has been made, particularly by my friend, the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody whom I have already complimented, for the needs of many of our members, especially the younger ones with families. However, the Prime Minister has already said that older people should rearrange their priorities and somehow get along. If we want to maintain contact and credibility with our people, we should rearrange our priorities, even on our $47,100 combined salary and expenses allowance we now receive and try to make it. I do not equivocate about the matter at all. I think the pay and allowances we are now receiving should stay at that level and we should not at this point be seeking an increase. I say that at this time in particular because of the difficult circumstances facing Canadians in recent months. The tremendous increases in the cost of living and interest rates have put our people in a difficult position, and we in this place have done very little to ameliorate their situation. I do not think it brings us closer to them to ameliorate our situation when we have done nothing for them.

I want to be fair about this session. I do not see very much that we have done at all. There was that $35 increase in the guaranteed income supplement last summer which has been eaten up time and again so far as our older people are concerned. Tomorrow we will pass a bill that I have been pleading for every week this year to cut out the delay in benefits sour 20,000 widows of veterans were subjected to in the bill we passed last summer. Now, if other members can add to that list the things we have done to meet the needs of the people we represent, I would be glad to hear them.

An hon. Member: Silence.

Mr. Knowles: I hear silence, just as if I were performing a wedding and had asked if anyone had anything to say, let him say it now or forever hold his peace. Yet, Mr. Speaker, we say that we, too, have troubles: the high cost of mortgages, interest rates, the cost of living, cost of travel. However, we are in a position to do something about it. It can be justified; everyone who has spoken in this debate thus far has justified it. I say, and I speak only for myself, that I do not want to be in the position of improving my situation when we have done so little for those out there.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I cannot vote for this bill. As I say, quite frankly—and I do not apply this test to anyone else—I cannot retain for myself the extra dollars that would come to me if this bill were passed. I feel it all very deeply. I have already made reference to what my experience has been. My friend, the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski) says we have all had those experiences. That is true. I am not the only person in this place who came from humble beginnings and who know the experience of a shop worker father who was laid off from time to time. I am not the only one; this place has many persons like that. I just do not want to forget it. I think this Parliament should not forget it, and I think we would better represent the people of Canada if we ourselves deliberately suffered a bit, if we deliberately delayed doing things for ourselves until more has been done for the people we represent. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I feel this bill should not be passed.

I am not trying to answer the arguments that have been made. They are all valid. It depends on the point of view from which you start. I think someone said today, what is the job worth? What are the people prepared to pay? My question is: What am I prepared to pay to maintain the confidence of the people for whom I am working here and not just to get something better for myself? I am prepared to pay the price I have implied in what I have already said.

It is sometimes argued that a better rate of pay is necessary in order to attract good people to the House of Commons. I think that is nonsense. I was going to use another word but the Prime Minister did not like it when my leader used it earlier today.

An hon. Member: Unparliamentary anyway.

Mr. Knowles: No, no. In my view, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, and it has been quoted, I have never seen any lack of candidates at election time, and everyone knows then what the pay is going to be. I can remember some awfully good men in Parliament when the pay was $4,000 a year and no extras.

An hon. Member: One-dollar men also.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, $1 men also. I know times have changed, but my fear is that getting the salaries up where they are and where they are going—and these figures are getting pretty high by the time you add in the new salary level, the tax free expense allowance, and the higher indexing, within a few years we will be up there in the stratosphere—all it really does is attract people looking for a good paying job. I think for the good of the country we should avoid that. Maybe others will say: Well, I am just like the rest; I do not want it to be too high or too low. However, I think the emphasis, the main reason for coming here, should be one of dedication to the good of the country and of the people we represent. We may not forget them with more money in our pockets, but they think we will. They think we are in the position of the elite and that we have all kinds of things that we do not even have. It seems to me that we should be prepared to pay a price to have the confidence of the people we represent. That, to me, is something which is very important about Parliament these days. People are wondering whether we really represent them, whether we are really addressing ourselves to their problems. They are coping with 20 per cent interest rates, they are coping with food costs which have gone sky high, they are coping with housing problems that they cannot meet, and all the rest of it. I just have the fear that in the next day or two, as people read about what we have done today, they will feel, "Well, those men and women have taken care of themselves. Can we count on them addressing themselves to our needs?"

I am speaking only for myself. I say again that I am grateful to my colleagues, the majority of whom are on the other side of the issue, for letting me speak at this time. If we cannot make my way prevail, if we cannot get the bill defeated, I hope that at least I will inspire people to the proposition that we must think a lot more about what we are doing for the people we represent.

I know one could say, "We will do this first and then we will do it for the others". It does not normally work that way, but I want some sense of conscience to be felt in the House about what we are doing. I know all the arguments, that the $4,000 which I talked about when I was first here is irrelevant. I may say to the younger ones who are having difficulty that I understand it. I knew what it was to try to get by on a $4,000 indemnity with Mr. Ilsley taking $1,200 of it away in income tax during the war, with no air flights to get home, only railway passes, with out-of-pocket expenses which paid for two trips a year. Boy, look at the distance we have come. Look at the things we have now as part of our jobs. They also add to our standard of living, to the joy of being here, to the thrill of being members of Parliament. I suppose it has been decided in each caucus how the vote will go tonight, that the bill will pass, but I want to express my objection to it.

One of the other arguments used of course is that in terms of percentages the increases that we have had in the last few years add up to something like 4.5 per cent per year and that the people out there have been receiving higher average increases than those. Let us remind ourselves that it depends upon the base, it depends upon where it is starting. I have this argument with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Begin) about old age security. She and the rest of the government are proud that the pensions are indexed according to the rise in the consumer price index. The base to begin with was too low. With us the base to begin with back in 1974-75 was way ahead of the average, and we received increases. The thing to look at is not a comparison of the rate of increase but the absolute dollars and the absolute relationship between us and the people we represent. If we do that, I hope we will think more about the whole situation.

As I say, I do not expect to change the vote. I am glad the government House leader and the opposition House leader agreed with me yesterday that we would have a vote so that those of us who feel as I do could have our votes recorded against this bill. At least I hope the thoughts I am uttering will have some effect on the thinking of members and that, starting tomorrow, starting next week, or starting on October 14 when we come back, we will try to be better representatives of the people, with members more attentive to their needs if for no other reason than for conscience sake because of what we have done for ourselves.

While I am on my feet may I say that there are one or two things I would have liked to raise in committee on the bill. I realize by the time 9.45 p.m. comes, there will still be members wanting to speak on second reading and the committee stage will be quite pro forma. If I have anything I want to say in terms of the things that are in the bill, I will have to say them now.

The first is that I am very sorry that with this bill being brought in, opportunity was not taken to correct something for former members of Parliament who retired a number of years ago for whose wives there is no protection if the member died first. There are only about 20 or 25 such former members, all of whom I knew; they were here in my time. They retired and went on the small pension that it was then, $3,000 per year being the maximum, but it was before there was a provision for survivors. There are these 20 or 25 former members out there who are prepared to make payment to cover actuarially the cost of a pension for their widows. They have been in correspondence with the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and with the government House leader. It has been kicked around. I have had copies of most of the letters. I had thought when the time came to amend the Members of Parliament Retirement Allowances Act that something would be done. We are doing things in this bill, especially in the pensions part, for members who are now here. We are permitting them to go back and make extra payments for years gone by so as to get the full advantage of this bill, but why is it that we are never prepared to do something for those who have left the place? As I said, the 22 or 23 former members about whom I am talking are quite prepared to pay the actuarial amounts to cover their widows. I wish something had been done for them.

Speaking of the pension arrangements, I have to say that through all the fine arguments I have heard defending the new pension arrangements I found it pretty hard to accept as justifiable a scheme under which in 15 years one can become qualified for what is known as a full pension. The argument is that members pay for it. They pay for it out of the increased indemnity. Actually we pay for half of it; the government puts up the other half. Any steel worker or any elementary school principal in the country would be happy to pay for a pension that good—fully matured at the top level in 15 years. It has been agreed to. If it goes through now I think it is a little too much. If I may return to my theme, I hope after it is done that we will have a little conscience and realize that having done what we have for ourselves, we ought to be doing a lot more for the people we represent.

By the same token—and I would have raised this in Committee of the Whole had there been time to do so—I still think that it does not make sense and it is not fair that a pension for life is available regardless of one's age. I know it is hypothetical and theoretical, but it is possible for a person to be elected here at the age of 18, spend six years as a member and receive a pension for life, level up to age 60 and indexed thereafter. No one has done that, but there are members who have gone out in their thirties and forties, and there will probably be more. This does not happen in ordinary society. People say, "Why do you do those things for yourselves when you will not do them for us?" It has been my experience that after almost every time we have done something to the pension plan, some Liberal has come to me and said that we should not have done that. I remember particularly when we had the Curtis report a number of years ago. Professor Curtis of Queen's did one of the studies, and one of the things he recommended, I think, was that members' pensions be deferred to age 55. Some have suggested age 50, but certainly it should be age 55 or 60. While it was before us we got nowhere. I suspect within a few days from now there will be some members saying that that is what we should have done, and so we should have. These are things I would have raised had we got into committee of the whole. That will be a pro forma experience, so I mention them now.

I will be a bit more personal. I have heard two or three hon. members say today that it is an honour to be here but that families cannot live on honour. I know that is true. It is not my suggestion that we should ask them to do that. It is not my suggestion that we reduce the indemnity. I would take it if there were a reduction, but I guess I am that strange breed. But I want to say that you could not pay me with millions of dollars to match the satisfaction I have had in being a member of Parliament. I was here for 16 years, from 1942 until 1958. I had a four-year break, and I have been here 19 years since then. So I have been in this House for 35 years. In the first session that I was here, I think the first accomplishment that I won—and hon. members will smile about this in view of what will happen tomorrow—was a concession from the Hon. Ian MacKenzie. He was then minister of pensions and national health, and he had charge of veterans affairs. The department had not yet been created. I pleaded from my seat in the back row, for widows of World War I non-pensioned veterans, for whom there was nothing. They are now covered in the War Veterans Allowance Act. They were not, in those days, even though the act had been around for a number of years.

I remember the day when Ian MacKenzie got up in this House and tabled an order-in-council which would provide ad hoc allowance for that year to those widows of World War I veterans. Someone said that it was reported in the paper that I was jumping for joy yesterday. I almost jumped for joy then over the satisfaction of that kind of an experience within a year or two after I came here, in that same first session which ended in 1945. I was not alone then, but I had a good deal to do, by way of participating in it—we got the first increase in the old age pension, which had been $20 a month from 1927 until 1945. Just before the election in 1945, we got that pension increased to $25 a month. There was still a means test. The pension was still paid 75 per cent from Ottawa and 25 per cent from the provinces. Then Manitoba had to be persuaded to pay its $1.25. These amounts sound infinitesimal now, but the thrill of that sort of thing makes the experience of being here, through all of its frustrations and through all of the disappointments, one which one could not match with millions of dollars.

Across the years I have been involved in the same things, such as old age pensions raising them up from that $25 up to where they are now, over $200 on a universal basis at age 65; getting family allowances started and keeping them on a universal basis at a time when the government wanted to put them on a means test. We now have unemployment insurance, hospitalization, medicare, the Canada Pension Plan and greatly improved veterans benefits. I could make a longer list of the things which I have not seen succeed; but I say to hon. members; do not think of this place as one where one has to work hard and does not get much pay. Think of it as a place where if one stays with it and has some sense of dedication one can win.

This morning while I was in my office there was hardly half a minute between each of the phone calls which came. Some of them were about today's business and matters like that, but most of them were from people who had seen the item in the news this morning about the bill which was introduced yesterday to end that waiting period for 15,000 or 20,000 veterans' widows. As a matter of fact, I do not think one of the calls was from a widow herself. The calls were from other people, such as veterans and citizens generally who were just pleased that this step had been taken. No sum of money can match that satisfaction.

I do not need a pay increase. I do not need tributes or that sort of thing. The thrill of being here and winning some of these accomplishments, the feeling that people out there are perhaps a little better off in some respects, or that they are glad they have someone who is a friend in court for them, makes this experience, the 35 years that I have had here, such a delight that I hope I can do it again.

Mr. Rose: Another 35 years!

Mr. Knowles: Another 35. I thank my hon. friend.

I suppose that those who spoke earlier will reply to me, "That is fine, but one cannot feed a family on honour". We are not asking families to live on honour. We are talking about moneys which are into the $40,000 and $50,000 bracket per year. We are talking about a lot of other things that we have.

It is tough in many cases, and if one has not been here very long, one's pensions will not let one travel around the world; but we are reasonably taken care of. We are well ahead of those whom we represent. I think our pay and allowances should stay as they are.

I thank hon. members for their attention. I am delighted to have had this opportunity to state my philosophy of the life which a member of Parliament should lead, and I thank my colleagues again for letting me be the second speaker of our party, even though I differ from the majority of my colleagues. I hope hon. members realize why, when the vote comes at ten o'clock tonight, I shall be voting no.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chas L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, this intervention will be a short one. It will be one which I do not relish making. First of all, I would like to give thanks for the opportunity of participating in this debate and to explain why, by virtue of perhaps being old-fashioned or by virtue of having a mental block or other reasons which I cannot briefly describe, my reasoning leads me to the conclusion that, regretfully, I cannot support this bill.

This is the way I see the issue. To me it is a question of going back a year ago when I was elected for the life of this Parliament. In a way I felt that I was hired under the terms and the conditions of the duration of this Parliament. I therefore feel that I entered into this role of a member of this House with the clear understanding as to what was ahead of me, both the good and the bad. Having reached this point in my thinking, my next step, therefore, is to comment on the approach which I would support and I would urge the government to consider, because this is not the first time and there will be other times, years from now when this matter will be before this House.

I think we should arrange things in a way whereby one Parliament decides for the next. In our specific case, I would be glad to support the measure whereby we would determine the salaries and other conditions for the members of Parliament to be elected in the next Parliament, namely, the thirty-third Parliament. In doing so, I think we would, first, increase the quality of accountability in such a way that it would not harm the texture of democracy, and maybe it would strengthen it. Second, we would be making a decision for a group of parliamentarians whom we really do not know yet, for another group separated from us; some of us may be in that group and some of us may not. In other words, we would not be making a decision for ourselves; we would be making a decision for the next group, whatever the composition of that group may be. Third, the public would know in advance. It might want to make it an issue, but I doubt it very much. However, it would not be an issue which will be raised during the life of a Parliament for that specific Parliament but it would be an issue in relation to the following one. The public would know, the candidates would know, and there would be no element of surprise. I had hopes that this bill would contain a clause which would permit those who wish to do so to continue under the present regime until the end of the life of this Parliament. In other words, in doing so there would have been an element of choice and a possibility of option. Those who want to continue this regime would be able to do so, and would therefore have a choice. Those who want to have a change, would have the alternative. I regret that this clause has not been included. I would not say that this is the entire picture that I would like to give in my reasoning. There is also one element that has to do with timing. It seems to me that this is not exactly the most appropriate time in relation to what is going on in our economy.

To summarize, Mr. Speaker, my position is that I cannot support this bill. I do support the concept, the principle of one Parliament deciding the income of the next Parliament. As I mentioned before, this is not the first and it may not be the last time when MPs debate their own salaries. Each time it is no fun to see this issue come along this way, no matter on which side of the issue one stands. The concept of accountability, the concept of timing and of the option, are all related to this basic principle of one legislature deciding for the following.

I should like to conclude by saying that like all my colleagues in this House, I enjoy the parliamentary work. I enjoy the conditions under which I am allowed to work and I regret very much not being able to support the majority of my colleagues in this project.

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this pay and pension bill which has seen the light of day in this House this afternoon, hence my handwritten notes, rather hastily put together.

Neither I, nor anyone in this House, has had a chance to inspect and calculate the cost of this pay and pension bill. I find that a very uncomfortable position from which to debate any legislation in the House.

I am certain that the pensioners who are waiting for their cheques and the small business owners who are watching their businesses atrophy, will not be impressed at the way we suddenly sneaked this bill in and will pass it in the course of six hours over other much more important legislation. I am particularly appalled by the callous disregard of cost associated with the bill, especially in the pension provision. It would have been far better to split pay from pension so that we could have responsibly investigated and debated them individually. Although they are linked, I intend to deal with them separately.

Let me begin with the pay portion and the increases for members. I will say at the outset, that while many of my colleagues have made eloquent speeches in defence of a pay increase and I agree with many of the points, this is a debatable bill and many of those points are debatable.

I regret very much having to speak against the personal and family interest of many members, as they are perceived by them. Perhaps I should say that it is my former colleagues I will be speaking against when tomorrow morning comes around. Indeed, I could have restrained myself from speaking against the bill at all had we simply been debating a pension bill. Let me dispassionately attempt to offer the counter view on some of the reasons advanced by my colleagues for the pay increase. I had intended to discuss the arguments of hard work, long hours, exposure to public ridicule, maintaining two homes, the fact that higher pay would provide better members of Parliament and all that sort of thing, but some of my recent colleagues and speakers here tonight have made the case for me, so I will not waste the time of the House on that.

Let me deal with a couple of arguments to the effect that this pay increase is needed in order to compensate MPs in a manner commensurate with private sector professionals, and that MPs provide a valuable service and do a most important job of running the country. At the risk of seeming to be facetious and cynical, let me examine some of these points.

The comparison with the private sector income and the quality of service in running the country can, I think, be dealt with together. It is true that executive pay is generally greater than that of an MP but, private sector salaries and pay scales are based on the achievement of results. Much has been made today about the activity of members of Parliament. If we are being paid for being busy, or being inconvenienced, or being bothered by the public at any time of the day or night, or for the discomfort in travelling, or all the other arguments, then the public is certainly getting a bargain if we are paid by the hour. But if we are being paid for results, as in the private sector, then I submit there is little justification for a pay increase based on this Parliament's results.

One of my colleagues has argued that individual members have not made claims to control inflation or hold down interest rates or support the value of the Canadian dollar or hold down the price of gasoline, and therefore they cannot be held responsible for failure in these areas. This, I submit, is a specious argument at best. The government certainly did claim it would do these things and every member was a spokesman and a mouthpiece for those claims with his constituents; ipso facto, every member here, whether elected to the government side or not, made or implied such a claim by virtue of running for Parliament at a fee which was known in advance.

Let us look at the one and one third year record of the government, its members and all of us, to see whether we justify and deserve the $9,000 per year pay increase reward for performance for meeting the obligations and promises in the contractual arrangement we made with the public of Canada.

The price of gasoline which was $1.07 per gallon when we were elected, is now $1.60, which is way over the guaranteed maximum. Interest rates on election day were running at 14 per cent but today they are 5 per cent higher, at over 19 per cent. The value of the Canadian dollar was 86 cents on the U.S. dollar on February 18, 1980 but today it is down to below 83 cents on the U.S. dollar. Inflation was running at 9.5 per cent then, is today running at 12.3 per cent and tomorrow we will hear the latest news on that. I submit that does not justify a pay increase at all.

We could look at other economic indicators or yardsticks but I think these are as important as any and will serve. You will agree, Mr. Speaker, that they represent the total failure of this Parliament to achieve the objectives claimed. This does not warrant the reward of a huge pay increase. I suggest that the government side should be penalized by the amount of inflation, not rewarded by its failure to deal with it.

What other Canadians have the opportunity to redress their absolute job failure or to relieve themselves of the burden of high prices by giving themselves an offsetting pay increase? I have heard the argument that inflation cannot be controlled, that it is imported, that it is inevitable, etc. ad nauseam. I suggest that a government which has paid attention to the development of Canadian industry and Canadian production and Canadian jobs over the years would now be seeing the results of sound industrial strategy. These results would have had Canada importing less foreign goods and, therefore, less foreign inflation. We would be producing more domestic goods made from Canadian natural resources and therefore eliminating, to a large degree, the cost of imported inflation. Even if we were importing inflation from our principal trading partner, the United States, that might be a benefit. Their inflation is only two thirds as high as ours.

Even if we do not accept the argument that inflation can be controlled, let me ask; if members of Parliament with the federal government cannot control inflation, who can? This large increase and this increased indexing of both pay and expense allowance will give government members no incentive at all to fight vigorously on behalf of senior citizens, mortgaged home owners, small business people and the people who drive cars and heat homes.

I can just imagine myself going back to my constituents explaining to them how I am down here battling inflation, battling high interest rates on their behalf, while I vote myself an unwarranted—and that is unwarranted by results—pay increase.

Let me now deal with the real issue as I see it, namely pensions. The pension program is a very costly item. This proposal is the most unparliamentary and irresponsible action by a spendthrift government. The government House leader (Mr. Pinard) said earlier that consultation among the parties had preceded the introduction of this bill. That is true. But he neglected to mention that no details had ever been given, certainly not to this party. Indeed, I have never seen any. No discussion with members with regard to detail or cost preceded this debate. We are seeing the bill for the first time today and I consider that irresponsible. No expenditure measure should ever be debated and passed without a detailed examination, in this case a detailed study of the actuarial soundness.

A government which has brought us a $15 billion annual deficit is certainly not one to be looked to for calculating in advance the cost of such an expensive program at the expense of the taxpayer. Surely it would not have been too much to have asked the government chief actuary to inspect. He was not consulted, nor was the superintendent of insurance for Canada.

Actuarial figures, such as the return on investment calculation on the funds invested to see how much there will be when payout takes place, have not been studied. If you look at some of the cost comparisons with the private sector, you will see how bad this is. The average cost of a pension plan in the private sector is about 9 per cent of the total lifetime income of the recipient. Even in the best of private sector plans, the cost is about 12 per cent to 15 per cent of the total lifetime earnings of the pension recipient.

If the salary increases with indexing, and the cost of pensions as shown in the McIsaac-Balcer report are carried out, the cost down the road to the government, that is the taxpayer, will be something in the order of 75 per cent of the lifetime earnings of a member of Parliament. That is irresponsible. Even if a member pays 10 per cent out of his own pocket, the government will be picking up something over 70 per cent, with the rest coming from investment. The government forbids anyone else in the country, parliamentarians excluded, from earning more than 2 per cent of their lifetime earnings as a pension. That is the law. This plan allows members of Parliament to have pensions as great as 5 per cent of their lifetime earnings, or 2.5 times the amount allowed to a regular Canadian citizen by law. That pension allowance applies from the day a parliamentarian leaves this place and it carries on until a member reaches the age of 60 at which time the pension becomes indexed. It goes upwards from there.

There has never been an evaluation of the members' pension plan. Even the present plan has never been actuarially studied. How could any responsible or informed member support such extravagance? Any 15-year member of Parliament who votes today on this pension plan provision will be voting himself or herself a $250,000 or more increase of lifetime earnings. That is over and above the $700,000 or so that are put away for him already in the present pension plan. Therefore, a member who has been elected for 15 years will have the value of about $1 million set aside in his or her name as pension funds. That is for regular members. Cabinet members will get much more. Even parliamentary secretaries significantly get more, probably $500,000 more than regular members.

In six hours we are sneaking through a $9,000 pay increase as provided for by the McIsaac-Balcer report which has been cut by one third, which is supposedly a real cutback. The argument was made earlier that what other union or group of Canadian citizens would take less than an arbitrator's recommendation, but I submit that two thirds paid out in full today is better than 100 per cent paid out over four years, if you know anything about 20 per cent money today.

The least we could have done as a government was to consult our two distinguished actuarial former members, one in the Quebec Legislative Assembly and one a former member of this Parliament. They could have looked at this plan on our behalf. Mr. McCrossan was the former member of Parliament for York-Scarborough. Mr. Claude Castonguay is the former minister of health for Quebec and lately is a special adviser to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). As adviser to the minister, Mr. Castonguay helped in an intensive investigation into private sector pensions. If it were so important to have looked into private sector plans, would it not have been useful to have consulted Mr. Castonguay on the massive outlay contemplated here today? If the government had not wanted to consult the private sector people, it could have consulted Mr. Walter Reise, chief actuary. He is knowledgeable about RCMP pensions and other public service pensions. He has the computer and the program ready to go, yet he has not been consulted.

How can we study the private sector to death and yet not look even casually into this mammoth expenditure? There is even a federal-provincial conference set up for September to look into the private sector. We are not rushing into that in any six hours.

I implore the government to separate these two items of pay and pensions so that Parliament can inspect the costs and the ramifications of this actuarially unsound and unethically large pension which cannot even be provided under the law to the ordinary citizens.

Finally, let us recognize that by providing such an inordinately large pension after 15 years, an MP will be better off if he or she retires from Parliament, then collects a pension of 75 per cent of the best six years and takes another job. So much for keeping skilled parliamentarians working and getting better members of Parliament.

The government of today does not know and cannot know how many members will retire, will be defeated, how long they will serve or how long they will live an draw pensions, in some cases along with their spouse. So the costs of output cannot be controlled and have not been actuarially studied. Only the input amounts are known.

I intend to vote against this vast and irresponsible disregard of public funds, this unwarranted squandering of the dollars of the citizens of Canada for the benefit of government members of Parliament who are not carrying out their jobs successfully on behalf of the citizens they are sworn to serve. I hope other members will have both the conscience and the good business sense to vote against it as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I would like first to break down to some of the arguments just made by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Gilchrist). I do not know how much schooling he had, but when he states that two thirds now are better than 100 per cent in three years, I think that he should figure it out for himself, and he would then see that, in view of the indexation, this amounts instead to 26 per cent less than what is recommended by the report of the McIsaac-Balcer Committee. He should learn some arithmetic.

Second, I would like him to note, with regard to his arguments against the pension fund, that the average term of office of a member of Parliament is four and a half years, and that to be eligible for pension, a member of Parliament has to remain in office for six years. When the average term of office is between four and a half and five and a half years and when the first condition to receive a pension is to have remained in office for six years, he can certainly not maintain that this system will favour a certain elite. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if we consider the problem objectively, we can see that a real problem exists because we are all human and no union in Canada would have agreed to settle for an increase of 4.4 per cent in seven years.

One of my colleagues on this side of the House argued that he knew what his salary would be when he agreed to be a candidate. I remember what went on when I was with labour negotiating collective agreements. When I first got a job, I accepted the first offer that the employer made to me. A year later, I was president of the union and I wanted a higher salary for myself and for the others. I therefore think that it is unrealistic to maintain that we entered politics with full knowledge of the conditions and that we must now live with them.

I would like to give a few examples for the benefit of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He quoted the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at the beginning of his comments. For my part, I would like to quote Plato, who was a great philosopher and a great politician. Plato said that politics must live with honour. Those who know me will say that it is unusual for me to quote Plato. I especially want to remind the hon. member that Plato was somewhat older than he is and that values have changed as well as practical realities.

When my hon. colleague first came to Parliament I had not even been born. I am sure things have changed since then. I am sure as well that things have been happening outside this House and there are times when I would urge him to go outside a little more often. As to those whose conscience prompts them to speak sincerely against the increase as proposed, I do invite them to get in touch with my office, for I am quite sure that they will find poor people in my riding who will be willing to accept the salary increases which those members find indecent today. I will be pleased to spread it among my electors. In that sense, one must be honest with everybody here. The salary increase we are about to vote for ourselves a little later is quite realistic. We simply have to look at Quebec right now where welders earn $1,300 a week—and they are on strike. They want $2,000 a week. Multiply that by 52 and you get $104,000. Those are today's facts of life.

When we came into politics, we wanted to serve the public. We also liked it and were willing to do it. But that does not mean that today we should try to belittle the role of member of Parliament because I for one believe that refusing to give a member of Parliament a decent salary is tantamount to belittling his role. That is quite all right for those who can manage to survive on $4,000 a year or who are so well off that they do not know what it is to be broke. We would then find ourselves within a group of wealthy people and a closed circle of millionaires who will be able to pay their own way, sit here and say: "Yes, we are working because it is an honour".

Mr. Speaker, I see nothing wrong in the fact that men and women in this House decide to accept a proposal which is less generous than the one recommended by an independent committee. I am saying this to you and I say it in front of all my colleagues here: I would have liked to get much more. I would have liked us to accept the Balcer report recommendations because he himself said in his report that those were minimum levels; and yet, keeping in mind the economic rather than the political situation, we have already agreed that perhaps it might be more normal to cut that increase by one third. I do not know many people who have offices and who work outside the House, who would go along with a cut of perhaps one third in their income.

Also, Mr. Speaker, I do not feel ashamed to take part in the vote tonight, because I think that next year the average salary of national league baseball players will be $383,000. Although we have a great athlete, Mr. St-Jean, among us, I think that those guys may be a bit overpaid. One thing is certain, Mr. Speaker, the people here work almost round the clock first to get elected but foremost to try and improve the lot of those whom they represent.

Imagine, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Prime Minister will get to be paid—the Prime Minister is now paid $67,000 and the Leader of the Opposition $53,000 and yet there are welders, as I was saying, who earn $1,300 a week and who are on strike because they want $2,000—as I was saying the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition will get substantially less than that despite the fact that their responsibilities are considerably greater. I think that in 1981 we have to be able to face facts and to make it possible for members of Parliament to work within the system.

I would like to go back to the pension system, Mr. Speaker. I know a member—and I am serious—who, when he came here, drove a Jaguar. Today he drives a small foreign car. Some members here were set up in practice and doing really well, their businesses were flourishing, but now they cannot do both, that is work as a member of Parliament and maintain their law practice or their business. What is wrong with wanting some security? A lawyer who leaves a good practice and who spends 10 or 15 years of his life here would have great difficulty, if he was defeated, adjusting and building up a clientele in order to enjoy the same standard of living he had before entering politics. To those who argue that the salaries of $40,000 proposed here today are indecent, I would say that some of our provincial counterparts earn more. In Quebec, for example, MLAs will be getting $49,000 as of next September.

I also remind the House that we recently voted a salary increase for judges which made their salaries jump from $50,000 to $72,000 a year. Why? Because we know they need it to do their job. There is nothing dishonest in that. There is nothing wrong in wanting a decent salary because decent salary helps one to do one's job and I think that the people who voted us into office expect from us first rate work.

We could give numerous examples. In the labour force and among professionals salaries are considerably higher than the one proposed here today. If I were to figure out the hourly salary of a member of Parliament, I am sure that some provinces would consider it illegal because it would be less than minimum wage. Of course, some will say: In my riding, my MP is not worth that much! This is what I would like to tell the people: Do you know how much your MP costs you? Your MP costs you about 25 to 30 cents a year. If my colleagues feel they are not worth 25 cents, I wonder what they are doing here. They have no respect for their constituents if they feel they are not worth a quarter.

Considering that, the work of a member is far from being an easy one. My hon. colleagues from the east should consider for a moment that our western friends have to log six hours of flying time to come and sit here five days a week and then go back to their ridings to carry on their work there. Think of our friends from the other provinces who have two homes and have to bring up their children by telephone. Yes, that is right: several hon. members in this House raise their families over the phone. That is how their families are raised.

I ask the people to think of that, to have a second look at the role and work of members of parliament. I say to the Canadian people that it is no easy task for us to sit here in judgment and vote ourselves an increase, being both our own judges and employers. It is no easy job and that is why it was decided to have an independent commission look into the whole problem. That commission recommended an increase spread over a three-year period to up to $45,000. After discussions with all the parties, it was decided, not because of the present political situation, not because it was feared we would not get re-elected, but because of the economic situation, to reduce that proposal by a third. And here again I say: those who maintain that two thirds of that increase today, as opposed to three thirds in three years from now, is a better proposition, are wrong. I beg of them to figure it out. The last proposal represents a net decrease of 26 per cent as compared with the recommendation of the independent McIsaac-Balcer Commission. That is what it boils down to. In other words, today we are accepting a cut in salary. Had I been there, had I still been president of the union, I would never have accepted a cut in salary for the union members I was representing. I would not be ashamed to go to my constituents and to tell them: "Yes, ladies and gentlemen, I took part in the debate, because I thought I was worth that much money and if you do not agree, since we live in a democratic country, when the time comes, I am sure that you will know what to do."

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask all my colleagues, all those who are against this bill, to stop believing that everyone here is rich or a millionaire. Already in our constituencies, some people think that we earn $50,000, $60,000 or $70,000 per year. In addition, seven years ago, when a bill was introduced to provide for a salary increase, some people thought that we had got three increases. The bill had been tabled on first reading and the next day it was mentioned in the newspapers, so there was the first increase. A second increase on second reading and when the vote was taken on third reading, they believed that a third increase had been granted.

I say to those same people that, since 1974 when the last increase was granted, hon. members' income has in fact increased by 4.4 per cent. Such are the facts. In a democratic society for professional and labour groups some catching up is in order and it was done. It is merely a slight catching up. I thank the Opposition House leaders. I thank the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) who did a lot of work on this. I also thank all my colleagues, especially the member for Quebec East (Mr. Duquet) for his efforts to come up with what I consider a decent minimum salary which will enable us to carry out some decent work and not to "fill our pockets", as some people suggest but on the contrary to continue to provide first rate service to those who have put their trust in us.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, this is a very difficult debate for any member to intervene in. I think those of us who have been here for several years ought to take a moment to reflect that we have been through this before. The Hon. Mitchell Sharp, as president of the Privy Council, introduced a similar type of bill on December 17, 1974, and he said at that time:

—one of the most distasteful tasks for any minister is to take the lead in proposing a bill which, among other things, increases his own salary as a member of parliament and as a minister.

He was followed in that debate by a member who is well remembered and revered in this House, the great Ged Baldwin, who preceded the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) as the House leader for the Conservatives, and he said at that time:

We are faced here with a vexing, difficult and contentious problem, that of how to persuade people to come to this House or to become members of legislatures and do the job that they should do.

Mr. Baldwin at that point added:

All over the world the light of freedom is flickering in face of the strong winds of violence and intimidation, of attempts to secure a government of the people by other than democratic means. Let us not delude ourselves.

I see the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) is here tonight. He made a distinguished contribution to that debate, which continued on into the early part of the next year, and he said at that time:

—I suppose no member of parliament is likely to earn the undying favour of the public by speaking in favour of this bill, but the act is that the bill as it is now before us, and with possible future modifications, is not only one which would provide justice to hon. members of this House and the other place but it is also a bill which would safeguard the public interest.

That is what this debate is about today, the public interest.

There are only a few moments left in this debate. I hope the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) will have an opportunity to make his contribution. In speaking to support this bill I only want to tell the government House leader that it is time members of Parliament ended this business of having to stand in the House to speak about and vote on a subject of such clearly vested interest. It is time for the government to be serious about bringing in a measure that would enable the setting up of an independent tribunal following an election, not just a tribunal of former members to advise and recommend as the McIsaac-Balcer report does, which report I support.

● (2140)

I think the government House leader, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have done a distinguished job in bringing to this House the recommendation that we will vote on in a few moments, a recommendation which is two thirds of the McIsaac-Balcer report. I say it is time members of Parliament stopped having to vote on such a measure in which they have a vested interest. Let us have a tribunal empowered to set the standards for future parliamentarians. That is what we need. I suggest to you, sir, and the other distinguished leaders in this Parliament that we need a tribunal headed by a judge, and will include a representative of labour, of management, a former parliamentarian and perhaps others, whatever is considered appropriate.

This tribunal would be empowered by a future Parliament to set the standard, and we would no longer have this distasteful job. It is not a pleasant thing for members to have to rise in this debate. I spoke to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton privately about this measure and he knows where I stand. I come here now and say publicly in support of what I said to him privately as a member of this House for nine years, with some experience, and as a father of five children, three of whom were in college at the same time, and as one who attempts to devote his full time to being a member of Parliament, but as one who does not dare to complain. I consider it an honour to walk onto this floor every day that Parliament is assembled. However, at the same time we have to recognize the realities of life.

I say to you, sir, it is absolutely essential that members of Parliament can continue to come here in a full-time capacity and not have to depend on previously acquired wealth in order to maintain their existence in this place. This, sir, is a place of the commoners. A former leader of this party, the great Robert Stanfield, used to say: "You have to remember, this is a place of the commoners". I say to you, Mr. Speaker, if you want that to continue, you must enable people of ordinary means to come into this establishment and stay here.

I think this reasonable proposition put forward tonight by the combined endeavours of the House leaders has enabled us to come to this point where we are about to vote, and as distasteful as this vote is, let us proceed with it. I am looking down the road to a younger generation and I want people to be able to come in here, people who have some beliefs and who want to be able to stay here. I think it is absolutely essential for world order, for the wellbeing of Canadians and for the democratic system that we have a system of fair compensation, which is not by any means rewarding—and we know that the McIsaac-Balcer recommendations are not rewarding; they are compensatory. We say it is essential to maintain that kind of fair, equitable and stable system, not on behalf of the members who happen to be here now, but for those who will be here in the future. That is the reason I have come here tonight to make this address.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being 9.45 o'clock, pursuant to order made earlier this day, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forth every question necessary to dispose of all stages of Bill C-83. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council) moved that the bill he read the third time and do pass.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Pinard) which was agreed to on the following division:

Madam Speaker: Far be it from me to want to anticipate the adjournment of the House, but I thought this evening was as good a night as any to have a reception for hon. members in Room 16.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: The House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 10.19 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

INDUSTRY

IMPACT OF WINE IMPORTS ON CANADIAN INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas lower-priced imports have, within the last few months, increased by 11 per cent and the market for Canadian wine products has declined by 6 per cent; whereas foreign subsidies on one side and weighted tax measures on the other threaten the serious erosion and the potential collapse of the Canadian wine industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Haldimand-Norfolk (Mr. Bradley):

That the Ministries of Agriculture, Revenue, and Industry, Trade and Commerce combine their resources in an investigation of the serious injury being done the Canadian wine industry from low-priced imports, which, in the instance of one country, borders on dumping.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

OMISSION OF REFERENCE TO ENVIRONMENTAL RIGHTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Yesterday, during debate on a motion by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), speakers from all parties supported the principle of an environmental bill of rights. Since the Minister of the Environment himself supported the motion during his speech, and since the same minister has special responsibilities connected with the government's constitutional resolution, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That the Minister of the Environment explain fully to the House why the government's proposed bill of rights, while addressing almost every other subject under the sun, contains not a single reference to environmental rights.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

MINISTER CONGRATULATED ON EFFORTS TO INCREASE FUNDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of this House to put a motion on an urgent matter.

Since the Government of Canada yesterday approved an additional increase of $20 million in the budget of the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, which means a 23.9 per cent increase with the inclusion of amounts already granted, and since the cabinet approved the major policies in the five-year plan proposed by the National Research Council, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Montreal-Mercier (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette):

That the House congratulate the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) for these major initiatives which will increase to 1.5 per cent the portion of the gross national product allocated to research and development.

Madam Speaker: It is not customary to congratulate ministers for what they do.

HUMAN RIGHTS

SOUTH AFRICAN APARTHEID—THREAT TO 1982 COMMONWEALTH GAMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, this motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 concerns a forthcoming tour of New Zealand by a South African rugby team. It may therefore sound frivolous, but I assure the House it is not. Unless the tour is cancelled, a Black African boycott of next year's Commonwealth Games in Australia is a distinct possibility.

S.O. 43

In 1966 both Canada and New Zealand signed the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, which obliges the signing nations to refrain from engaging in such exchanges with South Africa. Under Article 22 of the Convention, if any signator to the agreement participates in such an exchange, any other signator to the agreement can apply to the World Court in The Hague for interim protection or injunction against such a tour.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That Canada support the objections to the proposed tour by the New Zealand Human Rights Commission and give this racist issue international exposure by seeking an injunction at The Hague.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PORTS

DELAY IN SIGNING CONTRACT FOR WORKS AT PRINCE RUPERT, B.C.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, arising from the reported two-month delay in the awarding of the contracts for the causeway access and site preparation at the Port of Prince Rupert. The tenders closed on July 7, 1981. The two-month delay will mean that work will not commence until September, when adverse weather conditions will surely delay the completion of this important project. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the Minister of Transport personally intervene so the work may begin immediately on this long promised facility at the Port of Prince Rupert.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VIA RAIL

SUGGESTED DEFERMENT OF PROPOSED CUTBACKS IN SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the government's intention to reduce rail passenger service drastically in this country simply by cabinet edict and without the consideration of the Canadian Transport Commission, and since this will seriously affect millions of Canadians and numerous communities, particularly in those areas where adequate alternative services are not available, and since VIA Rail was never properly constituted through the parliamentary process as determined by the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Statutory Instruments, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That the government defer any passenger service cutbacks and that a VIA Rail Canada Act be presented to this House in the fall at which time its mandate, objectives and regulatory mechanism and route structure can be fully debated and considered by Parliament.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ENERGY

IMPERIAL OIL PROJECT AT COLD LAKE, ALTA.—STATEMENT MADE BY MINISTER OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas Imperial Oil spokesman Glenn Rainbird said yesterday, "Despite Imperial's continued interest in the Alberta oil sands, it will take two years to get the Cold Lake project back on track, if it is resurrected", and whereas, in an interview on "Canada AM" this morning, Mr. Arden Haynes, president of Esso Resources Canada Limited, Calgary, said it will be 18 months to two years before Imperial would be able to reassemble its research and work teams in order to restart development at Cold Lake which was suspended yesterday, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That this House direct the very righteous Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to retract this statement of yesterday that the postponement at Cold Lake does not mean a delay of up to two years, or that he stand in his place and tell this House who is telling the truth, the spokesmen for the company or the minister.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUS OF WOMEN

ACTION TO INCREASE FEMALE REPRESENTATION IN HOUSE OF COMMONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Al MacBain (Niagara Falls): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the participation of women in politics, commerce and the professions for more than 1,000 years has been and remains unequal when compared to that of men; and whereas this state of affairs will tend to continue unless and until the representation of women in the seats of political power is more or less equal to that of men; and whereas, in the troubled times that lie ahead, for selfish reasons alone, if not for the noblest of reasons, it is imperative that we no longer perpetuate a system which tends to prevent about one-half of our people from entering the mainstream of modern society; and whereas it is acknowledged that any new program for equalization must take account of input from the grassroots level of all political parties, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mercier (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette), and supported by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean) and the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That this House unanimously accept, in principle, that it is necessary to take some innovative, direct and adequate action now to promote equal representation of women in the House of Commons by the year 1995 and that, to this end, the government be asked to appoint forthwith an all-party parliamentary task force of four women and three men to conduct an in-depth study of the matter and to prepare a report which shall delineate a course of action to promote the desired result, and that the report be tabled in this House on or before June 30, 1982.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is writing a book. Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

POST OFFICE

RECOMMENDATION THAT GOVERNMENT MOVE TO SETTLE POSTAL STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, in view of the disastrous effect the postal strike is having generally on the Canadian public and specifically on the small business and agricultural sector, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That the government immediately proceed to obtain a settlement so that the Canadian public will have this essential mail service restored.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CABINET CONSIDERATION OF CHILDREN'S NEEDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a very urgent matter. In view of the fact that it is 18 months since the International Year of the Child and thousands more babies have been born into poverty, children at risk have reached school age and adolescence and many are now beyond help, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Prime Minister allocate a cabinet meeting to discuss the priority needs of Canada's children and that recommendations from the reports presented to the health and welfare committee and tabled in this House on Wednesday be discussed, in particular the recommendation

(1) to establish a children's bureau,

(2) action to appoint a minister to be responsible for children, and,

(3) action requiring all federal departments concerned with children to act on the recommendations of these reports.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

CONGRATULATIONS TO ORGANIZERS OF 1981 CANADIAN SUMMER SPECIAL OLYMPICS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a motion to move under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on which I have consulted with all parties. The city of Ottawa will be hosting the 1981 Canadian Summer Special Olympics from July 16 to July 19. Seven hundred fifty mentally retarded athletes from across Canada will be competing in track and field, swimming, bowling, and floor hockey. I believe the House should encourage these special games and, if that is the case, I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), and I know as well by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House congratulates the sponsors and organizers of the 1981 Canadian Summer Special Olympics and extends its best wishes to the competitors for success at these games and at the subsequent International Games in 1983.

Madam Speaker: I am sure members of the House will want to express those sentiments by their applause.

COMBINES

URANIUM CARTEL—ADVICE TENDERED BY MR. JUSTICE DAVID HENRY

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice in his capacity as the Attorney General of Canada. We now know, on the admission of the Prime Minister, that the government became aware in 1975 that the uranium cartel could be impacting or, indeed, could have the effect of fixing prices in Canada. We know as well that the combines investigation did not start until two years later. Did Mr. Justice David Henry, in his capacity as director of combines, offer advice to the government to the effect that one of the consequences of the international cartel could be the fixing of prices in Canada and, hence, the breaching of the Combines Investigation Act? Did he get that advice? We know that at least one of the client groups of the cartel received similar advice from Mr. Justice Willard Estey when he was in practice, and if that advice was given to the government, what action, if any, did the government take?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I do not know any facts on this question. I have received, as I said, a report from Mr. Bertrand, who, with some lawyers, studied this problem for three or four years. They have made a recommendation to me. As I have said earlier to the House, I have accepted the recommendation of Mr. Bertrand. I have hired the same lawyers he hired, and I have initiated actions in the court on the cartel and on the illegality, if there was some, and now the matter is before the court to be decided.

On the question of the advice from Mr. Henry, who was the director before Mr. Bertrand, I do not have any knowledge of it, and it is not related to the accusations which are before the court and which have to be disposed of by the court in the future.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, the minister seems to be very selective in what he remembers and what he does not remember.

ACTIONS OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a supplementary question. In terms of the charges which have been laid and considering the fact that one of the two named unindicted co-conspirators was an assistant deputy minister in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, did the minister in his capacity as Attorney General satisfy himself that the deputy minister and the former minister were not involved in this conspiracy? Indeed, it is inconceivable that an assistant deputy minister would act without the advice and consent of his deputy and his minister.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I am satisfied that there was an inquiry which lasted for four years and that there was a report to Mr. Bertrand, who made a report to me. I have hired the same lawyers, and both Mr. Bertrand and these lawyers, who are the special prosecutors in the case, have recommended to me that action be taken against six companies, and I have done that. The unindicted co-conspirators are not indicted, so that means they have not been guilty of anything, according to that report. They have been named. This is not unprecedented. In three other cases before, there was the same type of classification of unindicted co-conspirators. It is a technique which has been used in these cases in order to facilitate the development of cases before the court. However, when you are named like that you are not a conspirator and you are not an accused. I am satisfied the report of the investigators is thorough, and I have accepted their recommendation.

REQUEST FOR RELEASE OF BERTRAND REPORT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, those who are sitting in jail convicted and sentenced for conspiring in the dredging scandal will draw very little consolation from what the minister is saying. But the minister can help himself and the House by releasing the report. Given the fact that the "gag" rule was put in place to protect Canadians and Canadian corporations from United States law, and that these individuals and corporations can now no longer claim the legal principle of coming to the court for protection with clean hands, why does the minister not now lift the "gag" rule since these people it was intended to protect are now charged under the Combines Investigation Act? Why does he not lift the "gag" rule and release the Bertrand report? Otherwise we could draw only one conclusion, that is, that the minister wants to cover up why they did not act between 1975 and 1977.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member uses exaggerations in his language quite regularly, but I should like to say that I explained to the House some time ago that the "gag" rule does not apply to Canadian cases within the Canadian law. There was a ruling on that by the appeal division of the Federal Court. I quoted the case a few days ago. If the hon. member looks back at the record, he will see that I said that, according to my judgment, if some of those documents can be used in the court the "gag" rule would not apply because it is not in relation to international jurisdiction but it is within Canadian jurisdiction. That is the advice I have.

When the case will be in front of the court, the lawyers will make their case, the judges will rule, and the government will be faced with the problem at that time. But I think the "gag" rule was applied so that the Canadian documentation would not be used in other nations against the Canadian interest.

PROVISION OF LEGAL COUNSEL FOR OFFICIALS NAMED IN BERTRAND REPORT

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Minister of Justice. It relates to the uranium cartel. There is a widespread belief across the country that the Attorney General, in the terms of laying his charges, is in effect hanging out public servants to dry, so to speak, and not possibly fulfilling his responsibility of having joined or named as unindicted co-conspirators other people who had positions of political responsibility. In the interests of determining exactly where the government stands with respect to these public servants who were in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, reporting to a deputy minister and to a minister who is no longer with us, does the government intend to engage counsel on behalf of Mr. MacNabb and Mr. Runnalls for the purpose of the hearings and of the information and the charges which were laid against the alleged conspirators in the cartel case? Will the government be providing counsel for these people?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I have not received any such request, but Mr. MacNabb and Mr. Runnalls have not been accused. They are not accused. I do not know whether they need some legal advice. I have not received any request from them. They have been named as unindicted co-conspirators, a technique which has been used in three different cases before. This is the first time that there are public servants in that position. I want to repeat that they are not accused. If they are requesting some legal advice of me—and I have not received any such request—I will certainly study the case.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR ACTIONS OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I am sure that the people who are named in this particular information will take very little comfort from the position taken by the Minister of Justice. In other words, he is not quite sure what he will do with respect to providing counsel. This only goes to underline the fact that they are being hung out to dry.

With respect to the Bertrand report, the minister will know with his legal training that it is one of the items in which demand for particulars could be obtained in the criminal proceedings. In fact the prospect is that the report could be public in the course of these proceedings. Why does the minister not allow the Bertrand report to be made public? Why does he continue to keep this matter under wraps? Why does he insist, for example, on not having the matter reviewed by the attorneys general of the provinces, independent of counsel who helped prepare the report and who naturally will have a particular interest with respect to the kinds of charges which are laid?

There is a principle here of ministerial responsibility, which the minister does not understand, traditional to our parliamentary system. The minister must take responsibility for the acts of public servants. What is the minister's position with respect to—

Mr. Lalonde: What about the rights of the defendants?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —Messrs. MacNabb and Runnalls? Did they act without the authority of the government, or is it the position of the government that they acted with authority?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): I will have a little bit of a problem in replying to all those statements, but I would like to say that I have been discharging my responsibility as Attorney General. It is a quasi judicial capacity, as was stated by Senator Flynn when he appeared in front of the committee at the time the other side was forming a government. In the matter of transportation, when there was some argument about consultation with ministers and so on, he took full responsibility, as I am doing.

The Bertrand report is the documentation that will be used by the prosecutors in court in terms of evidence. At that time, according to the inquiry lawyers, they will use some elements of that material to make sure they win their case against the six corporations indicted. I do not want to jeopardize the position of the prosecutors in that case. That is their case, they will handle it in the courts. Some or all of it will be in front of the courts; but it is their case. It is like any other report from the police or reports in other cases of a similar nature in the past. These reports are for the Crown to use in their prosecution, and I will keep it that way.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL STRIKE—COMPOSITION OF GOVERNMENT NEGOTIATING TEAM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. As the whole country knows, on Monday we will have experienced two weeks of a postal strike which has been a great inconvenience to the country, has meant a great financial loss particularly to small businessmen, and most of all has adversely affected the workers involved because they experience a total loss of income.

Since the striking workers have made a significant conciliatory gesture by stating they would go back to the bargaining table right away if the government has Mr. Michael Warren join its negotiating team—that is the only condition now—I ask the minister is the government prepared today, as an important step to getting the postal service running again, to agree to that request?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, first let me say that I know we all share concern about the impact the postal strike is having across Canada. I might also say that we have at all times been ready to sit down and negotiate—the team is there—without any preconditions whatsoever. I have of course encouraged Mr. Parrot to do just that.

I might say that I received a letter from Mr. Parrot yesterday which suggested we did not have negotiators with authority at the table. I intended to clarify that with Mr. Parrot, and I had the opportunity of doing so during a telephone conversation yesterday afternoon. I pointed out that no matter who is at the table, they would have the same authority, and our team has the authority to reach a settlement with CUPW. I hoped to satisfy him on that point. I then suggested that we should put repesentatives together to see how the parties could get back at the table, and I specifically named the most senior member of our department in charge of collective bargaining across the public service, Mr. George Orser, for that purpose. I went even further and said we would send Mr. Orser to the bargaining table.

Mr. Parrot called me last night to advise me that this would not be acceptable. I received a letter this morning. He does not make reference to those conversations, but he again indicates he would like to have Mr. Warren at the bargaining table. This puzzles me because Mr. Warren can add nothing to these negotiations and, as I think we all know, there are concerns on our part with respect to having Mr. Warren at the bargaining table. We expressed reservations. We have not yet closed that door, but we are interested in the long-term health of the Post Office and we do not think Mr. Warren's presence at the negotiating table is likely to help that come about.

POSITION TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the postal workers, as everyone who has been following the situation knows, made a major concession when they withdrew their insistence that the conciliation report recommendations be accepted before going back to the bargaining table. That was a major concession by the union involved.

Since Mr. Warren will, in fact, become the new head of the Post Office when it is re-established as a Crown corporation and the postal workers are simply saying have him there taking part in these negotiations, why is the government holding back? Surely we want the postal service restored in the country. The union wants a settlement, obviously, because it has withdrawn a certain precondition. Why is the government so reluctant to be reasonable?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I certainly take issue with that statement. Not only are we being as reasonable and as accommodating as possible in the circumstances—we want to negotiate—but the union wants to negotiate who the negotiator is going to be. Mr. Warren will be the chief executive officer of the Crown corporation. Whether he will elect, at that time, as chief executive officer to go to the bargaining table with all the unions of the Post Office, which would be most unusual, that would be his decision as chief executive officer. The mandate that he would then have would be a mandate that would be established by Mr. Warren, presumably in consultation with his board of directors. But he can only enter these negotiations with the government mandate.

I might say to the Leader of the New Democratic Party that the decision not to send Mr. Warren to the negotiating table is not one I am taking personally as President of the Treasury Board. I have expressed the concerns of the government because the question has been addressed to me. I think it is clear that this is a matter of concern to the government with respect to future operations of the Post Office itself.

REQUEST FOR EARLY DECISION ON PARTICIPATION IN NEGOTIATIONS BY PRESIDENT DESIGNATE OF NEW CROWN CORPORATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, with that in mind I will put a question to the person who is directly responsible, namely, the Postmaster General. I will ask him a related question, because the President of the Treasury Board has once again chosen his words with care. He has not closed the door to Mr. Warren's participation. Considering that, considering the fact that the postal workers would like Mr. Warren in attendance, and considering there is an intended recess coming, we want the negotiations back on track before we all go off to do other things.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: We are not in favour of back to work legislation like some people in this House who preach the right to strike but oppose it once it is exercised.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: We want negotiations.

Mr. Beatty: You got your raise; now you want to go home.

Mr. Broadbent: Is the minister prepared to say that during the course of today the government will reach a final decision as to whether or not Mr. Warren can participate in these negotiations? Will the government make its final decision known before this day passes?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I think it is important, and all members will understand, that we want Mr. Warren to start out with the clearest and nicest possible situation. In my opinion, he ought to get off on the right foot and under the best possible conditions. I would remind hon. members that several unions in the Post Office, including mail carriers, superintendents and postmasters, saw it that way and did not ask for Mr. Warren's assistance at the bargaining table when they signed their collective agreement recently. I deplore that requirement on the part of the inside postal workers but, in a spirit of co-operation and anxious to break the deadlock, my colleague did not close the door. He did not say no, but I think that before saying yes the government would like to have assurances from the postal workers and from Mr. Parrot himself with respect to the true role that Mr. Warren might be expected to play in the next few hours and the next few days.

Unfortunately, in his letter to my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Parrot is much too vague about Mr. Warren's participation and eventual role. And before jeopardizing the significant work which Mr. Warren might do within a few months as head of the new Canada Post Corporation it would be imperative that those points be clarified with Mr. Parrot or one of his spokesmen, as had been suggested by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SALMON FISHING CONFLICT IN QUEBEC—INQUIRY RESPECTING DATE OF MEETING WITH CONCERNED PARTIES

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It deals with the current situation in Quebec with regard to salmon fishing.

As the Prime Minister of Canada has asked that a meeting be held in the fall with the Indians, which invitation the latter have accepted, I myself got in touch with the Attikamek-Montagnais council who have agreed to meet with the Canadian government. The Indians would like the minister to say exactly when this meeting will be held, and who will set the date for it. I should also like to ask the minister to tell us whether there has been any consultation with the Quebec government with a view to dealing directly with the dispute involving the Indians. Again in this connection, Madam Speaker, I should like to know whether or not the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is directly in contact with Quebec Indians concerning that conflict.

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I would say that my officials and staff have been in touch with the chief at Restigouche this morning. He indicated that at this stage he might be prepared to compromise on the situation in some way to resolve this troublesome dispute following his conversation with the Premier of Quebec yesterday. We are keeping in touch with the chief to find out that exact dimensions of his compromise and to ascertain whether over the weekend or at the beginning of next week we might finally find a solution to this matter.

ENERGY

IMPERIAL OIL PROJECT AT COLD LAKE, ALTA.—MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON BLACKMAIL

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday in response to a question regarding the cancellation of the $12 billion Cold Lake heavy oil project, the minister said that the government would not be blackmailed by any oil company. Does the minister believe that Imperial Oil is blackmailing the government? If so, how?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, when I made that statement, I was replying to a member of the Conservative party who asked that we reach an agreement. The implication was that we should be ready to sign any agreement, at any price, at any cost, to get that project back on the rails.

Mr. Epp: No.

Mr. Lalonde: I indicated that we were not ready to do that and that this government will have to bear in mind the interest of Canadian consumers and the interest of all parties concerned. This government is not ready to buckle under any particular threat of suspension or cancellation of any project just to sign anywhere where any particular company would wish us to sign. That is our position and it remains our position. Our interest is to have a fair deal for the producing provinces, for the people of Canada and for the industry, but not any deal.

Mr. Beatty: You are not getting any deal either.

QUERY RESPECTING OIL SELF-SUFFICIENCY TARGET FOR 1990

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I think we all feel the same way about this. But I say to the minister he is blackmailing the people of the country with the negotiating stance that he has taken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: Employment in the manufacturing industry today has fallen by 26,000 jobs. Here is an opportunity to reverse that downward trend and to get jobs back into Ontario and Quebec as a result of this project.

Yesterday the minister also said there is no justification to conclude that the decision announced yesterday meant it would take two years to start the project again. Arden Haynes, president of Esso Resources, said quite specifically on the program "Canada AM" that it would take a year and a half to two years to start the project again. Since the minister clearly misled the House, I ask him today to reserve his position and state clearly that that is the case. Because of the casual attitude which the minister has taken with regard to the cancellation of these huge projects, can he also advise the House whether he believes that the Cold Lake project and the Alsands project are not now necessary in order to achieve oil self-sufficiency by 1990?

• (1140)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I said in the House yesterday that there does not appear to be justification for that conclusion that it would take two years to start the project, certainly not from the discussions I have had with the president of Imperial Oil. What Mr. Arden Haynes said this morning is, indeed, along the same lines.

Mr. Wilson: He said a year and a half to two years.

Mr. Lalonde: That is a minimum—not two years for sure. Maybe another official will come along next week and say maybe it will be nine or 12 months. I have seen this happen before. My statement stands.

As far as "the casual attitude" of the government is concerned, Madam Speaker, I remind the opposition that this government has placed $40 million in this deal in order to ensure that the work would reach a stage where it could be started again as soon as we reach an agreement. This is a contribution which has been made by this government, one which has been greater than anyone else.

As far as the importance of those projects is concerned, we want to pursue all options. We want to make sure as far as possible that every project will contribute to self-sufficiency in this country. That has been our policy. We think that the completion of those tar sands projects will be very helpful in achieving self-sufficiency. But again, I do not think we should be ready to ask the people of Canada to pay any costs which the companies may ask us to pay in order to achieve that end. That is what we are fighting for at the present time. I think the people of Canada support this position rather than the position being put forward by the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SMALL BUSINESS

REQUEST FOR EXPANSION OF SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of State for Finance, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of National Revenue, you would think the economy was booming, Madam Speaker. I therefore address my question to the Minister of State for Small Business.

On Monday of this week the Minister of Finance announced a commitment made by the chartered banks to increase their lending under the Small Business Development Bond program by $800 million. This, of course, was a commitment already made by the Canadian Banker's Association some weeks ago, along with other proposals which the government has refused to consider. Would the minister now make a more meaningful commitment and expand the Small Business Development Bond program to include provisions to finance inventory and receivables for all small businesses, incorporated and unincorporated, keeping in mind the increase to $1.6 billion by the banks, and the banking community's obvious co-operation?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, it is easy to make such suggestions, but I would like to say to the hon. member that an amount of $1.6 billion, such as announced by the Canadian Bankers' Association, is not an insignificant amount which you can dismiss offhandedly by saying that it is not enough. It is certain that there is never enough money to satisfy all the needs which occur at the same time. However, if we add to the $1.6 billion which the banks will make available to small businesses the financial commitments which other financial institutions have already made within the Small Business Development Bond Program, we come to a figure of over $2 billion, Madam Speaker, which will be injected in the Canadian economy for the development of small businesses.

Yesterday morning, during a press conference held by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and the Canadian Bankers Association, Mr. McIntosh indicated that as a result of a survey of the banks in the Association, about $250 million would be allotted specifically to small businesses in financial straits. I believe that these are extremely important measures for small businesses; if well used, these funds will be of great service to this important sector of our economy.

REMITTANCE OF TAXES BY SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, not only is the minister and his government unwilling to reduce the burden of high interest rates on the small business community but the problems of that community have been further compounded by their refusing to deal with the postal strike. Therefore, at this time, will the minister at least take steps to allow small businesses to suspend remittance of employee income tax deductions, pension contributions and UIC premiums until full postal service has been restored? Surely the government cannot stop cash flows on the one hand by allowing the post office strike to continue, while on the other hand continuing to insist on the remittance of funds to the federal treasury by the already hard hit small business sector of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, has already indicated in the House that he would do everything in his power to have refunds sent to individual and corporate taxpayers. My colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, has not only implemented throughout Canada a delivery service for social benefit cheques, but he and this Department would also like to use this system for government purchases from Canadian businesses so that the payments can be made as quickly as possible. I think that it is uncalled for to say that we do not want to settle the postal strike, that it is misleading the House and Canadians, and that it is quite unacceptable. Not only have the President of the Treasury Board and the Postmaster General maintained the negotiating team at all times, but like my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, I am myself in daily contact with the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Canadian Association of Small Businesses and other groups of small businesses in Canada to try to find a way to help them to get through this difficult period.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

RECOMMENDATIONS IN NUFFIELD REPORT RESPECTING POLITICAL APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. As the minister knows, this week he made public the Nuffield report, the report of the working group on conditional release. That group unanimously urged that there should be no further political appointments to the National Parole Board, appointments such as those of former Liberal MPs Gaston Clermont, Prosper Boulanger, and defeated Liberal candidate Anne Cools. Will the minister confirm that, in fact, he received this report in March, well before he reappointed Anne Cools to the National Parole Board in May and well before he appointed defeated Liberal MP. Simma Holt to the National Parole Board in June, ignoring the recommendations of this important working group? Why did he ignore these recommendations and engage in such blatant political pork-barrelling?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, in fact I had received that report. It has been made public for the gathering of public reaction. Anyone who can read the report will see how grossly the hon. member opposite has exaggerated the recommendation of the commission, which merely amounts to a suggestion that there is a danger in having too many political personalities appointed to the parole board. As it happens, I agree with that recommendation.

I point out that out of the 26 full-time members of the parole board only four are former members of Parliament or members of provincial parliaments. I believe the board should contain broad representation of the community point of view. These are former policemen, former prison officials, clergymen, businessmen—the widest possible variety of representation—on the board. As I indicated a few days ago, I am proud of all the members who have been appointed to the board, but particularly of Simma Holt because she is the first woman journalist who ever covered the prison beat. She has written books on prisons. She was one of the principal authors of the McGuigan report, which has been responsible for considerable reform of the penitentiary system in the last few years. I am sure she will do a very good job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): As the Solicitor General has indicated, there are four members with impeccable Liberal credentials on the Board, two of whom were appointed after the minister received this report.

• (1150)

IMPLEMENTATION OF REPORT'S RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Will the minister tell this House how long he intends to consult before he intends to implement the recommendations of this important report for long overdue changes to the judicial relief system in Canada? Will he, at the very least, give this House an assurance that until those consultations are completed there will be no further appointments of a political or quasi-political nature to the National Parole Board, appointments which the working group said can affect the quality of justice delivered by the National Parole Board?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I intend to recommend new members of the National Parole Board as vacancies arise. I would also like to note that the committee itself made no recommendations for an improved or alternative system of appointments. So if I were not to proceed in the way I have so far and look to the report itself, there would be no solution for appointing people.

I think the important consideration is to find individuals of good, sound judgment who can make decisions and guesstimates, in effect, about the possibility of the individuals before them committing more crimes. I hope the public will react quickly to the recommendations contained in that report. There are nearly 100 of them. I hope that in very short order, perhaps a few months, I will be able to form conclusions about the way in which all the recommendations will be dealt with.

AVIATION SAFETY

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS IN DUBIN REPORT

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Several weeks ago the first Dubin report on air safety was released and aviation groups across Canada unanimously called for speedy action on its recommendations. I wonder if the minister can tell us now what progress he has subsequently made to put the Dubin recommendations into practice and to make Canada's air safety system safer?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, there is indeed an amount of urgency in the question because some people have expressed worry about delays in implementing the Dubin report. On the advice of the committee, of insiders and outsiders, for the implementation of the Dubin report, I was in a position a few days ago to recommend to cabinet that it should agree with most of the recommendations of that report on the creation of an independent air safety board. Fortunately, cabinet agreed. We will now proceed to the writing of a longer paper which will be the basis for drafting legislation which we hope will be introduced in the fall to the great satisfaction of all my friends here.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBLE CONFLICT OF INTEREST IN ALLEGED BREACH OF GUIDELINES

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister for National Defence. This concerns the frigate program and the possibility of a conflict of interest in the case of a senior officer moving from being in charge of the patrol frigate program to the position of president of a subsidiary of one of the major bidders. On October 16, 1980, the minister told the House that he had "... asked the Privy Council to co-ordinate the review of the case." I wonder if the minister could tell the House now what the results of the review were, and what action he has taken, if any?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, in the case that the hon. member mentions, I do not remember that any issue or any memo was sent to me regarding a conflict of interest.

ACTION TAKEN BY MINISTER

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, this is an astonishing remark when several billions of dollars worth of contracts are involved and when one of the main movers is in possible conflict of interest. I do not question the integrity or probity of the officer concerned, but I do question the competence of the dunderheads in the Department of National Defence who approved this transfer after the commodore had gone through the routine of applying for sanction. The minister has to accept responsibility for that. I should like to quote to him from the guidelines, which appear to me to have been abridged, as follows:

> An office holder must not ... change sides to act for or on behalf of any person or commercial corporation in connection with any specific proceeding, transaction, case or other matter to which the Government of Canada is a party and in which he had a personal and substantial involvement on behalf of a department or agency of the government.

This exactly describes the case referred to. What is the minister doing about it? I do not accept the fact that he may have told the House months ago that the Privy Council was looking at it and has not bothered to enquire into it again, considering that the contract is being signed today.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, the case mentioned by the hon. member is well known. If he would like to have answers to all the questions he has asked today, he can put a question on the order paper. I cannot give him all the answers here. All I can say is that there was no conflict of interest. It was in accordance with the guidelines that existed at that moment. That is all I can say now. If the hon. member wants more detail about when the individual was engaged, when he took his pension, etc., we could give all those answers on the order paper.

DOMINION CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT

HEARING OF PETITIONS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to either the Minister of Justice or the President of the Privy Council. It relates to the exchange a week ago between myself and the Prime Minister when I raised the question of the implications of the appointment of the then member for Spadina, Mr. Stollery, to the Senate of Canada in a way that might void proceedings before a special court established to see whether Mr. Stollery had been elected legally or illegally. At the time I pointed out that that was a test case which might also call into question the right to sit in this House of the Liberal member of Parliament for Scarborough Centre and the Liberal member of Parliament for Guelph.

At that time the Prime Minister indicated, as reported at page 11173 of Hansard:

> I will certainly consider that suggestion. ... I believe if any minister of this government is involved in that matter, it might be the Minister of Justice or the President of the Privy Council. I will discuss the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition with them.

My suggestion was that the Government of Canada knows that it is in the interest of Parliament to have any question of the legality of the right to sit here of members of Parliament solved very quickly. My suggestion was that the government act very quickly to ensure that the question of the right to sit in Parliament of the Liberal members for Scarborough Centre and for Guelph be proceeded with very quickly. That question has added urgency today because Mr. Stollery now has commenced an action, or an application in the courts of Ontario, to squash the action against—

An hon. Member: Quash.

Mr. Clark: —to render inapplicable the action against him in the special court.

My question to the Minister of Justice or to the President of the Privy Council is, will the Government of Canada act, first, to ensure that the action in the case of Spadina remains open, and second, that the speediest possible priority is given to the constitution of special courts to determine whether the member of Parliament for Scarborough Centre and the member of Parliament for Guelph sit legally in this House of Commons?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): No, Madam Speaker, because the hon. member ought to know that the government is not party to any one of the cases he has mentioned. In the case of Spadina or of the other two ridings, he ought to know that the defendants are the hon. member who was elected, the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada and the returning officers in the ridings involved. The government has absolutely nothing to do with those proceedings.

As far as we are concerned, the Leader of the Opposition can appreciate the fact that, under the circumstances, we can hardly interfere in the judiciary process. I looked into this after he raised that issue the other day. The government did not do anything to speed up the proceedings before the Senate appointment of the hon. member for Spadina. No more than before does the government intend to get involved in the judiciary process.

Now if I may I should like to point out to the Leader of the Opposition that we are not about to settle those proceedings here on the floor of the House, any more than the postal strike. The Leader of the Opposition should know that in this institution we debate subjects but that we do not get involved in the judiciary process, nor do we force our way to the bargaining table when a union has the right to strike. I hope that is perfectly clear.

PROCEDURE FOLLOWED IN NOMINATION OF MR. STOLLERY TO THE SENATE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I will put my supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs since it was rumoured that Mr. Stollery had first sought an ambassadorial appointment before he settled for the Senate—or to whoever is the Acting Prime Minister.

The Acting Prime Minister will know that Section 9 of the House of Commons Act reads as follows:

> No member shall tender his resignation while his election is lawfully contested, or until after the expiration of the time during which it may by law be contested on other grounds than corruption or bribery.

My question to the Acting Prime Minister or whoever responds for the government in cases of this kind is to ask whether that was the reason the very unusual procedure was taken of naming Mr. Stollery to the Senate prior to his resignation from this House and, if that was not the reason, to get around that section of the law in the naming of Mr. Stollery to the Senate, what was the reason for breaking the normal practice and the normal routine which is followed when members of this House are elevated to the other place? Why was a special procedure followed here? Was the simple reason to avoid and evade Section 9 of the House of Commons Act?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, there was no attempt to go against Section 9 of the act referred to by the Right Hon. Leader of the Oppostion. On the contrary, if I may refer the right hon. gentleman to Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons for Thursday, July 2, 1981, he will realize that when we wrote to the Speaker on July 2 we did not tell the Speaker that the hon. member for Spadina at the time had resigned. We advised that he was appointed to the Senate and that therefore his seat was vacated.

For someone who understands the law, this is very clear. There is no breach of Section 9 of the act referred to by the right hon. gentleman. On the contrary, all the procedures were well followed. There was no resignation. Once again I refer the right hon. gentleman to Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons for Thursday, July 2, 1981. If he re-reads the Votes and Proceedings passage to which I am referring him, he will understand that in fact there was no breach of Section 9. On the contrary.

REASON FOR PROCEDURE FOLLOWED

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, what we have here is an admission by the government that it acted under Section 10 in this case, whereas in every other appointment to the Senate, whether it had to do with Senator Muir, Senator Haidasz, or any other senator elevated from the House of Commons in the last ten years, whenever there has been that kind of appointment there has been first of all a resignation from this House. An unusual procedure was followed in the case of Mr. Stollery. He was appointed before he resigned from the House of Commons. Was there some reason for that, other than the fact that following the procedure followed in every other case would have broken the law of Canada under the House of Commons Act?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, that is not an unusual procedure. The Leader of the Opposition is referring to previous cases. It is obvious that in the case of Senator Murray and of Senator de Cotret, those gentlemen could not hand in their resignations since they were not elected members of Parliament. But in Mr. Stollery's case, who was the member for Spadina, we did not follow an unusual procedure, we simply advised the Speaker of the House that he had been appointed to the Senate and that as a result his seat had become vacant. That is quite normal, that was the most appropriate procedure under the circumstances, and I do not think that the Leader of the Opposition is being fair when he refers to precedents because he is proving to me that Messrs. de Cotret and Murray had to resign before being appointed to the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that messages have been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed the following bills: Bill C-81, an Act to amend the Official Residences Act and Bill C-14, an Act to amend the Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities Act, without amendment.

I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill C-83, an Act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Salaries Act, the Parliamentary Secretaries Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, without amendment.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have indicated to the government House leader that I would be asking him a House business question today.

My understanding is that as a first priority we will be dealing with Bill C-82, to amend the Pension Act and the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act. If that is the case, I want to advise my friend that we are prepared to have that bill proceed through all stages here today with one speaker per party, and hopefully it can be passed and be before the Senate before we break for luncheon.

I wonder whether the minister can tell us what his intentions are with respect to this bill and with respect to the legislative program for today and for next week.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, we always keep our word on this side of the House and we will continue to do so. Consequently we will, as indicated very clearly, first introduce Bill C-82. I thank the hon. members for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for having agreed to a short debate on that bill in order to send it to the Senate around 12.45 p.m. so that it may get royal assent as soon as possible. Following passage of Bill C-82, we will keep our word and introduce the motion for adjournment motion of which I gave notice Wednesday last in the hope that such motion, in accordance with an understanding but not a firm agreement last week, will be passed to allow us to adjourn today.

However, if the opposition would rather not adjourn today, we will be considering Bill C-48 at the report stage on Monday.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I rise simply for the purpose of confirming the agreement we made with respect to Bill C-82. The agreement was that we would deal with that bill through all stages today and that there would be only one speaker per party. We stand by that agreement, and we trust that if their Honours in the other place pass it quickly there will be an arrangement for royal assent this afternoon, whatever else happens, so that Bill C-82 can come into effect right away.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the President of the Privy Council a question. He says the government intends to keep its word. He says, "We keep our word". The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources made a deal with the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre, the Conservative energy critic, that the report stage of Bill C-48 would not be proceeded with until the fall. I wonder if the President of the Privy Council could tell the House what has happened to keeping his word on that deal.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the government is keeping its word on that deal. I refer the hon. gentleman to the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works at page 63:5 and page 63:6, where the matter is stated very clearly. The hon. member for Edmonton East asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to be very specific and to make a commitment in the name of the government. The parliamentary secretary said, "Yes, I will speak in the name of the government," and here is what he said:

> I shall undertake that the government will not bring this bill for third reading prior to our recess if this resolution carries your positive support.
> MR. YURKO: Okay.

That is the agreement. What I am saying is that we will be dealing with the report stage of that bill, not with the third reading stage.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made reference to royal assent a little later today. Could the government House leader tell us whether arrangements have been made for royal assent later today?

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, with reference to what the President of the Privy Council just read out, I want to inform the House that in discussions I had with the minister, which were not on the record but between himself and myself, he told me, and his words were, "The bill will not be brought back to the House until the fall". To me, that means it will not be brought back for the report stage until the fall, and so I say to the government House leader that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is not keeping his word by bringing Bill C-48 forward for the report stage today.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I usually believe the hon. member. I was not party to the discussion he had with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but I want it to be on the record that I spoke to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who confirmed to me that the only agreement he made was not to deal with the third reading stage of that bill before fall. I believe both hon. members, but what we will be dealing with on Monday is the report stage of Bill C-48.

NATIONAL CAPITAL ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING INCREASE IN MEMBERSHIP OF COMMISSION

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-637, to amend the National Capital Act (local government representation).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I want first to thank the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) for agreeing to second this motion because he is very interested in the subject as well.

The purpose of this bill is to increase the membership of the National Capital Commission by adding two commissioners who represent local government, that is to say, the chairman of the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton and the chairman of the Outaouais Regional Community. However, because this represents a new financial charge which only a minister of the Crown may initiate, the bill provides that the two local chairmen would serve without any remuneration, allowances or salary.

I would hope, as I said earlier in the House, that at some point the government would adopt this bill as its own.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS

On the order: Government notices of motion.

July 8, 1981—The President of the Privy Council:

That, when the House adjourns on the day this order is adopted, it shall stand adjourned until Wednesday, October 14, 1981, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Madam Speaker, after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Madam Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees or the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in her stead for all the purposes of this order.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I intend to move this motion. It was agreed that when we reached orders of the day, we would first of all consider Bill C-82 and that I would then move the adjournment motion.

ILLEGITIMATE IMMIGRANT CHILDREN

Question No. 2,280—Mr. Herbert:

1. (a) Must the adoption of an illegitimate immigrant child take place before the child is thirteen years old (b) can a child under the age of twenty-one be sponsored as an immigrant by the father?

2. In the past five years, how many governor in council approvals were given to admit to Canada illegitimate children between the ages of thirteen and twenty-one?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration):

1. (a) Yes;

(b) Yes. Under Section 4(b) of the Immigration Regulations every Canadian citizen and every permanent resident may, if he is residing in Canada and is at least 18 years of age, sponsor an application for landing made by his unmarried son or daughter under 21 years of age, provided that child was either born in wedlock or was legally adopted by the sponsor.

2. The Employment and Immigration Department has no readily available statistics on the number of governor in council approvals which were given in the past five years to admit to Canada illegitimate children between the ages of thirteen and twenty-one. To provide this information would require employing additional staff to help search individual files and, in addition to the high cost, it could take a considerable amount of time to answer this question.

MR. GREGORY ARGUE AND MR. ALLAN COULTER

Question No. 2,373—Mr. McKnight:

1. Is Mr. Gregory Argue employed by the Department of Transport or the office of the Minister of State (Canadian Wheat Board) and, if so (a) what are his duties (b) what is his salary and term of employment (c) where is he located (d) what is his relationship to the minister?

2. Is Mr. Allan Coulter employed by the Department of Transport or the office of the Minister of State (Canadian Wheat Board) and, if so (a) what are his duties (b) what is his salary and term of employment (c) is he employed on contract?

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. No.

2. Mr. Coulter is employed on contract by the office of the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, as a special adviser to the minister on the drought situation.

(b) He is paid $106 per day, professional fees, plus expenses. Contract: June 18, 1980, to August 31, 1981.

(c) Yes.

LIDOFLAZINE

Question No. 2,512—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the Department of National Health and Welfare aware that a drug, generic name lidoflazine and trade name Angex, is about to be placed on the market in the United States?

2. Does the government have information with regard to the value of the drug for angina or other heart disorders and, if so, what is the information?

3. Was the drug tested in Canada and, if so, what are its merits?

4. Will the drug be approved for sale in Canada and, if so, on what date?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Yes, but no "approvable" letter has been sent as yet by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA). A committee of experts in the United States recommended approval for use in angina patients who are resistant to other drugs, but asked that further studies be done to clarify a possible adverse effect (abnormal heart rhythm).

2. Yes. A new drug submission is under consideration. A request for additional data was sent to the company in 1979 however no response has been received to date. There has been a change in the last few months in the Canadian sponsor of this drug and this may account for the delay in reply to the department's questions. The department believes that the information submitted was not as complete as that made available to FDA.

3. Yes. Limited studies were done. More precise information is required to substantiate safety and effectiveness in angina.

4. It is impossible to predict at this time if and when lidoflazine will be marketed in Canada.

DILTIAZEM

Question No. 2,513—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the Department of National Health and Welfare aware that a drug, generic name diltiazem and trade name Cardiem, is about to be placed on the market in the United States?

2. Does the government have information with regard to the value of the drug for angina, arrhythmias or other heart disorders and, if so, what is the information?

3. Was the drug tested in Canada and, if so, what are its merits?

4. Will the drug be approved for sale in Canada and, if so, on what date?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. No. Diltiazem is under consideration by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA). According to the information available that agency has no definite projected date for approval as yet.

2. Yes. Preliminary data are available to us as part of the preclinical submission and published reports. This information indicates probable effectiveness in angina and arrhythmias. Further studies are being done in Canada and elsewhere.

3. Yes. The drug is being tested in Canada. Results will be evaluated when presented.

4. It can be expected to be approved barring any adverse information. The projected date for general marketing is 1982.

NIFEDIPINE

Question No. 2,515—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the Department of National Health and Welfare aware that a drug, generic name nifedipine and trade name Procardia, is about to be placed on the market in the United States?

2. Does the government have information with regard to the value of the drug for angina or other heart disorders and, if so, what is the information?

3. Was the drug tested in Canada and, if so, what are its merits?

4. Will the drug be approved for sale in Canada and, if so, on what date?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The nifedipine submission is under consideration in the United States. The information available to the department indicates that no definite decision has been reached by the American authorities, however, the drug will probably be placed on the market within several months.

2. Yes. Preliminary data are available to the department as part of the preclinical submission and as published reports. This information indicates probable effectiveness in angina. Further studies are being done in Canada and elsewhere.

3. Yes. The drug was and is being tested in Canada. Some results were presented to the department and are being evaluated.

4. Nifedipine can be expected to be approved barring any unexpected or new adverse information. The projected date for general marketing is 1982.

DEPUTY POSTMASTER GENERAL—BILINGUALISM

Question No. 2,524—Mr. Cossitt:

Did the Deputy Postmaster General, Mr. James Corkery, make a recent statement to the effect that increasing numbers of postal employees are being given crash courses in the French language and, if so (a) what was the number of persons involved over the past four years and how many were employed in each province (b) what was and will be the cost or estimated cost of the program?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Yes.

New Brunswick	63.
Ontario	97.
British Columbia	40.

(b) The cost of the program for the fiscal years 1977-78 to 1980-81 was $722,887. The estimated cost of the program for the current fiscal year (1981-82) is $550,000.

NIAGARA PENINSULA—FRUIT CROP DAMAGE

Question No. 2,525—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is there serious damage to this year's fruit crop in the Niagara Peninsula as a result of frost and, if so (a) how many farmers or growers are affected (b) what is an estimate of the damage as a percentage of the entire crop (c) what is an estimate of the damage in dollars?

2. Does the government intend to assist those suffering considerable loss in the area and, if so, what are the details?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. In late December temperatures fell to −25° throughout much of southern Ontario. The severe temperatures froze fruit buds and damaged peach trees.

(a) Initial crop estimates show that approximately 25 per cent of the 800 peach growers received moderate to severe damage. Producers in the western half of the Niagara Peninsula (Vineland to Stoney Creek) received the brunt of the damage. Damage to fruit trees varied by crop with peaches and cherries being hardest hit. Some losses also occurred in the vinifera type grapes. The extent of permanent damage will depend largely on the severity of next winter.

(b) Preliminary indications are the peach crop will be 75 per cent to 85 per cent of the 1980 crop. The cherries crop is anticipated to be 50 per cent to 60 per cent of the 1980 crop. However there was a bumper crop in 1980 for peaches and cherries. Over-all peach yields will be almost average and sour cherries are expected to be about 70 per cent of the normal yield of the last five years.

(c) The extent of loss in dollars cannot be determined at this time as provincial officials have not completed their annual fruit crop survey and they are therefore unsure of both this year's production and prices.

2. The policy of the federal government in providing assistance to farmers suffering serious and unavoidable crop loss is one of financial contributions to the federal-provincial crop insurance program. In Ontario, this contribution is 50 per cent of the premium cost which in 1980 amounted to some $100 million in Canada, including $13.4 million for the province of Ontario. The crop insurance program, administered in Ontario by the Ontario Crop Insurance Commission, has insurance plans covering virtually all fruit crops grown in the Niagara Peninsula. This is a well advertised program that guarantees a return of at least the out of pocket costs of growing a crop. Since crop insurance was available in the Niagara Peninsula, no additional assistance programs are considered necessary.

Order Paper Questions

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION—CONTRACTS WITH BRONSTEIN BROS. AND GATEHOUSE LASALLE LTÉE

Question No. 2,550—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission pay Bronstein Bros., Lasalle, $19,326 for bakery and cereal products and Gatehouse LaSalle Ltée, Lachine, $10,011 for miscellaneous groceries and, if so, for what purpose were they purchased and to whom were they distributed?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): No. However, the Department of Supply and Services did awarded a contract on behalf of the Department of National Defence, to Bronstein Bros., Lasalle, for the amount of $27,794.75 and to Gatehouse LaSalle Ltée., Lachine, for the amount of $10,011.00. Both contracts were for purchase of miscellaneous groceries required by the DND Base at Alert. N.W.T.

MONTREAL NEUROLOGICAL INSTITUTE

Question No. 2,572—Mr. Halliday:

Were federal funds used in the establishment of the Montreal Neurological Institute and, if so, in what amount?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Under the Health Resources Fund Program, federal contributions were approved for the expansion and renovation of the Montreal Neurological Institute in 1978, totalling $7,262,983. To date, payments amounting to $5,040,637.72 have been made.

DEPARTMENT OF THE ENVIRONMENT—ALBERTA U-DRIVE LEASE

Question No. 2,605—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Department of the Environment lease cars and trucks from Alberta U-Drive valued at $58,629 and, if so (a) how many vehicles (b) for how many days (c) for what purpose?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): On behalf of the Department of Environment, DSS awarded a contract to Alberta U-Drive for an amount of $58,718.75.

(a) 30 vehicles.

(b) 4479 days.

(c) To be used in the national parks during the tourist season.

EDC—CESKOSLOVENSKA OBCHODNI BANKA FINANCING

Question No. 2,629—Mr. Jelinek:

Was financing made available in 1978 to Ceskoslovenska Obchodni Banka, Czechoslovakia (H.A. Simons International Limited) through the Export Development Corporation for the purpose of constructing a sulphate pulp mill at Czechoslovakia's Ruzomberok and, if so, what was the full amount of the loan and what were the terms of repayment?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (Trade)): Export Development Corporation states that: it did make financing available in 1978 to Ceskoslovenska Obchodni Banka A.S. by signing a loan agreement to finance sales of goods and services by H.A. Simmons (Overseas) Limited to Technoexport Bratislava for a pulp mill at Ruzomberok.

The full amount of the loan was $218 million. The loan was to be repayable in 20 semi-annual instalments commencing the earlier of August 15, 1982, and the fifteenth day of the sixth month following the month of commissioning.

As to the rate of interest, in view of the intense competition that prevails among countries in foreign trade, it is not in the public interest for the Export Development Corporation to discuss its participation in export transactions or proposed export transactions. Such information would assist an exporter's competitors both foreign and domestic. Since information on bids, participation or negotiations is given by companies to EDC in confidence, the corporation, to respect that confidence, refrains until the sale arrangements are final, from discussing a deal or even from indicating that it has been approached in a transaction. EDC makes public its participation in direct lending transactions when the financing agreement therefor is signed, and, on request, in credits and foreign investment insurance cases where the exporter or investor consents to publication. If the exporter or investor has not given its consent the reply will so state. When EDC makes public its participation in direct lending transactions it does not, because of the intense competition above mentioned, publish the rate of interest, for the reasons mentioned.

Mr. Collenette: In anticipation of a question from the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe, it is my intention to answer his two questions on Monday. I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, that in itself justifies our waiting until Monday. I just want to indicate to the parliamentary secretary that if he does not give the House the answers to those questions on Monday, I will.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PENSION ACT COMPENSATION FOR FORMER PRISONERS OF WAR ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that Bill C-82 to amend the Pension Act and the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure today, on behalf of my colleagues, to move passage of Bill C-82.

[English]

Last July I had the privilege of seconding Bill C-40 which was presented to this House by our late colleague, the Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald. Bill C-40 was considered to be a major breakthrough in veterans' legislation as it granted proportionate pensions to widows of disability pensioners with an assessment of 47 per cent or less. We believe that Canada thus became the only country in the world to have such a program and to recognize in such a tangible way the spouses and dependants of pensioned veterans. Almost all other countries grant widows' pensions only in cases where the death of the veteran was due to war service.

The well-being of veterans and their families has long been the concern of the government and today I am pleased to propose that we enhance Canada's proud record in this area. I am asking hon. members to approve the total elimination of the phasing in process now in place for the payment of proportionate pensions to widows.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lamontagne: Instead of waiting for up to five and a half more years for a proportionate pension, this bill will allow some 23,500 additional widows to receive monthly payments as of July 1 this year.

I therefore ask hon. members to agree that the phase-in period for the payment of proportionate pensions to widows be altogether abolished. Instead of having to wait five and a half years to be eligible for a proportionate pension, 23,500 widows would, under this legislation, start receiving monthly benefits as of July 1 of this year.

Hon. members will recall that prior to the passage of Bill C-40 last summer, widows' pensions were payable to spouses of veterans who had died as a result of their military service. Also, widows of pensioners whose disability was considered at least 48 per cent at the time of their death were also eligible for these benefits. These benefits are still being paid; however, under this bill the proportionate pensions would be paid even if the pensioner's disability was under 48 per cent.

The speed with which the House approved Bill C-40 was quite welcome, but there was still some concern about the phase-in period for the widows' pensions. At the present time, widows of veterans with a 33 per cent or more disability pension receive monthly benefits. The Hon. Dan MacDonald and myself were concerned about the period of time which would elapse before all widows could receive their pensions. At the House Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs and during our many meetings, the Royal Canadian Legion expressed the wish to have this phase-in period amended and even suggested that widows become eligible at 65. Moreover, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggested that pensions be paid immediately, at least to the widows of First World War veterans.

[English]

We are acting today beyond the desires and projections of all these people. The government is proposing a formula which should satisfy everyone. We are eliminating the timetable completely and all entitled widows will have become eligible for a pension as of July 1, 1981.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the government is suggesting a formula which should commend itself to everyone. We are abolishing altogether the phasing-in period. All widows will be eligible for a pension as of July 1, 1981.

[English]

Looking back about a year, we should remember that Bill C-40 fulfilled the pledge made in the election campaign a couple of months earlier that, if elected, a Liberal government would move quickly to help those persons in society in the greatest need, and this should be our objective in the months ahead. I do hope that everyone in this House will be convinced of this principle.

Bill C-40 was not exclusively addressed to the needs of widows. There are other benefits for entitled veterans and their dependants. In particular, the legislation gave immediate and future assistance to over 50,000 recipients of war veterans and civilian war allowances under the age of 65.

In total, Bill C-40 represents $184 million in additional benefits for veterans and their survivors and was the most that could be attained in the financial circumstances at the time of its passage.

Now, just one year later, the government is allocating a further $41 million so that 23,500 widows and dependants can be eligible for their proportionate pension benefits effective July 1 of this year. We are eliminating completely the phasing-in period.

Hon. members will be interested to know that of the 2,300 widows it was originally estimated would be eligible for benefits by April 1 this year under the current phasing-in formula, applications have actually been received from 1,200, and of these, more than 90 per cent have been processed.

• (1220)

I would point out that the average age of entitled widows is 72 years and the total number of eligible beneficiaries is expected to remain constant over the next five years as new applicants replace those who died. Before the passage of Bill C-40, the Canadian Pension Commission had no way of knowing whether a disability pensioner below the 48 per cent level who had died still had surviving dependants years after the death. As there were no ongoing benefits, there was no need for such records.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to thank all my colleagues in the cabinet, in the House committee and in the House who have made representations and have helped us pass this bill as quickly as possible. I believe that credit should also be given to members on the other side of the House and that my colleagues on this side have made matters easier by making representations in the proper place and at the proper time. I am very grateful for their support.

[English]

Now, widows and dependants of all disability pensioners who pass away are informed of their benefits under Bill C-40. The same information will be relayed in respect to the legislation I introduce today. The commission will be working with veterans' organizations and through a media campaign to inform widows of their new benefits. Members on both sides of this House have always been zealous in passing on veterans' information to their constituents and I trust members will use their householders mailings to inform their constituents of this legislation. In these ways, I hope that all widows and dependants will have the information to apply for their rightful pensions.

Honourable members, Mr. Speaker, can be confident that the Canadian Pension Commission is ready to deal quickly with the applications flowing from the legislation. The processing period will be relatively short as, unlike claims for disability pensions, there is no need for the comprehensive gathering of supporting medical and military evidence. I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that this legislation will have the support of all parties. It is further proof of this nation's resolve that veterans and their survivors will continue to receive the just and generous treatment they deserve.

Bill C-40 was ground-breaking legislation. The aging veterans' program I announced last November is another pioneering program designed to bring independence and dignity to the most needy of our disability pensioners. Bill C-82 is added evidence that this government and this Parliament continue to recognize and honour the debt owed to those who fought for Canada and who left us a heritage, the freedom and liberties we enjoy—which make this country Canada so great.

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, for the second time this week I have the honour and privilege of rising on behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition to respond to the introduction of a bill which this time is not only to the benefit of veterans, but particularly to the benefit and interest of widows and dependants of veterans. Of interest here is the fact that Bill C-82 introduces amendments to an act passed just one year ago yesterday. If we could maintain that kind of review and update in this House with respect to all legislation, then this would be an efficient Parliament indeed and it would gain the respect of Canadians across the land.

Of course, it should come as no surprise that we on this side endorse the recommendations proposed in Bill C-82. We have recommended them for some time, and the Conservative party endorses the proposals with respect to both amendments to the Pension Act and the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act. We advocated those changes and said the phasing-in period as prescribed by Bill C-40 was inappropriate for widows and dependants of veterans who were in receipt of pensions of less than 48 per cent. It was recommended that we shorten or eliminate that phasing-in period. This party took the same position with regard to widows and dependants of prisoners of war.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that at the time Bill C-40 was being debated I had the privilege of making this comment in the House:

> Let us hope that many of them will live long enough that they will see the day when they, too, will receive the benefit of this golden anniversary year legislation.

In view of that, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to be able to say I commend the minister for the introduction of Bill C-82. With the elimination of the phasing-in period, currently a five and half year wait for some, an additional 23,500 widows and dependants of war disability pensioners will become eligible for monthly benefits as of July 1, 1981. When one considers the advancing age of the veteran population and the inflationary times we live in, the immediate availability of a pension income of this nature is a welcome necessity. Clearly the minister has not only been listening to the veterans' community, but he has been taking action following those recommendations received from the Legion and other veterans' organizations, and from members on this side of the House. For this he deserves the thanks of all of us.

As I mentioned Wednesday afternoon, Mr. Speaker, we remain hopeful that Bill C-79 and Bill C-82 will be the forerunner of still further improved veterans' legislation. Canadian veterans should not be subject to the inexcusably long periods of application reform and delays, and I gathered from the minister's comments today that some action will be taken on these. I would like to say as well that pensions should be indexed in some meaningful way so that they will not continue to be eroded by inflation.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, in my last speech I recommended amending legislation with regard to prisoner of war compensation. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) referred to this last Wednesday as a grave injustice to prisoners of war under the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act. I can only concur with his assessment. At present, compensation occurs in theory, not in practice. This should be corrected, and soon.

I do not feel, Mr. Speaker, that we in this House should prolong the debate. We are pleased the amendments have been brought forward today. We recognize that veterans and their widows and dependants have called for this action and we want to expedite the bill's passage so that they will receive the benefits of this legislation as early as possible. I would like at this time to confirm it is the Progressive Conservative Party's position that this bill should proceed through all stages today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suspect I will make what for me will be the understatement of the year when I say I am pleased this bill is now before us. I congratulate the minister on getting the support of cabinet and for being in the position where he can present this bill before we adjourn for the summer recess, if indeed we are going to adjourn.

As the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid) has pointed out, it was just a year ago yesterday that the late hon. Daniel MacDonald presented Bill C-40 for second reading. I am glad the present Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lamontagne) referred to that. It was the last thing our friend Daniel MacDonald was able to do for veterans. It was an historic piece of legislation.

However, despite the fact that that legislation improved something which had been around for 50 years, it did leave a serious, most unfortunate gap in that it provided that many widows, more than 20,000, who were given entitlement to pension on that day had to wait for another one to six and one-half years.

As the House is aware, there has not been a week since then, when the House has been in session, that I have not found a way to get in a question as to when we were going to correct that wrong. The minister is quite right in saying that when it looked as though it was difficult to get the money for such a change, I offered various compromises. I suggested on the floor of the House, and I suggested to the minister privately, that if it was not possible to go all the way, that at least the phasing-in period could be shortened, or maybe the proportionate pension could be paid right away to the widows of veterans of World War I, or maybe an age factor could be introduced. These were just alternatives if we could not abolish the phasing-in period altogether. I am more than delighted that the minister has not brought in a half-way measure. He has gone all the way and is wiping out, as of ten days ago, all of the phasing-in period.

The minister has indicated a bit of the history of this legislation. Perhaps I might just include a repetition of some of that. Starting about 50 or 51 years ago, the Parliament of Canada did provide for pensions for widows of disabled veterans; a continuing such a pension for the widow, as of right, provided the veteran's disability rate was 48 per cent or more. That, in itself, was good for 50 years ago. However, throughout those 50 years, those interested in veterans and in thier survivors have contended that that 48 per cent cut-off was unfair.

That is what we corrected a year ago. We wiped out the 48 per cent cut-off. We said by Bill C-40 that all widows of veterans who were disabled were to be entitled to a pension, either the full widow's pension or a proportionate pension. The difficulty a year ago yesterday was that there were still clauses in the bill which provided that 20,000 of them had to wait one year, two years, three years, four, five or six years. These were older women. As the minister said today, the average age is 72.

Most of the ones who have been writing me during the last year have been 76, 78 or 80 years of age. They have been getting letters wich tell them that, yes, they will qualify in 1984, 1985 or 1986.

I am sure that my good friend, Allan Solomon, must have found the writing of those letters the most difficult thing he has had to do in his times as chairman of the Canadian Pension Commission. Incidentally, I thought I saw him in the official gallery earlier this morning. I am pleased that his term, which has expired, has been continued for a little while. I would like to see it continued for a long while, because he has done a good job. He has been not only an efficient administrator of the Canadian Pension Commission, but he has also had ideas which I know he has spread all over the place, and his innovations have played a part in many improvements, some of which I could identify if there were time, but I will not do it now. But as I say, the pleasures he has in that job did not include writing these letters to older women to tell them to apply again four years of five years from now. This is fine; all of that has been wiped out.

I remind the minister, and I hope he will not mind that I am doing it, that all of this trouble could have been saved if there had been three or four fewer Liberals or three or four more Conservatives or New Democrats in the House a year ago yesterday. Because when we got into Committee of the Whole on that bill and we got down to the clause on page 11 which provided for the phasing-in period, I was able to get the Chair to call a vote on that particular subclause. The record of that is on page 2730 of Hansard for Wednesday, July 9, 1980. What was the vote? It was 62 to 58.

An hon. Member: Too many Liberals.

Mr. Knowles: If a few Liberals had stayed out, or a few more on this side had been here, we could have defeated it all. I hear my friend contributing from across the way. I heard various sayings.

An hon. Member: We would have had an election!

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no, it would not have brought an election. I was even told that maybe the government would not have proceeded with the bill because of this extra money which would be required. At any rate, that is how we felt last year. It was only by a vote of 62 to 58 that the phasing-in period was kept in the legislation at all.

Well, that is all history now. I am sorry for the many thousands, though it will not be the full 23,000, who might have had it if we had had this provision in Bill C-40 last year. I am glad that the second category, the 33 per cent to 38 per cent group, got in a few months ago. However, for the rest, they are all coming in now. They all get their pensions. In some cases, they will be disappointed in the amount, because it will be a proportionate pension based on what a veteran's total income would have been from his disability pension as a married veteran. In the lower cases, the amounts are not going to be very large, but at least there will no longer be a discrimination which says that these people have to wait until 1984, 1985 or 1986.

I confess that I am never conscious when I speak as to whether the light on my desk is on or not. I am never conscious whether the camera is focused on me or not. I do not know how much the people of Canada watch; but I hope that the people who are watching us now or see us on a replay will take note of this. I hope that many of these widows will actually see what we are doing. I hope that others who are not personally interested but who know veterans' widows will tell them about it.

One of the reasons I am sure that there have not been the number of applications we thought there would be is that many of them do not know of it yet. I know that there is an advertising program by the department, or by the Canadian Pension Commission. I know that the Legion does a very good job of trying to get this information out, in its magazine and in notices in its halls across the country. In fact, women from the group which was entitled in the last year have written to ask me whether it was possible. Those were the nice letters, to be able to write back and say, "You are already covered. Send in your application to Mr. Solomon, you will get it quickly."

I just hope that we will all do everything we can to let these people know that we are passing this legislation and that from now on, as of July 1, nine or ten days ago, any widow of a veteran who had a disability pension anywhere from 5 per cent up is now entitled and will get that pension, retroactive to July 1, 1981.

Mr. McKinnon: They have to apply, though.

Mr. Knowles: That is my reason for referring to the publicity that they give. I hope that what I have said will lead people out there to tell widows that they may know that there is this bill. As the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) says, they have to apply. But before they apply, they have to know that it is available to them. I urge that we do everything we can to get that kind of publicity out there.

In other words, for some of us this is a much happier day than yesterday. This is a piece of legislation of which we are all very proud.

An hon. Member: We were happy yesterday.

Mr. Knowles: Not I. I congratulate the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lamontagne) for being in a position to bring this legislation before us. As he said a while ago, the Royal Canadian Legion and other veterans' organizations have had this issue right up at the top of their list. The veterans are getting older. They are more conscious of what happens if they die and leave widows. A few years ago, it was number three or four on the list of priorities. It has been number one, and now they can take that off and we can move down to number two and number three, and we will. Therefore, it is good that we are doing this. As I say, I trust that widows who are affected will find out about it, and that we will get most of those widows covered just as soon as possible.

This, of course, has been an interest of mine for a long time. I made a reference to it in my speech last night. I think the first time I ever felt my interjection on the floor of the House had resulted in something happening was with respect to the widows of veterans of World War I back in about 1943 or 1944, when Ian Mackenzie was the Minister of Pensions and National Health. At that time the widows of non-pensioned veterans of World War I were not covered under anything. They had not been included in the War Veterans Allowance Act, but I was able to persuade the Hon. Ian Mackenzie to obtain an order in council from cabinet to make an ad hoc allowance of probably about $25 to $30 per month to such widows, and a few years after that we got them covered under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

The acting minister is part of the process. We are not only improving things for veterans, but we are increasing the recognition of the rights of women. There has been too much tendency in the whole of mankind's history—and I say "mankind" advisedly—for women to get their rights only because of their attachment to men. The more we establish women's rights in their own right, the better it is and I am glad that we are moving in that direction.

We have agreed to put through this bill quickly with one speaker per party. As far as I am concerned, this means the one speech which each of us has made now at second reading and that when we get into committee of the whole there will be no debate. We will have the bill out of here and get it to the Senate very shortly. As the hon. member for St. Catharines emphasized, with this out of the way, the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs must know that all the jobs are not done. There are some other things which will start to have priority. In the first place, he himself referred to the fact that Bill C-40 of last July included references to the War Veterans Allowance Act and to benefits under that act, and I quote him from this morning, "immediate benefits and future benefits".

I remind the minister that in that part there is another phasing-in process. It is not quite as serious as the phasing-in with respect to widows, but I suggest it is time he start studying that and bring in the full benefits accorded under the War Veterans Allowance Act, and that Bill C-40 be brought into play right away.

I also urge, as the previous speaker did, that he give considerable attention to facilities to speed up the handling of cases by the Canadian Pension Commission. Also I support the proposition that the formula for the rate of pensions paid by the Canadian Pension Commission should be put on a clear basis. It should not wait every three or four years to be adjusted; it should stay in a relationship to the average take-home pay of the five categories of public servants designated eight or nine years ago. If we were able last night to change the indexing formula with respect to certain other things like pay and pensions, we ought to be able to do the same for veterans, and I urge that it be done.

I am getting some signals that if I were to sit down now we would get the bill over to the Senate, get it passed, and get royal assent today. This is extremely important so that the July 1 effective date has its full meaning. On behalf of my party I give our full endorsation to the immediate passing of Bill C-82.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Certain remarks were made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) concerning Committee of the Whole stage, but the order made was to refer the bill to the standing committee. Is there unanimous consent to refer the bill to Committee of the Whole?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Ethier in the chair.

Clauses 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I said that there would be no speeches but I think that Allan Solomon, having appeared for a moment, should be given a round of applause for the work he has done, just in case there is any change before we meet again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, bill read the third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS

Mr. Pinard moved:

That, when the House adjourns on the day this order is adopted, it shall stand adjourned until Wednesday, October 14, 1981, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Madam Speaker, after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Madam Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees or the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in her stead for all the purposes of this order.

He said: Mr. Speaker, for the information of my colleagues of the opposition, we talked about royal assent earlier and arrangements have been made, since we received formal notice from the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) that the adjournment motion would not be passed today; consequently, royal assent will be given this afternoon a little before or a little after 4 p.m., depending on circumstances.

As far as the adjournment motion is concerned I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, that we on this side keep our word and that we intended to move the adjournment as discussed a little earlier in the week.

I think I may take this opportunity to make a brief review of what we have accomplished during this session. All hon. members will remember that Parliament was first convened after the April, 1980 election and that we had to sit from mid-April until mid-July, that we adjourned for the summer and that we returned subsequently in the fall; we shall probably adjourn later today, in July or in August, depending on circumstances.

So, Mr. Speaker, I believe it falls to me as government House leader to point out the work carried out during these weeks and these months. First of all, let me congratulate all members on their regular attendance and on the earnestness and determination they have shown during these months in their efforts to act sincerely in the best interest of the nation and their constituents. I am convinced that regardless of political ideas, principles or philosophy, every member in this House is sincere. Irrespective of any political affiliation, I must recognize that in any debates held during this session, whatever opinions were expressed by members on both sides of this House, everything was done in earnest and with the intention of actually serving society rather than to destroy this nation called Canada. In these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, this is the first group I wish to pay tribute to even though it does not mean that we have completed the job if I am now extending congratulations, but I believe that after these months, since April, 1980, the members deserve congratulations and recognition for all the work they accomplished and for all the time spent doing their work and taking their responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, since the election and since April 1980, we often meet members who could prove beyond doubt they devote 80, 85 and even more hours every week to the interests of Canadian men and women. I believe this is a fact often forgotten in the heat of action, in the heat of debate, and I believe it is sometimes important that parliamentarians and I, as parliamentary leader in any case, should mention it. Whether on the government or the opposition side, whether we favour such and such a policy or have differences of opinion on the same subject, each and every one of us devotes in all good faith 80, 85 hours of our time every week to serve the interests of our constituents to the best of our ability and to make Canada progress. There is absolutely no question about that, it is worth mentioning occasionally and it is a further reason to congratulate again every parliamentarian.

We must also think of all those people whose lives are related to our proceedings. We must not forget all the Commons staff, all those whose duties are related to those of parliamentarians, who have to adjust their way of life to the tempo of parliamentarians, and I include the media and also the press gallery people. When we sit till 10:30 p.m. they have to stay on the look-out and keep their ears open up to the last minute to report as completely and faithfully as they can what happened on the floor of the House of Commons. Accordingly, in order to adapt themselves to our parliamentary tempo, these people must follow our proceedings and neglect their family life or other occupations. This applies to the media, to the reporters on the Hansard staff, to the translators, it applies to all those men and women whose job it is to keep the House of Commons working smoothly, and at this time of the year, on July 10, after a very long session which started last April, these people deserve our respect, our support and our apologies to some extent, if we have to sit after today.

As for the business which has been dealt with during this period, let me say that this session has been more productive on the average than all previous sessions in the history of Canada. Let me give you only one example. I see that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is smiling, and I know that it is not with malice, but he may not be aware of this fact. For over 20 years, it has never happened that the House of Commons has passed all bills related to the budget before the summer recess. This is the first time it has happened in over 20 years, and I am told that it may be the first time in 29 years. I would like to thank also in this regard his House leader, who has co-operated and contributed to this result, as well as the House leader of the New Democratic Party.

When I said earlier that parliamentarians had worked constructively and when I asked that party lines and partisanship be set aside, it was because it is indeed important for the public to know from time to time that their representatives in Parliament are doing something positive for society. The Leader of the Opposition will agree with me that the image of politicians is not at its best among the public. And what often contributes to tarnishing this image unfairly are irresponsible reactions to positive results when a statement which contains such positive aspects is made. I am not denying the right of the Leader of the Opposition to criticize and to blame us for not having tackled such and such an issue which his party considers a priority. I understand this, he is within his right and I respect that freedom. It is the very foundation of Parliament. However, when we do something positive, when we get results, when we are productive, I would also appreciate a positive reaction on his part in an effort not to deteriorate further the image of public men and women in Canadian society, because in fact, at times when parliamentarians do something positive I believe that it is the responsibility of parliamentarians themselves, and especially party leaders, not to minimize the importance of such positive results, however small they might be.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, in over 20 years, the House of Commons has never before passed all the bills related to a budget, as was done during this session. Let me enumerate them. We have had the Income Tax Act, the borrowing authority bill, the Customs Tariff Act, the fiscal transfers, the Excise Tax Act, the six day budget debate. And if I wanted to add all the bills related to the economy, I have here a list of 65 measures which as of four o'clock this afternoon will have been approved during this session, which is more than usual, and it is another positive aspect to which we shall come back later on.

During this session, we have passed more economic or financial bills than ever before in previous sessions, and I do not want to take the credit for it and I am not looking for plaudits, quite the opposite. I do not expect congratulations from the Leader of the Opposition. I do not ask for any, but what I am asking him to do is to recognize that his own House leader and the House leader of the New Democratic Party have done everything in their power to allow this Parliament to produce at least a minimum, and by a happy coincidence, this minimum represents more than what was done in previous years, and I believe that they have contributed to this result. I simply wanted to point this out. However, I have not only compliments to address to the House leaders. As much as possible, I shall avoid making criticisms, but in the areas where they deserve congratulations, no one will stop me from saying so because I am speaking quite sincerely. Going back to the month of April, we avoided a situation which was, and still is, the result of two elections in less than a year. Hon. members will remember that because of the nature of our Standing Orders—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but it being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed the following bill without any amendment: Bill C-82, an Act to amend the Pension Act and the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act.

[English]

THE ROYAL ASSENT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received which is as follows:

Government House

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 10th day of July, at 2.15 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the House of Commons,
Ottawa

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pinard:

That, when the House adjourns on the day this order is adopted, it shall stand adjourned until Wednesday, October 14, 1981, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Madam Speaker, after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Madam Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees or the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in her stead for all the purposes of this order.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, since the beginning of this session last April, 1980 in this House, we will have adopted and obtained royal assent, after what Your Honour just mentioned, to some 65 bills.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pinard: I have the list of those bills here, but I will not read the list because it would be rather long. However, Your Honour will see that among those 65 bills there is a lot of major and most important legislation related to financial matters, related to budget, and related to other major subjects, like the Post Office, the Bank Act and others.

What I would like to make very clear at this stage in my speech before we adjourn later today, hopefully, is that during those months many people have been made to believe that we have dealt almost solely with the Constitution in this chamber during the last months. This is not the fact. This is not the truth. Let me tell Your Honour that, in fact, the Constitution has required about two months of the time of the House of Commons. The resolution on the Constitution was sent to a special committee which dealt with it during four months. Hence, altogether it is true that we have dealt with this very major and important subject of the Constitution at length and that we have spent six months on the subject; but four of those six months were spent in a committee, allowing this House to be able to deal with some other business.

What kind of other business have we dealt with? I spoke to Your Honour a few minutes ago about 65 bills. Once again, I will not read the list; but let me tell Your Honour that we had a six-day budget debate last fall. We have dealt with major bills related to the economy—the Income Tax Act, borrowing authority bills, the Customs Tariff Act, the Bank Act, fiscal transfers, the Income Tax Conventions Act and the Excise Tax Act. We had 35 allotted days related to the business of supply, and a special two-day debate on the economy just before Christmas. Everyone will remember that.

Therefore, if we add up all those days we spent in the House of Commons which were devoted to the economy and to financial matters, people in this country will realize that we have spent, in fact, much more time on financial matters and on the economy than on any other subject. That must be said very clearly. As I said earlier in my speech, it is the first time in over 20 years that the government has been able to have all the bills related to the budget adopted before the summer adjournment. That is a reality too.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): But interest rates are still at 20 per cent!

Mr. Cullen: We are going to wrestle them to the ground!

• (1410)

Mr. Pinard: There was something very positive also achieved during the session. It is related to some changes in the system. I should like to speak briefly about those parliamentary task forces that were created to deal with different subjects and to say that if, on the one hand, the experiment was very positive and very useful, on the other hand there are aspects that will have to be corrected in order to allow this Parliament still to be able to allow a number of members to be part of an action group and deal with very important subjects, at the same time not disturbing the existing system of standing committees.

[Translation]

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that following an agreement between parties, we have set up task forces, parliamentary committees made up of seven members, which is much less than the normal membership of some 20 members for a standing committee of this House. What the government intended in agreeing to set up those parliamentary task forces was to enable a limited number of seven members from all regions of this country to get together and look fully into highly topical matters, and in so doing to enjoy a great deal of freedom and travel opportunities, technical advice and every facility to produce a report as little partisan as possible which would really enable the government to be acquainted with the real views of the public and those concerned on a given subject. You will recall that those committees have considered alternate energy, the handicapped, the North-South relations, the National Trade Corporation, regulatory reform, employment opportunities for the 80's as well as the renewal of fiscal agreements between the federal government and the provinces. As I said, this experience has had very positive aspects. Those honourable members have done an excellent job. They have worked in a very responsible and efficient manner. I think we can now say that in the reports of those committees, there was an input by members from all over the country, including the maritimes, western Canada and central Canada, which will give more weight to the recommendations made in those reports.

However, on the negative side, there has been an increase in Parliament's costs in order to allow those committees to do their job. The costs have increased very substantially. We know that printing costs have gone up as well as transportation and counselling costs. But I think that was worth it and that in the future we should not cut out those activities just to save money, as I think the loss would outweigh the benefits; but we should not overspend if we want to show our moderation or at least our ability for sound management and efficient control.

But the most negative aspect may have been the disruption of the present standing committee system, as such honourable members who were appointed to the task forces were also very active members of the standing committees. Because of the very long time they had to work on the task forces, they were not always able to take part in the activities of the House standing committees. So I believe we will have to look into that practical problem and try together to find a workable solution. I am quite willing to try and work out an acceptable compromise with representatives of the opposition parties to reach our objective and not place the work of the standing committees in jeopardy.

Offhand, I would make a suggestion subject to amendment or discussion. We might perhaps consider having sub-committees of our existing committees perform the same role, and this might be an indirect way of obtaining the same result without jeopardizing committee work. We might also require that these task forces, these sub-committees, made up of seven members or so only, be empowered to travel outside the period where the committees are dealing with the estimates, between the beginning of March and the end of May. I submit there are two or three months in the year where all hon. members should be required to be very active in committee, to better scrutinize the Main Estimates, and outside that period we could be more flexible in order to allow these sub-committees to address matters of public interest, in small numbers, to effectively reach the same goal we had in mind for that experiment. This is what I had to say on that aspect of a new feature. Once more this year we had television. We extended it to the committee on the Constitution, which was also a first and an innovation. That experiment proved very profitable, and also very costly, but money is no obstacle to possibly trying similar experiments in the future. On the other hand, it is a matter of common sense in my view that before bringing television into the proceedings of all committees, we must first bring in parliamentary reform, especially in our committees. Television should be brought in only when we have put some order in our parliamentary procedure, especially that of our committees. Be that as it may, the constitution committee experience has been most positive, and I wish to commend all people involved with televising the debates, both in this House and in the committees, for their magnificent work at the technical level.

Madam Speaker, I see you have not yet interrupted me, so I may go on. In respect of other reforms that could be made, I have often indicated publicly in this House, during the year, in response to questions, that to me this was a priority. Some three weeks ago, on a Friday afternoon, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in answer to opposition members stated in this House that this was one of his priorities, and I want to confirm that I am now consulting and preparing a document. I intend to consult my colleagues as soon as possible on some aspects of that reform, but I will do all I can in order that we may reach an agreement on changes that would not be too controversial at first, and in order also that we might ask a committee to very seriously but in a short period deal with that basic question of parliamentary reform. Why did we not do so during these last few months? After passing 65 pieces of legislation, discussing the Constitution for two months in this House and four months in committee, after having a budget, 35 opposition days, passing all the bills stemming from the budget, as I said, for the first time in more than 20 years, after performing all that work, especially after passing all those bills, most of which were an accumulation of legislation resulting from two elections in less than a year, it would neither be realistic nor fair to expect that we should have addressed in-depth reform over these last months.

However, I think that though there are still about twenty bills on the Order Paper, we, on this side, can consider the future with optimism, I can assure the hon. members that when I refer to parliamentary reform, I do not want to restrict the rights of the opposition. I wish to be quite clear; I will never suggest any change that could encroach on the rights of the opposition. This is not my intent. And if such changes were made, it would be for reasons beyond my control. When I refer to reform, I do not mean more power for the government, Madam Speaker; I want to improve the ability of this House to hold more thorough debates while coping realistically with the problems and dealing with the concerns of the Canadian people. I apologize, Madam Speaker, because I see that you want to interrupt me. I will continue my speech shortly.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Madam Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Madam Speaker with the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

And being returned:

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber, the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

Bill C-14, an Act to amend the Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities Act—Chapter No. 74;

Bill C-81, an Act to amend the Official Residences Act—Chapter No. 75;

Bill C-82, an Act to amend the Pension Act and the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act—Chapter No. 76;

Bill C-83, an Act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Salaries Act, the Parliamentary Secretaries Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act—Chapter No. 77;

Bill C-79, an Act to amend the Veterans' Land Act and to amend the Veterans Benefit Act in consequence thereof—Chapter No. 78;

Bill S-10, an Act to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act—Chapter No. 79.

Bill S-20, an Act to revive Ontario News Company, Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act;

Bill S-21, an Act to revive G. A. Barber & Sons Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act; Bill S-22, an Act to revive Eastern Diversified Company Ltd. and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pinard:

That, when the House adjourns on the day this order is adopted, it shall stand adjourned until Wednesday, October 14, 1981, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Madam Speaker, after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Madam Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees or the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in her stead for all the purposes of this order.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I have almost finished my intervention on this motion. Let me just refer you to the text—

[English]

Yes, I have an hour and a half to go. However, since I am creating the case for 20-minute speeches, I should set the example. I am sure that when the Leader of the Opposition follows me, he will set the example and limit himself to 20 minutes. For that I thank him in advance.

May I now refer to the motion. It has been drafted the same as in the past with the same standard provisions. The House will adjourn until mid-October, which is the normal date for the return of Parliament in the fall, and I quote:

—provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Madam Speaker, after consultation with the government that the public interest—

I repeat that:

—that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time;—

Possibly I misunderstood, but yesterday I heard some members say that once we adjourn until mid-October, that is it; Parliament will not be able to do anything before the middle of the fall.

Mr. Lambert: Those on your side.

Mr. Pinard: I heard it from members on both sides. To pretend if my motion is accepted that it is theoretically and physically impossible for Parliament to sit earlier than October 14 is not correct. I am not saying that the House of Commons will come back earlier, but that it is theoretically possible. In fact, this was done last summer when we came back a week or ten days early. It was done a few years ago when we dealt with the bill on the pipeline. We returned in mid-August to deal with that bill.

It is up to the elected representatives to look at the facts. When the public interest is at stake, it is up to the government to assume its responsibility. If it fails to do that, we have an election. It looks as though the Liberal party has assumed its responsibility rather well in the past.

Therefore, when we are told that Parliament cannot meet before the middle of the fall, this is not true. Theoretically, it remains a possibility; the motion respecting the summer recess is drafted in such a way that if the public interest requires it, the government may recall the House of Commons to address this question, as was the case last summer and as was the case not too long ago when the House was recalled to study a bill on the pipeline. I do not say that the government intends to take this action; that is not the point. The question is hypothetical and I say this simply to refute the arguments of those who claim that this motion makes it physically impossible for Parliament, for the House of Commons, to sit before October 14. Let us be clear on this; this is not only true in theory, it is a possibility; Parliament can be recalled this summer and for the time being no decision has been reached nor am I in a position to confirm or to deny that the government does or does not intend to recall the House of Commons earlier than October 14.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, I can hardly add anything to the balance sheet I summarized a moment ago, and I will not repeat myself. In my opinion, we have had so far in this session a rather considerable and highly appreciable production of legislation, motions and reports, as well as the work done by all sorts of committees of the House. I am not trying to pat anyone on the back; it is simply a matter of looking at the facts and to conclude that indeed a lot of work has been done in recent months. Of course, some members would have liked to accomplish still more, and I count myself among them, Mr. Speaker. I would suggest once again that if we had more modern tools to work with, the House of Commons and the committees would be a lot more active and a lot more productive, and they would also be working under much more human conditions. Now, as I said earlier, after we have just had royal assent, changes are in the air and I think that we have been able to clear up most of the bills which had accumulated as a result of the last two elections in less than one year and, within reasonable time, we will be in a position to consider and negotiate changes and submit them for study by appropriate groups.

Mr. Speaker, those are the essential remarks I wanted to make at this stage of the session. I hope hon. members will agree to consider adjourning later today, in principle until October 14. Yesterday I heard the Leader of the Opposition suggest in his questions that on the face of it he was tempted not to support this motion for as long as the postal strike is not settled. I think he had not read the text of the motion when he said that. I am not asking him for anything, I am simply expressing a wish. Should he insist that we go on passing bills this summer, we are at his disposal, but then may I be permitted to point out to him very respectfully that, to my mind, his request is not going to help solve the postal strike.

In my opinion, the conflict will be brought to an end at the bargaining table. It is not the type of dispute which we will settle here on the floor of the House of Commons. The Prime Minister told him quite clearly, I said the same thing to him, the President of the Treasury Board confirmed it, and again today as government House leader I say to him that we have no intention of legislating the postal workers back to their jobs. That has happened in the past; the government has had to weigh, on the one hand, the right to strike and, on the other, the public interest, so that when the government did legislate in the past it was because it deemed that in the circumstances the public interest was sufficiently harmed to justify disregarding the legal right to strike, which is acknowledged and supported by the Leader of the Opposition, particularly at the Post Office. If the Leader of the Opposition is now against the right to strike by postal workers, he cannot say so more clearly than by demanding that we pass legislation immediately. I would ask him to give me one single example, and I mean a realistic, not a trumped up example, of the ideal moment when we would respect the right of the postal workers to go on strike.

Summer is starting. The postal workers are legally in position to strike. They have exercised that right for barely 15 days and the Leader of the Opposition has been asking us for a week already to send them back to work. Does he not believe in the postal employee's right to strike? If he does, when then will he realize that back to work legislation is not advisable if the postal workers chose freely to go on strike? Let him show me a realistic example where the right to strike is recognized not only in theory but in practice. I claim that at this point, in view of the time of the year, and of circumstances generally, though undeniably there are serious inconveniences which affect some people, a responsible government must look at both sides of the coin: the interest of the public on the one hand, and on the other the financial implications, the need for wise management, and above all the respect of existing laws and the right to strike granted to a union with the support of the Leader of the Opposition.

In view of those circumstances, when he tells us suddenly, at the very last minute and to everyone's surprise, that the House will not adjourn until the postal strike has been settled—I recognize that he is free to say so, and I do not despise him for it—I say he is mistaken. That in no way helps to solve the conflict, nor does it help the parties involved to get back to negotiations, nor does it help negotiate a settlement. I claim it is harmful. The present attitude of the Leader of the Opposition will do more harm than good if he persists in it. I have no idea what he will be telling us. Perhaps I misunderstood him yesterday. It is possible. Perhaps he did not want to go that far. I pass no judgment on him but only give my interpretation of the situation and my point of view; I do not believe that forcing the hon. members to sit here in Parliament for one week, two weeks, will change anything in settling the postal dispute. If anything, it will hinder it.

We believe in the right to strike, in legal strikes, in negotiations and discussions that will bring all parties involved back to the negotiation table to settle this conflict in a normal and legal way. We are not of the opinion at this stage that it is appropriate to legislate the postal workers back to work and I say it again. It is not because the Leader of the Opposition is going to have 282 members of Parliament come back here or those members who are responsible enough to come back next week or in the coming weeks, that we are going to legislate. I am telling him, we have no intention of legislating a back to work order. He is making a mistake if he thinks so. Not only is he making a mistake but he is jeopardizing a settlement to the postal strike. He is jeopardizing the possibilities of a compromise and a negotiated settlement in this dispute.

If he really wants to be useful in the settlement of the labour dispute in the Post Office, I will remind him that strikes are not settled on the floor of the House of Commons, just as trials are not settled on the floor of the House of Commons, as I told him during the oral question period regarding the dispute over the election in the riding of Spadina. To each his own. Courts deal with trials and parties involved in a labour dispute have to negotiate a settlement. Some are free to make offers up to a certain limit, others are not, and if they are not satisfied with having to go on strike, as provided in the law, that is put to the vote democratically and with the support of the Leader of the Opposition and suddenly he turns against that practice. All of a sudden it's no. The right to strike is no longer to be granted, it has negative effects.

Strikes have negative effects indeed. But if he is against the right to strike, let him have the courage to rise and say: "I am against the right to strike in the Public Service, I am against the right to strike for postal workers in particular." Let him state it clearly. But let him not play little parliamentary games on the backs of parliamentarians, on the back of the media covering our activities, on the backs of all the personnel of the House of Commons—and they are 3,000 employees—and their families depending on our schedule, on our work here, and all of that for the purpose of scoring little political points and making the postal workers believe that we are going to force them back to work. We have no intention of legislating their return to work. All that he is doing presently, is jeopardizing the settlement of this strike. It is pure masochism to harm your own members of Parliament and also to infringe on the rights of members opposite. I am calling him back to his senses. If he absolutely wants us to come back next week, let it be so. As I told him, he knows the legislative program and we are going to be here. But we would prefer to adjourn now since we have been sitting since April, 1980, with our usual adjournments. We would prefer, naturally, to adjourn on July 10 after having passed 65 bills, after having reached an agreement on the constitutional debate, after a budget, after having passed all the budget bills, which was the first time in over twenty years. So I would respectfully submit to him that he should consider being a little more human and, rather than taking a position which would hinder rather than facilitate a negotiated settlement of the postal dispute, I would respectfully suggest to him, if he keeps on, unless there are new developments which would make him change his mind or explain to me his position, which I may have misunderstood, that at this point if he wants to help the settlement of the postal dispute he must not count on the government legislating the postal workers back to work. Also he had better not think that by keeping hon. members here he will in fact force the government to introduce legislation to that effect. I think I made that quite clear. I will not repeat what I said in the other official language.

I would finally like to congratulate all parliamentarians, for their good faith, and that includes the Leader of the Opposition, because I have never questioned their good faith and the efforts they made in the last months to try and improve the quality of life of Canadians. Of course we do not always agree with each other's methods, but it is the role of the opposition to criticize us. I do not expect to be paid compliments. I expect to be criticized and that is normal. However, there are things that must be said. I think that beyond party politics we are all men and women who, sincerely believe they are doing their best to improve the quality of life in Canada. I believe that the best way to act at this point is to allow members, not to go on holidays, but to go and meet with their constituents in their ridings, to go and meet with their people, to go to their offices, as all of us on both sides of the House intend to do. For someone to say that——"We won't allow the members of Parliament to go on holiday before any strike is settled," that is wrong. It is not a matter of a holiday. It is a matter of allowing the members of Parliament, after ten months, to be able to go to their constituencies and meet with their people so they will know what the people really want and they can try to solve the problems of their constituents, who have the right to see them. That is one very important aspect, too. The role of the parliamentarian, I agree, is to legislate and to debate in the House of Commons. However, when we have achieved what we have during the last ten months, having passed 65 bills, a budget, all the financial bills, the Constitution, a lot of major bills have been adopted, above the average compared to previous sessions of Parliament, I say that it is unfair if someone prevents hon. members from going as soon as possible to their regions to explain, to listen and to meet with their constituents, and to allow the easterner to go to western Canada and westerners to come to eastern Canada.

• (1440)

That is what we have in mind when we say it is about time we adjourn today. We do not want a holiday. I think some hon. members deserve a holiday. They will take two weeks or three weeks, and that is fine. However, hon. members know very well that we will not be on holiday for three months. It is wrong to say that. We are not going on holiday for three months; we are going to do our job, which is different, another aspect of our job, working very hard in our constituencies over two and one-half months. That is what we want to do, and no later than today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, let me begin on a soft note on two matters on which the President of the Privy Council and I can agree. One of those certainly has to do with the expression of our appreciation on this side of the House to all of those who work in association with the House of Commons as employees, or in jobs which are associated with the House of Commons. They are called upon to perform tasks with unusual demands, and all of us in this Parliament on all sides of the House, are deeply grateful for the work they have done and want to take this opportunity, as we begin an adjournment motion debate, to express our deep gratitude to them all.

• (1450)

Mr. Clark: The other matter on which I want to express some very real identity of interest is the references the President of the Privy Council made to parliamentary reform. I am pleased that he has found so useful the innovation of parliamentary task forces which my government began. If he takes a look at some of the other proposals for parliamentary reform which were introduced during the period we were in office I am sure he will find other elements of value. I am pleased to see him nodding his head. I am prepared to accept his word that he is genuinely interested in the reform of this place because, frankly, I cannot imagine how anyone who has spent any time here can be satisfied at all with the way the rules of Parliament now limit the ability of individual members of Parliament on either side of the House to do the job we are sent here to do, which is to have influence upon the public policy of the land.

Certainly it is my view—it has been my conviction through my life here, and I am pleased to hear a similar view expressed by the President of the Privy Council—that there have to be changes which allow individual members to have more influence upon the events of Parliament. He has given us his word that he will not introduce reforms which will limit the powers of the opposition. He will understand if we want to wait to see what he is proposing before we accept that word, but certainly there is major institutional work to be done here.

We have to change the rules of this place because it is one of the greatest wastes in the country to have a situation where some 30 people, who happen to sit at the Privy Council and in the centre of the government side of the House of Commons, have most of the influence and power in this Parliament, where there are 282 members, and all the rest of the members of the House of Commons have relatively little influence upon the events of the day. It was not for that reason that Parliament was created, and it is not under that system that Parliament can thrive.

If the President of the Privy Council is serious about reforming this institution to make it an institution in which individual members of Parliament can in fact influence the public policy of the day effectively and freely, then we on this side of the House will support any sensible measure which he introduces to accomplish that, and we will propose several to him ourselves.

Let me get to matters where there might be less agreement. I heard the minister talk about the need for members of Parliament to get into their constituencies and to talk to their constituents.

I must say that I am certain that if some of the members from Quebec had been able to visit their constituents, especially when we were debating the constitutional issue, the result would be very different and the contribution of these members to our debates would have been very different. Because one thing is quite clear, and that is that the views of Quebec citizens on the constitutional issue do differ from those expressed by Quebec members during the long constitutional debate.

Someone mentioned Lévis. The Progressive Conservative Party obtained 4 per cent of the vote in Lévis in 1980. We obtained 31 per cent of the vote in a byelection because we spoke up for Quebecers on the constitutional issue. This is why our candidate was so successful, and I believe that it shows to Quebecers, and especially to the members of the Liberal party, that they have the duty to take the views of their voters into account in the future when we deal with such basic issues as constitutional reform.

[English]

I wish them well on their voyages home. If they need any arguments or if they need any help in understanding the point of view of Quebecers on the constitutional question, they can write me and I will send them some of my speeches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me come to the question of the order we are debating now, the motion for adjournment. The President of the Privy Council jokes and says he will mail me a letter. Unfortunately, that is one of the problems with this House in dealing with this question, because it is possible for members of this House of Commons to have our communications sent by messenger, or perhaps by courier, to people who need them. It is not possible, when the postal service is on strike, for ordinary Canadians to have their mail delivered when they need it because ordinary Canadians do not have the privileges members of this House of Commons have. My party and I say that we do not propose to exercise our privilege of rising for the summer while individual Canadians across the country face the prospect of being denied their privilege and their right to have their mail delivered by their postal service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me come back to some of the remarks of the President of the Privy Council. He admitted that Parliament has the power to come back here and resolve problems—including problems of a work stoppage—and to introduce back to work legislation, so the question of the right to strike is not at issue here at all. Most of us in this House who have been here for any length of time have had to vote to have Parliament impose upon various work forces in the public service the necessity to get back to work and carry on their functions. That was done without any limitation of the right to strike.

That is an unhappy part of the life and the responsibilities of the parliamentary system, but that is not the question here at all. The question here was alluded to, perhaps inadvertently, by the President of the Privy Council. He talked about the inconvenience caused to members of Parliament. He talked about the inconvenience caused to members of the press. He talked about the inconvenience caused to others who might have to stay here to make sure Parliament is able to do its duty. What concerns me and my party is the inconvenience to hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have a right to count upon their mail. They look to us to put their convenience ahead of our convenience, and that is what my party and I intend to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: He speaks about the rights of public servants, and I certainly accept that. But I also accept that citizens have rights in this country, and if there is one body in the land which has a duty to respect and protect the rights of the citizens of Canada, it is this Parliament of Canada. I do not propose to have this Parliament of Canada getting up and going away when, by staying, it could positively influence the restoration of mail services in the country.

The President of the Privy Council used the words "the public interest". He said that the government can decide to call Parliament back when the public interest is at stake. We happen to believe that the public interest is at stake now in the question relating to mail service in the country. He has said that if we want to have a real test of the public interest, we can perhaps have an election. We are ready for that too; however, I suggest to him that the people of Canada are not particularly interested in elections, but the people of Canada are very much interested in having their mail delivered. The people of Canada are very much interested in having an energy agreement. The people of Canada are very much interested in having a government which will act on the problems which are real and important to ordinary people across the country. That is what this government has failed to do, and it proposes to continue to fail to do so. That is the responsibility this government proposes to continue to back away from by having Parliament rise when, by staying, we could influence a settlement—one way or another, by negotiation or by other means—of the postal strike. We say we should not be moving away from our responsibility. We say we should spend another couple of days here in the heat. We are elected to take the heat. We should stay here for a couple of days further in the heat, deal with our responsibilities, do our duty and not run away from our responsibility as members of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The President of the Privy Council spoke about the record of the government in this session. He said that for a session of Parliament this government had a record better than the average. That has to be seen in the light of the fact that this has been two sessions of Parliament, when we take into account the fact that we met before summer and then recessed for summer last year. What he is saying is that in two sessions of Parliament we have had a legislative output a little better than the average in one session of Parliament. I can agree with that kind of calculation.

However, it is not really for us today to compare lists of things which were done and things which were not done, although there is a very real concern in the country about a number of things which were not done or a number of things which were badly done. Some parliamentary sessions are merely unproductive. This session of Parliament has been one of the most divisive sessions of Parliament in the history of this nation and, tragically, two issues which could have united Canadians, our energy and our Constitution, have been used by this government to drive Canadians apart. Now, the constitutional bill which occupied most of the government's legislative agenda—he says it only took two months; I seem to hear them saying it took 54 years. That constitutional provision betrays the basic federal nature of this nation. The National Energy Program, which reflects the government's intellectual agenda, its taste for statism and its determination to have the state control more and more of life in Canada, is driving Canadian citizens, jobs and money out of our country.

We, Mr. Speaker, are one of the few nations in the world with a chance to become genuinely self-sufficient in energy. The news in Canada should be about new energy projects starting, however, because of this government, the news in Canada is about new energy projects shutting down. This week it was the $12 billion Cold Lake project shutdown for at least two years, and probably much longer. That project's delay will have economic implications and will cost jobs right across this country. I hope members of Parliament from Ontario and Quebec understand that fully 35 per cent of that project's impact, which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources cancelled, would have been felt in those two provinces. So the provinces being bloodied by this wrong-headed, ideological, doctrinaire attempt to control in Ottawa an energy industry which will, faced with that kind of control, choose other places to build, and the people who pay for that, are the citizens of Ottawa Centre, Toronto, Montreal, Trois Rivières, indeed the citizens of every community right across this country.

Before the announcement of the Cold Lake shutdown, before that great economic leap backward as a result of federal Liberal policy, there had been a flood of 165 drilling rigs out of this country, taking expertise from western Canada, taking jobs and production from eastern Canada, and taking the possibility of energy self-sufficiency from all of Canada. There has been in the energy service industry a drop of between 20 and 30 per cent in employment as a result of the energy policy of this government. There has been a mammoth increase in imports which help foreign countries and hurt Canada. Instead of building up the independent Canadian energy industry, this government builds up its own multinationals. Instead of serving Canada, this Liberal government serves Mexico, Saudi Arabia, Venezuela and OPEC. The Liberal energy policy is: OPEC first and Canada last.

Mr. Clark: In a curious way, "Canada last" was also the motive of the constitutional proposal. The Liberal government tried to hide behind the colonial connection to have Britain decide Canada's Constitution. We fought that colonial action and we won the right to have the courts of Canada decide the constitutional legal questions the Prime Minister and the Liberal party wanted to send away to Britain. Having won that right, we reserved for Canadians the right to decide the political question about what it is that is right and legitimate for a federal government to do. Because, sir, that Constitution is Canada's first; it is not Britain's constitution.

An hon. Member: Not too convincing.

[Translation]

A Quebecer told me that was not convincing. He should perhaps talk to his constituents, because they believe like I do that this is an issue for Canadians to decide and not for the British people, and if he thinks that it is up to Britain to determine the future of Canada, he is wrong.

[English]

As a consequence of some of these actions, Mr. Speaker, and I say it with sadness and almost with fear, we have a situation where in some parts of this country you can cut the anger with a knife. Whole regions are developing the view, with far too much evidence to support it, that their nation is being governed against their interests. The great majority of individual Canadians with bills to pay, families to raise and lives to lead, find their daily problems being ignored by a national government that just does not care about the things that concern individual Canadians across the country.

Some hon. Members: Right on.

Mr. Clark: Millions of those Canadians are forced to cut back on their food purchases. Thousands must contemplate letting their houses go because they cannot afford to renew their mortgages at current interest rates.

[Translation]

Interest rates have broken every record in the last six months. Prices have increased by 12.3 per cent. Food prices have increased by 13.6 per cent. Energy prices have gone up by 28.5 per cent, bankruptcies by 20 per cent during the first part of this year, and the price of gas by 60 cents a gallon since the return to power of this irresponsible government. The deficit this year will be $3.7 billion higher than it would have been with our budget.

[English]

We have the unemployment statistics today showing the rate for June. It is up again now at 7.3 per cent. In June of 1981, 24,000 jobs were lost in the services sector, 26,000 in the manufacturing sector. Those are jobs Canadians have been counting on. They cannot count on them any longer. Because of the economic policies of this government, those jobs are being lost. The cost of living remains far too high. The agriculture food index published yesterday stated that for June of 1981 food prices are up 13.6 per cent over last year. Business bankruptcies are up 20 per cent in the first quarter of 1981 compared to 1980. Farm bankruptcies are up 70 per cent in the same period. We have the highest interest rates we can remember in Canada. We have an indication that the CPI for heating oil was up in May, 1981, 44.8 per cent over May of 1980. The statistics go on.

However, for the individual Canadians across the country, they are not statistics; these are real problems which they have to deal with every day as they try to make their way through life, feeding their families and building their futures. The tragic and unforgivable thing about this government is that it knows it could act to help some of those Canadians. It knows, for example, that the mortgage tax credit proposal that my government introduced, and which the Liberals and NDP voted against, would be paying $100 a month today to every Canadian with a $30,000 mortgage. It would help that Canadian keep his or her home against the high cost of interest. The government knows it could bring in an energy tax credit to help low and middle-income Canadians. It knows it could act in other ways to protect victims of inflation and high interest rates, but it will not do that. Why not? Because it prefers to spend $1.5 billion on an oil company it does not need. It puts buying oil companies over helping meet the needs of individual Canadians across the country. That is an inforgivable priority for any government facing economic circumstances such as those we have in Canada today.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Clark: This, sir, is a government whose priorities are absolutely wrong. It is following its own selfish course and is blind to the real needs of individual Canadians across the country. Nothing is more typical of that attitude than the desire of this government to have the House of Commons get up and go home while postal workers are on strike and Canadians are denied the right of mail service. We want that resolved by negotiation, but if that fails, there is only one institution in the land that can restore mail service, and that is Parliament. The business of Parliament is to stay here and be ready to act rather than to run off. If this government cared about the people of Canada and cared about its responsibilities, it would demand that Parliament stay and be ready to do its duty. The government might walk away from its duty, but this party will not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We intend to keep this Parliament on the job until we can be assured that the postal workers will be back on the job.

Let me review some of the unhappy facts about the postal situation. They are unfortunately known to most people in the country. At midnight on June 30, some 23,000 postal clerks and mail handlers went on strike. The government knows that the people who suffer most are Canadians in need of postal service, people who need to receive their government cheques and small businesses which are paralysed and cannot keep functioning without that kind of service. The important thing in this situation is that the postal strike was absolutely unnecessary. It could have been avoided. It is a strike by choice, not the choice of the union, but a strike by choice of the Liberal government. This is why we have a postal strike in the country today. It could have been averted by the federal government.

The government refused to go back to the bargaining table for a difference of less than 2 per cent. The difference between what the government was offering and the cost of the conciliation board report was less than 2 per cent, yet the government maintained that the board's recommendation could not even form the basis of negotiation. The government was not interested in keeping the mail service going. The government was interested in forcing a strike by a union it knew to be unpopular. That is how we got into this situation, and that is clear to every Canadian who has followed the negotiations and who knows that what separated the parties was 2 per cent in terms of money and a determination on the part of the Government of Canada to force the postal workers out. We in this party are determined to have the postal workers back at work preferably by negotiation, but in any event back at work so that Canadians can count upon their mail being delivered.

Let me speak for a moment about the government's record in labour relations. For the government to force a strike by the postal workers should not be surprising to anyone who has known its record. One only has to look at what happened in the government's treatment of disputes in the past. One example is the Radio Canada strike which dragged on for eight months, interestingly for eight months during the discussion of the constitutional question in the House of Commons. Another example is the current CBC strike which is over 50 days old. Last fall some 48,000 clerks were out on strike. This means that in the last eight months alone nearly one quarter of the public servants under the direct authority of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) have been out on strike. The government's record with respect to postal disputes since 1968 has included 12 strikes, virtually one strike for every year of office. This indicates a terrible record of labour relations by the government. In the meantime, while the government plays its political games with CUPW, those who suffer real and deep damage are Canadians awaiting government cheques, old age pensioners, widows, small businessmen, and others across the country.

It is estimated by the Canadian Organization of Small Business that there will be between 1,000 and 1,500 bankruptcies per week as a result of the postal strike. It is estimated also that 6,000 to 9,000 jobs will be lost each week and that direct mail business people will lose several million dollars every day the strike continues.

The postal strike creates unsolvable problems for most small and middle-sized businesses in Canada. I have received many phone calls at my office for the last 11 days in support of my representations to try and convince the government to take the necessary steps to settle the strike. Many small businesses in Canada will not be able to survive for long if this situation continues a few more days or a week. Let me give one precise example. I could give 1,000, 5,000 or 10,000 more but I want to stress the case of MSC Ltée of Sherbrooke, in Quebec, in the Eastern Townships. That company is a Quebec small business.

It buys, manufactures, imports and sells sewing and handicraft products to businesses in Quebec, the maritimes and Ontario. It generally has 40 full-time employees. Customers' orders are received and goods delivered by mail.

At a pinch, shipping could be done through Voyageur bus services but Voyageur is on strike. As a result, the company had to lay off thirty of its workers. Thirty out of a staff of forty have now lost their jobs because of government procrastination and unwillingness to settle the postal problem. The president of that small business, Jean-Guy Cyr, told us this morning that he was very concerned about the future of his business should the postal strike last another one or two weeks. He added he is not the only one in such a position; all his suppliers, customers and customers of his customers have to lay off or shut down. Mr. Speaker, this is a concrete and precise example. There are thousands more in all Canadian cities and towns.

[English]

I think it might be interesting for the House to have just a quick survey of some of the damage which is being done to individual Canadians by this postal strike, by this government forcing the union to go out and now indicating that it is prepared to wait a long time to have postal service restored.

In Victoria, British Columbia, over 250 people who are eligible for United States pensions or other benefits went yesterday to the office of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) to give him written authority to pick up their U.S. social security cheques from the U.S. consul in Vancouver. These cheques represent the main means of livelihood for these senior citizens. This is one group we know about. We do not know about other senior citizens who do not realize they can go to their member of Parliament or do not know what route to follow to ensure that they obtain the cheques they need to maintain their living.

Let me bring to the attention of the House of Commons the problem of a very small business in Dundas, Ontario, namely, McMaster Pottery. It is a small business with 21 employees. The company must close the plant for the rest of the summer and lay off the 21 employees because it cannot receive its incoming orders or accounts and it cannot do its billing.

The Edmonton Chamber of Commerce indicates that the effect of the mail strike on business, especially on small business, has been simply devastating. The feeling in the business community is such that a meeting of businessmen was called for noon today for the express purpose of discussing the particular problem. It is probable the meeting will recommend the boycott by the business community of all government accounts. In other words, there will be a stoppage of payment of anything owing to the government, be it payroll deductions or income tax. According to a spokesman of the chamber of commerce, in many cases $40,000 to $50,000 cash flow is tied up in the post office. He could not give specific details as to how many businesses are being affected or how many are near the brink of disaster, but he did say that the telephones have not stopped ringing in his office and that the feeling in the business community of that particular city is very grim.

I should like to refer to the case of Burlington, Ontario. A company called Brant Insulation laid off most of its employees because its cash flow has dried up. When the company tried to collect an account it was told, "It is in the mail". But when it is in the mail in Canada today, it means that it is nowhere. Minuteman Press in Burlington has released half its staff and the balance will go this weekend if no settlement is reached. Alpha Davis of Burlington indicates that mail accepted for delivery more than a week before the strike date is undelivered, which leads it to believe that this might have been some plan to plug the system before the strike deadline. Most independent insurance agents are hard hit because of delays in policy renewals. The money is not coming in, the policies are not going out. This means that many individual Canadians are exposed to risks with no insurance coverage because of the mail strike.

I should like to refer to the case of a very small business in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island. It is a flower shop called Hearts and Flowers. It has five employees and is owner-operated. Usually it receives its payments on account in the amount of $2,000 to $3,000 each week. Now, because of the strike, the shop's cash flow is cut in half. On the island fewer people use credit cards than they do in many other parts of the country, thus, that particular blow is doubly damaging to that small business operation in the city of Charlottetown.

I would like to refer to a letter sent to my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). It is from L.U.L Publications and it reads as follows:

I have just finished laying off our entire staff of 17 people because of the postal strike.

Our customers are located in the three western provinces, and we rely on the postal service to deliver our products, and therefore on the postal service to receive payments from our customers.

The majority of these 17 people will be applying for unemployment insurance, which is an expense to the "Canadian Taxpayer".

Also the following companies are our suppliers, and we will not be placing orders with them. I know the volume we handle will not put them out of business, but they will have a decrease in orders:

Premier Matches Limited
Trendcraft
Hi-Signs
Edmonton Screen Craft
Sheltered Workshop
West Web Printers
Allied Printers
Barber Ellis
A.G.T.

These are but a sampling drawn together at random this morning which shows the impact upon individual Canadians, companies, citizens, businesses, and people who want to keep jobs but cannot when the postal service does not work. The government can sit back and say, "We will be tough. We will force these guys out and we will not be forced to act quickly to bring them back." The government has the luxury of being tough. The people, whose cases I have just cited, do not have that luxury of being tough; they cannot hang tough. They will go under. The government has the responsibility to stop Canadians from going under, not to force them to go under.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We never know the full impact of something like this strike until after it is over. The one thing that is clear is that it will cost the Canadian public many times more than what a settlement with CUPW would have cost them.

One way of judging the cost to the Canadian economy is to look at what happened in 1975 when there was an interruption of postal services. According to a survey undertaken by the St. Catharines Chamber of Commerce in 1975, the average daily loss to local businesses in St. Catharines during that 42-day postal strike was $38 per day. It was further deduced by the Chamber of Commerce that, city-wide, this represented a daily loss of some $200,000. At today's rate, with our dollar's purchasing power eroding, that $200,000 is clearly understating the case. In fact, the Chamber has learned recently that some of the 1975 totals have already been reached in St. Catharines. Therefore, even if we do nothing to transpose 1975 figures into 1981 dollars, we can assume that St. Catharines, Ontario has already suffered a business loss of at least $1,600,000.

Some industries, industries spread across the country, are more particularly hurt than others. The big industries can handle it. The big guys like big governments can usually look after themselves. It is the smaller industries and the smaller individuals who cannot.

For example, the direct mailing advertising industry in 1975, according to its report, lost an estimated $37 million on revenues of $250 million. A 42-day strike in 1981, if it goes on as long now as it did then, will cost this sector 15 per cent of its yearly revenues, or $61.5 million. We are asking these industries and these individuals to bear that kind of burden because the Government of Canada would not sit down and negotiate a 2 per cent difference between themselves and the postal workers. That is the context in which we must see this issue. The government might say that it is saving people money. For whom is it saving money? Is it saving money for the florist in Charlottetown who is being forced out of business? Is it saving money for the businesses in St. Catharines who are losing sales? Is it saving money for the business in Sherbrooke which is forced to lay people off and cut sales? It is costing these Canadians money and opportunity. It is doing exactly the opposite of what a government should be doing in this kind of circumstance.

The tragic fact is that the longer the strike goes on the higher the cost will be to Canadians. We on this side of the House do not intend to go home until there is some reasonable assurance that mail service will be restored in the country. The government provoked the strike; it is for the government to show its good faith and bring the union back to the negotiating table for final resolution of the issues which are in dispute. In the last analysis, back to work legislation has to be considered if no other solution is found because Canadians cannot be left in the grips of a postal strike during the summer.

As I said before, the government might think that it has the luxury of waiting. Again today the President of the Privy Council said, with all the security he has as a well paid minister of the Crown, that they will not settle or legislate a settlement. He has said, "Let them suffer."

Mr. Cousineau: That is not what he said.

Mr. Clark: That is the clear implication of his statement when he indicated that the Government of Canada would not consider using the legislative instruments open to it. The clear implication of that is that the Canadians who are losing their jobs and their incomes can go right on losing them because the Liberal government does not care about the ordinary people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The fundamental point here is that a minister of the Crown might have the luxury of saying that he can tough it out. He can wait; most Canadians do not have that luxury. For some Canadians, some of the people we are here to represent, whose interests we are here to protect, it is merely an acute inconvenience. For the elderly, people cut off from their families and friends, it is merely an acute inconvenience. But if you know older Canadians and the degree to which they count on the mails, you will know that it is an inconvenience that cuts deeply into their lives. It cuts deeply, even though it is an inconvenience, into the lives of young people who might be waiting for word on jobs, or for people who might be awaiting documents or payments in the mail.

But for others it is much more than an inconvenience, it is a literal tragedy to be without their mail in this country. It can be the breaking of their lives. People who have laboured long to put together small enterprises, people who have worked hard to keep and to earn jobs are now being forced, because the government will not negotiate a settlement, to see their businesses put at risk, to see their jobs put in jeopardy. These individual Canadians cannot afford to have their government play games with their future.

The Government of Canada has two alternatives. One is to negotiate a settlement. The other is back to work legislation. The one thing which is not acceptable is to do nothing. The government created this burden for Canadians and it must resolve that burden. A Parliament which rises now is one which turns its back on its responsibility to be here immediately in case there is a need for Parliament to act. We have here a House of Commons which is not working to solve the problems of our country. That is not the fault of the institution of Parliament; it is the fault of the direction of the policies brought before the Parliament by the government. We have a Parliament and a government whose initiatives and policies are having the effect of dividing the country more dangerously than it has been divided at any time in our past.

We have a government which ignores the real problems of real people. An opposition in the Parliament of Canada has only very limited weapons. I talked about those when I began my remarks. On some occasions we can be ingenious in the use of our weapons to ensure that the public interest is protected. But there are very serious restrictions on what we can do as an opposition. We cannot hold Liberal members of Parliament here forever. We cannot force the government to be here forever. We cannot even force it to do its duty and negotiate a settlement or bring in back to work legislation. But we do have a duty to Parliament to try to force this government to accept its responsibility to the people of Canada. We have a duty to try to force the government to restore the mail service in this country, to recognize that it is not here for its own pleasure but is here to serve the interests of individual Canadians, to solve the problems of individual Canadians. There is no indication at all on the part of this government that it intends to do anything to restore mail service in this country. Until we get an indication of a serious determination to restore the mail service in this country, we in the Progressive Conservative Party intend to prolong this adjournment debate as long as we can.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Deniger) on a point of order.

Mr. Deniger: Would the Leader of the Opposition allow me one or two questions so that I may properly understand his rationale and the conclusions he suggests to the House?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With the consent of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Clark: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deniger: Mr. Speaker, I did appreciate the comments of the Leader of the Opposition. I think he eloquently made a very strong case about the specific impact of a postal strike on the Canadian people. He mentioned some particular cases and rightly so, and many more could be added. However, does the Leader of the Opposition think that the right to strike should be taken away from postal workers? If not, does the Leader of the Opposition think that we should immediately legislate them back to work?

Mr. Clark: I want to answer very briefly, Mr. Speaker. I think it would be a mistake to take away the right to strike from postal workers. The hon. member will remember that we have suggested another way of settling disputes in the public sector. I hope this government will be prepared to implement such a solution. But, at least until we have a more efficient mechanism, we must respect the right of the workers to strike, and we must also recognize the right of Parliament to act in case of emergency to provide services. Back to work legislation immediately? Of course not. If, as I often said, we can reach a negotiated settlement, that would be a lot better. But the government must show evidence that it is really determined to reach such a settlement by negotiation.

Mr. Deniger: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. Leader of the Opposition allow a supplementary question?

Mr. Clark: Certainly.

Mr. Deniger: Mr. Speaker, I share many of the feelings which were expressed by the Leader of the Opposition, but I would like to get things clear. The motion put forward by our House leader does provide that at any time prior to that date if the government becomes convinced that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied and thereupon the House shall meet in due time. Therefore, does the Leader of the Opposition not agree that the guarantee which he is seeking can be found in the notice of motion introduced by the Government House leader?

Mr. Clark: With this motion, the government alone is deciding what the public interest requires. We have no confidence in the government to make such a decision. It is for Parliament to make that judgment. We are here and we intend to stay here to allow Parliament, not just the government, to decide what the public interest, the Canadian interest requires. We consider bankruptcies, problems affecting individuals, people losing their jobs, as a serious situation and a threat to public interest. We do not want to leave Ottawa and let the government decide on a matter of public interest, when we feel that Parliament is a much better judge of the matter than the government.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise not to speak in this debate, but on a point of order. There are certain discussions taking place this afternoon in which my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa is involved which, we dare to hope, might be fruitful. I believe the Leader of the Opposition has been informed of these discussions. Because they are taking place, we feel it would be better not to speak at this time. I should like to reserve my right to speak later in the debate, if it goes on.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak as one individual member of Parliament this afternoon and say that I am appalled at the government's attitude that this Parliament should rise for a three-month holiday, that this Parliament should walk away while the country remains in the grip of a strike which is so badly hurting the Canadian people. I find it unconscionable that the Liberal government should propose that we leave countless thousands of Canadians in a situation where they are deprived of a service that so many people depend upon for their livelihood, their jobs, their pay cheques and the welfare of their families.

How could a Government of Canada possibly be so insensitive to the welfare of so many Canadians? How could the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) make such an unbelievable statement as he did on Monday of this week when he said that he did not want his government to legislate the postal workers back to their jobs because he did not think the postal workers would obey that order?

I want to read into the record a commentary from a former colleague of mine in the parliamentary press gallery who is now a reporter on CFRA, Mr. Hal Anthony. On July 7 he said:

> Canadians reached a plateau of sorts yesterday. They were told by their Prime Minister that the government will not introduce a certain piece of legislation because it wouldn't be obeyed.
> The elected representatives of the people are running scared, afraid of a powerful and determined union.
> The possibility of levying heavy fines seems to have escaped the government. The thought of sending postal union leaders to jail is enough to paralyse the Canadian government. If the government were to stand on a principle and say, "Having given the posties the right to strike we cannot now forbid a strike," one could understand that. But no, the Canadian government quite clearly is caving in to blackmail. The private and public sectors are already shuddering about their own union contracts should the posties win the day. They cannot be allowed to win all they are asking for . . . that's clear to just about everybody except organized labour. But the government is ducking the issue and uncounted thousands of Canadians will pay the price. The anguish and economic hardship is being felt across the land, but the government backs away, fearful of enacting a law it doesn't want to enforce. It's a sorry day for Canada, and for all of us.

We could not agree more with our leader that we as parliamentarians simply cannot walk away from an issue that this government may want to run away from but that the people want brought to a dead halt.

I do not like to face the prospect of going back to my constituents and telling them that I as a member on this side of the House or, indeed, a member of Parliament on any side of the House, did not do the best we could; that we in the official opposition did not do the best we could to convince the government to be sensible for once, to public opinion and to listen to this very real expression of public concern. It is a widespread expression of concern.

I want to say right now that I resent an aside made earlier today by the Leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Oshawa. He said that we on this side preach the right to strike and then want to shut one down the moment a strike gets going. As the Leader of the New Democratic Party pointed out, it will be two weeks on Monday since this strike has been crippling the nation.

The principle of the right to strike in the public service is one thing. It is an arguable principle for some of us on this side, but it is now an accepted fact of life. A prolonged strike in such an essential public service as the Post Office is quite something else again. And we, as elected representatives, feel we should do whatever we can on behalf of the hundreds of thousands of Canadians affected by this strike. They may not care about the niceties and technicalities or the crucial aspects of whether one more body is added to the negotiating table. We think it is up to this House of Commons to get that strike stopped in the absence of successful negotiations at the table. I share the hope of my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that maybe there will be some hope of getting the parties back to the negotiating table and getting a negotiated settlement. I repeat, if we do not have that negotiated settlement, it is up to this House of Commons to get this strike stopped, get the mails flowing again and to get into place some mechanism, some way of reconciling the right to strike with the chaos that results when the whole country is held up for ransom by the disruption of an essential public service.

I believe we have to think through very carefully about what services are essential in this society. But even our friends to the left cannot deny that the Post Office and the movement of mail is indeed a vitally essential public service and worthy of the concern of this Parliament before we take a three-month holiday. My opinion is shared by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. All members of Parliament receive copies of Mandate. We all take this group of businessmen seriously. The federation plea is "end the chaos". In one of its publications we read:

> We're mad. In fact federal members are seething over the public sector strikes that so badly affect the health and survival of the country's small and medium-sized enterprises.
> Strike after public service strike has created chaos.
> Post office unions are among the worst offenders, but the strike, go-slow, work-to-rule mentality has, over time, tied up everything from airlines to police protection services.

In my view, the Mandate article has real credibility. The federation makes a very strong case about what happens to strikes in any part of the public service, but especially in the Post Office. As I said, I think it would be unconscionable for this Parliament to adjourn for the summer without coming up with some form of legislation recommending some solution to end this strike in the absence of negotiation.

People keep talking about bad faith being shown on both sides of the postal dispute. But the ultimate act of bad faith would be shown by the Parliament of Canada to the people of this country if we were to take our three-month holiday and leave this nation in the grip of a postal union whose actions are crippling the country and causing all sorts of economic hardships to the people of Canada.

My leader touched on the costs of the 1975 mail strike and what that could mean in 1981 dollar terms. The 1975 strike lasted 42 days. According to the Canadian Direct Mail Marketing Association, the expected loss to the Canadian economy for a 1981 postal strike of the same timing and duration as the 1975 strike is $407.6 million, which amounts to $9.7 million per day.

Reference was made earlier to Mary McMaster's pottery operation in my home town of Dundas, Ontario. That pottery business is a small business with 21 employees. Mrs. McMaster has closed down her plant for the rest of the summer, laying off 21 people because she cannot receive incoming orders or accounts and she cannot do her billing. Understandably, Mrs. McMaster is fed up with the Post Office. She is fed up with the strikes and the salaries disputes. In fact, she is fed up with the whole civil service. Mrs. MacMaster feels, and she is just one of many hundreds of thousands of Canadians expressing this view, that it is totally irresponsible for this Parliament to recess during the postal strike, abandoning thousands of small business owners to deal with this colossal problem on their own. Having talked to Mary McMaster myself, I know what a problem this will be for her because having laid off these 21 employees, it will take her months to gear everything up again. There are many thousands of businesses which are like Mary McMaster's.

People on the government side who are trying to duck this issue and run away from it ask what positive proposal we have on this side. I would suggest that perhaps we return to the idea of a public interest disputes commission. This proposal was made by the former postmaster general, the hon. member for Vancouver South, when the Conservative government was in power. He said:

> It is recognized that sometimes the private right to strike or lockout must give way to the larger public right to receive essential services, whether those services are provided in the public or the private sector.

In order to help prevent recourse to strikes affecting essential services, the Progressive Conservative Party advocates the establishment of a public interest disputes commission. This was first recommended in 1968 by Dean H. D. Woods and others who made up the federally appointed Task Force on Canadian Industrial Relations. The Task Force Report said:

> "The public has an interest in being protected from the hardship caused by work stoppages which interrupt the supply of essential goods and services."

However, while some services are easily defined in advance as "essential" a strike can have effects under some circumstances that are not easily anticipated.

Again, I come back to Mary McMaster and the 21 employees that she had to lay off about 48 hours ago.

The Woods report listed seven factors that should be considered in finding solutions to essential service disputes. Because labour relations are not nearly as simple as some believe, these factors need to be understood and are set out exactly as they appear in the report. I will not take the time to read that report into the record. It may be found elsewhere in Hansard. But a public interest disputes commission would be a new approach, a better management-labour climate in both the public and the private sectors. The report states that new approaches are working in other jurisdictions and, where compatible, experience gained in these other areas may well be incorporated along with the Woods report suggestions.

We on this side have said we will consult with labour and management and prepare legislation for introduction to Parliament once we become the Government of Canada again. This is an idea which we are dusting off, but it is an important one. Labour and management relations are essentially a matter of human relations. Just passing more laws is not the answer. We believe that the public interests disputes commission is a step toward establishing a more effective framework for the settlement of legitimate issues. It could serve to minimize work stoppages in essential services.

In closing these brief remarks, I would like to reiterate that this Parliament and we as elected representatives have a right and a duty to speak on behalf of the Canadian people. We want to ensure that we are representing their best interests. Their best interests right now are served by getting the mail going again. However the mail gets going, whether it is through a negotiated settlement or Parliament legislating the CUPW workers back to work, we will not know until after the weekend. However, in the final analysis, we the representatives in this institution are responsible to the Canadian people to keep one of the most essential and fundamental Canadian services going. That is Her Majesty's Royal Mail, Canada's post office. That is why we feel it would be dead wrong for this House to rise this afternoon leaving the country in the grips of this crippling and very unfortunate postal strike.

Mr. Fennell: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to discuss the matter of the adjournment of this House which has been brought forward by the President of the Privy Council. During his remarks, he explained in a glorious fashion how his government had 61 bills passed through this House.

An hon. Member: Sixty-five.

Mr. Fennell: Sixty-five, 103. I wish to state unequivocally that I could not agree with at least 66 per cent of those bills. They will destroy the economy of Canada and take away the rights of Canadian citizens. They are bills which will expropriate the property of Canadians. The government has not accomplished very much since the session began in April, 1980.

The postal strike is very critical. It is hurting every person in this country. The large corporations need not worry, just the little guys who cannot collect the dollars. The banks will extend them money. With interest rates at 22 per cent, I can understand why a bank would be delighted to extend credit. We are not looking after the people of this country.

Concerns have been raised in this House about blood samples getting to hospitals. There are many examples of how this strike is destroying Canada just as much as the legislation that has been passed in this session. I support the Leader of the Opposition in his belief that we should stay here in order to give a message to the Canadian public that the government and the unions should get their act together and resolve this matter. I do not say we should necessarily give in to the union because this new round of wage increases will result in increased inflation. It is all we have seen in this House in this last session.

When they sit down at the table, the government blames the union and the union blames the government. Now they are all blaming Mike Warren who is being brought in as an extra. They cannot even do their own work without bringing in somebody who has not even started his job. He is to be chief executive officer of a corporation which has not yet been formed. If he can do it, that is great and I will give him credit. He may be successful. He has had a good deal of experience with a Conservative government in a part of this country. Perhaps a Conservative civil servant will be able to help out.

I would like to refer to some of the things the government has not accomplished and to which I take objection. This is the year of the handicapped. I attempted to move a motion under Standing Order 43 and raised a question in this House. I also wrote to the Minister of State for Finance asking for some relief for the handicapped people of this country who must use braces but are not in wheelchairs. I received the most ridiculous answer from the minister. Six weeks ago I wrote him a second letter, but I have not yet received an answer. This is why I complain that we should not be going home for a holiday until we accomplish what we have set out to do.

This is the year of the disabled. If the government were to protect one segment of our society, it could have been the handicapped. I came upon a situation where a gentleman suffered through 36 hours in the Toronto-Dominion Centre. They did not give a damn about him. That is exactly how this government feels about the citizens of this country who are affected by the mail not getting through. The only ones to gain will be the banks. The large oil companies will not suffer but the smaller ones will. They will not be able to get their working agreements with other companies through the mail.

Maybe it is time to look philosophically at the Post Office. Maybe the government's opinion is that if we leave them out long enough, the private sector may pick up. That is fine for those businesses and individuals who can afford it. However, we must address the situation of senior citizens who will not receive their cheques, as well as needy Canadians such as the handicapped who are not capable of going to government offices to pick up cheques. We must look after the unemployed who are out of work as a result of the poor economic policies of this government. To say they can stay out for two years and the private sector will look after them will not work. It will destroy small business and many individuals.

This government boasts about its great legislation. I would like to refer to one of the great pieces of legislation of all time, the National Energy Program. It has brought this country to its knees. I hope Lalonde and Leitch are using the federal express to correspond with each other.

Recently I had an opportunity to visit western Canada where I met with small service operators. It is not only those in the west who are going into bankruptcy. This is hurting every segment of industry in Ontario. When you bring the industrial heartland to its knees, you create a chaos from which this country cannot recover. Much as I would like to be lying beside my swimming pool or playing tennis, I would be willing to stay here till hell freezes over, and perhaps this place is the closest we will come to that, or at least stay here until next winter in order to try to get something moving.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

PENSIONS

SUGGESTED LOWERING OF AGE ELIGIBILITY AND INCREASE IN MONTHLY BENEFITS

The House resumed, from Monday, June 2, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan to provide for the pensions payable under these two acts to be available at age 60 to all persons who meet the other requirements of the said acts and who are not in or are prepared to withdraw from the labour market, and also to provide for the basic amount of the pension payable under the Old Age Security Act, at age 60 for those not in the labour market and to everyone at age 65, to be increased to $400 per month, for this basic amount to be escalated each year by an amount that will enable pensioners not only to keep up with rising living costs but to share in rising standards, and also to provide for the elimination of any means or income test from the Old Age Security Act, so that the full pension thereunder will be recognized as the established right of all our people.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, this is an interesting motion which was last debated on June 2, 1980. It is a rather lengthy motion which includes more than one idea. The motion would provide for the payment of pensions at the age of 60 to all persons who are not in the labour market or who are prepared to withdraw from it. It would also provide for an increase in the old age security payment, that is, the basic payment as opposed to the increases that the Liberal government has recently given in the supplement. While I am sure the concern on all parts of the House is equal for people who are finding it difficult to manage on a fixed income, the different philosophies of the different political parties would, of course, suggest different approaches. Retirement at age 60 is something which is also being proposed now, I understand, by the newly elected socialist government of France, partly as an answer to the question of youth unemployment. Its slogan, I believe, goes something like: "Less work so that everybody works".

The approach includes not only early retirement, but also a shortening of the work week. This, of course, is one approach to youth unemployment, but we will have to watch it with some interest to see if, in fact, it proves to be effective because the jobs which are vacated by 60-year old experienced workers are not necessarily the jobs which will be suitable for 20-year-old or 18-year-old persons who are unskilled and inexperienced.

The other aspect, of course, is the problem of income maintenance for older people. This is very real. We all know that the poorest people in Canada at the present time are older women who have not been in the labour force long enough to have acquired pension credits. Women generally have interrupted careers and work at the kinds of jobs which do not carry private pension plans. In any case, the private pension plans in Canada have generally not served their members well. But whether increasing the old age security for everyone and making it available after age 60 is going to answer this, or is the best way to answer it, I think is very much open to debate.

The hon. member's motion would also eliminate any means test. The Liberal party's position has been to try to assist first those who most need assistance. Therefore, we have opted to increase the old age supplement, that is, the part of income maintenance which is means tested. We have increased this, and we will try to manage further increases for those people who are clearly in need of assistance. We would give a much lower priority to increasing the old age security, that is, the basic part of the plan which is paid to everyone, whether they need it or not, and whether they are wealthy or poor.

The fact that we would put the first emphasis on increasing the supplement rather than on the basic part of the pension does not, of course, alter the fact that we know that pensions, generally, in Canada are greatly in need of improvement. The Committee which was so ably chaired by Senator Croll produced some very interesting figures, and also a number of different solutions which I think should be looked at with at least as much attention as the particular solution advanced by the hon. member in this motion. That particular report suggested widening the eligibility of people to pay into the Canada Pension Plan, increasing the contributions, with the aim of everyone receiving more substantial Canada Pension Plan at the end of a career.

In terms of the question of retirement at the age of 60, this again is perhaps a question where one would like to see considerably more flexibility. Again, the report of the committee which was chaired by Senator Croll does, in fact, suggest flexible retirement ages because clearly there are many people who wish to work long after the age of 60 and are very capable of doing so. Increasingly, people are not only living longer but are also remaining healthy and active longer. On the other hand, there are people, particularly people who have done hard manual work, who are tired and who might wish to retire at age 60 or even earlier.

In my own constituency, I find that many people are having great difficulty in working, even by their mid-fifties, people who have worked very hard at backbreaking work in construction who have perhaps had an accident or two. People who, although intelligent, have not had the opportunity to upgrade their qualifications can find themselves at a very distinct disadvantage in the labour force long before the age of sixty. Indeed, I would like to see, as a higher priority, some special plans for people in that age group, for the older construction worker who is tired but who, once his physical strength has gone, is finding it very difficult to acquire the skills which would let him move into another type of job.

There was another aspect of the hon. member's motion which also gives me pause. The suggestion in the hon. member's motion that old age security for everyone be increased at age 60 without a means test, would mean a substantial cost. If that cost appreciably improves the lot of Canadians, then of course I would not quarrel with it because there are certain costs which have to be met in terms of social justice and humanity. However, as I think of the number of working poor, the number of families where one parent or both work very hard because they have a large family, and as I think of the needs of poor children in our society, I wonder if the shift of revenues toward older people and away from young people is necessarily in the best interest of society. My own preference would be for something in the nature of a guaranteed annual income, something which assists people of every age, whether employed or not, to have a standard of living which meets what most of us would consider to be a decent standard and which allows them to raise their children and educate their children—if they still have children of that age—without undue stress on both parents. We are increasingly seeing families with parents who are thoughtful and caring and who have much to give to their children, but are obliged to work such long hours that they spend little time with them. Something in the nature of a guaranteed annual income—one can call it by what name one would choose—it seems to me would meet the needs of both older people who need income supplements and also the needs of some of these young parents who are struggling to give their children a healthy lifestyle and exhausting themselves in the process.

In closing, I would like to say that, while I appreciate and respect the concern about poverty among older people which is shown by the hon. member's motion, I would rather see an approach which would assist all poor people in Canada to use their own resources and to have the kind of equality of opportunity we would like everyone to have, whether young or old.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I too rise to speak in the debate on the motion put forward last June 2, 1980 by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It is a great honour to speak to this motion presented by a person who has fought so hard for so many years for older people in Canada.

As the last speaker mentioned, the motion concerns amendments to the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan. Although we are pleased to have this matter brought forward today, it is interesting that for some rather mysterious reason it is brought forward after last evening when members of Parliament voted themselves a generous pay increase. I think many of us recall the speeches made and the pleas made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre last night on behalf of senior citizens across our land. I hope this bodes well for pensioners today and that there will be unanimous agreement on this motion, although I cannot help but comment that we have fewer than one dozen members of Parliament sitting listening to the debate on this motion on a Friday afternoon.

The motion put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre over one year ago includes a number of points which I will quickly review. The motion concerns old age security and the guaranteed income supplement, as well as the Canada Pension Plan. In his motion the hon. member recommends that these plans should be available at age 60. It should not be for everyone but for those who are not in the labour market or those who choose—and they should have the right to choose—at age 60 to retire. They should have the assurance that they have adequate incomes on which to survive.

In his speech last year the hon. member pointed out that this also would make many more jobs available for young people in a rapidly tightening market situation. This, of course, is not the main reason for the proposal, and we hasten to point out that we would support the flexible retirement plans suggested by Senator Croll which would allow people to choose at age 60 either to work or to retire with adequate pensions as a right and not just as a token welfare gesture.

The motion also recommends increasing the old age pension to $400 for those aged 60 who are not working and for all people at age 65, the age upon which our universal old age pension is based.

The motion also recommends that the Canadian Pension Plan be reviewed and be changed so that it is available at age 60. This would make a consistent policy for all older people.

I think we should note also that the motion mentions several points which in effect are goals that we in the New Democratic Party would say are important goals for pensions and for older people. We should eliminate the means or income test so that pensions are a right and not offered as a matter of charity. We would see implicit in this that there must be tax reforms which would ensure that wealthy people receiving these pensions would be taxed back and that that money would go into the kitty in order to make this a universal and equitable plan.

I would like to make a personal reference. I have a neighbour next door whose name is Buster, a man in his eighties who never lets me forget the needs of senior citizens, just as my hon. colleague does not.

Mr. Knowles: Good for Buster.

Mrs. Mitchell: Because of him I could not vote on the bill last night, although I acknowledge that it is needed and certainly is just from the point of view of the work of members of Parliament. If Buster had been here yesterday, he would have been demonstrating outside, just as my colleague was demonstrating inside. He would have been fighting, not against pay for the very hard work members of Parliament do, but for a fair and adequate guaranteed income for the pioneers of our land.

Buster is typical of many west coast pioneers. He came from Ontario to the prairies when he was a young man. He worked on the prairies before the depression in days when things were very difficult. Then he moved to British Columbia. He worked in remote areas of the north. As a mechanic he repaired ships and often travelled up and down the British Columbia coast, stopping in at Indian villages and so forth. During the war he kept ships in repair. He worked hard to keep our navy in the state of repair which was needed. However, of all the experiences in his lifetime, this man will never forget the shame and indignity during the depression years. This pioneer was proud of his independence and worked hard all his life. He will never forget the indignity of having to ask for welfare to support his young family at a certain period during the depression. As we do, he believes that an old age pension and a guaranteed adequate income should be a right and that it should never, never be a charity for which people must beg or suffer indignity.

What is happening to our senior citizens today? In one's year time things are worse, not better. Granted, the Liberals fulfilled their one single token election promise and brought forward an extra $35 a month for senior citizens, but even with indexing this still leaves single senior citizens far below the poverty line, the poverty line for a single person being recognized as $5,500.

So even if we pass the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the combined old age pension and GIS will total only $4,800 per year, still below the poverty line. It is a year later and we should probably be going for more than a $400 increase. The cost of living for every senior citizen and every person aged 60 has gone up phenomenally in one year. Rents for the average older person in Vancouver are now far in excess of 60 per cent of their income. The cost of food is more than double. Fuel costs are up, and we have no cost of living supplement to help people in that regard. Taxes for those who own their own homes are up. Of course, we have extreme variations in the cost of living across Canada.

I put in a plea as well for increased pensions. We should also have shelter allowances, particularly to help older people faced with exorbitant costs of shelter, whether it be their own home or rental accommodation. We certainly must have pensions increased to at least $400 a month. If you think of your own parents or friends in the 60 year old age group, with the changing employment situation and the fact that as people get older they have to retrain or be forced out of the labour force, surely it is reasonable to give people a choice at that age of whether to continue in the work force or to retire with dignity.

I would like to speak for a moment to the pensions, which do not at all provide for the needs of women. My friend and colleague mentioned this in his speech last year, and many times since then. We know the system discriminates against women, particularly those in that very important class of workers, the homemakers and parents raising children. They are in effect raising the new generation. Many of our women now reaching 40, 50 and 60 years of age have worked very hard in raising their families. In the case of women on the farm, for example, they have carried on another full-time job as well. In recent years, of course, they have worked in industrial areas and in the community, as well as in the home.

Now, if we could just think a moment about the working conditions of the homemakers. Their job requires long hours, particularly when children are younger. They have no control over the working hours and they work seven days a week. They have no pensions, no benefits and no holidays because even on their holidays they usually go off with their families and do the same things they do at home, only under more difficult circumstances. In essence, they are workers in a most terrible and deplorable situation, yet they have no financial compensation. They have no cheque coming in that they can consider their own, that they can go and spend, probably on the family, but at least something they can decide to spend in their own right. They have no money to pay into the Canada Pension Plan, which brings us back to this motion. It is really very important that we begin to look at how this group of workers can have some form of income. We have some proposals on that which I will perhaps speak to another day, which will give them an allowance and give them the choice of working outside the home when children are younger, and thereby enable them to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan.

In British Columbia over the past year the New Democratic Party sponsored a task force on older women. We travelled to many parts of British Columbia, remote areas in the interior as well as the larger metropolitan areas. We spoke to many women in their middle and older years and those who work with and are concerned about women in that age group. Without exception, every group presenting briefs, every man or woman who spoke on the situation, stressed that we in Canada have to change the pension system so that women who are likely to be unemployed in their 50s or 60s, if not earlier, have a decent guaranteed income. In addition, they should have decent pensions to protect them as they get older.

We are pleased, of course, that the bill concerning widows went through yesterday. That is one step, but it is not enough. We have to have adequate pensions for everyone, but particularly for women and particularly at age 60. The Liberal party—and I am sorry all the representatives of the Liberal party left the House during this discussion on pensions, which I hope is in the record.

Mr. Knowles: Not one Liberal is now in the House.

Mrs. Mitchell: The Liberals have talked about pensions as being the responsibility of the private sector. We have had a number of conferences recently, such as the national pension conference which was limited to private sector input, and we have had Liberals, particularly the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) condemning the private sector for not taking action, seizing the moment to advocate expansion of private pension provisions. Yet these are the people who should be taking the responsibility, not for private pensions—sure, let us improve private pensions if we can, but they will never meet in a comprehensive way the needs of the people of Canada.

So we would like to see a much stronger emphasis by government on public pensions. I see no better motion or resolution than the one presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. We support it wholeheartedly and ask the endorsement of other parties.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) would permit a brief question in relation to her remarks?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member for Vancouver East accept a question?

Mrs. Mitchell: Yes.

Mr. Hawkes: I listened with great interest to the hon. member's remarks, but I am a bit puzzled as to the position of the hon. member and her party. Having sat on the Constitution of Canada Committee, and in particular having dealt with clause 15, it seems to me there would be an anomaly in supporting the Constitution and this motion at the same time because the Constitution would, in effect, rule out the use of age as a criterion. In fact, we are dealing with a motion to extend pensions to people at 60 years of age, and I am wondering how we can support that and the Constitution at the same time, given that anomaly?

Mrs. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I did not sit on the Committee on the Constitution of Canada to the degree the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) did. However, we have already accepted the right of people at age 65 to a pension, and surely in any charter of rights we accept the point that there will be adequate living conditions for people, regardless of age. Surely the rights of the aged are implicit in our Constitution.

I do not know whether it would be appropriate for my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, to speak to that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: According to the rules, the hon. member has spoken in this debate. Is there unanimous consent of the House to allow the hon. member to speak if he wishes to make an intervention at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for giving me the opportunity. I suggest that the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) is really drawing a long bow if he suggests that the provision against discrimination with respect to age means we have to pay family allowances regardless of age. Do we pay them to people as old as I am, or do we pay old age pensions to people as young as he is? Surely that is not the meaning of the provision in the Constitution that people shall not be discriminated against because of their age. The fact of the matter is that when people get older, if there is not security for them, they are being discriminated against because of their age. I think that would be a better way in which to interpret that provision.

● (1630)

Mr. Al MacBain (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to hear some of the many different views held by various members of the House on the topic of retirement and benefits for the retired. I am especially glad to have the chance to make some comments on this very timely issue.

Hon. members have spent a fair bit of time discussing the many facets of retirement. In particular, they have discussed the present motion and its ancestors which entail making retirement benefits available at age 60 for those not in the labour market. I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is not advocating that all Canadians must or should cease paid employment immediately upon attaining 60 years of age. What I find particularly interesting is that we have two schools of thought on the issue of retirement age: one supporting a longer working career and the other a considerably shorter one. Could this be a reflection of an ambivalence toward working and retirement being felt by the Canadian population? I believe this must be so. It would be all too easy to dismiss this social phenomenon as an indication that people simply do not know what they want. On the contrary, it seems to be a very real and important demonstration that the Canadian public is not just simply a faceless mass moving uniformly in one direction. Rather, in this age of awareness Canadians are coming to the natural realization that different people have different needs and expectations. For some, their lifetime fulfilment and objectives are met in their work world. They want, are capable of, and very much need this continued contact. For others, their lives are not motivated by a need to work in paid employment. They find the important qualities in their lives outside the labour market. Each approach to living is equally valid. Our vigil will be long-enduring if we intend to wait until the Canadian population reaches a consensus on such an individual and personalized matter as retirement and optimum retirement ages. A final distillation of views may never materialize.

How can we as legislators best respond to a situation where there is no clearcut right and wrong, where in fact what is right for one might be entirely wrong for another? The only reasonable course to follow is one which will provide the maximum amount of flexibility, one which allows Canadians to have as much access as possible to the greatest number of options.

It might be worthwhile at this point to examine the development of our present retirement system. Not so many years ago the Canadian public was coping with almost the entire responsibility for providing for its income needs after retirement from the work force. As recently as 1965, the income guaranteed to a retired Canadian by the Government of Canada was only $75 per month, payable at age 70 under the Old Age Security Act. Some were lucky and were able to participate in an employer-sponsored pension plan, but others were not so fortunate and had to provide from their own resources and savings. Some simply could never afford to retire and were obliged to continue working. Since then some dramatic improvements have been made in retirement benefits for the elderly.

In 1966, the retirement age for old age security began to be reduced a year at a time until it reached the present OAS retirement age of 65 in 1970. Also in 1966 the Canada Pension Plan came into effect. A compulsory, contributory pension plan, the CPP provides coverage to virtually every Canadian wage earner and has become increasingly important as a source of present and future retirement income.

Parliamentarians did not intend that these two programs would provide all the retirement income Canadians might wish to have. Rather, the Canada Pension Plan and the Old Age Security Act were seen as providing the foundation of a layered retirement system. The first level, the flat rate old age security pension, provides a base upon which the second level, the earnings-related Canada and Quebec Pension Plan benefits, is built. Together with the guaranteed income supplement, these benefits ensure a minimum amount of income which adequately provides for the basic needs of retired Canadians. There is still ample room for Canadians to apply their initiative and supplement this minimum amount, because the third level of the system is the additional income available through private pension plans, registered retirement savings plans, investments or other sources which can be seen as providing whatever supplementary margin of comfort the individual might require.

This retirement system gives Canadian workers a great deal of flexibility in determining when they will retire. First, there is no federal statute legally requiring the retirement of each and every Canadian at a specified age. Benefits are available at age 65 under both the OAS program and the CPP, but neither stipulates that in order to receive benefits the individual must be retired or removed from the active labour force.

A wide array of retirement options is available to Canadians. Almost two million Canadians have taken advantage of the tax savings and the wide range of choice allowed in setting up registered retirement savings plans. When the time comes to turn their savings into retirement income, taxpayers can either invest their RRSP proceeds in a life annuity with an insurance company prior to reaching 71 years of age, or withdraw the funds in a lump sum and pay income tax on this amount in the same year. Two additional alternatives increase flexibility while retaining the basic principle that RRSP funds are for retirement income. The first alternative allowed the purchase of a fixed term annuity to provide benefits to age 90. The second alternative allowed taxpayers to have RRSP savings placed in an investment vehicle known as a registered retirement income fund. The transfer of an RRSP into any of the retirement income options can occur at any time between age 60 and age 71. These alternatives provide a range of choice available to Canadians in planning for their retirement.

The motion before us today is not new to the House. This is not the first time the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has proposed this motion. If the hon. member's tenacity in the past is an example of what is to come, it will probably not be the last time.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacBain: But I think there is a very real danger in over legislating. Governments have been accused of this tactic in the past. It is time we all recognized that it is nearly impossible to devise a plan with universal applicability which, at the same time, has the capability of adapting to individual needs. Perhaps it is better to have a straightforward basic plan which is fairly simple to administer and from which the individual, if he or she wants, can build to develop a personalized retirement package.

● (1640)

The issue of retirement age has been debated in this House on many occasions, as I have said, and that in itself is evidence of our concern and desire to explore the various approaches to retirement. As our elderly population continues to grow, the age of retirement becomes more and more relevant, both in economic and in social terms.

What have elderly Canadians a right to expect? Canadians have traditionally believed not only in the right to work but in the right to work for as long as they wished, or were able to. Hon. members will agree that as a fundamental right senior Canadians should have the right to make reasonable personal choices. It follows then that we must retain a retirement income system in this country which makes some provisions for individual options.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member permit a question from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre?

Mr. MacBain: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the fact that the hon. member believes that senior Canadians should have a number of options, does he not agree that one of those options should be to retire at 60 and have a reasonable measure of security?

Mr. MacBain: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question. The cost of retiring at age 60 may make it impossible for most senior Canadians to exercise that option. It may be holding out something which at this point in time we cannot offer.

Mr. Knowles: Then, is the hon. member limiting the number of options which he holds out for senior Canadians?

Mr. MacBain: I think to that extent, yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on the point raised by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes). This is one of the points which concerned me, and probably others, with regard to the Constitution wherein it is said that there is no discrimination because of age. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre expressed the hope that there would be no discrimination because of age. The difficutly is that when this provision is written into the charter of rights, if the judges decide that is the case, then our hands are tied. This is one of the very dangerous points of that type of legislation if left to the judges to decide and not to the legislators of our country. If some decision needs to be made without it being tied into the charter, individuals could come to their members of Parliament and members of their legislatures and the matter could be brought before the government of the day which could see that justice was done. But if a decision is given by the Supreme Court of Canada, then our hands are tied until the Constitution is changed. I hope that is one of the reasons why the Supreme Court judges will throw it out.

The next point I would like to mention is that social legislation is important in any country. The party to which I belong is very conscious of the importance of social legislation. I think probably every party in Canada has its own social legislation program. I personally feel that social legislation should be written in such a way that our people generally come under that legislation. That is why I question the social legislation which is now included in the negotiation package of our postal service which is presently on strike. They are asking for a maternity package. If it is granted, then one particular group will have better maternity benefits than any other group in Canada, including those on unemployment insurance. Thus, differences begin to build up between women. Some receive a certain amount of money under one program and some another amount of money under a different program, and others still receive nothing because they come under no program. I feel that social legislation should be enacted by the governments of the day, nationally by the federal government and, to the extent they can, by provincial governments. This would allow all women to come within a similar category for similar benefits. This is my view. I object to including maternity benefits in a negotiation package for just one small group. I believe in maternity benefits. As a matter of fact, I was part of the legislation in Alberta which led the way with regard to maternity benefits several years ago. I believe that course was followed by other governments later. The fact that babies were to be born in hospitals and not in some other places saved the lives of hundreds of babies born during the depression years.

Something else which always appalls me about social legislation, and which causes me great difficulty when explaining it to the people who come to me, is where there are differences between two women on one street, for example. Both are widows; one is 62 years of age and the other is 64. Neither one's spouse came under the old age pension but the spouse of one had contributed to the Canada Pension Plan and the spouse of the other had not, for the simple reason that he was not working during the period of 1976, or because he was working in a field in which that pension was not deducted. Both these women came to see me at the same time. They told me they had come to me to see whether they could receive the Canada pension. I asked them if their husbands had contributed to the plan. As I said before, one husband had and the other had not. Neither of the two women had contributed since they were housewives. I was able to tell one of the ladies that she qualified for a certain amount of Canada pension and that I would be glad to fill in the application for her. I told the other lady that it was no use because she had never contributed. She said that she had no opportunity to contribute, nor had her husband. I recognize that, but they receive no Canada pension.

This type of social legislation where we make differences of flesh of one and fish of another does not lead to a good feeling among our people. In my view, our social legislation should be overhauled with a view to giving the benefits to all those who fall within that group.

I recall that when I was first campaigning for the House of Commons in 1979 I knocked at a door in a small town. When the lady came to the door, I introduced myself. She said that she wanted to talk to me, and also to every other candidate, but so far I was the only one who had knocked at her door. She said she wanted to contribute to the Canada pension and that she was a housewife. I do not believe she had a husband, I guess she was a single woman. I did not go into all the details of her life. She said that she was able to contribute and that she should have the right to contribute. I rather agree with that. The women who are spending their lives in the kitchen and who are raising children, who are doing one of the most important jobs in the nation, should have the right to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan. If that legislation were so amended that would be fine.

There is still another group, however, those who will not be able to contribute. When people get to the age where they need help, are we going to treat them on the basis of whether they did or did not contribute to the plan? I think that is an important point. People of an advanced age who need help should get it, and that is where I differ somewhat, not too much, from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on the matter of universality.

I know people who are aged 66, 70 or 75 today who are well off and are drawing the old age pension. They have plenty to get by on and do not need it but as there is universality, they are entitled to it under the law. Personally, I question that.

Universality sounds fine and at one time I advocated it but when we see what social legislation is costing the nation, and when we consider that many people get nothing, then I think we have to reassess the situation. We must ask if those who are well off and have made provision for their senior years and are not going to suffer in any way, should draw this allowance while other people in the age bracket who need it badly, get nothing.

I think of single women between the ages of 60 and 65. If a woman's husband was a pensioner and she was on spouse's allowance, she is fortunate, because the legislation that the Clark government introduced to continue that pension for the spouse filled one gap. A lot of women did not have a husband who was a pensioner and indeed, some did not have a husband at all. I know one woman who spent her life looking after a disabled sister. She has no way of getting help, except through welfare. An hon. member from British Columbia told us that some people who have been independent all their lives are reluctant to go to the welfare office. I think the welfare office has its place, Mr. Speaker, and I do not look down on anyone who has to go there. It is there to help people, but in spite of anything we say, many people feel that there is a disgrace in applying for welfare.

I think we made a mistake in our social legislation when we did away with the disability pension. There is a disability pension today if one has contributed to the Canada Pension Plan but a lot of people did not and are now dependent on welfare. They should be in a different category. At one time there were two disability pension plans, the federal and the provincial—at least the province of Alberta had a plan and I suppose other provinces did as well. At present the only disability pension is paid under the Canada Pension Plan. In many cases the only redress for the disabled is to seek help through welfare, and that is not satisfactory.

I think the government realizes that a lot of work has to be done on pensions. The Canada Pension Plan does not do the complete job and that is aggravated by the pension bill passed in this House last night for MPs and senators. They can now draw a full pension at age 35 if elected at age 20, based on the best six years of earning. That is pretty rich, when someone can draw a pension for life at age 35, or 40 or 45, when they are still in good health.

I think we have to inject some sense into this, Mr. Speaker. Surely pensions should be paid as the result of a number of years of service and contributions. Even if the pensioner has contributed part of it, someone else has paid the other part. I think this type of pension should be reassessed.

With regard to the Old Age Security payment at age 65, one of the things we can do is change the compulsory retirement age in many industries and services from 65 to at least 70. Even 70 may be questioned if a person is well and able. I know of people working on farms today almost as hard as they did 20 years ago and they are now aged 71 and 72.

Mr. Cousineau: Some people of 70 still play a great game of hockey!

Mr. Taylor: I don't know about that. These people are happy, Mr. Speaker. I know a chap who took early retirement—I have to talk fast, Mr. Speaker—from the Department of Highways. He was an excellent engineer but that was all he knew. When he retired, he sat in his back yard and dreamed about the bridges and roads he had built. He just lasted two years. He took retirement at age 61 but he had nothing to do then. He had worked hard all his life and suddenly he found there was nothing to live for. That is a real danger.

We all like social legislation, Mr. Speaker. Someone made the point that lowering the age to 60 for those who are not in the labour market or who are prepared to withdraw from it is a redeeming feature of the bill. I think all our social legislation needs to be reassessed so that we can help those who need help and that we do not provide pensions for those who do not need them.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: I rise on a point of order, because I do not want to deprive my colleague of his right to speak with regard to the business of the House. We still intend to proceed on Monday with Bill C-48 but we may instead decide to resume debate on the adjournment motion started today. Probably before the end of the question period on Monday we will be able to advise the opposition parties whether we will debate the report stage of Bill C-48 or whether we will resume debate on the adjournment motion. Should I know before the question period, I will advise my colleagues. For the time being we intend to proceed with Bill C-48, but I must inform the House that we may instead decide to continue debating the motion to adjourn. In any event, I shall advise opposition parties before the end of the question period on Monday.

PENSIONS

SUGGESTED LOWERING OF AGE ELIGIBILITY AND INCREASE IN MONTHLY BENEFITS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan to provide for the pensions payable under these two acts to be available at age 60 to all persons who meet the other requirements of the said acts and who are not in or are prepared to withdraw from the labour market, and also to provide for the basic amount of the pension payable under the Old Age Security Act, at age 60 for those not in the labour market and to everyone at age 65, to be increased to $400 per month, for this basic amount to be escalated each year by an amount that will enable pensioners not only to keep up with rising living costs but to share in rising living standards, and also to provide for the elimination of any means or income test from the Old Age Security Act, so that the full pension thereunder will be recognized as the established right of all our people.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I enter this debate with pleasure although there is not much time remaining to make a contribution. I should like to speak for more time, of course.

At the outset, I should like to say that I have the utmost respect for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He has contributed greatly in his role as a parliamentarian for, I believe, 35 years.

Mr. Knowles: Thus far.

Mr. Evans: But for the unfortunate hiatus of four years he would be, by far, the dean of the House of Commons for longevity of continuous service. I still consider him to be the dean of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: How about agreeing to my motion, then?

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with his motion. As Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance I have some problems with the motion. The main one is that I think that at this time the OAS represents an outlay in the range of $6 billion per year. If we were to accept the motion and make the OAS payable at age 60 and incorporate the GIS, that would mean an additional outlay of some $5 billion per year and would raise the total outlay for the program to $11 billion, or nearly doubling the cost for all time.

Mr. Knowles: That is what every Minister of Finance has said: we cannot afford it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour provided for the consideration of private members business has now expired.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL STRIKE—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of consuming concern to all Canadians. Inasmuch as the government appears intimidated by statements that postal workers will not be legislated back to work, and whereas the government should rather be motivated by the plea from groups such as the Chamber of Commerce of Oliver, British Columbia, who ask that government get the mails moving again before irreparable damage is done to the thousands of small businessmen already imperilled by the government's high interest rate policy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski):

That this House condemn the government for its irresponsibility in eliminating all consideration of back to work legislation, thus playing into the hands of the CUPW leadership.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RAILWAYS

MAINTENANCE OF EXISTING PASSENGER SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, the government's plans to slash rail passenger service by simple order in council pose a serious threat to many western communities. Saskatoon is slated to lose two ways. Not only is the east-west service of the Super Continental to be abandoned and replaced by day trains, but the city will lose its complete north-south connections with the scrapping of the Regina-Prince Albert route. Instead of double track, Saskatoon is getting a double cross and a double whammy. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the government cease its practice of reorganizing Canadian rail passenger service by executive fiat and that existing passenger service be maintained until there has been an opportunity for full public debate of the abandonment question.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL STRIKE—RECOMMENDATION GOVERNMENT ACT TO END DISPUTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of obvious urgency. The strike affecting postal service in this country has swiftly become a cause of grave concern. In addition to creating a measure of varied inconvenience for almost all Canadians, the strike is forcing thousands of businesses to face the very real prospect of financial ruin. In light of the fact that the livelihood of many Canadians is in severe jeopardy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the government recognize the seriousness of the situation, accept its responsibility to the Canadian public, and take firm and immediate steps to end the postal strike.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DEMAND THAT GOVERNMENT RESPECT ITS OWN LAWS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on an important and urgent matter.

As the joint committee on official languages has admitted that practically no federal institution fully respects the Official Languages Act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That the House ask the government to respect its own laws with regard to services in the language of minority groups.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43 this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

METRIC COMMISSION CANADA

COST OF COURIER SERVICE TO DELIVER COOK BOOKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Because of the postal strike the Metric Commission is using private courier services to distribute metric cook books at a cost to the Canadian taxpayers of $12 each delivered to Winnipeg. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the government launch an immediate investigation to determine how widespread this wasteful use of courier service is within government departments, stop the distribution of metric cook books at $12 a copy for Winnipeg delivery, and limit the use of private courier service to the delivery of essential documents.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

POST OFFICE

POSTAL STRIKE—CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the disruption in postal service is creating hardship for many Canadians, and many small businesses already hard hit by record high interest rates are forced to close their doors and lay off their employees, and whereas a prolonged strike will create hardship for many of the members of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers who did not want a strike in the first place, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House direct the President of the Treasury Board to introduce legislation forthwith which would provide for an immediate resumption in postal services and a legal obligation for both parties to resume negotiations, for passage in the event that both parties fail to resume negotiations immediately.

CALL FOR LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE BENEFITS FOR WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, counting on the desire of this House to give help to those who are in need, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House calls on the government to introduce forthwith legislation to improve the pension position of women, such legislation to include in particular pensions for women between the ages of 55 and 65 who are alone and who are not in the labour market, it being the view of this House that the needs of such women should be met without further delay.

EFFECT OF PLANNED SERVICE CUTS ON WESTERN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, in view of the very strong protest made by the administration of the city of Edmonton, the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce, and hundreds of Edmonton citizens against the planned cancellation of rail service west to Vancouver and east to Saskatoon and Winnipeg, as a proposal completely and totally unacceptable to the residents of Edmonton, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour):

That the cabinet order public hearings to be held before any cancellation or reduction in service is imposed in order that the fullest consideration can be given these moves which will have such a disastrous effect on the economy and unity of western Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

POST OFFICE

POSTAL STRIKE—SUGGESTED USE OF PARLIAMENTARY TIME—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the almost total dependency of rural and small town Canadians on the mails for information, business exchanges, pension cheques, and numerous transfers of important personal data, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That the government assume the responsibility it has for the welfare of individual citizens, particularly those who do not enjoy the communication opportunities and advantages of those in cities and larger urban centres, and use the House of Commons time, provided by the opposition, to deal directly with the number of measures available to get the mail moving again.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

CONDEMNATION OF GOVERNMENT POSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas in 1975 the 42-day postal strike cost the people of St. Catharines about $8 million, and it is estimated to date that the current postal strike has cost just that one community some $2.6 million in lost revenue and extraordinary expenses, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Haldimand-Norfolk (Mr. Bradley):

That this House condemn the government for allowing the current postal strike to inflict this kind of loss on the business communities of this country without making any serious effort to negotiate a settlement.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

REGULATIONS GOVERNING CHARGES ON TRANSPORTATION OF MALT BARLEY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas, when Canada Malt in Calgary is required by the Canadian Wheat Board to ship malt barley to Thunder Bay or Vancouver by truck or train, whichever has the most favourable price for the Canadian Wheat Board and the said cost is charged to the farmer; and whereas some 30 per cent or more of the said malt is consumed in Alberta, but even so each farmer is charged the freight to either Vancouver or Thunder Bay, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone):

That the Canadian Wheat Board amend its regulations so Canada Malt will not be required to charge freight to farmers whose malt barley is not shipped to Vancouver or Thunder Bay.

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the minister disallow the CTC and DOT from stopping this service in our particular area.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

POSTAL STRIKE—GOVERNMENT INITIATIVES TO END DISPUTE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question has to do with the postal strike, and I want to direct it to the Prime Minister because the matter is becoming of such grave concern to so many individuals across the country that it should no longer be left simply to one minister but should be the demonstrated concern of the whole government.

On Friday the government indicated it had no intention of meeting the union's one condition for reopening negotiations, and today Mr. Warren has indicated he does not intend to become a bargaining instrument, to use his phrase, of either party. The Prime Minister must know the damage which is being done to countless individual Canadians across the country, and to countless Canadian businesses. I wonder if the Prime Minister will tell the House of Commons what initiatives the government plans to take today or tomorrow to end this crippling postal strike.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, we had made it clear that we hoped the issue would be resolved at the bargaining table. I believe it is unfortunate that the Leader of the Opposition took away from the government any hope that that would happen by forcing Parliament to stay around—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Do your job and govern the country.

Mr. Trudeau: —thus giving the union cause to believe that it does not have to settle because Parliament will settle the matter for it. I think that is contrary to the spirit of the law and contrary to the whole matter of industrial bargaining whereby the employer and the union try to negotiate an arrangement which is acceptable to both of them. If one party uses the strike route, as it is entitled to do under the law, then that route should be respected.

I repeat that the government is aware of the distress this is causing, or any strike causes. This strike is certainly one which is regrettable, but I find it unfortunate that the official opposition should have forced Parliament to continue sitting—

Mr. Beatty: Now answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: —at a time when the parties were seeking some way of solving the dispute by bargaining, not by enforced return.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, we have all known for a long time that the Prime Minister would rather govern without Parliament and that he regards Parliament as a nuisance. We regard Parliament as an institution which has a duty to protect the interests of individual Canadians, and those interests are being deeply damaged today.

REPORTED OFFER TO SUBSIDIZE COMMERCIAL CLIENTS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister did not indicate what new initiatives he plans, except to let individual Canadians continue to suffer. But perhaps he will not let the rich and the powerful suffer. I wonder if the Prime Minister will confirm the report by the Canadian Press that the Post Office itself confirmed that before the workers went out on strike the Post Office contacted banks, insurance companies, and other rich clients of the Post Office, and offered to subsidize their courier services during a strike. Will the Prime Minister confirm that such an offer was made to the Post Office's commercial clients and that it was made several days before the strike began?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have no knowledge of that. I imagine it is another canard peddled by the right hon. member, but I will inquire.

STATEMENTS MADE BY POST OFFICE SPOKESMEN

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, let me direct a question either to the Postmaster General or the President of the Treasury Board. Can he confirm the Canadian Press story today that the Post Office offered to arrange private courier service for its priority mail customers several days before the postal strike began? Post Office spokesmen confirmed that today. The report cites Post Office spokesmen.

An hon. Member: Who was that?

Mr. Clark: Will the Postmaster General tell this House now whether that is a correct report and whether there was an offer to subsidize the mail of the rich and the powerful during the postal strike, prior to that strike's occurring?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of this. I doubt it very much. If the right hon. member were able to give a name, it would be very helpful. I will inquire, but this story surprises me very much.

Mr. Cousineau: It must have been in the Sun, Joe.

PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION ON BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I have a question which is supplementary to that of the Prime Minister, who has given us a very interesting reason for refusing to consider back to work legislation. Not very long ago he said he would not introduce such legislation because Mr. Parrot would not obey it. Now he says he will not introduce it because Mr. Parrot wants it. Will he come clean with this House as to what his reason is?

● (1420)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, when the process of collective bargaining ends in a strike it is generally because the union wants to make somebody suffer, the clients, the employer and so on. This is the process now. That is why unions declare a strike, because they know there will be economic pressure on the employer to settle.

We know, Madam Speaker, one way of getting the union off the hook would be to settle the strike by legislating them back. Mr. Parrot said if that happened he would not intend to obey the legislation. That is not a reason in itself for not legislating them back. The reason we did not want to legislate is because we believe that in a system where we have free collective bargaining the matter should be settled by the employer and employee bargaining together, rather than by having Parliament step in and solve the problem—in this case probably for the union because I do not think they have the support of the people. Therefore, they are happy to have the support of the opposition in a legislated settlement, rather than one which is reached through fair collective bargaining.

PLANS FOR RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, the public interest only seems to matter to the Prime Minister when the banks, insurance companies and others are not covered, which they already have been.

Not very long ago the current Attorney General set a record. In two years, when he was president of the Treasury Board, we lost 900,000 man-days to strikes and lay-offs. The current President of the Treasury Board has set a new record. In one year and four months we have lost 1,400,000 man-days from strikes and lay-offs. Will the Prime Minister tell Canadians this: why should any Canadian have any reason to believe that a settlement will be achieved under a man whose record is strikes, lay-offs, and days lost, and why will the Prime Minister not tell Canadians exactly what it is he will do if he is serious about getting the parties back to the table?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, any employer at any time can settle a strike by giving in to the union and giving them what they ask. As the President of the Treasury Board indicated the other day, if we were to give in to the maximum demand of the union it would be a salary increase of some 28 per cent in one year. That is the price which could have been paid at the outset to avoid a strike. However, we on this side believe it would have been irresponsible to introduce that kind of settlement. Since it is the opposition which has kept the House around, presumably to have a legislated settlement, maybe I could hear from the hon. member or his leader what they would be prepared to offer to settle the strike.

Mr. Crosbie: Turn over the government.

QUERY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT MOVE TO RESUME NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. Just a minute ago the Prime Minister said the two parties are bargaining. Regrettably, as everyone knows, that is not the case. The postal workers have made two steps to try to return to the bargaining table, the first where they said if the government would accept the conciliation board recommendations, they would go back, which the government turned down; then they said if Mr. Warren, the head of the new Crown corporation to be set up to run the Post Office, joined the table, they would go back. The government has turned that down.

Since in the bargaining process a conciliatory attitude is a two way street, I ask the minister when is the government going to make a serious move to resume negotiations?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I certainly welcome that question, given the fact we have no preconditions for negotiations. I call that a conciliatory position, compared to a union which first of all establishes preconditions and then substitutes another precondition for the former precondition. It becomes perfectly apparent, Madam Speaker, that the union to date has shown no interest in negotiations.

In any event, I am pleased to advise the House that I have today requested Treasury Board to apply to the Public Service Staff Relations Board for the appointment of a mediator. Let us hope that this at least will be a step with which the union will see fit to co-operate.

ROLE OF MEDIATOR

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, with specific reference to the appointment of a mediator, will the mediator have the same mandate which the negotiators for the government had before talks broke off? Will the mediator be locked into the government's previously established position, which means that there will not be any mediation at all, or will he begin with an assumption that the government's appointed conciliation board recommendation is a pretty reasonable one, namely, that the cost difference between what the conciliation board recommended—which the union has gone along with but the government turned it down; it was only 2 per cent—and what the union is really after are non-costly work conditions, civilizing conditions, in the workplace? Will the mediator have a mandate which will enable him to make appropriate gestures in the direction of the government's own conciliation board recommendation?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, first, the mediator does not have a mandate. The mediator will be there to mediate between the parties. Since we are unable to bring the union to the negotiating table and talk directly with the union, we must have an intermediary. We hope the union will accept a mediator.

When I hear statements to the effect that some of these issues are not costly, I would remind the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party that some of the particular issues which will be the subject of mediation are very costly. I suggest that we are talking about a wide variety of issues. We have always been prepared to sit down and negotiate without preconditions, but we insist that the union come forward and accept mediation at this stage in order to unblock the impasse.

WORKING CONDITIONS AFFECTING WOMEN

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my final supplementary question is directed to the same minister. The minister knows, if the mediation process is to be successful at all, that the mediator must take in there a different attitude than that of the government. Does the minister dispute the claim that the gap between the conciliation board recommendation and what the government has already indicated that it would be prepared to do is only to 2 per cent? The union has indicated publicly and privately time after time that it is interested in non-costly matters, working condition matters which substantially affect, if they are implemented, the equality of condition for women in the country.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, with respect to the question of the equality of the condition of working women in the country, we indicated before the strike began that that is an issue we would very much like to sit down and negotiate at the bargaining table, which we have been unable to do. Clearly that is an area in which we would very much welcome an exchange of views between the union and ourselves. Otherwise, when the Leader of the New Democratic Party says that privately and publicly the union has taken positions which are very conciliatory or not costly—

Mr. Broadbent: What about the 2 per cent?

Mr. Johnston: —I would remind the House that the union position to date has been simply this: if the government accepts en bloc the recommendations of the chairman of the conciliation board, then they are prepared to sit down and negotiate the contract they would like to have. It has always been the conciliation board report plus—

Mr. Broadbent: No, it has not.

Mr. Johnston: That has always been the official position taken by the union.

RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF VIA RAIL LEGISLATION

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Is it still the intention of the government to cut back drastically rail passenger service in the country, affecting some 21 routes across Canada? If so, and given the fact that VIA Rail was never properly constituted or established under the parliamentary process, is it the minister's intention to bring to the Parliament of Canada a new VIA Rail act this autumn, as was recommended by the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments? If it is the intention of the minister to bring forth a new VIA Rail Canada act, would it not be reasonable for the minister and the government to defer any cutbacks in rail passenger services until such time as the mandate, the objectives, the whole regulatory mechanism and the route structure can be debated fully by Parliament?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, on the first subject, I am not in a position to comment because the decision of cabinet has not been made. On the other subject, that is the usefulness or necessity of having a VIA act, I am in full agreement with the views expressed by the hon. member and others.

The problem has always been with the agenda or the timetable of the House. In 1977 when VIA was created by an item in the estimates, presumably there were too many items on the agenda of the House. Last year I gave priority to the problem of the transportation of dangerous goods. This coming year, as the hon. member knows, we have the ports policy to bring up. We also have the independent air safety board to create. Thus, time is really the problem. Everyone agrees that VIA is entitled to legislation of its own as one of the major Crown corporations. I am committed to cabinet to bring forward a memorandum on the subject which might lead to that realization, whenever the time of the House permits.

REPORTED PLANS TO REDUCE SERVICE

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, surely the minister realizes that the wholesale abandonment of several rail passenger services throughout Canada is a matter of very serious concern. I note that the minister neither confirmed nor denied that this matter was under active consideration. Could he undertake to tell the House whether, in fact, some 16 abandonments and five reductions in rail passenger services are currently under active cabinet consideration? If this decision is to be arrived at through government edict, could the minister explain how the citizens in the communities which will be affected will have an opportunity to voice their objections and concerns in a formal way?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have no intention of confirming or denying indirectly what I did not confirm or deny in a direct way.

POSSIBLE DATE OF GOVERNMENT DECISION

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): In order to clear the air, could the minister undertake to tell the House when a decision will be forthcoming, since it is quite obvious the matter is under active consideration?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is experienced in the art of being a minister. He also knows that this is unpredictable.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS THROUGH EDMONTON

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and it deals with regulations concerning hazardous and dangerous products. In view of the fact that there have been six or seven incidents concerning the transportation of hazardous and dangerous products in the Calder area in Edmonton along the 127th Avenue right-of-way, what game plan does the Canadian National Railways have to handle a major disaster—God forbid? We do not want a Mississauga or Sundridge affair in our area.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the hon. member spoke to me about this subject a few days ago. I provided him with a number of scenarios with regard to what happens in the case of transportation accidents involving dangerous goods. At the time I told him the scenario varies a great deal depending on where the accident takes place, what kind of dangerous goods are involved, whether or not it is on a siding or a main line, etc. I agree with the hon. member that these scenarios are rather complex. Efforts are being made now through the regulations provided in Bill C-18, which was passed in the House about a year ago, to streamline these methodologies.

At the last meeting of the ministers of transportation I echoed the worries which the hon. member has. The provincial ministers of transportation and myself agreed that a maximum effort should be made toward simplifying these procedures. At the next meeting of the ministers of transportation I will bring forward ideas to that effect.

RAILWAYS

STATEMENT ISSUED BY EDMONTON AREA MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Is he aware of the publication on Friday last of a statement signed by eight members of Parliament from the greater Edmonton area who fully endorse the protests made by the city administration of Edmonton and the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce who are protesting the cancellation of transcontinental service west from Edmonton to Vancouver and east from Edmonton to Winnipeg? Has the minister read this statement and can he give a commitment to the House that before any such cancellations are imposed on the people of Edmonton public hearings will be held in that city?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the answer to the first question is yes. The answer to the second question is no.

Mr. Roche: The attitude of the minister is rather cavalier considering the gravity of the situation which will have a tremendous economic impact on a trading area in which there are more than one million citizens in the fastest growing area in Canada.

TELEGRAM SENT BY EDMONTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, has the minister received and read a telegram circulated by Mr. Eric Geddes, the president of the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce, in which he says, in part, that this forthcoming planned cancellation "would greatly increase the feeling of alienation in western Canada."? Will the minister comment on the repercussions which are likely to occur from the point of view of national unity and transcontinental service if such cuts are imposed unilaterally by the government?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the hon. member made sure that I would receive a copy of the telegram. If I recall correctly he sent me a copy of it on Friday, which was when I read it. I have had a number of anticipatory protests from the Edmonton area to the same effect. I can only say that if what the hon. member and others fear is done, of course I will have to justify that action extensively.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

MINISTER'S DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES AGENCY

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, last week the Minister of the Environment met with the chief of the United States Environmental Protection Agency. Will the minister inform the House about the discussions he had and about what may be ahead of us in the near future?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the discussions I had with the head of the United States Environmental Protection Agency, Miss Gorsuch, a week ago were successful in terms of their limited objective, which was to explain as forcefully as possible to the American administration our concern about possible proposed amendments to the American clean air act, and our concern that the negotiations with the United States for a trans-boundary air quality agreement be proceeded with as vigorously as possible. Within that context I can assure the hon. member that our discussions, which I think were vigorous, left no doubt in the minds of the officials of the American administration what the position of Canada was.

I must say to the hon. gentleman that we expect negotiations to proceed. I want to be neither optimistic nor pessimistic about the outcome of those negotiations. I think that the discussions will be difficult ones; but I believe that in the end the reasonableness of our position will lead to the conclusion of some satisfactory arrangement with the United States.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

CONDUCT INTO HEARING ON PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who may know that on July 27, two weeks from now, the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission will be holding a pre-hearing meeting to discuss the rules of the game in the investigation of the $12-billion oil company rip-offs alleged by the Bertrand report. Can the minister confirm to the House that a secret meeting was held on July 7 behind the backs of the majority of the intervenors, who total 40 in number, at which only the oil companies were asked for their input?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, it was not a secret meeting, but rather a first meeting between the lawyers of the Unfair Trade Practices Commission, the lawyers of the government in this case, and the lawyers of the accused, namely, the oil companies. This was a working meeting in preparation for the hearings to be held in the near future. The first public meeting to which will be invited the lawyers of third parties, that is the various associations wishing to express their views, will be held at the end of this month. This first meeting was therefore not exclusive, but simply a first meeting between the lawyers of the main parties involved in this case, and there will be other meetings to which third parties may be called and heard.

MINISTER'S POSITION ON PROCEDURE FOLLOWED

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have before me the memo from the counsel, Mr. McDonald counsel for the commission, listing that meeting with Gulf, Imperial, Shell, Texaco, BP, Chevron, Irving, Petrofina and Suncor. The minister says that that was an encounter. It seems to me that it was a strange encounter.

Do I take it, then, that the minister approves of this procedure whereby commission counsel meets? This was not a public meeting. The other interveners could not come. There were only the oil companies. It was a meeting behind closed doors with the very companies which are being investigated. Does the minister approve that kind of procedure? Does he think that that will lead to what would appear to be a fair hearing?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am surprised at the reaction of the hon. member. It is quite normal in court proceedings for the lawyers of both parties involved, that is the Crown and the defence counsel, to meet in camera before the judge. This occurs frequently and there is nothing incompatible or wrong in this as long as both parties appear together before the judge.

In fact I can assure the hon. member that no final decision concerning the procedure to be followed during the public hearings will be made before the meeting at the end of this month where not only the Crown and the defence counsel but also third parties wishing to express their views will have the opportunity to do so.

PORTS

DELAY IN SIGNING CONTRACT FOR WORKS AT PRINCE RUPERT, B.C.

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): I would like to address my question to the Minister of Transport, through Your Honour. I provided advance notice to him last week. Can the minister tell us whether the proposed delay will be two months in the awarding of the contracts for access, site preparation, etc., for Prince Rupert? Will the delay to the contract which was closed on July 7 be two months, or will work start sooner, before the rains and the wet season hit the port of Prince Rupert?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Hon. members will remember that some months ago there was a discussion between the grain consortium and the National Harbours Board having to do with the ground at Prince Rupert, the famous "caisson" business. At that time the National Harbours Board decided to allow for a certain change in the site to be used for the grain terminal. That caused a two-month delay, which explains why we are now two months behind. The National Harbours Board has 60 days to make a decision on the site preparation contract, and that should be by September. But it is hoped that less time will be needed. Be that as it may, the time for delivery of the site to the consortium, is May, 1982, and that will be done.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

QUERY RESPECTING INITIAL WHEAT PRICES FOR NEW CROP YEAR

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I certainly cannot understand the delay of 60 days in the awarding of a contract, but I would like to ask the minister a supplementary question at this time. Would he be prepared either to confirm or deny, or to announce to the House, that the price for spring wheat and durum wheat will be much lower, approximately $4.75 a bushel, in the coming crop year? As Your Honour recalls, and I am sure that the minister does, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board had said that he would make an announcement in July, which is certainly about three months late. I think we would like to have an announcement now, Mr. Minister.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): I am not in a position to do that, Madam Speaker, but the minister of state for the Canadian Wheat Board still has a number of days to go, and still live within the promise he made, which is to make the announcement before the opening of the new crop year.

GRAIN

APPOINTMENT OF GRAIN TRANSPORTATION CO-ORDINATOR—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I also have a question directed to the Minister of Transport which is of considerable importance to western Canadians. The minister will recall that the position of grain transportation co-ordinator has now been vacant for almost a year since the resignation of Dr. Hugh Horner. Mr. Doug Radke has filled that position on an interim basis. People in western Canada are wondering when an announcement will be made with respect to a permanent replacement in that position. I wonder if the minister will indicate when he will be in a position to announce the appointment of a new grain transportation co-ordinator.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, those who wonder will not have to wonder very long.

REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE ANNOUNCEMENT

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, the minister's idea of a short period of time is since October last. Short periods of time in the west are not completely uncertain. I would like to ask the minister whether he is aware of the fact that if we get a few more rains in western Canada we face the prospect of a very major grain crop in western Canada this year, which would apply an extreme pressure in respect to the transportation of grain, which is very important factor for all of Canada. I want to ask the minister if he will not give consideration to making this announcement immediately, and allow us to make plans with respect to transportation of grain on an export basis.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I can only say that I will hurry.

TEXTILES AND CLOTHING

FORECASTED INCREASE IN IMPORTS

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question, directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, relates to a statement made last month regarding the five-year program for the Canadian textile and clothing industries. The minister will know that the government-appointed textile and clothing board, having completed the most extensive examination of those industries ever undertaken, urged the continuance of the current import levels through 1990 as its principal recommendation. Despite this, as I read the minister's statement, it expressly anticipates significantly higher imports of foreign textiles and clothing. I therefore ask the minister can he indicate to the House his estimate of the percentage increase of these imports by the end of the five-year program period?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, this is something under negotiation with the 16 exporting countries with which we have agreements; but I did say that we expected that the basis for these agreements would be the 1979 levels, which, I think, provides an approach which respects both the needs of Canadian producers and Canadian consumers.

PROJECTED EMPLOYMENT IN INDUSTRY

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Again, if I read the statement correctly, the minister's main thrust seems to be to provide for communities and workers who will no longer be engaged in the textile and clothing industries by the end of the five-year period, because the statement includes replacement of plants, job search, monitoring, early retirement benefits, and so on. This seems to anticipate a rather massive reduction in the number of textile and clothing workers. If I am incorrect, I wish the minister would correct me. However, of the current 189,000 jobs now in those textile and clothing industries, what percentage or number does the minister and his department anticipate will exist at the end of the five-year period?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend has neglected to mention that another major element of the adjustment program I announced along with my colleague, the Minister of Regional and Economic Expansion some weeks ago, was a program to assist in the modernization of the textile and clothing industry, and the firms in it, no matter where they are located. We believe that there is a tremendous potential for modernization so that we can be more competitive in both domestic and world terms. Therefore we do not anticipate a massive reduction in employment—

Mr. Jarvis: How many?

Mr. Gray: —although the figures have indicated that in past years there has been some reduction in unemployment in that period. However, I would not want to estimate the figure at this time, because it depends a lot on how vigorously the industry responds to the opportunities we are providing through our $250 million fund for modernization, in becoming more competitive. A lot will depend on the vigour of that response, as I have said. Spokesmen for the industry have already indicated that they want to respond in a very active way by putting in new investment in the billions of dollars, far in excess of what we will be making available for modernization. I think that is a very healthy indication of what could be happening in future years.

Oral Questions

ENERGY

FUTURE OF ALSANDS PROJECT AT FORT McMURRAY, ALTA.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I will wait until he gets back, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Lalonde: Go ahead.

Mr. Shields: I am sure that the minister has probably been able to inform himself and has come to the conclusion that the postponement of the Imperial project in Cold Lake will mean a two-year delay. What efforts and initiatives is the minister taking, or does he plan to take, to ensure that the Alsands consortium does not cancel their project in Fort McMurray, which is another $12 billion project for this country?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, Mr. Leitch, the minister of energy for Alberta, and myself are due to meet in a few weeks. I hope that we will continue to make progress.

As the hon. member knows, the government of Alberta had taken a position that it did not want to discuss a separate deal for tar sands plants independently from a settlement on all the other issues. We will try to work along that line so as to arrive at a global settlement as soon as possible.

● (1450)

I have tried twice to see whether it was possible to arrive at an arrangement, to have an agreement on pricing, etc., which would deal with the tar sands plants but this is something the government of Alberta has refused. Therefore, we will try to work along the lines of getting a comprehensive settlement.

POSSIBLE COMMERCIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH OIL COMPANIES

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, there have been 16 months of failures, 16 months for this government to sit down and reach an agreement with the government of Alberta. Over and above that, I am sure the minister would agree that a commercial arrangement with the companies allowing them to see a profitable investment climate for themselves is the kind of thing that is required. Therefore, is the minister addressing himself to a commercial arrangement with the companies? Syncrude has cancelled its expansion. Cold Lake has postponed its construction, and Alsands has indicated it may follow suit. Is a commercial arrangement being negotiated? Without such an arrangement every major project in northeastern Alberta is being affected.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member refers to 16 months of failure. But he should also add all the other months when his party was in office when it could not reach an agreement either.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Wrong again.

Mr. Clark: That is a falsehood.

Mr. Lalonde: So, the period is even longer, and that we regret. I am sure that government when it was in office did its best to get an agreement, but it did not get one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: We had an agreement.

Mr. Trudeau: Why don't you produce it?

Mr. Lalonde: So we tried.

As far as the question of arriving at a satisfactory commercial arrangement is concerned, this is what we are negotiating with the government of Alberta at the present time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—ARCHBISHOP'S STATEMENT CONDEMNING ARMY ACTIONS

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs my question is for the Prime Minister. Perhaps I could have the attention of the Prime Minister?

An hon. Member: It is the guy over there with the flower.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rose: My question is for the Prime Minister, who is well known for his interest in North-South problems. It concerns the tragedy of El Salvador. Is the Canadian government aware of the news yesterday from El Salvador in which the country's leading churchman, Archbishop Arturo Revere y Damas, attacked the army for "crimes against the church", including the murder of 27 additional civilians and the beating of nuns? Under the circumstances, how does the Canadian government justify its continued support for the current regime?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think the statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on this subject have been quite clear. He has mentioned before in so far as the problem with El Salvador is concerned that the people themselves should settle their own problems in a political way, and that we do not want to be involved in such matters as those which the hon. member has just mentioned. We are aware of what is going on. I presume the question could be discussed further with the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

SHIPMENTS OF UNITED STATES ARMS

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, if the "can't fly minister of the F-18A fame" is going to be the prime minister, I suggest he wear a rose in his lapel.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Or wear a pansy.

Mr. Rose: In the meantime while this tragedy of El Salvador is passed off, news reports indicate that the current U.S. ambassador is prepared to recommend further U.S. arms shipments to the government junta, while the ambassador's immediate predecessor, Ambassador White, just this weekend labelled such shipments as contributing to a slow motion coup by right wing officers.

Will Canada now stop backing this U.S. military policy in this sad little central American country, and instead urge in the strongest possible terms that the U.S. stop its proposed arms shipments and support a negotiated settlement?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I think it has always been the policy of this government to prefer a negotiated settlement whenever that is possible. I am surprised that the hon. member is so concerned about what is going on in El Salvador when his party just asked us to withdraw from NATO and NORAD, thereby leaving us defenceless against other people acting in the same way as those in El Salvador.

COMMUNICATIONS

TELIDON CONSULTANT'S STUDY—PROJECTED COST OF SYSTEM TO FAMILY USERS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, on Friday the Minister of Communications gave me a copy of a consultant's study on Telidon prepared for his department in December, 1980. I thank the minister for his courtesy. Does he disagree with the consultant's findings that if Telidon's customers are charged the projected $25 a month for service it would require a family income of almost $70,000? Also, if that were the case, there would be only 13,000 customers in Canada for Telidon by 1985?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I am told that other reports have been made on the same subject. For instance, the Hickling and Johnson report published in February, 1979, predicts that the Canadian home market will be 1.8 million sets by 1991. The predictions also made by Mr. Hough indicate a rather substantial market.

However, I point out that Mr. Hough's report was done before some of the major breakthroughs, particularly the adoption of teletext standards by AT & T in the United States. The general feeling of the department is that because of these developments some of the conclusions in Mr. Hough's report do require modification.

FIELD TESTING OF SYSTEM

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, Mr. Hough also complains that in studies which have been done on Telidon to date, field trials have not been done by charging customers for the service being provided and consequently are invalid. What field tests are anticipated by the minister for which customers will be charged the fair market value of Telidon?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, talking about field trials, and there are a number ongoing. There is a new Bell Vista field trial which will be ongoing in Toronto and Quebec City. I hope to be able to announce a new teletext field trial probably next week. We are obviously still in the field trial stage. We hope that the field trials will demonstrate that there is a market in homes for this type of technology. I should caution the hon. member and indicate that as far as videotex and teletext is concerned they are at the same stage as computers were a number of years ago. The initial paying market will be found first in businesses and institutions. It will be at a later date only when we expect to have a marketable videotex product for home consumption.

RAILWAYS

REPORTED PLAN TO ABANDON LINE FROM HALIFAX TO MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC HEARING

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It has been customary to hold hearings before rail lines for freight or passenger service are discontinued. While the minister is not obligated by law to hold those hearings, it seems to me that because of the abandonment of the line from Halifax through Saint John, Sherbrooke and Montreal there should be a search for public opinion with respect to such abandonment. Would the minister explain why his department has made a survey but refuses to release the findings to the public and is not asking for comments on such a drastic action nor holding any hearings?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, should cabinet decide to do what my hon. friend is afraid it might, I will explain fully why it has done so.

IMPACT ON SOUTHWESTERN NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Madam Speaker, is the minister saying to the people of the Maritimes and all the way west to Montreal that cabinet is going to decide without seeking any public input whatever with respect to abandonment of such a line? That leaves southwestern New Brunswick with virtually no access whatever to the passenger service to which we have been entitled since the initiation of rail passenger service over 100 years ago? Is that the way we are going to be dropped, just like a hot potato, with a shameless and no-guilt face?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am sure you will understand very well the position I am in. If I make any comment on that, it will be read differently by different people. I can only remind my hon. friend that there was a big "if" at the beginning of my previous answer.

POST OFFICE

REPORT OF LETTER WRITTEN BY DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIAL

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is supplementary to one I asked earlier of the Prime Minister and the Postmaster General who will now have had the opportunity to check with their officials. I am advised that the letter in question was written by Mr. Rolf Bischoff, marketing director for the Montreal postal district.

● (1500)

I would like the Postmaster General to stay in the House to listen to the question. Perhaps he wishes that the House of Commons had risen rather than stay here to answer questions. I cannot recall an occasion in this House of Commons when a minister has walked out in the middle of a question being put.

Madam Speaker: Order. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition rises at three o'clock, at which time he realizes I should cut off question period. However, I have allowed him to ask the question. I hope he will not rise so late in the future because I will not be able to recognize him, but I did allow that. I hope he will ask his question and be as brief as possible.

Mr. Clark: I will ask my question if the minister to whom I directed it will come back to the House of Commons. Here he comes. The minister smiles at his contempt for the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: My information is that the letter in question was signed by Mr. Rolf Bischoff the marketing director for the Montreal postal district, that it was a letter dated June 29. The existence of that letter was confirmed to Montreal Canadian Press reporter Larry Black, both by Mr. Bischoff in Montreal and by Francis Harding in the Ottawa office of the Post Office. Will the minister responsible for the Post Office now extend to the House of Commons the courtesy that has been extended to Canadian Press and confirm to the House that such a letter was written, such an offer was made to look after the powerful clients of the Post Office and, most important, that this was done prior to the strike on June 29?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, immediately after that question was raised in the House, I contacted the officials of my department to obtain additional information. When the Leader of the Opposition rose to put his question for the second time, a page told me that I was wanted on the telephone by someone who would be giving me the answer to the question. So I left the House to take that call. I now have the information which I can make public and thus answer the question of the Leader of the Opposition. Madam Speaker, I must say that the Leader of the Opposition has misinterpreted that letter, that he was completely wrong to interpret it as he did, and that as early as tomorrow I will be in a position to shed more light on the question if we are given an opportunity to do so.

[English]

REQUEST THAT MINISTER TABLE LETTER

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the Postmaster General has referred specifically to that letter. He will know that even if the rules do not permit a minister to walk out in the middle of a question being posed him, they do require him to table correspondence and documents to which he has referred specifically. I ask the Postmaster General to follow the rules of the House and to table that letter to which he has made reference.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is obviously flouting the Standing Orders of the House. I have not seen any letter. I have no document in my hand. I said I would check. I sought information from my officials and they told me that, once again, the Leader of the Opposition is mistaken. I will look further into this matter and answer any question he may want to ask me tomorrow. For the time being I fully reprove the altogether unspeakable conduct of the Leader of the Opposition.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. PINARD—TIME ALLOTTED TO ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I should like to draw your attention to two standing orders of the House which, unless I am mistaken, are still in force and perhaps too clear. I quote Standing Order 15(2):

Not later than 2:15 p.m., or 11:15 a.m., as the case may be, oral questions shall be taken up. At 3:00 p.m., or 12:00 noon,—

—it says 3 p.m., not 3:05 p.m.—

—as the case may be, the House shall proceed to the ordinary daily routine of business, which shall be as follows:

—and it goes on.

Secondly, Madam Speaker, Standing Order 39(5) is much more specific and coercitive. I quote the last few lines of Standing Order 39(5):

. . . provided also that the time allowed for a question period prior to the calling of the Orders of the Day shall not exceed forty minutes.

So in both cases, Madam Speaker, the Standing Orders are very clear, namely, that the oral question period may not go beyond 3 p.m. and may not exceed forty minutes. That is the first point of my argument.

The second is that the way the business of the House is directed and organized is based on and guided by the standing orders, by doctrine or by practice. It is the first time, at least in the seven years I have been sitting as a member, which is not all that long, that the same member was recognized more than once during the oral question period, I say to my knowledge, it is the first time that a member who has asked his main question and his supplementary questions is given the floor a second time a few minutes later after other members.

Madam Speaker, in my opinion, the current and very well known custom forbids us to allow this type of practice, and I respectfully submit that in keeping with the established practice, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) should not have been legally recognized when he asked his last series of questions. So, Madam Speaker, for all those reasons and considering that the Leader of the Opposition asked his questions after 3 p.m., that is after the expiry of the oral question period, pursuant to the two Standing Orders I quoted and to the established practice whereby a member may not be given the floor more than once during the oral question period, for all those reasons, Madam Speaker, we on this side of the House strongly object and we ask that the Standing Orders be respected in future and that the Leader of the Official Opposition not be given a preferential treatment which he does not deserve.

Madam Speaker: The hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) is quite right. Our Standing Orders state quite clearly at what time the question period is supposed to end. However, he probably quoted it from memory because the oral question period is supposed to last 45 minutes and not 40 minutes as he indicated. Nevertheless, Standing Orders stipulate that at 3 p.m. the Chair must interrupt the oral question period. However, the President of the Privy Council has been sitting in the House long enough to know that from time to time, at his discretion, and for various reasons, for example the fact that some questions or answers are lengthy or because there is a great deal of commotion in the House, the Speaker chooses not to see the time and to go over the 3 p.m. or 12 noon limit, as is the case on Fridays. The rule is clear but the custom varies somewhat, yet I agree with the hon. President of the Privy Council that, whenever possible, we must try to end the question period at 3 p.m. and I try to do that as much as I can.

As for the fact that a member cannot rise a second time, it so happened, last week I believe, that the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) had the floor twice during question period, because he asked to be recognized and other members of his party who would have wanted to speak at the time remained seated to give him an opportunity to do so. So that can happen. Standing Orders do not prohibit a member from rising twice during question period. But I do take the remarks made by the hon. President of the Privy Council in consideration; he knows that I always try to apply the rules, but I think that this time I sided more with parliamentary custom.

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the tabling of documents. A document was referred to by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). In direct response, the minister indicated that the Leader of the Opposition was misinterpreting the document, thereby referring to it. Will the minister take a look at that document and perhaps see to its tabling tomorrow?

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,852, 2,527, 2,565 and 2,641.

[Text]

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—CHAIRMAN

Question No. 1,852—Mr. Beatty:

1. Is the chairman of the Canadian Film Development Corporation included in the corporation's conflict of interest guidelines?

2. Does the chairman maintain an interest in a private law practice and, if so (a) with which firms and in what capacity (b) does the firm conduct any business on behalf of clients in the film industry?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the answer to the above question is as follows: 1. According to information received, the chairman of the board of the Canadian Film Development Corporation is not subject to the corporation's conflict of interest guidelines. However, the chairman, as a member of the corporation, is subject to the provisions of Section 5 of the Canadian Film Development Corporation Act.

2. As of the date this question was asked, yes.

(a) As of the date this question was asked, Mr. Michel Vennat was a partner in the Montreal legal firm of Stikeman, Elliot, Tanaki, Mercier and Robb. While chairman of the board of the Canadian Film Development Corporation, he did not take part in decisions relating to clients of the firm who were in the film industry.

(b) Yes; see 2(a) above.

POST OFFICE, NOVA SCOTIA—BILINGUALISM

Question No. 2,527—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Does the government intend to take action with regard to the fact that the 1980 Annual Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages states there are 36 bilingual positions in the Post Office Department among Nova Scotia's 1,955 postal employees and, if so, what are the details?

2. For what reason would it be necessary to have bilingual employees in Nova Scotia?

3. What is the estimated percentage of persons living in Nova Scotia who speak the (a) English (b) French language only?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Canada Post and Statistics Canada as follows: 1. In Nova Scotia, the 36 bilingual positions already in existence are deemed to be sufficient to meet present identified demand. However, Canada Post will continue to review and monitor the situation with respect to bilingual positions throughout the province.

2. As a federal institution, Canada Post recognizes an obligation to provide service in both French and English to Canadians in areas where a demand is established.

3. The latest information on languages is from the 1976 Census, but that information relates only to mother tongue, as opposed to language currently spoken. According to the 1976 Census the distribution of the population in Nova Scotia by mother tongue was as follows:

Mother tongue English:	92.7 per cent
Mother tongue French:	4.4 per cent
Mother tongue neither English nor French:	2.9 per cent

The most recent information on official languages capabilities was collected in the 1971 Census, which asked whether English or French were spoken well enough to conduct a conversation. For Nova Scotia, the official languages capabilities of the population in 1971 were:

English only:	92.6 per cent
French only:	0.5 per cent
Both English and French:	6.7 per cent
Neither English nor French:	0.2 per cent

Similar information is being collected in the 1981 Census.

MR. PETER STUDER

Question No. 2,565—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is Mr. Peter Studer a chauffeur with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and, if so, on the evening of Wednesday, May 26, 1981 was he driving Mr. Ed Clark, senior assistant deputy minister of energy?

2. Did Mr. Studer telephone the Citizen with comments on the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville and, if so (a) did he do it on his own volition (b) was he ordered to do so by a superior in the government and, if so, what was the name of the superior?

3. Did Mr. Studer advise the Citizen that the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville was incorrect in stating that the Prime Minister was "giggling and guffawing" outside the members' entrance of the House of Commons with the Minister of Finance and that it should have been the Minister of Justice and, if so, are Mr. Studer and his government associates aware that the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville is quoted in Hansard as saying "it was at this point that I noticed that the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) was standing on the sidewalk adjacent to the members' entrance along with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien)"?

4. Did Mr. Studer further advise the Citizen that the green bus for MPs was not moving because "there weren't any passengers to take anywhere" and, if so, are Mr. Studer and his government associates aware that there were two buses at the time the incident occurred and that one of the buses was approaching the Centre Block with passengers when stopped by the RCMP?

5. Is it government policy to use chauffeurs and senior assistant deputy ministers to attempt to destroy the credibility of opposition members of Parliament?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1. Yes, Mr. Studer is an EM&R chauffeur and he was driving Mr. E. Clark on the evening of Tuesday, May 26, 1981.

2 to 5. Mr. Studer on his own initiative was exercising his rights as a Canadian citizen.

BUREAU OF PENSION ADVOCATES

Question No. 2,641—Mr. Howie:

1. What number of applications were received and recorded by the Bureau of Pension Advocates but are not yet registered with the Canadian Pension Commission?

2. Does the bureau consider it has sufficient staff to carry out the duties?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. None. To protect the date of application, all claims are registered with the Canadian Pension Commission immediately.

2. Yes.

[English]

Mr. Collenette: Before I sit down, Madam Speaker, I should point out to the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) that I am unable to give the answer to question 2,955, I believe it is; it is the other outstanding question on the Order Paper. I hope to be in a position to give that answer tomorrow.

I would ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Are the remaining questions allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA OIL AND GAS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OIL AND GAS INTERESTS

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-48, to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Madam Speaker: As hon. members are aware, there are 57 motions standing on the Order Paper at the report stage of Bill C-48, an act to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act.

With the short time available to the Chair, and it was very short, I have had a preliminary look at a number of the motions. Motions Nos. 1 and 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) and the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), seek to import a preamble into a bill which was introduced in the House without a preamble. In this respect I refer hon. members to Beauchesne's fifth edition, Citation 779(3) and I quote:

(3) Where the bill, as introduced, does not contain a preamble, it is not competent for the committee to introduce one.

This citation can also be found in May's nineteenth edition at page 531. Admittedly, this refers to proceedings in committee; however, the same rules apply at the report stage, and to this effect I refer hon. members once again to Beauchesne's fifth edition, Citation 792. This is also confirmed by a ruling by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux on June 11, 1973, at pages 394 and 395 of the Journals.

For all these reasons, regrettably, motions Nos. 1 and 2 appear to be out of order, but I would be prepared to hear argument later.

Motions Nos. 43 and 50, standing in the name of the minister, seek to insert new headings into the bill. Citation 710 of Beauchesne's fifth edition states as follows:

710 (1) The marginal notes, short titles of clauses and the headings of parts of a bill do not form part of the bill and, therefore, are not open to amendment. Journals, May 17, 1956, p. 568.

(2) The Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel is responsible for marginal notes and headings. S.O. 84.

For these reasons, the Chair will not propose the motions to the House.

Motions Nos. 3, 5, 14, 17, 18, 23, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29 and 30 will be debated separately and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 4, 51, 52, 53, 55, 56 and 57 should be grouped for debate and will be voted on as follows: (a) The question on motion No. 51 will be put to the House and a vote on this motion will dispose of motion No. 4; and (b) the question on motions Nos. 52, 53, 55, 56 and 57 will be put to the House separately.

Motion No. 54 standing in the name of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) seeks to establish a compensation fund to be administered by a board which would entail the outlaying of public funds. Once again I refer hon. members to Beauchesne's fifth edition where Section (7) of Citation 773 is on this point, and I quote in part:

(7) An amendment is out of order if it imposes a charge upon the Public Treasury—

For this reason the motion appears to be unacceptable, but again I would be prepared to hear argument at the appropriate time.

Motions Nos. 6 and 20 will be grouped for debate and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15 and 16 will be grouped for debate and voted on as follows: (a) the question on motion No. 7 will be put to the House by itself; (b) motions Nos. 8, 9 10 seem to offer alternatives and will be put to the House as follows: (i) the question will be put on motion No. 8. An affirmative vote on this motion makes it unnecessary for the House to decide on motions Nos. 9 and 10. However, a negative vote on the motion necessitates the question being put on motion No. 9; (ii) an affirmative vote on motion No. 9 obviates the question having to be put on motions Nos. 10, 11 and 12. A negative vote on motion No. 9 necessitates the question being put on motion No. 10 and the vote on motion No. 10 also disposes of motions Nos. 11, 12 and 16. (c) Separate questions will be put on motions Nos. 13 and 15.

Motions Nos. 19 and 24 standing in the name of the hon. member for Nunatsiaq seem to go beyond the scope of the bill and therefore do not appear to be in order. The hon. member may wish to present argument on this point later. For the benefit of the hon. member I refer him to Beauchesne's fifth edition, Section (1) of Citation 773.

Motions Nos. 21 and 22 should be grouped for debate, with a vote on motion No. 21 disposing of motion No. 22.

The Chair will now proceed to propose to the House motion No. 3 standing in the name of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if both you and the House would be willing to defer until later the question of the procedural propriety of motions Nos. 1 and 2. Quite frankly, speaking for myself, I had not anticipated any question there. I have not done any reading on the subject lately. Your view may prevail, but could we not leave Nos. 1 and 2 till later, perhaps to the end of the debate, and start now with No. 3?

Madam Speaker: That is exactly what is to be done in practice. I am proposing to go now to motion No. 3. I know that preambles have sometimes been accepted, but I believe that is only with the unanimous consent of the House. However, the decision is deferred and we will proceed to move to motion No. 3.

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-48, An Act to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, be amended in Clause 2 by striking out lines 17 to 25 at page 1 and lines 1 and 2 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"west Territories,".

He said: Madam Speaker, this is a very important bill. Indeed, it is probably one of the most important measures to be brought before this Parliament and, of course, evidence of that fact is the amount of time devoted to the bill in committee and the number of amendments the House is now faced with at report stage.

In terms of the amendment I have placed on the Order Paper and is now before the House, it might do well for the House to recall that at the last first ministers' meeting in September we were told that certain questions were to be the basis of round two of the first ministers' negotiations with respect to the Constitution. I realize, of course, that that statement may have been overtaken by events, namely, the unilateral action of the federal government in dealing with the Constitution in the manner in which it has and which is now a question before the Supreme Court of Canada. The fact remains that not only was this undertaking made at the time of the first ministers' meeting in September, it was repeated during the course of the hearings of the joint committee on the Constitution. Whenever we attempted to raise this question we were told there was in fact a phase two of the negotiations.

We know, for example, that regardless of what happens to the constitutional package which is now before the Supreme Court of Canada, the Government of Canada will have to go back to the provinces. We know that to be a fact, and I would be very surprised if during the course of these federal-provincial first ministers' negotiations and discussions the question of offshore jurisdiction and fisheries jurisdiction did not constitute one of the priority items on the agenda. I believe that to be a fact, and I believe that is an important fact. It is important to the argument I wish to place before the House.

If we read "The National Energy Program", the white paper of 1980 which preceded the bill which is now before the House, Bill C-48, we find the definition of Canada lands, and I quote from page 42:

> Under the British North America Act, large areas of Canada fall within federal jurisdiction. These Canada Lands, which comprise almost twice the area of the 10 provinces combined, include the area off Canada's coasts—

Then it goes on to say:

> There is some debate as to whether offshore resources in these Canada Lands fall under federal jurisdiction. Notwithstanding a ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada in 1967 that lands off the west coast are within federal jurisdiction, both Newfoundland and Nova Scotia have laid claim to jurisdiction of areas off the east coast.

I will continue to quote because this is very germane to the argument.

> The Government of Canada believes that the offshore resources belong to all Canadians. It is anxious to refer the matter of ownership quickly to the Supreme Court. Uncertainty about the legal control over such vital areas is not conducive to the rapid development of the oil and gas potential of this promising region, which can contribute to Canada's energy needs and the economic aspirations of the region.

Notwithstanding the stated position of the federal government within this policy paper, on the floor of this House and during the course of committee hearings, that it would like to have this matter of jurisdiction between Newfoundland and Canada and Nova Scotia and Canada, the offshore question, resolved by the Supreme Court of Canada, we are presented with a bill—which in essence is a fait accompli—which defines "Canada lands" as the very areas the federal government feels are under dispute and which it feels should be adjudicated by the Supreme Court of Canada.

What I am saying is that this bill can only be construed by those coastal provinces as an act of provocation, hardly conducive to successful negotiations. I believe very strongly that negotiations are absolutely essential. Having the Supreme Court of Canada resolve disputes is not the Canadian way. That is not the way this country has survived for 114 years. That may be the way of our neighbour to the south, but that is not the way I want to see Canada go, and that is not the way Canada has been growing in the past. I believe very strongly that this question has to be resolved by negotiation.

I say that notwithstanding the firm belief I hold that Newfoundland has an ironclad case. I also believe in the strength and the validity of the Nova Scotia case. The argument is totally different from that which prevailed in the situation in British Columbia. In the Newfoundland case we can argue that we had jurisdiction prior to 1949. Indeed, we can establish that we had jurisdiction prior to 1949. The government of Nova Scotia has made the case that it was given jurisdiction by letters patent from the Crown prior to confederation. These are not cases to be brushed aside.

I have no desire to presuppose how the government of Newfoundland will act with respect to this bill, or the government of Nova Scotia, but I certainly hold to the view that it would be a great mistake to have this matter end up before the Supreme Court of Canada. I do not think that would serve the best interests of this federation of ours. I do not believe it would serve the best interests of the two provinces which are disputing this claim with the Government of Canada.

I certainly would not want to see the Newfoundland case brought before the Supreme Court of Canada because I believe there is another way, a Canadian way, whereby the Government of Canada, if it is serious about this, would sit down with the government of the province of Newfoundland and/or the government of the province of Nova Scotia and work out a settlement. I believe that is essential. Hence I have placed this amendment at the report stage before the House, because nobody will dispute the jurisdiction of the Government of Canada within the territories of Canada. Nobody will dispute these areas being defined as Canada lands. They are obvious, they are self-evident. But the question of the offshore is another question entirely, one which I believe should be the subject of negotiations.

Let me quote again from the policy paper of the government:

> However, in its management of these resources, the Government of Canada is determined to take into account the needs of the region. It will use its regulatory powers to accelerate exploration in this area. Development must reflect the social and economic concerns and legitimate aspirations of the residents of coastal provinces.

What level of government is best able to reflect the social and economic concerns and legitimate aspirations of the residents of a coastal province? What level of government is best able to protect these special concerns? Obviously it is the provincial government. That is its principal responsibility. Representing a Newfoundland constituency as a Newfoundland member of Parliament, that is one of the problems I have with the position of the federal government. As a province we have been misrepresented as some kind of an ambitious young province which is on a power trip, trying to grab everything for ourselves and not wanting to share. Nothing could be further from the truth. The Premier of the province of Newfoundland, speaking on behalf of the government of Newfoundland—and I believe speaking on behalf of the legislature of Newfoundland—has made the point time and time again that the question of ownership is important to us because ownership will determine who controls the rate of development and the rate of exploitation.

The rate of development and the rate of exploitation are crucial, given socio-economic consequences. It is essential that the government of Newfoundland control the rate of development and the rate of exploitation because only the government of Newfoundland—I might say also the government of Nova Scotia; the argument applies in both cases—can truly reflect the social concerns of the people and can truly reflect cultural considerations.

There are cultural considerations. The fishery of Newfoundland, for example, is tied up in the social and cultural fabric of the province. We cannot divorce one from the other. It is an economic question; it is a social and cultural question at the same time. Yet the rate of development, if this bill becomes law and if the federal government has its way, will be controlled by the federal government because the federal government by this bill is exerting ownership. It is not even waiting for the Supreme Court of Canada to rule, in accordance with the position the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has taken in the House and in accordance with the position the Prime Minister took at the last first ministers' conference. It is not even waiting for that. It is going ahead and has taken in all the area of the continental shelf, defining it as Canada lands and thereby taking unto itself the right to control the rate of development, with all of the socio-economic consequences that would flow from it.

I do not understand, Mr. Speaker, why the government would do this. I believe it is possible to resolve this dispute. Notwithstanding the hard lines taken by the governments of Newfoundland and Canada, I believe it is possible within the spirit of confederation to reach agreement on this question. Provided that the Government of Canada is prepared to recognize the right of the coastal province to control the rate of development and to reflect the social aspirations of its people, provided that it is prepared to concede that right, I believe it is possible to reach a fair and equitable agreement.

What is the position of the Government of Canada? Perhaps we will hear a little more about that during the course of this debate, but as I understand it, the Government of Canada holds to the view that is has ownership, and it approaches it from that point of view. Conversely, the Newfoundland government takes the same position.

In terms of the jurisdiction over and revenue from offshore oil, the Government of Canada's position is that it will treat Newfoundland the same as Alberta. Newfoundland would achieve, as I understand it, the same return from the offshore during a certain period as Alberta is presently enjoying, until the people of Newfoundland reach "have" status. In terms of equalization this means, as I understand it, until the per capita income of Newfoundland reaches the national average. At that time there is some kind of negotiated sharing agreement.

I do not believe that position is as rigid, in terms of closing the door, as it would appear on the surface. I believe it is possible within that framework to negotiate a settlement, bearing in mind, I repeat, the right of Newfoundland to control the rate of development. The people and government of Newfoundland want this matter resolved. It is important that it be resolved because, let us not kid ourselves, until it is resolved the rate of development of those important offshore resources is going to be deliberately retarded. In fact, in my view it is being retarded. Given the energy crisis in Canada, given the economic situation prevailing in Atlantic Canada, and specifically given the economic conditions prevailing in Newfoundland, I think it is nothing short of criminal that we are not allowed to enjoy the returns from these resources and share them with the rest of Canada by providing energy for an energy hungry nation which could be, given the right policies, self-sufficient and one day will be.

In a letter to a member of the Newfoundland legislature which appeared in the press on July 6, the Prime Minister, reasserting the position outlined in the policy paper, said this:

We have constantly held the view that the Government of Canada owns and has jurisdiction over all offshore resources and that if the provincial governments disagree, the matter should be referred to the Supreme Court.

Nothwithstanding our views on the ownership question however, we are eager to get on with the job of developing these resources in close co-operation with the coastal provinces. While in the government's view, these resources belong to all Canadians we recognize the special opportunities and problems which their exploitation will create for the provinces nearest to them.

I see a glimmer of hope in that paragraph of the letter. I see the door being opened a little bit. I hope I am not overstating the case because I believe you have to get back to that kind of flexibility, that kind of give and take which has characterized relationships between the provincial and federal governments, if we are to resolve this issue satisfactorily and quickly. It is that kind of give and take which will make it possible for us to reach agreement.

I do not think I am exaggerating if I read in that paragraph a sudden awareness of what the Newfoundland government has been trying consistently to say throughout, namely: We must contol the rate of development and exploitation; we must be in a position to protect the interests and aspirations of our people, the social, economic and cultural fabric of our province. In addition, there is the very delicate environmental question with respect to the fisheries resources because, let us face it, we are talking about a renewable resource. If managed properly, it will be there for all time. Of course, here we are talking about a finite resource, although we are told there is a very extensive amount of reserves.

I believe very strongly, Mr. Speaker, that the time is right for us to get on with an agreement. I say with respect to the hon. gentleman who sits over there and holds the responsibility for dealing with the provinces on matters of energy, he is not going to get anywhere by being abrasive. He is not going to get anywhere with the provinces by being insulting, condescending, by refusing to recognize the legitimate rights and aspirations of the provinces within the two layer governmental system that is our country. Failure to recognize the sensitivities of the provinces with respect to their own jurisdiction under the existing Constitution will get the minister nowhere, as has been demonstrated by his experience in dealing with the provinces.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, there are other equally important aspects of this bill which will have to be dealt with either at report stage or third reading. There are the environmental aspects of the bill. The question of a major blowout, for example, and the damage it could do to our fisheries resources, our groundfish stocks on the continental shelf. These are the most prolific fishing grounds in the world. We know what happened in the Gulf of Mexico when they were not prepared for it, and I hope we have learned something from their experience. When I had the responsibility of administering Canada's fisheries I sent observers down there to experience first hand how they were dealing with the environmental impact of that massive blowout.

In the time I have remaining I would just like to reaffirm the position we put forward as a government, which has been deliberately misinterpreted time and again. I want to state our position with respect to the offshore which was contained in a letter dated September 14, 1979, from the Prime Minister to the Premier of Newfoundland. That letter outlined four principles as follows:

(1) That the province of Newfoundland should own mineral resources of the continental margin in so far as Canada should own them.

● (1540)

This is important because the Premier of Newfoundland stated—and I agree with him—that every member of the Newfoundland House of Assembly agreed with him that ownership determines who will control the rate of development and the rate of exploitation. This is why it is crucially important. It is not ownership in terms of wanting to grab it all for yourself and not wanting to share it with Canada. It is ownership in terms of managing the resource. It is ownership in terms of saying to the oil companies: "This is the rate at which you will develop, this is in the rate at which you will exploit; the rate has been determined by the socioeconomic factors of the region". The letter continued:

(2) That ownership and legislative jurisdiction would be consistent with and subject to the division of legislative competence as between Parliament and the provincial legislatures under the Constitution of Canada.

This is also important because it takes into account and recognizes the pre-eminence or paramountcy of the Government of Canada in protecting the environment and of the Fisheries Act, which certainly controls development in terms of its impact upon the environment. It is the law of the land. Nothing is changed by the dispute, nothing is changed by the Canada Lands Act. It will still hold true, just as it would have held true if the agreement we offered the provinces had been consummated. The letter continued:

(3) That the Government of Canada would continue to have legislative jurisdiction in certain areas such as the environment, shipping and so on.

(4) Those principles would be confirmed by the signing of an agreement between the two governments and by appropriate legislative action and constitutional change.

This was the proposal we put forward. It was simple, straightforward, and designed to satisfy the legitimate concerns of Newfoundland with respect to what is a very delicate environment and its legitimate desire to protect that environment and the renewable resources it produces not only for ourselves but for the world.

Newfoundland is the poorest province in Canada. It enjoys only 53.6 per cent of the earned income of the average Canadian. Its unemployment rate continues to grow. None of us in Newfoundland can take any pride from the latest unemployment figures which show that the rate of unemployment in our province went up, whereas it went down slightly in the rest of the country. Considering that unemployment insurance represents one twelfth of all personal income in Newfoundland, compared with one fortieth in the rest of Canada, it is not difficult to understand why this question is so important to us. We feel it is a matter of absolute urgency. I feel it is absolutely essential that they get back to the bargaining table.

This is not a panacea for our economic ills. It will be very expensive oil to produce and, hence, the rate of return will not be that great as from oil produced onshore. It will be some considerable time before the benefits start to flow to us. Granted, there will be spin-off effects. We know of the experience in Scotland and in Norway. We can learn from what happened in these countries and benefit from it. Indeed, studies have indicated that certain things should be in place, and they are being put in place.

All of these things notwithstanding, it is not difficult to understand why oil companies, which have spent millions and millions of dollars on exploration and drilling, are in no hurry to get on with it. It is because they feel—and I think this is a reasonable position—that the question of jurisdiction must be resolved soon. It should not be resolved by some long, drawn out litigation before the Supreme Court of Canada, but by serious negotiations between the Government of Canada and the government of Newfoundland. These negotiations would take place within the spirit of confederation, the spirit of sharing, in the spirit of Newfoundland not wanting it all for itself, but wanting a part of it, wanting to get on with it, wanting to share it with the rest of Canada. But Newfoundland must reserve as its bottom line—and this is nothing to negotiate—the right to control the rate of development because we know how crucial it is to the very delicate social and cultural character of the region in question. That is all we are requesting. It is not unreasonable.

Within the bounds of that limitation, within that general area, within the spirit of the July 6 letter of the Prime Minister to which I just referred, and within the spirit of the speech he made in St. John's earlier this year, I believe there is a degree of flexibility coming into this difficult bilateral question between Newfoundland and the Government of Canada which was not there before. I caution the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to recognize it for what it is, to seize upon it and to take advantage of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take part in this debate. This bill has been a long time in committee. I want to make some comments about the committee hearings. There are some very important aspects of the bill, especially for people who live on the east coast, on the west coast or in the north of the country.

Recently I looked at a cartoon which appeared in the Alberta Report on May 29, 1981. It depicted the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) as a chef. He was lifting the lid on a cake dish. The words "Lalonde' NEP Amendments" appeared on the lid. Since he had lifted off the lid, one is able to see the amendments which were made in committee. The cartoon depicted a four-layer cake, each layer indicating an amendment. The first layer was entitled, "Back-in compensation". This means that the government changed its original position and made it a little easier on the companies in which Petro-Canada will take a carried interest. The second layer of the cake read, "Royalty holiday expansion". This means that the government gave the companies a little longer in their royalty holiday—a tax break. The third layer indicated, "Exploration Licences Extended"; and the fourth layer of the cake read, "Petroleum Tax becomes 'Royalty-Deductible' ".

In other words, the cartoon was trying to show that, as a result of the amendments to the bill brought in by the minister in committee, the people who benefited were by and large the oil companies. The minister did not bring in any amendments to benefit other affected groups. One group was mentioned, that is, the people who make their livings on the east and west coasts fishing or operating pleasure boats in terms of environmental concerns, and the northern governments and their role. The government brought in amendments which basically helped oil companies. In doing so, it is my position that basically the government was giving in to American and oil company pressure.

Recently we have heard a lot in the news about Americans pressuring the Canadian government and the minister saying that he would stand up to that pressure on oil policy, yet we see here the government giving in to American pressure. First, it makes it easier for the bigger companies by bringing in the amendments which are set out in the cartoon to which I referred and, second, it has backed off from Canadian control of the oil industry and is not requiring the stringent degree of Canadian control which was in the second reading draft of the bill.

I say that the government gave in to the Americans and that the companies are happy. As a matter of fact, it was indicated in the Financial Post that after the minister brought in his amendments to Bill C-48 oil stocks rose. The companies are happy, but who lost out? I say that all Canadians have lost out as the result of the amendments of the minister. We will not really have a Canadian-owned industry off the east coast, the west coast or in the north. We will pay more in incentives and grants. We will pay so much in incentives and grants—92 cents to 93 cents of every dollar—that with that money we could buy Dome Petroleum and some of the bigger companies to whom we are giving the money.

• (1550)

Third, the companies will not be Canadian controlled. They will be, American controlled shells. The bill speaks of Canadian ownership, not American ownership. Thus, when we talk about the east coast and the oil plays there, such as Hibernia, and the control of those plays, we will see large American companies such as Mobil still calling the shots. Supposedly this is a government which favours Canadianization.

Worse, there are no job guarantees for Canadians. The environment is lost. Under this legislation the minister can even authorize a spill. There is no role for the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) to play in this bill. The bill deals with the development of the east and west coasts by the federal government through the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. That is a department which wants to develop oil and gas. That is what it should be doing. It should not be the guardian of the environment. We need a balance. The Department of the Environment should be involved.

The previous speaker, of course, dealt with offshore resources. Again, a balance is needed in this area. The bill which is before us purports to take all the control of the offshore, the east and west coasts and the northern offshore, and give it to the federal government without really consulting the provinces, or even listening properly to the provinces or the northern government. We say that the ownership and management should be left to the provinces. I would like to deal with the east coast and the west coast to illustrate my point. The ownership, development and management should be left to the provinces. It is the same situation as that dealing with land. Perhaps I can explain the importance of this point to people who live in central Canada. I speak as someone who comes from a west coast constituency.

Mr. MacLaren: The west part of Etobicoke?

Mr. Waddell: The hon. member opposite comes from the west coast, too, but he lives in Etobicoke now. He once lived on the west coast. He should understand that on the coast the people see coastal areas as an extension of the land. It is like land only it is under water. Thus, the provincial government should control it. The reason they want to control it is that they want to have control of the pace of development since that will affect them directly. In simple terms that is why they want control of offshore resources.

I sometimes do not agree with the rather blustery language of the Premier of Newfoundland, or the cold and hard language of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) when he replies to that Premier. Canadians should look at the problem in the context of simply having the provinces control their offshore, since it is just an extension of the land. They want to control the pace of development. They are right in wanting that. Then if there is a big find of oil or gas, such as Hibernia, the provinces should insist that they have a role to share that with the rest of the country. As I understand it, that is co-operative federalism and the way it would work.

Then someone might ask what the role of the federal government is to be. Are we to leave it out? Is there no government for Canada? That is the argument the Prime Minister has used; but he is avoiding the issue. Of course there is a role for the federal government. It has a role with regard to the environment, fishing, international affairs and the free mobility of labour. In many ways there is concurrent jurisdiction with the federal government. Let us face facts; that is how the situation will be worked out, is it not? Instead, however, we have the federal government jumping the gun and bringing down a pretty strong clause which even takes Sable Island for the government.

We on the west coast are particularly interested in the pace of development, since during the course of the committee hearings we learned from witnesses such as Chevron that in a few years it will be ready to drill on the west coast. There has been a moratorium on the west coast. I suggest that members look at the excellent brief presented by the West Coast Envrionmental Law Association to the standing committee. This brief was given on April 2, 1981. I will not repeat what is in the brief, but I will say that the concern that we on the west coast have about our environment and about drilling is present in that brief. We would like to see a public inquiry held before there is any continuation of drilling.

I have said that the government did not listen to the provinces of the east and west coasts, and it did not listen to northerners. I am particularly concerned about the last group. I proposed that the committee travel up north and listen to the people there. They do not think they have received a fair shake in this bill. Why could we not go up north and listen to the people there, considering that they were not consulted, considering that their offshore will be developed and that the pace of development will speed up? They were not properly listened to before the bill was presented. The people of the north were unanimous. They asked that the committee come up and listen. This view was held by the governments of the Yukon and Northwest Territories, the Dene Nation, the Inuit Tapirisat, the Metis Association and the many associations of the north.

I have a letter before me from the Catholic Bishops of the north pleading for fundamental justice. It is a fundamental principle to have a fair hearing. The committee heard from oil company after oil company and bureaucrat after bureaucrat, yet we never really heard from the ordinary people of the north. They want the right to be heard. Why? Because their lives and their land will be affected.

Frankly, I am surprised that a good Québécois like the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources would apply such a colonial attitude to the north. I am surprised that he would take such an inconsistent attitude. His attitude is inconsistent with the Drury report, which was a government report on the north made by a former colleague of the minister who said that the northern territories should have a fair share, a piece of the action with regard to oil and gas revenues. Where is this provided for in the bill? Nowhere. The people of the north should have some say in environmental control since there are great dangers of oil spills on their offshore and in the Beaufort Sea. The minister's attitude is inconsistent with the Berger report. It is inconsistent with the government's own National Energy Program which talks about consulting northerners. His attitude is inconsistent with reality and logic. If there is to be proper development in the north and native people and northerners are to be included in that development, then they must have a better say in the matter than they have now.

I have said to the minister that the ideal thing to do would be to do what the Americans did when they developed the Alaska pipeline. Land claims were settled before they began construction of the line. They made sure the native people had a part to play in the future of Alaska. The American government was prepared to do that. We were not prepared to do that in Canada and we will have nothing but trouble because of it. We may even eventually have rebellion in the north if we do not listen to the people of the north. There is a great judge of the north, a great Canadian hero who many people do not know about. His name is Judge Sissons, the first Supreme Court Judge of the north. He travelled around and brought justice to the people of the north. Someone said he brought justice to every man's igloo in the north and he literally did. He was made of the stuff heroes are made of. The native people of the north called him the one who listened. He was prepared to listen to them.

Having agreed to go up north, the Liberal majority on the committee, on the instructions of the minister, rescinded the resolution to go up north. I do not understand why we could not take that extra time and at least give the people of the north a fair hearing.

During the course of the debate on this bill we will be proposing numerous amendments. I am speaking specifically about the offshore amendment. Before I sit down I would like to talk about other areas of importance in the bill. We will propose amendments dealing with the grants and the giveaways. We will say that one needs to have equity. Let us take back some control if one is going to give 93 cents of every dollar. We will point out, too, that this is consistent with the pattern of the National Energy Program. There is a lot of big talk and a lot of talk of cancellation. But ultimately the furthest the National Energy Program may go is that there will be a replacement of the big American guys by big Canadian guys. We will make Dome Petroleum and the NOVA corporation and some of those companies the Standard Oil of Canada. We will make them the giants, and all through Canadian grants and incentives.

● (1600)

The Canadian people are starting to see in this bill that Canadian ownership is Canadian private ownership, not Canadian public ownership. I think Canadians are ready and want to have public ownership of their resources. I suggested in the committee, and I suggest now, Your Honour, that if one looks at the regimes of Norway and Great Britain, one will find that they are a lot tougher than this one. They do not have the 25 per cent backing. They are a lot tougher. I just want to read, if I may, what the vice-president of Petro-Canada told the committee. He told the committee that the land tenure and rent collection regimes proposed by Bill C-48 are less onerous than those applied elsewhere. He said that Petro-Canada developed a model of the economics of developing a field similar to the current Hibernia discovery off the east coast at a wellhead oil price of $41 a barrel. Then he set down how much money would be made, how much profit would be made, in millions of dollars. I will not go into those figures, but it is far higher in Canada than it would be in the United Kingdom or Norway.

Mr. McNicholas, the manager of the economics and public policy of Petro-Canada, in a letter to our chairman of the committee dated March 25, 1981, had this to say:

> It is clear from the above analysis that the development of a field like Hibernia yields higher present value returns and comparably higher rates of return on capital invested in Canada under NEP rules than in the U.K. or in Norway.

If these multinational companies are prepared to accept tougher regimes in Norway and in the United Kingdom, why do we not have these kinds of regimes in Canada? This is what our amendment will try to do. It will try to bring this regime up to a tougher standard.

This bill also speaks of the difference, when we are developing the offshore, between ownership and control. This bill talks about Canadian ownership. However, it is control which is important, so that we do not just have a number of dummy Canadian companies, dummy consortiums, which will be really controlled by Americans. That will be consistent with our history. We have been a nation—and this government has been the most to blame—which has allowed our oil and gas industry to be controlled by foreigners. We have done it again and again, and even after this bill is passed we are going to continue to do that.

Therefore, let me sum up by saying this. We believe that the provinces should control the offshore, but there should be an overriding federal power. There should be concurrent power, in the federal government and the provinces, in a number of areas like the environment, shipping, fishing and so on. Finally, there should be revenue-sharing as a result. That is the way Canada can work fairly.

I hear the hon. members criticizing and shouting at me. I say to them that they are very confident, that they can impose regimes on areas of the country where they have no members. They do not hesitate to impose their will on places. Now they are allowed to do that legally. However, I think that they should be very careful and should try to listen a little bit before they do that. The north is a prime example. They are imposing a regime on the north, and they are not even prepared to give a fair hearing to the northern people.

Finally, I say that this bill has been amended under pressure, I submit, from Americans. The government is yielding to pressure. It is also coming from the oil industry. My friends to the right, the Conservatives, are happy with this bill in many ways. They co-operated in getting it out of committee. They agreed to the closure in the committee; but when it was passed, they fought the bill in committee to try and get these things through, on Canadian content, on Canadian control, on a tougher regime, on a fairer regime for the coast, on a fairer environmental regime for fishermen and environmentalists, and finally, on a fair regime for the northern governments. Therefore, as a result of these changes which the committee has made to the bill, the people who have gained have been those in the oil companies, the large multinational companies and the large Canadian companies. The people who have lost are Canadians, as a whole, and specifically a number of groups.

Frank Scott, the great poet, a great Montrealer who is now in his eighties, I believe, once wrote a poem about the north and Canada. I remember one line from it: "A large land silent, awaiting the struggle". The struggle has come in the north and in the east and west coast, because Bill C-48 will speed up, more than anyone in the country now realizes, I think, the development of our offshore and our north. We have to make sure that we have the toughest possible regime which will protect the interests of ordinary Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to participate in this debate at the report stage and to consider various amendments which have been proposed to this most important bill. I recognize, indeed, that this is a major piece of legislation which has great significance for the future development of oil and gas resources in Canada, and particularly all those resources which are in the Arctic and the offshore. This bill represents a major step forward compared to any previous legislation which has been put forward in the past, and, unfortunately, was never passed, for various reasons.

Up until now, this whole sector, that immense part of Canada which is part of the Northwest Territories, the Yukon and all the offshore, was controlled only via regulations adopted by the federal government; and some of the regulations, going back 20 years, have been completely outdated. Therefore, Bill C-48 brings a modern regime to Canadian lands, a regime which will compare favourably with any other regime set up elsewhere in the world and will ensure that the people of Canada as a whole are going to benefit from these developments. When I say the people of Canada as a whole, I obviously include, more particularly, the people in the regions neighbouring those developments or the regions in which those developments are going to take place.

This bill has given rise to extended debate. It was the hope of the government that this bill would have been considered only in the fall, at the committee stage and for third reading. As Your Honour knows, last week the government proposed that we adjourn and reconvene some time in October to pursue discussions of various legislative measures. Unfortunately, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has decided that we should keep on sitting in case legislation concerning the postal dispute is required, rather than adjourn and have the House resume at any time if such a measure is required. Today we are beginning this report stage. I do not know how long we will debate this project. Obviously, it will depend on how long we are required to stay before an adjournment is agreed to by the opposition. As far as we are concerned, we are very happy, nonetheless, to see that debate can begin on this particular measure. My parliamentary secretary gave a commitment that the bill would not be proceeded with on third reading before the House resumes in the fall. We certainly intend to keep this commitment, assuming, however, that the House will adjourn.

I want to repeat that if the House is kept in session through the whole summer and into September, we will obviously have to proceed with this bill; but I assume that the official opposition will conclude that it is reasonable to have some adjournment at some stage during the course of the summer.

The committee has had 73 meetings and heard 130 witnesses during that time. I have remarked that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), as a good former Torontonian, talked about many aspects of this bill. He referred to a cartoon in the Alberta Report. I suggest that he should have read, rather, an article by Bob Hepburn entitled "The NDP's Energy Headache", in which this analyst, having attended the recent NDP convention, concluded—

Mr. Waddell: He was not there.

Mr. Lalonde: —that the NDP, as usual, is completely wishy-washy, if not completely awash, on the subject.

Mr. Waddell: He was not there.

• (1610)

Mr. Lalonde: The NDP did not even give birth to a mouse. The whole debate on energy at the recent NDP convention clearly showed that the NDP, as in so many other areas, does not know whether it is going or coming.

As far as the points raised by the hon. member are concerned, I want to stress particularly his argument about the people of the north not having been heard. This is a most unfair statement to make as far as the committee is concerned. If the hon. member had attended all the committee hearings, he would have realized that many representatives of the north came, including some very outstanding representatives. For instance, representatives of the government of the Northwest Territories, the Dene people and the Inuit were present. They made their representations. They were heard. Numerous briefs were presented on behalf of various organizations in the north. I am amazed that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kinsway had the gall to say the people of the north have not been represented when two members from the north, the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) and the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar), participated very actively in the debates of that committee. They brought a most constructive approach to those debates.

Mr. Waddell: That is what they are saying, not me.

Mr. Lalonde: I want to congratulate both members for the positive attitude they took and for the genuine effort they made in bringing improvements to the bill. Many improvements were accepted. I commend also the Inuit council on national issues which went to work and put forward constructive amendments and made strong recommendations respecting the bill.

In addition, I should mention that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) had a few words with me. I did not see him too often during the committee hearings but I know that he was otherwise busy. Nevertheless he expressed his interest. However, the notion that three members of Parliament for the north, no matter from which party they come, would not be speaking for the people of the north appears to me to be the most outrageous statement to come from another member of Parliament. This kind of notion that members of Parliament in this House do not represent the people of the north, that they do not speak for the people and that only the local governments and local voluntary associations are speaking for the people, I do not accept.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I recognize the minister should have an opportunity to speak and that I can reply at another time, but he should not misrepresent what I said. I never said members of Parliament were not representing people; the northern people said that. That is a deliberate misrepresentation on the part of the minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) does not appreciate the interpretation the minister is giving to certain words. However, that is a question for debate and is not a point of order.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I hope this irrational interruption will be deducted from the time allotted to me.

Mr. Knowles: You have 40 minutes.

Mr. Lalonde: I recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Indeed, I believe I have 40 minutes.

An hon. Member: You don't have to take it.

Mr. Lalonde: Therefore, I will not include this intervention. Nevertheless, I must remind the hon. member that the committee voted for additional meetings and voted to pay for the expenses of the people of the north who wanted to appear before the committee. Those proposals were agreed to by the committee and reiterated by the chairman.

In addition, at the invitation of the hon. member for Nunatsiaq, two members from the Liberal party travelled north and visited various communities. They met a number of people.

Mr. Wilson: Who paid for that?

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member is suddenly worried about who paid. As the hon. member well knows, members of Parliament are entitled to ten trips across the country every year. He could have taken the trouble of going north as provided for by the rules of this House, along with any member of his party; but he did not bother to use that privilege. So I say to the hon. member that is his problem.

Mr. Waddell: That is a pretty weak defence.

Mr. Lalonde: Recently I went to the western Arctic. There I met representatives of various communities.

On the issue of amendments, there are several dozen amendments before us today. Well over 100 amendments were considered by the committee: some were passed and some rejected. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has referred to a cartoon in the Alberta Report. He should have been more attentive in committee. He should have known that there were many more amendments than those referred to in the cartoon. I remind him that an amendment was brought forward by the government which specifically guarantees the rights of the aboriginal people and says that this bill does not affect in any way, shape or form the titles and the rights which the aboriginal people in this country may have.

Mr. Waddell: That is laughable.

Mr. Lalonde: My hon. friend says it is laughable, but that is exactly the same clause as that found in the constitutional resolution which his party supported.

Mr. Waddell: That is right.

Mr. Lalonde: It is not laughable. It is a fundamental guarantee given to the people of the north, particularly the aboriginal people of Canada. There are amendments which will guarantee the aboriginal people the possibility of participating actively in the development that will take place in the north, either as individuals or through their co-operatives and the corporations they may set up, etc. These amendments have been brought forward by the government. Other amendments provide for the setting up of advisory bodies which will ensure participation by the people in the regions in the development that will take place and, in working closely with the government, in controlling the development that will take place.

Canada lands represent the future of this country in terms of resources, and in terms of oil and gas in particular. All the analysts indicate that the future security of this country in terms of oil and gas is most likely to come from the Canada lands.

What do we call Canada lands? This bill does not make any particular grab for jurisdiction; this bill provides only that what were Canada lands before continue to be Canada lands. There is no extension of jurisdiction nor any grab for it. For the last 30 years at least the federal government has legislated Canada lands.

As I said, we have been acting essentially through regulations, a very poor way, and with regulations that are very inadequate. Now we are coming forward with a proper legislative framework to ensure that the people of Canada will know the rules of the game. They will know that Parliament will have pronounced on the legislative regime to apply to Canada lands. This means essentially at least 40 per cent of the resources left in this country, probably more. It means all of the lands we find in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and all of the water resources surrounding Canada, off the west coast, in the north and off the east coast. These are Canada lands. These are the lands for which we as the Parliament of Canada are responsible on behalf of the people of Canada.

There are those, and we hear them on the other side, who are afraid of assuming their responsibilities, who feel that the Parliament of Canada or the federal government cannot be trusted with the responsibility of ensuring an orderly development of those lands; that those lands and the resources that are there should be hived off to whatever regional or provincial governments there are. We as national parliamentarians and as the Parliament of Canada are too far removed, too weak, so short of imagination that we will not be able to ensure in those lands a regime that will benefit the people of the regions and all the people of Canada. We will not be able to have a regime which will ensure development and at the same time protect the environment and the rights and interests of others, such as the fishermen.

The solution of those opposite is to say: "Hive it off to the provinces; let the locally elected people in the regions run it, the national government cannot do it". That is not the view of this government. It is not the view for any proper national government of this country. In fact, there is not one federation in the world where the offshore resources belong to the regional governments, the provinces or the states, not one.

Members opposite are afraid to take responsibility for protecting the interests of Canada. They believe this should be up to the provinces, territorial governments or other groups. That is not our view. Our view is that those lands belong to all the people of Canada. The immense wealth that is there belongs to the people of Canada as a whole.

The Parliament of Canada is the guardian and trustee of the immense wealth which should be developed and protected in the interests of the people of Canada as a whole and the people of the regions concerned in particular. That is our view. That does not mean that this national government is not interested and concerned about a proper role and a proper share for the people in the neighbouring regions or the provincial or territorial governments of the regions where there are Canada lands. That is not our view. Over this past decade our view has consistently been that we want an arrangement with the provincial and territorial governments to ensure that there is proper development and that it is carried out on a co-operative basis.

It is the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who initiated an agreement with the maritime provinces many years ago. The three maritime provinces agreed with the federal government on a regime for the development of offshore resources in the maritime provinces. What happened? The agreement which was arrived at voluntarily by the various governments was later cancelled by some provincial governments. Unfortunately, since then it has not been possible to arrive at another agreement.

It was not the federal government which cancelled the agreement. It had been willingly entered into by the four governments concerned. At a certain stage some of those governments withdrew their agreement. Since then we have consistently tried to work out an arrangement with the provinces concerned so that this development takes place on a co-operative basis. We continue to strive to arrive at such an agreement.

Any agreement has to take into account the rights and responsibilities of the national government for the people of Canada. We differ from the parties opposite because we believe that the people of Canada, through their national government, have an interest in this. Some members opposite say that the rate of development of the Canada lands should be left to the neighbouring governments. We disagree fundamentally in that regard. Do we want a situation where a particular province could block indefinitely the development of resources in the offshore areas or in the north while the people of Canada are importing oil and are unable to develop those resources that are needed for this country? Do we want a situation where Premiers could do with offshore resources on lands or waters which belong to the people of Canada what was recently done by the Premier of Alberta when he cut off production because he did not like the price?

When the resources belong to the people of Canada, would it be responsible to have a situation where the Premiers or heads of various governments could veto development? We do not agree with that. We want to arrive at arrangements where development is done on a co-operative basis, where the rights of the regions and the people in those regions are protected and at the same time the rights of the people of Canada are protected by their national government. That is our belief.

The notion that a particular region of this country could prevent the people of Canada from getting the benefit of resources which belong to them is one which we as a government cannot accept. In that regard we dissociate ourselves from the position of the parties opposite.

We have had meetings with some of the provincial governments concerned. I am sure there will be more. We have indicated that we are eager that provinces such as Newfoundland will be a major beneficiary of such development. As the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has indicated, that province is in a difficult economic position. It is one of the poorest provinces in this country. It is important that any development which takes place is done in such a way that it does not hurt the economy and social life of Newfoundland but ensures a dynamic society and economy for that province. That is the position of this government. That is the type of arrangement we would like to arrive at with the government of Newfoundland as well as those of the other maritime provinces, British Columbia and the governments in the north.

This does not mean that the courts have no role in this regard. I find it strange that some members would appear scandalized at the notion that the national government could go to court if there is no agreement on some issues with a particular provincial government. The provinces can take the federal government to court every day of the week. Those opposite find that quite normal. In fact, they think it is great if a province takes the federal government to court. I believe the same role should apply to both sides.

Sometimes there are honest disagreements between citizens of this country or between governments of this country. If you cannot work out a deal in a civilized society, the judicial system is asked to arbitrate and decide who is right and who is wrong. There is nothing scandalous about that. That is the way every civilized society has operated in the past. That is the way democratic society in this country will operate in the future. For example, the issue regarding offshore jurisdiction is before the courts at the present time. That is not at the initiative of the federal government. I remind hon. members there was a joint reference on the west coast between the B.C. government and the federal government. It was an agreed reference. The Supreme Court of Canada concluded that the federal Parliament had jurisdiction offshore on the west coast.

As far as the east coast is concerned, particularly Newfoundland, there is a case before the Federal Court of Appeal at the present time which has been initiated by the Seafarers' International Union during which the issue of jurisdiction is being debated, and I suspect that the court will be called upon to arbitrate in this respect and both the Newfoundland government and the national government will be mise en cause; they will be called in as intervenors in that particular case. We will see what will be the results of that particular litigation.

As far as we are concerned, we are not closing the door even now on pursuing negotiations between the governments concerned which would arrive at a satisfactory conclusion for all. Therefore, what we have put forward in this bill is a whole train of measures which will ensure that for the first time the people of Canada, through their national government, are going to be significant beneficiaries in a very direct way from the development that will take place in Canada lands. For the first time the Canadian people will have a 25 per cent interest in the development of Canada lands. For the first time there will be very tough rules whereby there will be requirement for procurement of goods and services and Canadians will be able to compete for the procurement of those goods, and Canadians will find themselves in the advantageous position of seeing their ability fully exploited and their manpower fully used in the 12 projects that will take place in the north.

Quite clearly there will be significant development in years to come. In the view of this government—and we have appreciated the representations made before the committee, as well as through letters from all kinds of groups in the country who are concerned about the people living in the regions—this will remain a very, very high priority and a very high source of concern.

I submit that we have debated long enough. This bill has been before Parliament since December. I have referred to the 73 meetings that took place before the committee and the 130 witnesses who have been heard. I submit the people of Canada expect the Parliament of Canada to act at a certain stage, and certainly on an issue as important as this one, on a bill that has so much significance for the future of those lands and the future of energy security in this country, I hope Parliament will make up its mind eventually and reach a conclusion.

Mr. Speaker, in the two minutes left to me, I merely want to stress the importance of the bill. This bill concerning Canada lands is the most important measure brought forward by the Canadian government in the energy field in many years. The bill covers the entire Arctic, all offshore mining rights. Those are the areas which in the coming decades will provide for Canada the energy security it needs.

We feel as a government that those resources belong to all Canadians and that we should see to it that all Canadians benefit from them. That is why we have provided in this bill, for example, that Canadians will be directly entitled to a 25 per cent interest in any future developments on Canada lands.

We have taken steps to ensure that Canadians will remain strongly competitive when they sell their assets or provide their services. We have taken steps to ensure that the economy and the Canadian workers throughout Canada may benefit from developments taking place on Canada lands.

We have also taken steps to ensure that the areas in the vicinity of those developments are the first to benefit from them. The Prime Minister has said so repeatedly, as I have. Discussions and negotiations are being pursued with the governments concerned with a view to making sure that developments on Canada lands will take place in an orderly way that will be of benefit not only to the regions concerned but generally to all Canadian citizens whom it is our duty to represent as parliamentarians, as members of the Parliament of Canada. In that sense, we reject the opinion that federal parliamentarians do not have the guts, the imagination nor the sense of responsibility needed, in short, the courage to make sure that those developments can take place for the good of all Canadians whom it is our duty to represent here.

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in my remarks I will confine myself to the question of the offshore, which is the subject of this motion moved by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). Let me say that the minister who has just sat down has really represented today the Liberal party in its true arrogance and its true scorn for anyone who is not of that one ilk, its true blindness and smugness.

This is not a unitary state, this is a confederation, and the Liberal Party of Canada epitomizes certain central Canadians in the kind of approach the minister indicated today, blindly and smugly believing that no one else in Canada should ever have their day in the sun. We are never to have our day in the sun in Newfoundland; we are never to have our day in the sun in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick. If there is a prospect in those areas of wealth from some offshore resource, that is not to be permitted to be ours. We are not to have that by right. We are only to have that—and I use the minister's language—if those people opposite, in their great wisdom, their great benevolence and great mercy, decide to give it to us.

The minister said in his speech that these resources belong to the people of Canada as a whole. These resources that are offshore belong to the people of Canada as a whole, as though if they are owned by Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and P.E.I. they do not belong to the people of Canada. In other words, Alberta should not have owned its resources in the first place, nor Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Ontario or any province, because if they owned those resources they do not belong to the people of Canada as a whole. That is a whole new concept. The minister said they have to belong to the people of Canada as a whole but can only if this government owns them; that is, the Government of Canada.

He then said: We will give a proper share to the provinces. Does this government not see that we do not want it to give us a proper share. We say we are entitled to it. We say it is our right. We are not coming up here like lap dogs with our paws out looking for gifts from the great Liberal governing party of Canada. That is not acceptable to us. We do not accept it. It is ours by right. It should be ours not to be given to us by the great Liberal hegemonists of central Canada who think the rest of the country has to bow to them as long as they can continue getting the majority in the ways they have in the past. We do not want this minister giving us one thing. We are not going to put ourselves at his mercy down in Newfoundland, having him or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) give us something. We do not want to be given anything; but we want what we say we are entitled to. We want what we say we have the right to. We are not going to plead with the Liberal Government of Canada for anything.

Let us consider the legal position. I do not care what the Supreme Court of Canada would decide on legal grounds is the position with reference to offshore resources. I do not care if the Supreme Court of Canada would say for technical, legal reasons it is legally owned by the Government of Canada. I would say: So what! Our party would say: So what! That might be the technical, legal position, but it is not the right moral position. It is not the right equitable position. It is not the right confederation position. It is not the right spirit of confederation position. So we do not care what the Supreme Court of Canada would say in Newfoundland; it will not satisfy us because we do not see any reason why we should be treated differently from the other provinces of Canada.

Mr. Cullen: The Conservatives do not care what the Supreme Court says.

Mr. Crosbie: Perhaps you cannot understand that. Let me say it again. The technical, legal position which might or might not confirm the federal government as being the technical, legal owner is irrelevant to the whole situation, completely irrelevant.

I refer to a document from the Parliamentary Library, "Offshore Mineral Resources: Legal Aspects". It says this at page 2:

> At Confederation, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario retained ownership of the "Lands, Mines, Minerals and Royalties" and all "Public property" then belonging to them; this was embodied respectively in Sections 109, and 117 of the British North America Act. This proviso was also made applicable to Prince Edward Island and British Columbia when they joined Canada.
> In the western provinces, the situation differed initially, as the natural resources were reserved to the federal government when Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba were carved out of Rupert's Land. However, the BNA Act of 1930 subsequently transferred the same rights to those provinces.

Do you understand, Mr. Speaker, that Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba had no legal right to their resources until 1930 and that they were in fact technically, legally owned by the Government of Canada? That is why I say I do not give a fig what the Supreme Court of Canada says is a technical, legal position on the offshore resources. They should receive the same treatment as the resources in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba received in 1930.

What happened in 1930? The British North America Act of 1930 subsequently transferred the same rights to those provinces. When Newfoundland became part of Canada in 1949 it was put in a similar position by term 37 of the Terms of Union. Thus, there is historical and legal justification for provincial resource ownership.

Then, of course, there is a dispute about the offshore resources. It is a technical dispute. Are they within the boundaries of the provinces? And so on and so forth. The Supreme Court of Canada made a decision with reference to British Columbia in 1967 which is persuasive but not conclusive as regards the other provinces because the technical, legal aspects with reference to Newfoundland have to be decided with respect to the law of 1949 and not the law of the nineteenth century and so on.

So our party takes a fundamentally different view. We take the same view that the Parliament of Canada took in 1930 with reference to Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, that resources belong to the provinces, and just because they are under the salt water off the physical shores of the province makes not one whit of difference to that principle, that equitable principle, that principle of confederation, that fair principle, that just principle on which Canada was set up in the beginning and under which Newfoundland entered confederation in 1949. That was the understanding we had of the situation.

Up to 1971 we had a government in Newfoundland which did not care about the offshore. It did not defend Newfoundland's position. It did not put forward a case. I refer to the Smallwood Liberal government. It surrendered to the federal government. It was prepared to cast off the offshore resources. As a matter of fact, it is a lucky thing it did not go any further because it had given a whole series of permits to Mr. John Shaheen and to Mr. John C. Doyle of Canadian Javelin and the like. All it ever did with the offshore was give concessions to these favourites of the then Premier.

In 1971 that situation was changed. A new government took over in Newfoundland and adopted a different attitude to the offshore and has dealt with it in a much more serious and convincing fashion. It has set up an administration and a regime and a department that can administer it, that has people involved in that department just as good in every way as the people involved in the civil service of Canada or of Alberta, Saskatchewan or whatever. We in Newfoundland are ready to handle our full responsibilities as owners of those resources.

What about this view that somehow Newfoundland has suddenly become rich? You can forget that, Mr. Speaker. Newfoundland is still the least rich province of Canada if we just look at one example of that, and I am quoting now from a document of May, 1980 prepared by the government of Newfoundland. They point out that in 1978, the latest year for which statistics were available, Newfoundland ranked a dismal last in the nation in terms of earned income, income that we earn down there. It is not given to us, not transferred to us, not coming from somebody else, not given—you put your hand out like a poor old trained seal and somebody puts it in your hand; it is earned income that people earn. We are the last of the ten provinces in Canada, and if we take Newfoundland per capita earned income at 100 in the year 1978, Ontario was 208. It had double the per capita earned income of Newfoundland. Our disparity was 108 per cent compared to Ontario. British Columbia was 205. Our disparity was 105 per cent compared to British Columbia. And so on down to Prince Edward Island, which was 14 per cent better off than Newfoundland was in earned income in that particular year. That is the situation of Newfoundland.

Supposing Newfoundland—and this argument applies to the other Atlantic provinces also—is recognized by the federal government, no matter what the legal, technical position is, as being the owner of those resources just as if they were under the land, just as if we were Alberta, Saskatchewan or British Columbia. The federal government would not be giving much away. The federal government would still have the right to impose a corporation tax. The federal government would still have the right to impose any means or method of taxation, direct or indirect. It would still have all its tremendous constitutional powers that it has today in relation to the resources of Alberta, Saskatchewan or wherever they are. It would be no different.

Now, this year Newfoundland is going to get $782.4 million in transfer payments from the Government of Canada; $416.7 million in tax equalization. When we include all the established programs financing, $782.4 million is a sizeable amount in relation to Newfoundland. But I point out that Quebec is going to get over $6 billion and that even mighty Ontario is going to get $4.909 billion, and so on. Do not think that Newfoundlanders are the only ones getting money under these programs. We are getting $416 million in tax equalization.

If Newfoundland at some point becomes entitled to the royalties and a lot of the revenues that come from the ownership of oil and gas resources, then it will no longer be receiving $416.7 million in tax equalization. It will no longer need it. That will save the Government of Canada $416 million and, of course, in ten or 15 years' time it will be a far larger sum. If the four Atlantic provinces become self-sufficient and self-sustaining because of offshore resources, it would save the Government of Canada hundreds and hundreds of millions, even billions, of dollars.

Why is this government so dedicated to the position that these areas must be kept dependent? Because that is what they are saying in this bill. That is what they are saying in their oil and gas policy. "We are dedicated to the proposition that you in the Atlantic provinces and Newfoundland will always be dependent on us here in Ottawa" and "If you do not do as we tell you to do, we are going to punish you," just as this government is punishing Newfoundland and Newfoundlanders today in every way, shape and form they can—

Mr. Breau: Nonsense.

Mr. Crosbie: —in their restriction of spending and federal expenditures in that province. I do not have time today to document it but I can, and that is why the minister opposite who represents us is going to have to run. He is going to be like Hughie Shea, the fastest man on two wheels ever to go through the Goulds. He is going to be the fastest man on two wheels ever to go through Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador unless he changes some of his actions when the next election comes.

We are not a have province. The Prime Minister indicated in a speech to the Liberal party in Newfoundland that he is ready to discuss this issue and to try to get some resolution of it. He says he wants Newfoundland to have 100 per cent of the revenues. This is all weasel wording, of course. What revenues? He says he wants us in Newfoundland to have 100 per cent of the revenues. He does not define what they are. He says we should have those revenues until we become a have province. What is a have province? Who defines it? Who decides when Newfoundland becomes a have province? We have just seen this House pass legislation to provide that Ontario is a have province when, according to the equalization formula, it is a have-not province now.

We just passed in this session legislation to change the definition in terms of "have" with respect to Ontario, because Ontario was entitled to tax equalization until we passed those recent amendments. So who can define what a have province is and what a have-not province is? Is Newfoundland, if it entered into such an agreement with Canada, to leave it up to the Government of Canada to decide when it is have and when it is have-not, and when it loses the revenues? When it loses oil and gas revenues because it is a have province, how can it remain a have province? If you had all those revenues and they made you a have, and then the federal government says "You are a have" and they take the revenues back, are you still going to be a have, or are you going to be a have-not? That is some deal to offer the province of Newfoundland! I hope the Prime Minister is going to be a bit more serious than that.

The Premier of Newfoundland has written the Prime Minister to say that he is ready any morning, afternoon or night to meet with him and discuss this issue, to try and negotiate some settlement. However, he is not going to throw away Newfoundland's rights and opportunities just because the squeeze has been put on by the mighty Liberal government in Ottawa to try and bring Newfoundland to its knees by cutting back federal spending, by treating the province with shabby manners, insulting statements from federal ministers about provincial ministers and the like. It is a disgusting exhibition of bullying and arrogance of the worst type.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on September 5, 1979 the then prime minister, now Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), met with Premier Peckford. Then on September 14, 1979 a letter, which my confrere the hon. member for St. John's East has referred to, was sent which outlined four principles to resolve this whole issue. If we had continued in office, the offshore issue would be settled now. There would be substantial progress toward developing the Hibernia oil field. This is another example of how this government's arrogance, stubbornness and wrongheaded policies are holding up self-sufficiency in oil and gas for Canada.

An hon. Member: Another failure.

Mr. Crosbie: As long as this dispute continues, the development of Hibernia and other fields is going to be delayed. Another failure. The Cold Lake failure. The Alsands failure. The economic failures. The hypocrisy of their economic policies. Oil rigs leaving the country.

Today the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) gave us one of his best examples of reptilian arrogance, reptilian bootheeling. You could hear his jackboots cracking on the floor of the House as he explained how he represented all Canadians, he and only he, and his government. They do not represent the Canadians who live in my district, they do not represent me, they do not represent the west at all. They are arrogating unto themselves the idea that they represent all of the Canadian people. The premiers do not represent anyone, just the people in the provinces. Well, it is the ten provinces that make up Canada, and those ten premiers together equally represent the people of Canada—

Mr. Lalonde: They cannot agree. What can they agree on?

Mr. Crosbie: —not just the members elected to this House. This is a confederation, Mr. Speaker, not a unitary state. This is not yet a Liberal dictatorship, even though they want us to carry on as if it were.

The minister said Newfoundland should be—he said "should be"—a major beneficiary of offshore development. Thank you, Mr. Lalonde. Thank you for these small mercies. I am sure your fellow cabinet minister, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey), and the four other Liberal members from Newfoundland are saying to you every day, "Thank you, Mr. Lalonde."

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Crosbie: They are tipping their caps to Mr. Lalonde.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Minister. Thank you, Mr. Minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I am sure hon. members get carried away and forget that hon. members should be referred to by their constituencies and not by name.

Some hon. Members: Carry John away.

Mr. Lalonde: Carry him away.

Mr. Crosbie: They are saying every day, "Thank you, Mr. Minister."

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member, at the end of his speech, could take ten seconds and summarize the important points he has made.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, that shows you why that gentleman is a parliamentary assistant; that is the highest he is ever going to reach. He is never going to get one centimetre higher. In the metric system or in any system in the world, that parliamentary assistant will never go one iota higher.

The gentlemen of the NDP are used to discordant singing; they had a lot of it out in Vancouver at a recent convention.

An hon. Member: Ask Benno Friesen. Where is Benno Friesen?

Mr. Crosbie: Where is he?

An hon. Member: He was there.

Mr. Crosbie: We do not have all that long to speak in this debate, Mr. Speaker, and I probably have only—

Mr. Knowles: We have all summer.

Mr. Crosbie: Well, we do have all summer unless the government listens to reason, and probably they will.

An hon. Member: Don't bet on it.

Mr. Crosbie: The minister referred to the maritime agreement. Well, that was entered into by several Liberal administrations in the Atlantic provinces which have been swept out of office.

Mr. Lalonde: The Hatfield—

Mr. Crosbie: The Hatfield administration. I will not say any more than that about that. When the Buchanan government came to power in Nova Scotia and the new PC government of Prince Edward Island, that was the end of this maritime surrender agreement entered into by those Liberal governments. It was terminated because they were no longer going to go along with that. They are hoping the hon. gentlemen opposite will come to their senses.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Hatfield—

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Hatfield can speak for himself. He certainly appears to do that.

We are not happy with this bill. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) suggested we were. We are positively unhappy with this bill and unhappy with this government. We are not the happy hookers of Ottawa; that is the hon. gentleman's leader who jumped into bed with the government on the Constitution and on energy, and they have been in bed ever since. Now they are trying to wriggle out of bed by trying to convince the Canadian public they are no longer happy hooking with the Liberal government.

Mr. Waddell: Who closed off the debate?

Mr. Crosbie: Do not accuse us of being happy with this bill. We are determined to oppose this bill. Why did the hon. gentleman not ask this House of Commons committee to go to the east coast and talk to the people?

Mr. Waddell: He did.

Mr. Crosbie: Not just to the north, but to the east coast, the west coast and the north to see what conditions are actually like. Get out of central Canada; leave the salubrious atmosphere of Ottawa and see what life is really like. See what the people down there—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Crosbie: I will terminate quickly, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Terminate, terminate.

Mr. Crosbie: I just say, Mr. Speaker, if we pass this motion—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Did I hear someone disagree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Agreed.

Mr. Crosbie: Is there agreement for me to carry on?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I gather there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Lalonde: Next time, John. There are 57 amendments; you have 57 speeches.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Social Security—Minister's commitments to improve pensions for women, (a) request that minister press for action by government, (b) minister's role in advocating income tax reforms; the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp)—Post Office—service provided by rural offices during postal strike, (a) treatment of employees who remain on duty; the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek)—Post Office—government position on postal strike, (a) suspension of right to strike.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA OIL AND GAS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OIL AND GAS INTERESTS

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-48, an act to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, and Motion No. 3 (Mr. McGrath).

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say on this particular motion moved by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). I think what we have seen in the last hour or so has been quite an interesting display. It is interesting that the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) would find it necessary even to rise after what was a rather excellent presentation by the senior member in the Tory caucus from Newfoundland, the hon. member for St. John's East. He is a man who has been here for some years and who demonstrated his knowledge of the subject this afternoon. I listened with great interest to what he had to say and, while I did not agree with everything he said, he certainly made a very good case. I for one, as a fellow Newfoundlander, certainly want to congratulate him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simmons: I find it a little disconcerting and revealing that the hon. member for St. John's West thought it necessary to rise and make an effort to improve on the arguments of the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Nystrom: The junior member.

Mr. Simmons: I found it really significant that the junior member, the hon. member for St. John's West, could not identify himself with the remarks of the hon. member for St. John's East, but elected in this important debate to carry on the feud which has been evident between them for some years, especially since the junior member came to this chamber.

It is not often, Mr. Speaker, that I come to the defence of my good friend, the hon. member for St. John's East, being of a different political stripe and all that, but I think it is a bit of a pity that an attempt has been made to humiliate him in this House this afternoon. The implication is made by the hon. member for St. John's West that somehow the hon. member for St. John's East was not able to put the argument forward, and that he, the junior member, had to rise and elaborate and embellish the argument, as it were. Indeed, in some instances he took a very different tack from the hon. member for St. John's East. Mr. Speaker, I think the record should show that.

Just to make a quick and passing observation before I come to the substance of the motion before us—

Mr. Waddell: Don't do that. Don't stop now!

Mr. Simmons: —I thought some of the wind had gone out of his sails. He was just a shadow of his former self today. There was lots of sound and lots of fury, all signifying not very much. He was really not up to it today. If hon. members observed closely, his heart was not in it any more. I suppose it is very difficult. It becomes embarrassing to rise in the chamber and go through the motions of identifying with the hon. member for St. John's East, a gentleman one rarely identifies with on anything. It was more important and significant that he found himself defending the premier of the province which the hon. member for St. John's East, the hon. member for St. John's West and I represent in the House. He placed himself in the position of actually being on the same side of an argument as the Premier of Newfoundland. It must have been galling and very embarrassing for the hon. member for St. John's West.

● (1700)

A week or so ago on a very related issue he took quite a different stance. The hon. member for St. John's West is not known to be silent on many issues, but let me draw the attention of the House to a matter on which he has been extremely silent, and not only he but the hon. member for St. John's East as well.

A short while ago in the House the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) rose and told the House that the government was prepared to facilitate the movement of hydro through the province of Quebec. We all know the stance of the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) on it. He is on the record as being against it; the hon. member for Yellowhead opposes it. We know that the Premier of Newfoundland is very much in favour of it because he came out and said no. We must give the man credit: he came out and said that he was happy with the new initiative of the government.

What did the hon. member for St. John's East say or what did the hon. member for St. John's West say on that particular issue? If they are as concerned about energy issues as they affect the economic future of Newfoundland as they purported to be in the House this afternoon, where is their voice on the issue of transmitting hydro through Quebec? Where is their voice? It has been completely silent. There was not one tittle, not one syllable, not one word from the hon. member for St. John's West; not a word, not a syllable, not a phrase form the hon. member for St. John's East on the issue. Why? It was because they were caught.

Mr. Crosbie: That is not the subject.

Mr. Simmons: The hon. member for St. John's West conveniently says that that is not the subject. Now he wants to split hairs. He wants to say that we should not talk about this kind of energy. Let us compartmentalize it now to satisfy the hypocrisies of the hon. member for St. John's West; let us talk about oil today and leave hydro energy over there because it might embarrass him. I am not too concerned if I embarrass the hon. member for St. John's West on this particular occasion. If he wants the floor to tell us where he stands on the transmission of hydro through Quebec, I will yield the floor to him for a moment. In two weeks he has not said a solitary word on the subject. We still do not know where he stands. He has two fairly clear choices. Does he stand with the federal leader of his party or with the provincial leader of his party? He cannot do both because they are diametrically opposed positions. One is for it, the other is against it.

Mr. Crosbie: I am ready to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the hon. member for St. John's West seeking the floor on a point of order?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, it is a point of order only in the sense that the hon. member offered to let me speak on this issue. Let me make it quite clear that on the issue of the spurious announcement of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, it was something he might do in a proposed bill if it was passed by the House. It was all very speculative. The government is still not committed to it.

Mr. Lalonde: Where do you stand?

Mr. Crosbie: It is hardly worth passing a comment on it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: I am quite disappointed in the illusion which has been created this afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Often invitations are given across the floor requesting the viewpoints of certain members, but at this time I invite the hon. parliamentary secretary to conclude his remarks on the motion before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I think I demonstrated the seriousness of my invitation by allowing him the floor to state his position. It became clear—and Hansard will show how clear—that in the three or four sentences he uttered he avoided giving any position. He cast aspersions on the legitimacy of the legislation being proposed and that kind of thing but he avoided skilfully, as only he can do, giving a position of any particular kind. He has still managed not to state a position. He was just given an opportunity in the House. Let the record show that he has no position on this issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. An opportunity was also given to the hon. parliamentary secretary to confine his remarks to the motion.

Mr. Crosbie: Stop trying to overtake your cabinet colleague. You are not getting anywhere, Roger. Rompkey is firmly attached to the cabinet table.

Mr. Simmons: He is doing very well. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) is doing very well despite the vicious attack on him this afternoon by the hon. member for St. John's West.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simmons: I quite agree that it is difficult to do two things at one time.

Mr. Waddell: You are doing it.

Mr. Simmons: It is difficult to address oneself to this bill and to respond at the same time to the irrelevancies raised by the hon. member for St. John's West. If I erred in that respect I am genuinely sorry. I was attempting to respond to some of the issues he raised, but they were so far off the subject at hand that in the process I got fairly far afield in my response. One mistake the hon. member for St. John's West makes repeatedly—

Mr. Waddell: This is not the Newfoundland legislature.

Mr. Taylor: Keep trying, you will get a seat in the Senate.

Mr. Simmons: Which is more than you can hope for; the cutoff is 75.

Mr. Crosbie: Pitfield for Newfoundland!

Mr. Simmons: Hon. members opposite are in an euphoric mood. None of their leaders is here today, so they can afford to be somewhat euphoric.

Mr. Nystrom: Crosbie is here.

An hon. Member: That is what he said, that there are no leaders over there.

Mr. Simmons: When I am not praying that the present leader will continue as leader, I pray that the hon. member for St. John's West will be the leader because he would be the second best thing for us on this side.

Mr. Crosbie: Thanks for the publicity.

Mr. Simmons: One of the mistakes the hon. member for St. John's West often makes—and he made it again in discussing the item before us—is the old "them" and "us" dichotomy. Members of his party do it generally. They talk about the Government of Canada as "them". It is part of the opposition mentality which I suppose they have grown used to over the years. They never see themselves, the Tories, as government. Aside from that they have developed an adversary role that somehow the Government of Canada is out there, is "them" and that the provinces are "us". Who does the hon. member represent here? If he wants to be in provincial politics, let him be in provincial politics. Indeed, he was there for some years with somewhat of a reputation.

He talked about Newfoundland being the last in earned income in Canada. He was a Liberal minister for a couple of years in Newfoundland. Then he got tired of that and he was a Tory minister for five years. Is he saying that those seven or eight years were all for naught, that he made no contribution toward raising Newfoundland by its bootstraps? Is that what he is admitting to the House in this particular instance, that his eight years as the great white hope in the Newfoundland cabinet was all for naught? Is that what he is telling us this afternoon?

Let me take a look at the comments of the hon. member for St. John's East on this particular bill. It is to his credit that the hon. member for St. John's East gave us his views on the bill. The hon. member for St. John's West gave his views on just about everything but the bill. The hon. member for St. John's East made some fairly pertinent comments on the issue we are supposed to be addressing this afternoon. I will respond to several items in no particular order. Perhaps it will be the order in which he mentioned them or the reverse order.

He talked about ownership controlling the rate of development. Certainly he did not really believe that. There are all kinds of examples around him, both in this field and in other endeavours, where ownership per se does not control the rate or nature of development. That is another one of those red herrings which gets dragged in to support motherhood causes.

In the process he tells us about how his leader, the then prime minister, the hon. member for Yellowhead, went down with a letter in which he articulated several points as a proposal. We do not dispute the accuracy of that particular statement. We all remember that the letter of proposal was put to the Premier of Newfoundland. But what the hon. member did not tell us about, and what the hon. member for St. John's West did not tell us about, was the other meeting between those two leaders, the Premier of Newfoundland and the then prime minister. They did not tell us about the meeting which took place during the first week or so of February in the Confederation Building in St. John's. In that meeting the then prime minister was asked, in public, in front of the press, by the Premier of Newfoundland whether before the election he would put in writing, not a proposal, a set of ifs, but a commitment. That is where the bluff was called. To his credit, the Premier of Newfoundland called the bluff.

We all know the result since it was broadcast on national television that night. When put to the test the leader of the Conservative party, the then prime minister, said he could not do that. He refused to do that. He was prepared to do anything verbally or by way of ifs and proposals, but given the clear request of the Premier, in public, in front of television cameras and journalists, he said quite categorically that he could not do that. He could do anything but commit himself in writing to what he was attempting to convey verbally to the people of Newfoundland.

It seems to me that if we are considering events in history, if we are going back and talking about the Tory record on this particular issue, then we must keep in mind that given the one opportunity to put their money where their mouth was, given the opportunity to correct the record and to give a firm undertaking to the government of Newfoundland on this issue, they reneged and backed away from it. They refused quite explicitly, not by implication only but quite explicitly, to be part of any such arrangement. Is there anyone in this House who will deny that, Mr. Speaker? Is there anyone here who does not remember that day when the then prime minister of Canada said quite categorically and publicly that he was not prepared to put it in writing at the particular time?

Mr. Wilson: Give us the reason why.

Mr. Simmons: If there are whys about which I am not aware, and if there are reasons, there is a great deal of opportunity for members opposite to place them on the record. What I am saying here today is that the two spokesmen from the Tory opposition who spoke in this debate this afternoon carefully avoided any reference to that particular issue because it is something which they would like to forget. Newfoundlanders do not so easily forget that kind of misrepresentation.

Mr. Wilson: Tell us the whole truth.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, Newfoundlanders do not so easily forget that kind of deception.

Mr. Wilson: The minister agrees that it is a total distortion.

Mr. Simmons: What is a total distortion, Mr. Speaker, is what the then prime minister tried to perpetrate on the people of Newfoundland. The Premier of Newfoundland, to his credit, called his bluff. He called his bluff two weeks before the last general election. If the Tories' policy has changed on this subject, then I am not surprised. In the last two weeks their policy has changed on the postal dispute. The hon. gentleman for Yellowhead said two weeks ago that he was against a legislated return to work. Suddenly his party has ramrodded him into the reverse position. That is not strange. I call to mind Jerusalem and other issues on which they changed their minds.

Mr. Nystrom: What about PetroCan?

Mr. Simmons: We can talk about Petro-Canada and a number of other issues. I am not surprised if they do a flip-flop on this one. They are used to doing flip-flops. Perhaps they have now found a way to weasel and flip-flop out of this particular offshore issue as well.

Mr. Wilson: Why does the minister not take him aside and tell him what is right or wrong? Total distortion.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) will have an opportunity to tell us what he knows about distortion when the time comes. I have given him a couple of examples which he might want to elaborate on. I invite him to elaborate on the Jerusalem issue, Petro-Canada, the postal dispute and the Newfoundland offshore. These are just starters while he is preparing his notes. His party sits on both sides of the fence, depending on the day of the week, the convenience of the moment or the votes they are trying to garner. We all know their record on this particular issue. My advice to him is that if he keeps sufficiently silent about these issues they will go away, along with the embarrassment caused by them.

Mr. Siddon: Let us hear something positive.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I am listening but I do not hear much that is positive.

Mr. Siddon: You have the floor.

Mr. Simmons: I am glad to hear I do have the floor. Perhaps the hon. member opposite would honour that for a few moments and allow me to say a few words on this particular bill. If he does not want me to respond further to his colleagues, the hon. member for St. John's East and the hon. member for St. John's West, and if it is too embarrassing to look at the loopholes they have allowed themselves, I will throw away the rest of the notes I have with respect to their comments and I will come to the gist of the matter, which I hoped they would have spent more time on.

The hon. member for St. John's East talked about deleting the references to Sable Island and the offshore waters. Thus, by implication, he would leave out the coastal provinces altogether. He would leave out the north altogether. In the process he implies that somehow this would strengthen the case, both legally and politically, made by Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and other coastal provinces in respect to their adjacent coastal waters. In fact, the deletions which are being suggested by the hon. member for St. John's East would do nothing more than weaken Canada's claim to sovereignty over these waters to the 200-mile limit. If effected, his deletion would have the net effect of weakening Canada's claim to sovereignty while at the same time doing nothing whatsoever to address the problem he seeks to address.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise in support of the motion which has been presented by my good friend and colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). I think it is a very fundamental and important amendment and one which bears serious consideration.

The motion proposes to limit the application of this bill to the lands known as the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, eliminating the other sections which are the offshore areas, for a couple of fundamental reasons. My colleague takes exception to the general principle and thrust of the bill. More important, there is a very fundamental jurisdictional question which is of the utmost importance and which should be considered in its most important paramountcy.

I do not want to respond or react to the flim-flam and rhetoric we heard from the previous speaker. I think you and I both know, Mr. Speaker, that he spent very little time talking about the bill or the amendment we are dealing with. One thing I would like to point out, and which hopefully will set the record straight, is that in terms of the Conservative government's position with respect to offshore resources there were four fundamental principles outlined in a letter from the then prime minister to the Premier of Newfoundland. The previous speaker would have been aware of this had he listened to the speech of the hon. member for St. John's East.

● (1720)

As I said, that letter outlined four fundamental principles. So far as Canada's ownership of the mineral resources of the continental margins is concerned, they should be within the care, control and ownership of the provinces. There were three other principles which were contingent upon that very fundamental one. There was absolutely no question that the province of Newfoundland should own the mineral resources of the continental margin, in so far as Canada should own them. That is very clear. Certainly there should not be any equivocation on that whatsoever. I am sure that the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) and our energy spokesman will have something to say about that as well. The parliamentary secretary did not bother to listen to the facts.

Mr. McGrath: He is gone. He has left the House.

Mr. Mazankowski: The fact of the matter is that the parliamentary secretary spoke and ran. Obviously he did not listen to the presentation by the sponsor of this very important and fundamental motion. I think it should be seriously considered and earnestly debated by all members of the House of Commons, and particularly by those who are directly affected by it.

One has to find it very strange that, at a time when there is a clear jurisdictional dispute, we have a piece of legislation before us which really sets out effectively to close the door through unilateral action. This point is mentioned in the National Energy Program booklet which was presented at the time of the budget, and reference is made to it. However,the reference is very light and fluffy. It is flippant and really tends to wash over the importance and the fundamental nature of the issue. At page 42, it is stated:

> There is some debate—

There is some debate!

> —as to whether offshore resources in these Canada lands fall under federal jurisdiction—

It is referring to the area off Canada's coasts.

> There is some debate as to whether offshore resources in these Canada lands fall under federal jurisdiction. Notwithstanding a ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada in 1967 that lands off the west coast are within federal jurisdiction, both Newfoundland and Nova Scotia have laid claim to jurisdiction of areas off the east coast.
> The Government of Canada believes that the offshore resources belong to all Canadians.

It goes on to say that it will provide a formula, as alluded to by my colleagues from Newfoundland, to:

> Provide 100 per cent of provincial-type resource revenues to the adjacent province, subject to arrangements whereby, when the province reached an agreed level of wealth, these revenues would be shared with other Canadians.

One cannot have half-ownership or quasi-ownership. One either has ownership or one does not. As my colleagues, the hon. members from both St. John's East and St. John's West have stated very categorically, Newfoundland believes very profoundly that the ownership of its resources is equivalent to the same ownership which applies to the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, or any other province for that matter; but particularly to those provinces where, in 1930, the right to the ownership, control and management of those resources clearly became a matter for federal jurisdiction. There can be no equivocation about that.

The sponsor of this motion takes exception to the fact that this legislation will provide for the management, the rate of development and the control of a non-renewable resource which the province of Newfoundland believes is rightfully a resource which belongs to the province of Newfoundland. Of course, there is very definitely a concern as to the pace of the development of that resource, when and where and how it should be explored and developed. There is certainly an impact which will accrue with respect to the social, economic and environmental realities. The provinces believe that they have a rightful say in the way in which their resources will be developed.

Instead, as the federal government points out in the National Energy Program, it is determined to take into account the needs of the region and is determined to exercise its responsibility. I quote again at page 43, where the National Energy Program states:

> Unfortunately, the offshore resource issue was not resolved.

It admits right in the National Energy Program that the offshore resource issue has never been resolved; yet it proceeds with legislation to include that area which is under dispute. It is a very fundamental issue. Further, it says:

> However, in its management of these resources, the Government of Canada is determined to take into account the needs of the region.

Notwithstanding the fact that the offshore issue has not been resolved, and notwithstanding the fact that the province of Newfoundland does not concur, it intends to forge ahead in a unilateral way. It goes on to say:

It will use its regulatory powers to accelerate exploration in this area. Development must reflect the social and economic concerns and legitimate aspirations of the residents of coastal provinces. Furthermore, Canada's east coast fishery resources and the general environment must not be damaged in pursuit of energy objectives.

The acceleration of exploration in this area promises thousands of new jobs, supplying the services and goods needed to carry out the program. This represents one of the most exciting opportunities available to this region.

What is the goal of the provinces? What will be the role of the province in determining the economic, social and environmental goals and objectives, or the job opportunities? What role will the province of Newfoundland play? I am sure that the government of Newfoundland, whatever stripe it may be, speaks for the people of Newfoundland. Given the political realities of our country, it always seems quite normal and natural that the government which is closer to the scene is in the best position to determine the local economic, social and environment aspirations. Surely, that makes common sense.

However, here we have a bill and a policy directive which unilaterally imposes the federal government's thrust upon the development of a resource which could turn Newfoundland and other eastern provinces into have provinces, which could provide a dynamic way of life for their people, which could provide employment opportunities and improved technology, and above all would contribute to the goal of self-sufficiency. We on this side of the House still believe that goal is attainable.

It goes on to say on page 44:

Indeed, properly managed, the exploration activities could provide the basis for a major, sustained, economic upsurge. The Government of Canada will ensure that these opportunities are realized.

What guarantee do we have that this government will ensure that economic opportunities will be realized for the people of Newfoundland or the people from the north? It certainly does not have a very good track record. Look at what is happening to rail service today. We have a government hell-bent on dismantling the rail passenger service in this country after the Canadian Transport Commission studied, assessed and developed a route structure which this government has not even given a chance to be tested. We now have a situation where unilaterally, by cabinet edict, we are going to dismantle some 16 routes and cut back service on five others. That is to be interpreted as serving the best interests of Canada, without any local participation, without any avenue for appeal, without any formal way in which the people and the communities affected will have an opportunity to voice their objection? People are afraid of that. The people of Newfoundland and the people who have the potential to develop offshore energy resources are concerned that they will be left in the cold. Therefore, I have no hesitation in supporting the principle and the general thrust of my colleague's amendment.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) stated that we have not heard from the ordinary people of the north and the offshore, and I agree with him. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) took exception to that comment. However, I believe it. What will happen is that through the centralized, organized and bureaucratic mechanism which will govern these activities from the ivory towers in Ottawa, the ordinary people will in fact be overlooked. The minister replied that provincial governments do not act in the best interests of the people they represent. That is the implication. The hon. member suggested only the federal government has the power and the compassion to speak and act on behalf of Canadians in general. I believe people of local governments have a better understanding and a better view of the aspirations and needs of a given community or region than any federal bureaucracy, or minister for that matter.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in his remarks chose not to deal with the amendment. He talked about many things contained in the bill. He suggested that the bill is a major step forward. I suggest, however, that many will see it as as major step backward, especially when you look at the potential of bureaucratic centralized control. The minister places a very high priority on developing the potential of Canada lands. I suggest that if he is placing this high priority on the development of resources in the Canada lands, he should reaffirm his government's position on what it intends to do to develop further conventional supplies in the western sedimentary basin. Is the government writing the western sedimentary basin off? It appears that it is, given the fiscal tax regime it has established, given the way in which the National Energy Program is being applied and interpreted and given the fact there seems to be much foot dragging in getting a realistic pricing agreement. Perhaps the government is writing off the synthetic projects. The government does not seem to be too concerned or alarmed that the $12 billion Cold Lake heavy oil plant project has been shelved indefinitely, or at least for two years. It is $12 billion today with inflation at 10 per cent to 12 per cent, and with inflation at 20 per cent to 25 percent two years from now the cost will be $15 billion. What about the jobs that have gone down the drain? What about the cost of providing expensive imported oil which has been estimated at approximately $5.8 billion because of the delay?

This minister must take the people of Canada into his confidence and tell them what the government intends to do with respect to the other potential developments, the conventional sources and the synthetic sources. It appears that we are on the threshold of another postponement with the Alsands plant. What will that do to our goal of energy self-sufficiency? What will it do toward bolstering our economy? Those two megaprojects need to proceed if we are to ever recover economically and gain any semblance of the goal of self-sufficiency.

The minister again today chose to attack Alberta in his abrasive and continuing arrogant fashion. It seems to me that it is time for this minister to settle down. He has won the war in terms of pitting central Canada against Alberta. Why does he not sit down now and try to negotiate an agreement? I am convinced that had it been anyone else sitting on the treasury benches who was called upon to work out an agreement with the province of Alberta, by now we would have had an agreement. No one can continue to attack in that abrasive and arrogant fashion and expect to get a deal. That is the problem. I must say we are getting rather disgusted by this minister's actions and by his attitude.

We know that the minister of energy did not want to get a deal. The minister visited Edmonton twice in the spring of 1980. He spent about 100 minutes attempting to seek a deal. In reality he was barely crawling through the hoops. He has failed to take advantage of a fundamental political opportunity. I would say that he has created a political error of historic dimension. I would accuse him of an action which could only be classifed as premeditated abdication of his duty.

In order to be an effective energy minister, one must have not only the knowledge and the political skill, but the trust and confidence. And above all, he must be seen as fair and reasonable. Unless this minister is prepared to change his ways and demonstrate some of these attributes, I suggest we will be a long time in getting an energy agreement.

Further, the minister of energy should stop misleading the people of Canada. He should stop accusing Alberta of being a filthy rich and selfish province. I think the evidence now clearly reveals that based upon a gallon of gasoline sold in the province of Ontario, the province of Ontario is receiving more in terms of revenue than is the province of Alberta. To be exact, out of a charge of $1.66 a gallon, the government of Ontario receives 25 cents or 15 per cent of the total proceeds, whereas the government of Alberta in its royalties receives 22.7 cents or 14 per cent of the total. The federal government receives 56 cents, which is about 34 per cent of the total, with the balance going to the producer, the refiner and the dealer.

I suggest it is time for the minister of energy to level with the people and lay out the facts so that everyone can understand who is the bad guy in the negotiations. If he can change his attitude, level with the Canadian people and try to establish an environment and a climate of trust and confidence, we can move ahead. We must move ahead in order to achieve our economic—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp).

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this motion, I must say that my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Crosbie) has put before the House in a very succinct manner two views as to how we believe Canada should develop its resources.

The government in its bill sees the development of Canada generally through the eyes of a centralized bureaucracy only. While I say that is not totally invalid because we need that component, it is not the only component making up Canada. The other component consists of our regions. I will come to that, but first I want to thank the hon. member for St. John's East in putting forward the two views of Canada so clearly.

W. A. Wilson, a member of the press gallery, a journalist respected by members on both sides of the House, makes the point in an article that traditionally the view of Canada was focused on the larger metropolitan areas. That is how the view of Canada evolved and it was the determining factor. While that view is still valid, it is not the only valid view for Canadians. The view seen from a small Saskatchewan town, from a coastal community in British Columbia or from Newfoundland is as valid for the development of Canada as is the view held in the traditional centres of opinion in this country. That is central to what we are discussing here. When we discuss Ottawa, that word is not used to deprecate the city or the central government. Rather, it is an expression of the view that whatever comes from the treasury benches here is more valid than the view from any other part of the country. I cannot accept that. I want to say why.

The federal government says that regardless of the fact that the matter is before the courts, it is going to use its majority to pass unilaterally a definition of Canada lands. That definition of Canada lands is such that everything which is not clearly defined by provincial boundaries is automatically Canada lands. That is the general thrust of Bill C-48. Those people who are affected by activity outside provincial boundaries such as citizens living in Newfoundland will obviously be affected by offshore activity such as fishing, drilling for gas and oil or whatever. The person living north of the 60th parallel in the Territories will also be affected. Those affected by these boundaries will be subject first to the view of this government and the definition in this bill.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) is trying to change the definition in the bill. What is fundamental in what the amendment does is that it says that what is effective on land in terms of resource ownership and management, should be operative offshore.

I found it rather interesting that the minister brought forward his strongest argument against this motion for the following reason. I cannot quote him word for word, but I hope I am paraphrasing him accurately, or at least repeating correctly the sense of what he was trying to project. He said he could not accept this motion because the premiers could then do offshore what they are doing on land.

What are they doing on land? They are drilling for oil, for natural gas, building tar sands plants and trying to create the Cold Lake project. That is what they are doing on land.

Mr. Simmons: They are stopping the Cold Lake project.

Mr. Epp: Yes, and you know why. This government is only willing to give them $18.75 a barrel, and yet it will give Mexico $40. What the premiers are doing on land is moving Canadians toward energy self-sufficiency, not only with regard to fossil fuels but in developing hydroelectric power.

The premier of my province has been working with other premiers in western Canada to develop a hydroelectric energy grid which would tie in not only with other parts of Western Canada but with other projects as well. Megaprojects, hydroelectric projects, oil and gas projects require co-operation. The first responsibility of this minister is to develop a co-operative plan. To date he has been an abject failure in that regard.

I want development in the offshore the very same as is happening on land, that we drill for oil and gas, develop hydroelectric projects and so on. That is what I want to see happen. However, this bill will bring about the opposite. Just as we have seen the postponement of projects or the fact that projects are more difficult to bring on stream, I fear the same will happen offshore.

Some members might be surprised that one who lives in the longitudinal centre of Canada should speak on this bill dealing with an offshore project. The reasons are the following. Some provinces at the moment are defined as have-nots. I find that definition difficult to understand because they might have cultural or social advantages which other regions do not have. However, speaking in economic terms, I want those provinces to have an economic activity which will have growth and which will be based on their natural advantages. That is what I want to see happen.

If the earned income of the average citizen in Newfoundland rises, that not only benefits the citizens of that region, it benefits the entire country.

There is a philosophy which is becoming part of the Canadian psyche. It is believed that if people in a certain region have a better income, somehow the country does not benefit; however, when an Albertan progresses, Canada benefits or when a Newfoundlander progresses, Canada benefits. What is this philosophy that makes us fear growth in a given region?

When income is earned, we spend that income. We do not spend it narrowly in the region in which it is earned. That income is spent across the country. The country benefits through growth. I cannot understand a government which believes we have to restrict growth because one area might get ahead of another and that is not good for Canada. I need not say any more about that because it is so obvious.

There is another point I want to make regarding this motion. When the three prairie provinces entered confederation, they were regarded as not being competent to control their own resources. In fact, the province of Manitoba has been longer in confederation without owning is its resources than it has been in confederation while owning them. It is a have not province.

The provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan entered in 1905 and received their resources in 1930. I do not want to be negative toward the Liberal members. A lot of them are my friends and I know they hold their views as sincerely as I do. However, I had a discussion with a former member of this House, a predecessor of mine in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. We were discussing northern Canada. He said to me that the government made a mistake when it gave the prairies their resources in 1930 because now they are holding the rest of the country up for ransom. He said the government will not allow it to happen again in the north.

That philosophy is detrimental to this country. The prairie regions finally acquired ownership of their resources in 1930 when an amendment was made to the British North America Act. That is significant. If you look at Canadian history, there is a view that the prairie region was helped by other parts of the country during the depression. That is a historical fact. However, why did the prairie regions need that help? Might it be the case that if they had their own resources and made some money from those resources, they might have been in a different situation in the thirties? History does not record that. If history does not record that, how can it record that Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island or British Columbia in the west could not have the growth which would, first of all, take their provincial averages up to a higher level and then benefit the whole country? One of the reasons that the prairies had difficulty during the depression, I submit to you, was that they did not have control of their resources. The same situation exists on the offshore today. It is a parallel. Why should the Atlantic provinces not have that control?

I found it interesting to read in the documents on federal-provincial relations that the province which has been most definitive and vocal over the years in terms of defending provincial rights has been the province of Ontario. The reason Ontario, its premiers and its government have been so vocal is that they knew that as mineral resources were developed in that province, if ownership and control were removed, in spite of its industrial base it would be in trouble.

What the hon. member for St. John's East is asking for is ownership and control. He mentioned the socioeconomic reasons. It is interesting that the very thinking the hon. member for St. John's East put before the House today dominated the federal government when it passed the Northern Pipeline Agency Act. Before that pipeline could be built, the government put in socioeconomic conditions. I remember during the time of our government when I had the responsibility, and when I talked to the present minister, I knew these things had to be put in place before we could start building the pipeline. What is different in that situation from the one that is now being proposed?

There is another concern I have, one which was mentioned by the hon. member for St. John's East. Magnanimously, he has not confined his amendment to Newfoundland, the maritime region or British Columbia. He has drafted his amendment in such a way that other regions which have not even come into consideration would also be included. Let me give you just one example. Manitoba and Ontario border on Hudson Bay. The so-called inland ocean exists there, but who owns the offshore resources there? Is Manitoba to have no claim to the mineral wealth that might lie under the waters of Hudson Bay? These are the questions that are before the courts. These are the questions on development that should be answered. I cannot accept a unilateral bill such as the one before me which says that for all times this has now been decided by Parliament, because I see that as being negative to the country.

Let us consider the attitude of the people in the north. I worry about northern development, particularly with the attitude this government has. If everything north of the 60th parallel will be defined as Canada lands, I have had enough experience and have talked to enough people to know that the people of the Yukon and the residents of the Northwest Territories see themselves first as Canadians, and what they want is to see development in those regions so as to stop depending on the federal money which pours into that area. Just look at the budgets. They want to stand on their own feet because they have earned that income and thus are contributing to Canada. I have not met people north of 60 who say: Just give us those mineral resources and we will show you what we will do to you in the south. That is just not their attitude. Their attitude is that those who live in the north should have the first benefits from those resources. Surely that is the fair and equitable manner in which to proceed.

I wanted to spend most of my time putting forward my views of Canada. However, the parliamentary secretary who spoke made one point to which I should like to respond. I do not want to spend all my time rebutting that which has been said on the other side.

That hon. member said that the former Prime Minister, the right hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), had his bluff called in February 1980 in that he had not been willing to put in the form of an agreement a promise he had made in a letter regarding the offshore ownership by the provinces. I want to say to that member as sincerely as I can, and I am sure he will accept that, the reason was not that the Prime Minister or this party reneged on its view of the offshore, but rather that we had been defeated in this House and there was an election campaign in process. The then Prime Minister stated very clearly that he did not believe it was his parliamentary right to commit a future government to the position in which this government finds itself without receiving a mandate from the people of Canada.

I think that is the manner in which parliamentary democracy functions, and I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that those were the facts of that question. The former Prime Minister had committed his government but he obviously needed a mandate to put it into agreement form.

What I am saying to hon. members on the opposite side is that I believe this amendment is in the interests of Canada. I suggest that because the matter is before the courts we should not proceed along the lines the government has suggested, but rather along the lines of the amendment the member for St. John's East has proposed to this House.

[Translation]

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. When the House took recess at six o'clock, the Chair had recognized the hon. member for Manicouagan.

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, I am almost embarrassed to speak before such a large audience. I think there are people here from all over the country who have come to hear us. I am all the more happy to take part in this debate on Bill C-48 as for the people of my generation, for the younger generation of Canadians, this is indeed an extremely important measure which seeks to place Canada lands under the control of the government of Canada for purposes of exploring and developing the oil and gas deposits found in those lands which are, of course, owned by the government of Canada.

I listened this afternoon to the remarks of some colleagues who were in fact saying that the major problem was directly related to the area of the coast of Newfoundland or British Columbia, because these offshore resources belong to the provinces or fall under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal tonight not so much with the letter but with the spirit of this legislation. As I listened this afternoon to all those who spoke against the bill, with all kinds of variations, of course, I realized that it was mainly because of legal issues and technicalities that they were opposed to it, because they pitted provincial jurisdiction against federal jurisdiction. Now, Mr. Speaker, to really understand Bill C-48 which is before us, we must go back to our Constitution and see how things have evolved since 1867. At the time the Fathers of Confederation drafted the British North America Act, the term natural resources applied to resources found in all four provinces then making up the Canadian Confederation, namely lumber, fisheries and fur. That is what was meant by resources at the time.

At the time, all provinces enjoyed justice and equality. However, the situation gets a little more complicated in the twentieth century when one resource is required by all the people of the country. When can a province claim rights over a natural resource and set its price, and when should the federal government do so? That relates to the spirit of the law more than to the letter of the law, as I was saying before. Our country was founded on a concept of sharing. In this regard, I believe that in the east as well as in the west there has been a time since Confederation where some region or another has had to pay for the rest of the country. There was the case of western grain during the depression, when grain prices were much higher than everywhere else in the world and subsidies were set up to help western farmers. Prices were even higher in Canada than anywhere else to help farmers to sell their grain. Later on, it was oil and the Borden line because of which people in Ontario had to pay more for their oil than other Canadians.

There has always been a time in Canada when someone paid a bit more for a shared resource. For young Canadians, there is nothing worse than to hear representatives of each party or group of citizens throughout the country try to emphasize the egoistic aspects of such an issue, because when a province has an important resource and expects benefits from it, it wants to keep it for itself. This is what is happening in Newfoundland now. The same thing happened when Quebec wanted to claim Labrador because as we now know, there are important resources in Labrador. However, what young Canadians want to see in this country is a sense of sharing rather than not a war among leaders. Yet, what is now happening in Canada is indeed a war among leaders, a war among premiers.

We saw this again recently at the First Ministers' Conference and when the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) took part in the latest Federal-Provincial Conference in September: The provinces still wanted a bigger share of the pie, but without sharing their own resources with Canada as a whole. This is where we have a problem in Canada, because we do not consider the population as a whole, but rather each of the provinces. As for us, as the government of Canada, we were not elected to represent a region. We were not elected to see to the next election, but to see to the welfare of the nation and of future generations. In this regard, what does Bill C-48 do? It gives the Canadian government, our government and our Parliament, certain powers over Canada lands to manage more effectively and more rationally the resources of the country, the heritage of 100 years and the guarantee for the Canadian people of a secure future.

When we read—and this is important—the exact provisions contained in Bill C-48, we are surprised that the other side would oppose it because, far from stripping the country, of its resources, the purpose of the bill is as follows:

To regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas production and Conservation Act.

Do we agree or not that we are living in a country where wealth must be redistributed, even though we might have to find the proper mechanism to do so? Basically, this is somewhat of a paradox, but Canada is perhaps one of the rare countries where two problems can be well identified. We have great wealth in this country and a resource sharing problem. We do not know how to share, how to be fair. All we know is how to grab this wealth, how to keep it for ourselves without allowing the Canadian government to share it among all Canadian men and women.

That should be elementary for anyone, man or woman, sitting here in this Parliament and we should be able to reach a consensus easily. As for me and the generation I represent, what disillusions us increasingly is the sight of artificial conflicts, conflicts based strictly on absolute power or the power to grow richer at the expense of other Canadians. I say that without political prejudice because in Quebec we had a referendum that was undeniably an extremely painful experience since we criticized each other in search of reasons, which often turned out to be excuses to score a point, but always at the expense of the whole community.

I heard the hon. member for St. John West (Mr. Crosbie) say this afternoon that Newfoundland needs its offshore resources to do away with the equalization payments and because it wants to grow richer. That is what Canada wants for each one of its parts, allow it to grow richer, but not at the expense of the Canadian people as a whole. I have a strange feeling that there are 12 countries in Canada, two territories and ten provinces and if anything is left over, then it can be given to the federal government.

When we have transportation problems, and I see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is here in the House, everyone turns to him, beginning with me, asking him for very costly things about which it is sometimes very difficult to tell whether they are needs or whims; no one ever hesitates to turn to the federal government to ask for more. But when the time comes to put something in the central pot, one's share of the pie, everyone objects; and it is stranger still to see the Newfoundland premier go to the federal government asking it to request of Quebec that it allow an energy corridor through its territory, while at the same time asking the federal government not to touch the offshore resources under the pretext that they belong to his province. In other words, they use double standards. As I understand it, the Progressive Conservative Party, when they were the government, were in the position to realize that over a nine-month period. They had difficulty getting into an agreement, they could not even agree with Alberta on a pricing formula at the time. They could not agree either with Newfoundland on a program that would have been acceptable to both parties. But now they would have us give everything to each province under the pretext that this would facilitate an agreement. This is out of the question, it is a matter of attitude. As far as I am concerned, I am first and foremost proud to be a Canadian, and I recognize that Quebec and the other provinces should contribute to the central treasury, the central budget, the Canadian treasury to allow for redistribution. I cannot agree that a province or a region be allowed to monopolize the whole amount, claiming it as its own.

I think Bill C-48 is clear on that. Let us put aside the legal question of who owns the 200 miles of coast, let us now factually examine what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) is proposing. He is simply proposing that from now on, we may Canadianize to a greater degree and even reach energy self-sufficiency with what we already have. To that end, through a most detailed and specific legislation, he is proposing that Parliament take a direct involvement in Canada lands. It is my basic impression that such a proposal deserves united, enthusiastic acceptance from Canadians, because what this is all about is truly a heritage, and the development of that heritage to the benefit of all. And what I mean by that is that this is just as beneficial for French, English and native Canadians, because the term "Canada lands" includes, of course, the Territories and the Amerindian lands. And the pooling concept means in the first place that those groups agreed to be part of the Canadian whole and that provinces also agree to take part in that pooling.

In the course of our discussions here or in committee, we often forget that reality, and in our own provinces or areas we say we have been short-changed, we do not get our share. Provinces like Alberta that were comparatively poor at first, now are in a favourable position and get ahead of the other regions. The same goes for Newfoundland. When Newfoundland accepted to join Confederation, after two referendums, other Canadians paid its way in. So much the better if Newfoundland can now strengthen its economy, but it should not be forgotten that Newfoundland is part of the Canadian whole just as any other province. It becomes very tiresome for young Canadians to note that our proceedings are strictly based on the past. When I mentioned the natural resources of 1867, I explained a while ago that they merely consisted in the navigable waters, furs, timber and fisheries, and now that we are speaking of an essential product called oil, it has become an instrument of blackmail.

Now Bill C-48 provides, of course, that the distribution of resources be planned and requires also that the provinces should not resort to blackmail with respect to any of those resources. I hope that the members opposite will give us later an answer on that point. Is it possible to build Canada while giving more energetic power to the provinces without taking all Canadians into account? What would you say of a country such as Canada where a province would become filthy rich at the expense of the other citizens of the country. It is not normal, and such is not the purpose of a government, but rather to redistribute wealth, to give freedom and to promote the movement of goods.

If there is no agreement on that principle, then I understand that hon. members opposite might not share the philosophy of this government. And in this respect I think that the party to which I belong has made its position extremely clear in the last election because that was precisely one of the issues, namely to achieve a greater Canadianization and sharing of our natural resources. We could have entered into legal technicalities and undertake a point by point study of what is proposed in Bill C-48, but what would be the use of it if at first there is no will to live together and to share the profits as well as the deficits, the joys as well as the hardships of belonging to the same country?

When travelling around the country, we see people look so sullen. Do you know why? It is often due to the fact that our leaders by artificial means are fostering conflicts within the people. Once a conflict opposes two provinces, the federal government is being asked to take sides in the decisions to be made as is the case of the energy corridor requested by the province of Newfoundland that would go through Quebec. I could mention many such examples where the federal government was asked to be the referee when various parties are engaged in a litigation. I suggest we often forget that we have been sent here to promote greater unity among the Canadian people and although I do not expect you to fully agree on what a government can do but in this case it is quite obvious that it is a matter of sharing a resource and the benefits derived from it. This to me seems quite clear and I cannot understand why members of Parliament should be reluctant to pass such a bill. It is clearly spelled out in the bill that we are dealing with Canada lands. The purpose of this bill is not to deprive the Canadian people of their revenue but on the contrary to increase it. This is the philosophy underlying this bill, and that is what hon. members opposite have a tendency to forget.

I would like it very much if the opposition could reply to that in a few minutes. What is the argument in favour of the fact that such an important energy resource ought to be given to one province or another without Canadians as a whole being able to benefit from it? I would like to have evidence that a country can be built on economic disparity, on unfair distribution of wealth. I hope someone will give us that evidence in a few minutes. And when we go here and there, if we read the newspapers about what is happening in England, what is going on almost everywhere in the world? The problem stems from a shortage of wealth, a lack of sharing, and here we have the impression—I would even say that sometimes I have the conviction—that what we are trying to do is to widen the gap with respect to sharing and redistribution. As we are debating this bill, instead of looking strictly at the financial aspect of the operation as far as one province is concerned, we should put more emphasis on the spirit which ought to unite all Canadian men and women and try to find a formula or a prescription whereby Canadians might take pride in their own energy resources.

I think that even the former prime minister of Canada, the Hon. Joe Clark, would agree that Canada is one of the few countries that can claim to have enough resources to be completely self-sufficient in energy within 10 years. The big challenges for us to take up are to be able to control our own potential, to develop it, to make it much more economic and to use it as an extraordinary leverage. All Canadians and particularly parliamentarians should bear in mind that we govern one country and not 12 countries. I think we have a very important step to make to change our mentality and our morality in government. It is overdue, and for two years, since I came here, I have had the impression that we talk about 12 countries. I wish we could speak of one country, of equal citizens. When the time comes for Canadian men and women to apply for a passport, they are glad to receive one with the name Canada on it. I think we should also be proud to have the same energy prices across the country and the same right to share our Canadian heritage. Mr. Speaker, I ask members of the opposition to answer the few questions I asked them, bearing in mind that we are one country and that we are Canadian men and women who are proud to be Canadians and to share our own wealth.

[English]

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interests to the remarks of the preceding speaker. I will not try to answer point by point some of the rhetorical and some of the substantive questions he asked. We must keep one thing clear. We do not have a nation or a country by preaching from the rooftops on the beauty from sea to sea. We do not have a nation or a country by hon. members standing in the House and saying "Let us all be homogeneous, let us forget history and start anew". I agree with the hon. member that Bill C-48 and its complementary bill, Bill C-57, which has already been disposed of in the House, is the two-pronged attack of the National Energy Program or the nationalized energy policy of the government, depending on what one wants to call it. This is the government's policy. There is no doubt that it is looking to the future.

It is ironic on July 13, in the doldrums of summer one day before Bastille Day that we are debating this bill. I have not heard the French try to change the name of Bastille Day because to do so would smack of something anti-historic for France. They are proud of some of their history. I can understand the argument about whether it should be Canada day or Dominion Day.

The hon. member spoke sincerely from his perspective, but one of the problems in the country is that members of Parliament and people of good faith, who keep talking about the quality and history of Canada and who want all the problems solved overnight by one act, forget the history of the land. There is nothing different personally between the hon. member and myself. There is a fundamental difference in our recognition of the history of this land.

I will not go into all the intricacies and complexities of Bill C-48. Once any speaker gets into the bill, it could take hours. Hon. members have debated this bill in committee. Obviously they have done much more detailed work than I because I was not a member of the committee. The speech of the hon. member for Manicouagan (Mr. Maltais) fits very well with what I wanted to say. I am not talking about the generality or the principle of this bill. I am not talking about sharing or redistributing the oil revenues, about oil companies making too much money, about Alberta being too greedy, about the Quebec government taking Newfoundland to the cleaners on the James Bay contract, or about Joey Smallwood selling out part of the birthright of Newfoundlanders many years ago. Now Newfoundland wants to try to come in by the back door because it has lost by coming through the front door for 20-odd years. I will not deal with those matters.

We are talking about an amendment which was put forth by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). I hope the hon. member will read the bill. I think what I have to say will answer his question, from my point of view, because there are many other principles involved in the debate. When we reach clause 1 of a bill, as we did with this bill when we dealt with it for a brief time at second reading stage before closure was invoked and the bill went to committee, that is when a member can talk about the principles of a bill. That is when he can talk about the cross currents. I thought we were talking about an amendment to the bill put forward by the hon. member for St. John's East. What he wants to do through his amendment is to recognize the history of this land and recognize what this land has been until Bill C-48 was put before us. The greatest mythology in this debate occurs when we talk about Canada lands.

I listened to the hon. member opposite and he was partly right. I hope he appreciates why we in the east, in Atlantic Canada, feel rather aggrieved and threatened by this bill. It is because until now we have not been part of Canada lands. Look at the bill and the interpretation of Canada lands therein. Clause 2 of the interpretation section of the bill reads:

"Canada lands" means lands that belong to Her Majesty—

That is ownership.

—in right of Canada, or in respect of which Her Majesty in right of Canada has the right to dispose of or exploit the natural resources, situated in

(a) the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories,—

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, who owns that now? Canada owns those lands now—the people of Canada. At present there is a contest, a debate, an argument if you will, in which they say they want in effect statehood or provincial status, or autonomy. But I will not get into that subject tonight. Let us not have any more of these red herrings, these oil slicks dragged across this debate about Canada lands.

Most parts of this bill affect ownership, distribution and administration. The federal government now has certain rights. There is an argument on our side as to what the federal government intends to do even with lands it owns, such as the Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories. This debate began after Madam Speaker made a ruling this afternoon in which she suspended the debate on motions Nos. 1 and 2 and ruled that we move on to motion No. 3 put forward by the hon. member for St. John's East. His motion would strike out the second part of the meaning of Canada lands. He suggests this be done in a very fundamental way. In effect, he wants it admitted that Canada lands means the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories and not, as stated in the bill:

2(1)(b) those submarine areas adjacent to the coast of Canada and extending throughout the natural prolongation of the land territory of Canada to the outer edge of the continental margin or to a distance of two hundred nautical miles from the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea of Canada is measured, whichever is the greater;

In simple language this amendment says that the Government of Canada, without consent, without any joint federal provincial arrangement, owns the submarine lands adjacent to the coastlines of the Atlantic provinces. That is why we in that area have been, historically, on the receiving end looking for some economic strength and growth.

We finally started to see a glimmer on the horizon when we saw oil rigs offshore. I will not get into the question of who shares what, whether it should be 60-40, 50-50 or the back-in provision of 25 per cent. In my opinion those are iniquitous under the act. I know the formula has been changed. This is a principle which almost every Atlantic Canadian firmly objects to. We object most strenuously to it. Using the rhetoric, which is what we can use—in other jurisdictions they would use bullets—we will object until the cows come home, until we are forced to vote on this bill to unilaterally give away what we had historically even before Confederation. That is the point which makes us aggrieved, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: These are not my words. Unfortunately, in the 20 minutes I have I do not have the time to go through the entire history. But in view of the sincere comments made by the hon. member opposite, it would not hurt to repeat some of that history. Part of the problem in Canada is that we do not have instant pudding history. The situation becomes worse when you begin to pollute the pudding that you do have. The situation worsens when history is ignored. I am talking about the British North America Act, the charter of James I or William Alexander's charter which set out the definition of Nova Scotia. I am talking about Nova Scotia; the hon. member for St. John's East talked about Newfoundland. Nevertheless, the general principle applies in terms of maritime offshore resources.

I would like to speak specifically in terms of Nova Scotia. Hon. members opposite can ask rhetorical questions. The bill we are debating says that for the first time the federal government will own these Canada lands which are set out in the interpretation section of the bill. This raises a philosophical question with regard to the words "in right of Canada". We are all Canadians, let us share and share alike. The federal government has tax policies to help the sharing. I ask the hon. member opposite, who must appreciate this fact: why should we in Atlantic Canada, and in Nova Scotia, be the only provinces which do not own their natural resources in adjacent areas of the sea? Does he not appreciate the history of this land? Let us take James Bay for an example. When this country was formed in 1867, Canada lands of the day included one half or one third of Quebec. I do not plan to just pick on Quebec. I will talk about the tar sands development and the mineral wealth of northern Ontario. These, too, were parts of the country which formed Canada lands of the day. The term Canada lands seems to be something new from the heavens, an open sesame to the new world and a new distribution service wherein everyone will be treated equally. We will share the bubbles from gas and the slickness of oil. We will share. I want to share, but that is not the topic of debate this evening.

As far as I am concerned, when we are speaking about motion No. 3, why should we in Nova Scotia sit quietly back and allow the federal government to come in and say, "The history of Nova Scotia since 1621 is wrong. We own it. You must come to us on bended knee and find out how we will administer it?" Why should we in Nova Scotia who, prior to confederation, had control of our offshore mineral resources, allow the government to come in and take Sable Island where a great deal of the action is today in terms of oil and gas, especially gas? As my hon. friend said this afternoon, a provincial government fell on the issue of ownership in 1978. The present Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) tried to defend the federal position of a 75-25 share to administer the wealth and to try and reach a practical sharing formula. As we all know, the trouble with that principle is that he who owns the resources calls the tune. There is no doubt that if you own a resource, you can direct its development. We do not feel that confident when there are competing interests in a country such as Canada with a federal government away in Ottawa which perhaps gives priority to the development of a resource which we thought we had owned since 1621. I say to the hon. member opposite, partly in answer to his question, that he would be just as aggrieved if the situation were reversed historically.

I am all for the Canada lands which were created in 1867. At that time they became trump cards. There was James Bay, which I am all for. It is one of the great creations of our engineering skills in Canada. As we all know, Hydro Quebec is a fantastic colossus which has economic clout in terms of the dollars which it produces for Canada and Quebec. The mineral wealth being ceded to Ontario and the development of the tar sands in Alberta were not part of the original confederation agreement. That is when Canada gave Canada lands to those parts of the country, and since then they have become very valuable.

Let us not kid ourselves about this bill in terms of distribution. This bill does not affect those ex-Canada lands. It affects and directs the development of the present Canada lands, the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, and then it adds to Canada lands parts of Canada which were not defined in the term before.

● (2040)

That is the whole point. Your Honour and I could go back to section 109 of the BNA Act which makes it very clear as to who has jurisdiction of the mineral resources and the seabed of Nova Scotia. I am not going to confuse everyone by reading a lot of historic definitions; but, in effect, the definition of section 109, as most hon. members are aware, is:

All lands, mines, minerals, and royalties belonging to the several provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick at the Union—

Of course, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Upper and Lower Canada were the four original partners. We all know that. The section continues to read:

—and all sums then due or payable for such lands, mines, minerals or royalties, shall belong to the several provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in which the same are situate or arise, subject to any trusts existing in respect thereof and to any interest other than that of the province in the same.

Section 7 of the British North America Act states:

The provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall have the same limits as at the passing of this act.

In terms of Nova Scotia, what were the limits at the passing of the act in 1867? Where does one get that? One has to go way back to the original charter given by King James the First to Sir William Alexander, dated September 10, 1621. I have a single-spaced typewritten copy of part of the definition, which I will not bore the House with reading, though it is very interesting and has a lot of old history in description; but I am going to read a part of the definition to show Your Honour that the reason we feel aggrieved, threatened and a little angry is that in current times we define the boundaries of Nova Scotia and talk about the promontory of Cape Breton in this manner. The definition says, amongst other things:

—all the lands upon the continent with the rivers, torrents, bays, shores, islands or seas lying near to, or within six leagues (approximately 21 miles) from any part thereof, on the western, northern or eastern parts of the said coasts . . .

—and to the southward thereof where Cape Sable lies, all the seas and islands to the south within forty leagues (approximately 140 miles) of the said shores, including the great island commonly called the Isle of Sable on Sablon, lying south-south-east in the ocean about thirty leagues (approximately 105 miles) from Cape Breton aforesaid—

Then listen to these interesting words. The people back in 1621 must have been genuises to know that we would be so immature as to get involved in a dogfight like this, because it was written in very interesting English. Actually, it was Latin. They did not write English or French in those days. They were a little retarded. They wrote Latin, and this is the translation. This is why, of course, I have a private bill respecting the name of Nova Scotia, because I believe the proper name is Nova Scotia, or New Scotland. However, we will not get into that for the moment; not yet. Listen to what it says at the end of the definition. It reads as follows:

—and if any questions, or doubts shall hereafter arise upon the interpretation or construction of any clause in the present letters patent contained, they shall all be taken and interpreted in the most extensive sense, and in favour of the said Sir William Alexander, his heirs and assigns aforesaid.

Of course, Sir William Alexander was the fellow who got the whole chunk of Nova Scotia, and that was the start of it. I already read the section of the BNA Act which gave a smaller definition and, in effect, said there was no change. However, it goes on much further than that. As we all know, there have been a few wars in Atlantic Canada, in New York, and also in North America. In every war and in every treaty since the treaty of New Trent and the Treaty of Paris, Nova Scotia has been defined to include the lands and seas, and depending on what definition one adopts, it is either 40 leagues off sea—it always includes Sable Island—or 30 leagues for those who are not nautical. I am not the most nautical person, but 30 leagues is 105 miles. That gets one pretty far into the adjacent lands offshore. The French, under the Treaty of New Trent in 1713, acknowledged that. It has always been acknowledged.

In terms of Nova Scotia, and there is another claim. One can talk about statute law. No one objected for 115 years that Nova Scotia was passing statute law to control Sable Island or to make sure the fishermen did not throw, in the words of one law, "awful" or "offal" into the sea.

Some hon. Members: Awful!

Some hon. Members: Offal!

Mr. Nowlan: That was one of the first pollution bills, way back in 1770. Fishermen were allowed to throw awful offal into the sea, and no one objected to that. Under the statute law of Nova Scotia in 1700, revenue officers of Nova Scotia could go on to Sable Island and haul in those people who did not pay taxes. There are all sorts of laws which apply to the sea, and also, in particular, to Nova Scotia.

There have also been many royal commissions on boundaries. Every commission in Nova Scotia starting in 1846, as well as the governors of the day who redefined parts of the boundaries, has cited not only Sable Island, but 21 miles or 140 miles contiguous to the shore line, once one sorts out the phraseology of the legal description. The interesting thing is that in the description of 21 miles and 40 leagues, or 140 miles, the 140 miles is very relevant, because that is the distance to Sable Island. Sable Island is within 40 leagues of Nova Scotia's coast.

The most interesting thing in this whole problem of section 3 and the amendment of my friend is to come right down to something which is most relevant and which has not been answered. For over 100 years we in Nova Scotia have been giving leases for mining coal in offshore areas which extend much farther than six miles. The interesting little twist to this is that the federal government itself passed a statute, when Your Honour and I were hon. members in this House, creating Devco. Who was it that assigned the mine leases to the government of Canada in the name of Devco? Was it the Government of Canada, in the name of Canada, which assigned the mineral leases to Devco, a creature of this federal House?

I see the very stimulating and distinguished Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) here tonight. She is from Sudbury where mining is most relevant. She knows my brother who works in mining part of that area. Perhaps she could answer my question.

It was not the federal government that ceded leases to Devco. It was the province of Nova Scotia, which had legally assigned the leases years earlier, which ceded those leases to the Devco Corporation.

Mrs. Erola: Why?

Mr. Nowlan: Why would they, under the purport of section 3, if they owned the area, cede and give to themselves that which they already owned? Here is a beautiful example of the left hand not knowing what the right hand does.

However, let us come down to the part that I mentioned when I started my remarks. All other provinces of Canada have ownership of their resources without any equivocation. I am talking about the ownership of the resources; I am not talking about what the federal government owns in the Northwest Territories or the Yukon.

I have already said that section 7 of the BNA Act gives Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the same rights they had at the time of confederation. As I have already said, other provinces have had fundamental ownership since confederation. North Ontario is an example. The mining area of Sudbury has been added to Ontario. It has helped Ontario, and it has helped Canada. I have already mentioned James Bay, Alberta and Saskatchewan. However, the tar sands are in Alberta. My friend talked earlier about the bill here before the House in terms of the hydro line and obtaining rights to convey hydro across the territory of Quebec in the same manner as gas and oil were conveyed across other provinces. The premier of Quebec has said that this right of way is a violation of the sovereignty of Quebec. I am not going to debate it. I know that my friends in Newfoundland and the premier of Newfoundland feel very strongly about this bill. However, imagine the sense of violation that the premier of Quebec would feel, and, certainly what the premier of Alberta would feel, even more so, if, unilaterally, the federal government, which initially gave them the lands which are now James Bay and the lands which are now the tar sands, were to say, "Well, that was not really in the public interest. We want to revoke that unilaterally"? That would just show Your Honour—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: More, more!

Mr. Nowlan: I just want to conclude with one sentence. It is rather ironic to me—I am going to be very unprovocative tonight—it is really an amazing thing to me—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect, the hon. member has already exceeded his time by two minutes.

Some hon. Members: More, more!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We need the unanimous consent of the House to proceed. There is not unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, at an earlier stage of this debate, the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons) made a few remarks. I think it is high time that we again put the record straight, even at the expense of being somewhat repetitive. Perhaps, though he may be a slow learner, at long last he might be able to take it in. First there was some correspondence between the then prime minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Premier of Newfoundland, Mr. Peckford, and I think it only proper that some of that correspondence be read into the record once more.

● (2050)

On August 23, 1979, Premier Peckford wrote to the then prime minister of Canada in the following terms:

> On a number of occasions we have discussed the ownership of the mineral resources of Newfoundland's continental margin. In those discussions, I outlined to you the province's legal and moral claims to ownership and the importance which I place on this subject.
> To restate my position briefly, I regard the development of the province's offshore mineral resources as both the greatest hope and greatest challenge facing us. The development of these resources in accordance with the priorities and objectives of the province would enable Newfoundland to become a strong member of an enhanced Canadian Confederation. On the other hand, the development of these resources at a rate, or in a manner, which is inappropriate to the province would do irreparable damage to our social and economic wellbeing.
> It is our belief that this challenge can only be met if the province has ownership of, and jurisdiction over, its offshore mineral resources.

I wish to emphasize the next portion and bring it to the attention of members opposite. It reads:

> Accordingly, we greatly appreciate your support of Newfoundland's position and the position of the federal Conservative party that Newfoundland's undersea resources should be treated constitutionally in the same manner as if they were on land.

That is Premier Peckford's understanding of the position adopted by the then prime minister of Canada and it is spelled out quite clearly.

Let me read some of the then prime minister's answer to Mr. Peckford. In part, this letter dated September 14, 1979, reads:

> As you pointed out during our meeting, the strong feelings which Newfoundland has expressed on the offshore mineral resources issue down through the years have flowed from its history. It is fitting, therefore, that I confirm to you, the Premier of Newfoundland, the adherence of the Government of Canada to the principles enunciated. At the same time, however, I wish to take the opportunity presented by the publication of our exchange of letters to confirm that the Government of Canada is prepared to see these principles applied to the resolution of the offshore issue with all provinces concerned. Indeed I am sending a copy of this letter to all the Premiers because all are interested in the matter to some degree and will, in due time, have to deal with it in constitutional discussions.

Attached to that letter was an annex. Its heading reads "Basic Principles Concerning Offshore Mineral Resources". The following is the first item:

> The province of Newfoundland should own the mineral resources of the continental margin off its coast in so far as Canada is entitled to exercise sovereign rights over these resources in accordance with international law. Such ownership should be, to the extent possible, of the same nature as if these resources were located within the boundaries of the province. The legislative jurisdiction of the province should, to the extent possible, be the same as for those resources within the boundaries of the province.

I will not read items 2 and 3 because they go on to reaffirm the position. But let me read item 4 of the annex to the letter dated September 14, 1979, from the then prime minister of Canada to Mr. Peckford. Item number 4 reads:

> The above principles will be further confirmed and implemented by the signing of an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland and by appropriate legislative action and constitutional change.

Perhaps the issue which the hon. member for Burin-St. George's was raising was the comprehension of Mr. Peckford that if perchance, and that chance did arise, the Liberal party should take over the Government of Canada, he wanted the further commitment of a Conservative government that those resources would in fact be lodged with and be the property of the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Simmons: That is where Clark reneged. I have those letters and he reneged. He flip-flopped, just as he did with Jerusalem.

Mr. McCain: He did not renege.

Mr. Simmons: He did an about-face.

Mr. Kempling: You are a Newfoundland sewer pipe.

Some hon. Members: Order, please.

Mr. McCain: I wish the hon. member for Burin-St. George's would be as silent and polite while I speak as I was when he spoke.

Mr. Simmons: You were not here.

Mr. McCain: I was in this House and I heard every word of the hon. member's speech.

Mr. Simmons: You didn't understand it.

An hon. Member: Talk about slow learners.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. McCain: A lot of slow learners were brought into the House who are sitting on your right, Mr. Speaker. It is regrettable for the good of Canada, but some of the loudest complaints come from those who are the slowest learners.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCain: A whale off the coast of Newfoundland would not make as much impolite noise as the hon. member for Burin-St. George's is making right now. He would understand the difference between blowing and sucking.

Mr. Kempling: He sucks and blows at the same time.

Mr. Siddon: The yappy dog over there.

Mr. McCain: I repeat, the Premier of Newfoundland understood that he could not trust the Liberal party, and the epitome of his cause of mistrust has been vocally expressed here tonight by the hon. member for Burin-St. George's who has failed to be a loyal Newfoundlander by not supporting the concept of coastal provinces in Canada in general, owning the resources, as the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition said, "as if they were resources on land".

The committees had been established to do the negotiating. A cabinet committee had been established. Members were assigned to the committee to take in the necessary parts of their particular portfolios as the particular portfolio concerned an agreement to be made. The total negotiating package had been set up and was in place. Negotiations were about to begin. That is a far cry from the misleading remarks which have come from the hon. member for Burin-St. George's.

Mr. Simmons: What is misleading? I referred to the same letters you did. He reneged on it.

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Mr. Speaker, can you not keep that fellow quiet?

Mr. Kempling: Who has the floor?

Mr. McCain: If the students of a former teacher of this House had been as diabolical in the interruption of his work as he is now, how would he have dealt with them as a disciplinarian? How can he expect you, Mr. Speaker, to deal with him as a disciplinarian of this school? I am sure he demanded more consideration from his class than he is willing to give to this House of Commons.

A number of things cause great concern in this House. It has been proposed that a pipeline be built from Montreal to Atlantic Canada. We are now in the process of passing a piece of legislation which, in 55 instances, allocates to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) ministerial discretion. I am concerned about that because it has been ministerial discretion and the tardiness of the various agencies of the Liberal government of this land which have created the present situation. Should the pipeline be built to take gas from Sable Island to central Canada or should it be built from Montreal to take western gas to eastern Canada? If we have not had such greed for political profile on your right, Mr. Speaker, we would know in which direction to build that line. There would have been sufficient exploration and development off Sable Island to enable us to say today where that line should go. If present exploration is indicative of what is there, then the line should definitely be built from east to west in eastern Canada rather than from west to east. We may be getting ourselves involved, as a result of procrastination, deliberation and over-regulation, in the construction of a line which may cost $100 million or more to reverse if and when the dreams, aspirations and reasonable hopes of those drilling off Sable Island are realized.

We are in a position where the government has said, and it has been repeated here today, that the assets of Canada should be shared. I am rather concerned about the approach of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) who indicates that the central government of Canada should exercise all the authority. In the country from which he came there was nothing any stronger than the constitutional rights of the States. Nothing more was carved in stone than the right of each state to have two senators in the United States Senate. In that senate was vested the authority to protect the rights of every state in the union, new or old.

Under our system we do not preserve state rights carved in stone, as they do in the United States. We would have the existing rights further disrupted and diluted if and when the constitutional package which has been before this House so long were passed. I cannot comprehend how a man who should have obtained his philosophies in a native land which appreciates democratic rights and state rights would ask Canadians, and his own constituents in particular, to accept that the federal government should have all the rights. Nothing could be further from what he was taught to believe.

Mr. Simmons: When did he say that?

Mr. McCain: By his very loud-mouth support of this bill he said that. He has said just that. He has interjected enough that it is pretty clear where he stands.

Mr. Simmons: Come on.

Mr. Epp: Go up to the Senate with Stollery.

Mr. McCain: I suppose you will give me an extra five minutes to deal with the manners of this man.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. A number of members are calling on the Chair to intervene. I remind them that heckling is an honourable tradition. The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte has participated in the response, heckling and using some of the same expressions. I think he is doing quite well on his feet and I do not see the necessity of interrupting.

Mr. McCain: Very well, Mr. Speaker. Where does the share of the federal government fit in a confederation? That has already been doled out to the federal government in income tax by an early constitutional amendment. What other share will the government get in a healthy economy with rapid development which this country is ready to receive and capable of developing?

The government gets a share because the unemployment insurance payments would go down. They would save half a billion bucks, maybe more. It gets another share because welfare payments will go down. Under the present Unemployment Insurance Act, welfare payments as part of a cost sharing program, are costing more. It will probably make another half a billion a year there. The government gets another share because the highly paid employees of any developmental structure are going to be paying personal income tax on a high level. I do not know what the estimate of that would be. That is the third share. The government gets another share in the form of income tax from the corporations, companies or individuals conducting the development. It gets other revenues in every tax field from every spin-off of an improved economy. How much does this government want to try to persuade Canada that it should get off the backs of the provinces? It is hypocritical for a government to say it does not get anything out of the development of oil when its gets it in every direction by reduced costs of government and increased revenues which amounts to billions of dollars.

Mr. Gustafson: It wants to whole hog.

Mr. McCain: You get this by reducing federal expenditures and by increasing national revenues. The problem is that an ill-managed government has spent to the extent that it cannot cope with the programs it has put in place and which it has costed and forecast with great inaccuracy. Rather than say a mistake was made, it is reaching higher and higher with greed for political profile at the expense of the provinces in this and so many other situations.

This party was asked what it would do were it in power with respect to the right of way for electricity to pass through the province of Quebec. That was one of the most superfluous questions I have ever heard. There was a deal made by federal Liberal government under Mr. Pearson, with a Liberal government negotiating for Newfoundland under Mr. Smallwood's direction and a Liberal government dealing with the problem in the province of Quebec under Mr. Bourassa. I say to the Liberal government of this day and its party supporters that it is a pretty dirty bird that will foul its own nest and ask its successors to move in and clean it up. You fellows clean it up. Your predecessors created it. Don't ask us what to do about it, we didn't create it.

The Bible says that the son shall answer for the sins of the father, and so the sons will just have to take the punishment and come up with the solutions that will create a unified, harmonious Canada. While they are doing that they should bear one thing in mind. Montreal has been supplied with oil by an international pipeline from Portland as well as from other sources. New Brunswick has undertaken an interprovincial and an international electric grid. Without rights of way, these projects would have been impossible. There is to be and there will be a maritime energy commission at some point in time. That will depend on the freedom of transmission of electricity through the provinces of Canada for it to be successful.

I submit that if there is to be energy transmitted from one province to another, if we are going to bring gas from Alberta to Montreal, then can we not bring electrical energy from Newfoundland to New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario? This is what should have been thought about when those three great Liberals were laying down the plan which is causing the problems of today. It was the acquiescence and lack of foresight which create the problem.

Mr. Simmons: Are you for or against it?

Mr. McCain: Just like an artesian well.

Mr. Epp: No, an artesian well has clean water.

Mr. Wilson: He's more like a sump pump.

Mr. McCain: Perhaps the federal government could improve its approach in the fashion it is trying to negotiate with the provinces. The history of the resource industry of Canada, regardless of the resource, has proven to responsible governments, beyond any measure of doubt whatsoever, that a specific royalty is detrimental to development. The only royalty which a province or federal structure should seek is on a profit-sharing basis.

One of the biggest mining developments in New Brunswick employs a couple of thousand people. It would never have got off the ground if the province of New Brunswick had applied a specific royalty on the specific minerals which were withdrawn from the soil at Bathurst. It was by agreement between the Hon. Hugh John Flemming, then premier of New Brunswick, and the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker as prime minister of Canada that a new formula was devised to make work in Bathurst through the development of our resources, with the province to get a percentage of profit as a royalty.

If a percentage profit had been the basis for royalties in western Canada and in the mind of this federal government, those 500 oil wells in Saskatchewan would still be producing, and those 175 rigs which have left Canada would still be drilling. Anybody who has any love for Canada whatsoever and understands the business concept of a free world knows there must be a new formula.

In spite of all the bellyaching from your right, Mr. Speaker, let me point out one thing. The relations between the Leader of the Opposition when he was prime minister and the provinces of Canada at no time cause a shutdown of wells or a reduction in oil delivery. Nor did it interfere with exploration. Nor has it caused the postponement of any development or exploration, and when that contrast is drawn, the government should only speak of its own performance with a sheepish look and a covered face.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by observing that the demonstration we have seen in the last hour put up by the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons) indicates he certainly is no beautyrest. He has created an ache in the backsides as no other member has since that late appointee from Spadina to the other place.

Let me begin by saying that the debate on this bill is right now totally out of place. What we ought to be debating are matters of the Post Office and the fact that potentially 1,000 to 1,500 businesses per month, will go bankrupt as a result of the postal strike, if this government does not get the Post Office working again. Here we are debating Bill C-48 at the report stage, even though there was a commitment to save it for a fall debate.

We have before us Bill C-48, even though off schedule.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Friesen: Let me reply to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell). It seems to me that since the last election the Liberal government has made certain the people from British Columbia are alienated from the government. To speak on behalf of British Columbia has fallen to the lot of only one party, and that is the Progressive Conservative Party whose members now speak on behalf of British Columbians.

I remember the debate on the Constitution and I cannot remember members to my left speaking on behalf of British Columbia during that debate. As a matter of fact, we had an indication of the direction those members want to go when it came to a discussion of natural resources at that time. I fully recall, and I checked with Hansard, a speech made by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen). I recall very clearly that he said the former Premier of British Columbia, the Hon. Dave Barrett, indicated at the 1975 federal-provincial conference that if the federal government would promise it would nationalize the natural resources of the provinces, British Columbia would gladly turn over its natural resources to the central government. That was the commitment Dave Barrett made in 1975, and I think members to my left will acknowledge that. The hon. member for Kootenay West approved of that commitment. Incidentally, that is why the New Democratic Party during the Constitution debate supported the Liberal Party in the matter of ownership of provincial resources. In a sense we have to say who speaks on behalf of the people of British Columbia.

An hon. Member: The NDP.

Mr. Friesen: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway wants to speak on behalf of the central government, letting the central government acquire all the resources that belong to the province of British Columbia. He speaks on behalf of the north, and that is fine, it is part of his mandate as a critic for that party, but somewhere along the line somebody has to speak on behalf of the people of British Columbia.

It seems to me we are dealing not only with the resources of that province, we are dealing with the inheritance of our children and their children. What members to my left and also those across the way would like to do is to develop an irrevocable act that would for all time turn over those resources to the central government, thus prohibiting future generations in British Columbia from having any kind of control over those resources.

This amendment is vital. For the record I want to say it was the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) who proposed an amendment to Bill C-48 which is entitled "An Act to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands", which should more honestly read "an act to confiscate oil and gas interests in Canada lands". The hon. member for St. John's East would like to see his amendment accepted so this act would have no authority over offshore resources.

I should like to have heard the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway speak on behalf of the offshore resources in British Columbia, resources of very vital interest to the people of that province. As he knows, interest in offshore resources in British Columbia is growing rapidly. The land is being parcelled off for future drilling. There is increased interest in drilling for gas in the ocean waters of British Columbia, but that interest will never be developed until this question is settled and until those who are interested know who is going to control, manage and own those resources, and to whom they will be accountable in the development of those resources.

For the future of the economy of British Columbia and for the protection of the cash flow of British Columbians we have to speak to this issue. I would urge members on my left to support this amendment in order to preserve the resources of British Columbia for British Columbians. As long as there is this vagueness and this vagary, we will have stagnation in that industry offshore.

The Liberal Government's position is that the central government should own those resources, take in all the revenue possible and then take what it deems to be surplus revenue and give it back to the provinces. This is the same kind of program we have for many other taxes in the country. The trouble is that the central government spills so much; the money sifts through its fingers through accounting errors. The bottom line is that the federal government makes the provinces vulnerable to the caprice of a centralist government. The centralist government determines what the payback for these resources ought to be to the provinces.

British Columbia happens to be a producing province which is in a prosperous state. Let us consider the condition of the Atlantic provinces, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, which are on the threshold of becoming have provinces even though historically they have been have-not provinces. Let us consider how much they would still suffer from the caprice of a central government determining, by the whim of Ottawa bureaucrats and a formula they would devise, what payback ought to go to those provinces after the resources have been developed. As long as this is in the control of the central government, that government will act capriciously with those provinces.

Our party has made a clear declaration of where we stand on this. The province ought to control the offshore resources in the same way as the provinces control the land resources. Saskatchewan and Alberta have land-based energy resources. Those provinces which have offshore energy resources ought to enjoy the same kind of benefits. The problem is that whenever the federal government has tried to manipulate those land-based resources, the provincial economies have been destroyed.

I was talking to a friend from Alberta just a few days ago. I said to him, "Things are going pretty well in your town". He said, "No, things are shut down". In this particular case it was an auditor from the revenue department who had gone out to one of the towns in Alberta where oil drilling is the chief industry and, instead of there being 60 cats operating, there was one, merely because of the manipulative power of this central government.

We in our party are convinced that a province which enjoys an ocean shoreline ought to be able to develop resources offshore in the same way provinces can develop those resources on land. However, this is not just a matter of constitutional right and interpretation; it is a matter of stewardship. It seems to me that wherever the federal government has been involved in resource development, particularly on northern land, its stewardship has left much to be desired. When we were in government one hon. member opposite came to me and said, "Why are you people so intent on granting provincial status to the Yukon?" He said, "Look at all the money the Yukon brings into the federal treasury". That is the nub of it all; the federal government wants to prevent provincial status in the north; it makes money because the Yukon has a territorial government and is not operating on behalf of the territory but on behalf of the Central government. It is a matter of stewardship. As long as resources are in the command of the central government, stewardship will be left wanting.

Canadians have become convinced that the entire energy policy is not a matter of self-sufficiency or a matter of supply; it is a matter of money for the federal Treasury. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) pointed out this afternoon that through tax dollars the central government is the greatest beneficiary of the energy policy. The province of Ontario gets more tax dollars out of petroleum energy than the province of Alberta. That is very poor stewardship.

As a member for British Columbia I want to speak on behalf of the province of British Columbia, which has a vital interest in this particular amendment the passage of which would ensure that the province of British Columbia, as well as the provinces of the Atlantic, would maintain control of all the energy resources and mineral resources offshore in the same way it controls other resources. Should the amendment of the hon. member for St. John's East be accepted, the province of British Columbia would benefit. Incidentally, so would the federal government because the federal government would get its due in terms of tax dollars.

I trust that hon. members of the House will accept the motion of the hon. member for St. John's East, and that the provinces which enjoy maritime coastlines will be able to control their own natural resources.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, I too want to speak in support of this motion introduced by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). I think it is good to begin this debate at report stage on this very important motion moved by my colleague because, although it speaks directly to the question of offshore rights for the coastal provinces, it brings us directly to the larger issue of Bill C-48 and, indeed, the government's energy policies, which are directly based on the government's philosophy of management of the country's resources, and that is a philosophy which I profoundly oppose.

The hon. member for St. John's East made a distinguished contribution this afternoon when he insisted that it is the right of the coastal provinces to control their own rates of development. Indeed, as the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan) told us earlier this evening, the provinces in the Atlantic area which those two members represent had ownership of their resources when they entered Canada. I represent a province, Alberta, which had to struggle to acquire that ownership long after we became part of Canada, and if today hon. members from Alberta are fighting strongly to retain control of the resources in our province, so too we fight on behalf of those coastal provinces which had those rights when they came into confederation.

This motion brings us directly to the heart of the bill and the philosophy of the government. The rights of the provinces, whether obtained at their entry into confederation or provided to them by amendments to the Constitution in 1930, are at the very heart of the continuation of the development of this country, which is based on regional strengths. This is a confederation, and I have to say with great sincerity that I believe the government is operating from a unitary philosophy. It is not the provinces and the rights of those provinces which are uppermost in the minds of hon. members opposite, but it is their desire to control from the centre of this country all aspects of its development. That has led to the unfortunate National Energy Program and the Canadianization concepts therein.

Before I leave the speech made by the hon. member for St. John's East on the motion now before the House, I would like to underline a very important phrase the hon. member offered for our consideration. The hon. member defended the case of Newfoundland regarding the right to offshore mineral development out 200 miles and in the seabed beyond as far as the coastal lines prevail. He said to us that what Newfoundland wants is the right to control the development of that heritage which is Newfoundland's and the right to control the economic and social ramifications that development brings the indigenous community around it so that it would be developed with the best interests of the community involved in mind. So too in Nova Scotia. The hon. member for St. John's East said it is important that we have that rate of development controlled so that Newfoundland can then proceed, in the spirit of sharing, to share with the rest of Canada. I believe it is not the intention of Newfoundland, any more than it is the intention of Alberta, in exercising control of the development of resources, to hold the benefits of those resources for themselves. It is abundantly clear that Alberta has shared the benefits of its heritage. Indeed, we can make the case, and have made it very strongly, that by accepting a price far below the world price for our energy, we have made a significant contribution to the wellbeing of Canada. If you go back to the beginning of OPEC and the rise in oil prices, this contribution amounts to some $30 billion. While we are not looking in particular for a great amount of credit for that because we have done it in a spirit of developing Canada as best we can from all regional points of view, at the same time I think it ill behooves the government, particularly the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to keep insisting that these problems with respect to Alberta could be solved if we had a better sense of sharing.

The same is true of Newfoundland. When the benefits of high technology become operative in securing the development of mineral resources in our coastal provinces, whether it be the Atlantic coast or the Pacific coast, I believe these provinces will operate in the same mode as Alberta, which is in a spirit of sharing with the rest of Canada. However, they cannot do that, any more than we can, if they roll over and allow an excessively centralist government to dominate the ownership, control and development of those resources.

I have a number of things that I wish to say about Bill C-48, Mr. Speaker, as we proceed. I am not going to go into them all tonight. I would draw your attention only to the importance of the motion put before us by the hon. member for St. John's East concerning the protection of the rights of coastal provinces with respect to ownership of their resources.

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I would like to ask the hon. member to tell me who negotiated the 200-mile limit and more, the provinces or the Government of Canada?

Mr. Roche: Well, I do not know that that is a point of order, but I am glad to proceed into the question of the negotiation of the 200-mile limit and the whole aspect of the Law of the Sea. I do not know whether Mr. Speaker is going to welcome a lengthy intervention, and I will be glad to return to that, but let me just tell the minister that of course it was the Canadian government that negotiated the law of the sea. However, I would say the Canadian government's intervention would only carry as much weight as the province's agreement to participate in a national policy on the law of the sea. I believe the provinces have made a distinctive contribution to the formulation of the policy which was advanced. I hope the minister is not trying to suggest the government's policies on the Law of the Sea have been all that wonderful, because I would draw to her attention the briefing published by the North-South institute in March, 1981, entitled "Canada: The Third World and the Law of the Sea" in which the fundamental point is made that there has been an acquisitiveness underlying the policies of the Canadian government and a reluctance for revenue-sharing.

The hon. member for St. John's East made the case this afternoon, which has been referred to by others in the course of this debate, that revenue sharing in Canada can only be done if there is a proper understanding of ownership and a proper exercise of the rights of ownership. So, too, revenue sharing internationally can only be done if there is a proper understanding of the rights of ownership of other countries. I believe that what the provinces have done so far is to help in the formulation of a realistic Canadian policy which respects ownership and then goes on to the larger question of revenue sharing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I was hoping perhaps the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche) might wish to indicate if he was prepared to accept a question, but I do not have that choice before I know whether or not the minister wished to ask a question or make a point of order. So I have to recognize the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) on a—

Mrs. Erola: I have another question, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Perhaps we can make it clear that it will be with the permission of the hon. member if he chooses to entertain it.

Mr. Roche: I certainly welcome the opportunity of answering questions rather than trying to ask them, but if the minister will let me proceed for a few moments, at the end of my speech I will welcome her questions and will try to leave her some time.

I think, Mr. Speaker, what we are attempting to do as a centrepiece of this particular motion before us is not to go into the larger questions of the law of the sea—which again I say to the minister ought to be debated in this House, and I fault the government for not having brought before the House a significant debate on the law of the sea—but rather to concentrate for a moment on the rights of the provinces.

The bill before us is an expression of the philosophy of the government regarding the best way to maximize its take from the offshore provinces, indeed from the north, the two central aspects of the Canada lands which are before us. The sensitivities of the people of the north and the provinces bordering the oceans are apparently just inconveniences the government lightly brushes aside. So far as members of the government in this House are concerned, they evoke the same kind of yawn which must have creased marie Antoinette's lips when she heard the poor of Paris clamouring for bread. That unfortunate queen misread the mood of the people, as indeed the present government misreads the mood of the north and the coastal provinces.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has proclaimed self-sufficiency and Canadianization as the goals of this bill. I do not know how we can seriously believe his words when we see the most recent report of the Canadian Petroleum Association, when we recognize the decision to put the Cold Lake development on an indefinite hold, which indeed could put it off into the far distant future. That plant would have produced 167,000 barrels a day by 1987. I do not know how the minister can keep proclaiming that he has the best interests of the development of energy in Canada in mind when the Canadian Petroleum Association in its review said:

> The 1981 spending outlook has been dimmed by the National Energy Program. The Association's projections prior to NEP foresaw exploration and capital expenditures in excess of $10 billion for the year. It is now expected that only approximately $6.5 billion will be spent. This would be a reduction of 22 per cent from the 1980 spending level. The impact on the industry's activity level will even be greater because of inflationary cost increases: e.g. drilling completions are forecast to drop to 6,400 compared with 9,200 in 1980. An early resolution of the energy impasse is required to improve the investment outlook.

This is the fundamental background with which we began debate at report stage of this bill. The government is showing the same disregard for the feelings of the north, to touch on the north for a moment, as it showed for the feelings and the claims of Albertans.

I should like to refer to the report of the Canadian Catholic Bishops' Social Affairs Commission wherein it indicated:

> In effect, this proposed legislation would further entrench the people of the North in a situation of colonialism in Canada. It not only threatens to violate the aboriginal rights of the native peoples but it also threatens to deny all the peoples of the North some of the basic democratic rights and freedoms which we have to know and expect in other regions of Canada.

The question before us is very simple: Do we care for the future of the inhabitants of the Northwest Territories and for the future development of the coastal provinces of our great country? Do we want both these tremendously important areas of Canada to be truly a part of the Canadian mosaic? This bill, particularly in its form at report stage, does not give me much hope. I believe it is a selfish bill, the enrichment of Ottawa being its principal aim. This is the fundamental point I wanted to draw to the attention of the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola). It is a bill without a vision. It is a bill that the people of the north and those of the coastal provinces will remember with bitterness for many years to come.

In the moment remaining I would say that we ought to think seriously about the northern leaders' conference which was held in Yellowknife in March of this year. It categorically castigated the present government for ignoring the most crucial concerns of the north—those of political development, the settlement of aboriginal rights, as well as resource ownership and control.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources continues to demonstrate before the House and the country a spirit of confrontation rather than one of co-operation. He is taking steps to move us backward in the true development of our resource strength which our country and indeed the world needs. The policy whereby we continue to import offshore oil in the amount of $5.5 billion to $6 billion this year, in my judgment, ought to be most severely criticized. This oil is needed in other parts of the world. We have sufficient oil here if we put our own act together to develop and produce it properly. This policy should not be criticized on grounds of politics or partisanship. It should be criticized on grounds of fairness for a world in need of resources. The very idea of closing a $12 billion oil plant because we cannot reach an energy agreement is a problem beyond belief.

Hon. members on this side are determined to keep putting these points of view forward. I know how little the government listens, but we on this side of the House will show some determination by speaking out on behalf of true energy development, on behalf of all people of Canada, and on behalf of true regional development. It is our duty, and it is what we intend to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I know the hon. Minister for Mines is seeking the floor on a point of order and I know it is intended as a question for the hon. member for Edmonton South. Is there unanimous consent of the House to extend the hon. member's time for a moment in order to permit the hon. minister to ask her question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Speaker, I should like to return to the subject of the law of the sea to which the hon. member referred. If the resources at the bottom of the high seas which, if we follow the law of the sea treaty, are to be shared by all humanity or all people in the world, does it not follow that those resources which are at the bottom of the sea within Canadian jurisdiction should be shared by all Canadians?

Mr. Siddon: Who said that they would not be?

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I thought I dealt with that question when I emphasized what the hon. member for St. John's East said earlier in the day. It is the intention of the province for which he spoke to enter into a spirit of sharing with the rest of Canada. In the law of the sea the minerals at the bottom of the ocean in the high seas ought clearly to be put under the jurisdiction of an international institution because they do not belong to anybody out in the high seas. The revenue from that ought to be shared on an equitable basis, particularly with land blocked and geographically disadvantaged states. Those minerals which will subsequently be developed at the bottom of the sea on the coastal areas of Canada belong to Canada—

Mrs. Erola: That is right.

Mr. Roche: —but we will enter into a revenue-sharing formula. This revenue-sharing formula will be arrived at by the concurrence of the provinces which have the actual ownership. I believe that is what makes Canada.

In conclusion, the hon. minister is reflecting her reaction to my answer on the question of the unitary concept of Canada that we are opposing. We are saying that Canada is composed of a confederation in which the policies of our government, of our national stance, are arrived at jointly by the federal and the provincial governments. Certainly this will come into play in the revenue sharing concept of the minerals at the bottom of the sea on the coastal areas of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I was about to recognize the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), but I must look to my right at this point and recognize the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren).

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, during the course of our discussion today on the amendment advanced by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) we have heard some discussion of the questions about oil supply in Canada and of the broad question of meeting our oil needs at the end of this decade. We have also heard another principal theme in our discussion, namely, the more legalistic question of ownership of offshore resources, whether they be on the Atlantic coast, on the Pacific coast, or in the Arctic regions.

Let me attempt for a moment to comment on the first of those two major themes in our discussion on the question of the exploitation of resources on Canada lands. The suggestion was made this afternoon and this evening that this legislation would somehow act as a hindrance to the achievement by Canada of the goal of self-sufficiency in the petroleum field. In fact, there is no evidence to substantiate such an allegation. On the contrary, there is ample evidence, some of which I should like to cite for the benefit of the House, that the very opposite is true. One broad purpose of the National Energy Program is to ensure that Canadians enjoy self-sufficiency in oil, as they already do in hydro-electricity, coal, uranium and natural gas, by the end of this decade. In the evaluation of our potential supply it is obvious that the offshore resources on the east coast, which have now largely been outlined, and those in the Arctic which are on the way to being determined, will play a significant part in the provision of self-sufficiency in oil for all Canadians. That exploration, that exciting new development in Canada's energy future will, in part, come about as a result of the incentives which have been provided in the past and which will be provided increasingly in the future for Canadian-controlled companies to bring those resources to the benefit of all Canadians.

We have seen the example of Dome Petroleum with its ambitious schemes in the Beaufort Sea, schemes which also involve a degree of Canadianization which hitherto were not present. We know of the NOVA corporation's commitments in the Canada lands. As indicative, indeed, of many other arrangements, we have seen the arrangements between Shell and Norcen. We have seen the participation of a number of smaller Canadian companies, and I wish to note in particular their participation in the offshore exploration where they were not present in the past. Indeed, it would be an unusual week when the readers of at least the financial pages of our newspapers were not to note some new commitment by petroleum companies, particularly Canadian companies, to participate in the exploration and development in the Canada lands. I would submit that, in fact, the regime which is set forth in Bill C-48 does not in any way hinder or discourage the development which we all seek. On the contrary, it provides a framework in which that exploration and development can proceed.

Members of the House may recall that some years ago Bill C-20 offered a new regime to replace the existing somewhat ill-defined regulations to govern exploration and development in Canada lands. Unfortunately, that legislation died on the Order Paper when an election occurred. We now have before us Bill C-48, which sets forth in a coherent and comprehensive fashion the terms on which exploration and development will occur in the Canada lands. Quite obviously, this legislation is timely. Indeed, in my view, it is overdue. It provides the petroleum industry with the ground rules on which it can proceed with investments, with an assurance of the terms on which investments can be made.

We have before us a bill which defines the relationship of the federal government and the oil companies active in the Canada lands. It is not a bill about native people's claims. It is not a bill about the ownership of any particular area, or claims to ownership of any particular area in the Canada lands. What the bill does is to set out the terms and conditions for exploration and development in the frontier areas. As I have said, companies can proceed with assurance as a result. In short, we shall have a regime which will stimulate further development in the Canada lands and help to ensure that all Canadians can enjoy the benefits of oil self-sufficiency, as they do in all other areas of energy.

The second major theme which we have seen develop in the debate today is that of ownership of offshore resources. I assume that members opposite have in mind the idea that somehow this bill prevents any further discussion or consideration of how the revenue from what we all hope will be the successful exploration in the Canada lands will be shared. Obviously, the bill does not do that. Indeed, I would draw the attention of the House to the fact that the bill states quite clearly that Canada lands means lands that belong to Her Majesty in the right of Canada. If they are not lands that belong to Her Majesty in the right of Canada, then they are not affected by this bill. Also, in the second part of clause 2 we refer to submarine areas not within a province. If there is some debate, some dissension about what are Canada lands and what are not Canada lands, whether they are within a province or not, then that can be challenged in the courts. Indeed, this afternoon the minister made some reference to the fact that a case currently being heard in the federal court—as I recall, a case initiated by the Seafarers' International Union—may well address this very question of the ownership of offshore resources and the right to exploit those resources. But that, to my mind, is taking an unnecessarily legalistic view of the question.

The fact is that this government has, on numerous occasions, indeed, as was noted by the hon. member for St. John's East, offered to engage in serious discussion with the Maritime provinces of our country to determine a way in which those offshore resources will be explored and developed. The government has indicated its willingness to commit itself to a regime which would provide the adjacent provinces with revenues which would bring them the opportunities which all of us seek for our citizens, providing the adjacent provinces the opportunity to benefit fully from the exploration and development. There is no question here of a grab. Indeed, the land in question is clearly under the authority of the national government of Canada. I include Sable Island. Quite obviously, as is set forth in article 91.9 of the British America Act, the federal Parliament has legislated jurisdiction over Sable Island. Thus, I cannot think why the hon. member for St. John's East sees any particular advantage in deleting that reference when it is a reference enshrined in our Constitution.

With regard to other points made by the hon. member for St. John's East, I would submit that the deletion of the clause would in no way strengthen the legal, or even the political, case made by the adjacent coastal provinces. In fact, in my view and in the view of the government, such a deletion would merely weaken Canada's claim to sovereignty over those waters to the 200-mile limit. If this motion were adopted what we would have would be a deletion of all reference to the 200-mile limit. By extension, we would weaken our claim to sovereignty over that area. I noted earlier that the definition provided in the bill excludes submarine areas not within a province. Therefore, that responsibility for all or part of those waters may be devolved to adjacent provinces without any amendment to Bill C-48. There is no need for amendment if such a devolvement were to be made. Rather than clarify the offshore dispute, in our view, the amendment would only serve to confuse the issue and leave unclear the responsibility for such important matters as environmental protection.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

SOCIAL SECURITY—MINISTER'S COMMITMENTS TO IMPROVE PENSIONS FOR WOMEN. (A) REQUEST THAT MINISTER PRESS FOR ACTION BY GOVERNMENT. (B) MINISTER'S ROLE IN ADVOCATING INCOME TAX REFORMS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, July 3, as recorded in Hansard at page 11167, I put a series of questions to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). The questions raised three main points, and I shall refer to them; but I hope it was clear that the thrust of all three was the same, namely, that I think it is most unfair to the senior citizens of this country that there is so much delay in dealing with the question of raising pensions.

The first point that I raised had to do with a particular group who are being shortchanged. I refer to women between the ages of 55 and 60, and between the ages of 60 and 65. I put them in those two different groups because the discrimination against them varies a bit. In the case of those between 60 and 65, the discrimination is against single women, women who are alone, as opposed to those who can qualify for the spouse's allowance. In the case of those between 55 and 60, the discrimination is against all of them in that there is no federal pension for people in that age bracket.

Earlier today, when I moved a motion under Standing Order 43 along this subject, one of my friends, to have a bit of fun, suggested to me that I was violating the Constitution because I proposed something that seemed to discriminate in favour of one sex as opposed to the other. Of course, my immediate reply was that there is provision in that same Constitution to ameliorate the plight of disadvantaged groups; and women in those two age brackets, from 55 to 65, are certainly a disadvantaged group. I welcome the things that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has said about doing something for women in these groups; but I confess that much as I enjoy the position that the Minister of National Health and Welfare takes, and much as I am ready to quote the things that she says, it does annoy me that we are told again and again that this is a time of restraint, that there is no money, and all the rest of it. As I said in response to someone who used that line the other day, that has been the line of ministers of finance from the day when the minister of finance, back in the middle twenties, told J. S. Woodsworth that there was no money for a pension of $20 a month.

My second point in my question on Friday, July 3, had to do with the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) keeps telling us how strong the economy is, and we get these reports about the billions of dollars which are around. How does the Minister of National Health and Welfare square with that her being told that, so far as increased pensions are concerned, she just has to wait? She said, "When I see the money, when I see the colour of the necessary billions of dollars, I will be at the door of the Minister of Finance." I want her at the door of the Minister of Finance right now.

Then my third point had to do with the fact that the same minister of National Health and Welfare has some very good ideas about tax reforms which ought to take place. We liked her proposal for a child tax credit as opposed to deductions from taxable income. She has other suggestions. She points out the many loopholes there are in the tax system which result in those who are not in need getting all sorts of benefits, cutting down the money which is available to provide pensions or assistance to those who need it. On that score, too, I want her to be knocking much more seriously on the door of the Minister of Finance than I feel she is.

As I say, those are the three specific points that I put into my question. I know that when parliamentary secretaries are assigned to answer questions in the late show, they like to have the member stay on the questions that he asked. Sometimes I see faces over there go ashen when the member gets up and talks about something else altogether. My hon. friend must be ready to answer. She is the only parliamentary secretary and the only Liberal over there tonight. She is the Liberal party. She will realize that I am dealing with the very points that I raised in my question.

As I say, the thrust of all that is that it is not good enough to talk about doing something for senior citizens four or five years down the road, just before the next election sometime in the eighties or nineties. I hope I can say it without giving offence to anyone: I felt this last Thursday night. I said it when I opposed the bill which was before the House that night. I expressed the hope that members generally having done so well for themselves, both in pay and pensions, would have some conscience about these things, and I want to see action very soon.

Therefore, I present to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mrs. Appolloni) the points that I have raised. I hope she has the answers to them. I hope also she will assure me that she will get behind the Minister of National Health and Welfare and push her for action soon, not just before the next election. Our pensioners need substantial improvements now.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to answer the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). If my face is ashen it is because it is hard to dispute the hon. member. He is reasonable, and he makes very good claims, with which I personally agree. Nevertheless, I am sorry but I have to repeat what the minister has said over and over again because it is the truth. As the hon. member has rightly said, the minister is extremely sympathetic to this question but she does not have the money. The answer is that simple and that horrendous.

The government does have a clear responsibility to provide pensions for the elderly, and it discharges this responsibility through the Old Age Security program and through the Canada Pension Plan. However, as the hon. member knows well, direct assistance to other persons, that is to those who have not reached the pensionable age, in a provincial responsibility. The provinces already provide benefits for these groups through cash social assistance and through a variety of free services. The federal government also plays an important role in the provision of these benefits since it pays for 50 per cent of their cost. That is a fact not generally known by the public.

One does question the desirability of a universal program to assist people between the ages of 55 and 65. Such a suggestion implies that the majority of Canadians in this broad age group requires this type of assistance. I do not believe that is the case. Even if we were to make it universal, the trouble would be that people who do not need the money would benefit from it, whereas people who need it desperately would have to do with so much less.

Some might see this idea of lowering the age requirement as being tantamount to reducing the qualifying age to 55 for Old Age Security pensions. Here again we find another problem. Even setting aside the enormous cost it would imply, we must recognize that such a move might work as an incentive for individuals to leave the work force much earlier and thus disrupt our socioeconomic structure. Thus, the ultimate cost, social and economic, might be even higher than the more than $3 billion of direct initial federal expenditures which would be required.

Mr. Knowles: It would provide jobs for younger people.

Mrs. Appolloni: The government has committed itself to the elimination of poverty among the Old Age Security pensioners who live alone. This is the government's first priority and it is a costly one.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The parliamentary secretary has been made familiar with the rather rigid rules of the adjournment motion.

Mr. Knowles: No money and she ran out of time.

POST OFFICE—SERVICE PROVIDED BY RURAL OFFICES DURING POSTAL STRIKE. (A) TREATMENT OF EMPLOYEES WHO REMAIN ON DUTY

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, on July 7, as recorded at 11,266 of Hansard I asked two questions of the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) regarding the present strike. Just to put the questions into context, in my part of the country, eastern Manitoba, there is no post office that is closed and there is no postal worker who is on strike. What we are receiving in that area is local mail delivery. For example, a letter posted at a local post office will find its way into the post office box of the individual post box holder.

The postal workers in the region—and I conveyed this in a question—asked me whether the government would be willing to set up a route system whereby letters posted in one post office destined for another town could be taken in bulk by the Post Office to the post office in question and there distributed to the mail boxes. That has been done before.

I had a meeting with my postal workers on Saturday last. They repeated that request and pointed out the manner in which the system could work. What would happen obviously is that within that trading region in a regional area, we would be able to continue our postal service.

I want to say publicly that I commend those postal workers for continuing to have those post office open and giving us postal service. I personally feel that a negotiated settlement is best. However, I suggest that consideration might be given to a cooling-off period during which the postal workers would come back to work. Negotiations would continue during that time.

First, I am asking the parliamentary secretary whether the government will consider this inter-postal distribution system in order that within a trading area that work could continue. The question I ask is whether the government would guarantee these postal workers the right to continue working and that they not be locked out, as they were in 1978, or dismissed from service and after a while having to go on unemployment insurance.

Those workers felt the union was putting pressure on them and would discipline them. In the Friday, July 10 issue of the Winnipeg Free Press, there was an article entitled "CUPW spokesman 'disowns' non-strikers". I quote from that article as follows:

> Pat Miller said that at the conclusion of the strike, the 15 to 20 members of CUPW's Winnipeg local in Altona, Morden, Winkler and Steinbach will have an opportunity to show cause before the local's three-member disciplinary committee why they should not be thrown out of the union.

In rural areas I hear this time and time again. The union workers say there is really no point in voting because the vote has already been taken. No matter how they vote, the strike will be called. A strike situation in a rural community is quite different from a strike situation in a larger centre. These are neighbours and friends. Frankly, these people feel that a negotiated settlement would be much better.

In my second question I ask the parliamentary secretary what guarantee the federal government would give to these postal workers who have chosen to stay on the job and give us local postal service and who, if the public press is to be believed, could be facing disciplinary action. What guarantee will the government give these people to continue working even though the mail supply might dwindle and these people may be locked out? I recommend that they not be locked out but be commended for the service they are giving.

Those are the two questions I would like to have the parliamentary secretary answer. As I say, I believe that a negotiated settlement is preferable. I suggest that instead of legislating a settlement here on the floor of the House of Commons, what should be considered is a deal whereby we could have a cooling-off period. Work could then resume in the Post Office, mail services would be reinstated and negotiations undertaken. I understand from both sides that should they come to the table, the postal strike could be settled in a matter of hours. I hope that is the course to which the government will direct its attention.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, if I may reply to the first question raised by the hon. gentleman, I would like to suggest very strongly that not only would it be impossible to transport, sort, forward and distribute large volumes of mail through these tiny rural offices, but an effort to move national mail through these centres could be interpreted as encouraging strike-breaking on the part of another bargaining unit, and that, of course, is something the government does not want to do.

As far as the second question is concerned, I can reassure the hon. gentleman that the minister is very much in sympathy with the hardships caused in rural communities by the postal strike, and we will attempt to continue to provide as much local mail service as possible through our rural offices to reduce these burdens. We will continue to monitor the situation on a daily basis to ensure that our responses are the most appropriate for that particular time.

Unfortunately, when legal work stoppages occur by one of the postal groups, the end result is often insufficient mail volumes to justify continued employment of all other postal employees. Thus, with the current strike of inside postal workers, the letter carriers as well as others have had to be placed on off-duty status. The minister sincerely hopes that the parties can resume negotiations in the near future and settle this postal disruption before the burden of the strike affects any additional Canadians.

Adjournment Debate

POST OFFICE—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON POSTAL STRIKE. (A) SUSPENSION OF RIGHT TO STRIKE

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my topic this evening as well is the Post Office and the current strike to which all Canadians are being subjected. As we all know, the right to strike within the Post Office and other essential government services was granted by a Liberal government in 1967. since then a dozen or more strikes have taken place within the Post Office itself, nearly one per year. In fact, since 1975, in the last six years, seven strikes within the Post Office, have taken place; in other words, more than one in each year, and all those strikes under Liberal government administration.

Yet today we find ourselves faced with inconsistency on the part of the front benches and of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau); inconsistencies such as this: During the 1978 postal strike which the Liberal government legislated "back to work", the postmaster general at the time said "when an individual right becomes a public wrong, Parliament should terminate the dispute. That was less than three years ago. Last week the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) of this same government said, in so far as legislating postal workers back to work is concerned, "I think if you are saying you have to legislate, then you are saying there should not be a right to strike". I am paraphrasing. That is the inconsistency. The government legislated the postal workers back to work after a stoppage of work of one day in 1978. Today the government is saying that perhaps it will let them strike all summer.

I have another quotation by the Prime Minister of just last Monday. When asked about legislating the Canadian Union of Postal Workers back to work, he said, "we cannot legislate CUPW back to work because they will disobey the order". That is probably one of the most ridiculous statements made by any prime minister or politician. If he is afraid to legislate a law because someone would disobey it, we should not have any laws at all.

That same Prime Minister of that quotation a week ago said today, in response to a question dealing with legislating the postal workers back to work, "we cannot legislate CUPW back to work because that is what they want." That is a total inconsistency within a week. I submit that these are political games.

Canadians are hurt badly by any essential service strike, but particularly by this strike. In 1978 the interest rates small businessmen had to pay were between 7 per cent and 10 per cent. They have to borrow money when they cannot depend on day to day mail delivery. Small businesses depend on day to day mail delivery for their cash flow. Today that interest rate is 20 per cent. Small businesses are paying somewhere around 21 per cent, 22 per cent and perhaps 23 per cent, and the government is sitting back and saying, "We cannot deal with the situation because we must be fair." Yet all the reports, including one by Judge Rene Marin's commission of inquiry, have concluded that there are serious problems within the Post Office. For example, the Post Office has a deficit this year of $457 million. The study estimated an annual loss due to theft, arson and vandalism in excess of $4.3 million. For example, between 1975 and 1979, $10 million in government cheques were lost in the mail.

One of the demands CUPW is making is that there not be cameras to show people stealing and vandalizing, but that is what they have been doing, according to the report by Judge Rene Marin. I believe the government should start being consistent and start being tough with the union because the union's demands go beyond its needs. Even according to the union, the monetary problems have been solved, yet the union is trying to hold the Canadian public to ransom. It is doing just that, and Canadian industry is losing to the tune of nearly $10 million a day. Unemployment is affecting nearly 10,000 workers a week as a result of the postal strike. Businesses are dropping like dead flies off the ceiling through bankruptcy as a result of being robbed of the essential service of day to day mail delivery.

I am not suggesting that we should eliminate the right to strike in essential services right across the board, although that is the wish of the majority of Canadians. However, I believe we should suspend the right to strike in essential services until this government has stopped dealing in an ad hoc, hit and miss way with postal strikes and with strikes in other essential service sectors. The right to strike should be suspended until this government has come up with a policy to reduce the number of strikes and the possibility of strikes taking place in the essential sectors of our economy. It should introduce legislation dealing with sector bargaining, for example, or providing that at least 51 per cent of the rank and file members vote in favour of a strike, instead of just a select few who speak on behalf of all 23,000 postal employees.

Perhaps the government should introduce such legislation as the Taft-Hartly Act in the United States which would postpone a strike date by 60 days until negotiations can take place.

In closing my remarks this evening I urge the government to take specific action in this matter and to stop dealing with these very serious strike situations in this country on an ad hoc basis. The government should come up with a full-fledged, long-term policy which would at least reduce the hardships which are being faced by all Canadians as a result of strikes in essential services in this country.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I point out to the hon. gentleman opposite that although the legislation he referred to was introduced by a Liberal administration in 1967, it was passed with the support of all three parties of this House.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kelly: That is something he should remember. He should remember too that the Public Service Staff Relations Act created 80 bargaining units, each of which have the option of choosing one of two dispute resolution methodologies, either of which the employer must accept. There is no option whatsoever on the part of the employer. One dispute resolution method is final binding arbitration; the other is known as the conciliation-strike method.

● (2225)

The Public Service Staff Relations Act imposes an additional requirement on groups which choose this latter strike method. The additional requirement is that members of the group who perform duties necessary in the interests of the safety and security of the public do not have the right to strike. However, to date, and I would point this out very strongly to the hon. member opposite, there has been no contention that the inside workers of the Post Office have duties which are necessary in the interest of the safety and security of the public. Specifically, then, the inside workers of the Post Office are a group that the Public Service Staff Relations Act envisaged as having the right to bargain collectively and engage in strike action if necessary to resolve a dispute with their employer.

I should also like to take this opportunity to correct a misbelief held by some that Treasury Board or the government selects the chairman of the conciliation board. The truth is that unless the parties, in this case Treasury Board and CUPW, agree on a chairman, he or she is appointed by the chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

It should also be made clear that while the recommendations of a conciliation board chairman can be useful in assisting the parties to settle their differences, they are in no way binding on either party. For example, it is not unknown for one party or the other to reject a conciliation board report even, when one's own nominee has concurred with the recommendation.

In the present dispute, we have CUPW insisting that the employer accept without reservation the recommendations of the conciliation board chairman as a prerequisite to resuming negotiations to obtain further concessions which the chairman has not recommended. Mr. Speaker, the parties themselves must resolve this dispute. It may be that goal can be facilitated by the presence of a mediator, but it will not be facilitated by continuing the imminent possibility of back to work legislation. The sooner both parties realize it is their responsibility to achieve a settlement, the sooner a settlement will be achieved.

This is not to say that given a reasonable time to achieve this objective, the government would not act decisively to end the dispute if the continuation of the strike began to create a severe emergency. Everything that can be done will be done, Mr. Speaker, but the emphasis must be on the parties achieving a voluntary settlement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

At 10.27 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

POST OFFICE

CONDEMNATION OF CREATION OF TWO TYPES OF POSTAL SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgency. In light of the fact that the government has established a double standard for postal delivery during the current strike, a standard which promotes subsidized courier service for wealthy clients of the Post Office, and because such service has not been made available to small business clients, most of whom have had to resort to courier dispatch at their own expense; nor has such a service been offered to lower income or needy Canadians, a growing and great majority of the population, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek):

That the government be soundly condemned for creating two types of postal service in Canada, one for the rich and another for the poor.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POSTAL STRIKE—CALL FOR RESTORATION OF SERVICE TO ALL CANADIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the Government of Canada has chosen to violate its own postal monopoly by contracting with private couriers to provide continued Priority Post services to favoured customers, and whereas many direct mail businesses, such as World Wide Industries of Richmond, British Columbia, are faced with laying off hundreds of employees immediately as a consequence of the government's incompetent tolerance of the national postal strike, I move under Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the government admit to the catastrophe which it is causing for thousands of small businesses and their employees, and that it take immediate action to restore postal services to all Canadians, instead of giving favoured status only to wealthy customers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

INVESTMENT PRACTICES OF ALBERTA GOVERNMENT'S HERITAGE FUND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton-Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas some great Canadian companies such as Petro-Canada, Dome, Seagram and the CDC are showing their faith in the entrepreneurial spirit by Canadianizing the petrochemical industry through astute business takeovers, and whereas the Alberta government has seen fit to invest its Heritage Fund in no risk, low yield bonds, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. Campbell):

That this House condemns the Alberta government and its Premier for not investing its energy royalties in the future of Canada's oil and gas industry.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL STRIKE EFFECT ON FLORISTS—CALL FOR RESTORATION OF SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) himself has confirmed that before the current postal strike the Post Office made a sweetheart deal with its rich so-called priority clients to provide them with mail delivery during the strike at rates subsidized by the taxpayer. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney):

That the government move immediately to ensure normal postal service at normal rates for all Canadians, including the thousands of flower shops across Canada, such as "Hearts and Flowers" and others in Charlottetown, P.E.I., for whom the strike is especially critical because they receive most of their orders by phone and, therefore, rely on the mails for payment.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

CALL FOR INSTITUTION OF MADE-IN-CANADA INTEREST RATE POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during his trip to Washington indicate that he now thinks that interest rates are too high, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House directs the Prime Minister to practise what he preaches and initiate a made-in-Canada interest rate policy to protect farmers, small businesses and home owners instead of merely waiting for Washington to do something about it.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL STRIKE—ACCEPTANCE OF MEDIATOR BY BOTH PARTIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, I rise under the usual provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Canadian Union of Postal Workers has accepted a federally appointed mediator, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. MacBain):

That this House congratulates both sides in the postal dispute for demonstrating good sense despite the interference of members of the opposition who have hampered negotiations by advocating that Parliament legislate an end to the strike, and that this House begs those members from the Conservative benches who advocate greater government interference and tinkering and regulation, to keep their noses out of this matter.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DEMAND FOR RESTORATION OF SERVICE TO SMALL BUSINESSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that yesterday's revelation of the offer made by Canada Post prior to the postal strike guaranteeing the delivery of mail for big businesses and financial institutions, subsidized by the taxpayer, only further confirms the government's complete disregard for the difficulty that this postal disruption imposes on the small business sector and other Canadians not considered as priority clients by the Post Office, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

• (1410)

That this House instruct the government to take immediate steps to ensure that the small business sector and other Canadians most unable to absorb the costs and hardships of this current round of essential service disruptions be guaranteed regular mail delivery at normal rates and, failing this, that the government at least allow small businesses to suspend remittance of employee income tax deductions, pension plan contributions and UIC premiums until full postal service has been restored.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EFFECT OF STRIKE ON SERVICES PROVIDED BY PHYSICIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. At the present time a physician in my constituency is facing a very serious problem in administering to his patients, many of whom are required to take correctional pain therapy using special medicines obtained from Germany, the United States, Toronto and Vancouver, and his supplies for these patients are held up in the mails. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the government make arrangements forthwith to effect the delivery of these urgent medicines at all physicians similarly affected in Canada, preferably by the immediate restoration of full mail service.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ADMINISTRATION

MANITOBA REPRESENTATION IN CABINET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, small businesses in greater Winnipeg and in Manitoba in general are suffering from very serious cash flow problems brought about by the present postal strike. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), the only minister in the federal cabinet from Manitoba, is not returning calls from affected small businesses, nor is he prepared to state his position in reference to the strike.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That the Prime Minister appoint a new member to his cabinet who will be responsive to the needs of the people of Manitoba, answer his telephone calls and assist in a return to normal postal service for the small businesses of Manitoba, not just for the rich corporations as is the case presently.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

CALL FOR RESTORATION OF FULL SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Madam Speaker, small enterprises with business dependent on a functioning Canadian postal service, such as Beaven's Custom Cannery in Summerland, B.C., and the businessmen of Oliver, B.C., who have expressed their distress through the Oliver Chamber of Commerce, all demand resumption of service. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer):

That the Postmaster General instruct the Canada Post Office to demonstrate the same concern for small-town customers as it has done for its larger, city-based customers to whom it offered priority service at normal rates during any work stoppage, by moving resolutely to restore full postal service.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR RESTORATION OF ORDINARY MAIL SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Post Office is honouring its contract with the rich and wealthy who can afford other methods of mail delivery but doing absolutely nothing about the mail for the rest of the people, and whereas small businesses, ranchers and farmers must pay their employees, make instalment payments on income taxes, etc., etc.—in other words, they must have a cash flow or go under—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish):

That this House urges the Prime Minister to get off his arrogant perch, give some consideration to the every-day people for a change, and restore ordinary mail service for everybody, not just the rich.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PENSIONS

CALL FOR LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE PENSIONS TO ALL HOMEMAKER SPOUSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett), I move:

That this House urges the government, in view of its stated recognition of the role of spouses working in the home, to bring before the House legislation to provide pensions for all homemaker spouses, in their own right, equivalent to those earned by contributors to the Canada Pension Plan, thus recognizing in full, for pension purposes, the contribution to our society made by those who work in the home.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

POSTAL STRIKE—OFFER SENT TO PRIORITY POST CUSTOMERS

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. I should start by indicating that we on this side of the House are extremely glad to see that both sides have accepted the proposal to return to bargaining if the mediator is successful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1415)

Mr. Bosley: I might say it is extremely doubtful the government would have even offered to go to mediation unless the House were sitting this week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, the Postmaster General yesterday indicated he was not even aware of an offer made June 29, before the strike began, by management in his department who sent a letter to Priority Post customers, those rich enough to afford it. That letter guaranteed normal service at normal rates during the strike, with any additional costs incurred to be borne by the government. I repeat that the minister said yesterday he was not aware of it.

Could the Postmaster General please explain to this House how he justifies guaranteeing and subsidizing mail delivery for the rich and powerful, while he ignores or, worse, bankrupts ordinary Canadians?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, let me say that I totally disapprove of the line taken by the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Crosbie: I guess you do.

Mr. Ouellet: —yesterday, and by the hon. member today in saying we divide the service and give different treatment of various kinds of Canadians. It is absolutely untrue and unfounded that we are subsidizing the rich in this country in relation to postal services.

Miss MacDonald: Only part of the time.

Mr. Ouellet: The reality is quite the contrary, Madam Speaker. We, as a government, took every step necessary to assure pensioners, indeed every Canadian who receives social benefit cheques, that they will receive them despite the strike. Indeed, we are subsidizing those services for those in need in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ouellet: Secondly, we have a service called Priority Post which is addressed not only to the rich and to large firms in Canada, but to a number of Canadian businessmen, large, medium and small. They are paying a premium price for that type of service, on which the Post Office has made a good profit in the past and hopes to do so in the future.

The Post Office has taken every step to protect its clients, to keep them rather than to lose them to private couriers. And I want to say, Madam Speaker, despite the heckling on the other side by those who do not want to listen to the answer, that we are not subsidizing the rich. We are doing our utmost to keep a profitable service for the Post Office, one which brings in substantial revenue, and we intend to continue to do that despite this very regrettable line taken by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday.

NEED FOR RESTORATION OF FULL SERVICE

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): We are now in a position, Madam Speaker, where the Postmaster General finally admits that he has indeed maintained services for those parts of the system which he describes as profitable, while leaving everyone else who depends on the mail to hang out to dry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, I would like to get an answer to a question we asked last week. In defence of not bringing in back to work legislation, the answer we were given was that any strike, anywhere, is bound to hurt someone. Now that we know whom the government will hurt and whom it will protect, will the Postmaster General please tell this House how long he intends to continue a practice such as this before he will recognize that the public interest is not just those who can afford courier services or Priority Post, and that thousands of ordinary Canadians desperately need their mail contract honoured and their mail service restored?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, only a few days ago, on July 7, the hon. member for Provencher asked me whether we would attempt to maintain postal services in the small rural post offices in Canada. I told him then that of course we would try as much as possible to maintain services in those small post offices since the government is committed to deliver pension cheques, family allowances cheques and various social security cheques to the most needy Canadians. Notwithstanding the Progressive Conservative opposition, we will try to honour the contracts we have signed with Canadian companies—large, medium-sized or small—which use the Priority Post and pay a high price for that service.

REQUEST THAT SERVICE BE RESTORED BEFORE ECONOMIC SUMMIT MEETINGS COMMENCE

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, my final question is directed to the Postmaster General who at least finally has the honesty to admit that he is trying to divide postal customers into two classes—first class and the rest of us.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bosley: Since the government is headed by a gentleman who presumes these days to roam the world telling the rich nations that next week's economic summit meeting should focus on help for the poor nations, will the Postmaster General guarantee to ordinary Canadians that the Government of Canada will practise in Canada what it preaches abroad, that normal service at normal rates for all will be restored before next week's summit meeting, not just a continuation of the service for those who are least hurt and can afford a strike the most?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, in my opinion this persiflage simply does not help solve the current labour dispute. The irresponsible attitude of the Leader of the Opposition and of the hon. member for Don Valley West can only encourage the Canadian Union of Postal Workers not to return to the bargaining table and not to negotiate a new collective agreement. If our negotiations with the postal workers have not progressed very far until now, the fault lies with the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Don Valley West, Madam Speaker, who rather than say—

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Balderdash!

Mr. Kempling: You are silly.

Mr. Huntington: Nonsense!

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, when we say the truth to members of the opposition, they start yakking and yakking because they do not like it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: I would invite the minister to complete his answer.

Mr. Ouellet: To my mind, Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition was taken in by Mr. Parrot. Instead of urging the postal employes to accept our offer of $25,000, he led them to believe that he would force the government to legislate them back to work. In my opinion, when it comes to irresponsibility, the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition puts him on the same level as Mr. Jean-Claude Parrot.

ADVICE FOR PEOPLE WHO CANNOT AFFORD PRIORITY POST

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, a government which would provide postal service to the corporate elite during a legal strike can hardly be called responsible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Neither can that be construed as being conducive to successful labour negotiations. I want to ask the Postmaster General, who has the responsibility here, what advice he has for the thousands of Canadians who cannot afford Priority Post, who cannot afford this special privilege service, but who, as Canadians, are entitled to equal treatment from their Post Office? What advice does he have for these Canadians who are—

Some hon. Members: Louder, louder!

Mr. McGrath: If it is necessary to get the message across, I will yell louder. What advice does the Postmaster General have for the thousands of Canadians who are being forced to close the doors of their small businesses and to lay off their employees because they cannot afford this elitist Priority Post service?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1425)

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. member for St. John's East has asked this question because I can tell him that, in fact, Priority Post customers include a number of small businessmen from Newfoundland.

Mr. Siddon: Name them.

Mr. Ouellet: They include prescription optical suppliers, photographic dealers, small retail stores, drug companies, logging equipment dealers, television and stereo dealers, rental suppliers, and a small butler from Newfoundland. All of these businessmen, who are not large companies, are depending on a service for which they pay much more than 17 cents a letter. They are paying dollars for this type of service. These are services from which the Post Office is making a profit and from which we hope to make a profit in the future; but with the help of the Conservative party the future of Crown corporation is being destroyed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: It is no wonder that the Post Office has deficits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, it is incredible that the Postmaster General of Canada would stand in his place and espouse a position which says that "if you are prepared to pay the price we will give you the service". That is the line he is taking in this House. I say to him that there are people in this country who cannot afford to pay his price for postal service and by the thousands they are wiring members of Parliament every day because they are going out of business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EQUITY OF TREATMENT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, the Postmaster General has had experience in this area. He knows that the acceptance of mediation does not necessarily lead to the bargaining table. We are now into the third week of this costly strike. What is the minister prepared to do to ensure equity of treatment to Canadians who are suffering? What is he prepared to do for these people, since he is evidently prepared to serve the corporate elite who are well able to sit out this strike?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the very reason we can keep this service going is because Priority Post normally goes directly from the customer to the nearest transportation point. It does not go through the Post Office and there is no sorting involved. This is a service which has been in existence for years that permits clients who wish to enter into a contract with the Post Office to have their mail picked up at their place of business and be delivered directly to another point. We have been able to perform this service for a number of years, and we hope to continue performing it.

The consequence of the irresponsibility of the Leader of the Opposition and of some of his colleagues has probably made it impossible to continue the performance of this service.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has asked me for my advice to settle the current dispute. The answer we can give to the public who are suffering from the strike is that there is a possibility to have a negotiated settlement between the parties involved. A mediator will be appointed and, hopefully, members of the opposition party will remove themselves from this conflict and not put their noses in it, allowing the parties to negotiate, rather than intervening very negatively in the way they have been doing thus far.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

DEFICIT ON MANUFACTURED PRODUCTS—FUTURE OF BUDD COMPANY IN KITCHENER, ONT.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I would have asked a question of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but I will ask it of the Minister of State for Trade. I think he would be interested in it. As he knows, we are suffering a considerable deficit on manufactured products. There are two situations currently being carried on in Canada which further erode our trade position.

First of all, will the minister look into the persistent rumour that Budd automotive of Kitchener will close, and that the frames it makes for mid-sized cars will be brought into Canada from a U.S. manufacturer? Will the minister bring to the attention of General Motors the fact that the trade balance on manufactured products is at an all-time high, in terms of a deficit to Canada, and that the auto pact requires that a fair share be manufactured in this country, and we will not accept the decision to close Budd?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (Trade)): Madam Speaker, since the domestic automobile industry comes under the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I am not aware of the specific instance alleged by the hon. member. I will discuss that with the minister upon his return to the House. I do hope, though, that the hon. member has noticed, in the last couple of months, that a Canadian automobile company, General Motors, assisted by the Government of Canada, negotiated the largest transaction in a foreign market for automobiles in the history of Canada. That was a $100 million plus deal: a sale of 13,500 cars to Iraq.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, that information will be invaluable, I am sure, given the fact that all of the frames for all of the cars will be manufactured in the United States. That is really a silly answer.

CROSS-BORDER TRANSFER OF PRODUCTS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Now let me ask the minister a question in relation to yet another very difficult situation. Wabco, located in Stoney Creek, has been on strike for nine weeks. There have been no meetings. The parent company in the United States is filling every single order in Canada from its U.S. parent facility. Will the minister look into how it can be that companies can so easily transfer their products across the border, thus undermining the Canadian public, undermining the Canadian employees, and undermining Canada's economy at the same time?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (Trade)): Madam Speaker, I want to correct a statement that the hon. member just made. One of the reasons that Canada was able to obtain that contract with Iraq was the fact that we guaranteed that those cars would be manufactured and assembled here in Canada, and not in the United States. That is the reason we got a contract.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lumley: With respect to the second part of the hon. member's statement, I will confer with my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL STRIKE—DURATION OF HARDSHIP

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General, who is now getting briefed by the President of the Treasury Board on what the postal strike is all about.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Yesterday he knew nothing about the letter with respect to Priority Post. Today he is an expert. In 1978, after one day, the Postmaster General brought in legislation mandating the CUPW back to work. This year he is talking about extending the strike for an indefinite period. Since he is applying a double standard—the Post Office is now in effect providing a service for the wealthy of this nation and not for the average citizen, the pensioner, the poor and the rural person—how long does the Postmaster General think the hardships, which the Prime Minister acknowledged yesterday were being endured by the average citizen in Canada, can be allowed to continue? Does he believe, as does the President of the Treasury Board, that this strike can continue all summer until Parliament reconvenes in the fall, or is it his opinion that some action will have to be taken within a reasonable period of time? He knows that if it was not for the action taken by our party, there would be no development in terms of mediation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The only reason they are back is because of our side.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I would like to indicate to the hon. member that, if he insists on talking about double standards, I will remind him that the government has taken every step to deliver the socioeconomics cheques free to all of the pensioners and the recipients. In this regard the Post Office has worked out an agreement with the letter carriers and with other unions of the Post Office to make sure that these cheques will be delivered. Therefore, indeed, we are doing this free of charge to our customers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Who are your customers?

Mr. Ouellet: When we give information, the Conservative members of Parliament do not like that. The other service that the hon. member talks about is a service for which customers pay a much higher price than 17 cents. There is, indeed, a big difference between the two, and the government makes no apologies for having taken every step to make sure that the poor of this country will continue to receive their cheques through the services of postal employees.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ouellet: In relation to the second part of the question—

Madam Speaker: Order. There has to be some kind of limit to answers.

MINISTER'S VIEW ON LENGTH OF STRIKE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, on the basis of the answer of the Postmaster General we now know what he is, but we do not know what the price is. I want to ask the Postmaster General a supplementary question in terms of his statements in 1978, where he said the government staunchly believed that public interest must override personal interest, and it was a fundamental belief of the government that when an individual's right becomes a public wrong action has to be taken. I want to ask the Postmaster General, as the person who has responsibility for the Post Office, and in view of the Prime Minister's admission yesterday that there are widespread effects of this strike on the average citizen, how long does he anticipate that this strike will be able to proceed. Will he answer that simple question, or does he think that that matter is not of enough importance to the Postmaster General of this country? How long can we wait for a settlement?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, there is one thing that I could say in answering this: as long as the opposition is going to stay in Parliament, with the type of questions it is putting, there will be absolutely no settlement, because—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: —their attitude is fuelling the conflict and the confrontation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ouellet: I can predict, for the hon. member, that the minute that the union membership, and particularly the union leader, understand that there will be no way out for them via legislation to bring them back to work, they will then understand that the only course for them to follow is to go back to the table to negotiate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ouellet: We hope that this will become very clear in the coming hours, and that they will realize that there will be no legislation, and that they will then be able to go back to the table and negotiate with the Treasury Board nominees who are waiting for them 24 hours a day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL REVENUE

COLLECTION OF TAXES FROM SMALL BUSINESSES—EFFECT OF POSTAL STRIKE

Mr. Jack Burghardt (London West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. As the minister is well aware, because of the postal strike many small businesses are experiencing cash flow difficulties. Would the government be prepared to assist some of these businesses by relaxing the collection of federal funds such as sales tax, income tax deductions and the like from these affected businesses?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, my department is quite aware of the difficulties that small businessmen find themselves in at the present time. I have been consulting with my colleague, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. I can assure the hon. member that we have been in touch with the Canadian Federation of Independent Businessmen, and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and that we will be treating remittances on an individual basis.

● (1440)

I can assure small business of every possible latitude under the law. We understand their difficulties and will be taking them into consideration. There are arrangements for them to make their payments at chartered banks or offices of my department across the country. We will provide every possible latitude under the law.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PAYMENT OF INTEREST ON CREDIT CARD ACCOUNTS DURING POSTAL STRIKE

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs but it touches on the minister's responsibility as Postmaster General so it will give him a real chance to show whether he is prepared to treat all Canadians fairly.

My question is in connection with what people are to do about interest charges on their credit card accounts during the postal strike. In view of the fact that only two provinces, Quebec and Alberta, have laws which protect consumers from paying interest charges until they know what the particulars are, can the minister say whether the federal government is considering any federal consumer protection law which will give all Canadians a chance to avoid paying interest on credit card accounts during the postal strike?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, this question re-opens the issue of whether it would be appropriate to have federal legislation in the area of consumer credit. The hon. member will recall that a few years ago, the liberal government introduced such a bill, which was then strongly criticized by the Progressive Conservative Party. If the hon. member can assure me that his party has changed its mind in this regard and that the Conservatives now have a new policy in this area, it would be very interesting to discuss this, and we could perhaps introduce a similar bill to the one which we put forward a few years ago to protect all Canadian borrowers.

[English]

REQUEST THAT MINISTER INTERCEDE WITH BANKS AND CREDIT CARD COMPANIES

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, the minister may be aware that the banks, considering themselves under federal legislation, are ignoring the two provinces where consumer protection laws are in place. We need something much stronger. We need something from the federal point of view, which will apply to all Canadians. In the meantime will the minister intercede with the banks and credit card companies on behalf of many unwitting consumers across the country who have been nailed by high interest rates, and ask them to forestall interest charges on overdue accounts on the understanding that they will be paid in full within 30 days upon restoration of mail service in the country?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I know that several of my colleagues are concerned about this issue. I shall certainly refer the suggestion made by the hon. member to the Minister of Finance, but I understand that the Minister respnsible for Small Businesses and the Minister of State (Finance) have already examined the matter.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CABINET CONSIDERATION OF COMMITTEE REPORT UPON CHILDREN'S NEEDS

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and I hope that the Minister of Justice will return for my supplementary question.

I assume that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has now had time to read the report of the health and welfare committee which was tabled last week, containing urgent recommendations for federal action on behalf of Canada's children. Particularly since the summer is upon us and we are fearful that this report will be buried, will the minister tell the House when this report will go to cabinet and what action she intends to take, personally, particularly with regard to establishing a children's bureau or secretariat that will advocate on behalf of Canada's children?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I am now examining the report which was tabled in the House of Commons only at the end of last week, and unfortunately, since the House is still sitting this week, we have had to cancel today a working meeting scheduled for this afternoon. It will take us a few weeks to put into practice the various recommendations, evaluate them, examine the costs, and so on, and it will not be possible to report to the House immediately.

[English]

REQUEST THAT MINISTER TAKE CHARGE OF PROGRAMS FOR CHILDREN

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the Minister of Justice in his capacity as Minister of State for Social Development. In our view Canada's children deserve an independent minister who will be their advocate and will report directly to cabinet, and will provide an independent budget for a children's bureau. Since the main function of the ministry of social development has been to cut back on social welfare programs rather than to initiate new programs such as are required for children, will the minister tell the House if he agrees with the recommendations of the health and welfare committee that he, himself, should be in charge of programs for children? If so, what does he intend to do to improve the lot of Canada's children?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I have nothing to add to what the Minister of National Health and Welfare has replied. The report was received last week and we are in the process of studying it.

FISHERIES

LIMITATION ON SIZE OF REPLACEMENT VESSELS

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In view of the fact that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans uses fish stock quotas as a management tool in the Atlantic fisheries and has publicly expressed its commitment to improving the quality of Canada's fish products, why has the minister decided to implement a policy of limiting the size of replacement vessels to the size of those they replace, when this policy can be shown to be an inefficient fisheries management tool and will limit fishermen's ability to adopt technological improvements which may require larger vessels, and therefore actually interfere with the department's policy of improving the quality of catches?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, it is a well known fact for those who follow these matters, as I am sure the hon. member does, that the catching capacity considerably exceeds the biological capacity of our oceans. We are endeavouring to keep some control over the expansion of the fisheries.

There are some cases, however, where it would not be logical to maintain a foot-by-foot replacement policy. Following representations by a good number of members on both sides of the House, in particular on this side, I have asked my regional directors to look at where adjustment can be made and a tolerance be acceptable which in fact does not so much increase the capacity of catching as the quality enhancement of the catch.

POST OFFICE

DELIVERY OF TAX REBATE CHEQUES TO YUKON RESIDENTS

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Postmaster General. Approximately 1,000 tax rebate cheques for residents of the Yukon are held up in the Vancouver district taxation office. These northern residents cannot receive delivery of their cheques. Just today in question period the Postmaster General reconfirmed the delivery of socioeconomic cheques to Canadians. The government has therefore made arrangements for delivery of UI cheques and pension cheques. What arrangement has the Postmaster General made for delivery of tax rebate cheques?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, as I answered in the House last week, we have made arrangements for taking the refund cheques from the offices of my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, and distributing them to our district taxation offices across the country. Unfortunately we do not have those in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. I am consulting with the Minister of Supply and Services to see if there is some way we can efficiently do that. It is not as easy, though, because of the way refund cheques are processed. They are processed in a much different way from the normal social security transfer payments. I am actively working to see if we can come up with a means of doing that. In the meantime, if there is an emergency situation and somebody needs a cheque for an emergency, then I think we can find ways and means of getting it for them.

TELEGRAM OFFERING SERVICES OF YUKON GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Yes, Madam Speaker, there is an emergency when 1,000 residents of the Yukon are waiting for cheques. They are now paying 20 per cent at the bank for money. That is the emergency.

In view of the fact that the district office of the minister's department in Whitehorse was closed, and therefore those cheques cannot now be distributed from that point, the hon. Chris Pearson, leader of the government of the Yukon, has telexed to the minister offering any employee of his government, any service and any office, in order that those cheques can be distributed. What has the minister replied to Mr. Pearson? What arrangements have been made?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I have not seen that telegram, but when I do see it I will be glad to respond and take Mr. Pearson up on any offer to which we can reasonably respond.

Oral Questions

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—RELOCATION OF RUNWAYS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Last year a study entitled "The Winnipeg Area Airport System Study" was completed by the Department of Transport. It indicated that two of the existing runways at Winnipeg International Airport would be moved as part of a key expansion program for the whole aerospace program in Manitoba. That of course, will fit in with the location of the $14 million hangar that is going to be established by PWA and some 50 additional jobs as the start of an expanded role for Manitoba's aerospace industry. Will the minister indicate whether his department has given the go ahead for the movement of these runways so that this aspect of the Manitoba aerospace industry can go ahead and, hopefully, we in Manitoba can have more jobs in the aerospace industry?

● (1450)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Yes, Madam Speaker. I am glad the hon. member prefaced his question the way he did, because there is a master plan for the Winnipeg airport. It is the result of ample consultations with the public. Everyone was invited to come and make his case. In this master plan, an area is reserved for hangars. The PWA company has not found that location to be convenient to its own use. For a number of months the discussions have been going on between my officials and Mr. Eyton. I am a bit hesitant because I have received conflicting information. I have a confirmation from the airline that no agreement has been reached and consequently they will delay construction of the hangar. However, I have an indication from the government of Manitoba that PWA will now agree to build the hangar on the west side. If my friend will be patient I will attempt to find out who is right and who is wrong in this matter, and report to him urgently.

EXPANSION OF AEROSPACE INDUSTRY IN MANITOBA

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): I think the Minister of Transport will probably find in his investigation that the position the Manitoba government has taken is closest to being the correct position. He should keep uppermost in his mind the fact that it is more than a question of moving runways and a question of noise which was talked about in the report. What is involved at the present time is an expansion of the aerospace industry in the province of Manitoba. That is the key. That is the area the minister and his department should zero in on and everything should be done to facilitate that area.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, we have already zeroed in on that a number of times with great sympathy and eagerness in order to ensure that the economic advantage goes to Winnipeg and Manitoba. At the same time, you cannot simply for the sake of that specific project, however important it appears, say that the master plan goes out the window, and kill the efforts which have been made over a period of time to determine the best way in which the Winnipeg airport should be developed. It is a balance between advantages and disadvantages, as we so often find in life.

INCOME TAX

TAX AUDIT OF NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERMEN—TELEGRAM SENT BY UNION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): My question is for the Minister of National Revenue. The minister knows that the fishery in Newfoundland to date this year is not very favourable. On June 23, in connection with tax assessments on fishermen, he told me that 1,457 fishermen in Newfoundland had received 50 per cent garnishees of all their earnings. He said that 50 per cent had been contacted in order to enter into reasonable arrangements for payment. The minister received a telegram from the Newfoundland Fishermen, Food and Allied Workers Union on Friday last advising him that the department is still automatically requiring a 50 per cent payment of all fishermen's earnings, despite their repeated representations and hardship cases. They say they are unable to get any favourable reaction from National Revenue. Will the minister advise what action has been taken by his department in view of this telegram from the union, which represents nearly all of the Newfoundland inshore fishermen?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I have received a representation from the Newfoundland federation of fishermen. I and my officials will be meeting with the union tomorrow morning to go into the matter in some depth and to see what exactly is the problem. I repeat that we are not firm at all on the 50 per cent garnishee. We have come to arrangements with individual fishermen when it has been brought to our attention. We want to treat each individual case as a separate case, and treat each one on its merits. There is no across the board policy that everyone must pay a 50 per cent garnishee. I will be meeting with the union tomorrow morning, and hopefully as a result of that we can clarify these difficulties.

MEASURES TO ASSIST INDIVIDUALS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, the government is unable to deliver the mail but it certainly appears determined to collect its taxes. In view of the remarks by the minister earlier today that he is going to take steps to see that small business and the like affected by the postal strike will not have to make their tax payments on time and pay the interest penalties as a result of that,—I presume that is what he is arranging, and the interest is at least 12 to 14 per cent if you are not paying your taxes—will the minister let the House know tomorrow or the next day what steps he has taken to stop this very severe treatment of taking over 50 per cent of the gross earnings of the fishermen in Newfoundland who admittedly must owe taxes or this would not be a proper legal procedure? Also, will he report what steps he is taking to relieve them as well as the small business community from some of these burdens? Will he inform the House later in the week just what steps are being taken?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): With regard to individual fishermen, Madam Speaker, if the hon. member has individual problems where fishermen have been assessed and they find it an undue burden, will he contact me personally, let me know what they are, and give me a list of names? I will ensure that my people are in touch with them directly in order to reach an adequate pay-back period with them.

PIPELINES

ALASKA GAS PIPELINE—FINANCING OF PROJECT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The minister knows that the pipeline consortium which proposed to build the Alaska highway natural gas pipeline is trying to get financing in the United States. Yesterday in Anchorage, Alaska, James Edwards, the Energy Secretary in the United States, was quoted as saying that the Reagan administration:

—"has some real concerns" about asking U.S. consumers to pay for current construction on the project's Canadian leg regardless of whether the most difficult segment across Alaska is ever completed.

The article further states that this, and I quote:

—is the first clear cut indication the White House opposes major elements of the financing package the pipeline's backers are developing.

The government promised that it had guarantees from the United States. It promised that Canadians would not end up paying for what is essentially an American pipeline. I would like to ask the minister about these ironclad guarantees and what he is going to do about the fact that it appears the Americans are backing out slightly with regard to their support for this pipeline.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I understand that the Prime Minister discussed this issue with the President on July 10. The discussion was positive. The President reaffirmed the commitments which he made during his visit here in March. We expect amendments to be introduced in the American Congress shortly which will attend to this matter.

QUERY RESPECTING EXPORT OF CANADIAN GAS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, with respect to that conversation with the United States the Canadian Press story reports, and I quote:

Reagan assured Trudeau the United States is "deeply interested in coming to an arrangement" about reducing acid rain, but said only that the administration "will continue to examine" problems associated with the pipeline.

That does not sound very positive or ironclad. Is the minister now prepared to say to President Reagan, Secretary Edwards and the U.S. administration, that unless they are prepared to help with legislation in the United States—and we all want to see the whole pipeline built—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: Maybe my friends don't, but if they will just listen—that the Canadian government is prepared to cut off at some point the exports of Canadian gas through the prebuild, that it is not open ended, that we will cut that off if the American government is not prepared to pass legislation in the United States to support the financing of the whole line?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the presidential assurances during the visit in March were given not only to the Prime Minister privately but, to my recollection, they were given in this very chamber and, I presume, heard by the hon. member. We are satisfied with the tone and content of our negotiations with the Americans on this subject at the present time.

• (1500)

SUGGESTED CANADIAN ACTION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I have one final question. It is all very well for the minister to say that, and we heard the President. The fact is that here is James Edwards saying these things yesterday in Alaska, and we know of the conversation with Prime Minister Trudeau.

The American government has said it does not want American consumers to shoulder the burden of building a pipeline, part of which is the rest of the Canadian section. The minister must know that if we build that section and the Americans do not complete theirs, then the Canadian taxpayer will lose some $2 billion to $8 billion. What is he prepared to say to the Americans, beyond just saying in this House that we have some jelly-like assurances? What is he prepared to say? I would suggest something he can say. Will he say: We will not give you cheap Canadian gas unless you give us some guarantees that you are going to do something about building this whole line?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member seems to misunderstand the tenor of our present negotiations with the United States. As I mentioned in my answer to his first question, we expect a package of legislative amendments to be introduced in the U.S. Congress shortly which we believe will provide for the financing problems, and it is because of that expectation that we do not have to engage in the kind of threats the hon. member was suggesting.

Petitions

PRIVILEGE

MR. FRIESEN—ALLEGED MISLEADING REPLY OF MR. AXWORTHY

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, on May 28 I rose to ask a question of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) regarding his policy of an across-the-board promotion of immigration officers at Canada's major airports, and he responded, in part, as reported in Hansard at page 10012 of that date:

> Those were the discussions we had with the unions, and they are in agreement with the basic redrafting of the categories we now have implemented in the department.

My question of privilege is not a matter of a disagreement with the minister, or taking a different point of view; it is a fundamental matter of being able to believe the minister and whether he has accidentally or deliberately misled the House with the information he gave me in his answer of that day.

Yesterday I received by courier, priority or not I do not know, from the Canada Employment and Immigration Union a statement that refutes categorically the statement the minister made in the House. I quote just briefly from that letter to indicate that the minister misled me in the House in the answer he gave me. The official—

Madam Speaker: Order. I get the impression very clearly that the hon. member is entering into debate. There is a disagreement between what the hon. member thinks the minister has told him and what in fact are the facts. That does not constitute a question of privilege.

Furthermore, a question of privilege should be raised at the first possible opportunity. This question dates back to May 28 and, therefore, if it had been a question of privilege it must be settled on an urgent basis; otherwise neither the House nor the hon. member would be able to function. I think the fact that the delay is so long in itself proves that this is not a founded question of privilege. Therefore, I must rule that the hon. member does not have a question of privilege.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, on a further question, I received this letter only yesterday—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe) moved that the fourth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, presented to the House on Thursday, July 17, 1980, be concurred in.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, as I rise today to move the motion for concurrence in the fourth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, I have in my hand Volume 1 of the Consolidated Regulations of Canada. Those members of the House who have taken the time to read Volume 1 from cover to cover, as I am sure most members have, will know there are some 775 pages in Volume 1 and that the volume weighs some 5.5 pounds. This is only one volume of a series of volumes of the Consolidated Regulations of Canada. In fact, there are some 18 volumes which all told include some 14,420 pages.

The contents of the Consolidated Regulations of Canada are probably not fascinating reading which most Canadians would have beside their beds each night to read before drifting off to sleep. They contain a number of regulations, a number of ordinances and other provisions which often appear from their titles to be a bit archaic. We have the Guardianship of Veterans' Property Regulations, the Dominion Water Power Regulations, the St. Andrews' Airport Zoning Regulations, the Flying Control Locks Order, just to give four examples of some of the regulations that are contained within these 18 volumes. Also included within these 18 volumes are regulations which affect every Canadian and touch every aspect of our lives, and often which are much better known to Canadians.

Parliament has granted to the government authority to regulate virtually every aspect of our lives, from the homes we live in to the clothes we wear, the ability to open a business, the safety of our working conditions, from what we watch on television to whether we hear about the temperature outside in Celsius or Fahrenheit degrees.

In 1980 there were some 1,164 statutory instruments registered. Up to June 30 of this year there had already been 572 registered statutory instruments. Those were only the registered statutory instruments; countless more go unregistered each year.

My purpose today is not to argue or frighten people about the extent of government involvement in our day to day lives. That is an issue perhaps for another day. Nor is my purpose to argue that it is not often both proper and necessary for Parliament to give the government a grant of power to operate without having to come back to Parliament to obtain new legislative changes. It is proper, it is appropriate and it is necessary in very many instances that this be done. The case I want to make today on behalf of the standing joint committee is that if Parliament is to continue granting vast powers to the government which will enable it to act without seeking further approval from Parliament, we have the obligation to our constituents and to the people of Canada to ensure that those powers are discharged properly, that the rights and liberties of the subjects are protected, and that there is vigilance constantly exercised over the way in which the government is doing this.

It is absolutely essential if we are to discharge our responsibilities as members of Parliament that we look very carefully at the whole issue of delegated power and how we ensure that the rights of Canadians are not diminished as a result of our increasing tendency to give these vast grants of power to the government.

• (1510)

On Friday of this week it will have been one year since I tabled in the House of Commons the fourth report of the standing joint committee. I might mention that it is typical that the committee operates by unanimity. This is a unanimous report which is representative of the feelings of members of the committee from all sides of the House of Commons and the Senate. Because of the committee's method of proceeding whereby historically we have proceeded on the basis of consensus and unanimous agreement wherever possible, the government should be giving special attention to the recommendations in this fourth report, which represents probably the single most important report on regulatory reform to be presented to Parliament in the history of Canada. It is a report which commends itself to all members of Parliament. It is one which deserves urgent attention from the government.

As I say, one year ago this Friday this report was first tabled and brought to the attention of the government. The standing joint committee was asked to study the whole process of delegated legislation and to recommend what procedures and improvements could be made.

It might be useful at this point for me simply to explain what we mean when we talk about subordinate legislation or delegated legislation. Increasingly as we read legislation which is tabled in Parliament, we find that the government has also included clauses which give it power to make regulations to put into effect the policies contained in the legislation and to make those regulations some time after the legislation has been passed. It does so without having to come back to Parliament to ask for changes in the legislation.

All delegated legislation draws its authority from Parliament. It draws its authority from a specific statute, unless it is made under the Royal prerogative, which is very uncommon. Consequently, when the government is given by Parliament carte blanche authority to regulate in a particular area, it is essential that we have procedures in place which protect Canadian rights and liberties and ensure that Parliament has not simply given up its responsibility to exercise proper scrutiny over the rights of all Canadians.

When we recognize the fact that this Parliament has powers extending even to the life and death of Canadians, to questions relating to war and peace, and to whether or not Canadians should have jobs or homes of their own, we realize that our obligation as members of Parliament to oversee the discharge of those powers is very important indeed. If we fall down on the job, if we do not discharge that oversight properly and simply grant power to government where there is not proper scrutiny and when Canadian rights are not protected, then we render Parliament irrelevant and do a serious injustice to the people we are here to represent.

As I debate this report, I want to pay tribute to the members of the standing joint committee because the report itself had its genesis prior to my membership on the committee. It was well under way at the time I became chairman of the committee. I want to express my thanks to each of the members of the committee who contributed so much in terms of drafting, in terms of research and in terms of trying to make this information available to the public and the Parliament of Canada, information which we feel is very important to improve Parliament's functioning and to ensure that the rights and privileges of Canadians are properly protected.

I want also to pay special tribute to Mr. Graham Eglington, who was committee counsel and whose tireless efforts were essential in our being able to present a report which I feel is excellent.

I would like also to mention that the committee stands on the shoulders of two giant former parliamentarians. One of them is well known to every member of the House of Commons. I refer to Mr. Ged Baldwin, former House leader for our party and a former House of Commons chairman of the standing joint committee. The other gentleman, who was an outstanding parliamentarian and perhaps the outstanding scholar in Canada on constitutional matters, is Dr. Eugene Forsey, a former senator. These two gentlemen did a tremendous amount to make the committee what it was, to ensure that it did its job properly and to pave the way for us to present the report which is being debated today.

I think it is appropriate that members of the committee and members of the House of Commons should ask me, as I move concurrence in the report today, why I waited one year almost to the day before asking for concurrence by the House of Commons in this unanimous report of our standing joint committee. The answer is simple. It is that we felt that the government should be entitled to a chance to study the report. We hoped that the government's having been given that opportunity, concurrence would be forthcoming and we would see fundamental reforms taking place which would ensure the better functioning of this Parliament.

Hon. members will recall that on a number of occasions publicly in the House of Commons I have asked for a reasoned response from the government to our report. The government has indicated that it is not yet prepared, even after a year has gone by, to make a full report on the committee's recommendations, and it has asked that the committee not move for concurrence in its report, that it be held at least until fall so that this committee report could be lumped in with the report of the Economic Council of Canada and the report of the select committee which studied regulatory reform earlier in this session, and that perhaps a new parliamentary committee would be stuck to study the reports of these other committees.

Now is not the time for more studies. Now is not the time for another committee to study a committee to study a committee. Now is the time for action. This report makes a comprehensive analysis of the processes which are in place today. It finds them wanting and makes a series of recommendations—I believe 66 in all—which, if put in place by the government, could go a long way toward protecting Canadian rights and enabling members of Parliament to discharge their responsibilities properly.

For the committee to wait at this point and for us simply to allow Parliament to adjourn for the summer recess without calling for concurrence because it is inconvenient for the government would undermine the whole role of the committee, which has the responsibility of reporting to Parliament when it feels that action is required or when it feels the government has taken an action which is improper in some way. For us simply to await the convenience of the government on the ground that it has asked the committee not to ask for concurrence and not to ask that these reforms be made at this time is simply to turn the committee, which is a watchdog or scrutiny committee, into the handmaiden of government. No member of Parliament would ask that of the Public Accounts Committee, which is similar in its function to our committee, and surely no member of Parliament would ask that the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments be simply turned into a handmaiden of government, the reports of which would be discussed only at the convenience of the government.

It is particularly appropriate that there should be concurrence today as well because Parliament is going into overtime. It was the intention of the government to have Parliament wound down for the summer recess, and we were not to be sitting this week. That means that every day we spend this week is found time. It is time which otherwise would not have been spent debating legislation because Parliament would not have been sitting, if the government had had its way. Consequently, no one can argue that debate on this matter at this time would be blocking the government from legislation which it had been intending last week, for example, to bring forward. Time is available. It is incumbent on members of Parliament on all sides of the House to debate the report. I think it is in the interests of the people of Canada and of this Parliament that a full and fair debate be held on this report, that debate conclude at the end of the day with concurrence in the report and with action by the government to begin to address some of the concerns of the committee, many of which have existed for several years.

The issue of what the role of the committee is and what the role of Parliament should properly be is really the fundamental question we are called upon to debate here today. Because what we are talking about goes right to the heart of parliamentary government itself. It often seems as if the issues being debated in the committee—when we listen to the names of the regulations which are being discussed—are archean or in some way irrelevant to the pressing concerns of Canadians, but they are not because the principles involved—the principle of Parliament's oversight of delegated legislation, the principle of the rule of law, the principle of natural justice, the principle of whether or not the government is acting within the confines of authority granted it by Parliament—are principles which are central to the whole life of our parliamentary government and extend back over centuries. They are principles for which people have fought and died over the course of many, many generations. This is why the debate we are having this afternoon is essential, why it must be allowed to continue this afternoon and why action must be taken by the government as soon as possible.

I could not myself this afternoon more eloquently make the case on behalf of the committee than the committee does itself in paragraph 6 and 7 of its report. Let me read them because I think they outline the fundamental issue at stake here today. They read as follows:

> Subordinate legislation is an historically accepted means of governance. There is no longer any point in arguing that it is fundamentally improper or that it should be used only occasionally or for mere matters of detail. What is essential is to surround the making of subordinate legislation with procedural safeguards and measures of control so that the rights and liberties of the subject, which it is the object of our constitutional order to protect while maintaining a viable system of government, may be secured as well under subordinate legislation as under statute. Subordinate legislation must not become a means, even unwittingly, of suppressing rights and liberties or of subverting parliamentary supremacy over the law. The Crown's power has never stood higher; the potential for its abuse has never been greater.

> 7. Subordinate legislation may be inescapable and the implementation through it of policy, even policy never debated by Parliament, may be inevitable; but that is no reason to allow subordinate legislation to be made without adequate check, without any democratic element in its formation, and embodying any provisions Parliament's delegate chooses. There are still matters which are not meant to be dealt with by delegated legislation and which should be soberly weighed by Parliament. The confining of subordinate law to its proper sphere, and the regularisation of its use will be impossible of accomplishment if Parliament continues in the habit of giving larger and vaguer grants of law making power to the executive in skeletal statutes many of which are devoid of any clear enunciation of policy. Such blanket grants of executive power as are contained in, for example, the Petroleum Administration Act, the Energy Supplies Allocation Act of the Fisheries Act, were rarely made under the Tudor sovereigns who certainly prized administrative convenience and jealously guarded their control of the machinery of state. It is odd that in a supposedly democratic age government values its convenience, its control of the administrative system and its monopoly of information no less. What future can there be for individual liberty, for the rights of minorities and for democratic and participatory traditions if the highest end of government is its own ease, the exercise of power without public accountability? The need to abide by procedural rules, the stern restraint of the rule of law, the control of arbitrary if well meaning acts, all these may make government awkward. But the rights and liberties of the governed require that government not be untrammelled. Liberty is usually prickly and often untidy and asymmetrical. It wants, as Professor Hugh Trevor-Roper has observed, that certain beauty of mathematical order so beloved of those who respect power and what it can achieve.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the issue before the House. That is what we are debating. It is the role of Parliament itself, the safeguarding of the rights of the citizens of Canada. That is why this debate is so essential. Parliament is all that stands between the people and all powerful government, able to sweep away their most cherished rights with a wave of its arm. What is at issue is whether Parliament is discharging its responsibilities properly, or even, given present procedures, whether we have the ability to do our job properly. The committee's finding is unequivocal, that in fact we have not been discharging that responsibility properly, that in fact the procedures currently in place frustrate the ability of members of Parliament to do their job properly.

The committee's report, Mr. Speaker, makes some 66 recommendations which we feel are urgently required if Parliament is to discharge its responsibilities. We believe the government has had enough time over the course of a year to prepare a substantive response to our recommendations. Now is the time for action.

Let me review briefly for the House some of the recommendations made in a number of critical areas simply to set out a framework for this debate today. First, in response to a series of issues which have dogged the committee since its creation, the committee has called for a new subordinate legislation act. I mentioned earlier the number of pieces of subordinate legislation which were published each year, and yet the average Canadian, perhaps the average member of Parliament, is not aware of the fact that many of the laws we have which are made in the form of subordinate legislation are not even published, not available to members of Parliament, and are not set out for scrutiny by the standing joint committee.

We have every right to be concerned, Mr. Speaker, about our democratic liberties, when Canadians find themselves the subject of secret law. Yet that is what the committee has found on occasion after occasion. Some of the delegated legislation goes unpublished. Much of it is held by the government to be beyond the purview of the committee which was charged by Parliament to study this delegated legislation and ensure that it stayed within the bounds set out by Parliament.

We have asked, first of all, as part of this new subordinate legislation act, that we should provide expressly for the existence and continuation of the standing joint committee, which we would rename the standing joint committee on regulatory review. The change of name is simply to make the function of the committee more apparent from its title.

Second, we have asked that we clarify once and for all what is a statutory instrument; when the committee's jurisdiction begins; whether an instrument must be published in the first place or can remain secret—because we must not have secret law in this country. We on the committee believe, Mr. Speaker, that this is an essential issue which has to be dealt with.

Another recommendation which we believe is essential and which Parliament should be dealing with today is that all bills which include regulation-making authority in them should have the relevant clauses referred to the standing joint committee for study following second reading. That study would be concurrent with the policy study which would be taking place in other standing committees. The committee has not even asked for authority to amend legislation. All we have asked for is the ability to study it and make recommendations back to Parliament and the other committees studying the policy aspects.

We believe the request we have made is a very limited one, but one which is fundamentally important. Because what we have seen happen all too often, Mr. Speaker, is that the government has been granted vast authority to legislate by regulation without ever going to Parliament and justifying the need. There has only been one instance where the committee's recommendations have been followed. You will remember that was on the Post Office Crown corporation act where the committee asked and the government agreed to send those regulation-making clauses to committee. You will also remember that as a result of the committee's deliberations the government agreed to amend the legislation to make it a better bill, to ensure that it would not in fact be giving itself the power by regulation in the dark of night to sweep under its arm by way of the Post Office monopoly all telecommunications in Canada. That was the effect of the bill had it gone through unchanged. Our committee met, dealt expeditiously and in a non-partisan fashion with the bill, and its recommendations were accepted in large part by the government and resulted in a better bill, one which better reflects the intentions of Parliament and better protects the liberties of Canadians. This is why we believe it is essential to have this sort of expert study on which powers the government should properly be asking for before they are granted by Parliament.

We have asked, Mr. Speaker, that the appropriate cabinet minister report to Parliament within three months of any report respecting delegated legislation. We believe Parliament is entitled to have a response to standing committee reports. Indeed, had this recommendation been accepted by the government before, we would have had the government's response to our fourth report some nine months ago. It is now 12 months since the report was first tabled.

We recommended, Mr. Speaker, that committees of Parliament should have the right to review delegated legislation on policy or on their merits at any time. In essence, you would have a standing order of reference to committees to ensure that delegated legislation is studied on a continuing basis, and that Parliament discharges that oversight responsibility. By and large our committee confines itself to questions related to procedure and process, but we believe it is also appropriate that other standing committees charged with looking at the policy being followed under delegated legislation should have the right to call up those regulations at any time and have a study on the merits of the policy embodied in those regulations.

We recommended that for the first time there be standardized procedures in this Parliament for motions of disallowance and of affirmation. We have suggested that motions of affirmation should take place under specific circumstances where we feel they would be particularly justified. There are four in particular. First, where the enabling powers may substantially affect the provisions of the enabling or any other statutes; second, where they impose or increase taxation, fees or charges; third, where they lay down a policy not clearly identifiable in the enabling act or make a new departure in the policy; fourth, where they involve considerations of special importance.

We propose that in other instances not included under those four principles five members of Parliament should be enabled to move motions of disallowance, and there should be a right to ensure there is a debate in Parliament and that a decision is made. Parliament should have the right properly to scrutinize these regulations and nullify them if it feels it is important do so.

We have also proposed in this report, Mr. Speaker, another important departure from present procedures. In some instances the government follows procedures related to notice and comment to ensure that interested Canadians have a chance to be heard before a new regulation is put into effect. Sometimes it has an effect on government policy, sometimes it does not. By and large this is a matter of discretion on the part of the government. We want to see it regularized as a standard procedure to ensure that Canadians do not find themselves in a situation where rules are changed in the dark of night, where their rights are taken away from them, where their ability to hold jobs is taken away from them, where their ability to act without running into penalty is taken away from them without any opportunity for input.

This is why we have asked that wherever possible the government give notice of its intent to issue new regulations and that when draft regulations are available they be properly scrutinized by Parliament and by the public. They should be made available in draft form before they are put into law. Wherever possible, social economic impact analyses of new proposed regulations should be provided and made public so that Parliament and the people of Canada can weigh these public policy considerations to try to decide whether the regulations are justifiable in the first place and what the goals and purposes will be.

We have asked that the government issue quarterly a regulatory budget in which it would give notice of the intended regulation-making which will be taking place in the following quarter. We have also asked when regulations are public that there be an explanatory memorandum. If Canadians simply pick up a regulation and try to understand its purpose, its form or how it is in fact changing the law in Canada, it is often impossible for someone to do it unless they have had extensive legal training. If the law of Canada is made incomprehensible for members of Parliament and for members of the Canadian public, how can we ensure that proper justice is being done? It is essential to provide every possible avenue to ensure that Canadian participate in the making of legislation and that they fully understand it.

We have proposed as well that a new regulatory council be set up, composed of representatives of regulatory agencies, of government departments, of public interest groups and of industry, to look from time to time at the whole issue of regulations and to make recommendations, which would not be binding upon the government. It would make valid and useful recommendations to the government when it is engaged in regulation-making.

We brought to the attention of the House in our report a very important issue on which Madam Speaker, since the tabling of our report, has supported the committee and has moved. I am referring to the following concern:

> That the making of extensive subordinate laws under votes in Appropriation Acts should stop and that all existing subordinate laws made unde votes be subject to review as to merits by the appropriate Standing Committees.

The House will remember that a few weeks ago Madam Speaker moved to strike down attempts by the government to give itself a great deal of authority through Appropriation Acts when that authority should have more properly been granted through legislation being brought before Parliament. When we realize that the passenger service structure for Canada and the whole of VIA Rail was put in place not by legislation being brought before Parliament and being debated here so that we could talk about the future of the passenger service in Canada, but put in place through a dollar vote which gave the governor in council carte blanche to make regulations as it saw fit, we can see how inherently flawed such a system of asking for this authority through Appropriation Acts would be.

We have asked that where the departments of government make a decision with regard to delegated legislation on the basis of opinions of the Department of Justice, that our committee and the public should be entitled to see those opinions. What conceivable basis could there be for witholding from Parliament an opinion of the Department of Justice as to whether or not what the government was doing was legal or illegal, whether or not it had the authority to do it? Yet time after time when the committee questioned whether Parliament ever gave the government the authority to act in the way, we were told that the minister was given an opinion by the Department of Justice and that Parliament and the committee would be deprived of the right to see that opinion.

We are not asking for something which is unheard of in other jurisdictions. In fact, if one studies the procedures followed in other jurisdictions, it is commonplace that the explanations be given when the departments of justice in other jurisdictions have indicated that the actions of governments were intra vires and when serious questions were raised as to delegate legislation.

We have also proposed that amendments be made to make things more simple for the fisheries department, which has a particularly difficult situation. In the past the committee criticized the whole concept of sub-delegation. We have said that when Parliament delegates power to the agents of Her Majesty, that that power cannot be sub-delegated to make laws which affect the rights and privileges of people. Yet in the case of fisheries regulations we recognize that such sub-delegation may be necessary. We have asked that special provision be made for the fisheries department because we recognize that it is a special case, one which deserves special attention.

Finally, we have asked, as the Economic Council of Canada also recommended, that the government put in place sunset procedures to ensure that from time to time Parliament reviews the activities of its delegates, so that when programs are put in place by regulation parliamentary committees from time to time can call up those regulations, ask for a report and a review as to whether or not they are achieving the purpose for which they are intended, and whether or not they are doing it the best way possible.

We recognize by and large that those reports would have to be done by the government, but we believe they should be made available to the Parliament of Canada. Parliament does not discharge its responsibilities to the people who sent us here properly if it does not from time to time review the programs it created to ensure that there is a need for them and that the mechanisms in place are still the best means of achieving those purposes.

I am pleased to say that when I was a minister in the Clark government we were working on precisely such legislation which would allow parliamentary committees to call up program evaluations or to insert clauses in legislation to ensure that they were either lapsing after a certain time or were brought back before Parliament for review to ensure that they were still valid, necessary and achieving the purpose for which they were intended.

There is nothing in these recommendations which should be viewed in a partisan light. The issue is not one of the rights of government versus the rights of the opposition. The issue we are discussing today relates to the rights of the people of Canada and to the responsibility of Parliament. They go to the heart and the substance of the whole purpose of Parliament.

If our role increasingly in the future is to be simply to pass broad enabling legislation which gives the government the power to do whatever it wants at its convenience, then we might as well send this Parliament home because we are not doing our jobs; we are not doing what we were asked to do. This is why it is essential to have a full debate on this issue today and that it be concluded with concurrence in the report. This is why it is essential that we not wait any longer. After one year, how much longer need we wait to have a substantive response? If parliamentary committees are to be taken seriously and are to function in the way intended by Parliament, how long must Parliament and the people of Canada wait before receiving a substantive reponse from the government as to its recommendation? How long must we wait when we bring to the attention of Parliament the fact that present procedures are subverting the purposes of Parliament itself? How long must we wait before action is taken to correct those activities and to ensure that Parliament can discharge its responsibilities properly?

Canadians of all ages have an interest in the debate which is taking place today. Perhaps the debate is more fundamental than any other debate which will take place in this Parliament. It goes to the issue of the role of Parliament itself, to the preservation of our democratic institutions and to the protection of the rights of Canadians. Other issues with which we deal, be it the Constitution, the economy, agriculture or pensions, are vital issues affecting Canadians which deserve serious consideration by Parliament. But this is an issue which revolves around the role of Parliament itself and the preservation of our democratic system of government. It is one which deserves Parliament's attention today. It is one which deserves serious attention by the government and fast action; not more studies, not more reports, not more committees. It deserves more action in terms of legislation being tabled in Parliament and in terms of agreement by hon. members on all sides of the House to the recommendations in this report.

We believe that our report is essential and should be acted upon. We commend the members of the select committee for the recommendations which they have made. We believe that the government would be well advised as well to act on its report and to act upon some of the recommendations included in the Economic Council's reports.

But we say that our report stands on its own, that it is complementary to the other reports. It merits consideration and concurrence today. It merits action from the government without further delay. Canadians expect no less of us. Surely this is the action which should be taken by our Parliament before we recess for the summer break.

I call upon the government to ensure that today, before the day's end, there is a full and complete debate on this report. I call upon the government to allow members from the New Democratic Party, from its own side and from my side of the House to be heard on this non-partisan issue. It is an issue which affects all Canadians. It is one in which the government has a responsibility to show that it is serious, that it respects the rights of Canadians and that it respects the role which Parliament must be playing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette).

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I rise—

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I put it to the parliamentary secretary that, in order that there may be at least one voice from each of the three parties, I wonder if he would not be willing to let me speak at this time instead of him.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be discourteous to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but the normal practice is that we alternate from side to side. The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) has moved concurrence in his motion and Your Honour has recognized me to respond.

I do so briefly, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Rose: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mission-Port Moody, on a point of order.

Mr. Rose: I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 29 and move:

That the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre be now heard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mission-Port Moody is out of order. He was recognized on a point of order. The parliamentary secretary has the floor.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) knows, he was not given the floor at the appropriate point in time and therefore could not move the motion under Standing Order 29.

From the point of view of the government, I must say we are somewhat surprised that this motion has been brought forward today. I know there has been some discussion from time to time about the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe moving concurrence in his motion, but, as I told him and the members of the steering committee of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments about two months ago, the government would seek its co-operation in asking the hon. member and his committee to wait until this coming fall, when the government would be in a position to introduce a discussion paper in this House for all members to look at, taking into account the concerns of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe and the committee of which he is co-chairman.

The hon. member knows full well that some of the recommendations made by his committee, which, incidentally, has done excellent work over the years, have been implemented by the Treasury Board. He also knows that the recommendations that the committee have made have far-reaching implications for the the future of parliamentary democracy. One should not idly suggest by the moving of concurrence in this report, with little notice, if any, that we should deal with this very complicated subject in this particular way. I was only informed before question period that the hon. member would be moving this motion today.

In the Speech from the Throne the government said that it wants to look at all aspects of electoral and parliamentary reform. The hon. member knows, since it has been discussed with members of his party through the normal channels, that the government will be working on this subject over the course of the summer and would like to embark on a discussion of parliamentary reform, taking into account the recommendations of his committee and the very excellent recommendations of the special task force chaired by the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson), who is in the House this afternoon. The government wishes to take into account all of these various recommendations and bring forward a discussion paper in order that we may look at this subject in a nonpartisan way and decide the future course of Parliament and the future role of parliamentarians.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, without being too derogatory, that I am somewhat appalled that the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe has the gall to move this motion this afternoon, knowing full well that it is the government which has the responsibility under Standing Order 18(2) to determine the business of Parliament. That is a basic premise upon which our parliamentary system operates. One party has the confidence of the electors of the country to form a government. It is that party which has the right, under the Standing Orders, to introduce legislation and to set the priorities for business each and every day.

Members opposite know full well that it was the government's intention, after discussions with the House leaders, that we should adjourn last Friday. We know there was no formal agreement but there was a general understanding that we would adjourn last Friday. The government feels somewhat sad that this general understanding was not carried forward. For example, we know that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has stated that he and his colleagues will not allow Parliament to adjourn unless certain conditions are met. It is this party which forms the government in this country. It is this side which has the constitutional and parliamentary prerogative to set the business of the country. And it is this side which has the right to set priorities for discussion in this Parliament.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In effect, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council is challenging the right of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe to have brought on this debate, as though it was out of order for him to do so. He is talking about Standing Order 18, and so on. I contend that in view of the ruling by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux any member of the House of Commons can, at any time, put forward a motion for concurrence in a report of a committee. It is not out of order for this to have been done. It is out of order for the present speaker to be contending that something has been done which is wrong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has recognized the motion for the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe.

Mr. Knowles: Tell the parliamentary secretary that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's motion is before the House and the parliamentary secretary has the floor.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I am not arguing on procedural grounds against the right of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe to move concurrence. I am stating an elementary fact of parliamentary life. It is the government which sets the legislative timetable for Parliament. The government decided, in view of the attitude expressed by the Conservative party, that it would choose to call Bill C-48 for discussion this week. We debated that bill yesterday and we intend to debate it again today. Thus, it is quite clear that the kind of debate which we have had thus far this afternoon from the hon. member opposite is a dilatory tactic to prevent the government from discussing the very important legislation dealing with oil and gas in Bill C-48.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think it is a well known and justifiable tradition in this House that the motive of any member who carries out his function in accordance with the rules be not impugned. The hon. member opposite has made reference to the fact that, apparently, there is some dilatory tactic being undertaken by a member who has stood in his place, who is co-chairman of a standing committee approved by members of the government, as well as the opposition, and who has presented a report which has been ready for discussion for some considerable period of time. I think the point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's motion has been recognized by the Chair and it is before the House. The parliamentary secretary has the floor.

As far as the impugning of motives is concerned, what the Chair has heard was relatively minor compared to a number of other situations which have taken place in the House.

● (1550)

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to provoke my friends from the Conservative party any longer. Therefore, under the provisions of Standing Order 24, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans):

That the House now proceed to Orders of the Day.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 24 of the House provides that:

A motion for reading the Orders of the Day shall have preference to any motion before the House.

Standing Order 32(2) provides that such motion is not debatable.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Collenette), which was agreed to on the following division:

CANADA OIL AND GAS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OIL AND GAS INTERESTS

The House resumed, from Monday, July 13, consideration of Bill C-48, to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, and motion No. 3 (Mr. McGrath).

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as we were concluding our discussions yesterday evening on motion No. 3 pertaining to Bill C-48, I noted that two themes had emerged in our discussions. One was the misgiving on the part of some in the opposition that the bill would somehow delay the realization of the petroleum potential in our Arctic areas and in the offshore. I had cited several examples of recent expansion of activity in those areas which give lie to the misgiving.

What we have also seen during the course of recent years is the need for a clear statement to guide those active in the exploration and development in the Canada lands. They must know the terms and circumstances under which that exploration and development can go forward. In our desire to see the terms clearly established, we are joined by the spokesman on energy questions on the Conservative benches, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson). Earlier in our discussion of this bill he noted the need to proceed expeditiously with this legislation, welcomed it as being overdue and praised the minister for bringing it forward. I am pleased to note that there is broad agreement that this legislation is necessary and indeed is a matter of some urgency, that in fact it does not hinder but rather promotes exploration and development in the Canada lands. Indeed, since last night we have seen yet another example of initiative being taken in the frontier areas with the acquisition by Husky of the lands held by Shell Explorer.

I turn to the second theme of our discussion as we were concluding last night, which is a misgiving on the part of some of the opposition that somehow this legislation would preclude the benefits of exploration and development in the Arctic lands and in the offshore areas flowing to the adjacent provinces or territories. Quite clearly from a number of statements which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and others in government have made on a number of occasions, it is not our intention to deny to the adjacent areas the full benefit of the revenues flowing from oil and gas exploration and development.

We remain eager to negotiate an arrangement with Newfoundland and the other offshore provinces. We made that very clear on a number of occasions, most recently during the course of this spring. We have offered revenues to the provinces from oil and gas exploration and development comparable to the situation in Alberta today.

With specific regard to the motion put forward by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), the proposed amendment would delete that part of the definition of Canada lands which refers to offshore areas. This definition that would thereby be deleted does not apply to areas within a province. If it were ultimately determined that a province has jurisdiction in the offshore, those areas over which it has jurisdiction would not be part of Canada lands. In the absence of such a decision, the definition permits the exercise of federal jurisdiction over offshore lands which the Supreme Court of Canada in the 1967 British Columbia reference found to be within federal jurisdiction. The definition of offshore areas is also consistent with the work of the Law of the Sea Conference on the question of coastal state jurisdiction and certainly will not create any international problems.

I might also note that the definition in the bill does not state that the submarine areas in question are owned by Canada. Indeed, with respect to the areas outside the territorial sea, that is the 12-mile limit, it is doubtful that Canada could maintain a claim of ownership under international law. The definition clearly states that Canada lands are those that belong to Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada or in respect of which Her Majesty in right of Canada has a right to dispose of or exploit those natural resources. Those words refer not to ownership but to Canada's authority under international and domestic law. I would ask the hon. member for St. John's East to bear in mind that the reference within the bill is not there by accident. It is there to repeat the claim of Canada over the disposition of the natural resources in the 200-mile zone.

I have cited some reasons why it would obviously be against the whole tenor and purpose of this bill if this motion were to carry. We would have a bill that would in some curious way relate only to the territory of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. All offshore areas would be excluded whether in the Arctic, Pacific or Atlantic. For those reasons, as well as others I have cited, the amendment is unacceptable to the government.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie)—Veterans Affairs—(a) Appointment of full-time minister (b) Decentralization of department; the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn)—Combines—Request for release of report on uranium cartel—Request that independent prosecutor review evidence; the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse)—Bank Act—Query respecting possible revisions to control interest rates.

CANADA OIL AND GAS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OIL AND GAS INTERESTS

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-48, to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, and motion No. 3 (Mr. McGrath).

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised to find myself in mid-July speaking to motion No. 3 on Bill C-48, an act to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act. Motion No. 3 deals with the Canada lands concept. It is to this concept that I wish to direct my remarks.

Simply stated in the most naked terms possible, the National Energy Program objectives are energy self-sufficiency, greater participation by Canadians, fair pricing and revenue sharing. I think most of us in Canada accept those program objectives as worthy and worth working toward.

● (1720)

The delivery of these objectives requires dialogue, sound fiscal policy that delivers incentives to the system, and federal-provincial agreements. Instead, we have a government that approaches these desirable objectives with confrontation, socialization and the new word that is creeping into the vocabulary now meaning the same thing, "federalization", and extensive regional division. This is growing daily as a threat to our national wellbeing and is the direct result of the resolution on the Constitution and the twisted, devious policies that many of us in the west feel are being delivered by this government to implement the straightforward objectives of the National Energy Program.

Several times in the past I have spoken in the House and have warned this House that we must update our parliamentary system and structure. It is now evident that the British parliamentary system is failing us as it has failed others, in that it has served only the population centres of countries instead of giving equal representation to widely spread regions.

Instead of revitalizing the Senate of this Parliament so that Parliament could address regional needs and aspirations of the nation, this Liberal, socialist government uses it as a receptacle into which it drops people who need protection from the law or people who merely get in its way in its quest for perpetual political power.

We hear a lot of statements to the effect that the Constitution and the National Energy Program are in the interests of all Canadians. Indeed, last night the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) reminded us, in a question to my colleague the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche), that what the government is doing is in the interest of all Canadians. Mr. Speaker, this has a very good ring to it but it is as deep and as truthful as the great call in 1968 to a just society, on the repeated calls in Speeches from the Throne for equity and fairness. We have heard this ring through the various speeches, utterances and rhetoric of this government.

"In the interest of all Canadians" means "in the interest of the population centres that deliver and sustain federal power". "In the interest of all Canadians" means "in the interest of the people of Upper and Lower Canada". The use of the Canada lands concept as addressed in motion No. 3 is nothing more than a massive money grab for the people of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. McRae: Nonsense!

Mr. Huntington: The hon. member says nonsense. I would ask him to please listen. That is the way the people in the Atlantic region and western Canada feel.

What are hon. members opposite afraid of? Had we respected the truth and fact more than playing with shallow politics, today we would probably be in the final stages of completing the Mackenzie Valley pipeline which would deliver gas energy from the northern slopes of Alaska down to the midlands of the United States.

Had we worked towards the objectives of the National Energy Program, we would have preserved all the energineering and talent and production capacity that was in place for the Syncrude plant and would have phased it into another tar sands plant. By now we would have started a massive in situ plant. We would have had our nation and people at work instead of having close to 1.25 million people idle. We would have been well on our way to balanced budgets and would be able to afford the standard of life and welfare that we want for the people in this country. We would have been well on our way toward energy self-sufficiency and there would have been a happier, more co-operative attitude at large within our great country.

The benefits to all parts of Canada from expansion in the west and in the north and in the Canada lands are tremendous. Those benefits are not regionalized or localized; those benefits are there for the whole of the country. The manufacturing demand that would have filled the plants of Ontario and Quebec would give bounty to all.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have listened with interest for the last few minutes to the hon. member's speech. He has yet to be relevant to the motion under consideration. This is not a general, second reading debate. Motion No. 3 is specific and is under debate and I would ask that you request the hon. member to be relevant to the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The Chair would ask to be excused. I had a conversation with an hon. member and I did not pay attention to the words spoken by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). Of course, hon. members know that their remarks have to be relevant to the business before the House. Without having heard what the hon. member said, I have to accept what the parliamentary secretary has said. We will hear the hon. member for Capilano.

Mr. McGrath: I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I cannot see why I should entertain a further point of order. I have just said that I will recognize the hon. member for Capilano. I said I had not heard the remarks that he made before. He will now address himself to the bill. I cannot see why any further point of order should be entertained.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a different point of order. It is a practice of this House that when the House deals with the first amendment at report stage, it is given a great deal of leeway in terms of relevancy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I think the Chair has recognized that in the past. The Chair has not criticized anything that the hon. member for Capilano has said. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Capilano; I hope hon. members will understand that. I simply recognized what the hon. parliamentary secretary brought to my attention, perhaps rightly or wrongly, I do not know. I was having a conversation with a fellow member and now I recognize the hon. member for Capilano. The House can judge whether his remarks are relevant to the motion or not.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I think we should get this absolutely straight. The hon. member for St. John's East rose on another point of order.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I see no point of order here. The hon. member for Capilano.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the four minutes lost by that intervention be added to my time if I need it. I do not see that the point of order was relevant and I can establish that my speech referred strictly to the Canada lands and the background of facts related to the Canada lands. If the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council would listen instead of flapping his mouth every time anybody stands up in the House, he might learn something and he might get a feeling for the country and for some of the people who come from the outback.

One of the troubles with people elected from Upper and Lower Canada on that side is that they do not hear. They are arrogant, they are autocratic, they shove everything down our throats and then expect to have a feeling of friendliness and structure and building in this country. This will not happen as long as they have the attitude of the parliamentary secretary.

We talk about equity and sharing, Mr. Speaker. When the OPEC prices exploded, did the governments of Ontario and Quebec help share the oil-fired cost of electricity in the maritime provinces of the Atlantic? Just a minute, Mr. Speaker, I think this is quite relevant. No, they did not. We talk about equity and sharing and that is what the motion with respect to Canada lands is about. We heard it from the Minister of State for Mines last night. If she can make interventions on that same issue, surely I can address the intervention that she was allowed by the Speaker last night.

Mr. Collenette: Speak to the motion.

Mr. Huntington: We have heard the argument that Upper and Lower Canada need this sharing because they shared their wealth with the west at the time OPEC prices were lower than the delivered price of western oil into central Canada. During that decade from 1962 to 1972 the people of Ontario and Quebec paid over $639 million—

• (1730)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. With all due respect to all hon. members, I would invite them to address themselves to the motion. There will be ample opportunity for the hon. member to address future motions in this bill in the precise words he is using now, but I would invite him to speak on this motion.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With great deference, we sat here yesterday and heard the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Simmons) speak for 25 minutes without referring once to the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, order. Order, please. We could certainly go back to yesterday's Hansard and together review what happened and we might admit that a few of the speeches were not relevant, but I think perhaps if the hon. member was here and had listened to both speeches, he would have found that the parliamentary secretary was perhaps relevant to the speech of the speaker who spoke before him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The Chair also accepted those remarks. But we have to draw the line at some point. I do say once again that the Chair has been very, very lenient in the past, but I would invite you, and that is all I can do, to speak to the motion.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, equity and sharing is central to this motion, it is central to the bill and it is central and germane, in the opinion of the opposition that is at large in this country, to this piece of legislation. Motion no. 3 deals with the Canada lands concept. I am speaking to equity and sharing, and the lack of equity that is in this bill as far as we in the west are concerned and as far as those in the Atlantic regions of this country are concerned.

The motion deals with the matter of offshore rights, the matter of the extension of confiscation and so-called Canadianization of practices that were completely successful in the development and exploration work being done on those lands and offshore. That is all part of the equity and the sharing I am addressing right now. That lack of equity and fair sharing goes way back and is deeply embedded in the evolution of this whole matter of federalization and so-called Canadianization which many of us feel is absolute confiscation and a denial of the fundamental principles that built this great continent.

May I say that the province of British Columbia is very surprised to find C-48 before the House, as there was a distinct understanding that this matter and this business would not be before the House before the fall.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Huntington: I know that the mouthy experts over there are absolute masters in dealing with the extremes of legal interpretation, and if there are masters anywhere in the world who are experts in the tricky use of language, they are over there, and that is what they are relying on now.

The fact remains that at large in this country there is opposition among governments which are concerned with aspects of this bill that are involved in motion No. 3; aspects that are very important to the Atlantic provinces and to the province of British Columbia. The government, by bringing this matter forward at this time, is not living up to the impression it left at large within those provinces. They have not even been extended the courtesy of being notified of the amendments on the Order Paper addressing a matter as important as the Canada lands concept that we are speaking to in this motion right now.

We are talking about people keeping their word. Has the government kept its word?

An hon. Member: Sure we do.

Mr. Huntington: Why then did the government see fit to defeat an opportunity to debate one of the most important matters ever placed before this House, the motion put today seeking concurrence in the report of the Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments? Why did the government defeat that if it felt it did not have the opportunity to leave this bill to the fall, as it said it would and as it gave the impression it would to all the provinces?

The province of British Columbia is on the eve of a meeting with its sister maritime provinces in the Atlantic, but it has been waiting, as have the maritime provinces, for a promised letter from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources—waiting, waiting and waiting. Where is that letter in order that the meeting can proceed, so the provinces would have some knowledge of what is in the dark secret halls of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources? I suggest that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) use the executive mail service that is available to the large corporations and banks in Canada and have that letter delivered to the provinces which are concerned and are waiting for some kind of an insight as to policy and what is to be on the table next.

The parliamentary secretary said just this afternoon that the government was anxious to negotiate in this area. If the government is so anxious to negotiate, and if its rhetoric keeps coming out that way, why then is the government not doing as it says it will do with the provinces involved? Why is the government interfering with the progress of a meeting that is awaiting that letter? The issue addressed in motion No. 3 is important to my province. That province has had no warning and has not even seen the amendments, as I have said.

On the matter of offshore rights, my province has been to the courts. In 1967 there was a Supreme Court decision in favour of the federal position. But in 1976, the B.C. Court of Appeal ruled that waters inside the boundary between headlands inside those baselines fall within the jurisdiction of the province. As soon as that B.C. Court of Appeal decision came down, the federal government, in its anxiety to cause confrontation everywhere, launched an appeal, and since then has never proceeded with it. Why has it not proceeded with that appeal? Why has it not cleared that area?

There has been a moratorium on drilling and exploration in those coastal waters of British Columbia. Why has that moratorium been in effect?

It seems that the socialists in this country are intent on zero or negative growth. They have been interfering with the progress of every megaproject, every exploration project and everything that could deliver us to energy self-sufficiency by the year 1990. That is the deliberate plan of this government. The basic fundamental objectives of the National Energy Program are simple, concise and in place, and all they need is some fiscal policy and a government which wants to achieve energy self-sufficiency rather than impose a revolution and a change in the form and style of government to interfere with the freedom and liberty of people, as this government is doing.

The government should heed the warnings of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). This matter of the Canada lands concept is truly a political matter of great importance to the provinces and the people on both coasts. It will not be resolved with technical and legal arguments. It is truly a political matter. We have to be able to talk it out in this House if we are to understand our position as people living in widely diverse regions in a vast land.

I hear again the moans and groans of the people from Upper and Lower Canada, and I tell you there is trouble ahead if you do not open your ears and retain some of the appeals we keep trying to make. We will fracture into tribes such as those in Africa if the government does not listen, does not hear, does not get back to the bargaining table, does not negotiate and does not work to reach a consensus.

Arrogance and autocracy are absolutely obsolete today. They are obsolete in the work place. They cause all the confrontation we have between management and labour. They are obsolete in national politics. This country needs some gentle, loving care. It needs some talking; it needs to talk out our differences, it needs to reach and negotiate an understanding, and it needs to get back to the processes leading to consensus.

There are more intelligent ways of achieving the National Energy Program objectives than confrontation, confiscation and the very dishonest use of the word Canadianization. I urge the government to return to consensus-seeking procedures, for in my opinion the wellbeing of our country, Canada, is at stake, and the federal Liberal government's zeal to federalize is betraying the Atlantic regions and the western regions of Canada.

In the moment I have left I will return to the words "equity" and "sharing" because those are essential elements of this debate. It is in the interests of all Canadians, we keep hearing, that we move on the Canada lands. Let me tell hon. members that of the present price of $1.66 for a gallon of gasoline, the federal government, according to figures provided by my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Thomson), takes 56 cents; the Ontario government takes 25 cents; the Alberta government gets 22.7 cents; the producer gets 19.3 cents; the refiner gets 33 cents; and the dealer gets 10 cents. This adds up to $1.66.

Hon. members opposite keep talking about the interests of all Canadians. They keep thinking that this country will stay together as a co-operative federalist state. They talk about equity and fair sharing being the motivation which drives them to these types of policies, but nothing could be further from the truth or more divisive.

The Canada lands concept is a serious issue to the Atlantic regions and to the western regions. The definitions within the legislation are not known; nor is this amendment known to my province; and I urge hon. members opposite to go slowly so that full and studied input is available from our regions before this legislation goes too much further in this House. There are other matters we can be debating, matters such as concurrence in the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, which would give us time to get our regional inputs together on this important bill.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to follow on the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), and to support the amendment put forward by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

The matter before the House today boils down to one basic question: who owns the resources under the Canada lands? In particular, with respect to motion No. 3 we are dealing with the question of who owns the resource potential in the offshore areas in the Atlantic and Pacific coastal regions.

I would like to quote from the National Energy Program just briefly as referred to at page 42 where it is indicated that the federal government recognizes the difficult nature of this dispute. In fact, the government claims, in the very meritorious-sounding document released almost a year ago, that it is anxious to refer the matter of ownership quickly to the Supreme Court. The document states the following:

> Uncertainty about the legal control over such vital areas is not conducive to the rapid development of the oil and gas potential of this promising region, which can contribute to Canada's energy needs and the economic aspirations of the region.

All that sounds great. That is very high sounding rhetoric, but it is completely contradicted in the initiative reflected in Bill C-48, which would allow the federal government to lay claim, without constitutional amendment or legal clarification by the courts, to all those potential resources in the Canada lands areas without any provision for revenue sharing with the provinces, let alone recognition of the fact of provincial ownership as a basic aspect of those regions' entering into Confederation, and without any regard for provincial involvement in the management and development decisions in those Canada lands.

What we are dealing with is a federal attitude which treats the north, the west, our Atlantic provinces and British Columbia as colonies, as the hon. member for Capilano has stated, and the sole raison d'être for those colonies is to serve the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec. This is the view of this centralist government. The more remote regions of Canada are there merely to be raped and exploited by the Liberal plunderers.

These far flung regions of Canada are soon going to revolt against the power hungry, selfish attitude of the federal government. The federal philosophy seems to presume that regional growth and prosperity are wrong, because the government itself has contradicted the high sounding rhetoric of the National Energy Program. However, the truth is that decisions taken in the regions are very much superior to decisions taken 3,000 miles away in Ottawa by a group of uninformed bureaucrats and greedy Liberal squanderers. There is absolutely no evidence to justify the federal claim that it can do a better job of managing our natural resources than the provinces have done over the last several decades.

Let us examine the credentials of these centralists, these economic socialists whose narrow attitude toward Canada is reflected on the editorial pages of the Ottawa Citizen but hardly anywhere else in the country. What have they done recently for Canada? Let us look at the track record. How is the Post Office doing lately, or the armed forces? What about the state of our national economy, with interest rates at the level they have reached, the high cost of food and housing and the $20 billion projected federal deficit for the present fiscal year alone? What about the futile constitutional farce, the DREE farce and the CRTC farce, and what about the disaster of VIA Rail and the mismanagement of our transportation systems in western Canada? Look at their cynical, distrustful attitude with regard to the role of the private sector, in particular with respect to development on Canada lands. At the same time, the feds continue to amass windfall profits by ripping off Canadians through usurious levels of taxation.

Look at the basic disaster of the National Energy Program. Look at the drilling rigs flooding out of Canada, wells being capped, jobs being lost in all parts of this nation and major energy projects collapsing before our very eyes because of the incompetence of this government. How can the federal government possibly claim that it is the single, all-knowing, competent agency for managing our offshore minerals and hydrocarbon resources?

I sat through many weeks and months of committee deliberations trying to get information from federal experts who were there on behalf of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), and I was sorely disappointed to find that all those experts were there to do was to protect their minister and his political mission in life. They would not provide information, and, I hazard to say, they are not capable of providing that information. In fact, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), who has operative authority over 85 per cent of these Canada lands, did not appear at the committee more than once or twice during the whole four-month period of deliberations. It is not a widely known fact but it is certainly reflected in the bill, that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has jurisdiction over all decisions regarding exploration agreements and development permits above the 60th parallel. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is apparently trying to expropriate that authority from the native peoples, as well as their trust in the minister.

How can these centralists be so cynical as to deny that our regional governments have certain expertise and knowledge peculiar to their areas which federal policymakers cannot possibly experience or comprehend?

Yes, I predict that before long the regions of Canada will mount a massive strike against these arrogant, power hungry masochists who are wreckling our national economy. They will stop producing oil, as Alberta has done. They will stop using the Post Office. They will close up their businesses, as they are doing at the present time, and refuse to pay income tax. They will stop buying Canada Savings Bonds, as Canadians are already doing in record numbers, and they will abandon their mortgages.

• (1750)

This strike against the central government, Mr. Speaker, is where we are headed if we allow these insane policies, spearheaded by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), to continue to destroy our beloved nation.

On the question of resource ownership, particularly offshore resources, it is a fact that since the adoption of the BNA Act, ownership of natural resources has been entrusted to the provinces. These resources are the basis for building local economies, for development of communities, and for financing opportunities, employment and services to people living in those sparsely populated, far-flung regions of Canada. To build a future, Mr. Speaker, the people of those areas were granted in 1867 the right to elect their own regional governments, and to pursue their own heritage within a great country.

Why were the provinces given all these powers under the various sections of the BNA Act? Why were they given the power over education, land title and property, hospital and medical care, mining minerals, timber and royalties? Why were they given the power over business, their licencing, and incorporation, over provincial justice, and generally over all matters of a local or provincial nature? They were given that authority because the wisdom of another age saw that those kinds of decisions had to be made close to the people. They could not be gathered together and expropriated to a federal government 2,000 miles away from most of these far flung regions.

So the provisions of the BNA Act affirm the federal nature of our political institutions; the "dignifying", if you like, of the regions; giving those regions some cause for aspiring and hoping that they might energe as individual and unique entities within the rich fabric of this nation. Therefore, the federal government has no right to change this concept now.

Conversely, Mr. Speaker, the maritime regions have every right to those resources which they brought with them into Confederation, to the same degree that Ontario and Quebec have profited by their resources and have annexed vast tracts of additional land in this century which have brought them great prosperity. The province of Quebec annexed 379,000 square miles in 1912, virtually tripling the land mass of Quebec. The province of Ontario added 237,000 square miles in the north and western regions of the province, with federal consent, virtually tripling its area merely to fuel the necessities and provide for the essentials in developing the local economies in those two great regions. Ever since the first potash was produced in the Ottawa Valley by your ancestors, and perhaps some of ours, for use in the production of soaps, waxes and other important products, and ever since the first hydro electric station was established by Sir Adam Beck on the Niagara River, Ontario has been free to develop and own its resources without federal interference.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have a number of legal precedents to the provinces' case with regard to ownership of offshore resources on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. We have the claim of Newfoundland that they came into Confederation bringing title to their offshore resources. We have the Nova Scotia claim, as documented by the charter of William Alexander in 1621, giving that province title to all lands as far out as 120 miles off the coastline. In the case of British Columbia we have a Supreme Court decision, at least in so far as the inshore waters from headland to headland are concerned, which says the resources beneath those waters belong to the province of British Columbia, not to Canada as a whole. That could be interpreted as a rather selfish statement—

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Siddon: —but it is not because it has been the history of this country that all those regions which have prospered and developed with the benefit of their resources have in fact contributed to the national cause and the strengthening of this nation in a very generous fashion. That will continue, Mr. Speaker.

However, let us look for a moment at the leaked cabinet document respecting the first ministers' conference last September. Let us consider what it had to say about this question. The document recognized that all ten premiers felt the offshore areas within the immediate vicinity of provincial boundaries should belong to the provinces. The federal government put forward a proposal at that time agreeing to perhaps a 100 per cent "provincial-type" revenue sharing on those resources. Furthermore, there was an agreement or proposal that:

—bilateral joint bodies would be responsible for over-all management—of these resources. Reading from page 18 of that document, Mr. Speaker, it is plain that the government viewed it as being essential that:

—if there is to be any possibility of reaching agreement with the coastal provinces, that the federal proposal be modified to give greater recognition to provincial desires for a significant voice in managing the offshore.

This present initiative, Mr. Speaker, as reflected in Bill C-48, flies completely in the face of that advice which the government received last September in advance of the first ministers' conference. It flies completely in the face of the Supreme Court initiatives, it flies completely in the face of all legal precedents. Therefore, I contend that what we see here is a dog-in-the-manger attitude on the part of the federal government which wants to push this legislation forward now unilaterally and without granting any role for the coastal provinces, contrary to their own undertakings last September. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a cheap, childish and greedy way for the federal government to deal with the provinces. Instead of negotiating in good faith, it has chosen to mount an attack on the provinces. As in the constitutional initiative, they mount an attack as a smokescreen to cover up their own foul smelling plots.

The federal government chooses to deny the far-flung regions of Canada a resource base which they so desperately need to rise above colonial status, to rise above welfare dependency and poverty. In putting Bill C-48 forward in this way, the government has shown little maturity—in fact, none; no wisdom, and no compassion in their treatment of the coastal regions which might one day benefit from Canada lands resources. They have chosen instead the meat axe approach last summer of coming out sounding good and then coming along to chop, chop, chop, without regard for the views of the duly elected governments in those regions.

What about the future of the Atlantic region, Mr. Speaker? I was looking through some data yesterday in respect of the economic development of the four Atlantic provinces in particular. It is interesting to reflect on this data's significance. The graph I display here shows the per capita income from all revenue sources among the various provinces. It shows the Atlantic provinces are 33 per cent below the average per capita income enjoyed by Ontario, Quebec and Saskatchewan. Of course, at the present time Alberta's income is considerably higher. However, it seems to me to be a ploy of the federal government to equalize the bars on this graph so that the per capita income in every province is identical. I think if that should happen, it would be a sorry day for Canada because it would destroy mobility, the quest for opportunity in this country; in fact it would be completely contrary to the history of the first 100 years of Canada when Ontario and Quebec regard massive benefits from confederation.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I will not be long in concluding my remarks on motion No. 3, which seeks to amend Bill C-48. Before the dinner hour I commented on the future of the four Atlantic provinces which would be affected by the amendment put forward by the hon. member for St. John's East. I referred to a graph which displays the income per capita from all revenue sources. It shows the four Atlantic provinces in recent times receiving approximately two-thirds of the national average revenue per capita. Do the Atlantic provinces have to consider forever being on the dole or dependent on the good graces of the federal government to enjoy prosperity?

In the context of Bill C-48 and the particular amendment before the House, the questions we are asking are: Will the Atlantic region ever have an opportunity to grow and prosper? What say will their provincial governments have, the governments of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, in the development of their offshore resources? Will Bill C-48 enable those regions to become self-sufficient in oil and gas, or will this legislation hinder such development to the detriment of the Atlantic region, as is happening most demonstrably in western Canada at the present time? If such development should proceed on the offshore lands of the Atlantic coast under the provisions of Bill C-48 and under federal jurisdiction, will the Atlantic provinces be assigned the same milk-cow status which western Canadians have tolerated for several decades?

I need only refer to two other tables which I have before me to show the reflections of history upon those great Atlantic provinces which were the founders of Canada in so many respects. If we look at the graph showing the density of population by land area for the four Atlantic provinces, we find that in the case of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the population density is some six times the national average, and considerably higher than that of the province of Ontario. Even in the province of Newfoundland, if we deducted the land area of Labrador, we would find that there is a reasonably high population density, approaching the national average. One would hope that the people concentrated in these regions might be able to find to some degree their own destiny using the benefits of their natural resources.

If we look at another table of Canadian Demographics based on the 1971 census, we find that the greatest migration of peoples within Canada is from the four Atlantic provinces to Ontario. More than 10 per cent of the population of each of those provinces in recent years has migrated to Ontario—10 per cent from Newfoundland, 14 per cent from Prince Edward Island, 13 per cent from Nova Scotia and 11 per cent from New Brunswick.

Why are we encouraging the furtherance of a regime managed from Ottawa which will keep Atlantic Canada forever on the dole and will encourage people to move to Ontario and to other areas away from the vast potential residing in that region?

In conclusion, I submit that we should all support the amendment of the hon. member for St. John's East to assure the future wellbeing of the Maritime areas of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, after having listened to this debate over the last few days, I should like to speak tonight in an attempt to come to grips with the issues raised by hon. members opposite and with some concern that there are definite problems with the amendment in a number of areas. First, the amendment is drafted improperly. Second, the amendment as drafted has grave consequences for the control and jurisdiction of any government in Canada over the offshore.

I should like to refer to these matters and also to indicate to hon. members that the way the bill is drafted now is, in fact, proper and the only way it could be drafted to ensure that the word "Canadian" is used in the broadest sense and indeed to ensure provincial participation in the resources which lie offshore.

Let me start by reading precisely what is to be amended by the motion of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). Bill C-48 gives the definition of "Canada lands" and refers to the right of the federal government to exploit resources located on the Canada lands, meaning those situated in the Yukon Territory, in the Northwest Territories, on Sable Island, or those submarine areas, not within a province, adjacent to the coast of Canada.

• (2010)

The key to this clause with regard to part (b) is those submarine areas not within a province. I hope hon. members opposite will keep that in mind as I go through my speech, since it is a very important point. The bill says that the definition of Canada lands applies to those submarine areas which are not within a province. I will go on to show why that is extremely important. The bill says:

—adjacent to the coast of Canada and extending throughout the natural prolongation of the land territory of Canada to the outer edge of the continental margin or to a distance of two hundred nautical miles from the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured—

The amendment which is put forward by the hon. member for St. John's East indicates that we are to strike out lines 17 to 25 at page 1 and lines 1 and 2 at page 2 and substitute the following therefor: "west Territories". If we do that, then we would be striking out line 17 which now says "west territories, Sable Island", and we would simply be substituting "west territories", and the bill would then read "situated in (a) the Yukon territory or the Northwest Territories."

The problem is that there is a subclause (a) in that clause. There cannot be a subclause (a) if there is not a subclause (b). In other words, the hon. member's motion should strike out lines 16 to 25 on page 1 and lines 1 and 2 on the next page. Instead, it strikes out words beginning at line 17. First, there is an improper drafting of the amendment. Second, there is a serious problem with regard to the nature of the amendment and what it attempts to do.

As the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated earlier today, the amendment would strike out from the definition of "Canada lands" all offshore lands which are associated with Canada. There is a very distinct definition which has to be made between the offshore which belongs to Canada, over which Canada has title, and the offshore the resources of which Canada has the right under international law to exploit the resources but to which it does not have title. Indeed, no country has title beyond 12 miles. At one point in time the limit was three miles.

The point is that neither Canada nor the provincial governments have title, or can lay claim to title, over lands beyond 12 miles from its coasts, under international law. As a result of the hard efforts and the hard work of the Government of Canada in the negotiations under the law of the sea, we were able to obtain, along with other coastal states, the right to exploit the resources from 12 miles to the extremities of the continental shelf, or 200 miles. But that does not give the Government of Canada or the Canadian people ownership over that territory. It gives us the right to develop and exploit the resources, whether they be marine resources or natural resources in the form of minerals or petroleum. But we do not have title. Thus, when members opposite raise the issue of provincial ownership of the offshore, at the very most they can be talking about the first 12 miles and no more because there is no way that they, nor we, can own beyond 12 miles. When we look at the speeches which have been delivered with regard to this bill, we find a singular lack of understanding of what the state of the law is, not only in Canada but in the world, with regard to resource ownership offshore, and the nature of Canada's rights in that respect.

Additionally, the amendment goes on to strike out all reference to the offshore. Effectively it is then saying that Canada has negotiated under the law of the sea for the right to exploit resources beyond 12 miles for naught. With regard to the resources which are defined in Bill C-48, neither Canada nor the provinces would have the right to go beyond 12 miles. In other words, if this amendment were accepted, then Canada's stake, Canada's ability to say that we have the right to manage not only the east and west coasts but especially the Arctic, could be lost.

Canada has been working extremely hard against pressure from the United States, for example, with regard to its claim over Arctic waters. If Canada were to withdraw and say that Canada lands include the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, without saying anything about offshore, in a way we would be saying that we are giving up our claim. We would be saying that we are not staking our claim to the Arctic waters. That would be the height of folly, after Canada has worked so hard to obtain title, in a sense to obtain the right to exploit the resources in these areas, as well as the east and west coasts, offshore and the fishery. Then, to state in a bill which deals with Canada lands and the right of the Government of Canada, the people of Canada to exploit those resources—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary would permit a question at this point.

Mr. Evans: If there is time at the end of my speech, Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to entertain a question.

I will try and go through the speeches of members opposite to document as clearly as possible where I think they have been off base, not only irrelevant in many of their speeches, and not dealing with the amendment which has to do with the definition of Canada lands and the exclusion of the offshore from that definition, but harbouring, a misconception of want is involved and what the government is trying to do. We have heard from the hon. member for St. John's East, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), and most recently from the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon)—I used to live not far from his riding. Last night the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) accused the government of trying to grab provincial resources. If we just talk about the east coast, there are no resources to speak of that we know of within 12 miles of the coasts of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. The resources are much farther offshore. If what I have said is correct, and if what I have been told by legal advisers to whom I have spoken recently in order to come to grips with this issue being raised by members opposite is correct, we do not have title to that territory and, therefore, if there are resources, they cannot be provincial ones. As a result, how can that be a grab of provincial resources?

The ownership question is one which is crucial in this debate. We have heard about socialism and we have heard about it not being equitable. I will speak to the question of equity in a moment. We have heard that this bill is a rape of provincial rights. Again I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what provincial rights? If the provinces had rights over the offshore, why is it that the province of Newfoundland, for example, could not control the fishery of its coast with regard to foreign fishing fleets coming in and taking the fish stocks? It was not until after Canada negotiated the continental shelf agreement that we were able to manage our own fish stocks off the east coast. The accusation that this bill is a rape of provincial rights is simply a red herring, so to speak.

I would like to go on and look at the issues raised by the mover of this motion, the hon. member for St. John's East. As reported at page 11464 of Hansard he said:

> Notwithstanding the stated position of the federal government within this policy paper—

A policy paper which was put forward on offshore resources.

> —on the floor of this House and during the course of committee hearings, that it would like to have this matter of jurisdiction between Newfoundland and Canada and Nova Scotia and Canada, the offshore question, resolved by the Supreme Court of Canada, we are presented with a bill—which in essence is a fait accompli—which defines "Canada lands" as the very areas the federal government feels are under dispute and which it feels should be adjudicated by the Supreme Court of Canada.

● (2020)

That is absolutely false. What does the bill say, Mr. Speaker? I refer you to my comments with regard to the definition of Canada lands. The bill referred to "those submarine areas, not within a province". "Not within a province" means that if the Supreme Court rules that a province has title over that to which it has some claim to jurisdiction, it will go out 12 miles. That will be "within a province" under this definition.

What about the rest of the territory going from 12 miles to the continental shelf? There is no claim to ownership of that. The Supreme Court is not going to rule that Canada owns that or that the provinces own that. Under international law there can be no ownership. There can be the right to exploit the resources. There can be no question that the bill is carefully and properly drafted to take into consideration precisely the concern being raised by the hon. member for St. John's East.

The hon. member for St. John's East went on to say that this question of ownership, meaning within 12 miles, has to be resolved by negotiation. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said on more than one occasion that the federal government is perfectly willing to sit down and negotiate management. If you do not own something but have the right to manage, then the only thing you can negotiate is joint management. Newfoundland has been told, for example, that the federal government is willing to enter into a joint management agreement over those lands and that revenue sharing would be the same, from 12 miles to the continental shelf which Canada has the right to exploit, as it is for the province of Alberta.

The hon. member opposite asks why Newfoundland cannot own the offshore, meaning beyond 12 miles, I presume. If I have to go through that again, then I think there is a serious question of their listening or understanding.

The hon. member for St. John's East dealt with the question of ownership in his speech. After listening to him yesterday, I am quite confident that he was not talking only about the first 12 miles but was talking about the entire continental shelf, out to 200 miles and in some cases beyond, where the continental shelf goes beyond the coast of Newfoundland. That is the basic flaw, the basic fallacy; it cannot be owned.

The other point is that Canada has negotiated this treaty with other nations and Canada has the right to exploit, and also the responsibility for any occurrences which happen within that area under which Canada has been given jurisdiction. Therefore, if there are obstructions to navigation, the Government of Canada is responsible; if there is pollution, the Government of Canada is responsible according to international law, and the Government of Canada is responsible for the management of the fishery.

The question then arises, how can the Government of Canada be asked to be responsible for anything that occurs in that region which happens to violate international law and then be told that all developments and all management of the resources in that area must be under the exclusive control of the province? That is asking the federal government to take responsibility for something over which it is being asked to give away all authority. By any rational calculation, that is simply unacceptable. At the most, it should be precisely what the Prime Minister has offered to the province of Newfoundland: a jointly managed arrangement where the federal government can protect itself against those claims which arise in international law as the result of its negotiated treaty obligations over that territory.

Those are the facts, Mr. Speaker. That is the reality of the situation. The questions that have been brought out by the other side indicate that they have not read the bill and that they do not understand what this particular clause does and does not do. Hon. members opposite do not understand the reality of the 12-mile and 200-mile limits.

Let me go on now to indicate that this lack of understanding not only relates to hon. members opposite, Mr. Speaker, but also to the province of Newfoundland. The hon. member for St. John's East referred to a letter from the Prime Minister to the premier of Newfoundland outlining four principles. The first is as follows:

> That the province of Newfoundland should own mineral resources of the continental margin in so far as Canada should own them.

Canada does not own them, Mr. Speaker. It owns them out to 12 miles. There is a statement saying that as far as Canada should own them, the province of Newfoundland should own them.

The letter continues:

> That the Government of Canada should continue to have legislative jurisdiction in certain areas such as the environment, shipping and so on.

They must have this because under international law, they have responsibility for those areas and therefore must have the legislative jurisdiction to protect the people of Canada.

Earlier the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) spoke about the same basic issue, and effectively said that there should be concurrent power in the federal government and the provinces in a number of areas such as environment, fishing, shipping, and so on and that, finally, there should be revenue sharing as a result, and that is the way Canada can work and be fair to all.

We could not agree more, Mr. Speaker. That is what has been offered, not only to Newfoundland but to New Brunswick, to British Columbia, to Nova Scotia.

I become more than a bit concerned when time after time, day after day, on bills such as this, with regard to an amendment that is improperly drafted and misconstrued, we hear the opposition harangue the government for doing something that the government is not trying to do. If hon. members opposite would read that definition carefully, they would see that it is not the intent of the federal government to strip away provincially-owned resources or to rape the provinces. The intent is to ensure that Canada protects its international claim under treaty to those areas off its coasts for which we fought so hard to obtain the international treaty. There will be sharing, there will be equity, but let us keep the question of equity and ownership and those realities in proper perspective. I hope, in the speeches that follow, hon. members opposite will keep these things in mind as they go on with their discussion of this amendment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether there is time to permit a question or two of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans). In his comments, the hon. member suggested, first of all, that the law of the sea convention has been concluded and ratified and is now universal law. He should know, of course that it is not even concluded.

The other point he suggested in his speech—and I wonder if he has it clearly in his mind—is whether the federal authorities, when negotiating international agreements, negotiate only in those areas and for federal purposes only and do they negotiate on behalf of all of Canada, including provinces-

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is really making a speech. If the hon. parliamentary secretary wishes to reply, he may.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I shall try to respond very quickly. First of all, the hon. member is correct: the law of the sea convention has not been concluded. That makes my point even more firmly. If there is no formal treaty, we have even less claim than we had before under a treaty. As a result, how can we possibly talk about ownership in that situation? When the Government of Canada negotiates a treaty with other nations, it does so on behalf of all Canadians.

● (2030)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With all due regard, the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to the motion of my colleague from St. John's East which reads:

That Bill C-48, an act to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 17 to 25 at page 1 and lines 1 and 2 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"west Territories".

There are a number of points I would like to make. First, I would like to say a few words in reply to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans). His argument is as difficult to grapple with as it is to grasp an eel in a large barrel of water. If you poke at it, it goes to the top. If you try to grab it, it will disappear. In other words, you get nowhere. Actually I have never tried to do it, but I believe that to be the case.

The parliamentary secretary stated that he consulted legal authorities. I wish he had the courage to tell us the legal authority for the legal opinions he has given. Perhaps he might consult with his colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) who might correct the jailhouse lawyer opinion he has just given us.

Mr. Evans: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The answer is the Department of Justice.

Mr. Kilgour: I think the parliamentary secretary is aware that I used to work for the Department of Justice. I challenge him to name one individual, man, woman or child from there, who would come forward and give his name as agreeing with the legal opinion the parliamentary secretary just gave in this House.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) just made the point that the law of the Sea Conference has neither concluded nor been confirmed. The 12-mile limit does not yet exist. Does the hon. member for Ottawa Centre pretend that the province of Newfoundland no longer has rights over its continental shelf? Does he believe that those rights passed from Newfoundland to the federal government in 1949 and that Newfoundland now has no right to advance in World Court an argument with regard to ownership off its shore? I will run out of time if I spend much longer on the nonsense the parliamentary secretary has been giving us.

Bill C-48 defines Canada lands as those areas the federal government feels are in dispute and upon which it believes there should be an adjudication by the Supreme Court of Canada. I wish to quote from the white paper, as was done by the hon. member for St. John's East. It is the white paper on the National Energy Program. I have to call it what they call it. I quote:

Under the British North America Act, large areas of Canada fall within federal jurisdiction. These Canada lands, which comprise almost twice the area of the 10 provinces combined, include the area off Canada's coasts—

I will quote only that far. That is hardly the way to deal in good faith with the provinces affected. It is another way of the federal government saying, "what is mine is mine and what is yours I am going to seize through legislation, and you can try to get it back in the Supreme Court of Canada". That is what this bill amounts to in legal terms.

I now want to deal with the position of Newfoundland with respect to offshore rights. Perhaps this sounds better coming from a western Canadian than from someone who lives on the island. There is not a single Canadian I suggest, over the age of 14 from St. John's to Nanaimo who does not know that Newfoundland's resources offshore belonged to that province when it was a dominion at the time it came into Confederation. Prior to 1949, Newfoundland occupied a unique position: It obviously owned its offshore resources to the extent that any country could own them under international law.

Both the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and the hon. member for St. John's East (McGrath) put the problems of their provinces here very eloquently. "We will let you have the revenue up to the point that you become a have province" said the hon. member for St. John's East of Ottawa's position. As was pointed out, Newfoundlanders now have half the income of the average Canadian. Is there a single person in this country, other than the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and his moutons silencieux on that side who feels this is a fair way to treat the people of Newfoundland with regard to their offshore mineral resources?

Is this good faith? Is this a good way to treat people who voluntarily came into our Confederation in 1949? In my part of the country, this is called tricky dealing.

Mr. Wilson: It's bushwhacking.

Mr. Kilgour: As the hon. member for St. John's West said yesterday, it denies the people of Newfoundland their "place in the sun." I suggest it is enough to make any member of this House vomit. Our own party policy was referred to by the hon. member for St. John's East who quoted from a letter by the leader of our party dated September 14, 1979 as follows:

(1) That the province of Newfoundland should own mineral resources of the continental margin in so far as Canada should own them . . .

(3) That the Government of Canada would continue to have legislative jurisdiction in certain areas such as the environment, shipping and so on.

(4) Those principles would be confirmed by the signing of an agreement between the two governments and by appropriate legislative action and constitutional change.

It is an absolute mystery to me how any Liberal member from Newfoundland can accept what these grab and seize people are trying to do with the legitimate offshore resources of 750,000 Newfoundlanders.

I read carefully the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell). He actually said something with which my party can agree. Speaking to the parliamentary secretary to the so-called energy minister, he said, and I quote from page 11,468 of yesterday's Hansard:

He should understand that on the coast the people see coastal areas as an extension of the land. It is like land only it is under water.

I think hon. members of my party, and in fact all Canadians, can share in that view of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

I now want to deal with the speech of the energy minister. If I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the Energy Minister is not well loved in western Canada, Newfoundland or anywhere else, I think you will know what I mean. At page 11,473 of Hansard, the energy minister said:

The bill covers the entire Arctic, all offshore mining rights. Those are the areas which in the decades will provide for Canada the energy security it needs.

We feel as a government that those resources belong to all Canadians and that we should see to it that all Canadians benefit from them.

This implies all sorts of things. It implies, for and, that the so-called energy minister does not give a tinker's damn about the Cold Lake project in Alberta. Let me quote from an article by Ronald Anderson in the July 10, 1981, edition of The Globe and Mail. It reads:

And when Imperial announced its suspension of Cold Lake, a spokesman for Energy Minister Marc Lalonde said airily that the company had to make its own decision, almost as though Ottawa did not care about the suspension.

Does any member opposite deny that in fact they do not care about the consequences of the Cold Lake project cancellation? The article goes on to read:

Meanwhile, Mr. Lalonde, after a tour of Dome Petroleum Ltd. drilling operations in the Beaufort Sea, is reported by The Canadian Press to have talked confidently about the possibility of an oil surplus in Canada by 1990.

● (2040)

The minister, I suggest in parliamentary language, is stark raving mad if he thinks Canada is going to have an oil surplus by 1990 under his energy policy.

[Translation]

I may speak French at this time. The Fathers of Confederation were right in 1867 when they guaranteed to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec the ownership of "lands, mines, minerals and royalties" and "public properties". The foresight of our ancestors should still be an inspiration for Canadians today. Unfortunately, this government makes no attempt to create harmony among the ten equal partners that the Canadian provinces should be. Everywhere, this government is creating conflicts. The latest energy aberration of the Liberals is that of the minister responsible for this sector.

With the virtually avowed intention of breaking up the alliance of eight Canadian provinces against the constitutional position of this so-called Liberal government—and I have to laugh at this term—the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) offers Newfoundland to expropriate a corridor on Quebec territory so that it may export its electricity to the other provinces or the United States. It is most incredible that this corridor could be expropriated and that electricity could be transmitted over more than 900 miles without having to maintain this high-tension line at a higher cost practically than any profit that might be made. In return, what will this government ask Newfoundland? Will it be to give up its offshore mining rights? Will it be a tax on any profit derived from the sale of this electricity?

The government sets the provinces against each other the better to rule and impose its own views. It is totally unable to solve the energy problems facing all Canadians. If the National Energy Program is as good as the promises concerning the price of gas, I have to be very doubtful about the relevance and the effectiveness of Bill C-48. The major questions that all members opposite should ask themselves is whether it is really necessary to centralize in Ottawa what might well be achieved through consultation—are those opposite aware of the meaning of the word "consultation"?—with those who must live every day with the problems created by this government.

Had this government expended as much energy on trying to reach an agreement with the provinces as it did on making them aggressive, I am not saying that federal-provincial relations would be the reflection of undying love, but we certainly would not be talking about separation, divorce and Supreme Court settlements for everything at every moment. Canada should have a national energy program, fair enough, but we have to draw the line when the implementation of that program is going to be detrimental to what took us 114 years to build. We Progressive Conservatives had initiated a détente with the provinces; we covered more ground towards harmony in six months than it took this government to foster hatred and mistrust in one week. It is easy to depict the state of current relations—a country made up of ten provinces and two territories which are on the verge of breaking up as a result of a lack of appreciation for the Canadian reality and the nearly non-existent concern over Canadian regionalism. That is not what I wish for my country, but that is what is very likely to happen if this government or a better one fails to settle the various problems which confront us. Mr. Speaker, how can anyone considering this bill believe in the good faith of this government when that same government cannot even see eye to eye with Alberta on the price of oil from that province, or else with Quebec on the substitution of petroleum for gas or electricity?

[English]

Perhaps Mr. Speaker, you will permit me to quote on this from a letter I wrote which appeared in the current issue of "Saturday Night" on the subject of the national energy policy. I think I speak for many in western Canada and elsewhere. I wrote:

The reality is that provincial resource control to most westerners—

The reality probably is the same for most in the Atlantic provinces as well. The article states:

—provincial resource control to most westerners today is perhaps as important in a juridictional sense as language and culture are to francophone Quebecers, because resources give us for the first time an opportunity to become full partners in our own country. The federal assault on the oil and natural gas of the three mostly westerly provinces, under what the government insists is a "national" energy policy, is to many of us the equivalent of parking tanks on a fellow countryman's front lawn.

That is in economic terms. The quotation continues:

In terms of its effect on many western livelihoods, and on the goal of achieving national self-sufficiency in these two products—

These two Canadian products—they advertise on television telling us to "buy Canadian", but oil and gas are not Canadian products, I gather, according to these turkeys. Gentlemen from rural ridings will know how turkeys are regarded among the animal kingdom.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member is straying a little from the amendment before us. I invite him to return to the subject of the amendment.

Mr. Kilgour: I guess the rest of my speech, Mr. Speaker, does not really relate to the motion. How much time do I have?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: About five minutes.

Mr. Kilgour: I take it the Chair is enforcing the relevance rule tonight.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: These attempts to enforce the rules are strictly impartial on all occasions.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, my respect for the rules and the Chair is such that I will not continue to deal in irrelevancies. I would ask, sir, that in future when people get up and talk about anything except the bill or the matter before the House, the Chair will impose the rule with the same vigour.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The chair recognizes the difficulty in always being consistent, but does its best.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I certainly hope the Chair will ignore the hon. member's last remark. I should like to start off by complimenting my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East, (Mr. McGrath) on his motion that we are debating today. It is one of tremendous importance for people who live in coastal provinces. I am glad it is before us and is so well debated, with the odd exception.

I thought the parliamentary secretary was somewhat irrelevant. He was talking about its not being the intention of the government of Canada to strip the resources from the provinces. He should recall what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) said last year when he was touring Canada. He was asked why the government was so keen on imposing the strict regime it was imposing on Alberta. He remarked, "We need the money, and you get the money where the money is." With remarks like that coming from cabinet ministers it is very difficult for people to accept the statement that it is not Canada's intention to strip any of the resources from the provinces.

I was impressed by the speech last night by my colleague the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen). He made some comments about the New Democratic Party energy critic. I took particular note of them when I read his speech over today. My colleague mentioned that this 38-year-old adolescent, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), had avoided giving any idea of the position of his province. He claimed to be speaking for his province several times during his speech, but not once did he mention what the province of British Columbia has in the way of a policy concerning resources. I thought he might at least have given us Mr. Barrett's policy on the resources in British Columbia, but he managed to avoid both.

• (2050)

I believe the hon. member is setting a new record in the House of Commons for spurious and irrelevant points of order and questions of privilege. He may well end up in the Guinness Book of World Records over this, but he comes by it honestly. I believe he inherited it from his predecessor, Mrs. Simma Holt, who is noted for the same characteristics. Hon. members will recall that Mr. Speaker Jerome used to be very fast when the then hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway rose on a question of privilege. We used to time her at about 90 seconds before she would be asked to sit down so that the House could go about its ordinary business.

I agree there were some good points in the hon. member's speech about the attitude British Columbia has to its tidewaters and the waters particularly between Vancouver Island and the mainland. Except when the usual NDP anti-American paranoia crept in, the hon. member was making some sense. One should treasure it when it comes from that source.

I would like to remark that once again the Progressive Conservative Party is the only one left to speak for British Columbia or to advance British Columbia's aims in this House, particularly in energy matters.

Let us look at the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) for a moment. The minister was accurately described by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) when he said that Marc Lalonde would manage to pick a fight going to church in the morning. He did something similar in the House on March 12 when I asked him if he was aware of the effect his energy policy and his incursion by means of the excise tax into the natural gas market between British Columbia and the northwestern United States had on the budget in my home province, to which, in his usual fashion—although he was not on his way to church that day—he said:

Madam Speaker, I am only sorry that the hon. member believes the Socred propaganda of that particular government in its budget.

One can see how this minister goes around rather like Typhoid Mary spreading discontent and abrasiveness everywhere he goes.

I thought it might be beneficial if I were to read a few remarks from the budget the minister considered to be propaganda. He might obtain an understanding of how the government of British Columbia operates. It is the elected government of British Columbia. I do not belong to the party which forms the government there, anymore than I do the one which forms the government here, but it is in power there and has a right to express its policies. The Hon. Hugh Curtis from southern Vancouver Island said the following during the budget speech:

> The problem of slow revenue growth would have been difficult enough even without the measures announced in the October federal budget. Now, the situation has become critical. The Canadian government has introduced new energy taxes that directly reduce provincial revenue. More significantly, the federal has increased the tax burden on the petroleum industry and has reduced the incentives to explore for and develop new oil and gas fields in British Columbia.

He went on further:

> Over the period 1980-81 to 1983-84, federal taxes have a very real potential of reducing provincial revenue by over $1 billion.

In answer to my question on March 12, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources pretended that there was no effect on provincial revenues. He gave this curious answer:

> Madam Speaker, every gas consumer in this country is paying the same amount of federal tax under the last budget.

Mr. Evans: You are not being relevant and you know it.

Mr. McKinnon: He completely ignores the fact that there are only three provinces in Canada which produce natural gas, and their ability to tax it is limited by the price at which they can sell it. The minister lives in a funny dream world.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have to ask that the hon. member be somewhat relevant to the bill. He is talking about Bill C-57. This is Bill C-48.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the parliamentary secretary is challenging the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway about spurious points of order. I do not know, but gas lands are offshore as well as on the Canada lands. I believe gas reserves also come into this. However, the fact is that these matters are dealt with in the energy policy, and this bill is part of the energy policy the government is bringing in. This bill would have a considerable effect, and hon. members opposite do not seem to understand that. When one is trying to sell a product like natural gas in the United States, the Americans pay only so much, and then they start finding cheaper alternatives. That is what is happening to British Columbia at the present time.

The Hon. Hugh Curtis went on to say:

> This government is not prepared to consider borrowing to pay operating expenses.

I am sure this would shock the parliamentary secretary something terrible.

Mr. Wilson: He just left.

Mr. McKinnon: This is what the finance minister in the British Columbia government said:

> This Government is not prepared to consider borrowing to pay operating expenses. Too many governments have adopted this shortsighted way out of their financial difficulties only to find that tough decisions become even tougher to make as the debt load accumulates.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must ask the hon. member to address himself a little more specifically to the amendment before us. He is straying from the subject matter of the amendment.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I bow to your wishes, of course. I understand that some hon. members across the way blanch considerably at the mention of a government which is not prepared to borrow money to pay operating expenses. Perhaps I should go on to things less strange to them.

With respect to the problem concerning offshore resources, there are really two competing claims or philosophies which have been operating for many, many years. First, there is the federal authority which is based on the "authority in matters of trade and commerce" which is spelled out in the BNA Act. This conflicts directly with another item spelled out there whereby the provinces own their natural resources, which gives them a proprietary interest. I thought it might be of interest to hear what an expert in this field says. I refer to Dr. Bushnell of Windsor University. He says:

> No one doubts that the provinces do own their natural resources—

This was before the parliamentary secretary made the opposite statement. However, Dr. Bushnell said at that time:

> No one doubts that the provinces do own their natural resources (except for those which have been granted to private persons, and of course the granted resources could be acquired once again by the provinces), and that ownership rights allow the provinces to collect revenue.

What is the effect of this dichotomy between the provinces with their claim and the federal government with its claim? The provinces have power because they have the ability to determine the terms of leases and grants of mineral rights. The power of the federal government rests within the trade and commerce section of the BNA Act which permits it some pricing authority. There can be deadlocks, and there is one at present between Alberta and the federal government. The federal government has been gathering power in this area for several years, and quite a bit of it is due, of course, to the findings of the federal Supreme Court. Bushnell goes on to comment about this as follows:

> In the interpretation of the trade and commerce power the Supreme Court has since 1957 expanded the Dominion's power from the attenuated position given it by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council . . . it would not seem feasible that the same Court, as long as a majority of the judges maintain the same interpretation of the trade and commerce power, would take with one hand and give back with the other by allowing proprietary rights to overcome the restriction on provincial power achieved through the trade and commerce power. Possibly allowing provincial control through the exercise of proprietary rights could be viewed as a compromise position, in that the exercise of proprietary rights has only the effect of nullifying the negative impact of the trade and commerce power and not the affirmative impact. Thus the provinces, through their proprietary rights, would be able to control natural resources in the absence of Dominion legislation. But in order to create that so-called compromise position the Court would have to give section 92(5) of the BNA Act an interpretation which to date has not been given to any other provision in the Constitution. Section 92(5) would have to be interpreted to allow the province to legislate in relation to trade and commerce because it is dealing with provincially owned property.

The position of British Columbia is of course fairly well known. They were one of the later provinces to come into Confederation, and it is ridiculous to think they came in leaving their offshore behind them belonging to some world power or something. They had the rights to the offshore before they joined Canada, and made a strong case in 1967, as mentioned by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). They lost that case in the Supreme Court of Canada. However, the B.C. court of appeals ruled that the waters and seabed of the Juan de Fuca Strait, Georgia Strait, Johnson Strait and Queen Charlotte Strait belonged to that province. I understand the federal government lodged an appeal in that case which has yet to be proceeded with.

Now, it might be of interest to examine the history of this dispute. One of the hon. members opposite claims there is something immoral about not accepting the Supreme Court decision, as though it were carved in stone. In 1978, at the first ministers' conference on the Constitution, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) accepted offshore resources as an item on the agenda for constitutional review at the behest of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. In February, 1979, at the first ministers' conference on the Constitution, the Prime Minister tabled a draft of the federal proposal that accepted the principle of concurrent legislative authority over offshore resources management.

A significant part of the judgment handed down in 1967 was that it applied only to British Columbia. However, the federal Department of Justice said the decision almost certainly means the BNA Act, the basis of the Canadian Constitution, will have to be amended before B.C. can gain offshore jurisdiction. Oil exploration off B.C.'s coast has shown little promise, but mining concerns have expressed interest in manganese nodules on the seabed floor.

It is obvious in following this that there is room for compromise. I feel quite certain that if the federal government were at all certain it has the right to these offshore resources, it would not be offering any kind of deal to a province. The smash and grab artists on the other side will give you absolutely nothing that they are not forced to give you. I think when they talk about a 75-25 split in the case of the Atlantic provinces, they are in fact admitting they have a very weak case.

What is needed is an honest, sincere look at the situation. We cannot go on with the stalemate between Alberta and the federal government. Other provinces do not wish to find themselves in a position where they have to exert their rights and harm other Canadians in order to protect their own interests. Yet this is what they are being forced to do by the abrasive Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that we can somehow or other come to an intelligent compromise where by the rights of the provinces will be respected, and we will get away from the philosophy of the Minister of Justice that because they are so quick to take more money which belongs to other people.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to rise and speak on Bill C-48, motion No. 3 as it relates to the Canada lands, and particularly to the offshore resources.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has brought to the attention of this House something he is very concerned about, and I believe he made a very good presentation on behalf of his province. I would like to draw a parallel between what we find in the province of Newfoundland, and the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, indeed all of Canada as it relates to the energy policy in Bill C-48, and what we are dealing with in this House. The average income in Newfoundland is $4,000.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Gustafson: The average income in Ontario is $9,800. Here we have a small province which, when it came into Confederation, was looking for a better future. Now we have a government which, under a disguised energy policy, is making a power and money grab. This is not an energy policy at all because it has not created one extra barrel of oil. In fact, we have lost thousands of barrels of oil in western Canada. I think it was well put by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) when, in speaking in Estevan, Saskatchewan to a group of people who are very discouraged by this policy, he said this is not an energy policy, this is a policy to grab power for central Canada. Make no mistake about it.

Now, what is the parallel we see here between Newfoundland, which thought it had a right to fish in the ocean and bring back fish for the province—and it did—and which thought it had some oil. They did not know it was there a few years ago, but suddenly there is a newfound wealth. Now the power grabbers from Ottawa want to take this newfound wealth and filter it through this place. Well, they are going to spill a lot of it, I tell you. What is the parallel here to Saskatchewan and Alberta? The whole energy policy is designed along the direction laid in Bill C-48. Investigate this closely as in the coming days we will be relating it to how the government is seeking to nationalize the oil industry, and you will see that never before has a bill been brought before this House which has taken such great steps to nationalize the oil industry as does this bill before us. Through Petro-Canada, the government takes 25 per cent of all existing oil resources in the Canada lands, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. All that has to happen is for that percentage to change from 25 to 50 to 75, and you have a nationalized oil industry in Canada.

I want to say without equivocation: this policy is not going to work. It is going to have repercussions which we in western Canada have already felt very severely. What have those repercussions been? We have driven out 170 oil rigs. The independent oil people tell us that they believe we will lose half the fleet or 250 oil rigs. The energy policy has driven out 85 service rigs and along with the oil rigs and the service rigs, many winch trucks, caterpillars and other related heavy equipment. What has the loss been to Canada? We have suffered a tremendous economic loss under this energy policy. Who knows what the people of Newfoundland will lose? These are people who, like the people of Saskatchewan, need it. What does this do to Canada?

We in the Conservative party view Canada as a great chain and each province as a link. British Columbia contributes some lumber; Alberta, some oil and some gas; Saskatchewan, some wheat; Manitoba, some wheat and some power; Ontario, the great manufacturing area of the country, various manufactured goods such as rubber and so on. In fact, Ontario might be the greatest loser when it comes to the energy policy before us. The parallel is that Canada could become a nation of great strength, with each province making its contribution as a link. But if we have a government which wants to seize power from every one of those links, the links will be broken down and we will not have a Canada.

Is it any wonder that the people of Newfoundland are somewhat concerned about their industry and their resource, just as the people of Saskatchewan are very concerned about their resource? It is interesting to note that even the NDP in Saskatchewan woke up about a year late. They supported the government until it got itself into a mess which I do not think it can straighten out. Mr. Blakeney will have to bear a certain responsibility in the history of the country in allowing the Liberal government and the Liberal-NDP coalition to bring about an energy policy which has had a devastating effect upon the whole economy of the country as no other business arrangement has had in the history of Canada. Some people project that the energy policy is costing Canadians in lost opportunities and spin-off benefits about $1 million per hour, or $24 million per day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Again I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I am trying to convince myself—and I would like the hon. member to convince me—that his argument has any relevance to the motion before us. For the benefit of hon. members, motion No. 3 reads in part as follows:

—be amended in Clause 2 by striking out lines 17 to 25 at page 1 and lines 1 and 2 at page 2—

Again for the benefit of hon. members, those lines read:

—Northwest Territories, or Sable Island, or

(b) those submarine areas, not within a province, adjacent to the coast of Canada and extending throughout the natural prolongation of the land territory of Canada to the outer edge of the continental margin or to a distance of two hundred nautical miles from the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea of Canada is measured, whichever is the greater.

If hon. members want to refer to Canadian ownership, they can do so when we discuss the bill because it is not included in the motion. I invite hon. members to address themselves to the motion.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have sat through this debate and have tried to pay close attention. I understand Your Honour wants to maintain the general rule of relevance. I am sure that is the intention of every hon. member of the House. I sat through the speech of—and I make no reflection on Your Honour's observations—the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Simmons). The difficulty is that he did not say one word with respect to this amendment, and there was no intervention by the Chair. Yet, when we rise to talk about this motion, the Chair intervenes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. That argument was brought forward this afternoon. The answer which I gave to that argument this afternoon was that when hon. members make their remarks, we in the chair often give quite a bit of latitude and are very lenient as far as the rule of relevance is concerned. We had listened to the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), and I would say that most of his remarks strayed from the motion. Therefore, I had to be lenient also with regard to the parliamentary secretary, but on two occasions in the middle of his speech I asked him to direct his remarks to the motion before us. I want no one to feel offended if I do so again. I invite hon. members to address the motion before the House. If not, I do not know why they would need a speaker or someone in the Chair. We have a rule of relevance, and I hope hon. members will abide by it. The hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, it is Comox-Powell River, which is a little distance beyond Selkirk-Interlake.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You are now part of the Canada lands.

Mr. Skelly: The unfortunate part of compelling absolute and strict relevance on the first clause of a bill is that it is difficult to set the context within which the debate will take place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. That argument was also raised by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). Again, I must remind hon. members that we are not dealing with the first clause of the bill. We are dealing with motion No. 3, and I hope hon. members understand. I have clearly read motion No. 3. I am at the disposition of the House. If there is unanimous consent that we discuss the whole bill, I will accept it.

Mr. Evans: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Otherwise, I will invite hon. members to discuss the motion.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of being broad in the sense of discussing everything under the sun.

Mr. Evans: Respect the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): This particular amendments affects the definition of Canada lands. The last speaker was talking about revenues and ownership. Section 40 deals with Canada lands and the royalties derived therefrom. Canada lands must be properly defined in terms of revenue. Obviously this is a money bill. The government is seeking more funds for its treasury. In that context, the limitation we seek on Canada lands is intented to restrict the extent to which revenues can be derived. Therefore, the relevance between funds collectible and the Canada lands is quite obvious.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): With all due respect, I am sure the hon. member speaks with certain authority because of the long time he has been in Parliament, but I must say that the same speech could be repeated after we have passed the motion and are discussing clause 2. Motions are brought to discuss specific problems which hon. members find in a bill. The hon. member for St. John's East wants to have this particular clause excluded. I should like to be convinced by speakers as to why the motion was brought, but certainly when one wants to discuss the whole energy policy, it should be done when the bill is being discussed.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the reason I framed the amendment and moved it in the first place was that the exclusion of coastal areas from the Canada lands would mean that the revenues from offshore resources would accrue to the provinces. Revenues are at the very heart of the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2120)

Mr. McGrath: If you are now ruling, Mr. Speaker, that it is irrelevant to raise the question of revenue, then there is nothing left to discuss because you will have destroyed the whole thrust and purpose of the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I do not think I said that it was not relevant. I said that if the energy policy is to be discussed at length on this motion, then the Chair must take a stand at some point. I heard the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson) talking about the energy policy and about the Canadian ownership program, which comes after motion No. 3 and which is not included in it. Therefore, the debate could be repeated again. If members wish to include in the debate the pricing dispute between Alberta and Ottawa, then I do not think that has any relevance to this motion at all. That is where I wish to draw the line. If the Chair is wrong, then I invite hon. members to guide me on this point.

Mr. McGrath: Alberta is now enjoying the revenue from these Canada lands, and the same is true of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Gustafson: I hope that the time which has been used in debating this issue will not be subtracted from my allotted time.

I will try to follow very carefully, and I believe I have, the issues which are before us. Nothing is more important to the energy policy of this country than the offshore oil relating to the Canada lands and its submarine areas. We are talking about an area which includes ten provinces of this country and from which some day the greater part of oil and energy may be produced in this country. Thus, this issue bears a direct relationship to the energy policy. In the total concept of Bill C-48 there is nothing more important to discuss than the submarine areas and the issue being raised in motion No. 3 as to who controls these resources and who is to receive the revenue from them. If we cannot address ourselves to that issue, then there is nothing to address.

However, the parallel I was trying to draw here has to do with the concept of the government taking control through its energy policy, and particularly through Bill C-48. This is why the hon. member for St. John's East has addressed the important area of who controls that resource. In fact, in my opinion that is why we are having so much trouble in terms of the whole energy policy. Who controls the resources in the provinces is one thing. The whole question is that of control. This is the reason we are having so many problems with regard to the Constitution—we are talking about who controls resources.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gustafson: If this House is to be limited to the point where we cannot discuss this vital issue which is before us, then we are in serious trouble in Canada. What is happening to the people of Newfoundland and their resources? This government, every member of Parliament on the Liberal side and 98 per cent of those in the New Democratic Party, will have to bear the responsibility of bringing a change to government patterns, something that has never happened before in the history of this country.

The traditional direction of dealing with offshore oil, or with oil found anywhere in Canada, has been that the government of Canada—the Liberal government—has a method of taxation and royalty which brought in a fair share of income for the people of Canada. We in the Conservative party believe in a fair share with regard to offshore oil for the people of Canada, and particularly the people of Newfoundland. Let us bring this about through the traditional method of taxation and royalty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gustafson: Let us not bring this about through the nationalization of our oil industy, because if that is done to the people of Newfoundland, Quebec, Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia then they can expect that their gold and nickel mines and their steel industry will be nationalized in the same way our great oil industry is being nationalized by this government. One day every member of Parliament will have to bear responsibility for that to the people of Canada.

Before Bill C-48 is passed, I hope the government comes to the realization of exactly what it is doing. There is no more important area than that covered by motion No. 3, which relates to the area surrounding British Columbia, the maritime provinces and Newfoundland. It just so happens that right now off the coast of Newfoundland the development is such that we are focusing our attention on that area. One of the problems we always have is that we cannot see the forest for the trees. After listening to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) for 18 months, I do not think he is under any illusion as to what he is doing through this bill and what he is doing to the people of Newfoundland, which parallels what he is doing to the people of Saskatchewan and Alberta. Along with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), he intends to take from the provinces the very control of those resources which under the BNA Act, and under documents which were prepared before Newfoundland entered Confederation, they had the right to control.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gustafson: There is no question in my mind that the minister could reach a pricing agreement in one day if it were not for the fact that the provinces of Newfoundland, and the other provinces, are concerned with the issue of the control of resources offshore.

In closing my remarks I say that if Canada is to remain a strong chain, if it is to remain with its links binding the country together, then let us address ourselves to Bill C-48 and take a long clear look at what the Liberal government is bringing upon the people of Canada by trying to nationalize the oil industry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have 20 minutes to speak on motion No. 3. I believe it is the key motion which is before us. More than that, I think it is what differentiates this government from the opposition, the Tory Party in particular, and surprisingly enough from the New Democratic Party.

What we are really talking about on this side of the House is a bill which defines what is a nation. What is being talked about on the opposite side of the House is the whittling away of a nation so that there is nothing left.

Let us look at the motion which is before us, since it is a very interesting one. The Chair has just read the gist of the motion. It would remove Sable Island from the definition of Canada lands. That is the first thing it does. Let us consider Sable Island for a moment. The first time I saw mention of Sable Island was in Article 91.9 of the British North America Act, where the island is included under the powers of the Parliament of Canada. What we are trying to do is to amend the British North America Act. We are taking something in the British North America Act and saying that it is no longer there; it is not part of Canada lands.

• (2130)

I am not a lawyer and I do not want to spend a lot of time on this side of the situation, Mr. Speaker, but in the British Columbia case which dealt with who owns the territorial waters and the continental shelf, the province of British Columbia or the federal government, the most obvious reason that the British Columbia claim did not hold up was that the matter was not covered in Section 92 of the British North America Act.

As I recall my history, when the Fathers of Confederation were setting up this country, they had an image of what was across the border that scared them. One of the reasons this country was put together was the possibility of attack from across the border. When they wrote the British North America Act, which was later passed by the government of Great Britain, they were interested in setting up something which was much stronger. Unfortunately, members of the Tory party today forget that it was our first prime minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, who wanted a very strong nation.

One of the things that the Fathers of Confederation did was to leave in the hands of Parliament those things that were not enumerated.

In many ways, we are trying to take away from the British North America Act something which I think all of us believe only the British Parliament can do. I will grant, Mr. Speaker, that there is a considerable difference in the case of Newfoundland. There is no question about that. In the case of British Columbia and the other territorial waters off, Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, jurisdiction was just to the edge of the ocean. Anything east of the Pacific Ocean was in the province of British Columbia, up to the border of British Columbia. It was the same with the other provinces. In the case of Newfoundland we are dealing with quite a different concept and I will not go into it now. I certainly will not get into the question of international waters.

Since I have the floor, Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if I could carry on a monologue.

I should like to make the point that we have the Geneva agreement and we have treaties. We are talking about the 200-mile continental shelf which permits only the state, that is, Canada, to exploit land in that continental shelf or beyond the 12-mile limit of what is known as the territorial ocean.

How, as a self-respecting nation which belongs to the summit group and which is hosting a meeting of the most powerful non-communist states in the world next week, can we say that we are no longer in control of that area but that the provinces have control of it? I do not understand this.

I do not understand how the two opposition parties can put themselves in the position where they want to change the British North America Act right in this House. They do not even want to ask Britain to do it. After all the fuss the Tories made about going to Britain or even going to the courts to find out whether we could do it, we are saying that Sable island is no longer part of the Canada land. But there it is, in Section 91(9), Sable Island. Section 92 does not mention the offshore or territorial waters, so clearly under the British North America Act it is within the realm of the Parliament of Canada. Are we to accomplish this by just changing one act?

There is nothing to stop us from doing it, Mr. Speaker. But there is a very serious question about whether it would have any relevance. We can always make laws that contravene the British North America Act, but of course the courts would not sustain them.

Another thing about this provision has bothered me for a long time, Mr. Speaker. At the beginning of my speech I mentioned what is the key to the whole of Bill C-48 and that is, again, the question of what is a nation and the question of the provinces owning resources and the federal government owning resources.

In another place I raised the question when the hon. member for St. John's East was present. I did not make a complete argument then and I was not able to get back to the question. I always respect anything that the hon. member for St. John's East does, because he does it very thoughtfully and very carefully. His answer disturbed me, however, and having thought about it a good deal, I should like to respond to it.

Basically, what I said refers not just to the province of Newfoundland, but also to the lands in the north, the lands claimed by the Dene nation. There is a long history of manipulation of small states, and provinces, or what have you, throughout the world, particularly in the United States and Australia, by large multinational, global corporations. Traditionally, it has always been easier to manipulate a state or a province than to manipulate a whole country. I think this is important and I think it should be remembered, particularly by the NDP. There are many stories about this kind of manipulation in states such as Oklahoma and Texas, and it was a major factor in the whole offshore fight.

As I recall, the hon. member for St. John's East said that, coming from Ontario, I was being patronizing by saying that Newfoundland could be manipulated. I said something else, and I will come to that in a minute. I thought about this, because actually I asked: would it not be better if the province of Newfoundland, if the Territories, the Dene peoples' land, and so on, had a sharing arrangement? In the case of Newfoundland, the Government of Canada has offered 100 per cent of the revenue to that province. Would it not be a better situation to let the federal government face the multinational companies?

The hon. member for St. John's East replied that I was being patronizing, or something to that effect. He can correct me if I am not telling the story properly. I thought about northern Ontario where I come from. Precisely the same thing has happened to us in northern Ontario, a weak but large part of our province. We are virtually treeless now, or will be treeless if we do not do something very quickly, because the province of Ontario has been manipulated by a large number of paper companies over the long term. Basically we are now in a position where the economy of the north is in serious jeopardy. In light of this I have someting to say to the province of Newfoundland, to the other Atlantic provinces that would be involved as the result of this motion, and to the people of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory. It is much better at this stage that we as a nation share in these resources. We should share the revenues with those parts of the country which have the resources. However, the ownership or control of these kinds of resources and the resources in those areas which would be excluded by this motion must remain in the hands of the federal government, from the international point of view, the British North America Act and the equity of the whole country.

The people of Canada should understand the meaning of this motion. This motion would take away from the people of Canada control over those lands which belong to this country and offshore resources which under international law and the British North America Act belong to this country. Every Canadian should know what is happening in this House tonight.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have to admit that this has been a spellbinding debate. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson) and the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. McRae) certainly have rare gifts and unique views of the universe, and certainly opposite.

Tonight I want to deal with something which fits directly into my riding. The area off the west coast that is seriously being considered affects directly Comox-Powell River. The shallow basin that exists there has an estimated 300 million to four billion barrels of oil, and maybe as much as 90 trillion cubic feet of gas. That sits right off my riding in Queen Charlotte Sound, Hecate Strait, Johnstone Strait and off the west coast of the island. Motion No. 3 deals with the definition of Canada lands. The Northwest Territories and the Yukon certainly are lands that belong to the Government of Canada as well as the offshore area in the Arctic.

These, however, are not clearly Canada lands. There are other claims, such as aboriginal claims of peoples who were here before the tenure was decided. Those questions must be decided. Ownership of the oil and gas in those lands are called into question. This provision deals with it before those claims have been dealt with. I suggest that removal before dealing with those questions could be removing somebody else's property, and that should be effectively dealt with.

I now want to deal with the other submarine areas adjacent to the two coasts, British Columbia and areas off the Atlantic coast. I understand this motion would advocate that we delete Sable Island and the adjacent submarine areas. That makes sense, but certainly from very different points of view than those raised by members opposite and members to my right.

The two basic questions we face in this bill is, first, that the federal government advocates total jurisdiction. The second major issue, and it has been raised effectively by my colleagues to the right, is the question of tremendous discretionary power in the hands of the minister.

The basic question is: should the federal government have complete jurisdiction over development of oil and gas in offshore areas adjacent to the provinces? I feel, as do a lot of others, that the answer to that question is no. Bill C-48 gives the federal government total jurisdiction and gives the minister unfettered discretionary power. The minister continually justified that in committee saying, we really do not know what is going to happen, we want a free hand". Over the period of history of oil and gas in Canada, no one can dispute that.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan and many others have said that the oil companies have taken us to the cleaners many times and the federal government was in power during that period of time. We find that in this bill there is no clear statement of what the goals should be. The minister and others responsible should have clear instructions to move effectively toward the goals we want to achieve.

We have a bill which moves for complete jurisdiction in areas that have a long history of control over their internal economies and their resources. I suggest that the arguments the government members have put forward are very weak. In fact, they miss the point.

The government members have said we need this power and this control, that in order to keep Canada together we must have energy self-sufficiency, and we have to ensure adequacy of supply and fairness of access. They have also said that they want a share of the revenue in that endeavour. They believe that across Canada there should be an equalization of opportunities for Canadian citizens, that health care, education and the basic expectations of Canadian citizens have to be met and, therefore, that is a source of revenue that should be shared.

Basically there are two points, the energy security and access question and the sharing of revenue. Those goals are correct, but this bill is not the mechanism. We already have mechanisms in place giving complete jurisdiction to the federal government, and to give the minister unfettered discretionary power, and does this bill, without laying out clearly the goals and how he is to achieve them, will create a serious problem.

I suggest this massive appeal to Canada as a nation that it will somehow be destroyed if the provinces are given an effective say in resource development and development of their local economies is a false argument. If we in British Columbia control our resources and resource development, it does not mean that Canada will suffer. There is already the National Energy Board Act and other legislation which governs how energy resources are to be allocated in this country. There is the Income Tax Act and other provisions by which revenue can be taken and dispersed in order to ensure equalization and fair opportunity. It is basically wrong to prohibit those long-standing coastal states from having a meaningful share in the say with regard to development of their resources.

The other side of the coin has been the very compelling and persuasive arguments from my colleagues to the right who say there should be total provincial control over those resources. It is interesting when we look at the dilemma. In the case of British Columbia, over the years there has been the development of oil and gas by multinational corporations, corporations with budgets and financial influence greater than this country. They have not served the best interests of this country. They have largely been let lose by this Liberal government to do their deeds. It will be an interesting and difficult problem to be solved for those multinationals, both the Canadian and foreign owned ones.

The first prime minister of this country presided over what was called the Liberal-Conservative party. That party built an organization in the 1880s called the Canadian Pacific Railroad which ripped off this country from stem to stern. There was a combination of the Liberal-Conservative party, the Bank of Montreal and the Canadian Pacific Railroad. We still have not recovered from that rip-off.

In the 1980s we are creating another CPR out of Dome Petroleum, almost the same mechanism. We will have a very large multinational corporation within Canada. That is not the key point in this. The problem is that those large corporations in provinces like British Columbia and areas like the maritime provinces will be able to whipsaw, thus causing enormous problems. The whole business of corporate blackmail over a period of time has been a problem. What we would find with total provincial control is manipulation of those provincial governments with economic power and clout that would be difficult to resist. So total controls may not be the answer. There is another thing to consider in my area.

• (2150)

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Skelly: Be very careful and read the resolution to the end. Maybe by the end of the presentation I will be able to develop the total concept.

In British Columbia we have had a very interesting small group of people who have capitalized on an enormous amount of economic development in that province. Throughout my area, where much of this offshore drilling and development should take place, there are small communities which have been left out of the mainstream of economic development throughout the history of that province. They are left out today, and when the oil and gas in their communities is developed and removed, they will still be left out because there is a small group of individuals who tend to capitalize on the economic opportunities to reap the benefits. If we look to the east coast, we recognize those names today, whether it is in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Newfoundland. In those areas they are in position and working. In British Columbia there is clear evidence that they are mobilizing, and the government of British Columbia and the Liberal government in Ottawa have done nothing to make sure those other communities participate in the economic benefits.

The whole question of total provincial control means that multinationals would have a very large say, with possibly whipsaw and cost problems. There are local oligarchies which have always benefited at the expense of many other segments in those provincial societies. They would tend to work with those multinationals to benefit.

There is also the question of federal resources. If in fact an oil spill should occur off Rivers Inlet, Calvert Island, Bella Bella, northern Vancouver Island—wherever it happens to occur—such as the one that took place in the Caribbean that cost $1 billion to cap, the province of British Columbia is not going to cap that; it is not going to clean it up. It will require the resources of the federal government. If you have to take responsibility for long-term consequences, there is a question of resources. I am convinced, after listening to testimony, that we are not talking about the possibility of an oil spill occurring, we are talking about the timing of such an oil spill. Whose resources will pay for cleaning it up and who is going to have a say in the standards? I would urge my colleagues to the right to consider that maybe total provincial control needs better definition; maybe it needs some slight change.

The last thing we have to take a serious look at is the whole question of some very deep rooted economic disparities. Total provincial control has never been able to address this in the past. With the opportunity to develop this oil and gas, I doubt whether we will be able to see, with control in provincial hands, the removal of disparity among some of those communities. Possibly in terms of provincial control we have to look to a different mechanism.

On the other side of the coin of provincial control, we have a couple of items. First of all, decisions should be left as much as possible in the hands of the people whom those decisions affect—local communities and regional areas. They have the right to make the decisions that affect their lives. The argument for provincial control is sound in that respect. Local authorities with an opportunity to develop those resources would be more accountable. There is no doubt that a politician in British Columbia, or a government there or in Nova Scotia is more accountable to the people than a government in Ottawa. There are as many members of Parliament from the greater Toronto area as there are from the entire province of British Columbia. When you address a question from British Columbia to central Canada, or the Parliament of Canada, it is diluted down a tremendous degree. National priorities are far higher than local or regional priorities.

Therefore, as my colleagues on the right I think correctly pointed out, local control is imperative. Local control would have an opportunity to be more accountable to the needs of the people, whether they are associated with the disparity question, a response to environment or the strengthening of small economies. If you give control of oil development to the provinces, the local or regional areas, you will strengthen those communities in my area. You will provide more improved transportation. We have sat in this House and battled for years over improved transportation. If those communities on the coast of B.C. had improved transportation, their entire economic development, their stake and their position would improve, but this falls on deaf ears in this House. Maybe if this oil is developed under local control, the transportation system will improve and develop. We would then wind up with strengthened communities and improved transportation systems, and, by and large I think an improved situation.

We have a strange dichotomy here. We have the Tories on the right arguing for total provincial control and we have the Liberals with national interest in equalization and, basically, an energy security structure, arguing for federal control. Maybe the ultimate solution is a new approach, one that says there should be co-operative development of those resources, and that as much as possible the federal government should set standards for the development and define, in agreement with the provinces, where development can occur. If the provinces were in a position to meet those agreements, those minimum standards, they could develop and improve beyond that in ways that would be meaningful to those people. What we will wind up with is maybe a new approach, maybe one which says that the federal government should sit down with the province of British Columbia and discuss what offshore oil and gas development could mean to that province and where there could be a meeting of minds. Possibly there should be the passing of reciprocal legislation to give momentum to that kind of agreement.

Then beyond that point possibly British Columbia, in agreement with the federal government, could take control of developing an area, which is really developing resources that are within the confines of the province of British Columbia, in Hecate Strait, Queen Charlotte Sound or in Johnstone Strait, and in that way maybe we could deal with both aspirations—with the question of equalization and resource sharing. In this way we could settle the question of control over those resources in order to provide security on a national basis, as well as provide tremendous local benefits by giving British Columbians an opportunity to say how local communities will be strengthened as a result of the development and how transportation should be improved.

We could also decide how to remove pockets of deep-seated and chronic disparity such as exists in the Indian communities. Under the present system they will receive the oil spills and probably the negative effects of such development. Probably they will not be given an opportunity to participate and to share in the economic benefits. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Though I am usually brief, Mr. Speaker, I do not think I could complete my remarks in one minute. Perhaps I might call it ten o'clock and start tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been made.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—(A) APPOINTMENT OF FULLTIME MINISTER. (B) DECENTRALIZATION OF DEPARTMENT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, on June 23 of this year I directed a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) regarding the appointment of a full-time Minister of Veterans Affairs. In the Department of Veterans Affairs today we have a very serious problem regarding the processing of veterans' pension applications, some of which take from one to five years to process. I pointed out at the time that the present minister has not been able to find a solution to the problem. I asked that the Prime Minister inform us when he would be appointing a full-time minister who can deal with this very serious problem in the department. We received one of the evasive and uninformative answers we usually receive from the Prime Minister, regardless of whatever question we are posing to him.

● (2200)

I also asked the Prime Minister whether the government would be considering leaving the Pension Commission in Ottawa in order to rectify the one to five years' delay in processing veterans' pension applications. We received some more typical Liberal gobbledygook on that.

At a recent meeting of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs the chairman of the Pension Commission pointed out that he has very, very serious problems finding personnel who wish to transfer to Prince Edward Island and, of course, this is delaying the processing of veterans' pension applications.

Speaking in the House on July 10 of this year with regard to Bill C-82, which was amendments to the Pension Act and the Compensation for Former Prisons of War Act, the acting Minister of Veterans Affairs pointed out:

—I am confident this legislation will have the support of all parties. It is further proof of this nation's resolve that veterans and their survivors will continue to receive just and generous treatment.

At the present time, veterans are not receiving just and generous treatment if they have to wait up to five years to have their pensions processed, and we have a serious problem with respect to a very high percentage of veterans passing on before their applications can be processed. I have called this before an absolute national disgrace.

Because I received no firm or concrete answers from the Prime Minister to my questions to him, I wrote him a letter with respect to this problem, and I understand that officials in the Pension Commission and in the Department of Veterans Affairs are in the process of compiling an answer to my letter.

The letter I wrote to the Prime Minister was dated June 25, and I called for the appointment of a full-time minister of veterans affairs. I also pointed out that there are two main factors causing a malaise within the department. In the first instance, the legislation which the department has to deal with is cumbersome and archaic. As the chairman of the Pension Commission has pointed out in the Standing Committee of Veterans Affairs, he is hamstrung with the present legislation. There is no way he can process veterans' pension applications any quicker. It will take from one to five years under the present legislation. That is why I am on my feet tonight. I am on my feet to request once again that a new piece of legislation be introduced as soon as possible to cut out all this rigmarole veterans have to go through before pension applications can be processed.

I will give hon. members the exact wording of what we heard from Mr. Solomon in the standing committee on May 28. Mr. Solomon stated:

These procedures—

Referring to the Canadian legislation.

—although they are marvelous safeguards, take time, and they are hamstringing us in many ways.

In my letter to the Prime Minister I said that the aging veterans in this country simply do not have the years left to wait for this hamstringing, time-consuming legislative process to run its course.

In a letter dated June 2 of 1980 Mr. Chadderton, the chief executive officer of the War Amputations of Canada, listed the names of some 370 veterans associated with that organization alone who died waiting for their pensions. The War Amps are dealing with this figure in gathering detailed statistical information which is required before it can make applications to the Pension Commission. This figure is in addition to the applications the Pension Commission already has in hand.

● (2205)

I understand the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs is going around privately challenging these figures. I understand there are phone calls going on at the present time challenging the figures; it is not 50 per cent, it is some other figure. That is not the point at all, Mr. Speaker. We need a piece of legislation to get rid of this archaic nonsense of taking up to five years to process a veteran's application. That is the point, not whether it is 40, 50 or 60 per cent.

I have gone into great detail in my letter to the Prime Minister with regard to actual individual cases which have come to my attention. Every day there is a member of the Conservative party who comes to me and says: What are we going to do about the Pension Commission? What are we going to do about getting these applications processed? That is all I have listened to since I have been the spokesman for the Conservative party on veterans affairs. We have evasive answers from the acting minister. He has absolutely nothing to say, and tries to slough it all off on his officials. We are getting absolutely nowhere. Some of the Liberals are laughing; it is a big joke with them.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, once again the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) comes to the House with an argument short on facts and long on fiction. I want to deal with the two points he raised in a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on June 23 as reported at page 10885 of Hansard.

The hon. member asked the Prime Minister when he would appoint a minister of veterans affairs, and if he would consider having the headquarters of the Canadian Pension Commission stay in Ottawa and not relocate to Prince Edward Island.

Since the death of the Hon. Daniel MacDonald, Mr. Speaker, the acting Minister of Veterans Affairs has been responsible before Parliament for the portfolio. In this House, before its committees and the committees of the other place, the acting minister, being himself a veteran and a former POW, has been a stalwart representative of the interests of veterans and their families. The Prime Minister, when answering the member, took the opportunity to state once again his intention of appointing a minister. Hon. members will recall the previous government had designated one minister to be permanently responsible for Veterans Affairs and National Defence. This was done in spite of and in complete disregard of the wishes of veterans as expressed in the vigorous campaign mounted by the Royal Canadian Legion.

So for the hon. member to come here this evening and berate the government and the Prime Minister for not appointing a full-time minister immediately when his own government had put the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) permanently in charge of both National Defence and Veterans Affairs, I think is completely incongruous.

In addition, the relocation of the veterans affairs head office to Charlottetown was announced on October 26, 1976. The decision applied to the department and the four agencies, and was part of the government's policy of decentralization whose goals were: To move the administration of federal government programs closer to the people directly affected by them; to increase the presence of the federal government in communities where it has been low and where activities of a national nature can contribute to national unity; and to reduce the disproportionately high concentration of federal employees in the national capital region.

The relocation of Veterans Affairs involves the transfer of some 760 positions to Charlottetown of which 271 are with the Canadian Pension Commission. Presently, there are 160 DVA employees working in Charlottetown. The number of employees who agree to move will not be known until nine months prior to the official date of relocation of the positions. At present, the expected date of relocation for the Canadian Pension Commission is September, 1983.

The relocation has received the approval of three governments including the previous one, and I can assure the House that every effort is being made to minimize any disruption in the service provided to veterans. We are confident that veterans and their families will be as well served by departmental and agency employees working from Charlottetown as they were from Ottawa.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg Assiniboine is inflaming passions with statements not based on fact but based on his own great imagination.

Mr. McKenzie: I will send your answer to all the Legions in your riding.

COMBINES—REQUEST FOR RELEASE OF REPORT ON URANIUM CARTEL. (A) REQUEST THAT INDEPENDENT PROSECUTOR REVIEW EVIDENCE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight with respect to the persistent questioning of the government by members of my party concerning the uranium cartel and the subsequent charges which have been laid respecting a number of companies in Canada including Crown corporations within which two senior government officials were named in the information as unindicted co-conspirators, namely, Mr. MacNabb and John Runnalls.

Our inquiries with respect to the uranium cartel activities have, to a large extent, been directed toward the whole concept of determining whether or not the government has any understanding at all of the traditional parliamentary concept of ministerial responsibility. The government has consistently refused, in answering questions on the floor of the House of Commons and outside the House, to say whether Messrs. MacNabb and Runnalls acted on their own or on the instruction of the government. It is a rather peculiar evasion of a very essential and important fact respecting this matter.

It went to the extent that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) would not even tell us whether the government was prepared to provide counsel for these two people in the course of the legal proceedings which are about to take place in the prosecution.

Mr. Donald Macdonald was the minister during a good portion of time during which, the allegation is made in the information, there was a price-fixing arrangement respecting domestic prices in Canada. Mr. Macdonald indicated the following in a CBC interview:

> I can certainly say that there is absolutely no indication at any point to myself and I am sure other federal officials that the companies were getting together to take advantage of the situation—

Also he indicated that no one at the federal level was consulted about domestic prices following world prices. But there are a number of instances which are now a matter of public record that fly in the face of this contention on the part of Mr. Macdonald and of the response of the government. First, the Gulf memorandum of March 8, 1974 clearly indicated that the officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources recognized that Canadian utilities must be prepared to pay export prices. Second, the companies themselves were initially very concerned about the combines law. Third, apparently cabinet discussed the possible domestic consequences of the cartel at the outset of the arrangement. Fourth, we have the simple and bald fact that Messrs. MacNabb and Runnalls are now named as co-conspirators.

I will not comment on whether or not any further charges should be laid. It is really impossible to tell. That is the reason we are trying to get more information as to why a greater number of people who were clearly involved in the cartel arrangement were not joined, even as unindicted co-conspirators, or named in the information.

Officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources were involved. Either the minister knew what was happening at the time or he was ignorant. In either event, there are serious problems. The government is attempting to reduce the issue to a narrow legal one and trying to escape any further questioning on the basis that the matter is now before the court.

The principle of ministerial responsibility is basic and goes beyond the technical, legal culpability. This has nothing to do with the notion which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) advanced in the House that you must trust somebody.

I should like to refer to the fifth edition of "The Government of Canada" by R. MacGregor Dawson and revised by Norman Ward of Saskatoon. Page 176 of the book reads as follows:

> The minister at the head of every department is responsible for everything that is done within that department; and inasmuch as he will expect praise or assume blame for all the acts of his subordinates, he must have the final word in any important decision that is taken.

It continues:

> R. L. Borden, when leader of the opposition, aptly described the ideal situation as follows:
> A Minister of the Crown is responsible, under the system in Great Britain, for the minutest details of the administration in his department; he is politically responsible, but he does not know anything at all about them. When anything goes wrong in his department, he is responsible therefore to Parliament; and if he comes to Parliament and points out that he entrusted the duty to an official in the ordinary course and in good faith, that he had been selected for his capacity, and ability and integrity, and the moment that man had gone wrong the Minister had investigated the matter to the full and punished that man either by degradation or dismissal, he has done his duty to the public. That is the way matters are dealt with in Great Britain, and it is in that way, it seems to me, that our affairs ought to be carried on in this country.

● (2215)

Mr. Macdonald, the minister in 1972 and 1975, was interviewed by the CBC yesterday morning in Edmonton. In the course of that interview, he was asked by the interviewer whether at any time the reports which Crown corporations had to make to government involved the price being charged for uranium on the domestic market. In his response, Mr. Macdonald said in part:

> No, I don't think so any more than the kind of conduct . . . by CBC employees should be a matter of day to day surveillance by ministers—

The interviewer interrupted, but Mr. Macdonald went on to say:

> Just let me finish, please, you can trust the operations of the Crown corporations to officials to whom you have confidence and that was done and the question has now been raised by the Combines people as to whether or not the management of those two corporations exceeded the law in what they did.

In reviewing the annual reports of Uranium Canada, which is a Crown corporation, I find it peculiar when looking through the reports from 1972 to the present time to find out exactly what is reported to the minister. This is a Crown corporation of which Mr. Runnalls and Mr. MacNabb were officers.

I wish to make two observations. The first is that Uranium Canada had no personnel and that the administration of that corporation was carried out exclusively by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. There were no employees of Uranium Canada. Who were the officers of Uranium Canada from 1972 to 1975? The president was one Jacob Austin, otherwise known as Jack Austin, otherwise known as Senator Jack Austin. In one of his aliases, he was deputy minister to the minister of energy, mines and resources and, in fact—

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with the two questions raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn). The first question is a request for the release of the report on uranium cartel.

On September 30, 1977, the then minister of consumer and corporate affairs, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grace-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand), made an order pursuant to paragraph 8(c) of the Combines Investigation Act requiring the Director of Investigation and Research to inquire into the marketing of uranium with a view to obtaining all the facts and determining whether a violation of the Combines Investigation Act had occurred. In other words, the Director of Investigation and Research was required to conduct an investigation into the question of whether any individual or corporation had committed an offence. The Director carried out the investigation, and then on May 25, 1981, a report on the evidence gathered was submitted to the Attorney General of Canada pursuant to section 15 of the Combines Investigation Act in order to enable the Attorney General to decide what course should be followed.

It has always been the policy of the Department of Justice not to release reports made to it on investigations conducted into the commission of alleged offences. This applies whether the investigation relates to alleged violations of the Combines Investigation Act, the Income Tax Act, the Narcotic Control Act, the Customs Act and so on. The reason for the policy is simply based on considerations of fair play. If the person or corporation who has been investigated is not charged, to release the report on the investigation could very well amount to publicly accusing him of violating the law without the person concerned having any opportunity to defend himself or herself. On the other hand, if a charge is laid, then the results of the investigation are made public under the circumstances which are controlled by a court of law. That is to say, the evidence that is submitted must be admissible evidence and the accused person must be given an opportunity to make full answer and defence. I repeat, this has always been the policy of the Department of Justice and, as indicated, is based on considerations of fair play and natural justice.

The second question is a request that an independent prosecutor be appointed to review the evidence. When the Director of Investigation and Research commenced his inquiry, he—not the government or any member of the government—chose Mr. John Brown of the Toronto firm of Blake, Cassells and Graydon in September of 1977 to assist him in the inquiry. After working on the case for over three years, Mr. Brown reported his conclusions to the Director of Investigation and Research in April of this year. As already indicated, the director, in turn, referred the case to the Attorney General of Canada last May. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) sought further direct advice from Mr. Brown on the question of whether prosecution was warranted. He was advised in the affirmative and Mr. Brown has been appointed agent of the Attorney General of Canada and special prosecutor on the case.

There is absolutely nothing upon which to base any suggestion that Mr. Brown has acted throughout other than in a capacity totally independent of influence from the government. Indeed, any suggestion of that kind would simply be an unwarranted and unfounded reflection on Mr. Brown's professional integrity. For these reasons there is no basis for a request that yet another independent counsel be appointed to review the evidence.

BANK ACT—QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE REVISIONS TO CONTROL INTEREST RATES

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to protest the answers to questions about interest rates given in this House, in light of the statements on the same subject made outside the House. There seems to be some discrepancy between what is said in the House and what pass for answers outside the House.

It all began when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was quoted in the press. This is only one quote from many speeches delivered around the farming community this spring. In the Western Producer of May 14, 1981, there appears the following:

During his Humboldt address, Whelan also severely criticized the banks for showing what he called their lack of responsibility toward the problems farmers are now facing with high interest rates.

The article goes on:

Whelan added it was "criminal" that efficient producers are going bankrupt over high rates.

Earlier the same article had this to say:

Whelan said he will try to get the amendment into the Bank Act during the current review of the act.

The Bank Act was dealt with seven or eight months prior to that time, Mr. Speaker. When the question concerning the statements of the Minister of Agriculture was raised in the House, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) replied that he believed that the matter was clarified the previous week in the House when the Minister of Agriculture acknowledged that he did not have in mind the revision of the Bank Act. He added that he did not have that in mind either. That should have put an end to the doubt about the government's policy with regard to interest rates. We know from experience that the Minister of Agriculture quite often engages in flights of fancy. He is well known to be an expert spreader of that famous bovine barnyard product which he spreads very quickly and deeply. But we now find that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been engaging in the same game.

Before his trip to Washington to prepare for the summit, the Toronto Star of July 10 had this to say:

I think the Minister of Finance (Allan MacEachen) has made it clear that we think that real interest rates are far too high.

I am not sure whether the Minister of Finance has said that, but apparently the Prime Minister thinks that. The article also reads:

He was expected to ask Reagan today when his interest-rate policy is going to work.

The article went on to say:

It was the first time Trudeau spelled out Canada's position on the contentious economic issue.

And, later:

But although interest rates "are far too high" Trudeau said he would not start an argument with Reagan at the summit meeting.

This is another indication of the solution to the high interest rate problem. The Minister of Agriculture provides his assessment, and his solution was an amendment to the Bank Act, which we have just finished amending.

Then the Prime Minister engages in another strategy, which is hope. He made it very clear he hopes the U.S. strategy will work because we do not seem to have any strategy in Canada that will deal with the problem of high interest rates.

The Prime Minister's commitment is not particularly strong, however, as he is quoted in the press as saying, that although interest rates are far too high, he would not start an argument with Reagan at the summit meeting. The summit is reserved for important issues, yet the most important issue raised by the Prime Minister, according to the press report, was high interest rates.

I am not satisfied with the replies we have been getting from the government, Mr. Speaker. Members of the government are creating an expectation of action with a clearly stated intention in the House by the finance minister of doing nothing.

I have outlined to the House the statement made to the Prime Minister prior to his talks with President Reagan. I have reviewed the promises made by the Minister of Agriculture to amend the Bank Act when he knows and we know that the Bank Act was amended just seven months ago. Where was the minister with his proposals seven or eight months ago when the Bank Act was open for amendment? Why did he not support some of the amendments that my colleagues offered to regulate interest rate and to regulate the bank spread? He was strangely silent when he could have been taking action. I think the people of Canada deserve to know what the real interest rate policy of the government is, Mr. Speaker.

● (2225)

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): There are important reasons why the government is not prepared to contemplate direct control over the interest rates paid or charged by the chartered banks.

First of all, in the context of over-all monetary and exchange rate policy, variable interest rates are an essential part of the mechanism for moderating extreme variations in demand, production, prices and the exchange rate. The fixing of interest rates would tend to result in greater instability in these other important variables. As we know, the current high level of interest rates reflects to a considerable extent the current and expected levels of inflation, as well as current events in the United States and the tightening of monetary policy in an attempt to bring inflation under control. To fix interest rates at an artificially low level in these circumstances would discourage savings and encourage borrowing, thus exacerbating the demand supply pressures and would undoubtedly lead to economic inefficiencies and a worsening of inflation.

A second, equally important, aspect of the government's interest rate policies is that connected with the over-all efficiency of the financial system to gather and allocate savings. In this setting, it has generally been government policy to leave interest rates free to be determined by the forces of supply and demand. The rationale for this approach has been that the market mechanism is more finely tuned and tends to allocate resources over all more efficiently than government directives. Also, if the government were involved in the rate-setting business, it would have to be certain that the structure of rates were appropriate, and that the spreads allowed the banks were adequate to meet their capital needs and to provide an adequate return to shareholders. Further, it would be grossly inequitable to control the interest rates paid and charged by the banks without also imposing similar controls on competing institutions and other supplies of credit in the market place.

Furthermore, the imposition of interest rate ceilings on particular categories of loans could result in a drying up of the supply of funds being made for that purpose. Financial institutions, as other corporations, cannot be expected to lend out funds to customers at rates of interest below the level which they must pay to gather those funds from savers in the system and to cover the credit risks and administration costs associated with their lending and borrowing operation.

In addition, it has not been the policy of the government to implement measures to provide broadly based relief from the effects of high interest rates to specific sectors of the economy.

ENERGY

URGENCY OF NEGOTIATING AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, Canada has some 40 billion to 50 billion barrels of heavy oil amenable to in situ recovery. The Cold Lake heavy oil plant is the first commercial heavy oil plant, so what is at stake is not only oil supply but also commercialization of new technology which is vital to Canada's future oil self-sufficiency. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko):

That this House recognize the collapse of this project as a national emergency and request that the Prime Minister immediately involve himself directly and fully in negotiating an energy agreement with Alberta.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VIA RAIL

PROPOSED ABANDONMENT OF PASSENGER SERVICES ON VANCOUVER ISLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, in light of the fact that VIA Rail has notified the government of its intention to abandon a number of passenger services, in particular the Esquimalt and Nanaimo railway service running from Victoria to Courtenay, British Columbia; in light of the order by the Canadian Transport Commission to keep that passenger service running; in view of the historic commitment inherited by VIA Rail to provide passenger service up the east coast of the island, and in light, finally, of the difficulty once a rapid transit route or system is abandoned to get it started up again, and the future needs in the area for such a system, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That the government reject the application of VIA Rail to eliminate its passenger service on the E & N and require it to refrain from further announcements of this sort unless or until further public hearings are called.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the damage done to the process of collective bargaining in the postal strike by the statements of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and his colleagues, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle (Mr. Lefebvre):

That this House urges the Leader of the Opposition to undergo lessons in industrial relations so that his party in future disputes may be better able to act in the public interest.

SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER DISCUSS HUMAN RIGHTS WITH PRESIDENT NYERERE OF TANZANIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has announced his intention to visit President Julius Nyerere of Tanzania in August. Since President Nyerere has an astonishing record of brutality against those who oppose him politically, and an unenviable record on human rights, as recorded by Amnesty International, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the House urges the Prime Minister to discuss the matter of human rights with President Nyerere and urge him to bring a sense of humanity to his troubled country.

SUPPORT URGED FOR PASSENGER SERVICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. While most of the industrialized countries in the world are making massive investments in modernizing and expanding their rail passenger service, the Government of Canada wants to reduce passenger routes in Canada drastically. It forces VIA Rail to operate as CP and CN did, that is, if a passenger train is run old enough, late enough, slow enough, and dirty enough, nobody will get on it and the route can be abandoned. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) lays a bum rap on VIA Rail, complaining about the subsidy to VIA, and conveniently forgets to mention that all other modes of transportation receive billions of dollars in direct and indirect subsidies from the public purse. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House calls upon the government to (1) retain all present passenger routes; (2) provide VIA Rail with additional funds to invest in more new equipment, such as, at least ten more new train sets and expanded passenger routes; and, (3) provide full policy support to VIA Rail so that in a few years it can succeed so well that the taxpayers investment will be more than repaid.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Whereas the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) personally asked at least six candidates to run for his party in the Spadina byelection, Mr. Gordon Chong, Mr. Allan Eagleson, Mr. Richard Kirkup, Mr. Ron Atkey, Mr. David Kadis and Mrs. Laura Sabia, and whereas only Mrs. Sabia, after some reluctance, agreed, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson):

Becker of Sweden, which has already resulted in over two dozen salaried employees being let go, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce state publicly that his department is working to ensure that frames for General Motors cars will continue to be fabricated in Canada, and that any approval by FIRA for the sale of portions of the Kitchener Uniroyal general products plant will not be made without the condition of sale including protection for long-term Canadian employees.

NEGOTIATION OF SERVICE CONTRACTS WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, the provincial governments that now employ the Royal Canadian Mounted Police under contract have been forced to consider other methods of providing police services because of the onerous and unreasonable financial demands of the federal government. In order to ensure both the continuance of the RCMP as a viable national force, and the peace and security of the provincial residents involved, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That this House take the appropriate steps and advise the U.S. House of Representatives that such restrictive and protectionist moves would be counter-productive to the good will that Canadians and Americans have maintained over the years.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL STRIKE—APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. We are all happy to see some break in the postal deadlock with the agreement of both parties to accept mediation services.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Certainly we see this as a very positive step which would not have happened had the government had its way and adjourned the House of Commons last week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: We welcome that initiative and we hope that mediation produces a speedy settlement. Could the President of the Treasury Board confirm that a mediator will be appointed this afternoon, and is he in a position to tell us who that mediator will be?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, with respect to the preamble of the question, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition suggested that this might not have happened. I would agree to this extent: it might not have happened because we could easily have had a negotiated settlement perhaps last week without the intervention of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: In any event, the parties have agreed on a mediator. I understand that the name will be made public this afternoon. I am not in a position to make it public here. I believe it will probably be made public by the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

COMMENCEMENT OF MEDIATION MEETINGS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the nation knows that the government's interest last week was not in settling the strike but in getting rid of Parliament, and that because Parliament stayed there is some possibility of getting the strike resolved. Could the President of the Treasury Board inform the House when we could expect the mediator to be at work and when meetings between the two parties will begin?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): As soon as possible, Madam Speaker.

QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE IMPOSITION OF CONDITIONS ON MEDIATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to hear that. Since the appointment of a mediator indicates that there has been a successful conclusion to negotiations, at least on the intent to mediate, could the President of the Treasury Board tell us whether any conditions have been imposed upon the mediation by either side and, if so, what those conditions are?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am not sure what the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition means with respect to conditions being imposed upon the mediator. There are always terms of reference for mediation, if that is what he is referring to. I have not looked at any specific terms of reference, but clearly whatever has happened has been agreed upon by both parties, so I do not see why it should be of any concern to the Leader of the Opposition.

EFFECT OF STRIKE ON PASSPORT APPLICANTS

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, that is called bargaining in good faith. In the absence of the minister responsible for passports, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. What arrangements have been made to solve the problems of those people whose passport applications are stuck in the mail, in most cases including birth certificates? They now find that they cannot get their passports. This prevents them from travelling abroad and thereby causes two significant problems. They are forfeiting substantial deposits which they have paid on their trips, and they are also without their most significant and most important piece of personal identification.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Obviously, Madam Speaker, that is a source of problems for many Canadians who are anxious to travel abroad. Advertisements have been published in various newspapers to inform the public how to get in touch with Canadian government offices throughout the country.

[English]

INCOME TAX PAYMENTS DELAYED IN MAIL

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, the question concerned what to do about the stuff stuck in the mail. I have a similar question which I could perhaps address to the Deputy Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of National Revenue. Will the government ensure that the same treatment will apply to late income tax payments which are stuck in the mail as will apply to income tax rebates which are similarly trapped, that is, if no interest is to be paid on such rebates, then no interest will be charged on late payments, or conversely, if interest is to be charged, then interest at least at the same rate will also be paid on income tax rebates?

THE ECONOMY

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ABANDON HIGH INTEREST RATE POLICY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Prime Minister met with seven leaders of the labour world from the seven countries which are to attend the Summit meeting here in Ottawa next week. The Prime Minister is reported to have agreed to raise their concern about the monetarism of some of the countries in the world and high interest rates, at the Summit. If that is the case, can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us if it is the intention of the government, in order to show some leadership to abandon its own high interest rate policy before the Summit? Is the government considering abandoning its high interest rate policy to show some leadership on the world level before the Summit?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think it would be unwise to abandon the anti-inflationary stance which the government is taking. I do not believe any government represented at the Summit will advocate that course of action.

PRIME MINISTER'S DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): It is obvious that the government's policy is not working. According to an official spokesman of the President of the United States, when our Prime Minister visited that country a few days ago he did not even raise the question of high interest rates with the American President. I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister why the Prime Minister did not raise that important issue with the President of the United States, since the United States plays an important role in the world economic situation.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have not discussed with the Prime Minister the nature of his discussions with the President. I do not usually take what is in the press as the reality of events. I got over that a long time ago and I hope that the hon. member will reach that stage sometime.

I have no doubt that the hon. member is interested that the question of economic policy followed in the industrialized countries will be raised at the Summit. Obviously one of the major items on the agenda is the question of general economic policy, which will be discussed. I would be very surprised if interest rates are not a subject at the forefront of the discussions. How it will be discussed is another question.

EUROPEAN CALL FOR ECONOMIC EXPANSION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, can the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House whether or not his government supports the proposition put forward by the French President, François Mitterrand, and Chancellor Schmidt of West Germany which, in effect, is a call for economic expansion and full employment? If our government supports that policy then what action is it planning to take?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, just a short time ago I attended a meeting of the OECD countries in Paris at which all the representatives of the industrialized countries were present, including the new French ministers and representatives of the German government. All the industrialized countries were able to agree on a communique dealing with the economy in which appropriate attention was placed on the fight against inflation and the necessity of succeeding in that fight before it would be possible to resume upward growth in the industrialized economies. I have no doubt that every leader at the Summit will be concerned about future growth and employment prospects, but it seems to me self-evident that if we are to succeed we must deal with inflation as a major priority at the present time.

INDUSTRY

CANADIAN PRODUCTION OF COMPONENTS FOR F-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On June 29, 1981, McDonnell Douglas of the United States announced the awarding of four contracts to Canadian companies to build parts for the Hornet fighter interceptor aircraft. It is understood that McDonnell Douglas Canada will receive two contracts worth a total of $235 million. Will the minister inform the House when production of the components for the F-18 will begin at McDonnell Douglas, thus ensuring the creation of an estimated 250 jobs, and will he also advise whether the 1,048 people laid off since last August by McDonnell Douglas will be given priority when rehiring begins?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, it is my understanding that within 60 days of that announcement the company will begin the basic design and the layout work, and the actual components will begin to be assembled by the end of the year. I presume that priority will be given by McDonnell Douglas to the presently laid-off workers pursuant to the requirements of the collective agreement.

COMBINES

URANIUM CARTEL IMPACT ON DOMESTIC PRICES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice, to whom I have given notice of my intention to ask a question with respect to the uranium cartel. It relates to the principle of ministerial responsibility and accountability. The minister will have had an opportunity to refresh his memory with respect to this whole matter. Therefore, stonewalling is not permitted. However, the minister will know the principle of which I speak, that is, the minister is responsible for everything that happens within his department, and the Prime Minister is responsible for everything that happens with respect to his ministry.

In view of the fact that the Prime Minister has admitted knowing that the cartel had an impact on Canadian prices in 1975, will the minister tell the House with which of his ministers the Prime Minister discussed this matter, and what action was taken by the Prime Minister and the government in 1975?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I have already indicated that we have referred the whole uranium file to the court when we decided to prosecute the six companies. That case is now before the courts. Therefore I have nothing to add about ministerial responsibility. That, of course, does not fall under my jurisdiction.

[English]

ACTIONS OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, the scattered applause is quite understandable. We are not talking about the charges. We are talking about ministerial responsibility. I hope the minister understands that. A review of the annual reports of Uranium Canada, from 1970 to 1978, has indicated two interesting points. One is that Uranium Canada is a shell of a company. It has no staff. The administration and operation of Uranium Canada take place by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. The second point is that up until 1975 the president of Uranium Canada was one Jacob Austin, the deputy minister of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That was a time when the cartel was alleged to have operated, covering from 1970 to 1978. Surely, the minister is not trying to suggest that the deputy minister was unaware of the activities of his assistant deputy minister, Mr. McNabb, and of Dr. Runalls? Surely he does not want us to believe that an experienced man like Mr. Austin, who was a principal secretary to the Prime Minister, would not have reported to his minister and to the Prime Minister? Is he expecting us to believe that kind of story?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I would like to—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I just want to say that for four years there was an inquiry done on this file. A report was prepared for Mr. Bertrand.

Mr. Clark: A hidden report.

Mr. Chrétien: I have hired the same lawyers as Mr. Bertrand hired.

Mr. Andre: Let us see the report.

Mr. Chrétien: They have decided to recommend to me that we prosecute six companies. I have done so. I am not responsible for a company to which the hon. member is referring. The matter is in front of the court, and I have nothing else to add.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADA PENSION PLAN

REQUEST FOR QUARTERLY INDEXATION

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The minister will know, I am sure, that the high, inflationary, double digit rates which we are presently experiencing impact most heavily on pensioners and other low income groups. The minister will also know that recently the Economic Council of Canada said that in spite of this government's attempts we will have double digit inflation for several years. The minister may not know, however, the fact that the Canada-Quebec Pension Plan is indexed only yearly, and that it costs Canadian pensioners under that plan some $200 a year. Does the government intend to bring in legislation to index the Canada-Quebec Pension Plan quarterly, as is done in OAS and GIS, and if so, when?

• (1430)

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the Canada Pension Plan will necessarily be included in the review of pension plans which we have undertaken and will continue next fall. I am very glad to know the position of the Progressive Conservative Party. This is one of its first positive recommendations concerning the pension plan review, and this aspect of the question will certainly be included in this review.

[English]

QUERY RESPECTING FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I am rather surprised that the minister shows a lack of haste on this issue. Certainly the government is now spending some $70 million on propaganda, and is spending some $268 million to subsidize the American car driver. I know that if the minister inquires from some of her officials she will find that it would only cost $70 million to bring in quarterly indexing. I would think that the minister would show greater concern.

My supplementary question concerns the fact that last spring we had a pension conference. At that time I think the Prime Minister, and also the Minister of Finance, indicated that in July there would be a pensions conference with the provinces. I wonder whether a date has been set for that conference and whether the terms of reference have been decided upon.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know that it is quite difficult for a federal minister to move on the Canada Pension Plan in, I think the word he used was a "hasty", way. It means fast. He may want to discuss this with the B.C. minister of finance or he may want to call Mr. Frank Miller of Ontario, or different ministers of finance. They do not like any changes to the Canada Pension Plan when it takes money away from them and out of the $18 billion fund that they enjoy now at preferred interest rates. That is what it does. No change can be made that rapidly by one government alone.

Mr. Clark: And the July conference? Or was that just another lie?

MARINE TRANSPORT

USE OF CANADIAN REGISTERED VESSELS TO SHIP EXPORTS

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Trade. It was announced in today's press that Japan intends to expand its merchant fleet, in part to transport coal from northern B.C. In light of the minister's interest in expanding overseas trade, particularly in the Orient, is he prepared to recommend to his colleagues in cabinet that Canada must abide by the international agreements that require 40 per cent of Canadian exports to be transported in Canadian registered vessels?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (Trade)): Madam Speaker, I just returned from a trip to Japan and Korea where, along with businessmen from the coal industry in British Columbia, we were able to negotiate substantial contracts. The hon. member knows the stance that Canada took at the last UNCTAD meeting with respect to the shipping conference. Discussions have been since undertaken with the Minister of Transport and with the shipping industry, concerning this issue.

Mrs. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I did not hear an assurance that jobs on those ships would be for Canadians.

STEPS TO ENCOURAGE BUILDING OF CANADIAN SHIPS

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce because of his interest in industrial strategies that will create jobs. Legislation is now before the U.S. Congress which will protect the U.S. fleet at the expense of Canadian shipping. While other major trading nations are expanding their fleets and protecting their own interests, Canada continues to give away jobs by relying on foreign registered ships. As part of his so-called industrial strategy, what steps is the minister taking to ensure that we will build Canadian ships that will be registered in Canada, that will be manned by Canadian crews, and that will train a lot of our young people for jobs that are very important to them?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I understand that a memorandum has been tabled with the U.S. Congress suggesting that if this legislation is adopted it will increase the cost of shipping for American companies. They may well want to think twice about this proposal. In any event, Madam Speaker, at present we have underway a consultative process with the Canadian shipbuilding and ship industry, including the labour unions to develop the elements of a new national policy on shipbuilding for Canada. I hope that we will have these proposals before cabinet and ready for decision by the early fall so that Canadian companies and Canadian workers can play a major role in the very important industrial spin-offs which will come from the offshore development and the over-all development of the Canadian economy.

I think we are effectively moving in the direction sought by my hon. friend, a direction which is very much the policy and the approach of this government.

GRAIN

PROTECTION OF HANDLERS AGAINST LUNG DISEASE

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour I will direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the fact that the three-year dust control program in the grain industry, initiated in 1978 by the Occupational Health and Safety Branch of the Department of Labour, will end this fall, and that grain handlers continue to be concerned about the risk of lung disease, can the parliamentary secretary tell the House what additional measures are now proposed to protect these workers?

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question. Of course she is right in asserting that the report will be completed this fall. At that time a policy decision will be made. In considering the policy decision to be made at that time, many different aspects will be considered, and the government will be coming out with a decision at that time.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

BACKLOG OF PENSION APPLICATIONS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. At present there is a backlog of 4,500 pension applications which are taking up to five years to process. The pension chairman has stated that he is hamstrung by the present veterans' legislation. He says that the delays will get worse. Statistics provided by veterans' organizations show a 50 per cent death rate while waiting for pensions to be processed. What is the minister going to do about this?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, the member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine seems to have great concern about veterans' welfare. I do hope that this is a genuine concern and not a political concern. If it is genuine, he could have proved it by being in the House last week when we passed two very important pieces of legislation on veterans.

The hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine knows very well what we are doing about veterans' welfare. He was present at the Standing Committee on Veterans' Affairs. He has talked to and has met with Mr. Solomon and all the presidents and the chairmen of the agencies. He knows very well that there have been improvements in the cases to be heard. I think I could quote him as being very erroneous in some of his statements and the letter he wrote to the Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: What is the answer?

Mr. Lamontagne: The answer is that we are constantly in contact with the chairmen of each of the agencies. We try to supply them with all the members that the agencies need. They tell me that their work is improving tremendously.

As a veteran myself, an ex-POW, I know better than anyone in this House and like many others who are ex-POWs and veterans, what we should do about the welfare of veterans.

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I have a brief supplementary question. It is unfortunate that the minister cannot convince the veterans organizations, of that line. Why did he not come to the House to answer me in debate last night if he is so concerned?

The Auditor General's report points out that, as a basis for measuring actual performance, the Canadian Pension Commission should formalize processing time standards to the maximum extent practicable in all areas of the pension adjudication process within its control. As the pension commission cannot do this under the present legislation, will the minister introduce corrective legislation which will allow the pension commission to process claims in a reasonable time period, not five years? The United States can do it in 90 days; if they can do it in 90 days we should be able to do it in 90 days, not five years.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know that the system in the United States and ours are completely different.

Mr. Clark: Their works.

Mr. Lamontagne: I think the hon. member should know that it is not based on the same principle. It is not based on the same way of evaluating the pension of each veteran, so it cannot be compared. As far as the hon. member's statement that it takes five years to settle a pension claim is concerned, if he will let me have the names of these veterans who have tried for five years to get a pension and did not get it, I will see what happened.

Mr. Clark: What are you going to do—threaten them?

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

FUTURE OF BUDD AUTOMOTIVE COMPANY—REQUEST THAT MINISTER TAKE ACTION

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He was in the House a moment ago. In the minister's absence, if he has left the House, I would direct it to the acting minister. My question relates to the Budd Automotive Company in Kitchener which is now faced with the possibility of laying off up to 45 per cent of its employees for between six and nine months if it does not continue to manufacture frames for General Motors cars in Canada. Will the minister take this opportunity to assure the people of Waterloo region that he will raise this matter during his meeting with General Motors' officials tomorrow?

Secondly, will the minister consult with his colleague, the Minister of Labour, concerning certain unorthodox union agreements in the United States which at this time bring unusual pressure to bear on the union membership at Budd Automotive, and which directly affect the competitiveness of the Canadian automotive components industry? Will he undertake to protect the jobs of these Canadian workers?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is also very concerned about the situation described by the hon. member. Obviously, the minister will do everything possible and will take advantage of every opportunity to find a satisfactory solution to this problem.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

PROPOSED SALE OF PORTION OF KITCHENER COMPANY TO SWEDISH INTERESTS

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, the urgency of the issue cannot be underestimated. I appreciate the acting minister's assurance. The minister will also be aware, in his capacity as minister responsible for FIRA, of the proposed sale of certain segments of Uniroyal's Kitchener operation to A.B. Becker of Sweden. This anticipated transaction has already resulted in over two dozen salaried employees being let go from Uniroyal's general products and textiles plant. My question to the acting minister and the minister is: will they take the opportunity to see that any decision by FIRA in this matter will protect the jobs of Canadian workers and thereby ensure that the decision will be of significant value to Canada when there is a foreign takeover?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, when the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce reviews the recommendations of the Foreign Investment Review Agency, his first objective is naturally to protect Canadian interests, that is employment in Canada, and to promote new and important investments for the Canadian economy. That is the philosophy of the Foreign Investment Review Agency and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who will certainly give every consideration to the recommendations made by the hon. member.

SHIPPING

SHIPMENT OF DANGEROUS GOODS THROUGH CANADIAN PORTS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Is he aware of the fact that large quantities of radioactive materials, many of them hazardous, are presently being shipped to and from the Port of Montreal and other Canadian ports almost daily, and that these shipments are often stored for extended periods and trucked through city streets? Assuming he is aware of these practices, will the minister outline for this House the precautions which are being taken to protect shore workers, vessel crews, and citizens, from the dangers posed by these materials, and will he further undertake to provide this House with a complete inventory of all such shipments in and out of the ports of Saint John, New Brunswick; Halifax, Montreal and Vancouver during the past 18 months?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am surprised to see that the hon. member has not realized yet that the transportation of dangerous goods is a current event which happens every day in the whole of the Canadian economy. It is something that is desirable in terms of the economic development of Canada. There is no way one should prevent that from taking place, because one would have to stop a whole segment of the Canadian economy. Consequently the only thing governments can do in general is to take the necessary measures to make it as safe a procedure as possible. This is what takes place now.

Members were kind enough, clever enough, and wise enough to pass Bill C-18 last year, which covers exactly the transportation of dangerous goods. This is the law of the land now. I admit that the procedures and regulations are not completed, but they are being drafted. In the meantime we are doing with the legislation we have. To give the hon. member a list of all the dangerous goods being transported in Canada at this time would probably fill his room. If that is what he wants I may try to accommodate him, but I do not think it would be very useful to him.

DANGERS TO PORT WORKERS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I have such a list there in respect of the Port of Montreal, which does not fill a room. The minister has not answered either of my questions regarding specific safeguards or specific shipments. Surely the minister must know that port workers in Montreal and elsewhere are often called upon to handle dangerous materials such as uranium hexafluoride gas, large containers of uranium concentrates and spent nuclear fuels, often without knowledge of the contents, concentrations or radiation levels, or adequate training in precautionary measures. Does he condone such laxity, and how does he justify the fact that these major ports under his jurisdiction do not even have any equipment on hand or trained personnel in place to monitor radioactivity or detect leaks?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I did not try to give the impression that we were on top of all of these questions in Canada.

An hon. Member: You didn't?

Mr. Pepin: No, I did not try to do that, because progress has to be made and progress is being made now. I am sure the hon. member has heard of the Grange Report. That Grange Report is presently being implemented, as I reported to the House recently, and five of the recommendations are before the CTC. The member seemed to imply that I should provide him with an indication of all the dangerous goods going around in Canada at this time. If he wants them limited to the port of Montreal, indeed I will try to do that. But again the name of the game is really to take all precautionary measures. He was referring to the identification of the dangerous goods themselves. Part of the Grange report recommends changes and improvements in the placarding and identification of dangerous goods, and this is going to take place.

NATIONAL REVENUE

COLLECTION OF TAX PAYMENTS FROM SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance and Acting Prime Minister. In response to a question put yesterday to the Minister of National Revenue calling for the suspension of various premiums, contributions, and employee income tax deductions payable to the federal treasury by the small business community, the Minister of National Revenue replied:

There are arrangements for them to make their payments at chartered banks or offices of my department across the country.

He said that with a smile on his face, either misunderstanding the question or further rubbing salt into the wounds of the small business community, wounds which have been inflicted by the government. Therefore my question to the Acting Prime Minister is this: could he either confirm the callous statements by the Minister of National Revenue as being government policy, or, hopefully, deny that heartless comment and take immediate action to rectify this very serious problem facing the small business community of this country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I read the minister's answer this morning and I thought the Minister of National Revenue made a very sympathetic response yesterday to the problem placed before him with respect to small businessmen in the country.

REQUEST FOR SUSPENSION OF PAYMENTS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, surely this is a question of suspending the payments and not forcing the small business community to pay them. Surely the government cannot on the one hand stop cash flows to the small business community as a result of the postal strike, and on the other hand force the small business community to pay premiums to the federal treasury. Surely that is not the case. Since today is the middle of the month when these payments must be made to the government, I plead with the minister, asking him whether he will immediately suspend these obligations on the small business community until all postal service is returned to normal service. Please have some compassion on the small business community in this country.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks the government to have some compassion for the small business community. I believe that with the various measures we have adopted we have demonstrated our concern for the plight of the small businessman. For example, I have indicated to the House that through the instrumentality of the small business development bond, which makes funds available to small business at about half the market rate, this year about $3 billion has been committed for the use of small businessmen, and that is a very important measure.

● (1450)

The Minister of National Revenue said yesterday that all these remittances would be considered on an individual basis, but it is not possible for me, in answer to a question, to make a decision that all these payments will be waived at the present time. That is not possible at all. All these matters are being considered, and have been considered by the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, the Minister of National Revenue and myself, but the hon. member is asking for a very, very large decision when he asks us, because of this strike, to forget about all payments due to the government.

Oral Questions

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN NUCLEAR SAFEGUARD POLICY—AGREEMENTS WITH OTHER COUNTRIES

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last week, perhaps in an attempt to rescue the uranium industry in Canada, the minister announced his intention to abandon Canada's long established nuclear safeguard policy, which includes case by case review of exported uranium for reprocessing or enrichment, and that he expects to sign a new pact with the European Economic Community in the fall.

Despite the fact that I personally oppose the export of uranium, I expect it will continue. Nevertheless, since the government has repeatedly over the years asserted that it would not weaken bilateral safeguards, why is such an agreement being contemplated at this time?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member has it all wrong. There are no agreements being contemplated which in any way at all weaken our commitment to nuclear non-proliferation. What we are about is that we are engaged in applying our policy by signing supplementary agreements with countries in various parts of the world, such as the United States, Japan, the Philippines, and the European Economic Community, and the last of those is still under negotiation. These are ways of specifying in detail our policy of applying the principles according to the problems in a particular area, but there is no way by which those negotiations represent any weakening of our traditional positions.

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, according to the information I received, apparently Canada's negotiators with the EEC tried and failed to have a case by case review of uranium processing included in the new agreement.

PROHIBITION ON USE OF URANIUM TO PRODUCE ATOMIC WEAPONS

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, will the minister assure the House today that he will refuse to sign any export agreement with any country which does not maintain Canada's right to ensure that Canadian uranium is not used ultimately for the production of atomic weapons?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, of course I will give that pledge to the hon. member. I am not sure what he means by case by case scrutiny, but in an agreement in which there is a general principle to be observed by both parties, which applies in every case, one would not then need a case by case rule. The rule would already be there, and it would merely be a matter of having all the nuclear arrangements take place under the standing rule.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INITIAL PRICES FOR 1981-82 CROP YEAR

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport, who answers in this House for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, who sits in the other place. The minister is probably aware that the policy of the government for the past number of years has been to announce initial payments on grains early in the spring, several months before the beginning of the crop year, so that farmers would have the opportunity to make their plans for seeding and so forth.

We are now within 15 days of the beginning of the next crop year, and I wonder if the minister can tell us when the announcement will be made with respect to initial prices for grain for the coming crop year.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it was done this morning, and the initial price announced by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board for bread wheat, Canadian I CWRS wheat, is $4.75, which is higher by 50 cents than the initial price last year. The initial price for Durum is $4.75, which is 25 cents lower than last year because of fluctuations in the market. The initial price for feed barley is $2.70 which is the same as last year's initial price. The initial price of feed oats is $1.70, which is much higher than last year when it was $1.05. Those are the four main grains.

TIMING OF ANNOUNCEMENT AND REQUEST FOR TABLING OF INFORMATION

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for giving us this information. I hope he will relay to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board the importance next year of having this information in the hands of farmers early in the year.

In addition, I would like to ask the minister if at this time he would table the information, please.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): He has to. He has been quoting from it.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, on the subject of when initial prices should be announced there are two schools of thought. The first one says they should be announced earlier in order to give an advance message to the farmer. I followed that school of thought in the old days, and I am surprised the hon. member does not have a quote from me from back in 1969 on that subject, saying the same as he is saying now.

However, there is another school of thought, represented by Senator Argue, which says that in order to give as clear an indication as possible, he has to wait until now because of the fluctuations of prices around the world. In other words, he is in a much better position to indicate firm initial prices today than he would have been three months ago. This is a debatable subject. We will have occasion to debate it further.

Mr. Neil: Table the information.

PUBLIC SERVICE

COST OF LIVING DIFFERENTIALS APPLICABLE TO AIRPORT FIREMEN

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. One of the issues facing public service unions is the cost of living differentials across Canada. For example, airport firemen in some areas are being paid roughly $3,000 more than their city or provincial counterparts, yet at the Vancouver International Airport they are paid $6,000 less than their Vancouver counterparts city, and in some cases are in danger of losing their homes. I would like to ask the President of the Treasury Board if he is considering any cost of living differentials in upcoming negotiations with the members of this particular union.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, might I preface my answer by telling members of the House that just after I answered the question of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition I was advised that the name of Judge Allan Gold, Chief Judge of the Provincial Court of the Province of Quebec, has been released. He will be acting as mediator in the postal dispute. I understand mediation will get under way Friday because he is presently out of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Johnston: In answer to the question asked by the hon. member, Madam Speaker, I shall say that the problem concerning negotiations is real because of the fact that we have national unions. Whenever possible we try to establish regionally based negotiating units, but until now most organized workers have objected to this idea. Moreover, with regard to differences in the cost of living of the various regions I must say to the hon. member that we have not yet attempted to negotiate such an arrangement.

[English]

REQUEST THAT NEW BARGAINING UNITS BE CONSIDERED

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I am grateful that the minister recognizes that problem. In light of the fact that uniformity across Canada creates great unfairness in the working sector, I would like to ask the minister whether he is considering, or would consider, legislation which would allow certain regions to decertify and form new bargaining units so that the new bargaining units could represent their membership in a way which would help them meet the cost of living differentials across Canada.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, as I indicated, in terms of these national unions in the public sector, when there are clear regional disparities, it seems to me that the preferred approach would be to try to negotiate a means whereby those disparities can be recognized through different regional rates. We have that in certain circumstances with respect, for example, to the general labour and trades group. We have it in others such as the general services group, but by and large we have not been able to convince the public sector unions that we should have these regional differentials represented in the rate structures. That is something I am still striving to do and, it seems to me, that would be the preferred approach.

PETITION

MR. SKELLY—HEALTH PROBLEMS AND FINANCIAL LOSS ATTRIBUTED TO USE OF UFFI

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the Table the sixtieth report of the Clerk of Petitions, stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) and finds that it meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. NEIL—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) if he would table the document he was reading from. I think it is customary in the House that where a minister refers to a document, that it is tabled in the House. I think it is important we do have that information.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is correct when the minister or a member quotes a document in debate. However, the rule applies differently during the course of question period when a member asks a question which requires a minister to refer to some document. Under those circumstances, my predecessors have hesitated to ask ministers to do so because, of course, it would be so easy to set up a minister in this fashion to have him table documents which he might otherwise not want to table for reasons of his own. I will just quote Beauchesne's citation 327(6). It reads:

> If a minister cites or quotes an official document in debate, he should be prepared to table it.

However, the circumstances do not apply.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

CHANGES IN SALARY AND EXPENSES

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-638, entitled, "An act respecting the coming into force of future changes in salary and expenses provided to members of Parliament".

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, the bill puts forward the idea—perhaps unpopular here today but not necessarily so in future—that in case of future legislation concerning salaries of members of Parliament, the Parliament of the time will legislate so that the measure will come into effect immediately at the commencement of the following Parliament.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

LESLIE JAMES BENNETT

Question No. 669—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did or is the government investigating if former RCMP security official Leslie James Bennett had any connections whatsoever with British spies Kim Philby, Guy Burgess, Donald Maclean and Anthony Blunt and, if so, what are all the details?

2. Is the government aware of a press interview given on or about November 20, 1979, by Mr. Ernest Volkman, a journalist in New York City, in which he stated that a Canadian who worked in British intelligence at one time and later with RCMP intelligence was the "6th Man" in the Philby-Burgess-Maclean-Blunt affair and does the government have knowledge of any kind that this so-called "6th Man" could be Mr. Leslie James Bennett?

3. Does the government have any knowledge that the "6th Man" is someone other than Mr. Bennett and, if so, who is the person?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1, 2 and 3. It is the policy of the government neither to confirm nor deny that any investigation concerning specific individuals or organizations is being or has been carried out pursuant to the mandate issued to the security service in March, 1975. For the foregoing reasons, any comment on the matters raised in this question is judged to be contrary to the public interest, beyond stating that the government is aware of a press interview given by Mr. Ernest Volkman in New York City in November, 1979.

TREATY INDIANS—TRUST FUND

Question No. 2,290—Mr. Blenkarn:

Does the government have, and hold on behalf of treaty Indians, a Treaty Trust Fund and, if so (a) in what amount (b) where is it invested?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): There is no "Treaty Trust Fund" as such held by the government. Annuity payments, hunting and fishing equipment and triennial clothing for chiefs and councillors contained in the various treaties negotiated between the Crown and Indians are paid from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. The government also does hold, on behalf of Indian bands, moneys which are primarily derived from oil and gas royalty payments and leases, and to a lesser extent, from other minerals. Such payments are made to the government and are credited to the relevant Indian band. At the end of February, 1981, (a) the moneys held by the government on behalf of Indian bands totalled $290,199,700.00. The moneys (b) are not invested as such but are held in the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Interest is paid on these funds at an interest rate which is based on the average rate of those market yields of the Government of Canada bond issues as published weekly by the Bank of Canada.

STUDENT EXCHANGE TRIPS

Question No. 2,449—Mr. Neil:

1. Which departments sponsor student exchange trips?

2. For each calendar year 1978 to 1981, how many trips were sponsored and what was the total cost?

3. For each trip, what was the (a) name of the school involved (b) destination (c) number of students involved (d) cost?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Departments of External Affairs and Secretary of State of Canada as follows: in so far as the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission is concerned: presently, the CEIC administers the Canada-Mexico Exchange Program for Young Specialists and Technicians, the Canada-France Trainee Agreement of 1956 and the Canada-Switzerland Trainee Exchange Program. All three of the above-mentioned programs are solely for trainees and do not accommodate students. The CEIC also has major responsibility for setting annual allotments for specific student and youth international employment exchange programmes but does not sponsor any exchanges.

In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned: not applicable.

In so far as the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned: 1. The Department of the Secretary of State sponsors student exchange trips in Canada.

2. (a) Number of trips sponsored for each fiscal year 1978 to 1981:

1977-78	84
1978-79	805
1979-80	592
1980-81	498

(b) Total cost for student exchanges:

1977-78	$ 1,480,230.77
1978-79	11,953,427.78
1979-80	9,966,628.00
1980-81	9,713,277.00

3. Records have not been maintained in a manner which would enable the department to extract the required information readily and without an inordinate amount of work, time and cost.

VESSEL "MAISONNEUVE"

Question No, 2,492—Mr. Crosby:

1. (a) Is the vessel Maisonneuve in service in Montreal Harbour and, if so, what are its functions (b) what was the cost to the government to operate and maintain the vessel, including depreciation, in each year 1976 to 1980?

2. During 1980, did the Minister of Transport, the chairman of the National Harbours Board, Mr. A.E. Masters or any member of Parliament board the vessel and, if so, on what date and for what reason?

3. How many persons are employed at present to maintain and operate the vessel and what is the cost of their employment per year?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises that:

1. (a) Yes. Depth measuring; sonar sweeping to detect shoals; lateral sweeping to mark out erosion under wharf caissons; towing barges carrying wharf maintenance equipment; echo soundings to check on dredging results; investigating ships' complaints about obstacles to mooring through the use of a sounding rod; replacing the port's small service boat when it is unable to meet any of the following needs—to set in place or remove large fenders, to investigate cases of pollution, to inspect wharves and caissons; and a marketing tool for official visitors to the port.

(b)

For 1976	$48,505
1977	49,810
1978	52,550
1979	56,655
1980	65,725

NOTE: Each of the above amounts includes a sum of $26,630 for depreciation.

2. Mr. A.E. Masters boarded the vessel on July 17, 1980, to participate in a visit held for representatives of the shipping industry. The chairman of the National Harbours Board boarded the vessel on August 7, 1980, to participate in a gathering held for representatives of the shipping industry.

3. Three persons are employed at present to maintain and operate the vessel Maisonneuve, the Connie E (small service boat) and some barges. The cost of their employment per year is approximately $63,760 about one third of which applies to the Maisonneuve.

DREE—CANADIAN MEDIA CORPORATION CONTRACT

Question No. 2,590—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Department of Regional Economic Expansion issue a $450,000 contract to the Canadian Media Corporation for the acquisition of media time and space and, if so (a) were public tenders called (b) what was the name of each bidder and the amount of each bid submitted (c) what was the total amount of media time and space (d) what portion of the amount was paid as commission to the corporation?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): DSS awarded a contract, on behalf of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, for the amount of $450,000 to Canadian Media Corporation for the acquisition of media time and space.

(a) No.

(b) Not applicable.

(c) $385,000 for the placement of print advertisements and $65,000 for the airing of radio commercials in support of the "Special Investment Tax Credit" program.

(d) None.

In accordance with Treasury Board policy on government advertising (CMC) Canadian Media Corporation is under contract to DSS as the agency of record and is responsible for the consolidation and purchase of all government media and space requirements. For the provision of these services CMC receives a monthly management fee. Accordingly, a contract for a gross media value of $450,000 was awarded to CMC. None of this amount is payable as commission.

UNIVERSITY OF SHERBROOKE—COURSES

Question No. 2,635—Mr. Herbert:

Does the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources support instruction courses at the University of Sherbrooke and, if so (a) in which subjects (b) in what form is the assistance (c) what is the estimated cost?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: no. (a), (b), (c) Not applicable.

Order Paper Questions

DND, CIDA & DOT—HEWLETT PACKARD LTD. CONTRACT

Question No. 2,687—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Department of National Defence, the Canadian International Development Agency and the Department of Transport purchase electrical measuring and testing equipment valued at $85,917 from Hewlett Packard Ltd., Ottawa, and if so (a) for what purpose (b) at what location will it be used?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Three separate contracts were awarded to Hewlett Packard Ltd., Ottawa, by the Department of Supply and Services on behalf of the Canadian International Development Agency, the Department of National Defence and Transport Canada. The total value of the three contracts is $85,917.

Details of the contracts are as follows: for CIDA—the equipment purchased for CIDA is for the PAN African Telecommunications Project and the destination is Dakar, Sénégal, Africa; for DND—the equipment purchased for DND will be used for maintenance purposes at CFB Esquimalt, Victoria, British Columbia; for TC—the equipment purchased for Transport Canada will be used in the test instrument maintenance laboratory, Edmonton, Alberta.

DND—MOBILE HOMES—ATCO PACIFIC LIMITED

Question No. 2,702—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Is the Department of National Defence ordering mobile homes from Atco Pacific Limited and, if so, for what purpose?

2. Are the homes being bought for $1,509,736 on order 1GL.39-3940 and, if so, how many?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1 and 2. A contract in the amount of $1,509,736, order 1GL.39-3940 was awarded by the Department of Supply and Services to Atco Pacific Limited, on behalf of the Department of National Defence, for the supply and installation of 46 mobile homes to be used as housing accommodation at the Canadian Forces Base, Esquimalt, B.C.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if question No. 2,482 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 2,482 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CIDA LOANS TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Question No. 2,482—Mr. Greenaway:

1. In each fiscal year 1978 to 1981, how many loans were made by and/or through the Canadian International Development Agency to foreign countries?

2. For the same period, by year, which countries received loans and (a) for what purpose (b) in what amount (c) at what rate of interest?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary about some questions of mine which have been on the Order Paper for many months, one of which is No. 1,795. It is with regard to private organizations receiving federal grants for research and development. The question has been on the Order Paper for eight and a half months, which seems quite a length of time.

In addition there is question No. 1,667 which dates back to October 31, 1980. It reads:

What is the total number of applications currently before the Defence Industry Productivity Program (DIP) and what are the names of the companies?

That is a pretty straightforward question and I do not see why it has to take that length of time for an answer to be provided.

Another question which is very important to Manitoba and the west is question No. 1,541, which I placed on the Order Paper on October 6, 1980. It reads:

Did the government contract for industrial benefits for any province by name in the contract with McDonnell Douglas Corporation for the new fighter aircraft and, if so (a) which provinces were named (b) what is the total dollar value of any industrial spin-off allocated to any specific province?

To date all I hear is releases of work for the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. No announcement at all has been made for anything in regard to the aerospace industry in Winnipeg and I would like to have an answer as soon as possible on that very important question.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I will take all the questions first, and respond en masse.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, perhaps I could add to the parliamentary secretary's list. On Friday he made the following statement:

In anticipation of a question from the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe, it is my intention to answer his two questions on Monday.

The parliamentary secretary answered one of my questions on Monday after, I believe, some seven months, and I am grateful to him for his speed in at least getting an answer. I have since had a note from the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) indicating there is a problem with the second question, that it was improperly answered or that there was some other difficulty. Could the parliamentary secretary indicate when he will be tabling the answer to my second question which he promised for last Monday?

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I again draw attention to question No. 30. Apparently the government has never heard of the old biblical saying: ask and you shall receive, because I have asked for this for five years and 30 some days as of today. It seems to me utterly ridiculous that they cannot tell us what members of the Canadian Transport Commission have passes on Air Canada, and what wives of members have passes, and what employees have passes. Yet for five years and 30 some days we have had absolute silence. Every time I raise it, the parliamentary secretary obligingly says: "I will look into it." His predecessor said the answer would be forthcoming soon, and for all this time I have been told it is coming soon. Well, it is a pregnancy that is pretty overdue, and I hope, Madam Speaker, the parliamentary secretary can rise today and tell us when we are going to get the answer.

In conclusion I would like to say this: It is because they are hiding a conflict of interest in that if they delay it long enough the records will be destroyed because they are only kept for so many years? Is there not a conflict of interest here where members of the Canadian Transport Commission, who regulate Air Canada, are getting free jaunts all over the world along with their wives and others? Something smells bad and I wish he would enlighten us.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) said, I am an obliging person and I have tried to oblige members on the other side during this session. Of over 2,700 questions asked, we have provided 2,232 answers as of today. It does disturb me that we cannot have a 100 per cent response rate, but I will do my best in the time left in this session.

● (1510)

With respect to questions Nos. 1,795 and 1,667 in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie), certainly I will look into them on an urgent basis.

The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) is correct in the extracts he read from Hansard. Unfortunately, I led him to believe that question No. 2,455 would be tabled on Monday of this week. As he knows through private conversations held between him and me and him and the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox), an incomplete answer was provided to the minister. That answer is now ready. Unfortunately, the Secretary of State is not in Ottawa today. He will be looking at the answer tomorrow for final approval, and we shall table it in the House tomorrow. I do not want him to think that we are playing games with him.

With respect to question No. 30 in the name of the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt), I realize the hon. member has been rather patient in awaiting a response to the question. I would ask that he be a little more patient. Perhaps he could take a leaf from the book of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe who requested a number of times the tabling of a certain question. Perhaps it is not the number of times one asks; it is in the manner of asking.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: Perhaps we shall be obliged to give that answer very soon.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order or on almost a question of privilege. The parliamentary secretary said that it is how one asks it, not how many times. In other words, are we being told—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Cossitt: I think it is a legitimate question. I am being told that I have to get down on my knees to the parliamentary secretary. I will not do so.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member knows that these exchanges take place in the House. He also knows that that is not a question of privilege or a point of order.

Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 2,482 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA OIL AND GAS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OIL AND GAS INTERESTS

The House resumed, from Tuesday, July 14, consideration of Bill C-48, to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, and motion No. 3 (Mr. McGrath).

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, sometimes when one puts a 30-second speech on the record, one is tempted to let it stand. But today I would like to speak about a bill which I consider to be one of the most important of all the bills we have dealt with in this session. In fact, in my opinon it is the most important, other than the constitutional bill.

Bill C-48 has an effect upon the country beyond just energy. This is why we are debating the amendment which was put forward so eloquently by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). It will replace the jurisdiction of the federal government over the offshore without consultation or the consent of the province.

I see the chairman of the energy committee is present this afternoon. He will know that many of us were of the understanding that this bill would not be debated until this autumn. The members of the committee received hundreds of letters from citizens across the nation who were opposed to certain sections of the bill. We attempted to deal with those letters and those concerns, as well as the concerns of hon. members of the House, by way of amendments in committee. It is rather typical of this procedure that the only amendments which were accepted were the government ones; all other ones were rejected. Hence, it was incumbent upon hon. members of the opposition who had these concerns at heart and agreed with many of them to correspond with these concerned Canadians. This is what I attempted to do in discharging my responsibilities to some 200 or 300 people and groups of people. I had the misfortune of placing those letters in the mail two days before the strike.

We are now debating this bill at report stage. The citizens have not had an opportunity to see the amendments to this bill, yet we are now being asked to rush this piece of legislation through at this time of the year. I suppose the government feels that there will not be time for native people, the many serious groups in this nation who are concerned about the effects of this bill on energy and energy production, as well as the citizens of the maritime provinces and the northern regions, to correspond with hon. members on both sides of the House respecting their concerns and the amendments they think should be put in place.

Also the chairman of the committee will recall that there was a consensus among hon. members one day. It was placed on the record by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) rather deviously, because he did it on a point of order which should have been ruled out of order. At any rate, it was placed on the record. We did not say anything about it because we felt it was an important motion. The committee members agreed unanimously that we should travel.

Mr. MacLaren: No.

Mr. Schellenberger: Yes, they did. I was present. No one objected. It was the next day that the objection came forward. This would have been important because although many witnesses came forward and gave us information as to why we should change or accept the bill, many of the members who were on the committee did not come from those regions. It was important for members to actually spend some time in those provinces and in those areas of Canada which will be deeply affected by the bill. Of course we were not given that opportunity, and I think it is tragic in that we are now pushing the amendments through at a time when many people in the nation have not had an opportunity to get in touch with their members by mail.

Given the statement of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), the amendment of the hon. member for St. John's East has the sympathy of hon. members from the prairie provinces. We must remember that while we are dealing with this in 1981, my ancestors and those of many hon. members who sit in the House went through this very same debate from 1905 to 1930. I want to show that there is consistency between what happened then and what is happening now. It is the very same type of argument.

First I should like to read from the speech of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, as reported on page 11472 of Hansard, wherein he stated:

> They believe this should be up to the provinces, territorial governments or other groups. That is not our view. Our view is that those lands belong to all the people of Canada. The immense wealth that is there belongs to the people of Canada as a whole.
> The Parliament of Canada is the guardian and trustee of the immense wealth which should be developed and protected in the interests of the people of Canada as a whole and the people of the regions concerned in particular. That is our view.

Basically that comes down to the feeling of many of my constituents, that feeling of alienation, of not being in total control of their resources. This feeling is still in place today. If anyone believes that it is in any way waning, that is not the case. It is grinding them further into the ground. They are placing their feet down firmer than ever. I do not want to be a member of this House in a few years, hearing the same thing coming from my friends from Nova Scotia and Newfoundland or, hopefully, soon, from the provinces of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

● (1520)

Because of my own interest and because of the feelings of my constituents and my family over the years, I went back in the debates to see what happened then. I found that what happened then is very consistent with what is happening now. The Hon. R. B. Bennett speaking on April 29, 1930, summarized the argument very well. The Liberal Party of that time believed that the ownership of the resources of the provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta should continue to be, for the good of Canada under the jurisdiction of Canada, and that other provinces which came into Confederation earlier would have their resources under their own control.

I would like to quote briefly from the Hon. R. B. Bennett's speech. He said:

> Twenty-five years ago this fall, in the House of Commons, the Liberal party unequivocally placed itself on record as being opposed to the granting of these resources to the western provinces. On a division, which is recorded in Hansard, the Liberal party of that day decided that the new provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan should not possess their resources. The Conservative party of that day believed that they would not be provinces, within the meaning of that word, under the constitution, if they were deprived of their resources; they believed that the administration of the public domain within the area of Alberta and Saskatchewan by the Crown in right of the Dominion was at variance with every principle that should govern the creation of new provinces, and they placed themselves on record accordingly.

There are other interesting situations raised in the speech of the Hon. R. B. Bennett. He indicated that the Conservative governments of Borden and Meighen committed themselves to turning the resources over to the provinces. However, they were unable to do so. First, they were not given the chance to do so because of the war. They had to deal with very important matters and were not able to get the bill on. The second reason was the very short period of time that that party was in government. The Conservative party kept true to its commitment. When it came into power within a few months of the speech from which I have quoted, Mr. Bennett transferred the ownership of the resources to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Today we are debating the same question. It is whether the resources under the ocean, off the shores of those provinces, or found on islands a few miles off the shores of those provinces, should be under the control of the provinces. We know what the argument is on the other side. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has had a great deal of trouble with pesky provinces. He does not like to lower himself to work out an agreement. He wants control. He wants the power. Thus, we see the energy agreement which should have been worked out months ago with Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia not being worked out, although rigs are being driven from the area and tar sands and heavy oil plants which should be going ahead are not going ahead.

In my opinion there is a plan to all this. The plan is to move that capital into the offshore and into the north. The government is really not that concerned about getting new energy sources from Alberta or the prairie provinces as long as it can see its way free, hopefully, to getting those resources from the offshore or the north. But far be it for the government to allow pesky provinces to get in the road.

I can outline for the minister and the country my feelings on how the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has been systematically dismantled. In effect, Alberta is a province, and the minister of energy does not want the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) in his way when he permits land to be explored by Petro-Canada and other companies. Nor does he want to concern himself with the provinces of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia when development and drilling is given the go-ahead in that part of the country. The whole question is one of control of development and control of money. Is the federal government poorer because Alberta is richer? Are the provinces of Ontario, B.C., or Quebec poorer because Alberta is richer? Many on the opposite side of the House tend to think so. They tend to think that somehow it is wrong for a province which has legitimate control of its resources to spend the wealth from those resources in the interests of Canadians. They say that is not right. They think that it is far better for the nation to have control of the resources and of the wealth and to see that it is spent in the national interest. As my colleague has said many times, that wealth is squandered, which is why the provinces fight so hard to maintain control of their resource wealth. In many cases they have shown the ability to better spend it in the national interest.

It was stated by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson) that the average income of the citizens of Newfoundland is in the area of $4,000. That is probably one of the lowest average incomes in the nation. In the same manner as we in Alberta and Saskatchewan saw the ability to fully participate in this nation through the wealth of our resources, so do the people of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia see the ability to participate in this country as full participants. They see the chance to create work and wealth in their own area rather than to live without the knowledge that their jobs will always be there or, in many cases, without the knowledge that they will be perpetually on unemployment insurance or welfare. They now see an opportunity.

When we look at the bill which is before us, we see the federal government attempting to grab that opportunity. The government is saying, "Well, we will allow you to have the wealth of that resource until your average income is the same as that of other provinces. Then you must come to us again for handouts because we will want control of the resources again." We in this party do not feel that is acceptable. Our feelings have been consistent on this question.

When the right hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) was prime minister, he met with the Premier of the province of Nova Scotia. The correspondence which was transmitted between the two parties is available to all members. The then prime minister laid out the feelings of this party with regard to offshore control and ownership of mineral resources. I would like to read from a letter dated August 23, 1979. The then prime minister said:

It is our belief that this challenge can only be met if the province has ownership of and jurisdiction over its offshore mineral resources. Accordingly, we greatly appreciate your support of Newfoundland's position and the position of the federal Conservative party that Newfoundland's undersea resources should be treated constitutionally in the same manner as if they were on land.

It is almost the same as saying that the oil which is under Wizard Lake in Alberta is not owned by the province of Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1530)

Mr. Schellenberger: It is almost the same as saying that because there is a few feet of water over what is legitimately the land mass in Newfoundland, it is no longer possible for it to be under the jurisdiction or the control of that province. I want to show what I believe is happening as it is a major area, as is confirmed by what is happening under the National Energy Program and under this bill. By driving the rigs out of Alberta, we are losing an opportunity of finding billions of barrels of oil and natural gas. This government believes, and I hope it is right, that it can bring on stream from Hibernia and offshore Nova Scotia, and in the north, substantially more oil than could come from drilling in Alberta, even from the building of those tar sands plants and heavy oil plants. I believe that to be a risk that we should not be taking in Canada. While we should continue very strongly in the exploration of these two regions, we should not do it to the detriment of what we know to be possible in the western deposits of Alberta, Saskatchewan and B.C.

A forecast by a technical paper provided by this federal government suggests that 22,000 exploration wells must be drilled in western Canada in the next 10 years to find some 2.6 billion barrels of oil. It states that, by comparison, only 75 wells drilled in the Mackenzie Valley could discover the same amount of oil. The same is true for even less drilling in Hibernia. That may be so, and I hope it is true; but it is because of this policy that we are perhaps losing—and many say we are losing—energy self-sufficiency because we may not be able to bring that resource on in time.

However, in conclusion, I have to say that my argument today—and I will have a chance to make other arguments because there are many amendments to this bill—is that we in the western part of this nation have a great deal of sympathy for this amendment and support it wholeheartedly because we believe that the people of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland are fighting the same battle that our ancestors fought from 1905 to 1930 when they were finally given jurisdiction over those resources. In my opinion, there should be no argument, politically or morally, about this question, even though the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) may say that there is some argument legally. What I am afraid is that we will be facing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Schellenberger: —the same kind of alienation in those areas that we are now facing in Alberta. It disturbs me a great deal that citizens of that area are questioning their citizenship.

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, the amendment to Bill C-48 which we are debating today is designed, according to the mover, to prevent Bill C-48 from imposing federal ownership and control upon the offshore areas of Canada. The arguments we have heard from the opposition during the last three days have repeated this assumption, which is totally incorrect. Bill C-48 simply does not do that. The bill does not, in any way, alter the relationship between the federal and provincial governments with regard to offshore ownership and control.

Mr. Crosby: Why did you put them in there, then?

Mr. Watson: That question is a matter for decision by the courts. All Bill C-48 does is to provide rules to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands. According to Bill C-48:

> "Canada lands" means lands that belong to Her Majesty in right of Canada, or in respect to which Her Majesty in right of Canada has the right to dispose of or exploit the natural resources—

Bill C-48 does not declare the offshore areas to be Canada lands. That is a legal question. If there are areas offshore which the courts declare not to be Canada lands, then Bill C-48 does not apply to them.

I would not go so far as to label the amendment specious, because it at least allows us in this House to debate the fundamental issues regarding ownership and control of our offshore. However, I would argue that the amendment before us is certainly unnecessary because Bill C-48 does not do what the amendment pretends to do and pretends to correct. It is not necessary to correct something which is not there. However, the basic issues involved here are important, and they do reflect a very fundamental difference between the positions of the two major parties in this House.

The government, I hope—and I believe it does—starts with the premise that the resources of both our northern territories and our offshore areas are the common heritage of all Canadians and are the basis for a common sharing, the vision of which can help to bind Canada together. Canadians, whether living in Alberta, British Columbia, or Quebec, are part owners of the resources of the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, or offshore of those two territories. Surely, that form of joint ownership, that heritage we share together, does mean something to people. I am practical enough to think that people are a little selfish, and that no matter what province they live in, if they feel there is something there of which we all have a part, it is part of the cement, or can be part of the cement, that binds this country together. It is all very well to talk in flowery terms about sentiment binding this country together. I think there has to be more than sentiment. As a matter of fact, we all know that there is a lot more than sentiment binding the country together. There are a lot of practical things, and this is one of them.

When I say that, I want to preface that statement with a commitment which, I presume, has been made by the present Government of Canada and has been made in the past by Liberal governments, that Canadians living in those areas of the north or in the maritime regions, should have first call on those offshore or northern resources to assure themselves of a standard of living which is second to none in Canada. We are using different terminology here, but the former minister of northern affairs from Manitoba, who spoke two days ago in the House, came very close to using almost the same wording. Although I was quite pleased to hear him say it the other day, he did not say it when he was minister of northern affairs; namely, that what we want, first of all, is that the people of the north have a first call on their resources. He did not use those precise terms, but we all agree that those people should have the first chance to benefit. The people of the maritimes and people in Newfoundland should certainly have the first call on the resources which lie off their shores. In effect, we have promised as a government that Newfoundlanders will have 100 per cent of the benefits from their offshore exploitation until the time arrives when they have reached a level, a standard of living in Newfoundland, which is above the Canadian average level. Newfoundlanders—

Mr. McGrath: Up to the average level.

Mr. Watson: I stand corrected. I think that that is a level which can still be negotiated.

• (1540)

The government is willing to ensure that the maritime population, and in particular the Newfoundland population, receive the first benefit. The discoveries made there, while important, are not of Saudi Arabian proportions. It is probable that even if they find ten times the amount that has already been discovered, to all intents and purposes, Newfoundland would receive every direct benefit from the area. And so much the better, Mr. Speaker.

If the reserves are larger than is predicted, I doubt if many Newfoundlanders would object to sharing the additional icing on the cake with Canadians across the continent. The same is true with regard to maritimes living in Nova Scotia. When it comes to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, the amendment does not make it clear whether it deliberately left out any reference to the offshore resources. The former Conservative government under its prime minister, promised to create a province in the Yukon, which, by example, would have required the creation of one or more provinces in the Northwest Territories.

This promise of provincehood, combined with the position of the former prime minister on offshore resources, would have meant that those new provinces would have requested not only that the land based resources be turned over to them but also the resources offshore. The total population of the Yukon is about 25,000 and of the Northwest Territories about 55,000; together they make up about .3 per cent of the Canadian population. When Manitoba entered confederation with a population of 12,000 to 15,000, its percentage of the Canadian total was about .6 per cent or .7 per cent. The population of the two northern territories only comes to about .3 per cent of the Canadian population today. When Prince Edward Island entered confederation, its population represented about 1.2 per cent of the Canadian total. This undercuts some of the arguments being advanced for provincehood.

While some elected officials in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon are pushing for provincehood immediately, very few people on the streets support the idea. I do not believe that the majority of people in the territories regard provincehood as a reasonable, near-term objective.

The potential for problems accompanying provincehood is substantial. A very small group of people could control the immense resources which our government maintains are the common heritage of all Canadians. I cannot imagine reasonable people anywhere in Canada believing that it is wise to create provinces in the north and to promise to turn over these immense resources to them.

What northerners need is a way to cut through red tape. Some members of the House are inclined to paint a picture of poor northern colonials, but in fact the small population in the north has more absolute control over its own destiny than any other group in the country. For example, 25,000 people in the Yukon control their own education system. What other group of 25,000 or 100,000 people in the country control their education? Northerners are not colonized, as many people in this House, particularly on the other side, would maintain. They are in control of their own lives.

That is not to say, Mr. Speaker, that there are not areas of frustration that could not be improved or that the federal government could not find mechanisms to enable people in the north to solve their problems in a more direct way. Improvements are possible.

I feel that we should not be looking at provincehood as the only possible long-term goal for government of those two northern territories, but that we should be looking for another form of government which would give the people of the north control over their destinies and, at the same time, give them more direct, effective, efficient democracy and self-government. Provincehood is not necessarily the right thing for them. In fact, what we do in the north might show all Canadians that a new form of government is possible; one that allows all of us to be governed in a more effective and efficient manner.

Mr. Gustafson: The word is domination.

Mr. Watson: It has nothing to do with domination. I share with hon. members a desire to make government less onerous and more efficient and effective, from the point of view of the average citizen. We should approach our objectives for the north with an open mind and not with blinkers, seeking only provincehood.

[Translation]

Progressive Conservative members have, I believe, used the debate on this needless amendment to expound on the position of their leader on offshore resources. Were the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to have his way, ownership and control of resources would come under the provinces. It is not clear whether the amendment is purposely or accidentally vague on the issue of offshore resources in the Arctic, but as I said in English, our colleagues will recall that the Leader of the Opposition promised to give the Yukon provincial status before the end of his mandate as Prime Minister. That promise applied to the Northwest Territories also. Historically, there has always been provincial ownership of resources.

It would only be a matter of time before the new provinces of Yukon and Northwest Territories would demand and be granted ownership rights and control over land and offshore resources. If the official opposition was consistent in its reasoning we would find ourselves in a situation where ownership and control of land and offshore resources in all of the Canadian Arctic would be in the hands of approximately 25,000 people in the Yukon and 50,000 people in the Northwest Territories, that is, less than .3 per cent of the Canadian population.

During the referendum campaign, Mr. Speaker, I often said to my constituents in Quebec that Mr. Levesque and the Parti Québécois wanted to deprive Quebecers of their fair share of this common heritage, that is our northern resources. During this debate, Mr. Clark and his colleagues have shown once again that they are ready to go even farther than Mr. Lévesque. They would in fact deprive all Canadians, Albertans, British Columbians, Newfoundlanders and Quebecers of their fair share of these resources which remain largely untapped to this day. The government of Quebec, the Parti Québécois, considers itself the champion of the rights of Quebecers; yet it supports Mr. Peckford's position on the issue of offshore resources which, if it were accepted, would necessarily make all Canadians, including Quebecers, lose their fair share of our common heritage, that is our offshore and northern resources.

[English]

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the specific matter now before the House is motion No. 3 which amends the definition section of clause 2 of Bill C-48. Clause 2 of Bill C-48 contains a definition that establishes the territory included in the term "Canada lands", and that is what the pith and substance of motion No. 3 is, to change that definition of "Canada lands" to exclude those lands which lie off the coast of Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and which in the bill are referred to as the submarine land.

I have had an opportunity on two previous occasions when Bill C-48 which enacts the Canada Oil and Gas Act was before the House on second reading; on December 17, 1980, and again on January 12, 1981, to outline the history of the province of Nova Scotia's claim to its offshore resources contained in the submarine lands that adjoin the coast of Nova Scotia. I will not repeat them on this occasion.

I will underline the fact that for centuries now the province of Nova Scotia has claimed these resources and the submarine lands. The government of Canada, on the other hand, prior to 1968 or thereabouts, made no claim to these same submarine lands and at no time purported to deal with the natural resources that may be buried in these lands.

The history of the matter in that connection stems from a Supreme Court of Canada decision in 1968 when the resources that were contained in the submarine lands off the coast of British Columbia were considered by the Supreme Court of Canada. In what became known as the reference respecting British Columbia Resources, the Supreme Court in its wisdom to belong to Canada and not the province of British Columbia and, consequently, the resources within them. That decision of the Supreme Court was by no means complete in that it purported to extend to all submarine lands adjoining the coast of Canada, whether on the Pacific or the Atlantic coasts. Nor was it complete with respect to submarine lands adjoining the coast of British Columbia. In fact, I read a very recent report that the government of British Columbia wants to bring again before the court the matter of ownership of specific areas adjoining the coast of British Columbia on the basis that those particular areas were not covered by the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada which was made in 1968.

Even with respect to the specifics of that decision, and with regard to the claims of the government of the province of British Columbia to its own coastline, the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada cannot be taken as complete and undisputed.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, you will readily understand how the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada which relates to British Columbia lands is not accepted by either the government of Newfoundland or the government of Nova Scotia as resolving the dispute regarding the lands adjacent to their coast.

Let me speak very briefly about the history of the particular provisions we now have before us incorporated in Bill C-48 and which will become part of the Canada Oil and Gas Act if this bill is enacted.

The Parliament of Canada, following the decision regarding B.C. resources in 1968, enacted a new provision to the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act. This particular provision applied all provisions in that act to the submarine lands off the coast of Canada, but it did not in that provision claim those lands for Canada. It simply said the provisions of that act, the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, would apply to those lands, which is quite different, I believe, from the provisions we now have before us as part of the definition section of clause 2 of Bill C-48.

I want to be very specific about that because I disagree completely with the remarks of the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Watson), which were very similar to the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren), the member for Etobicoke North, in this House the other day on this same subject matter.

The thrust of their remarks, as I understood them, was that the definition of Canada lands now contained in Bill C-48 does not in itself claim or expropriate the submarine lands off the coast of Nova Scotia, or the coast of Newfoundland for the federal authority. It simply applies the provisions of Bill C-48 to those lands by way of describing them in the term "Canada lands".

I reject that interpretation of clause 2 of the bill defining Canada lands in light of the other provisions of the bill, because in fact the bill defines Canada lands very clearly to include areas like Sable Island and submarine lands up to the 200-mile limit off the coast of Canada. Also in another clause of the bill it claims and provides that the act applies to those very Canada lands.

That is simply not the technique that would be used if the purpose of the very careful definition of Canada lands was simply to allow the federal legislation to apply to those lands. We all know, who have studied these matters, that the federal authority has the simple right and authority to legislate in respect of many matters including natural resources, in some of their respects. Certainly the federal authority has the right and authority under the British North America Act to legislate with regard to environmental matters on the coast, whether or not they affect provincial resources.

• (1600)

In addition, by a clause of the bill, the provisions of the act are binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province. That provision is contained in clause 5(4) of the bill. There is a clear intention evidenced in the bill, through the definition section and through the fact that clause 5(1) makes all the provisions applicable to Canada lands, and because of the fact that the bill by clause 5(4) is binding on Her Majesty the Queen in right of a province. There is, I believe, a clear claim to what is described as Canada lands, and it just simply cannot be put aside on the basis that if any court subsequently decides that the province of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia or any other provinces own submarine lands adjacent to their coast, then the act will not operate in that area. That is not true, and I think the provinces, particularly the province of Nova Scotia, see Bill C-48 as a claim to the submarine lands which have been historically claimed by the province of Nova Scotia.

Just to demonstrate that there is a clear conflict, I remind the House that the province of Nova Scotia, in the case of its petroleum resources act enacted in 1980, claims the very lands which are covered by the definition of Canada lands in Bill C-48. We have a conflict on the face of the two pieces of legislation, the Nova Scotia petroleum resources act and the proposed Canada Oil and Gas Act. Both purport to deal with exactly the same lands. If that is not a conflict and if that is not a claim by the respective jurisdictions, on the one hand the province of Nova Scotia and on the other hand the Government of Canada, I do not know what is. We ought not to be lulled into thinking that there is no problem here and that we can go ahead and not deal with the conflict in this House and allow some other authority to deal with it, because that would be to abandon our responsibilities and not to face up to the problem which exists.

Let me very briefly review the claim of the province of Nova Scotia which, as I have said, I have detailed on other occasions in this House. Basically, the province of Nova Scotia was established by a grant by King James I which gave to Sir William Alexander, in 1621, a band of land extending seaward for 120 miles, and it included Sable Island. Subsequent treaties confirmed these boundaries for the province of Nova Scotia. And, in 1867, when the British North America Act was enacted, Section 7 of that Act said that the province of Nova Scotia consists of the land, mines and minerals which belonged to that province at the time of confederation. The basis for Nova Scotia's claim is very clear. I will not purport to deal with the claim of the province of Newfoundland.

What do we do, given this claim by the province of Nova Scotia and the historic basis for the claim and given the existence of these two pieces of legislation, provincial on the one hand and federal on the other hand, claiming exactly the same land, the submarine lands off the coast of Nova Scotia? What do we do? We have a dispute, and we must resolve it.

How can the dispute be resolved? One way would be for the province of Nova Scotia or any other province interested in resolving the dispute simply to sit down with the Government of Canada in a sensible, practical way to work out the problem. But we all know that that is not the style and the method employed by the Government of Canada, not only in this area of natural resources but also in the constitutional area and in any other area, including medicare and any other problem which comes up. It is simply not the way, method and style of the Government of Canada to resolve disputes by sensible political negotiation. Indeed, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) confirmed in this House that as far as he was concerned, that method had been exhausted by perhaps a few meetings, which established very little, if anything. Notwithstanding that most sensible Canadians would have the dispute resolved by negotiation, the federal authority has refused to continue these negotiations and presents us with the provisions of Bill C-48 which, as I have said, is effectively a claim of the submarine lands off the coast of Nova Scotia.

Another simple method of settling this dispute would be to extend the boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia to include those lands, in the same way that this very House of Commons extended the boundaries of various provinces, including the province of Ontario and the province of Manitoba, in 1912 and 1913. Again, the Government of Canada has refused to follow this course of action and has claimed the offshore resources and the submarine lands to the extent of 200 miles and to the continental shelf, not for the people of Canada but for the Government of Canada. There is a very substantial difference.

It has been claimed in this House on several occasions by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and by the Prime Minister that they would be willing to settle the dispute with the province of Nova Scotia and the other coastal provinces, but the manner in which they propose to settle the dispute is not one which could possibly be acceptable to the government of Nova Scotia.

What the Government of Canada proposes by way of settling the dispute is to take over the submarine lands and the resources in those lands, to dictate the manner by which those lands and the time in which those lands are developed, to exercise full and complete control over all aspects of exploration and development and then, having done that, to return to the participating provinces a percentage of the revenues. The Prime Minister has even said that this percentage could rise to 100 per cent if that would resolve the dispute but, as well all know, 100 per cent of nothing is exactly that, nothing. So without any guarantee of what those revenues are going to be, for the Government of Canada to offer to the provinces 65 per cent, 75 per cent or even 100 per cent is to say nothing. What the province of Nova Scotia wants is the ability to develop those resources and, more particularly, to assist the private sector to develop those resources and to co-operate with the oil exploration and development industry to see that the resources in the submarine lands are developed as quickly as possible.

It should not surprise anyone in this House that the province of Nova Scotia and, indeed, the people of Nova Scotia have serious doubts about the willingness and the desire of the Government of Canada to bring about the development of offshore resources in submarine lands with the rapidity and at the quick pace necessary to allow the province of Nova Scotia to continue its economic progress.

Unfortunately, settlement of the dispute comes down again, as in the case of any dispute I have ever been involved in, to the good faith and responsibility of the parties to that dispute. And we in Nova Scotia have seen no evidence on the part of the Government of Canada that it is willing to act in good faith and in a responsible manner to resolve this dispute. The federal government offers only a share of the resources without indicating in any way what that share might be. To myself and to many Nova Scotians, this is nothing more than a continuation of the charity payments, transfer payments and aid which have been provided by the Government of Canada in the past. And it will simply ensure for the future, as in the past, the economic plight of the maritime area.

There are a number of other items which relate to the particular provisions we now have before us in relation to the development of the Canada lands. And I want to point out to all hon. members of this House that the real heart of the problem and the real effect of the dispute is that it is impeding development of the offshore resources in the submarine lands. My colleagues on the other side of the House might not be willing to accept my word for that, but I have as support the word of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) and of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), who have both said publicly on many occasions that the dispute with respect to ownership of offshore resources was hindering the development of those resources. I do not have to detail what that means in terms of lost jobs and general losses to the economy at a point in time when Nova Scotians and, indeed, all Canadians require jobs and an impetus to our economy in order to stimulate activity and produce employment.

So in that context, Mr. Speaker, we must review the background and necessity for resolving this dispute concerning ownership and development of offshore resources. It is recognized by individual members of the government, members on this side, and people in the oil and gas industry that the dispute is impeding the development of offshore resources.

How are we going to resolve that dispute, Mr. Speaker? We are certainly not going to do it by bringing into this House legislation which vests the Nova Scotia and Newfoundland offshore resources in the Government of Canada. That will only prolong the dispute and lead to litigation. I have asked the Prime Minister in this House: "What are you going to do to resolve the dispute?" His response has been that he would be willing to have the matter go before the courts. No one agrees, Mr. Speaker, that that is the way to resolve the dispute. However, there is in fact now before the courts, as I believe the parliamentary secretary pointed out, a case involving the question of ownership of offshore resources. So, Mr. Speaker, we cannot avoid the fact that if Parliament does not take steps to resolve the dispute, someone outside this House will do so before the courts.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, in relation to the definition of Canada lands and the fact they include the offshore areas of Nova Scotia, I appeal to the government to review its position, to reconsider Nova Scotia's claim and the economic plight of the people of Nova Scotia. I appeal to the government to formulate a sensible policy to deal with this dispute, one which will result in its resolution in a sensible and fair way to the people of Nova Scotia and the people of Canada as a whole, so that we can pursue our economic interests to their benefit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity this afternoon to join in this debate on Bill C-48 at report stage. I would say at the outset that my position as a member from Ontario is somewhat different from that of those from the extremes of our country and that my perspective, in terms of what this bill is doing and might do to the established relationships, in so far as natural resources are concerned, between the provinces and the government, is perhaps without some of the perceived vested interests which are apparent in members from either side of the country. That perspective comes from a position which has been gradually formed by watching the development of natural resources in this country, and what the federal government has done with those resources over a long period of time, particularly this Liberal government.

Before commenting on the motion, I would like to say that at a time when the country is faced with extreme problems in the economy, when we are in the middle of a mail strike which has put considerably more stress on major segments of our people, whether it is business or individuals, it seems passing strange to me that we are now using this time at the discretion of the government to deal with things which I think are important in the long term but really do nothing to resolve the economic distress we now have in Canada. I think that is an unfortunate circumstance, one which we are prepared to face, but we would really rather be doing what I think in the short term could benefit Canadians across the country.

Bill C-48, Mr. Speaker, does a number of things through the back door that deserve full attention head on, and which could have been dealt with in the years gone by in a way which would have taken away a lot of the difficulties which are apparent in the bill. We are dealing specifically with one of those areas, namely, the Canada lands. Looking at that as a separate issue, at any other time would deserve the full attention of the House in a separate bill. It comes to the core of things which go back as far as confederation, in fact one of the primary concerns of the BNA. It was an evolution of events from the time of the BNA which have put us in the spot we are in now. There is no question that in the British North America Act we have a definition of provincial control over natural resources. Section 109 states:

> All lands, mines, minerals, and royalties belonging to the several provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick at the union, and all sums then due or payable for such lands, mines, minerals, or royalties, shall belong to the several provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick in which the same are situate or arise, subject to any trusts existing in respect thereof, and to any interest other than that of the province in the same.

That having been said, obviously the question of the resources under the sea was left out. This issue, as it developed through the progression of Canada as a nation, through the Treaty of Versailles, through the Statutes of Westminster and even up until now, has still been unresolved. It is a question faced by all countries when they look at their sovereignty, the control of their territorial waters and their international dealings.

I would like to go back one step to look at this amendment as it attempts to separate from the Canada lands the offshore areas of the provinces on the extremes of the country. The premise of the amendment to clause 2, presented now as motion No. 3, is based on the four criteria provided in the undertaking of the former Clark government and Mr. Peckford. Those four principles are as follows: Number one, that the province of Newfoundland should own the mineral resources of the continental margin in so far as Canada should own them; number two, that ownership and legislative jurisdiction would be consistent with and subject to the division of legislative competence as between Parliament and the provincial legislatures under the Constitution of Canada; number three, that the Government of Canada would continue to have legislative jurisdiction in certain areas such as the environment, shipping and so on; number four, those principles would be confirmed by the signing of an agreement between the two governments and by appropriate legislative action and constitutional change.

That arrangement could have provided the premise of a rational ongoing situation appropriate not only to Newfoundland, but it would also have provided a potential basis for dealing with British Columbia and the other Atlantic provinces. It could also be seen in light of developments in British Columbia and in terms of things which have already happened since the entrance into confederation of Newfoundland. It has been mentioned by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has suggested these things could be resolved in the Supreme Court. We go back to the British Columbia situation where mineral rights were given to that province in a 1968 decision of the Supreme Court.

There is an interesting and probably important parallel to be looked at in the situation with the United States. In 1974 they had a similar situation in a case called the United States v. California, which was resolved in favour of the United States, concerning control over mineral resources. I think it should clearly establish their resolve and the parallel that could be drawn in terms of how we might resolve some of our situations in Canada.

I would like to read briefly the comment of Mr. Robert B. Krueger concerning the management of federal petroleum resources in the United States. It very clearly defines the decision which was taken in 1953 that reversed the original court decision of 1947. He said that the situation is that the various coastal states own the mineral resources in the three-mile territorial sea surrounding the United States. This was directly as a result of the submerged lands act of 1953. One quesiton which will quickly come to mind concerns this three-league territorial sea. "Three-league" is one of the terms of reference in a number of comments; it would actually be nine miles. We must ask whether a specific mileage is in fact at stake. Indeed it is, because the 200-mile territorial limit is considerably different than that. That is really the argument.

If the Supreme Court of the United States made a decision in that regard, I am not clear as to how far other rights extend into the territorial waters. It would seem clear to me that the definition we require at the present time is an understanding and a rationalization of what limits there will be in terms of not only the main controls of the federal government with respect to the environment and other matters which relate to the federal government and sovereignty, but also in terms of a definition of the mileage and under what terms the agreement might take place.

There is major room for discussion, but I make the point that this agreement should take place not by the back door through Bill C-48, but through a rationalization, an understanding and an agreement which is sensible to the whole country.

The prime question in so far as Bill C-48 is concerned, and many of the items which antagonize and concern the provinces, is not the one respecting the legislative direction of the government. In itself that is one question which might be handled in one manner, but the overriding concern of all hon. members on this side of the House is the competence of the federal government as exercised by the Liberal party when dealing with issues that are important to all Canadians if we are to achieve the goals of self-sufficiency, of management of the country and the economy, and of all things we need to develop the potential of the country. This would be the primary concern. It is the one which is addressed by the reaction of the provinces to the mechanism of takeover which the federal government is providing under the terms of Bill C-48.

If we look at the examples of competence of the Liberal government, the one which hits us in the face very quickly is the situation in the Post Office. There have been six strikes in the last five years, and we are in the middle of one now. What kind of competence is that? What kind of competence is there in the situation respecting VIA Rail which is withdrawing services that are important to certain areas when in fact it is supposed to be providing them. What kind of competence is there in other areas such as AECL with $800 million in excess requirements this year? What kind of competence is there in the management of any number of government departments? I could repeatedly give examples of the incompetence as expressed by the kind of management not only in those areas, but in the area of natural resources which the federal government now wants to take over.

On top of all of this, there are examples of where ministerial discretion is requested and provided in Bill C-48. Not only is a system being put in place now, but we are also asking that the minister, at any given point in time in any number of areas described in the bill, will be given an opportunity to exercise powers in a discretionary manner which are overwhelming in terms of the eventual outcome. It would make me insecure and very uncomfortable if we gave these controls to the federal government now.

An interesting comment appeared in a newspaper article two or three days ago. Although in normal circumstances I might not be the first person to quote Sylvia Ostry, I think her comments were in support of the argument I should like to make in terms of the ability of the federal government to do what is required. In part, the article reads:

"We are the most resource-rich country in the OECD," she said, perching excitedly on the edge of the sofa in her office.

But the real question is, why isn't our performance a hell of a lot better?

"Inflation in Canada isn't decelerating and there are disquieting signs of it creeping up. Given Canada's underlying growth potential, why shouldn't we be better than anyone else?"

It is obvious who has been in charge, who has been running things, and who has been taking us where we are going.

I should like to refer to the points which were raised by the Parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren). While there might be some question as to the relevance, I suggest that in some ways the government has put its statements forward and that the parliamentary secretary speaks for the government, so my comments are relevant. He talked directly about self-sufficiency, which was one of the key phrases of a previous government to this Liberal government. It is one of the main points in terms of the energy future of Canada. Self-sufficiency under the terms of the National Energy Program and Bill C-48, as one of the many parts of the National Energy Program, is in severe difficulty. We had reasonable chances to reach self-sufficiency by 1990 under the different approaches which could have been taken. The single goal of self-sufficiency is severely threatened now, not only by Bill C-48 but by the general attitude of the government. In support of that point, I should like to quote from an article which arose from a Woods Gordon report. It reads as follows:

In 1990 assuming demand has not grown, and using the NEP's optimistic supply forecast (which does not provide for frontier production but includes oil sands production),— —Canada would experience a shortfall of 330,000 barrels per day. The NEP document states "it would be premature and unwise to count on the frontier to solve the oil supply problem." A CPA forecast (which does not include frontier production or new tar sands production) results in a shortfall of 740,000 barrels per day by 1990. Under current provisions of the NEP the CPA does not believe it will be possible to develop new frontier and tar sands production and does believe that the decline in conventional oil production will be more severe than previously forecast.

This is very debatable now.

This comment was made by several groups which pointed out very well that we will simply not achieve the important goal of self-sufficiency.

Also the parliamentary secretary raised the issue of revenue. In looking at these offshore resources, there is no question that the government is looking at revenue which it says is required to maintain the services it is providing to Canadians. One of the subtle elements about all this is whether or not the government is receiving revenue or has mechanisms in place to achieve revenue through regulation, taxation systems and so on, without becoming involved in a confrontation with the provinces which causes difficulty in terms of Canadian unity and the other matters that are straining the different parts of the cohesion of the country.

As a late comment I should like to indicate how the price of a gallon of gasoline is shared at the present time in terms of revenue. In terms of dollars per barrel of gasoline, $18 goes to the federal government. Approximately $8 goes to the provincial governments, whether it be the government of Ontario through road taxes or the government of Alberta through royalties. Some $6 goes to the producer and $11 to the refiner. About $3 goes to the dealer. Thus, the lion's share still goes to the federal government in the ratio of about three times that which goes to any other part of the system.

Total increases in the cost of crude oil in 1981 alone could exceed $8 per barrel by next fall. Of this amount the producing provinces and the oil companies will share approximately $2 per barrel and the remaining $6 will go to the Liberal government. That might be justifiable if we could see that it was really going toward self-sufficiency, increased production and everything which we think is important in terms of our energy resources. The fact of the matter is we do not have anything else to show for it. What we have had so far is $8 billion having gone to Petro-Canada, which has given us approximately 3 per cent more Canadianization. Another $25 billion will have to be raised either through Petro-Canada or some other vehicle in order to bring us up to the so-called Canadianization level which the government wants. That is a massive amount of money. But what has been done to develop our resources? Precious little. This has a great deal to do with control but very little to do with the development of resources.

My final point, and the point on which I would like to end my speech, has to do with my perspective as an Ontario member. There is no explanation for the fact that we are not doing a hell of a lot better than we are, as Sylvia Ostry said. The only explanation is that the perspective we should have, if we are to develop not only our natural resources but all of our other talents in the industry, must be in terms of private enterprise. The perspective which governments should have must be one of co-operation and the understanding that it is the private sector which will develop these resources under the appropriate controls of governments, both federal and provincial. This must be done not through the confrontationist style which has been so apparent and predominant in all the dealings thus far but through the kind of thinking which will develop as a result of negotiation and settlement, which is necessary if we are to achieve our goals.

[Translation]

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, at this point in the debate I should like to comment on the amendment of our Progressive Conservative colleagues which is aimed at reducing the size of Canada lands by not including the 200-mile offshore limit. Everything considered, I must say that as a Canadian and a Quebecer I do not feel ashamed to think that the national government must play a leading role in the protection of Canada lands. It is that particular aspect which I would like to debate with my colleagues this afternoon. First of all, Mr. Speaker, allow me to recall the historical background of the question under study. We are examining a bill which has to do with the energy issue, petroleum and gas. The principle involved with respect to the extension of the territory to 200 miles offshore to cover such natural resources as petroleum and gas has given rise to fascinating events in Canada. Indeed it goes back several years and I consulted a publication by a famous author whose name is listed in the 1970 Canadian yearbook on international law. Mr. Jacques-Yvan Morin, currently a minister in the PQ government, wrote an interesting article on technical progress, pollution and the recent evolution of the law of the sea in Canada, particularly with respect to the Arctic. I therefore believe that he is a very neutral authority to comment on this topic. In this rather long article, 25 or 30 pages, which I have no intention of quoting at length, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to an excerpt from Mr. Jacques-Yvan Morin's article who wrote on page 158 of that publication that the extension of Canada's ownership of the offshore territory, or rather not the extension of the territory but the extension of certain rights from three to twelve miles—from twelve to 100 miles in the Canadian Arctic—was an extremely constructive measure.

On page 215, Mr. Morin mentions the legislation passed by the Canadian government and notes that everywhere else in Canada, the limit was 12 miles and that the new legislation would extend this to 100 miles offshore to protect the environment. Of course, this issue had arisen as a result of a tanker accident causing an oil spill on the Canadian coastal territory, and the limit was finally extended thanks to the dynamic action of the Canadian government. Indeed, in 1972, with Bills 201 and 202, the Liberal government of the time extended the limits of three miles, 12 miles and 100 miles unilaterally to 200 miles. However, this action was accompanied by international discussions to determine who owned the offshore resources of Canada.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, Canada is bordered by three oceans, the Arctic, the Atlantic and the Pacific, and by extending the territory of Canada beyond the 12-mile limit, Canada would be able to increase the potential of its natural resources by about 20 per cent. The knowledge that Canada will be able to develop these resources in the future has an interesting impact in terms of the gross national product. The international discussions to ratify the treaty implementing the 200-mile limit without the threat of international disputes are under way, and I am confident that every country with coastal territories rich in natural resources will certainly support this extremely desirable action, especially because when we speak about coastal territories, we are obviously speaking about resources, but also about the development of these resources.

By excluding the submarine areas located outside of a province, adjacent to the coast of Canada and extending throughout the natural extension of the land territory of Canada to the outer edge of the continental shelf or to a distance of 200 nautical miles from the baselines, Bill C-48 is extremely positive and will only reinforce the very dynamic action undertaken by Canada in this area. As you know, Mr. Speaker, in addition to the oil and gas resources of these areas, there are also other resources, such as our fisheries, which are a very important source of revenue for Canada. Minerals are also part of the resources which could be available to Canada. In the years to come, in the nineties and in the next century, when plankton and other marine resources may become marketable, this coastal zone will be an extraordinary asset for all Canadians. We have just started to develop these resources, and already the provinces are arguing to know to whom they belong. Ownership of the natural resources in these lands is still not recognized internationally, and the provinces, which can do nothing in international law in this regard, have already started to criticize and speak about sharing.

I feel that the offers made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to Newfoundland during the last election show his broad outlook on the matter of sharing the revenues from those resources. And I further submit that the matter of knowing who owns the resources is one thing and who is going to benefit from those resources is quite another. Mr. Speaker, as a Canadian and a Quebecer, I own in Quebec part of the offshore resources and I am ready to share them with my fellow-Canadians. However, I am amazed that my opposition colleagues, especially those from the western provinces, excluding British Columbia, oppose such a measure. Because barring any unforeseeable geographical disaster, I find it hard to visualize how Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario can start speculating on the resources outside the 200-mile limit, because those provinces have no coast.

● (1640)

[English]

In the year 2000, I believe that the resources we have offshore which are shared by many provinces, except the western provinces, of course, not including B.C., will probably be exploited on a larger scale than today, and more than petroleum and gas will be exploited in these regions. I just question the purpose of an hon. member from Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba saying, only today, that we do not want to include this in the legislation when actually, in the year 2000, they will share the resources and the revenue of these properties. I just question the motive and I think that it is probably in support of today's problems.

However, I feel that we can have a long-term policy. We should think of Canada on a long-term basis. When we think about sharing today and tomorrow and about the existence of this country, we must remember that Canada can extend its shores to the 200-mile limit. We should keep this provision in Bill C-48 and think about the future, not be shortsighted and just think about tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, if reference is made to the known offshore resources, some information should be shared. Panarctic Oil, 45 per cent owned by the Canadian government, has been doing a lot of work, and in 1979 the Canadian government spent more than $600 million on the development of oil and natural gas. Certain provinces probably can spend that kind of money, but I would be very surprised if most provinces could invest such huge amounts of money to develop the offshore energy potential. That is why I firmly oppose the Progressive Conservative Party's amendment.

And based on the notes for a speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) at the Financial Post Offshore Canada Conference held in Halifax on June 23, 1981, I would like to repeat some basic facts emphasized by a minister coming from a coastal area. And I quote:

> The encouraging prospects found off the Atlantic coast could make a very significant contribution to this country's energy picture. A total of some 5 trillion cubic feet of gas and 1 billion barrels of oil have already been discovered off the Atlantic coast. According to federal geologists, that area could contain from 7.5 to 12.5 billion barrels of oil and between 70 and 125 trillion cubic feet of gas. That is nearly 20 per cent of all known and expected oil and gas resources in Canada, and nearly half the amount of oil and gas already discovered in the western provinces.

At this point, Mr. Speaker some 150 wells have been drilled off the Atlantic coast. In all, some $900 million have been spent since the beginning of drilling operations. But despite all those efforts, we still do not have one single producing oil well in that area. Research is being conducted and rigs are being set up and, hopefully, we will benefit from these resources in the not too distant future. According to the National Energy Program, we will spend yet another $200 million in 1981 and some $400 million in 1982. Such financial commitments will enable the Atlantic region to develop offshore Canada lands. However, if we look at what has happened in European countries, specifically in the North Sea, we realize that enormous investments must be made before this potential can be tapped.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, instead of taking a very narrow view, instead of fighting over the distribution of revenues even before starting to develop these natural resources which have not even been ruled Canadian property, since, as I just mentioned, the 200-mile zone has not yet been recognized in international law as Canadian land per se, and it will not be in the international perspective, international treaties, if ratified, will decree that natural resources can be the property of the coastal territory but that the land as such, the submarine lands, will not belong definitively to the coast entity.

It seems to me that we are splitting hairs. At this time, in the light of the extremely positive steps taken by the Canadian government in the last 20 years for the benefit of all Canadians in extending its territory, and especially with regard to the development of offshore resources, in the light of the dynamic role played by Canada at the 1975 Environment Conference where Canada actually started to get other countries to ratify the extension of coastal areas, we should rejoice instead of cry over our fate at the thought that offshore resources in the Atlantic will belong to strangers when those strangers are in fact other Canadians.

I think we should be able to discuss sharing those resources and their benefits in harmony. We should approach the subject in a positive frame of mind. I am sure the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) spared no effort in trying to find solutions acceptable to all Canadians. As a Quebecer, Mr. Speaker, I plead with this assembly to show some generosity in the sharing of those resources which all humanity can envy us. Mr. Speaker, I know of no other country with as small a population as ours and as great an energy potential that can at times be so narrow-minded about it. Our future depends on it, Mr. Speaker. I feel the notion of "Canada lands" must not be a narrow one but a generous one; and that is why I urge my hon. colleagues to vote against the amendment of the Progressive Conservative Party.

[English]

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, if I may begin my remarks by making a comment on those which we have just heard from the hon. member for Mercier (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette), there is no one in this House who is opposed to sharing the resources of Canada with Canadians. No one!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am not going to take anything from anyone who says, "As a Quebecer, I am prepared to share what I have with Canadians." Everyone in this House is prepared to share. What is preventing the sharing of the resources of this country is the conflict of jurisdiction, the conflict of ownership and the conflict of property.

● (1650)

At the present time we are a retarded nation because the federal government refuses to acknowledge the rules laid down in our constitutional documents that accorded the resources to the provinces in 1930. Now we are talking about sharing as though there is a niggardly attitude; there is no niggardly attitude in this country about sharing.

An hon. Member: There never has been.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): And there never has been. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that yesterday the debate on the amendment was punctuated by a number of points of order or appeals to relevancy from the other side whenever a speaker on this side raised the question of revenue or money in the general discussion on the amendment proposed in motion No. 3.

It is my contention and the contention of all members on this side of the House, I think, that the whole purpose of stretching the definition of Canada lands in legislation beyond that which is normally accepted, namely, north of 60, is to lay claim not just to land but to potential revenue-producing land.

I suggest that we might call Bill C-48 and particularly the section on definitions in a Clause 2 a matter of maritime gerrymandering. The government is trying to secure, by legislation, what it is unable to secure by negotiation. It is as simple as that.

Revenue and the Canada lands concept are intimately linked in this debate, Mr. Speaker. We cannot avoid that. The Liberals are talking Canada lands and they want us to stay with Canada lands, but what they mean is revenue from Canada lands. We are merely exposing this double talk. If there is any doubt, I suggest that hon. members look at Clause 9 and Clause 40 of the bill for the definition of Canada lands.

Clause 9 defines the method of licensing and exploration agreements, while Clause 40 deals with royalties from Canada lands.

It is all very well to say that we have to stay with the lands deal, but I insist that we must think in terms of the revenue that those lands are likely to produce. There is no question in my mind nor in the minds of a good many Canadians that the government in short of revenue and wants more. The argument for claiming the legislative right to more, through this bill, is that it is bankrupt. It is out of money. It is insolvent.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I will tell the hon. member why. It is because of its disposition to squander the resources that are available to it. Its cash flow is non-existent. Indeed, it is flowing backwards. it is not only taxing for revenue but it has to borrow from taxpayers to increase its revenue and to pay the interest on the indebtedness.

In this connection I suggest that all hon. members and everyone who is listening should refer to page 11176 of Hansard for July 3, where there is a table showing the standing of the national debt from the time of confederation until today. I note the date, July 3, and I note that this is a strange way to commemorate members of the House coming together after the Dominion Day break.

In 1867, the national debt was $76 million net; in 1941, in the middle of a war, the net public debt was $4 billion; in 1968, the year the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his governing team took office, the debt was $16.7 billion, or four times greater than it was in the middle of the war. Today the debt has increased four and a half times to $82.7 billion net.

We can see why the government is out in the maritimes, gerrymandering. It is on the grab. We should not be surprised that it is looking for new sources of revenue, and hence is seeking to broaden the definition of Canada lands and the royalties that can be obtained from the resources that those lands will provide.

If the government wants to show its good will, I suggest that it withdraw the notice of appeal it has lodged against an opinion of the B.C. Supreme Court which assigned to the provinces, by a decision of three to two, the waters between the mainland of British Columbia and the large offshore island and the chain of the Charlottes. The B.C. Supreme Court ruled that those waters belonged to the province and immediately the federal government lodged an appeal to contest the ruling.

I should like to go into this carefully because I think it is very important. It has been referred to by other hon. members so I will confine my remarks almost exclusively to one aspect of the matter.

For the definition of Canada lands I would refer hon. members to clause 2 of the bill, which reads, in part, as follows:

> "Canada lands" means lands that belong to Her Majesty in right of Canada, or in respect of which Her Majesty in right of Canada has the right to dispose of or exploit the natural resources and that are situated in
> . . .
> (b) those submarine areas, not within a province,—

"Not within a province" is what we seek to have removed, Mr. Speaker. If the government wants to demonstrate its good intentions, it should look at this clause in light of the B.C. Supreme Court ruling and its intention to appeal that judgment.

The B.C. government sought an opinion on a question regarding its property rights on land covered by the waters of the Strait of Juan de Fuca, the Strait of Georgia, the Johnstone Strait and the Queen Charlotte Strait. The court ruled three in favour and two against the lands being the property of the Queen in right of the province of British Columbia.

This question of discontinuity as between the mainland and the islands must underlie the decision of the federal government to appeal that ruling. No sooner had this particular ruling come down than the federal government decided to appeal. I think on the basis of it, it is beyond imagination's wildest hallucinations to suggest that the land attaching offshore land to the mainland of a province is not part of a province. Yet two justices out of five ruled that way. The three ruled that those submarine lands did belong to the province of British Columbia.

● (1700)

What disturbs me and many British Columbians is that the central Liberal government has served notice of intention to appeal that ruling to a higher court, presumably the Supreme Court of Canada, where, incidentally, one of the dissenting judges now sits.

What the dissenting judges are arguing and what the federal government is now suggesting by maintaining its intention to appeal this ruling, which is not yet implemented, is that there is such a phenomenon as a discontinuous province; that a province can be interrupted territorially or maritimely, if you like, in its seaward expansion, and that the interrupted portion could become a part of the central government. I suggest this is really not a very satisfactory way to run a federation. I would call it the doctrine of provincial discontinuity.

I suggest that if it were applied in its full intent it would probably apply in the mouth of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and to the waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, which would be interrupted by federal jurisdiction between the province of Quebec and Anticosti Island, and the federal government would claim the river bottom there.

I consider that doctrine of provincial discontinuity as one that is hardly tenable in any court of law. The only example I can think of at the moment, and that broke up, was the example of East and West Pakistan which were interrupted by another state, India. But to have east and west British Columbia interrupted by a section of territory or maritime area assigned to the central government is verging on the ludicrous, the ridiculous, if not the improbable. It is also verging on providing a very good cause for the breakaway of one province from Canada. I do not know whether they have ever thought of that. It would at least add another argument, if indeed a further argument is necessary, to persuade British Columbians that Ottawa has no sensitivity to their problems, and that B.C. and other western provinces might do better without Ottawa.

Therefore, as a mark of honourable intention, I suggest this to the parliamentary secretary, since he is the ranking guy here, I think, there being no ministers in the House. The central government ought to withdraw its notice of appeal against the ruling of the B.C. court. This would go a long way, I suggest, toward re-establishing an atmosphere of confidence and trust between the two levels of government, an atmosphere that has been sadly fogged for the last ten years or more.

It would seem that the doctrine of confrontation is that which governs the relations between this government and the provinces—a deplorable situation and I regret that it should be that way.

One might almost say that not just the waters at the mouth of the St. Lawrence, which is closer to the federal government, and therefore they can understand that—I do not think they understand what the waters between the islands and the mainland of British Columbia mean—might be declared in the same way the government is thinking of declaring as federal waters, but presumably the subsoil over which those waters flow would then become national territory. At least the government is testing that ruling of the B.C. Supreme Court. I suspect that would not go down very well with the province of Quebec. I suspect, in fact, that because the province of Quebec would be a party en cause, the claim would not even be made. But in British Columbia where the government has no member of the cabinet, and whose problems the government does not even understand, it is prepared to leave it stand as a threat to the province.

An hon. Member: Votes they do not need.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Votes they don't need and votes they won't get in that area.

Therefore I suggest that first of all, instead of leaving standing the intention to appeal the ruling of the B.C. Supreme Court, the federal government could do itself a great deal of credit if it were to withdraw entirely that particular claim to a review of the records.

I had that particular point to make. It is a point worth making. I hope it is not only made but that it has made a dent on the other side. I should like to see in the very near future a withdrawal of the intention of the federal government to appeal the decision of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia relating to the waters between the mainland and the baseline running along the west coast of Vancouver Island, up through the Queen Charlottes and out to the line A-B.

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I first want to indicate my appreciation for the wide latitude you have permitted in this debate. In looking at the various amendments to this bill one recognizes that perhaps motion No. 3 is the only motion on which we could have a wide ranging debate on the entire bill, the entire energy policy and, indeed, a number of constitutional matters. I might say that having listened for several days to this debate the debate has ranged widely. I am sure you will allow me the same latitude in the course of the 20 minutes I have, in which I hope to have my say in this House on this bill.

The first thing I want to say about the bill is that it is very complicated and very crucial to Canada. We have had hearings on this bill in the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works for approximately six months, with approximately 73 meetings and 130 witnesses. I think it is appropriate that somebody put on record some of the groups which came before this committee because it does give an excellent indication of the importance of this bill. They included most of the major oil companies and their respective organizations, such as CPA and IPAC, They appeared before the committee and made submissions. Several chartered banks appeared before the committee and made submissions, as did the Canadian Bankers' Association. The Canadian Bar Association and the Eastern Fishermen's Federation appeared. The Canadian Ocean Industries Association, the Canadian Shipbuilding Association, the Canadian Labour Congress and the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union also appeared and made presentations.

• (1710)

A number of native organizations also appeared, including the Native Council of Canada, representatives of the Dene nation, the Council of Yukon Indians, the Metis Association of the Northwest Territories and the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada.

The government of the Northwest Territories, the government of the Yukon, the chamber of mines of the Northwest Territories and the chamber of mines of the Yukon appeared and made representations. Indeed, one of the most pleasant presentations was by the mayor of Inuvik.

The Vancouver Board of Trade appeared and made a presentation, and several environmental organizations including the West Coast Environmental Law Association and the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee appeared. Other organizations came before the committee to make their presentations on this very important piece of legislation. Some of us had the opportunity and, indeed, the good fortune to listen to almost all of these presentations, and those we did not hear we read. I count myself in that group of few people who were fortunate enough to have this opportunity.

I mention all these organizations because today I want to take this opportunity to thank these organizations and people who came before the committee to make their cases. I hope everyone in the House wishes to thank them and to congratulate them for taking the time to come and put forward their cases. They participated in the democratic process eminently well with respect to this bill.

All these organizations were responsible for a substantial number of changes to this bill. Indeed, the initial draft of this bill left much to be desired, and by the time these organizations were finished with the bill, the government felt it necessary to bring forward many amendments and changes to accord with their wishes. In many cases those changes weave or interweave with some of the suggestions of the opposition. As I indicated, the influences were substantial, and I suggest they will continue to be so because literally every one of these groups and organizations will watch the passage and implementation of this bill very keenly, with great anticipation in some instances and with much regret in others.

I must say that I was disappointed that none of the provinces took time out to appear and make presentations to the committee on this very important bill which affects so many provinces. As I indicated before, this bill will have a profound effect on governments in Canada and on the opening up of what is two-thirds of this nation, the northern part.

If there is anything I would wish to say, I would publicly commend the chairman of the committee, who I think handled himself very well and gave every advantage to the groups which appeared so they could put their cases forward. I refer to the hon. member for Châteauguay (Mr. Watson).

There was a number of very important concerns, and they might be identified in about ten or eleven categories. The first was the definition of Canada lands. This amendment would effectively reduce Canada lands by approximately 50 per cent and would exclude from this bill Hibernia, the Beaufort Sea and most of the PanArctic gas discoveries in the north.

The second thing about which we were really concerned was ministerial discretion. This bill allows an enormous amount of ministerial discretion. We wish it had given the minister additional discretion in some other areas and removed it in many of the areas in which the minister is allowed wide ranging discretion.

Third, we were vitally concerned about the retroactive expropriation feature which was initially in this bill. Fortunately, because of the massive revulsion of the industry and some of the groups involved, the government felt it appropriate to back off the policy position it had imposed in the bill. The very unfortunate and almost despicable policy position regarding retroactive expropriation of rights and properties should under no circumstances be supported by any party in this House. Due compensation and access to due process of law should always be a right of Canadians in this democratic country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: Much concern was expressed about the Crown-carried interest and the extent of the proposed nationalization of the oil industry on Canada lands. Some excellent arguments were made in this regard. There was great concern expressed about native peoples and, indeed, about the use of Canadian manpower and Canadian materials. There was a great deal of concern expressed about the effect of energy development and growth in the north on territorial governments and the municipal governments of some of the smaller settlements in the north. Some of us felt very strongly that some of the royalties accumulating from oil and gas production in this vast area should be placed in a fund for the future use of the provinces and for the future use of some of the communities which will have to develop under adverse conditions—and rather explosively because of this bill.

Environmental matters were a great concern, and we do not think the bill deals adequately with the concerns which will evolve in this area. There were many punitive measures which had to be adjusted, but one of the most important single aspects of this bill was the nature of its construction in terms of limiting the opportunities of small Canadian companies and their ability to participate in the development of oil and gas in this vast area of Canada, which is literally two-thirds of the country. This was one of my most basic concerns. Here was a bill to Canadianize an industry, and the restrictions, monetary and otherwise, on small Canadian companies participating were overwhelming in some areas.

Our country is vastly endowed with hydrocarbon resources, including coal, oil, gas, oil sands and heavy oils, as no other country in the world, but what we are suffering from is the lack of a proper management program and, particularly over the last decade, political mismanagement of the development of our hydrocarbon resources.

Bill C-48, in tandem with the National Energy Program, is an attempt to bring forward a new energy supply, distribution and use regime. First let me state unequivocally that the regime, although having some good aspects, is being forced upon a nation over too short a time-frame. That is one of the reasons there is a major revulsion in the United States against the regime. It is too fierce and too fast to accomplish objectives which may be appropriate over a longer time-frame.

What are the objectives? The objectives have been well stated on a number of occasions. The first objective is at least 50 per cent Canadian ownership of oil and gas production by 1990 through the process of Canadianization and nationalization. The second objective is Canadian control of a significant number of large oil and gas firms. We know the manner in which the government is proceeding in this regard.

● (1720)

Third is an increase in the share of the oil and gas sector owned by the Government of Canada. I might put that in a different way: I might say a significant transfer of control over the oil and gas industry from the producing provinces, particularly Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, to federal control. The question is: How is it being done? Well, in three ways. First of all, by transferring the emphasis to Canada lands and away from provincial lands by taxation, rent and incentives. Secondly, by massively increasing the federal take from oil and gas produced in provincial land. We have seen only a beginning in that direction. Third, by the imposition of a federal oil and gas pricing regime which limits provincial government and company revenues from oil and gas produced from provincial lands.

From all the questioning we have done, we anticipate a two-price policy, a world price for oil produced in Canada lands. Petro-Canada has stated that unequivocally in committee. Under questioning the minister gave us every indication that oil from federal lands would be priced at world levels. Contrast this with a pricing structure for oil from provincial lands which is now approximately 50 per cent of the world price. So what we are attempting here is a transfer of control over the industry, putting emphasis on development of federal lands, not only through the tax and grant structure but through a price structure, and thereby depressing development in the provinces. I also want to touch on the Cold Lake project in relation to the policies associated with Bill C-48 and the NEP.

There is no doubt that there are very good arguments for moving in this direction if you have certain policies in mind and a certain vision of the nation. Canada's resources are what make this nation rich and make every one of us unique. We have in this nation elbow room, wealth, ability, capability and possibilities down into the future that no other nation in the world has. Heaven help us if we start to split it up because we will all suffer drastically.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am concerned about this amendment in regard to the vast seas of the northern part of Canada. It is my view and my conclusion that we must exercise sovereignty over that part of our nation in every possible way and at every instant. We must be there constantly because that vast area of Canada is looked upon with great envy by some of the major powers of the world. So if you ask me about my view with regard to that vast northern area, we must declare repeatedly that it is Canadian, and we must be there to exploit, develop, control and manage its resources.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: Now, I want to touch briefly on the rights of the Atlantic provinces with regard to the resources extending for 200 miles out on the continental shelf. I am of the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that laws and court cases will not settle the question. The provinces do not want to go to court or they would have been there a long time ago. It is negotiations which will settle this problem. My fear and concern is in connection with the negotiating process established during the last year by the government, which I find badly wanting.

I am terribly sorry that I will not have more time to dwell on this matter. What I want to say above all else is that any federal cabinet dealing constantly with the provinces must have somebody to take strongly the provincial point of view. The rest of the cabinet ministers are going to be building empires, taking the federal perspective, so there must be someone in cabinet who understands the provincial perspective and who will try and sell cabinet members and the caucus on the provincial perspective. There must be a minister of federal-provincial relations whose sole reason for being is to understand provincial aspirations, needs and desires, one who constantly projects them into cabinet over and over again. I for one am terribly disappointed that this government does not have a minister of federal-provincial relations who will totally carry the ball for the provinces on the Atlantic coast and the west coast on resources, cost-sharing programs and so forth. I suggest this government had better seriously rethink the need for appointing such a minister.

The then minister of intergovernmental affairs in 1978, the now Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde)—and he was a fairly effective minister of intergovernmental affairs in those days—gave a remarkable speech at the first ministers' conference where he said: "A century ago Sir John A. simply announced what his national policy was going to be. No discussions with provincial governments, no series of visits to provincial capitals, and no federal-provincial conferences preceded his announcements, and no one seems to have expected that they would. By contrast, any policies and processes we decide upon in this area today will emerge as a result of the process of federal and provincial consultation begun in the months preceding this meeting, and as a result of the continuing process of consultation which I hope the first ministers will agree to today."

His dissertation at that meeting was entitled "Consultative Mechanisms". That is what we need more of. That is what we need to bring unity to this nation, to bring the outer regions into the centre, and we need it quite soon.

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to enter the debate on this motion during report stage on Bill C-48, a bill which we all know is to regulate oil and gas interests in the Canada lands, and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act.

I represent, as most members know, what could be termed an energy disadvantaged region of the country. Regardless of what happens in the future in energy exploration off the east coast, the most South West Nova can probably expect, as indeed most of the region, are some spin-off benefits from development taking place in a few growth centres. Mind you, I will be working hard for South West Nova to obtain these spin-offs.

• (1730)

Much of the debate on this motion has been concerned with jurisdiction and with what should constitute the Canada lands to which the act will apply. This is not surprising in view of the amount of political mileage opponents of the program are receiving from the jurisdictional question. In my view, the jurisdictional controversy is a red herring which may obscure the fact that the greater issue is the development of offshore resources.

The question of what is or what is not Canada lands is sidestepping the real issue. The real issue is this: Do we want control over our energy supply, distribution and pricing, and decisions about development of new sources—in effect our entire energy future—to reside with those who have a vested interest in meeting the needs of Canadians or with the vagaries of an increasingly anarchic free market? Those who insist upon drawing fine lines over jurisdiction of frontier areas are either playing fast and loose with our collective future for short-term political gain, or attempting to sidestep the crucial question of whether control of Canada's future energy supplies will reside in the hands of Canadians or of foreign multinationals.

It is easy to make references to "just birthright", as I believe one Nova Scotia cabinet minister has done, when referring to ownership of offshore resources. It is not so easy to explain how the astounding costs of developing those resources will be met. It is not hard to see that without federal involvement in the development process provincial governments, assuming they had such control, would be forced to turn to foreign capital, which naturally entails foreign control.

For an illustration of this we have only to look at the Nova Scotia government's overtures to American business for capital to finance a tidal power development on the Bay of Fundy.

Mr. Siddon: Where are we borrowing from?

Miss Campbell: The hon. member wants to know from where we are borrowing. It is a prime example in Nova Scotia. While Premier Buchanan could have proceeded through the Maritime Energy Corporation and federal funding, which would have ensured that the development would remain under Canadian control and benefit Canadians as well as Nova Scotians, he elected to abandon the Maritime Energy Corporation and invited American interests to participate in the funding of the project.

This is fine, except that if it is ever built with United States funds instead of Canadian funds most of the power generated by the plant will be exported to the United States. With offshore energy development one can only expect the level of foreign control to be even greater. The federal policy is to ensure that the energy resources of Canada are developed for Canadians. There has never been any suggestion that the areas where these resources are located are to be deprived of any of the benefits of their development.

"Canada lands" clearly defines for those who are investing millions of dollars in offshore resource development where the federal regulations in Bill C-48 will apply. It is a clear statement of what the responsibility of the federal government to Canadians will be in the development of oil and gas on these lands. The jurisdictional problem is another issue. If the provinces feel they have a right to offshore resources, let them go to the courts; but in the meantime the development of offshore oil and gas should not be hindered by uncertainty. Canadians and east coast Canadians need a strong National Energy Program if we are to continue our growth as a country.

I might add that there is strong support for the federal government having jurisdiction over the offshore. I will not become involved in a debate which should take place before the courts, but even Sable Island about which we have heard a lot during the debate on this motion is under Section 91 of the British North America Act a federal responsibility. We could look at federal states such as Australia and the United States. Who controls the offshore? Both of the countries I have just mentioned do, not the states next to the offshore.

The Supreme Court of Canada ruled in the British Columbia reference case on offshore that the territorial seabed was not within the boundaries of British Columbia. International law recognized the rights of coastal states. The Geneva convention on the continental shelf granted to coastal states sovereign rights to explore the continental shelf and to exploit its a natural resources. Canada has claimed rights to the 200-mile limit and they have been recognized. The ongoing United Nations Law of the Sea Conference reached a consensus on the coastal state's exclusive economic zone of 200 miles.

I believe we must rely on ourselves, on Canadians, on Nova Scotians, if we want control over this vital part of our present and future. Only by retaining control of our resources within our own country can we ensure that Canadians, both business people and ordinary citizens, are the first to benefit from resource development or, indeed, even that such development is carried on in appropriate ways to meet Canadian needs and aspirations.

If Newfoundland and Nova Scotia are right, if their claims to offshore resources are found to be legitimate, what then? Should the rest of Canada be expected to foot massive bills for exploration if that exploration may ultimately only benefit one or two provinces? Could those provinces develop their resources on their own, or would they be forced to resort to opening the door to exploitation by big foreign interests? Who would ultimately benefit from such development? It would not be Nova Scotians.

I wonder if anyone in the Nova Scotia government has taken the trouble to ask the people of that province how they feel about the question of offshore jurisdiction. Do the people of the Atlantic provinces really support the idea of provincial control of the offshore? I would note in that regard that more Liberals were elected in the 1980 election than in the previous one, and certainly the then prime minister, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), was giving away the offshore to try to win votes. Our insistence upon federal jurisdiction over the offshore is well-established in precedents and in international law.

I do not think that by claiming jurisdiction anyone in the region seriously believes that Ottawa is out to rob them of their birthright. I consider it imperative that the people of Canada, through the federal government, have some input in future energy resource development decisions. Only in this way can we be assured that those decisions will be made with some regard for the legitimate needs of the people.

In these increasingly energy-short days when we are forced to develop more expensive energy sources, I believe it is only through the participation of federal agencies such as Petro-Canada that energy alternatives will be explored at all. The enormously expensive tar sands projects, upon which we will some day depend for crude oil supplies, oil and gas exploration off the east coast, and even Premier Buchanan's prize Annapolis Valley power demonstration project, were developed with the aid of federal money and without that federal money would in all likelihood not have come about when they did.

What is the alternative if we defeat this motion? Canada lands is the alternative. What do the provinces have? They must enter into arrangements with the federal government, and what is wrong with that?

Let us look at what the arrangements have been in the past. In February, 1977 Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island agreed to set aside their differences. They signed a memorandum of agreement for joint administration which would provide for a general revenue sharing arrangement of 75 per cent for the provinces and 25 per cent for the federal government. It was this memorandum of agreement which was later repudiated through changes in governments. As late as September 19, 1980, during the constitutional conference, the federal government offered an administrative agreement to the maritime provinces which would allow the 100 per cent of the revenues from the sales of fuel, natural gas and other minerals until those provinces reached a have position.

We should all take one minute to reconsider what Canada means. It has always meant the sharing of the wealth of Canada between the haves and the have-nots. Why would all of the Atlantic provinces not wish to share if they ever reach a point where they can? It looks as if that will be some time soon, with all the oil and gas which exists there. Why should they not wish to share their bounty with the rest of Canadians? The energies of the provinces, in my view, should be directed to arriving at arrangements with the federal government which truly benefit their areas. When they are negotiating these arrangements they would do well to put aside some of their political considerations and think about the people of all those provinces.

In conclusion, I do not believe that business alone, driven solely by the profit motive, can provide the assurance we need to approach the future with confidence. The National Energy Program has been criticized sharply by big business interests. I suggest those voices are speaking out of self-interest. We might do well to accord them less than total credibility.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, in the few remaining minutes this evening I too wish to touch upon the question of jurisdiction. It surprises me that the hon. member for South West Nova (Miss Campbell) would repeat speeches written by the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), the former Premier of Nova Scotia, written some ten or 15 years ago.

Miss Campbell: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to inform the House that I do my own research on my speeches. Maybe I do not have the opportunity to speak as often as the hon. member for Halifax-Dartmouth East (Mr. Forrestall), but I am sure that when he finishes his speech we will have to judge whose content is best.

Mr. Forrestall: The hon. lady might do herself and our province some justice if she would do a little original research and stop reading old speeches.

Our claim is simple. We want what was ours before confederation, which has been ours by recognition and which this government is now trying to take away from us. There is no political argument which can be put forward to controvert the position of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. Not only is there no political argument which can be put forward but there is no legal argument either.

The Supreme Court of the province of British Columbia made it very clear in its decision that, the facts in that case were based on historical evidence which may be not only different but which, in fact, were recognized by the court as being significantly different as between the west coast and the east coast. There is no question about the historical facts or the legal facts. The only question is whether or not there is a will in this Parliament to extend to the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland the same entitlements which were given in 1912, for example, to the great provinces of Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba.

At that time, by the stroke of a pen and by the will of Parliament, without constitutional amendment, some 600,000 square miles—20 or 30 times the size of the province of Nova Scotia—was given away. I was about to suggest that it was an oversight; but the question did come up at the time as to whether or not there would be compensatory arrangements with other smaller, original parts of confederation. There was no great pressure in those days to redress that inequity. There was no great pressure from Atlantic Canada. But because there was not, you cannot today interpret that to mean that the right does not continue to exist—it does. It is a historical right. There can be no real serious question about the legality of it.

It has been suggested that the issue should be taken to the courts. The Premier of Nova Scotia once removed tried to use those arguments. I wish hon. members could have been in the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia when Senator Isaac Smith from the other place, in another capacity, dealt with the spurious notes which were coming down from Ottawa with respect to jurisdiction.

Everyone knows we will share. We are not concerned about the money; we are concerned about the propriety of ownership and the right of entitlement. There has never been the question raised on this side of the House about the need for comprehensive, tight controls—none whatsoever. The province of Nova Scotia will give up to a central, singular authority environmental concerns, licensing concerns and all of the regimes which are important to develop the energy and resources which are there. The province will give those up for the sake of orderly development.

But you must always remember, Mr. Speaker, that, in fact, control is ownership. The Premier of the province of Newfoundland must have the right, since he is the one first associated, to influence. That right is impeded through ownership and the rate at which the resources off that coast are developed. He is the one who must have the right. He is the one responsible first to his people and for his people for the orderly development of the potential of the east coast. The same is true in the province of New Brunswick and it is certainly true in the province of Nova Scotia. About that there can be little historical or political doubt.

What we are asking for those people who have faith in Canada and Canadians—something which we see very seldom from members opposite—is that that simple request be recognized. Control must be centralized but ownership must not be in question. What this bill does by the stroke of a pen is take away from Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Newfoundland lands and resources which, under the British North America Act, they are entitled to. They are entitled to those lands in law. They are entitled to them by history. In fact, they are entitled to them politically.

The spuriousness of the argument put forward, and the fact that the hon. member for South West Nova would not recognize the simple difference between the words "control" and "ownership" rather shocks me. After all, she is a trained lawyer. She should understand that control can pass from time to time wilfully, and ownership can, as well; but ownership determines control.

If we give up ownership now we will have lost these lands and their potential resources forever. It was the eastern provinces which financed the development of the central part of this country. It was our fish, our timber and our offshore trading that set up the industrial heartland of this country. We did that without complaint for 150 years. Now the government wants to take away from us a reward, a due recognition? If what it wants to do is control it for orderly development, so that we can get at the resources and satisfy the investment, so we can control environmental concerns, by all means, let us have some common authority to deal with these questions. However, that does not, should not and must never compromise the question of ownership, and ownership is what we are talking about. Call it jurisdiction, if one wants. One may call it control if one wants. But is is simply ownership.

We got nothing at all in 1812. Our money was pouring into central Canada to develop the rich resources in the areas which were annexed by agreement. It was our money. Look at James Bay. Are we going to nationalize that? Is that going to become a Canada land? Not on your life!

Does Your Honour know what we have now? This is just one example. The gas and oil from the east coast will more than supply our needs beyond our lifetimes and our grandchildren's lifetimes. The development of it and the control that is wanted by this government is to force the development of a petrochemical industrial base in this country to locate where perhaps natural forces would not place it. We are going to remove from the source of gas and oil, a thousand miles inland, a petrochemical base. We in Atlantic Canada will be watchers of pipeline. Well, I say to the devil with you! The government is not going to get away with it!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: The government will not build a unified country. That is its intention. The government does not care about the cost. It allows $500 million or $600 million to be invested in the development of a petrochemical industry in eastern Canada, but it does so in such a way that not one nickle will accrue to the benefit of Newfoundland or Nova Scotia, not to mention New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. We are objecting to this. This is what control is about: recognition of our ownership. Then we would negotiate the best place for the development of that petrochemical industry. However, if we do not have ownership, if ownership is vested in Ottawa, although I trust Canada, I do not trust the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: We will get it in the neck, and we will be watchers of pipeline. We will not be allowed to develop a resource base which will enable us to lift ourselves out of the economic morass and difficulties in which we have been. We all recognize that as Atlantic Canadians. Please recognize us as Canadians from other parts of the country.

An hon. Member: A massive money grab!

Mr. Forrestall: It is a money grab. It is a resource grab. More than that, it is a serious deprivation of a historical right and a legal right. It is a political matter about which the people of Atlantic Canada have long believed there can be no question.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I too am one of those who have sat through numerous meetings on the committee which debated this particular bill, and listened to over 100 different delegations, all of which had very serious concerns about many different aspects of this bill.

One of the main reasons I am pleased to be able to speak about the broad concept of Bill C-48 in this initial stage is that the bill proceeded through committee not in a very conventional way. We had a bill which contained roughly 86 or so clauses before a committee. The government introduced 115 amendments to its own bill. What we were really trying to do in that energy committee on Bill C-48 was not to debate the bill, to improve it and to test it against its implementation out in the country; rather, what we were doing in committee was drafting a new bill. There were 86 clauses and 115 amendments by the government alone!

We had some amendments to the bill ourselves, and so did the members from the NDP. As I said, the reason I am pleased to be able to talk about this bill is that not one single amendment proposed by Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition or of the New Democratic Party was accepted by the members of the governing party in the committee. In fact, the parliamentary secretary who steered the bill through the House admitted to me—and that is when I walked out, toward the end of the deliberations—that the government had no intention of accepting any of the many amendments that we had made and that the other party had made.

So much for democracy! So much for the orderly process of what was once a proud institution on which Canadians could rely to test a matter which the government would lay before it against the will of the people. So here we are debating a bill with 86 clauses, which changes in a very fundamental way the very nature of our socioeconomic behaviour in this country, to which the government has introduced 115 amendments and stated publicly that it is in no mood or is in no way prepared to accept any amendments from the opposition.

I said to my friends across the aisle at that point, as I walked out, that I had a lot of other things to do. I knew what their amendments were. I knew that they had a bad bill. They knew it themselves or else they would not have brought in all these amendments. I do not know who their draftsmen were. Surely there must be people out there with the competence and capacity to state in legal language the government's intentions in this bill.

I want to speak a little about the government's intentions, but I realize it is six o'clock. Therefore, I would like to call it six o'clock and take my opportunity to do that tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) knows what the order of business will be tomorrow.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I thought that we had made that plain during the last couple of days. We plan to proceed with the report stage of Bill C-48.

Mr. Knowles: Times do change, as the hon. member knows.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

THE MONARCHY

CONGRATULATIONS ON FORTHCOMING MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCE OF WALES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing importance under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas Canada and Canadians rejoice over the royal wedding of the Prince of Wales and Lady Diana Spencer, to take place July 29, 1981, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. Campbell) and the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House unanimously congratulate and express its best wishes to the royal couple on their wedding.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the introduction of this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CALL FOR WITHDRAWAL OF SPRAYING PERMITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, despite the fact the report on Agent Orange was inconclusive, evasive, and totally unsatisfactory, several private companies intend to douse approximately 44,000 acres of woodland in New Brunswick with a poison containing some of the lethal properties of Agent Orange, namely, dioxin. Besides being adjacent to populated regions of the province there are water courses which could carry the toxins well beyond the boundaries of the spray area. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That until there is conclusive and substantial proof that sprays of this nature have no harmful effect on humans, or negative ecological impacts, the government immediately withdraw all permits for the use of these poisons in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

RAILWAYS

SUGGESTION MINISTER REFUSE APPROVAL FOR ELIMINATION OF PASSENGER SERVICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, whereas the plan of the Liberal government to cut severely rail passenger service by order in council is undemocratic and a threat to the well-being of many communities in Canada; and whereas if the Edmonton-Drumheller VIA Rail line is abandoned the city of Drumheller will be without direct ground transportation to Edmonton, our capital city, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche):

That this House urges the Minister of Transport to refuse to approve the elimination of such essential railway lines.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE—FUNDING FOR REMOVAL OF FOAM INSULATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 concerning a national disaster that is a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to be dealt with before this House breaks for the summer.

It is now clearly established that testing for the effects of urea formaldehyde foam insulation are inconclusive, since the degree of poisonous gas can vary with the weather, and individual susceptibility can differ. Since thousands of Canadian home owners are suffering from considerable stress and financial worry, as well as suffering health problems from urea formaldehyde, and inasmuch as the federal government is responsible for creating this severe problem through its product safety and CHIP programs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly):

That the federal government reallocate the $5 million budgeted for UFFI testing and the $330 million approved for home insulation programs for this year, and establish a fund to assist home owners immediately to remove this poisonous foam insulation and make their homes safe again for their families.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GRAIN

CALL FOR IMMEDIATE APPOINTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION CO-ORDINATOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, it took the previous minister of transport only five months to negotiate the terms of reference for the Grain Transportation Authority and appoint Dr. Horner as its first co-ordinator. For almost two years the Grain Transportation Authority has served a very useful function in making the best use of the limited amount of transportation facilities available for Canadian grain, and the Grain Transportation Authority has been without a permanent co-ordinator for almost ten months. Therefore I move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the Minister of Transport show his support for the Grain Transportation Authority by immediately announcing a permanent Grain Transportation Authority co-ordinator.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLITICAL PARTIES

POSTAL STRIKE STRATEGY OF PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of this morning's Globe and Mail report that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has been "brought to heel" by members of his caucus concerning the Progressive Conservatives' postal strike strategy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Parent):

That this House condemn those heels in the Tory caucus who are putting the boots to their leader at a time when his leadership is under review.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RAILWAYS

SUGGESTION MINISTERS MEET TO DISCUSS PASSENGER SERVICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, I am appalled at the thought that much of the rail passenger service across Canada may be discontinued in this time of high energy costs and, in particular, at the cancellation of the rail passenger service between Toronto and Barrie, a rapidly expanding area. The present Barrie train carries 500 to 600 passengers daily, and the savings in fuel alone for this service has been estimated at approximately 260,000 gallons annually. In speaking to the office of the minister of transportation and communications of Ontario this morning, I understand that the Hon. James Snow has requested a meeting with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the meeting between the two ministers be convened as quickly as possible and that there be no discontinuance of any rail passenger service without full public input and, most particularly, not by a sneaky order in council.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PENSIONS

LEGISLATION SOUGHT TO PROVIDE EQUALITY OF PENSIONS FOR SURVIVING SPOUSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, because it is understood that all hon. members of the House believe in equal rights for men and women I trust there will be unanimous support for my motion. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House notes that under various government superannuation plans, if the wife dies first the surviving widower's pension is 100 per cent but that if the husband dies first the surviving widow's pension is only 50 per cent, and this House calls on the government to bring in the necessary legislation to correct this situation on an interim basis by raising the widow's pension in all such cases to 75 per cent, and to declare that the eventual goal is pension equality between men and women.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM—SUGGESTED ONE-YEAR EXTENSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas 3,000 western cattle producers are still waiting for finalization of their herd maintenance applications, and whereas many of the producers hit hard for lack of forage crops last year are now experiencing worse conditions this year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight):

That the Minister of Agriculture, the minister responsible for DREE, the minister responsible for Saskatchewan in the other place, and the minister responsible for Alberta in the other place, get their act together and at least one of them accept the responsibility to see that last year's herd maintenance is finalized and that an arrangement be made to extend the program for another year.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NORTH-SOUTH RELATIONS

COMMENDATION OF POLICIES OF WEST GERMAN CHANCELLOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In recent times Helmut Schmidt, the Chancellor of West Germany, who arrives in Ottawa tonight, has gone through "great strains" to remain firmly committed to European security through NATO. Further, since Helmut Schmidt speaks for the one European country without which neither the North Atlantic Treaty nor the European Economic Community could exist, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Dion):

That this House thank and congratulate the Chancellor for his position that while military strength is one essential element of security, social peace based on a determined effort to ensure that the burdens of austerity are shared with tolerable fairness is another.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

CALL FOR DISMISSAL OF MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to the producers under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. I hope the minister responsible will assist me in this matter. In view of the announcement made yesterday by the assistant to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) in the other place, which lowered the initial payment for spring wheat by 60 cents per bushel and $1.75 for durum, compared with what producers received last year with the initial adjusted price, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That, in light of the appearance of deliberate deception by the assistant of the Minister of Transport in the other place, this House instruct the Minister of Transport to accept his responsibilities and dismiss his assistant immediately.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

VIEWS OF UNITED STATES TRADE COMMISSIONER

Mr. John Thomson (Calgary South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Trade. For the first time yesterday we witnessed a member of the United States cabinet speaking on behalf of the United States government with respect to what it believes to be discriminatory policies of the Canadian government, particularly with respect to the Canadian National Energy Program. William Brock, U.S. special trade commissioner, has stated in the last few days that the United States views recent Canadian policies as a violation of our bilateral agreements. The minister will also be aware of the concerns expressed by other of our major trading partners. These concerns—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that he should not be quoting at such length when asking a question. I would ask him to come directly to his question.

Mr. Thomson: Madam Speaker, the question I would like to put to the minister is this: has the minister discussed those concerns expressed by Mr. Brock? If so, could the minister advise the House what steps he has taken to ensure that Canadian exports will not be damaged as a result of the discriminatory aspects of the National Energy Program?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (Trade)): Madam Speaker, I have not had an opportunity to see the total transcript of Ambassador Brock's statements. I called CTV in Washington, today, and a copy of the film clip is being sent here. This morning I endeavoured to call Ambassador Brock to discuss the situation with him. I am hoping to meet with him in the next couple of weeks.

REQUEST THAT PROGRAM BE WITHDRAWN

Mr. John Thomson (Calgary South): Madam Speaker, I think you must agree, and the minister must agree, that this is a very serious matter. I cannot believe, in view of the seriousness of the implications, that the minister has not taken the time to talk to Ambassador Brock about this matter.

I would like to remind the minister that 75 per cent of his—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member put his question?

Mr. Thomson: Will the minister undertake to persuade his cabinet colleagues of the grave consequences which exist for Canadian exports and Canadian employment, and to withdraw the government's discriminatory energy program before it is too late?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (Trade)): Madam Speaker, we are very conscious of the fact that no two nations in the world will have bilateral trade reaching $100 billion this year, which Canada and the United States will attain. We are unaware of any violation of any bilateral agreements to which Ambassador Brock has referred. As my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, said the day before yesterday, the Prime Minister in his meeting with President Reagan last week discussed this issue. The Secretary of State for External Affairs also discussed this issue with Secretary Haig and Ambassador Brock in Nassau a week ago. Because of the fact that the private and public sectors in both nations are conscious of this excellent bilateral relationship which we have, I am confident we will find a solution to these problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INDUSTRY

CANADIANIZATION PROGRAM

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question must be directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce because the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is not here, nor is the Minister of Finance, nor the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1420)

Mr. Wilson: All I see is empty green here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: This is a bad start. I wonder if we are going to get through the question period today.

Mr. Wilson: It is quite clear, Madam Speaker, that they are very uncomfortable today. My question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in the absence of all of his colleagues. Most Canadians support increased Canadian ownership of industry in Canada, and particularly of the oil and gas industry. However, many are concerned—

Mr. Andre: Except those in Windsor.

Mr. Wilson: —by the way that the government has gone about increasing the level of Canadian ownership in Canadian industry, particularly as it relates to our trade relations, as my colleague has just stated, and in other bilateral areas, such as the question of acid rain.

Will the government withdraw the punitive elements of its Canadianization program and replace them with policies which encourage—I stress encourage—the greater purchase of shares of Canadian companies, by Canadians, and in so doing would not provoke the confrontation which is currently under way with the U.S. government?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we do not believe that these policies are punitive. We believe they are fair and reasonable. We do not deal in a discriminatory way with any of our trading partners. If my hon. friend—

Mr. Andre: And the world is flat.

Mr. Gray: —is giving more than lip service to the concept of strengthening Canadian ownership, he would not ask questions like that.

* * *

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

REQUEST THAT AGENCY'S POWERS NOT BE INCREASED

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, we on this side of the House take a back seat to no one in encouraging Canadian ownership.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: If the hon. member—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Where have you been, Herb?

Mr. Wilson: If the minister would read our amendments on Bill C-48, he would understand what I meant when I said that. The increase in the free flow of capital to the United States has resulted in a number of Canadian companies buying U.S. companies, and it is causing a problem with the U.S. Congress. The reverse is not true.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson: Companies in the United States are not able to move capital up here as freely, as the minister well knows.

In the Speech from the Throne there was the stated intention to increase the powers of FIRA and increase the degree of intervention of FIRA into the Canadian economy. Will the minister consider withdrawing those three elements of increasing FIRA's powers, and thus put a blanket on the current feelings existing between the two countries today?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we certainly do not agree that the proposals in the throne speech would increase the degree of intervention. They simply make it easier for the basic purpose of the act to be achieved, which is the attainment of significant benefit for the Canadian economy, the achievement of a good deal, both for the investor and for the Canadian economy.

Mr. Andre: And money to lend to Chrysler.

Mr. Gray: I am surprised that my hon. friend questions that. If he does, it is no wonder that the Canadian people put him and his party in the back seat last year.

RAILWAYS

FUTURE OF VIA RAIL PASSENGER ROUTES—QUERY RESPECTING CABINET DECISION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport some questions. On June 29 I asked the minister if he intended to announce abandonment of 16 railway passenger routes, and he did not say either way; but he moaned about a $300 million subsidy to VIA Rail and that something had to be done about it. Are we to assume that only VIA Rail is to be victimized by cutbacks? Subsidies in 1980 for marine transport amounted to $320 million, and for air transport they amounted to $312 million. There has only been a 38 per cent recovery for air users, and a 45 per cent subsidy for highway users.

Is it correct that cabinet made a decision today on what routes are to be abandoned by order in council? If so, will the minister tell us which ones they are and, if not, when will cabinet decide? Or will the minister abandon the idea of rail passenger route abandonments instead?

Mr. Andre: They will only abandon western Canadian routes. Don't worry.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am in no position to make an announcement today on that subject. Therefore, what is said in some quarters is hypothetical. However, I want to reassure my hon. friend that railway transportation, and rail passenger transportation in particular, has always been extremely well served by the Department of Transport. We know, however, that the rate of subsidization has grown 30 per cent in each year of the past two years. We simply wonder what the best way is to help VIA Rail to ensure the growth and progress of passenger rail transportation in Canada.

• (1425)

Mr. Andre: Abandon your western Canadian routes.

Mr. Pepin: In that respect, the essence is to make sure that VIA Rail has updated equipment, the lack of which seems to be at the centre of its difficulties now. At the same time we must realize there are limitations on the federal government's capacity to subsidize transportation. We are just trying, and we are agonizing over it, to find the best way to help VIA Rail and its rail passenger transportation. In my view those, like my hon. friend, who want to protect every yard and every inch of route in Canada are doing a great disservice to VIA Rail. In some ways they are strangling it with love, and that is not the best way to help.

SUBSIDIZATION OF AIRLINE SERVICES AND FACILITIES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, may I ask this philosophic version of Otto Lang whether it is correct that his ministry, which has jet engines for brains, in addition to present subsidies being made to airlines will grant a further $8 million subsidy to Eastern Provincial Airlines for operations into St. Leonard, Chatham and Fredericton, New Brunswick, and Sydney, Nova Scotia as well as paying the costs to upgrade those airports to handle Boeing 727s while the Atlantic Limited passenger train is being abandoned?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I would remind my hon. friend that 27 per cent of the department's budget goes to passenger railway transportation, which is quite substantial. Indeed, it is a half a billion dollars.

As to the question of St. Leonard airport, this is a subject to which I have given much attention. The idea would be to try, on a multi-modal basis, to give this particular area of New Brunswick the best possible transportation system, and we are working on that.

APPOINTMENTS TO VIA RAIL BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, the minister's assertions about the government doing its best for VIA Rail leave me a little bit cold. While I expect the minister to appoint Liberals, can he tell me which one, if any, of the six new appointees to VIA Rail Canada Inc. board of directors, including a former Liberal organizer, campaign manager, and MLA in Saskatchewan, knows a damn thing about railway passenger train service? Incidentally, legislation has not yet been introduced to make VIA Rail an incorporated company. One of these appointees is from Chrysler Corporation, one is from the University of Alberta, one is an investment dealer, one is a feed lot operator, and one is an industrial commissioner. Can the minister explain these appointments which, included an appointee from Windsor?

An hon. Member: They are all Liberals.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have served on a number of boards in the past. In every case the objective of companies is to appoint people to those boards who have a diversity of experience having been in different sectors of the economy. It is this diversity of experience that is required.

I am really surprised by the concept which has been put forward here, that in order to serve on a board you have to be an expert in the field in which a company is operating. The experts are in the company and are part of its staff. People serving on boards of directors should be those who represent a diversity of experience and the public interest at large. The other day I met with the VIA Rail group and I was impressed with their dedication and their knowledge of the subject.

COMBINES

URANIUM CARTEL—PROTECTION FOR CANADIAN CONSUMERS IN EARLY SEVENTIES

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question, of which I have given notice, is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. He may or may not know that the former minister of energy, mines and resources, Mr. Donald Macdonald, was interviewed by the CBC earlier this week. At that time he confirmed, and I quote from the text of the transcript:

● (1430)

All the Canadian producers at the time . . . all the essential producers were told that there was a government policy to maintain a floor price on uranium for export and were required to participate.

The minister is aware that with respect to commodities such as wheat, oil, and natural gas, we have a two-tier system of pricing. What system was in place to protect Canadian consumers from cartel prices during the early 1970s in circumstances where those prices were arrived at by way of bid rigging?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of not only one but three questions. Unfortunately, whether he has given me notice or not of the questions that he wants to raise in the House, I must tell him that these questions are in relation to cabinet decisions and something that is now before the courts. Therefore the answer given by the Minister of Justice should suffice.

Mr. Speyer: That is an absolutely astounding answer.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That's stonewalling.

LEGALITY OF CARTEL

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, I will direct a question to the minister that I hope he will be able to answer. During the early 1970s when the cartel was being contemplated not only by the producers but by the government, there was considerable doubt about the legality of it. I have given the minister notice with respect to this question. Did Mr. Bertrand's predecessor, David Henry, prepare for the government any opinion which would cast doubt on the legality of the venture as it pertained to the domestic marketing of uranium?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, it has been repeatedly stated in this House by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice that any arrangement having to do with the domestic market was not correct and was not acceptable. I do not understand why the opposition is pursuing this course, knowing full well of the arrangements with relation to international activities which did not have anything to do with the domestic activity. The only problem is in the mind of the vicious opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PREPARATION OF OPINION BY MR. DAVID HENRY

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, I am afraid the minister understands only too well why we want to know the answer to that question. It is part of a shameless cover-up by this government. I ask the minister again to tell us whether there was an opinion by Mr. Henry with respect to the legality of the cartel as it pertained to the domestic market?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the opposition is clearly trying to cloud the issue and draw conclusions about an imaginary situation. In fact I find the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition and that of the hon. member particularly unfortunate, since they use their parliamentary immunity to ask questions and raise suspicion among the public. It is quite clear that this file was examined by independent lawyers, that they recommended legal action to the Minister of Justice, and this is exactly what has been done. It is completely irresponsible to try to raise doubts or cast aspersions on other people, and I would say that the hon. member in particular is a drip.

[English]

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF OPINION

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, the minister is casting doubt and discredit on his own capability and performance as a minister by stonewalling these questions. I wish to bring to the minister's attention a conclusion which is based on fact. Since the minister's memory today is selective, I want to ask him about the advice of Mr. David Henry, the former director of combines, given in 1972, and released to a Congressional committee in 1977, contained in the minutes of a meeting which was called by Mr. Jack Austin. That meeting comprised all the people who had been charged in the indictment. At that meeting Mr. Austin said, and I quote from the minutes:

—that an opinion had been obtained from the Director to the Combines Investigative Branch that the arrangement is legal as it is presently understood by the Director but that it could later become illegal if orders have to be declined by Canadian producers as a result of the arrangement.

That was an opinion given by Mr. David Henry, now Mr. Justice Henry, the former director of the combines investigation branch in 1972. We are told by the Prime Minister that this matter did not come to their attention until 1975.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: They did not act on that investigation until 1977. My question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who is responsible to this House for combines, is: why did the government not act on the advice of Mr. David Henry when he gave an opinion that this could be illegal if it combined to affect prices in Canada? Why did he not act? Will the minister now table that opinion because otherwise he stands convicted of cover-up and being negligent of his duty to Canadian consumers?

Madam Speaker: Order.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, obviously, the case of the hon. member is so weak that he feels he has to shout to give more credibility to his question. I remind him that this matter is now before the court—

Some hon. Members: Table the report!

Mr. Ouellet: I remind the House that on the instigation—The Leader of the Opposition is getting into the habit of interrupting and cutting off those on this side of the House who are trying to reply to questions. I remind the House, Madam Speaker, that my predecessor himself asked the director of investigations to inquire into this area.

Mr. Andre: What year was that?

Mr. Ouellet: This certainly proves that the Canadian government decided to investigate the matter. It was then the Liberal government that asked the director to investigate. The investigation having been completed, the matter is now before the court.

Some hon. Members: Table the report!

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, I can speak in a very low voice if you allow me—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think that we shall go on to another question.

[English]

REASON FOR NOT NAMING DEPUTY MINISTER AS UNINDICTED CO-CONSPIRATOR

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, what a tangled web we weave when first we practise to deceive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps, Madam Speaker, you cannot expect much more from a minister who would phone a judge.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Justice in his capacity as Attorney General of Canada. It concerns the minutes of a meeting with some of the participants in 1972, which was called by Mr. Jack Austin, the deputy minister of energy, mines and resources. It took place at the departmental headquarters in April, 1972. All of the people present at that meeting, except Mr. Jack Austin, have been charged as indicted or unindicted co-conspirators, all the corporate citizens present and the others who were present. The Attorney General of Canada now surely knows the opinion of Mr. David Henry and surely must know the facts in that capacity. Why was Mr. Jack Austin not named in the information with the other two public servants who have been named as unindicted co-conspirators?

● (1440)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Attorney General and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, during the four years of inquiry by Mr. Bertrand and the lawyers he hired to do the inquiry they looked at thousands of documents and listened to hundreds of witnesses. Mr. Bertrand and Mr. Brown have recommended to me that six companies be prosecuted. They gave me the names of the non-indicted co-conspirators who are not accused. They are just there in a different situation. They are not accused. I have hired the same lawyers Mr. Bertrand hired. I have accepted their advice. I have taken action before the court. There is nothing else I can add to that because I believe hon. members opposite should be completely satisfied that I have accepted 100 per cent the advice of Mr. Bertrand and his lawyers. On top of that, these are the same lawyers I have hired as special prosecutors in the matter. The matter is before the court. There is nothing I can add, and I will not.

QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE OFFER OF IMMUNITY FROM PROSECUTION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, the government would have us believe that the consiracy ended where the politicians began. I want to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the government offered immunity from prosecution to any individuals in return for their agreement to testify on behalf of the government and, if so, to whom?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I agreed to launch proceedings against the persons and companies as recommended twice by Mr. Brown and once by Mr. Bertrand, and never did I speak to a witness or a person involved in this case. I received Mr. Bertrand's recommendations. I accepted them and took action before the courts. I never discussed the evidence with anyone in the House or elsewhere.

[English]

INVOCATION OF CROWN PRIVILEGE TO WITHHOLD DOCUMENTS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would now answer the question. Has the government offered immunity from prosecution to any individuals in return for their agreement to testify and, if so, to whom?

Second, in order to ensure that the trials can take place without interference by the government, will the government give the House the assurance that under no circumstances will it invoke the doctrine of Crown privilege to withhold documents or to withhold testimony from the courts?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, on the second question, I have replied many times in this House that there is a decision of the appeal division of the Federal Court which says that the decision of the cabinet that documents should not be available to foreign courts will not apply to domestic courts, so it clear as it is the decision of the court. I am not faced with any requirement by any court at this stage. When there is a requirement by the courts, I will deal with it according to what I said to this House.

On the first question, I have replied that I do not know of any deal with anybody. I have not made any deal with anybody. The decision I have taken is to accept 100 per cent of the recommendations of Mr. Bertrand, who, a month ago, was a hero to hon. members opposite, and now that I respect the judgment of Mr. Bertrand, hon. members opposite do not agree any more.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON INTEREST RATES

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question today is for the Minister of State for Finance. I hate to bother the minister with another interest rate question, but today the Conference Board predicted that high interest rates will prevail until at least the last quarter of 1982. Since there is wide recognition that these monetarist high interest rate policies have only contributed to high food prices, record housing costs and record bankruptcies, would the minister indicate that the Conference Board is wrong and that the government does not intend to starve pensioners, bankrupt businesses, and throw low and middle-income Canadians into the street as a basic policy?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member fails to make a distinction between causes and effects. We must keep in mind that if we have high interest rates it is because we are in a situation where inflationary expectations and inflation rates are very high as well.

The Minister of Finance did indicate in his budget that he would proceed gradually in his effort to dampen inflationary expectations and inflation rates. As long as we fail to lower those expectations and to reduce real inflation rates it is quite obvious that we will be saddled with higher interest rates.

However, the inflationary expectations can be reduced only in a climate of consultation and I am convinced that the understanding of the economic situation will prompt him to support the measures implemented by the Minister of Finance.

[English]

EXPECTED DURATION OF POLICY

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, the real defect is the minister's interpretation. High interest rates are causing high inflation rates. The defect also is the Speech from the Throne, which promised to protect those Canadians who need protection most from those high interest rates. The other defect is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, there in the back seat, because of the promise he made and did not keep.

Those kinds of policies will continue for three years if they go to the end of 1984. How long does the minister think Canadians will continue to submit to this kind of repressive monetarist policy? When does the minister think the people of Vancouver and Toronto will be in the streets saying that they have had enough of this crap?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, in his preamble the hon. member mentioned needy Canadians and how callously the government is treating them. I think that he has forgotten what was done during the past year especially for the poorest Canadians. I wish only to remind him that income tax indexation and all social measures were maintained, that the guaranteed income supplement was increased and so on. It shows the government's concern for needy Canadians and that steps have been taken to bring them some relief in a difficult economic period which we are now experiencing. As for his question, Canadians realize that it is only over the medium and long term that we will overcome those difficulties. If we continue to fight with effective means against inflation as Canadians, we will improve our economic climate and conditions, instead of looking for magical short-term and drastic solutions, the results of which we cannot anticipate.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DUMPING OF POISONOUS CHEMICALS INTO NIAGARA RIVER

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. There is continuing evidence that the practice of the Hooker Chemical Company of New York of dumping dioxin is causing dioxin to seep into the Niagara River. We are all aware that dioxin is one of the most toxic chemicals known to man and, being aware of the very serious medical consequences of this chemical, I would like to ask the minister what action he is going to take in this situation. Has he consulted with the Minister of National Health and Welfare and Minister of Fisheries and Oceans regarding a ban on fishing in Lake Ontario?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, as hon. members of the House know, we take this situation very, very seriously. Meetings took place yesterday and today among officials from both the United States and Canada to assess the health hazards in this situation. I believe my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, may be able to make some announcement about the results of these meetings in the very near future.

We have also expressed our concern to the United States administration in meetings which have taken place between officials of my department and those of the relevant American authorities about examining not only the possible origins of dioxin in the Great Lakes system but also the means of responding to the situation. There will be meetings again in Washington and again on the site of the Hooker Chemical plant within the next few days—I believe next week—in order to assess thoroughly that situation and to be prepared to take remedial action, if such indeed is necessary, in whatever way it can be done.

COMBINES

URANIUM CARTEL—MINUTES OF 1972 MEETING

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice, and it relates to his apparent refusal or neglect to answer any questions about matters which should have been brought to his attention with respect to the laying of charges. The minister was asked last Friday about the advice given by Mr. Justice Henry, who was then director of combines investigation. The minutes of a meeting of the cartel called in 1972 by Senator Jack Austin on behalf of the Government of Canada clearly indicate the contents of that memorandum of opinion. Is the minister now saying he knows nothing of this opinion and there is no indication in his mind of the implication of Senator Austin in this whole matter? If he is doing that, he is really pressing our credulity.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I have answered that question about a dozen times. The inquiry into the matter lasted four years. All those facts were made known to the investigators. They came to the conclusion, first Mr. Bertrand then the lawyers who were working for him, that six companies should be prosecuted. That is precisely what I did. They were able to discuss the matter with Mr. Austin and all the persons involved in the matter. They had access to all the documents they wished to consult. They came to the conclusion that legal proceedings should be instituted against the six companies which may at some time have tried to fix prices on the domestic market, which is illegal. During the oral question period the Prime Minister repeatedly pointed out that there is a difference between an international agreement between countries and the internal situation, that is, whether or not companies may agree within Canada to fix prices for the domestic market. That is forbidden and always has been by the law. I ordered proceedings taken under that act against the six companies involved that are alleged to have agreed to set the price of uranium in Canada, which is illegal under our laws. The opinion referred to by the hon. member was surely examined by Mr. Bertrand and the lawyers he retained, and I did as well later on. They reached the conclusion that proceedings should be instituted against the persons involved, and I did as they advised.

• (1450)

REASON FOR NOT NAMING SENATOR AND MINISTERS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, this matter stinks to high heaven, and I do not mind saying that to the minister's face and members of the cabinet. The minister was a member of that cabinet, and there is an apparent conflict of interest when he is the only one who decides who should be prosecuted. The fact of the matter is that there is a clear implication that Senator Austin, the deputy minister, and the ministers he served were involved, and this a political matter. I am saying to the minister that this is a matter of ministerial responsibility—

Mr. McGrath: And legal culpability.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Has he satisfied himself that there were no ministers aware of the cartel arrangements impacting on Canadian prices, and is he prepared to release the recommendations of Mr. Brown so that we can see the basis for his prosecution recommendation, or at least tell us on what basis he decided not to include Senator Austin and the ministers involved at the time in the information?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I said the reports of Mr. Brown and Mr. Bertrand will be—

An hon. Member: Let us see them.

Mr. Chrétien: —as is traditional, the basis for the prosecution. The material they have gathered will be used by the prosecution to try to have the six companies found guilty of the charges we have laid against them. That is the situation.

I have seen the report. I am satisfied that Mr. Brown has done a very competent job while working for Mr. Bertrand. That is the reason I decided to hire him as a special prosecutor in this case. I am satisfied he will put all the necessary facts in front of the court and will do his best to have these six companies found guilty of illegally combining to fix the price of uranium.

I have no reason not to accept their judgment. I think they know much more than any one of us about this situation. Their recommendations were valid and I have accepted them. It is now up to the courts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REPORT SUBMITTED IN 1972

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the great danger, of course, is that the six companies charged will plead guilty, keep the matter out of the courts, and the report will never become public in any fashion at all. Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, responsible for combines investigations, having to do with the state of knowledge of ministers or other persons not yet charged.

Will the minister answer a very simple question? Will he tell this House whether Mr. David Henry, then director of combines investigation, submitted to the government in 1972 a report which raised the possibility that the cartel would be illegal if it affected domestic prices? Was there such a report prepared by Mr. Henry?

An hon. Member: Yes or no?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the questions asked by the Leader of the Official Opposition are, of course, hypothetical. The Leader of the Opposition cannot infer that nothing will come out of the proceedings because we do not know whether the companies are going to plead guilty or not. So that is a hypothetical question.

Secondly, with regard to the so-called report from Mr. Henry, then director of combines investigation, that is also a hypothetical question, since he is asking whether, under different circumstances, this would violate the competition act. So we are dealing here with a hypothetical situation, which clearly shows, Madam Speaker, that the opposition is overstepping its parliamentary privilege and dealing in hypotheses.

[English]

MINISTER'S POSITION ON 1972 REPORT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, there is nothing at all hypothetical about a question concerning a document whose existence has been attested to in the Congressional Record of the United States, a country whose government by the force of things is much more public with documents than is this government, a government which was forced to abandon its practice of secrecy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We know, Madam Speaker, that we have one hidden report, the Bertrand report. It now appears we have a second hidden report, the Henry report. My question to the minister is very simple. Does he deny there was a report presented by Mr. Henry in 1972 which raised the possibility that the international cartel could have an effect on domestic prices which would be contrary to the law? Does he deny the existence of such a report?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the report the Leader of the Opposition talks about is a report, taking the words of the Leader of the Opposition, which says it could possibly contravene the act—

Mr. McGrath: Now you are coming out with it.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: So it does exist.

Mr. Ouellet: —if there were arrangements for a national market.

Mr. McGrath: That is right, that is what we have been saying.

Mr. Ouellet: Now, it is quite clear, taking the very words of the Leader of the Opposition, that Mr. Henry himself at the time was not saying it was illegal.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Well, produce it.

Mr. Ouellet: That he was, according to the very words of the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: No, no.

Mr. Ouellet: —saying that it could become possibly illegal if there were arrangements later on in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Let us see the report.

Mr. Ouellet: So I clearly recognize the hypothetical questions and hypothetical evaluation of the opposition. If that is the only basis for their line of questioning, their point is very weak.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST THAT 1972 REPORT BE TABLED

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, three minutes ago the minister said the existence of the report was hypothetical. Now he admits it exists.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Will the minister table that report in the House of Commons? If he refuses to, if he keeps that report as secret as the Bertrand report, will he tell us on what possible grounds other than cover up, other than to protect former ministers or deputy ministers, does he keep from public knowledge the Henry report which he now admits exists, and which he now admits raises the possibility of illegal action flowing from the cartel? Will he publish it and, if not, why not?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the matter being before the court—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: —is clearly an indication of government action. There is a series of events which took place that cannot be denied by the opposition even if they try to twist the facts. The very first fact is that the inquiry was conducted by the director of combines investigation at the request of the government. That is a fact.

Mr. McGrath: Two years after.

Mr. Ouellet: This is not a cover up; this is a fact. The second fact is that following this inquiry lawyers were retained to evaluate the evidence, and lawyers recommended a charge be laid. This is again a fact.

An hon. Member: How do we know?

Mr. Chrétien: The charges are there.

Mr. Ouellet: The government allowed the process to take place. The document was referred to the Department of Justice and charges were laid.

Mr. Clark: Against some people.

• (1500)

Mr. Ouellet: The only point which troubles the hon. Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Beatty: We want the truth.

Mr. Ouellet: —is that he would like to charge Senator Austin.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ouellet: But I could add my own speculation to his, and say that if Senator Austin is not charged it is certainly because the lawyers who have looked at the matter have not recommended to the Department of Justice to lay charges.

Mr. Clark: Publish the documents.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

DENIAL OF PENSIONS TO WIDOWS IN CASES OF MARRIAGE AFTER RETIREMENT OF SERVICEMEN

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Last week the minister in his capacity as Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs had two important days. One of them was a red letter day when he brought in Bill C-83 which will provide benefits to more than 20,000 widows of disabled veterans. However, as Minister of National Defence, is he aware of the fact that under the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act long-service personnel serving in the armed forces, are denied the right to leave a pension to their widows if the marriage took place after the date of retirement? In view of the unfairness of the situation, and in view of the fact that many later or second marriages are lengthy ones, will he do his best to get this situation corrected?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I think the question concerning the pensions of retired armed forces personnel must be looked at very seriously, but I believe it is related to the global situation of pensions in the government and in other sectors. At the moment I think there is a task force looking into pension questions. I will take the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre under consideration and submit to the task force the possibility of improving such conditions.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the Minister of National Defence for his interest in this question.

Business of the House

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST THAT REPRESENTATIONS BE MADE ON BEHALF OF WIDOWS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Solicitor General. He is aware that the same situation applies to personnel of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They can retire early but if a marriage, whether it is first, second, or what have you, takes place after the date of retirement there is no pension for a surviving widow. In view of the fact that this is unfair, will the Solicitor General join with the Minister of National Defence in seeking to get it corrected, and will they both make representations to the President of the Treasury Board to bring this whole proposition up to date?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, like my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, I will look into the situation but I would not want to agree, without having done so, that it is a unfair situation. For example, I would like to consider the way all retired public servants are treated and the way people outside the government in the private sector are treated generally with respect to pensions. This is the subject of the study. I do not think that public servants, even members of the RCMP, should be receiving benefits very far ahead of those outside the sector.

Mr. Knowles: It is up to the government to show leadership.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, with respect to the business of the House, I had a conversation earlier today with the minister. At that time he indicated his intention to call the adjournment motion standing in his name for today and tomorrow. Could I ask the government House leader his intentions with respect to the business of the House next week?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the question is hypothetical but I will answer it anyway. It is indeed a correct assumption to say that today and tomorrow we will be dealing with motion No. 51, in the hope that it will be agreed to as soon as possible. Next week, if necessary and unless indicated otherwise, we will resume consideration of Bill C-48.

MRS. MITCHELL—BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I wish to present a petition signed by more than 50,000 citizens of British Columbia requesting that the British Columbia Telephone Company be placed in the hands of a Crown corporation.

INTEREST ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING INTEREST PAYMENTS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-639, to amend the Interest Act (credit card holders).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, 11.5 million Canadians use Visa and MasterCard. The purpose of this bill is to offer some protection to credit card holders from interest charges which pile up when postal services are disrupted. The bill provides that for every month in which the holder does not receive a statement of account from the creditor, except on advances of money, no interest shall be charged on the amount then due.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 2,235, 2,389, 2,439, 2,455, 2,507, 2,657 and 2,707.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

ADVISORY COUNCIL ON PUBLIC RECORDS

Question No. 2,235—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is it a requirement that the Advisory Council on Public Records hold at least one meeting in each quarter?

2. What are the dates of all meetings held since its inception?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Public Archives as follows: 1. The Public Records Order (P.C. 1966-1749) states that there shall be at least one meeting of the Advisory Council on Public Records in each quarter.

2. The dates of all meetings held since the council's inception are as follows:

July 17, 1967	April 27, 1978
October 19, 1967	July 4, 1978
January 30, 1968	September 21, 1978
April 30, 1968	November 7, 1978
July 31, 1968	January 24, 1979
November 14, 1968	April 11, 1979
April 29, 1969	August 16, 1979
June 20, 1969	December 5, 1979
November 21, 1969	March 3, 1980
November 5, 1970	July 9, 1980
January 28, 1971	July 17, 1980
October 5, 1971	October 7, 1980
July 12, 1973	November 25, 1980
	March 17, 1981

From July 12, 1973, until April 27, 1978, the council as a whole did not meet. During that time its activities, including meetings, were carried out by a number of committees formed to work on specific projects such as drafting legislative documents regarding access to public records; translating records management terminology into the French language; developing standard records management forms; examining equipment for the destruction of security classified records; studying the systematic downgrading of security classified material and developing bench-mark position descriptions for inclusion in the Treasury Board's "Classification and Selection Standards".

PUBLIC ARCHIVES—MISSING ITEMS

Question No. 2,389—Mr. Cossitt:

Since and including the date of the discovery of the missing pages in the diaries of the late Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King, were any items found missing from the Public Archives and, if so (a) on how many occasions (b) in each case (i) what were the items (ii) were they recovered and, if so, in what location?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Public Archives as follows:

(a) The missing pages of the diary of the Right Hon. Mackenzie King cover the period November 10, 1945, to December 31, 1945. These pages never came to the Public Archives; they were not found after Mr. King's death and it is not known if Mr. King kept a diary for the period in question. (There is a note in the Public Archives from Fred McGregor, one of the literary executors of Mackenzie King, to the effect that pages for the period November 10 to December 31, 1945, were not found among Mr. King's effects). Archivists responsible for the care of the papers of the Right Hon. Mackenzie King that came to the Public Archives are certain that no documents in the King papers are missing and that the entire unit as received is intact.

(b) No systematic search of archives holdings in general has been undertaken to document that items are missing. Archives staff monitors holdings on a regular basis in order to identify items which are misfiled or misplaced in the stacks. When items are found to be out of place, they are returned to their proper location. This monitoring process has revealed only one instance of material accessioned by the Public Archives having been unlawfully removed from our custody. That was a case of two maps having been cut and removed from a bound volume in the late 1960s. The maps were never found. Two instances are on record of items stolen from an archives exhibition. In one case, the item was a printed map and was later replaced. The other case, also in the 1960s, involved two manuscript items stolen from an exhibition on loan to another institution. These items were unique and could not be replaced.

SEAL HUNT

Question No. 2,439—Mr. Blenkarn:

1. Does the Department of Fisheries and Oceans monitor the annual hunt of harp and hooded seals in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and off the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador and, if so, what is the cost?

2. Have some scientists compiled biological data on harp and hooded seals that claim the seal herds are increasing and, if so, what are their names?

3. Was research done with respect to determining the population of the seals and, if so, what are the details?

4. (a) What was the quota for the seals to be taken in Canadian waters during the most recent seal hunt (b) was a portion of the quota given to Norway and, if so (i) what portion (ii) did it increase or decrease over the past five years?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): (1) Costs of monitoring the 1980 hunt of harp and hooded seals in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and off the coast of Newfoundland were $163,000. This figure includes wages for enforcement staff, ship and helicopter time but is exclusive of icebreaker costs.

(2) The Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization (NAFO) provides the forum for international scientific review of data on seal populations. It is the advice of the NAFO scientific council rather than individual scientists that forms the basis for management of the seal hunt. At the November, 1980, meeting of the NAFO scientific council, the population of harp seals was projected to consist of 425,000 pups and 1.70 million seals aged one year or older (assuming a continuation of current harvest levels) by 1985, representing an annual growth rate of 1.7 per cent.

(3) Research by Canadian scientists in 1980 to determine the population of seals included mark recapture experiments on harp seal pups in both the front and gulf, an investigation of age-specific variation in age determination of harp seal teeth, a thorough review of historical commercial sampling data and a variety of other biological studies.

(4) (a) 1981 quotas for seals to be taken in Canadian waters were as follows:

Harp seals—	170,000
Hooded seals	15,000

(b) (i) The Norwegian allocation of harp seal quotas in 1981 was 22,500. Of the 15,000 hooded seal quota, 6,000 was allocated to both Canada and Norway and the remaining 3,000 was available to vessels of either country.

(ii) The allocation of harp seals to Norway for 1981 was increased from 20,000 in 1979 and 1980 but remains below the 35,000 in 1977 and 1978. Hooded seal allocations to Norway have remained constant over the last five years.

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—CHAIRMAN

Question No. 2,455—Mr. Beatty:

1. (a) On what date was the answer to question No. 1,852 transmitted to the government by the Canadian Film Development Corporation (b) was there a delay between receipt of the answer by the government and tabling of the answer in the House and, if so, for what reason?

2. Did Mr. Michel Vennat, chairman of the Canadian Film Development Corporation, discuss with the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications the effect of section 5 of the Canadian Film Development Corporation Act upon his ability to serve as chairman at the same time as he maintained an interest in a private law firm with clients in the film industry and, if so, on what date?

3. Did the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications receive a legal opinion from the Department of Justice concerning the effect of section 5 of the act upon the eligibility of Mr. Vennat to serve as chairman and, if so, on what date?

4. Did the minister inform Mr. Vennat, following advice from the Department of Justice, that he was satisfied that Mr. Vennat was not in conflict with section 5 of the act and, if so, on what date?

5. Since his appointment, has the present chairman of the corporation withdrawn from participating in decisions relating to clients of his law firm and, if so (a) on how many occasions (b) were the clients (i) successful (ii) unsuccessful in their applications for assistance?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): 1. Crown corporations do not answer parliamentary questions. Ministers, who are members of Parliament, answer such questions and take full responsibility for such answers.

2, 3 and 4. Mr. Michel Vennat disclosed to the previous secretary of state his situation as member of the board of the Canadian Film Development Corporation and as partner of the law firm of Stikeman, Elliot, Tanaki, Mercier and Robb. During the term of office of the previous government, Mr. Vennat requested and received, on a informal basis, an opinion from legal counsel in the Privy Council Office. The opinion received was to the effect that he was not precluded from being a member and chairman of the board of the Canadian Film Development Corporation by the provisions of section 5 of the Canadian Film Development Corporation Act. The previous secretary of state was obviously satisfied that there was no conflict of interest in the case of Mr. Vennat. Mr. Vennat disclosed the above information to the present Secretary of State and Minister of Communications in the spring of 1980. The minister has not received a formal opinion from the Department of Justice. In view of the importance of this question for both candidates and the government, in the case of future appointments to this position, the minister has asked officials of the Department of Communications to obtain a formal legal opinion. In the meantime, the provisions of section 5 will be rigidly interpreted and applied to future appointees.

5. Mr. Vennat's term as a member of the board has now expired. I am informed by the Canadian Film Development Corporation as follows: while chairman of the board of the Canadian Film Development Corporation, Mr. Vennat did not take part in the decisions relating to clients of the above-mentioned law firm in their dealings with the Canadian Film Development Corporation.

(a) and (b) Canadian Film Development Corporation records and procedures are not organized in such a way as to provide the information requested.

DND—USE OF DOGS IN RADIATION RESEARCH

Question No. 2,507—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Does the Department of National Defence conduct experiments subjecting dogs to radiation and, if so (a) for how long will a dog survive from the time of radiation (b) what is the radiation dose (c) what symptoms will the dogs have?

2. Did the military perform similar experiments on cats in the 1950s and, if so, for what reason are the experiments being duplicated?

3. Will meaningful results be obtained by destroying fewer than 40 dogs?

4. Will there be follow-up experiments?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. The Department of National Defence has not conducted experiments where dogs are subjected to ionizing radiation. However, the department has issued a notice in the Supply & Services Canada, Research and Development Bulletin of its intention to contract for a study on radiation-induced nausea and vomiting using rats and dogs. Past medical research elsewhere has established that only the canine species has a sensitivity to radiation which approaches that of man, and the dogs' ability to vomit makes it an ideal test animal to be used in the proposed study which includes the testing of possible antidotes.

(a), (b) and (c) The exact detail of the study is presently awaiting proposals by the contractor, who has not been selected as yet. However, laboratory dogs would be used in the experiment in accordance with the Guide to the Care and Use of Experimental Animals prepared by the Canadian Council on Animal Care. The experiments would also be reviewed and monitored by an animal care committee to ensure the humane treatment of the dogs.

2. No. No reference to studies where the department has exposed cats to ionizing radiations has been found.

3. It should be possible for the contractor to obtain meaningful results using 40 dogs or less.

4. The decision whether any follow-up experiments will be required cannot be determined at this time.

GRANTS TO SHERBROOKE AIRPORT

Question No. 2,657—Mr. Herbert:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 2,385, for what reason did the Sherbrooke Airport receive $106,000 in the fiscal year 1978-79?

2. Were requests made for assistance in the fiscal years (a) 1979-80 (b) 1980-81 and were they turned down and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Sherbrooke Airport received $106,000 in 1978/79 which represents 90 per cent of the $118,000 cost of temporary repairs as follows:

	Cost
Repairs to runway	$60,000
Runway lights	$33,000
Access roads	$25,000
	$118,000

2. Requests for assistance were turned down in 1979/80 and 1980/81 because the capital assistance program had been terminated.

MISS NANCY JAMIESON

Question No. 2,707—Mr. Corbett:

1. Is Miss Nancy Jamieson employed by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and, if so (a) in which position (b) what is her present employment status (c) is she on sabbatical and, if so, for how long and for what purpose (d) what is her job description?

2. Was she hired through Public Service competition or by ministerial appointment?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Miss Nancy Jamieson is not employed by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS

The House resumed, from Friday, July 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pinard:

That, when the House adjourns on the day this order is adopted, it shall stand adjourned until Wednesday, October 14, 1981, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Madam Speaker, after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Madam Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees or the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in her stead for all the purposes of this order.

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I rose on the adjournment debate last Friday, my leader had just indicated the determination of the Progressive Conservative Party to keep Parliament in session until we had an indication of a serious determination to restore mail service in the country.

Last Friday there was a postal deadlock; neither the government nor the union showed any movement toward settling the strike. Thousands of Canadians were left without hope that there would be an early restoration of their mail services. We insisted that Parliament stay and do its duty to Canadians.

As a direct result of our keeping Parliament at work, there have been three major developments in the postal situation. First, the parties agreed to negotiate about mediation. Second, that negotiation was successful and mediation was agreed to. Third, an excellent mediator has been named in the person of Judge Alan Gold.

One thing is crystal clear. If Parliament had gone home, there would have been no mediation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fennell: If Parliament had gone home, we would have been no further ahead today than we were last Friday. The very presence of Parliament doing its duty led to mediation, and my party and I are proud that we achieved that result.

We want the mediation process to proceed. We know Judge Gold cannot meet the parties until tomorrow. We hope he will find success in this work as he has found such distinguished success in other work in the labour field. He is a first-class choice. The question is whether the two parties, the union and the government, are entering this negotiation determined to find a settlement. We hope they are. We look forward to seeing the spirit in which they meet Judge Gold tomorrow.

We believe Parliament has a duty to encourage both parties to enter into the mediation in good faith. Parliament also has a duty to monitor the attitude of the union and the government, and to ensure that mediation is successful. My party and I look forward to the meeting between Judge Gold and the parties tomorrow. We hope it will result in a settlement.

In order to avoid in any way impeding successful mediation my party deliberately did not raise any question today about the postal situation during question period. We intend not to discuss the postal situation in the adjournment debate today or tomorrow, except to point out Parliament's presence. We are determined to make the mediation process work. We hope the government and the union share in that determination.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fennell: But, Mr. Speaker, we do want Parliament to work. This Parliament has a duty to the people of this country, a duty to the people whose businesses and firms are either in bankruptcy or almost bankrupt, a duty to people who are being forced to lose their homes.

During this period that we are sitting here in Ottawa there are many issues we can debate. The first one I would like to talk about has to do with high interest rates and the effect they are having on this country. High interest rates are not solving the problem of inflation. They merely provide greater revenue to the government from taxation. However, that really does not solve the problem because the government can spend it faster than it can collect it.

During this period of high interest rates I want to ask the government if it will consider this proposal. It is not only a proposal to protect those with mortgages coming up for renewal at this time but a proposal to protect new home owners, to give them the right to buy, to encourage the construction industry and construction workers back to work.

I would request the government to steal our mortgage deductibility program. It was a sound program. That program would have covered this period of time so well had we remained in office. I request the government to take this concept and use it, if only to implement it during this time of high interest rates. It was a sound program, one which has been used in every other country in the world. Canada is the exception. If the government were to put it in place for six months to a year it would assist home owners renewing their mortgages and it would assist new home buyers in buying their homes. In turn, that would assist the economy of our country.

The next point I would like to bring up is the small business development bond program. As we all appreciate, this was one of our proposals. Unfortunately, the government stole only part of it. Why would it not steal the rest of the program? Why will it not include unincorporated businesses and farms in the program? This is a time when these people are going out of business. Why should they not be included in the program?

Mr. Evans: For the same reason the hon. member for St. John's West did not include it.

Mr. Fennell: Perhaps he had a reason then. I am saying at a time when interest rates are 22 per cent that these people are going out of business and they need assistance now.

The small businessman is the lifeblood of our country. Small businessmen employ two-thirds of the work force in this country. The government must adapt the small business development bond program for unincorporated businesses. This group will solve the productivity and unemployment problems of our country. Regrettably, it cannot solve the inflationary problems of Canada since that responsibility falls squarely on the shoulders of this government. Small businessmen are the modern-day heroes of Canada. They have the guts to stand up and try to make this a better country and a great country. They are the people who create jobs. They are the ones taking the risk. Government never takes any risks, it just takes the money. These are the people, the great segment of Canadians, who are keeping the economy on track. These are the people whom we should discuss in this House.

I presented a program before which received some acknowledgement but I have not seen the results of it yet. It would have dealt with this situation. As I said before, the small businessmen cannot solve the inflationary spiral which has created chaos for all Canadians. This has really been a bloodletting situation for all Canadians. Senior citizens are losing their assets which are being eroded by inflation.

It is interesting that we continue to blame high interest rates on inflation. That is not the case. In the United States Americans have mortgage deductibility. They also have the same prime rate as us, within a point or so. In the United States, since high interest rates have come about inflation has been reduced to 8.5 per cent while our inflation has increased to 12.5 per cent. Again, the only one to blame for this situation is the government which is placing on the citizens of this country the cruellest handicap. It is hitting the poor and the middle class. It does not hurt the rich or the government, but it is the guts of Canada which is tearing apart.

Yesterday in a press interview the Prime Minister stated that each of the seven members of the OECD countries are trying different economic measures to solve their inflation problems. Before the summit takes place all I can say is that obviously Italy and Canada are trying two economic systems which are not working. These systems should be abandoned. We should stay here all summer and listen to measures which the opposition will put forward to improve the situation in this country.

This is a very serious time. Once government members received their pay raise it was interesting to see how rapidly they were prepared to pack it up and get out of the House. Now that they have their pay raise they have that much more responsibility to the citizens of this country. They have a responsibility to be here to do a job for their constituents. I have noticed that in many other countries there are Congresses and Parliaments still sitting.

What is the bottom line as a result of the National Energy Program? There is a very serious bottom line which is starting to surface. I was south of the border on Monday trying to find out what was happening. It is a very subtle course that the Americans will be following. They have been hurt by Canada and the National Energy Program. In one respect they have been helped since many of our drilling rigs have crossed the border. In another respect they have been hurt. American oil companies are suffering losses which enables the government to buy them up at distress prices.

The subtlety which will come through has nothing to do with oil or petroleum. It is another subtle trade embargo; not an announced one, and not an open one, but a very subtle one. They are not going to sit down and take it laughing. They look at Dome and how they got Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas away from them. They are fighting Seagram's as hard as they can, Canadian interests. Why should Seagram's have the right to go down to the United States and buy up a major American corporation when in Canada they are being expropriated from the same people? I am sorry, but they have a point. The only thing that this program is doing is bringing this country to the same state that England is in and is now suffering from as a result, namely nationalization.

I believe we should stay here for days to debate this. I plead with the government to abandon the National Energy Program now before we feel the full economic impact of the word of mouth which is travelling around the United States. Please abandon it now before the United States decides to abandon its part of the auto pact, leaving tens of thousands of automobile workers in the unemployment ranks. I plead with this government to go back and look at what it is doing. Its favourite, PetroCan, has been able to collect other oil interests from other countries. It is big enough now. Let the free market system work, because it is only the free market system which will resolve the economic problems of this country. Government intervention does not solve the problems, as has been proven in Sweden and in England. Now we have a Prime Minister imposing it on us here. Let the free market work; abandon the energy program.

In my riding, I have watched the havoc which has been created over expropriation. My riding encompasses the Pickering airport. I am talking about expropriation. This havoc is going to spread over the entire north of this country, as well as the east and west coasts of this country, if Bill C-48 is permitted to pass. That is a straight expropriation bill. If it is passed in this House, it will change the lives of every single Canadian, and we will be down in the ranks, below Italy, below the lowest of socialist countries which have tried it. Socialism has not worked in the other countries. Why are we attempting to try it here? It will not work here, either.

Once the government gets Bill C-48 through, the next thing it will do is bring in a new bill to expropriate 25 per cent of all farms, and it will be called "farmcan". Eventually it will go on, without the right of property rights in the proposed Constitution, to take 25 per cent of everyone's homes. The government will call that "Homecan". Therefore, we will have PetroCan, farmcan and homecan. Then the citizens of this country will be left with only one choice: to kick the can of the Liberal government out of Ottawa. That is the only choice we have. I would plead with them to do it today and not wait too much longer.

Mr. McDermid: Put the boots to Coutts!

Mr. Fennell: Good point!

An hon. Member: Keep your head, McDermid.

Mr. Fennell: I would like to touch on one of the other points which have come up during this period because it is very close to my heart and my feelings. This is the year of the handicapped. What has this government done to assist the handicapped this year?

An hon. Member: It is the most handicapped government we have ever seen.

Mr. Fennell: That is right. My colleague refers to it as a handicapped government. Maybe it should start by helping itself become unhandicapped, first of all; but let us help these people who need the help. The government does not need the help. I am talking about people like my constituent, Mike Overdyk, who had to sit in the Toronto-Dominion tower for 36 hours. I told him to go home and we would work it out here. I have now sent three letters to the Minister of State for Finance. I have received the most Mickey Mouse replies. One did not even answer the first letter. Now I understand that the matter is being studied. If it is being studied and we are staying here, let us bring in new legislation to help the handicapped of this country who have been severely hurt for many generations—since the beginning of time. That is one place the government could start.

All one has to do is look across this country. Do not feel that you are the great white fathers because of what you have accomplished this week which is of such importance: having the handicapped games here in Ottawa. Look at those people and realize how much more help they need. We are fortunate. We can stand on our two feet and use both our hands. We have no handicaps. Those are the people we must look after.

Mr. Chénier: That is what you think.

Mr. Fennell: Part of the problem of inflation is that the government keeps blaming it on petroleum prices. It is a wonderful way to be; but has it ever looked at the amount of money it is taking which is creating the inflation? Out of a litre of gasoline, the government now takes almost 23 cents out of 36 cents. That is two-thirds of the bite. The government is taking so much money in petroleum taxes that it could afford to provide mortgage deductibility for every home owner in this country for the next year. Give the people a break. Get the country working. Get the construction workers back on the job. This is a great opportunity, while we are sitting in this House, to read and to do something positive. This government does not care about Canadian citizens. It cares about itself. It has looked after itself. Now let us look after Canadians.

I could go on, but I still say that there are many things we can very usefully debate in this House between now and October 14. Perhaps we can get the message across there, because there is an old saying in advertising that if one hits the message frequently enough, it finally sinks in. Perhaps we can get the message across that by our staying here through this summer, we might resolve the economic dilemma of the country.

An hon. Member: Come on!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fennell: The country is in an economic dilemma.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fennell: Hon. members say, "What a laugh". They just want to go home.

An hon. Member: Where have you been for the last two weeks?

Mr. Fennell: I have been right here for the last two weeks, and I plan to be here for the next two and a half months because we have a lot of problems to solve. It would be a good thing if those hon. members would stay home. Then we could sit here and get something done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chénier: You had it a year ago. What did you do with it?

Mr. Fennell: There is a danger—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Ontario has the floor.

Mr. Fennell: There is a danger in our sitting here. The Minister of Finance keeps threatening the deindexing of income tax. Does Your Honour realize that it will raise an additional $1.7 billion? Soon the government will have 60 per cent of the GNP. If it does not introduce deindexing, it will probably try wage and price controls. This did not work five centuries ago when the Divine Rights of Kings were operating. The government has tried so many bad things that it is time it did something positive.

Mr. Chénier: Get rid of the PCs!

Mr. Fennell: I would say that to kick the Liberal can would be far better.

Mr. Chénier: That is a new one.

Mr. Fennell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the time I have had—

Mr. Chénier: Time you have wasted!

Mr. Fennell: I have not wasted any time. I have put my time to great use. My time has been wasted, to a great extent, by ministers not answering queries of mine. Yes, that time has been wasted. However, I have created productive time for my constituents, and I have worked hard on behalf of them, as we all have on this side of the House. Believe me, if we had stayed in government, this government would be sailing along a lot smoother road than with the Liberal intervention.

Mr. Chénier: We saw that last year. You sailed right past the election!

Mr. Fennell: Thank you for the time, and thank you, Liberals, for the insults. You can continue with the insults, because you cannot do anything else in this House of Commons, so keep it up. You are making fools of yourselves. You are making fools of Canadians.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member please address the Chair.

• (1530)

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this adjournment debate, I thought it unfortunate that the previous speaker, the hon. member for Ontario, became so incensed about a little matter. Maybe he got out of bed on the wrong side this morning, but some of the things he said during the course of his remarks sounded to me like an equal combination of Greek mythology, Walt Disney and science fiction. I do not think he should have allowed himself to become quite so incensed over the inventions of his own mind.

What has happened in this House over the last few days has been both irresponsible and new. The Conservatives have said they will not allow this motion to come to a vote, and they will not allow the House to adjourn for the normal summer recess when members can become reacquainted with problems in their constituencies and do the work that is important there enabling them to represent their constituents here in Ottawa. The Conservatives have said they will not allow a recess until such time as the government brings in legislation taking away the rights of the workers in the Post Office dispute and of the Post Office itself and putting an end to the strike. I say it is not only irresponsible but it is new and unusual because, in fairness to the Conservative party, never until this past year has the Conservative party when in opposition played this irresponsible role.

I have to say in fairness that the attitude of the House of Commons during major labour disputes over the years has been pretty well unanimous in its approach to keeping parliamentarians' hands off negotiations and the work of mediators and professionals who attempt to bring most settlements. I believe that an examination would show that the tendency is to allow the industrial relations system to function.

Why is it different this time? Why is it that an opposition party is doing something under the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) which did not occur when Bob Stanfield was leader of the opposition or when John Diefenbaker was leader of the opposition? Why is it that it has only occurred now at a time when the Leader of the Opposition is under very great pressure in relation to his future role from some of his erstwhile supporters?

Mr. McDermid: You have had experience in that.

Mr. Regan: As a matter of fact, I will mention more because this time, for some cheap purpose, their past relatively public spirited record has been allowed to go right down the drain. To keep Parliament sitting until the strike is settled is for those involved more than unsettling. It does much to guarantee that the strike will not be settled in the negotiating process. Having Parliament looking over the mediator's shoulder is not at all helpful.

The hon. member for Ontario said just a few moments ago that Parliament must continue to sit day by day and that we must monitor what is happening in the mediating sessions. I assume the Leader of the Opposition means by sitting day by day that he will continue to demand that the government pass legislation ending the strike and thus taking away the rights of individuals in that regard.

Mr. Pinard: What an insult to Judge Gold.

Mr. Regan: As the President of the Privy Council has pointed out, this is an insult to the ability of Judge Alan Gold who has just been appointed mediator of the Post Office dispute. It is not helpful to have Parliament peering over his shoulders.

Mr. McDermid: Get back to Bill C-48 then.

Mr. Regan: Mediation in a difficult dispute when the parties have strongly entrenched positions is not something that is usually or ordinarily achieved in a day or two. There are members who are here who are familiar with industrial relations, and who are fully aware that the task of a mediator is a very delicate one. Sometimes it may take a week, sometimes two weeks, sometimes even longer than that to reach a settlement.

One of the great mediators and conciliators of the past few years is Senator Carl Goldenberg. He participated in many important disputes and was able to resolve a good percentage of them. I want to put on the record what Senator Goldenberg once said. It is applicable to the situation with which the Leader of the Opposition has confronted us today. He said that you cannot mediate in a goldfish bowl. No one can mediate if the parties have someone, an organization or a group, such as this, peering over one's shoulder every day.

The hon. member for Ontario seemed to admit this when he said that they had held back today from asking any questions on the subject of the strike so that Judge Alan Gold could start his mediation tomorrow. At the same time the Conservatives are reiterating again and again that they will not allow Parliament to rise, that parliamentarians will be here to peer over the judge's shoulders and that they will insist upon legislation being brought in.

Let me discuss the dispute and the system we have for settling disputes between parties in the public service. The question arises whether people in the public service should have the right to strike. Often you hear the basic question as to whether people should have the right to strike at all. There is no question that people would give you many arguments on both sides of the question.

I will go into the merit of the right to strike in the public service in a moment, but first let me say that if you allow people in the public service to have the right to strike, if the law says that the Post Office employees, if they are unable to come to an agreement, after a vote, after the passage of conciliation, after a certain time period, are allowed to take strike action, then surely it is cynical to take away that right to strike the instant it is used. It is just like a bullfighter with a cape. If we are to follow a system—I believe we should and I will say why in a moment—that allows the collective will of groups of people, following statutory pre-conditions, who are unable to reach an agreement with their employer in rare cases to take strike action, then we must not be cynical. We must allow that strike when it occurs to be settled in the proper manner by the parties in negotiation and where necessary with the help of a mediator.

If the Conservative party does not believe in the right to strike, if it does not believe in the right to strike in the public service, then let it say so. Mind you, when the Conservative party was in government, it did not do anything to take that right away or change the system. Indeed, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has said in the past, in opposition, that there should not be the right to strike. However, when his party formed the government, he said that this question must be very carefully approached and that without the closest and fullest consultation with the parties no changes should be made to the system. I guess that eight or nine months was not enough to have that amount of consultation.

Suppose that one did not have the right to strike. I have to admit that there are many people who have not been intimately involved with the problems of workers getting their rights and good working conditions. They feel that the right to strike should be done away with. They are in error when they say that.

• (1540)

We must remember that this has been tried in various countries. I will give the example of Australia. A number of years ago Australia passed legislation to the effect that strikes would not be allowed and that compulsory arbitration would apply to the renewal of collective agreements. Well, Australia has one of the highest records of man days lost through strike action of any country in the world.

Mr. Oberle: Except for Italy and Canada.

Mr. Regan: All of these strikes are illegal, but they continue to exist. My friend opposite talks about Italy and Canada. Perhaps he should talk to some of his friends running the provincial governments in this country, because that is where you find the highest statistics. With regard to federal jurisdiction, we have a very low record when it comes to man days lost through strikes.

The question of outlawing strikes and ordering compulsory arbitration sounds simple. However, it has not worked where it has been tried elsewhere. Instead of having legal strikes, you have illegal ones. That is a bad system because illegal strikes can happen at any time. There is not the degree of responsibility in approaching the settlement that there is if you have a proper system of law and order.

Mr. Huntington: It is a rubber stamp system of law and order.

Mr. Regan: Listen to him! I want to quote from Walter Stewart who wrote a public service disputes article a few years ago. He talks about those people who would pass a law to do away with the right to strike in the public service. I quote:

> Jelinek's bill would allow the Public Service Staff Relations Board and the Canadian Labour Relations Board to declare any work at all to be an "essential service" and to order strikers back on the job forthwith. Great stuff, but before MPs turn aside from really pressing tasks... they should ask themselves whether legality is relevant in public service strikes. After Parliament passed the Public Service Staff Relations Act in 1967, it became possible for the first time for federal civil servants to walk off the job legally. Before that, strikes had been frequent, but had lacked the official stamp of approval. Now, for most groups of bureaucrats, they are legal. The Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service reported to Parliament in February 1976 that there had been sixty-one federal public service strikes since the passage of the act, eleven of which had been legal and fifty outlaw... Without it, we would have had sixty-one illegal strikes instead of fifty.

The only thing his statistics show quite clearly is that there are situations in which the dissatisfaction of people cannot be settled by the arbitrary judgment of one person acting as an arbitrator. There are situations in which strikes will occur whether they are legally allowed or not. Strikes certainly were not and are not, unless there has been a change in the last couple of months, allowed in Poland, a communist country. However, the will and the grievance was sufficiently strong that it did not stop Solidarity from being formed and strikes from occurring. It is all very easy to talk about outlawing strikes, but it is just not that easy to do.

One can argue that we would have less disruption if there were no strikes, but I believe it is better to allow strikes to occur. At the same time, we should take every possible step through mediation, improved industrial relations and the development of good health and safety standards to minimize strike situations and to have, as we have in our system, arbitration to determine the final settlement of disputes that occur during the course of a collective agreement.

The great advantage we have in the system in the provinces of Canada and in the federal government, and in much of the United States, as contrasted to that in England and much of Europe, is that we have statutes which determine where a strike can occur. They provide that a strike can legally occur at the end of a collective agreement and when efforts to renew with the help of mediation have failed. It can only happen then. This provides a period of predictable stability during the contracts. The price we pay for that system is the occasional strike, but it is a price we pay for the best industrial relations system in the world.

A lot of people are focusing attention now on the postal strike. However, we never hear anything about the strikes that are avoided or all of the collective agreements that are renewed without work stoppages. For example, when this House was sitting last December 17 and 18, some members were frightened they would not be able to get to their homes for Christmas because of the threatened strike of the air attendants of Air Canada. The mediation services of our Department of Labour settled that dispute and prevented a strike. There is not a question asked in the House as to how it was settled or why, and there is hardly a thing about it in the newspapers once it was settled.

We do not seem to realize that we have a system which brings a very high percentage of settlements without work stoppages and a very high percentage of quick settlements of those work stoppages that do occur. Occasional strikes are the price we pay for the best industrial relations system in the world.

Both unions and management must realize, and I think it is applicable to this case, that a strike is a two-edged system. When a strike occurs, it applies pressure to try to get better terms. It brings the parties to the critical point where they are sure to give their bottom line and are more likely to reach agreement. However, a strike does not guarantee success. Some strikes are lost and some are won. Some lockouts are lost and some are won.

When the postal workers go on strike, they should not feel that after a week or ten days there will be legislation to get them or the Post Office off the hook. Nor should the government feel that if a strike occurs, they can legislate an end to it after a very few days. If workers have the legal right to strike, and if they strike despite the best efforts, the matter must be settled at the negotiating table, as Judge Alan Gold will now be striving to do following his appointment. He will try to get these two parties to settle.

Back to work legislation should occur only when very serious and widespread damage is being done to society. I will give an example in that regard. I want first to say I have been fortunate that in all the years I have been involved in government, both as a minister and as a premier, I have not been involved in any back to work legislation. I have always faced the fact that a situation may arise where that becomes necessary, but in my view it is not something we should run out and do just because a strike happens to occur. We either give workers the right to strike or we do not; and if the legislation provides, as it does, that there is a right to strike, then that is the case. They should be allowed to do so, and the settlement should be achieved at the table. I think that is in the best long run interests of both parties in future negotiations.

• (1550)

What is happening here? Why is it that members of the Conservative party in this instance are taking a different position from the position they have taken while in opposition in the past? Many public service strikes have dotted the years. Never before have they taken the position that Parliament cannot adjourn until legislation is passed to end strikes. But do hon. members know what is unique? At this moment the Leader of the Opposition is under fire. We have a man whose supposed supporters—and one of them is laughing now—

Mr. Malone: At you.

Mr. Regan: —are not allowing him to leave. He is not allowed to leave. I believe he has many of the better instincts, but he is not being allowed to follow those instincts because the right wing—the red necks, as they are called—are ruling the day. He is in such jeopardy in relation to the continuation of his leadership of his party that he has to give in to the ill-founded and ill-advised pressure of this particular group.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Regan: This year his job is in jeopardy. I happen to be one who believes his job should not be in jeopardy. I have a very high regard—

Some hon. Members: We want Joe.

Mr. Regan: I am serious. I have a high regard for the right hon. gentleman, but there are more leaks from his caucus than there is in a sieve. Everyone around here and most of the people across the country know his job is in jeopardy. He therefore makes the human, but highly regrettable, error of being led into a position, reactionary in nature, which is harmful to the parliamentary process, destructive to the collective bargaining process and, indeed, one which inevitably will have the effect of prolonging the strike because it will prolong the expectations of the parties that a legislated settlement may let them off the hook and may put them back to work. But that is not going to happen.

Mr. Malone: Your speech writer drinks too much.

Mr. Regan: There is no speech writer in the world who writes in a hand like this, my friend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: The Leader of the Opposition is interfering in the process of attempting to achieve a settlement. This affects postal service for all of the people of the country and the working conditions and salary levels of a great number of workers across the country. It is not the role of Parliament to interfere with the settlement of this strike. A taxi driver drove me here this morning, and he said exactly that. He said, "Why is Mr. Clark messing around with this thing? Why does he not let the parties get on with negotiations?"

Mr. Beatty: That was Peter Stollery, was it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: What have you got against taxi drivers?

Mr. Regan: They are against taxi drivers. Or maybe they are against senators. It is one or the other.

Mr. Huntington: Was he driving an Austin?

Mr. Regan: I can understand why hon. members opposite want to distract me from my main purpose, because they are hurting. However, I say seriously that the Leader of the Opposition is serving the main purpose of satisfying his backbenchers instead of following his better judgment, and he is harming Canadians as a whole.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: His solution of passing legislation to end the strike can thwart the achievement of a fairly bargained settlement.

What has been the story when there has been legislation passed—and it had to be done—to end strikes in the past? It has left a residue of bitterness. It has not made for better relations. Sometimes it has to occur, as I said. I was going to use the example earlier of the fact that Allan Blakeney, as Premier of Saskatchewan, was faced with a hydro workers strike in the middle of a blizzard in February, and even he had no choice but to legislate them back to work. Those situations can arise. But when those situations do arise, as unfortunate as they are, there is no question that legislation does leave that residue of bitterness. It is not the foundation for building better industrial relations between parties.

The small businessmen of this country with whom I have talked are condemning the Leader of the Opposition for the position he is taking. Let us make no mistake about that. Some hon. members opposite know that because they have been hearing it, even though the mail is not pouring in because of the strike. They have been hearing it in other ways, and they know that what small business in this country is saying is that it is extremely unfortunate and painful to them and that the strike is costing them a lot of money. But they fear that a legislated settlement will breed more strikes each time the collective agreement comes up for renewal. If one side declares a strike or the other side allows a strike to occur and if the parties find that no one will legislate them back after seven or ten days and they must work out their differences rather than face a quick, convenient legislated settlement, then strikes will not be as likely to occur next time and in succeeding years.

The small businessmen I know in this country are taking the position that this strike should be fought out by the parties. Let them reach an agreement as best they can at the table with the help of good mediators, and let us not have Parliament interfering in that process. They believe that if this process is followed rather than the legislative process, we are much more likely to have the foundation for better industrial relations in the Post Office as it becomes a Crown corporation and in the years ahead than otherwise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: I want to summarize four or five points. First, in my view, by keeping Parliament sitting for this sole purpose, the Leader of the Opposition is showing no confidence in Judge Alan Gold. He is undermining him, and Judge Alan Gold has an enviable record as a mediator.

Second, the Leader of the Opposition is prolonging the strike by allowing the parties to believe that they may get a legislated settlement.

Third, the Leader of the Opposition is setting an undesirable precedent which could lead to more of the same in the future. If hon. members in the opposition keep Parliament sitting because there happens to be a strike in the Post Office, in the future they may find that they will have to keep Parliament sitting if there happens to be a strike in some other industry in the country.

I hear the voice of reactionary essential services legislation. I have already dealt with my view that people should have the right to strike legally, and under the controlled provisions of the statutes such as we have at the present time rather than the jungle of illegal strikes which inevitably flow from the hon. member's particular approach.

Mr. Beatty: You just want to have your summer vacation.

Mr. Regan: The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) says I only want my summer vacation. I want to assure him, as he knows from his own not so lengthy career as a minister, that the fact that Parliament rises does not do away with the work which has to continue in the department.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1600)

Mr. Regan: The next point I want to make in summary, Mr. Speaker, is that having Parliament sitting is not helping to bring those parties to a settlement. Unfortunately the Leader of the Opposition is not interested in a negotiated settlement; he wants something which is achieved by Parliament so that he can appear to have played a political role in it.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Regan: Finally, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Malone: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: —without much hope of results but in very good faith, I want to implore the Leader of the Opposition to stand up to the rednecks in the backbenches. I want him to recede from the position he has taken which is interfering with the settlement of the strike, to abandon that position and recognize that the best interests of the postal workers, the Post Office and its customers, and the Canadian public in general—

An hon. Member: And the Liberal party.

Mr. Regan: —would be served if he allows Judge Gold to mediate not in a goldfish bowl, but rather in the normal circumstances which would occur if Parliament followed the schedule it agreed to earlier last week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hope it will be appropriate if I try to speak in rational terms and try to keep cool. My doing so may not attract as much of an audience as the last two speakers, but we are debating a very serious matter.

In case those who might be watching us on television wonder what the motion before us is—they probably think it must in some way relate to the postal strike—I would point out that the motion in the name of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) calls for this House to adjourn on the day the motion is passed, whenever that might be, and to stand adjourned until Wednesday, October 14. In other words, we are debating the possibility of a summer break for the House of Commons.

The motion includes a provision that is always in such a resolution, namely that if the Speaker, after consultation with the government, feels there is an issue about which Parliament should meet, Parliament can be recalled. I have abbreviated it, but that is the whole motion we are debating this afternoon. We debated it last Friday and we will debate it until it is finally disposed of one way or the other.

An hon. Member: Does that mean closure, Stanley?

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend asks if that means closure. I hope it is in order for me to say that I have been told there will be no closure on this motion. There cannot be a Standing Order 75C—

An hon. Member: Standing Order 75B.

Mr. Knowles: There can be no Standing Order 75B or C on a motion. Standing Orders 75A, B and C can be applied only to a bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it is understandable and quite natural that the debate has turned to the postal strike. However many speeches there may be in this debate this afternoon or tomorrow, most of them will probably deal with that situation. My colleagues and I are as concerned as every other member in this House, and most of the people in Canada, about the seriousness of the strike of CUPW. We earnestly hope this situation can soon be resolved, and the place we think it should be resolved is at the bargaining table through negotiations. We regret it has gone on as long as it has. We are aware of the inconvenience and suffering being experienced by many people, and we earnestly hope that the appointment of Judge Alan Gold and his acceptance by both sides is a good omen. He has a reputation as a very effective mediator, and I think if we give him the chance there is reason to believe the postal strike might soon be settled.

Having said that, I suppose it follows almost automatically that I believe we should give him the chance. I do not think it helps for us to stay here monitoring this situation, watching it, standing over the mediation proceedings and giving the impression that if they fail Parliament is ready to jump in with back to work legislation. I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) was quite right in the position he took. He added a few political barbs which perhaps will not shorten the debate, but he was quite right in the position he took that we should not be interfering with that bargaining process by staying here when it was our intention to leave.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope we can come to an agreement without too much debate to take our planned summer break, and leave it to Judge Gold, the Treasury Board and CUPW to reach a settlement as soon as possible. The motion provides that if the government decides that Parliament should come back, it can be done very quickly. However, it is quite different to have Parliament out there having to be called back, rather than having it sitting here. I earnestly hope we can reach agreement on this very soon.

As I say, the Minister of Labour indulged in a few political barbs which were enjoyed on his side of the House and laughed at on the other side. However, it seems to me we are faced with the fact that the Leader of the Opposition and his party have themselves in a bit of a box. They made the statement, almost a threat, that the House would not leave until the mails are moving. That puts them in a spot now, even though there is some hope this might be done. Can they accept that hope and let us go, or do they have to keep us here day after day until the mails are actually moving again?

I would like to say that I would be prepared to refrain from casting any barbs at them for having changed their minds if they become responsible and agree to let this motion pass, and let Judge Gold get on with the job. I would also like to remind all members of the House—and I received the material from the Library just a few moments ago to confirm my memory—that we are dealing with a piece of legislation, namely the Public Service Staff Relations Act, under which the present strike is taking place and which was agreed to unanimously. It is not to be called Liberal legislation; it was supported by all parties in this House, and at that time there were four. As a matter of fact, there were no recorded votes in the House at any stage with respect to that legislation.

In those days we had an additional stage which we do not have now. We had a resolution preceding the introduction of the bill. It was debated in committee of the whole and supported unanimously. Then came second reading, it was debated, and supported unanimously. I have the relevant page of Hansard right here on my desk. It was then sent off to a special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons and considered at great length. I remember the experience very well. David Lewis and I were the members of our party on that committee. One of the leading spokesmen for the Progressive Conservative Party at that time was Dick Bell, who had very strong views. However, we found the give and take and back and forth in that committee a very useful experience.

May I say we had several votes in that committee as we moved amendments, and had them accepted or rejected. However, when that committee finally reported the bill with amendments, it came back to the Committee of the Whole House, was considered again and no more amendments were made. It was then debated at third reading and passed without a recorded vote.

The Public Service Staff Relations Act, more so than many pieces of legislation, clearly represented the will of the whole of Parliament at that time. The Senate agreed to it as well, very quickly; they had no votes over there and some of their members were on the joint committee.

For people to argue now that we should deny the rights which Parliament gave so unanimously to public servants is hardly playing the game. Therefore, I hope this will not be looked on as a partisan matter. I know the arguments that come up when a strike is prolonged and so on. I support the position taken by the government that this is not the time to talk about back-to-work legislation. This is the time to leave it to them as though they have to settle it. If we stay here, that will not be the situation. Therefore, I hope we will agree to the adjournment motion.

If I thought that by staying here we could get some legislation on other matters which I regard as important, that would put me in a dilemma but I would probably come down on the side of staying. We all know that if we stay we will be debating Bill C-48. What do we have? There are more than 50 report stage amendments and third reading after that. Although the debate on third reading is not supposed to come until fall, if we debate the report stage for a number of weeks it will be fall. I do not see any point in voting to stay here for the purpose of dealing with Bill C-48. There are too many things about that bill to which we object. We think that too many of our people, especially our northerners, are being defrauded in that legislation. To stay for that bill does not make any sense at all.

If I thought I could get action on some of the points that I raised today, such as inequalities and unfairnesses in the Public Service Superannuation Act, in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, and in the Canadian Armed Forces Superannuation Act, I would be glad to stay. If I thought I could persuade the Minister of National Health and Welfare to do something for women between ages 55 and 60 and between 60 and 65, if I thought we could get something a lot better for women between 60 and 65 than the spouse's allowance, I would stay. There is no sign of that. I regret it.

I think the way the government has put the country off with respect to pensions, by having a pensions conference a while ago from which nothing seems to have flowed and by telling us again today that there is a task force, is a disgrace. The task force has been around for a long time. We are told that the economy is strong, that there are billions of dollars around, and that there is money for some things when we want it, but that pensioners just have to wait. I regret that position very much. If by staying all summer I could make a speech on some aspects of the pension subject every day, I would be glad to stay. I do not see that happening. All that will happen if we stay is that we will continue to debate Bill C-48. We will get it closer to being passed, which my party is opposed to doing. In my view, our presence here will hamper the important negotiations in which Judge Alan Gold will be engaged with CUPW and with the officers of the Treasury Board. Therefore, I hope we can cool down and not be bound by things which may have been said in the heat of the past. I hope we can realize that it makes good sense for us to support the motion.

I do not think it is unfair to say as well that members of Parliament and their families have certain rights. I am not involved in this way at my particular status, athough I have grandchildren I would like to see. But I think it is worth considering younger members with their families whose holidays have been upset. This may sound strange coming from me; I do not always plead the cause of members. A week ago tonight I made a speech the other way. The more I think of it, the more I wish I had made it a lot stronger, I wish I had been more effective, and I wish the hon. member for Davenport had had more supporters over on that side. That is gone; but all told it seems to me that reason, common sense and fair play suggest that it would be the better part of wisdom for us to get out for a while and, in particular, to let Judge Alan Gold do the job we want done for all the people of Canada.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, this particular debate follows a long parliamentary tradition. It is an adjournment debate which is strangely brought forward by the government at this point in time. I will comment on that in a few minutes.

Essentially the purpose of an adjournment debate is twofold. First, it is to provide for the recess of the House to a particular point in time.

Some hon. Members: To adjourn!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I know hon. members on the government side are preoccupied. They sit there mute and silent and simply say, "aye, ready, aye" to whatever their leader does regardless of the stupidity of what he says.

Mr. Chénier: What do you do to your leader?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I can understand their desire to get back to the comforts of home.

The second purpose of an adjournment debate is to allow individual members of Parliament, without constraint or without any limitation respecting the relevancy of any particular bill, to raise and articulate the grievances he or she has with respect to what is happening in Parliament, with respect to government policy, and with respect to suggestions they have which may aid the government of the day better to administer the affairs of the country. This latter responsibility on the part of parliamentarians is very important. It should be considered at this point in time. The fact of the matter is that there is no particular limitation on the extent of the debate and hon. members are given reasonable opportunity to express their points of view.

Every once in a while there are rules which reflect the fact that parliamentarians are sent here to represent their constituents and the interests of the public at large. I think there is a very interesting, ongoing phenomenon. It has been stated and generally accepted across the country that parliamentarians cannot work in a vacuum, that occasionally parliamentarians must be ready to serve in the public interest at times when the public interest determines and dictates it. I am rather proud that we in this party were prepared, unlike hon. members of the other parties in the House who wanted to get out into the country, to stay here and were successful in influencing the commencement of three significant events which took place in the postal dispute.

Up to very recently the government indicated that it was its intention to allow the postal strike to carry on all summer and into the fall. This was the position of the President of the Treasury Board. The government knows that at least certain hon. members of the House of Commons are concerned that there be serious and positive negotiations on the postal front. We have now influenced the government to take these negotiations seriously, and we have now seen the commencement of negotiations with mediation. The government and CUPW have indicated that they are agreeable to the mediation process, and an eminent Canadian, Judge Alan Gold, in whom we have the greatest confidence, has now been designated to act as mediator with the agreement of the parties.

A novel proposition was put forward by the Minister of Labour, who is a very unusual spokesman for the government in this particular debate because he has been shut out of almost every aspect of the negotiations on the postal issue. He simply has not been included in this matter so far, or at least he was not deemed to be appropriate for involvement in this issue. He now appears as the great spokesman of the Liberal party. But the novel proposition he put forward, which gives us all food for thought, is that somehow whenever there is a collective bargaining process going on between the Treasury Board and any public service union, Parliament should adjourn. Somehow he seems to think that because Parliament is sitting that will influence the negotiations. I think this is what he is saying. It is the most preposterous proposition ever put forward. The parliamentary secretary nods his head in agreement with me.

● (1620)

It is incumbent upon us to examine the real reason why the government wants us to adjourn this House. First, I want to point out the fact that when the adjournment motion came forward, it was debated for a limited period of time. The government then had an opportunity to consider whether it was really serious with respect to adjourning the House or whether it wanted to play games. Unfortunately, it took the latter option. The government revealed itself immediately upon the conclusion of the first day on the adjournment debate. It did not carry on with the adjournment debate. Today the government members have been heard to say that they want to get out of here. They had the opportunity to carry on with this motion. It is the government which calls the orders of the day, not the opposition or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It was the government which decided to move into other government business. This was done notwithstanding the commitment which was given personally by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre. He was told that Bill C-48 would not be discussed until the fall.

Mr. Collenette: That is not true.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The parliamentary secretary knows it is true yet he continues to protest. The fact of the matter is, when it comes down to the question of who I believe as between the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I will take the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre every time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The government has now been heard to say, "Let us get on with the adjournment". It had the option of carrying on if it had been really serious about this matter at the beginning of the week. The government decided to play games and it brought in Bill C-48. All this did was underline the fact that there are a number of serious issues which should be debated by the House of Commons.

Mr. Collenette: Name them.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated that he, too, thought there were many pressing issues which should be brought forward. I agree with him on that point; there are a number of pressing issues which face our country. It does not hurt us to sit back and have the government inconvenienced once in a while, while pressure is brought to bear on it which will, in effect, bring forward legislation which will be beneficial to Canada, rather than the legislation and discussion which has been brought forward to date which will be detrimental to the people of Canada.

There is a matter which has been before the House of Commons on different occasions for which our party was severely criticized some time ago by the government led by the Prime Minister. This issue is one of the most serious matters, as far as I am concerned, which has taken place since the present Prime Minister has held office. It is an issue on which, on every front, the government has attempted to avoid its responsibilities. It is an issue which appeared again today on the floor of the House of Commons, one on which the government continues to stonewall. I refer, of course, to the very questionable and serious lack of action on the part of the government with respect to the uranium cartel.

I have never seen the government, and the Prime Minister in particular, look so bad in terms of their performance on the floor of this House at any time in my experience as a parliamentarian. The matter is a scandal, one which the government is feeling very sensitive about. It is the only time I have ever seen the Prime Minister go to such extraordinary lengths to conceal information from members of the opposition and the Canadian public.

I can well understand why the government wants to adjourn the House as quickly concealment which has taken place with respect to the political responsibility it should bear on the issue of the uranium cartel.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I can understand why members opposite are shouting and attempting to interrupt what I am saying. This is a very serious problem, one which I take most seriously. The fact of the matter is members opposite are extremely embarrassed about this issue. It is one which they wish would go away. We remember what the Prime Minister said when we tried to question him in the House with respect to the uranium cartel. He told us to shut up. That was his response. Now he is trying to get rid of Parliament so that he will not have to answer any more questions from the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The uranium issue has been a particular thorn in the side of the government as the result of a very serious situation which was announced by the Minister of Justice in anticipation of the adjournment of the House. Only two days before the House was destined to adjourn the Attorney General was obliged to indicate that on his recommendation charges had been laid. It was a very convenient time for those charges to be laid. Parliament would be away for the summer recess and there would not be the questioning from the floor of the House, before television cameras and before the nation, with respect to the government's involvement in this matter. Legitimate questions with respect to the political responsibility of this government would thus be avoided.

The way in which this particular announcement was made was a very convenient—

Mr. Collenette: Look at the press gallery.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: To my knowledge the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council has only made one or two speeches off the seat of his pants. Unfortunately, the only time he really speaks is when he is sitting down.

Canadians are growing more interested in this cartel issue now.

Mr. Collenette: Even the CP stringer is not there.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the only thing the parliamentary secretary wants to do is interfere with the right of a parliamentarian to speak. If that is his view about the way in which Parliament should be run, I am afraid it is a very sorry commitment—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Saskatoon West has the floor.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I appreciate your assistance in this regard. As Your Honour well knows, I always listen attentively whenever government members make their contributions. I would expect a reasonable courtesy on their part.

I wish to review briefly the history of this cartel. In the years prior to 1970 there was a slump in the industry. The reactors were going up but the short-term demand was flat. The Americans restricted access to the U.S. market. Maybe I can best describe the circumstances with regard to what was happening by referring to an article by Mark Gayn of the Montreal Gazette, who wrote:

> The secret planning began in 1971. Joe Greene was the minister of energy, and the deputy minister was Jacob "Jack" Austin, later a principal aide to the Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau and now a Senator.

Summer Recess

From Ottawa's point of view, there were two reasons for going ahead with the scheme:

First, there was a slump in the uranium mining industry.

Second, the United States, also going through a period of glut, declared an embargo on imports of uranium. There was fear that the Americans might begin dumping their stocks in the world market, and thus undercut the already threatened Canadian uranium industry . . .

In the even these fears were vastly exaggerated. In Ottawa, specialists kept advising the government that the slump was temporary and that as new reactors went on stream the demand for uranium would soar.

One of these experts was William Gilchrist, who between 1958 and 1975 was president of Eldorado Nuclear . . .

● (1630)

This is a Crown corporation. He was answerable to the former minister of energy, mines and resources, Mr. Greene.

In a deposition made in Toronto for the U.S. District Court of Virginia on September 16, 1976, Gilchrist testified under oath that from the early sixties on he had expected the prices to begin rising around 1973, at the lively clip of about 17 to 22 per cent a year. He said in his deposition that the government agreed with his view.

He said that the government agreed with his view.

Nor was the fear of uranium dumping by the Americans any more valid. The Americans did not dump; they took advantage of the cartel to raise their own prices; and U.S. utilities even made some purchases from Canada, anticipating a lifting of the embargo. It was eventually raised.

The article goes on:

Austin's handprints, all marked 'Secret' or 'Confidential,' seem to be spread over the early history of the cartel. He cajoled or browbeat Canadian producers into joining the combine, he negotiated with foreign producers and governments, and he presided over some of the cartel's secret meetings.

After Austin left, he was replaced as the Canadian overseer of the cartel operations by Gordon MacNabb, assisted by O. J. C. Runnals, a senior uranium expert who acted as a transmission channel to and from the cartel secretariat in Paris.

The article goes on to point out that:

Living in fear of U.S. anti-combine laws, Gulf was most eager to join the cartel, but it wanted to be seen as having been dragged into it, kicking and screaming. One of its officers even told the congressional sub-committee in Washington that Ottawa's pressure on Gulf Minerals was such that a 'push was turning into a shove'.

It goes on to point out that in april of 1972 the principal actors were France, Britain, South Africa and Australia.

In April, 1972, all these people met at the French Commissariat à l'énergie atomique at 31 rue de la Fédération in Paris. They set up a secretariat concealed behind the innocent name of Uranium Market Research Organization . . .

The Club was to gig the price of uranium and to decide on the quota assigned to each producer country . . .

The cartel also agreed on how it was going to make phony bids.

That is the essence of the cartel arrangement which was entered into by officials representing the Government of Canada, along with representatives from other uranium companies around the world and other government agencies.

Canada did take a lead role in forming this international cartel. In the aftermath of the cartel, according to the information that we now have with respect to Canadian interests, it is alleged to have affected prices to domestic consumers in Canada between 1970 and 1978. I think those dates are very significant and important with respect to the history of this matter.

We all remember the history in terms of what the reaction of the government has been and the attitude which it has taken with respect to this arrangement over the years. In the first place, I should point out that this arrangement in the cartel was born and created in the utmost secrecy. There was an element of secrecy and confidentiality which pervaded the whole setting up of this cartel. There was no public announcement about the arrangement of an international marketing agreement, as one might have expected, which would have been similar to what has happened in terms of the international wheat agreement, where the discussions are confidential, but in each and every instance there is publicity with respect to the meetings, and a release made on every occasion as to the conclusions arrived at by the participants of those marketing arrangements.

Second, what happened was that a gigantic lawsuit, the Westinghouse action, was commenced in the United States. This anti-trust matter was initiated with respect to the cartel operations and the effect that the cartel had on prices paid by American consumers. There were substantial amounts claimed in these actions under the American anti-trust laws. There was very substantial apprehension, of course, with respect to the consequences on the Canadian uranium industry as a result of this particular anti-trust action.

I think it is important to remember the dates. The response of the government was to pass what I would term unprecedented orders in council; unprecedented in the sense that these orders in council, passed under the provisions of the Atomic Energy Control Act, in secret, without parliamentary examination, did a couple of things. One, it was made an offence for people in Canada to deliver documents, inside or outside of Canada, related to the activities of the uranium cartel and uranium exports.

The second thing the government did was to make what I call a gag order. It is extremely important to understand the gravity of this whole matter. This regulation by government, unilaterally imposed, made it an offence for Canadians to even discuss the operation of the uranium industry with respect to their marketing activities. I am talking about Canada, not some dictatorship, not some country in which there is not a democratic process. This was the Liberal government, in Canada, passing that kind of law which, in effect, made it an offence for Canadians to even talk about what was happening in terms of the marketing of uranium. I simply ask Your Honour and the Liberal members who are listening to consider the importance of what I am saying.

Mr. Ouellet: It was done to protect workers in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: For the first time since I have been in the House, the spokesman for the consumers of Canada has at least said something on behalf of the consumers. I have never seen him act on behalf of consumers in this country.

There are other things that happened. At the time that regulation was discovered by members of our party, our party commenced an action attacking the validity of those regulations as being offensive, oppressive and contrary to the principle of natural justice we have come to expect in Canada. I think it is interesting to remember exactly what happened after that action took place, because today, to hear the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) stand in his place and suggest that this government, vigilant as ever, moved as quickly as possible with respect to its responsibilities regarding price-fixing in Canada, seems to imply that the government did it on its own volition. As demonstrated by the facts, the only reason there was any action on the part of the government was because of the legal action commenced by members of our party to force the government—

Mr. Ouellet: A farce.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —to open up its files with respect to its implication in this cartel. That is the only reason.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The government was not going to gag the opposition as it wants to gag the opposition now by getting rid of Parliament. We demonstrated that we were prepared to stand on hard issues in the interests of the consumer of our country—

Mr. Ouellet: What a joke, a big joke.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —at a time when the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs remained mute and did nothing on behalf of consumers.

Mr. Ouellet: That is what you did when you were minister. You did nothing.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: As a member of the cabinet, he clearly took no action. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) admitted on the floor of this House that in 1975 the impact of the cartel on domestic prices became known to the government, that was on admission of culpability, in my view. The Prime Minister has admitted that in 1975 the government learned of the impact on domestic prices. He admitted, as well, and it is shown by the record, that the only time the government started to act was after pressure by us in 1977, when it initiated an investigation.

An hon. Member: How can you lie like that and not blush?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I can always tell that I am getting through to members of the government side when they resort to unparliamentary language. I think so little of that intervention that I am not even going to pay attention to it, because the fact of the matter is that it is patently absurd, as the hon. member knows.

Mr. Kempling: That is the only time he speaks.

An hon. Member: I am not going to say any more.

• (1640)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: In 1977, the director of combines commenced his investigation, and this took some four years to complete. A report has been given. The Attorney General and Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) considered the report and the recommendations. We now find that six companies, including two Crown corporations, have been charged. The charge is not that they engaged in a cartel for purposes of controlling the price in an export market. These charges are that they conspired, each with the other, for fix prices domestically. In addition, there were the phony bids to which I referred earlier, the gigging up of prices to which I referred earlier, all of which affected the Canadian consumer. Those are the facts. One thing the government cannot avoid is that charges have been laid.

We have a number of concerns with respect to this cartel. Our concern is, of course, with respect to the effect on the Canadian consumer. We are not worried about the attempt the government might make to aid an ailing industry. We are not concerned about protecting Canadian industry against foreign tribunals. We are prepared to take our position on that matter. We are concerned about the government's decision to use a secret bid-rigging cartel making no provision to protect the consumer. The Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) should pay attention to this because she has some particular responsibility. We are concerned about a situation when in secret, against the law of our country, we have a situation where Crown corporations are now charged with breaking the law of Canada by involving themselves in price-fixing operations affecting the cost of electricity to Ontario consumers, a province from which the Minister of State for Mines comes. She should be particularly concerned about the cost of her electricity bill.

We are also concerned about the actions by the government and its senior officials as well as the political responsibility that must follow those actions. We are concerned because there appears to be now, on the part of the government, a cover-up and some stonewalling. Most important in parliamentary terms, because this is the forum in which we operate, there is a refusal to acknowledge ministerial responsibility.

What is the situation that we have today? Two Crown corporations are charged. One of those Crown corporations, as I have pointed out on different occasions, is Uranium Canada Limited. This company is just a shell. It has no staff. All but one of the directors and officers currently are senior officials from either the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Department of Finance or the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

If hon. members read the 1980 Annual Report of Uranium Canada Limited, they will find that the present incumbents to positions in that corporation include Mr. Gordon M. MacNabb, president, who is also the president of natural sciences and engineering research council and a former deputy minister for the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. Then we find the senior assistant deputy minister of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the senior assistant deputy minister for the Department of Finance; assistant deputy minister, Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce; senior adviser, legal, Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, adviser, uranium and nuclear energy, Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and a professor of energy studies, University of Toronto. These are senior officials, not only from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, but other departments which are fully involved in the operations of that particular Crown corporation.

Because this company is a shell, there is no staff. The operations of the company are being carried on by officials and members of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. They are fully aware of what is happening with respect to this company's operations.

Under the terms of its incorporation, what this company does is subject to order in council. I simply point out to members of the House when the government attempts to suggest there is no government involvement that every time a Crown corporation, such as Uranium Canada Limited, takes any step, the government has to pass an order in council on the recommendation of the minister. There is a responsibility here directly to the cabinet which has the authority under our parliamentary system to pass orders in council.

Eldorado Nuclear Limited is another Crown corporation which reports to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He takes responsibility for answering for that corporation. He follows it. I know from my own experience that I was briefed on what each company was doing, and I am sure that practice was the same during the period 1970 to 1978.

There are two unindicted co-conspirators who are named in the charge as well. These are Mr. Gordon MacNabb, whom I have already mentioned, and Mr. O.J.C. Runnalls, who was a uranium adviser. My colleagues and I want to speak about that later on.

The government's response thus far has been the most curious evasive action I have seen on the part of the government during the time I have been here. It gets curiouser and curiouser, as Alice said. There has been a refusal to acknowledge whether the unindicted co-conspirators, Messrs. Runnalls and MacNabb, have operated with government authority. This was the simple question I asked the minister of which I gave him notice. He has been put on notice with respect to all of these questions. But the Minister of Justice refuses to tell us whether or not these two gentlemen were operating within the authority of the government or whether they were operating outside that authority. That is not a difficult question to answer.

When I questioned him about whether the government will provide legal advice to these two public servants who have been operating in a senior capacity in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and who are enjoined and named as unindicted co-conspirators in this particular operation, I was refused answers. The government has refused to release any information as to the basis on which it laid charges and how it was decided who should be charged and whether or not any individual persons should be charged. In this instance, I think of the harbour dredging case where officers of the company were charged.

An hon. Member: They are in jail.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Why were no individuals charged in this case? What does the government have to conceal? Why can we not get some information from the government as to the basis on which charges were laid? The government has refused to explain why it did not take steps to protect the consumers of Canada. The government is waffling and back-tracking on questions about when it knew this price fixing impacted domestically. All it has told us is that in 1975 the government became aware of it. There is a refusal to explain what happened and what action the government took or did not take. What about the question of when the notice of the impact on domestic prices took place? There is a refusal to repeal the gag regulations. They are still in effect.

It cannot be argued that somehow gag regulations are required because for all intents and purposes the legal proceedings outside of Canada are finished. The only protection that can be afforded by this order in council is with respect to keeping documents away from any domestic prosecutions or lawsuits that might be commenced in Canada. That seems to me to be the only reason the government wants to keep these gag regulations in force. Why does the government not repeal the order in council at this time?

I want to come now to the fundamental question of what this issue is all about. On a number of occasions I have raised questions on the basis that we are witnessing an attempt on the part of the government to avoid what I call parliamentary and ministerial responsibility. Just for the edification of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in particular, I refer to MacGregor Dawson's book "The Government of Canada", fifth edition, revised by Norman Ward. We read there:

> The minister at the head of every department is responsible for everything that is done within that department; and inasmuch as he will expect praise or assume blame for all the acts of his subordinates, he must have the final word in any important decision that is taken. Only if the minister can clearly demonstrate his initial ignorance of the offending act and convince the House of the prompt and thorough manner in which he has attempted to remedy the abuse can he hope to be absolved from at least opposition censure. R. L. Borden, when leader of the opposition, aptly described the ideal situation as follows:
> A Minister of the Crown is responsible, under the system in Great Britain, for the minutest details of the administration in his department; he is politically responsible, but he does not know anything at all about them. When anything goes wrong in his department, he is responsible therefor to Parliament; and if he comes to Parliament and points out that he entrusted the duty to an official in the ordinary course and in good faith, that he had been selected for his capacity, and ability and integrity, and the moment that man has gone wrong the Minister had investigated the matter to the full and punished that man either by degradation or dismissal, he has done his duty to the public. That is the way matters are dealt with in Great Britain, and it is in that way, it seems to me, that our affairs ought to be carried on in this country.

● (1650)

There is a very appropriate lesson for all of us with respect to ministerial responsibility which I want to relate to what happened in this case. The government has consistently refused to acknowledge any implication or involvement.

Mr. Althouse: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the hon. member would entertain a question at this time, or does he prefer to wait until he has completed his remarks?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I would be glad to entertain a question at the end of my remarks, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rossi: He was never any good at answering questions, even when he was a minister.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: At least some of us attained the position of minister, but some never will.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am perfectly willing to accommodate the hon. member whose right it is to determine whether or not he wishes to entertain a question. Will he advise the Chair whether he wishes to or not?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Go ahead.

Mr. Althouse: I wonder if the hon. member would enlighten the House as to whether he considers himself, having been a minister, as being equally culpable in this matter since he has just outlined the responsibilities of ministers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I can tell the hon. member one thing. As far as we are concerned, without the help of the NDP and the Liberal coalition, which the hon. member is aware of, familiar with and supportive of on a number of issues, including the Constitution, if we had been in power this matter would have been resolved to the satisfaction of the public. There would have been no concealment by our party. We take our responsibilities seriously. What is happening here is an attempt to cover up and deny responsibility on the part of this government.

Mr. Masters: Answer the question.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I have answered the question. There would be no cover up as far as we are concerned. The member knew nothing of cover ups until he supported this government for a while.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, could we have a little order in the House? The fact is that the member never speaks. he never does anything except vote in favour of the government.

There are a number of indications that the government was fully aware of the operations of this cartel and the impact that occurred. There is in the public record a Gulf memo of March 8, 1974, which indicates that energy, mines and resources officials recognized that Canadian utilities must be prepared to pay the export prices. That is the fixed gate price.

Second, as I have indicated, the companies initially were very concerned about the effects of the combines law. They were given assurances by this government that no action would be taken with respect to this question of combines law as long as it was in power.

The third indication was that the cabinet apparently discussed the possible domestic consequences with the cartel. The simple fact is that Messrs. MacNabb and Runnalls are now named as co-conspirators. The Minister of Justice can say that they do not stand accused of anything, but as far as this is concerned, they are accused of being co-conspirators.

I can understand why the government wants to adjourn. It is embarrassed. It is therefore attempting to get Parliament out of Ottawa. It wants to shut down for an extended period of time. During the time the Prime Minister is entertaining the other leaders of the western industrialized world, he does not want questions on the floor of the House about the participation of this government with respect to a cartel and the responsibility it bears in that connection. I can therefore understand why the government wants Parliament out of Ottawa.

We take our responsibilities seriously in terms of the role of the opposition. Our responsibility is to ensure that it cannot be perceived in this country that anyone, including the person who holds the highest political office in this country, is above the law.

Second, we have a legitimate interest in terms of finding out exactly what the political responsibility is with respect to this matter. We should learn from what has happened in the past and indicate that that action is not acceptable as far as political activity in this country is concerned.

I have outlined some of the incidents and the background. This is a vital issue because it goes right to the heart and credibility of this government. I say in all sincerity and with a sense of sadness that there is a heavy smell of scandal regarding this matter. The people of Canada are entitled to the information with respect to the political activities of this government and what action it took as soon as this matter was brought to its attention.

An adjournment will clearly take the pressure off this government. It will not be subject to questions on the floor of the House of Commons and it will not have to discuss ministerial responsibility. This issue is making the government very nervous. As I have indicated—

Mrs. Erola: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the hon. member if he has any knowledge of how many jobs were saved by the actions of this government.

Mr. Beatty: The whole cabinet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I was going to indicate to the hon. member that his time had expired. I can only permit him to entertain a question with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, as far as the speech of the previous speaker is concerned, I would like to point out that since the question period early this afternoon, he has been making vague accusations, using words such as cover-up and stonewalling, saying that there is a bad smell of scandal and trying to implicate an honourable and respectable senator. I feel that he is taking undue advantage of his parliamentary immunity to question the integrity of someone who is not here, who cannot defend himself in the House and who cannot rise on a question of privilege. Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) or any one of his colleagues are not drips and are really serious about their accusations, they should not only rise in this House, where they know that they are very well protected, in an attempt to injure the reputation of the government and of individuals, but also make the same accusations in a direct and straightforward manner outside the House before the press. I believe that members opposite are trying to create bogus scandals and that is why they would like the House to continue to sit, because they will not have the guts to repeat their charges and innuendos outside the House.

Mr. Speaker, the discussions and speeches that we have heard from members opposite lead me to believe that they do not have much to do except try to tarnish reputations without good reason. I believe that the House should adjourn as soon as possible because we have the impression that they are being over-critical to no avail since they use the House of Commons to protect themselves. As for the uranium case, I believe that if Senator Austin or anyone else had been directly involved, he would not have been spared by the investigators.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for Shefford, but it is now five o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Châteauguay (Mr. Watson)—External Affairs—Southeast Asia—Abuses of human rights; the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields)—Energy—Future of Alsands project at Fort McMurray, Alta. (a) Possible commercial arrangement with oil companies; the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight)—Canadian Wheat Board—Query respecting initial wheat prices for new crop year.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely notices of motions (papers), private bills, public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

Orders Nos. 22, 5, 4, 35, 43 and 1 allowed to stand by unanimous consent.

APPLICATION OF FEDERAL LAWS IN VARIOUS PROVINCIAL COURTS

The House resumed, from Thursday, April 2, 1981, consideration of the motion of Mr. Herbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, minutes of meetings, studies and other communications of the Department of Justice relating to the comparison of the application by the various provincial courts of federal laws.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I must draw to the attention of hon. members the fact that the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) is not present in the House and that the motion cannot be withdrawn in his absence except by adjourning debate on the particular motion by unanimous consent. I am not sure whether other hon. members want to pursue the debate or not.

Mrs. Appolloni: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I will recognize the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mrs. Appolloni).

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the motion gives us an opportunity to discuss the general subject of disparity in sentencing by judges in our criminal courts. Members of the public and others who were not able to gather full information on criminal cases have to rely on reports in newspapers and the other media for information on sentences. Such reports inevitably are condensed and cannot cover all the facts of a case. They cannot describe all the circumstances of a crime, and they cannot portray the background and criminal record of an offender. The information which is available to the public at large is necessarily incomplete, so when apparently similar offenders are reported to have received widely different sentences for apparently similar crimes, these may not be examples of disparity at all, for the offenders may not in fact be similar at all. Neither may the crimes be similar at all in their circumstances, the value of property stolen or the degree of injury caused to a victim. It is not possible to judge whether disparity in sentencing really exists or the extent to which it may exist across Canada from the incomplete information presented in media reports.

Differences in sentencing from time to time and from place to place at the same time are entirely to be expected. Indeed, such differences are normal reflections of the differences in sentencing requirements from one court to another and from one time to another. One can imagine in a small community a wave of vandalism occurring caused by a few offenders. In that community and at that time the judge may decide, and properly so, that deterrent sentences of punishment are needed to discourage others from committing vandalism. In another town or at another time vandalism may not be a problem, and a judge sentencing an offender may feel that considerations other than general deterrence can form the basis for an appropriate sentence in that case and may see a fine, probation or community service as the best of the alternatives. So as crime conditions in a community change, so the sentences for similar crimes may have to change, depending on the view the judge takes of the seriousness of the crime situation and the chances of deterrent sentences influencing or discouraging other people from committing crimes.

I am sure we all recognize that sentences imposed in one place are quite likely to be different from those imposed in another, even for similar crimes. Sentences are neither expected nor supposed to be exactly the same across Canada. Rather, appeals against sentences in criminal cases are decided in the provinces where judges in appeal courts are more familiar with the local conditions and can reflect the feelings of the public and concerns about the crime situation in their sentences.

It is interesting to reflect on the fact that despite the expectation of variation from province to province in particular cases, a study of the leading cases in sentence appeals across Canada shows a remarkable consistency. I refer to the consistency in principles which have been enunciated by the learned judges in appeal courts in dealing with sentence appeals. In every province, these leading cases have declared the principles on which an appropriate sentence is to be determined, and these principles are the same in Newfoundland as in Ontario and the same in Quebec as in British Columbia. It is indeed a remarkable fact that while sentences for the same crime, or apparently the same crime, may vary from province to province, the principles on which those sentences are imposed are the same.

Among the principles which are applied in every criminal court in Canada when offenders are being sentenced are the following four main ones: first, the legal gravity of the offence proved against, or admitted by, the offender. This, of course, determines the upper limit of the sentence in accordance with the penalties laid down in the Criminal Code of Canada. Second, the circumstances of that particular offence—the degree of injury caused to the victim or the value of goods dishonestly obtained or damaged. Third, the circumstances of the offender—his background, including any previous criminal behaviour, his lifestyle and his prospects for the future. Fourth, the public requirements in such a case—does the public require protection from the offender by prison sentence, or can public outrage be satisfied by a sentence served in the community?

Naturally, when these main principles are taken in combination, several sentences may seem to be appropriate. And other principles—such as the prevalence of that type of crime in the community—are also considered.

The variations in sentences spring from the different perceptions of the local community expectation and needs for sentences. In one place deterrent sentences may be needed while, in another, given different conditions of crime and public feeling about crime, rehabilitative or community-based sentences may suffice. We can see that what is sometimes called disparity is really no more than the expected variation in sentences reflecting local conditions and the needs of the local community.

Another reason for the so-called disparity in sentences may arise in other types of cases. Let us consider a hypothetical example of a young, unemployed, married man who commits a breaking and entering. He is caught in the act. He pleads guilty and is found to have three previous convictions for theft. Such a man is a marginal case for sentencing. One judge reviewing the facts may decide that on balance the offender could still benefit from, say, the supervision of a probation officer and, by careful control, could be encouraged to lead a good and useful life. Another judge reviewing an exactly similar case may take a slightly different view. He may think that the offender is marginally too involved in crime to risk probation, that, rather, a short prison term may be expected to pull him up short and that this, on balance, is marginally more likely to help him lead a good and useful life in the future.

Each judge wants the same result; the balance between the choices of a long probation or a short jail term is marginal. One judge choose one way; one the other. Each may be right in the outcome: the offender does not commit crime again. One cannot term such variations in sentences "unwarrantable disparity". Rather, such variations are the normal differences in opinion, in perception and in decisions which reflect the careful consideration of a problem and the search for a solution. Here indeed we can truly say that wise men may differ in the solutions they find.

Let me take this example a little further. Suppose the judge who decides to sentence this hypothetical offender to a short prison term takes another factor into account. In his area he knows that the probation service is overworked, and in this particular case he believes that to succeed on probation the offender would need careful and intensive supervision, which just cannot be provided. In such a situation, we would not be surprised at all to read that a prison term was imposed, because the judge must take into account the necessary protection of the public. Nor would we be surprised about a long sentence of probation supervision being imposed by the other judge in an area where the correctional facilities are overcrowded, no adequate training programs are in place in the prisons, and where probation supervision being imposed by the other judge in an area where the correctional facilities are overcrowded, no adequate training programs are in place in the prisons, and where probation supervision is sufficient to assure the safety of the public.

● (1710)

It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that much of what is referred to as disparity may arise from an awareness on the part of judges of the conditions in the local area of prison overcrowding, or of overworked probation officers. Further disparity may arise where a program is not available at all to the judge. For example, there are many areas in Canada where there are no programs of community service or of supervised restitution to the victim.

Another illustration may be found in fine option programs. These programs permit an offender who cannot pay a fine to work instead of going to prison. Judges who have fine option programs in their area can, with more confidence, sentence an offender to be fined, knowing that if he eventually cannot pay, he can still serve the community, working off his sentence in the community. Judges who do not have access to this program may decide it is in the offender's interest to send him straight to prison for a period commensurate with the fine which might have been imposed, rather than delay the inevitable. In such a case, the offender may benefit by having the matter concluded as quickly as possible.

The variation in the availability of these different sentencing options, and others, such as intermittent or weekend prison sentencing, or psychiatric or psychological services to probationers or prisoners, leads inevitably to variations in sentencing practice from one area to another. These variations can be reduced only by the provision of the support programs on which they are based. This may itself be impractical, by reasons of geography, population, local working conditions and so forth. Nonetheless, we can welcome the extension of the programs to different areas, as their value is demonstrated and as facilities become available, as one further way to reduce certain disparities in sentencing.

Thus far, Mr. Speaker, I have referred to variations in sentencing which, when all the facts become known, are explainable in rational, principled terms. There are, however, some residual cases where the sentences imposed are, apparently, widely different, and where the sentences are so extreme that they are not, apparently, explicable in terms of the normal variation. If the sentence seems too severe, of course, the offender can, and with the advice of his legal adviser would, appeal against the sentence. On the other hand, if the sentence is so light or inadequate as to be wholly out of proportion to the seriousness of the crime, the Crown may feel obliged to appeal. There seems little doubt that the appeal courts can, in such cases, do much to smooth out unwarrantable disparity. And, to judge by reported cases, appeal courts do, indeed, vary sentences when it is clear that the judge at first instance has gone wrong in the principle of the sentence imposed. The capacity of appeal courts in the provinces to remedy errors of principle is a most important guarantee in our system of criminal justice, one of which we can be justly proud.

Some people may still object that, despite the efforts of the courts of appeal, there are still a proportion of sentences imposed or confirmed on appeal which may show evidence of unwarrantable disparity. If such cases exist, I am convinced that they form only a very tiny proportion of cases in which sentences are imposed. So far as we can tell, there is only a very small proportion of appeals against sentence; naturally, from this one can infer that the group of cases which might be classed after an appeal as still unwarrantably disparate is indeed very small.

We may be assured, Mr. Speaker, that the judges themselves are very conscious of their responsibilities in sentencing. To ensure so far as possible that appeals are not required, because the sentences at first instance are warranted, understandable, and in accordance with clear and definite principles, judges across Canada are holding seminars in which they discuss sentencing problems. In this way, the judges can reflect on the problems and have the benefit of the advice of all other judges in the province on the most appropriate sentence to be imposed in particular types of cases. To assist judges further, I understand a sentencing handbook is in preparation, and this will be available to assist all judges by providing an account of the services available in their areas, and the programs and training facilities to which offenders may be referred.

On the basis of the information we have at present, Mr. Speaker, it seems that we in Canada are very far from the problems which are reported to be found in some jurisdictions in the United States. Sentences there are, of course, not usually subject to appeal. Often the sentences are indeterminate in length, between wide lower and upper boundaries set by the judge. Naturally, with so much latitude left to the judge, unwarrantable disparities have been described. Some jurisdictions have attempted to deal with the problem by mandatory or fixed term sentences. If an offender is convicted of a crime, say robbery, he serves the statutory sentence—perhaps, ten years. This system takes no account of the circumstances of the robbery; it might range from a well thought out, planned raid on a bank, with many thousands stolen, to a spur of the moment wallet snatch in the street where the victim is pushed over and only a few dollars stolen. For each of these crimes of robbery, the same sentence would be imposed under a mandatory sentence scheme.

This seems to be far worse than a sentencing process where all factors in the crime can be considered. Other jurisdictions in the United States have legislated guidelines where the discretion of the judge is narrowed. Sentences may vary only by a few months, no more than a year or so. These schemes, too, have run into problems and have, in some areas, had to be abandoned, often because of overcrowding in the prisons. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian position is a good balance at present.

It is extremely unfortunate that we do not have at the moment enough information to satisfy ourselves that all is well, and that all cases of unwarrantable disparity are, in fact, caught at the appeal stage and rectified. Nonetheless, the strong impression is gained from what information we do have that in general terms sentencing in Canada is a just, equitable, and fair process for the offender; and that the needs of the community are being well balanced against those of offenders. The judges are regularly considering among themselves the principles of sentencing and the factors they take into account in each case. The police report of the crime; the evidence brought out in court; the defence plea in mitigation of sentence; the pre-sentence report on the background and circumstances of the offender; the judge's perceptions of community requirements and local conditions: all these combine to give an appropriate balance in the final process of sentencing. The judges have, and rightly so, a wide discretion in sentencing. They are given a great deal of information on which to exercise that discretion and, if they err in principle, senior judges wait in the appeal court to correct any errors.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian criminal justice system is far from being unjust, unfair or capricious, but is rather a fine example of the common law tradition of equality before the law, of fairness, and of the appropriate balancing of competing interests by the principled exercise of judicial discretion. Indeed, we have much for which to be grateful to our criminal court judges.

Mr. Bruce Lonsdale (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue the discussion along the lines of some of the comments the hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni) was making. However, first of all, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) for bringing to the attention of the House the question of the need for consistency and equality before the law for all Canadians.

The particular aspect of this subject on which I would like to concentrate this afternoon is the extent to which we are equipped to reach any conclusions on this important question. Earlier speeches have pointed to the important distinction which must be drawn between justified discretion in order to reflect local and regional differences, an unjustified disparity which leads to injustice and unfairness. Some statistics, mostly gathered by the national task force on the administration of justice, or by Statistics Canada, have been cited in this regard.

● (1720)

The point I should like to make this afternoon is one that has been made repeatedly over many years. The present state of criminal justice information and statistics in Canada makes it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to reach any valid or reliable conclusions on this question.

As long ago as 1938 the Archambault commission recommended:

> A complete revision of the method of preparing statistical information.

It went on to recommend:

> Provisions should be made for uniformity of statistical information in regard to all phases of the administration of the criminal law—

Some 31 years later, the report of the Canadian Committee on Corrections commented:

> In Canada as elsewhere the official statistics on crime are an uncertain measure of the actual number of crimes or the characteristics of offenders.

The commission went on to note:

> Unreliable reporting is not confined to victims but may be found at each official level. Individual police officers and police districts may report inaccurately or incompletely to their headquarters, which may in turn distort the figures through their own reporting practices. Similarly, court officials responsible for recording data and sending in reports may make incomplete or inexact returns to the central body compiling the statistics. The reader of the final published statistics usually has no empirical basis for assessing reliability. He cannot tell, for instance, whether a reported increment results from more actual crime, more efficient law enforcement, more zealous reporting, better record keeping, or some combination of these.

In its 1976 Report on Dispositions and Sentences in the Criminal Process, the Law Reform Commission of Canada summed up the problems resulting from the continuing lack of national statistics with respect to criminal justice in the following words:

> The state of statistics and information on the nature of crime and the administration of justice in Canada is simply deplorable. There is a clear agreement on this situation even by those charged with the collection and dissemination of data. Dispositions and sentences are especially vulnerable, since these now depend largely on beliefs on what are effective measures against criminal acts. The public, legislators, administrators, and judges are largely at the mercy of hunches in assessing the total picture of crime, and are forced to rely on their personal work experience. There are a great number of myths and misunderstandings in areas such as bail, leniency and sentencing and release on parole. Even where data are available they are not published in a form or with sufficient speed to check assumptions, mitigate exaggerations, or even more important, indicate pressure points and identify reasons for crises.

The continuing concern about this state of affairs on the part of both provincial and federal ministers responsible for criminal justice has resulted in a number of efforts to remedy the situation. Most recently, federal and provincial governments established the National Project on Resource Co-ordination for Justice Statistics and Information. This group reported in May 1980 the following:

> In Canada, nationwide information about crime is so fragmented, unreliable, untimely and varied that it is impossible to state, with any reasonable degree of confidence, conclusions about the state of crime or the justice system of the nation.

The report went on to outline a number of efforts which have been made in the past decade with respect to the broad problem of inadequate justice information and statistics, a problem which in large part derives from the split jurisdictions and fragmented nature of the criminal justice system in Canada. This was ably described by the hon. member who just spoke about the varying degrees of sentences, varying cases, and the mitigating circumstances surrounding decisions of judges in the terms of penalties they impose.

The national project on resource co-ordination went on to suggest the establishment of a Statistics Canada satellite in order to meet the needs for information which had been identified. The report recommended that all justice ministers and their deputies in each jurisdiction in Canada make a commitment and an appropriate allocation of resources to support and encourage the development of national justice statistics which are comprehensive, accurate and timely; the development of management information systems; the collection of operational information, especially that relating to jurisdictional and sectoral expenditures and staff complement; that the deputy ministers in the justice field, together with the Chief Statistician of Canada, constitute a justice information council to establish the objectives of, and formulate policies and priorities for, an agency which should be responsible for developing national statistics and information. Also it set out the series of steps it saw as necessary to accomplish those goals.

Following the acceptance in principle of the recommendations of the NPRC, working groups were constituted of provincial and federal officials with specialized subject matter knowledge of the different sectors of criminal and civil justice statistics and information. These working groups have prepared program outlines which, when accepted by provincial jurisdictions, should provide mechanisms for the timely gathering of the necessary information in a comparable format.

Consideration is being given to the system of setting up a centre for justice statistics which will be a satellite of Statistics Canada to handle this work efficiently and effectively. The main task of the proposed centre would be to assemble, distribute and publish justice statistics derived from the responsible jurisdictions. The submitting jurisdictions, whether they be provinces or territories, would have the responsibility to provide the needed information in an agreed format and at an appropriate time. To aid the provinces and territories in setting mechanisms in place, the proposed centre would also provide a technical assistance service for the first few years. This service would be needed only until each submitting jurisdiction has developed a satisfactory mechanism and the essential information is found to be flowing smoothly.

These steps had to be instituted to correct the deplorable position to which I alluded earlier. Some very good examples of this were given by the hon. member who spoke last. The centre for justice statistics will be carefully evaluated over a three-year period to ensure that it is reaching its objective. It may, however, not be possible even after three years of intensive work to provide all the information needed by members of the House and the public to have a satisfactory appreciation of the justice system in Canada. Nor will the needs of policymakers and program managers be satisfied within the first three years. Indeed, it seems likely that the complexity of the work to be undertaken will require at least five years before we have the types of information so urgently required.

But the complexity of this task must not deter us from undertaking it. In particular, we have an urgent need for information that can assist us in a fundamental review of the Criminal Code which the ministers of justice, in co-operation with the solicitors general and provincial ministers responsible for criminal justice, will be undertaking shortly based on past and current work of the Law Reform Commission of Canada. Accordingly, selected research work will be undertaken with the co-operation of the provinces in the short term to provide information to support this work.

But the major point I wish to make this afternoon is that this very fundamental work must be undertaken before we will be in a position to reach conclusions about the extent of disparity as distinct from the extent of variation in the application of federal laws in Canada. While we do have some information—and other hon. members have made reference to it—it seems apparent we are not presently in a position to draw the kind of fundamental conclusions which some critics of the criminal justice system might draw. This is not a recipe for complacency; far from it. I have outlined some of the plans of the federal and provincial ministers responsible for criminal justice for remedying this lack of information.

I would also mention in this context the work of the national task force on the administration of justice to which reference was made earlier. In addition federal and provincial ministers responsible for criminal justice, as well as their deputy ministers, meet on a regular basis to review issues of joint concern in this field of shared responsibility. Similarly, the commissioners of uniform law gather on an annual basis to discuss many of the issues which bear on the basis of the motion before us today.

The elaboration of this intergovernmental machinery of co-ordination and co-operation has come about only in the past decade or so, with the exception of the uniformity commissioners. The increasing degree of co-operation between orders of government in this important field is evidence of the fact that clear recognition is given to the need to eliminate unjustified disparity in so far as possible within the judicial system of Canada. That this should be the case is not surprising. The central place of criminal law and criminal justice in our society, the need to ensure equality of access to the law and equality of treatment before the law, are principles of fundamental importance to all Canadians.

I have briefly mentioned the fundamental review of the criminal law which will shortly be undertaken under the leadership of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). It is my understanding that this review will examine fundamental questions such as those raised by the hon. member in his motion in the sense that principles and objectives of sentencing will be the subject of intensive examination, as will all other aspects of Canadian criminal law. The kinds of concerns raised during this discussion will no doubt be taken into account by those responsible for carrying out this review.

The last point I should like to make in this connection concerns the role of the courts themselves in eliminating unwarranted disparity in sentencing. While it is true that no basic principles on sentencing appear in the Criminal Code itself and that general principles such as those indicating that "the punishment should fit the crime", or that the sentence should be broadly proportionate to the harm done, are so general in their nature as to be unhelpful in predicting precise sentences in individual cases, hon. members are no doubt aware of the fact that specific sentencing principles about what should be taken into account when sentencing an offender have been set out in leading cases from jurisdiction to jurisdiction in Canada.

Despite the fact that no appeal lies to the Supreme Court of Canada on sentence per se, the specific principles in many cases set out by provincial courts of appeal are broadly similar from province to province. By the declaration of these principles some attempt is made to limit the discretion of the sentencer further than that provided by the law itself. Sentencing judges, of course, have differing views on the purposes of sentences. Some judges sentence with a view to "doing the utmost for the offender" in a forward looking way, while others go strictly by some real but unstated tariff, fixing the sentence in relation to a retrospective look at the offence committed, without too much consideration to the future prospects of the offender.

To balance these differing approaches, appellate courts sit to consider too severe or too lenient sentences in an effort to strike a balance. The efforts of these appellate courts in this regard are aimed at ensuring that the objectives of sentencing in a particular case are consistent with the over-all aims of sentencing, which themselves should be congruent with the objectives of the criminal process and the criminal justice system itself.

Efforts in improving the quality of justice in Canada are continuing on the part of ministers and officials responsible for the administration of justice, and on the part of the judiciary. The development in recent years of sentencing conferences and seminars by organizations of judges are further evidence of the fact that the judiciary is keenly concerned with providing the highest quality of justice to Canadians. We in Canada have been well served by an independent judiciary of which we can be proud and which we hope will continue.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my appreciation for the opportunity to participate in this discussion and to thank the hon. member for bringing this important matter to the attention of the House and to the attention of all Canadians who are concerned about the criminal justice system in this country.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform hon. members that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) has elected not to make the customary five-minute speech under the provisions of Standing Order 48(2). He feels the arguments have been well made by members on our side this afternoon. Therefore, I would ask that you call upon the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) to conclude.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, my objective in bringing this motion before the House was to illustrate, as I think has been well illustrated by all the speakers, that since the various departments of justice in the provinces are responsible for the administration of justice and the application of federal laws, there will be, inevitably, some inequalities. I believe the various speakers have illustrated the steps which have been taken and are being taken to attempt, as far as is possible, to eliminate these inequalities in the administration of justice. I feel that the subject has been well aired. I therefore ask, Mr. Speaker, to have the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) seeks the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw his motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is there a disposition to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 5:34 p.m. the House took recess.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pinard:

That, when the House adjourns on the day this order is adopted, it shall stand adjourned until Wednesday, October 14, 1981, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Madam Speaker, after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its "business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Madam Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees or the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in her stead for all the purposes of this order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock this afternoon, the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) had the floor.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The question is as follows: Mr. Pinard, seconded by Mr. Lamontagne, moved:

That, when the House adjourns on the day this order is adopted—

Shall I dispense?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Does the hon. member rise on a point of order? The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour).

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, it will be abundantly clear what kind of a charade is going on in here. The government does not want to hear us talk about the uranium matter.

Some hon. Members: Order!

An hon. Member: The motion has been put!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Whatever the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) may chose to raise, one thing that the Chair cannot tolerate is the imputation of motives. I would ask the hon. member, if he has a point of order, to reach the point of order.

An hon. Member: The motion has been put!

Mr. Kilgour: If Your Honour is going to come in at 30 seconds after eight—

Some hon. Members: Order!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): For the second time, it is neither acceptable under the rules of the House that motives be imputed to hon. members anywhere in the House, nor is it acceptable that motives be imputed to the Speaker. The Speaker arrives at eight. If the hon. member has a point of order, I would ask him to get to it very quickly; otherwise, I shall read the motion.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly clear to everyone what is going on in here.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, this side is obviously not in favour of the question being put, and we have other hon. members who wish to speak with respect to the motion. I am one of them. I would therefore wish to speak on the matter.

Mr. Collenette: On a point of order. Your Honour has read the question. Your Honour has put the motion, and it is incumbent upon the Chair to put the question. Your Honour recognized the fact that the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) had the floor before five o'clock. He chose not to proceed. Your Honour then put the question. Your Honour is in the middle of putting the question, and I submit that Your Honour has no right to entertain any points of order. Your Honour must put the question forthwith.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kilgour: I do not have to tell Your Honour that you know perfectly well that you have not put the question. Your Honour asked if you should dispense with reading, and at that point an hon. member stood up on a point of order. Obviously, my point of order is that we wish to continue this debate. The question has not been put, and we wish—I wish, indeed, to continue the debate. If the premise of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette), the parliamentary secretary, is that the question has been put, he has just admitted—it is patently obvious that the question has not been put. Therefore, any hon. member in this House, I think it goes without saying, has the right to speak, and I wish to—

An hon. Member: Question!

Mr. Kilgour: No, the hon. member cannot call for the question until the question is put. The question has not been put, and I wish to speak on the matter.

Mr. Taylor: On a point of order. Mr. Speaker, when the debate ended this afternoon, there was an hon. member speaking. When we started tonight, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) was on his feet. Consequently, he should have been recognized, to continue the debate. The hon. member was on his feet, and he was not recognized. Therefore, he has the right to speak.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, again. Mr. Speaker has been consulting with the Clerk. Would Your Honour wish to continue that consultation before I speak to my point of order? I wish to speak on the motion, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member has risen on a point of order. I would ask that he address himself to the Chair on a point of order.

Mr. Kilgour: My point of order, as mentioned—well, I will wait until Your Honour is finished.

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Kilgour: I do not dance for you fellows!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Obviously, the Chair is faced with a difficulty. I need not go through all the procedural aspects of this operation. I can simply indicate that what has happened is as follows: I asked whether or not the House was ready for the question. There was an indication that it was, and I began to read the question. Somewhere during the first few seconds of reading the question, I indicated that I would ask whether or not the hon. members wished me to dispense with the reading of the question. Having done that, there was some indication that I should dispense.

Mr. Kilgour: Not from this side.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It makes no difference from which side the suggestion to dispense comes. What is important is that hon. members later have the opportunity, after the question is put, to determine whether or not they object to the procedure or, rather, whether they object to the question.

I think I have to come to some solution. Either, on the first part, the conclusion that I would come to is that, having asked the House whether it is ready for the question, I should then proceed without the interruption of points of order; or, on the other hand, some way, through putting the question to the House, I should observe any hon. member who wishes to rise and put a point of order, and that that point of order might somehow or other affect the proceeding of putting the question. I have tried to have a little advice while I have been listening to the points of order, and I do not feel comfortable with the situation. Therefore, I will proceed as I think best, and I will have to live with the result.

It is my feeling that once the House is asked whether or not it is ready for the question, and the question has begun to be read, and at that point the question is put to the House or is in the process of being put to the House, hon. members have a perfectly legitimate and perfectly parliamentary and free opportunity to consider whether or not they accept the question. I think that gives those hon. members who may object to the question being put, a reasonable opportunity to declare that they do not wish the question to be put at this point. Therefore, I think, given the rights of all hon. members who may want to object to the question being put or who may want to vote against the question, it seems to me that we ought to continue in a procedural fashion; and those hon. members who are discontented can rise in their places in due course and express themselves.

I think I have to indicate—I thought I had just done so—that if I am in the process of putting the question to the House, I will not recognize a point of order. The hon. member has no end of opportunities, within seconds, to express his opinion. I do not see that it disadvantages him in any way to have the question put.

Mr. Taylor: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. Once again, this hon. member was on his feet, and if he is not recognized, it is nothing more than a dirty trick. He was on his feet before Your Honour started reading—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I would ask the hon. member for Bow River to take his seat—

Mr. Taylor: I am in my seat.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): —and only under such circumstances as he is recognized by the Chair, to stand. If there are hon. members who want to make a point on this—my view is that there is no question. Once I have asked whether or not the House is ready for the question and have begun to read the question, it seems to me that we ought to proceed.

However, I will listen for two or three minutes, or a few minutes, to perhaps two or three hon. members—and I would ask that hon. members be very brief—and then I will make a ruling on the decision, because I understand there are some hon. members who feel strongly about the point. I have heard the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, and I will now hear the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I was not here, but it is my understanding—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. McGrath: We know what is going on here tonight; but it is my understanding that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour), at the moment Your Honour put the question, tried to get the floor. The hon. member nods his agreement. If that is the case, then I submit with great respect that Your Honour must cease and desist putting the question until you hear the hon. member. That is the point of order I wish to raise, because the hon. member tried to get the floor at the moment Your Honour put the question.

● (2010)

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, when you started the question—

An hon. Member: You were not here.

Mr. Taylor: Quiet down a minute. What are you trying to do? Are you trying to run this country with a steam shovel or something? Look at the rules.

The hon. member was on his feet asking for the right to speak before the motion was put.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Taylor: And the hon. member has the right to speak even if the motion has been partly read. If a member stands up and expresses the wish to speak, he has that right. Hon. members should look at the rules.

I submit that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona has the right to speak. He was on his feet. The Chair was not looking his way, but the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona was on his feet, and hon. members on the other side know it.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite clear. Beauschene's fifth edition, Citation 217, reads:

> When the debate on a question is closed, and the House is ready to decide thereon, the Speaker says: "Is the House ready for the question?"

Which is exactly what you did, Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago. The citation continues:

> If it is evident that no member claims the right of speaking, the Speaker proceeds to put the question by reading the main motion, and then the amendment or amendments in their proper order. He then takes the sense of the members of the last of these by saying: "Those who are in favour of the motion—

An hon. Member: You have answered your question.

Mr. Collenette: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that you are now in the middle of putting a question and any point of order, even the one on which I am rising, is entirely out of order. You have admitted by your own ruling a few moments ago, Sir, that you must put the question now.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, there is a question of equity and fairness here.

Mr. Gauthier: Look who's talking.

Mr. Beatty: It is your responsibility as Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: We hear shouts of derision from the government side when we talk about equity and fairness. I do not have to talk to you about your responsibilities, Mr. Speaker. You are fully aware of them. You know full well that it is the responsibility of the Speaker to protect the rights of Parliament and to protect the rights of individual members of Parliament.

My colleague said he was on his feet prior to the commencement of the question. Even if there is a grey area, and even if there is debate or question as to whether or not the hon. member rose to his feet during the commencement of the question being put, as opposed to being on his feet prior to that, the question with which the Chair is faced is one of fairness. If a decision is to be made, is it to be made on the side of terminating the debate thereby depriving members of Parliament of the opportunity to be heard? Or is it the Speaker's responsibility to protect the rights of Parliament. And, in particular, to protect the rights of freedom of speech of the individual members of this House?

The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council just read from the rules. It is very clear from Beauchesne's Citation 217 that the Speaker is to put the question only if no member wishes to seek the floor.

We know now at this point, without the question having been put, that at least one member of Parliament seeks the floor.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: Let them shout on the other side. However, I do not think they will succeed in gagging Parliament because it is your responsibility, Mr. Speaker, to protect the rights of Parliament from an oppressive majority and from trickery. A member of Parliament, duly elected to this place, is seeking the floor to debate a motion that is before the House at the present time. It is clear that the question has not yet been put.

An hon. Member: You were not even here.

Mr. Beatty: A member is seeking the floor.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that you have no choice, nor would any other incumbent in that Chair have any choice but to make the decision on the side of freedom of speech and on the side of the rights of an individual member of Parliament to be heard on an essential issue. To do anything else would be to deprive members of the most important function in this Parliament, which is here to talk about the issues facing the country. To take away that right from a member of Parliament deprives all members of Parliament. It is indeed a great undermining of the whole function of Parliament itself.

An hon. member seeks the floor. The question has not yet been put; I submit that, in fairness, in equity and in defence of the rights of Parliament, you will choose to recognize my colleague from Edmonton Strathcona, because there is no other option.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to point out that I was here when the bell rang, as were a number of other members on this side. When we came into the House there were two members on the far side of the House. As I understand it, the rules are the rules and you cannot roll back history any more than you can roll back a vote taken in December, 1979.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that you came into the Chamber and took your chair. The bells started. We came in. When a certain number of members are in the House, the bells stop. You rose, you went to recognize the hon. member who was speaking at five o'clock. That member did not rise. Some voices on this side said, "vote, question, question." You rose and said "Is the House ready for the question?" There was no voice from any side of the House opposed to the question. Therefore, you rose and began to read the question, at which point the hon. member rose. Those are the rules of the House. That is what took place. You cannot roll back history. I must say that if anyone is good at working edges, rules and points of order and other games in this House, it is members on the other side and not members on this side of the House. We were here and we work within the rules.

Mr. Taylor: Look at the sneaky way you do it.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, I was not in the House.

Mr. Deans: Sit down then.

Mr. McKnight: And I agree with members on the other side, I was not in the House. But I happen to have available to me cable television. If you want to go into sport, and I do not think you want to, sir, but occasionally referees and umpires have reviewed the electronic media. I came into this House when you were standing and I saw you put the question, but heard an hon. member saying "Mr. Speaker, Mr. Speaker". I am sure that you would like to review electronic Hansard or the video of the proceedings of this House, and following that you would then arrive at a fair decision. I know that in your capacity you would not want to deny any member of this House his right to be heard on an issue that is very important to him and his constituents.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, to begin with I would like to say that I have never in my life, or in the ten years I have been a member of this place, seen a government so anxious to leave Parliament.

The only thing which causes me to believe the government wants to leave is because it has something to hide. What this government has to hide is what we have been debating all afternoon, namely the mess with respect to the uranium cartel. That is what this government has to hide.

I think I should put this day in its proper perspective.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The Chair is in great need of assistance on the point of order.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I was about to come to that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I think I can establish the point of order or what the considerations are.

The first consideration is whether or not an hon. member rose to speak before the question was put. In that regard, my impression is the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona rose only after I began to read the question.

The second question that is germane is whether or not, once having begun to read the question, the Chair ought to allow any hon. member to interrupt, whether by point of order, by way of discussion or by way of debate, or whether the question having been started makes it impossible procedurally for hon. members to intervene.

If the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton would address himself to either one of those two subjects, I would be most appreciative. I did indicate that the intervention of two or three members would be adequate to meet the point. Time is passing. At a certain point I will have to either come to a conclusion or ask the House to give me adequate time to consult. It is one or the other. I will recognize the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and possibly two or three other members. But I would ask that hon. members be brief and address themselves to one of two questions. First, the facts. I think I am accurate in saying that I believe the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona arrived after I had put the question. The second issue procedurally is whether or not once I have begun to put the question, it is feasible for hon. members to interrupt and continue the debate.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): As I understand the situation, Mr. Speaker, after you began to put the question, the hon. member rose in the midst of your putting the question—that is the first point—before there was any question then in the sense that the Chair would deal with it before the House of Commons, the complete question. If that is the case on the first point, I respectfully suggest that the Chair has indicated that the Chair was aware of an hon. member standing. With respect to continuing the debate, the Chair had an obligation to recognize the member standing. That is the first matter I want to put.

As to the merits, what is the obligation of the Chair? I do not think under any interpretation of the rules of this House, that it is the obligation of the Chair to take any action that would cut off the right of a member who wishes to speak. That is the fundamental question, that the Chair has now acknowledged in the House that the Chair knew that at least somewhere in the midst of putting the question an hon. member was trying to speak. If that is the case, it is incumbent upon the Chair to allow that member to speak.

One of the fundamental duties of the Chair is to protect the right of members to speak. It is a duty of the Chair, and that duty is covered in many ways. One is with respect to a tie vote in the House of Commons. Normally the Chair operates in respect of a tie vote to maintain the continuance of the institution. Part of that institution is the right of the member to speak.

I recall in my experience here—and I say with respect it is as long as yours—that under Mr. Speaker Lamoureux, under Mr. Speaker Jerome and under Madam Speaker Sauvé, the Speakers have been very careful, even when they were on their feet. If a member rises for some reason or other, whether it is a point of order, a question of privilege or to intervene in the debate or in any other way, the Speaker is never legalistic and never turns his or her back on a member who wants to speak. In fact, that member is given the full right to speak.

If I have not moved you with respect to that, Mr. Speaker, then I think from the point of view of the preservation of the institution of the Speakership, there ought to be time taken by the Chair to consider this very carefully and to consult with Madam Speaker and the other officers at the Table, which is done regularly, to see that there is a resolution to this.

This, just as important, does not just end the debate. This effectively ends this part of this session of Parliament. That makes it fundamentally important.

I have a great respect for the Chair. It is out of that respect for the Speakership, the Chair, the institution of the Chair, that I respectfully suggest that you, sir, that you reflect upon the enormity of the decision which you may make one way or the other and take whatever time you may need in order to consult with the officials at the table and your colleagues in the chair, particularly the Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton has put the point very well. In the first instance, while his statement does not apply to any other member of the House, he does appear to agree with the Chair that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona did in fact intervene after the question had begun to be read. As far as I know, there should not be any dispute in that regard. In any event, I do not think it is terribly important.

The more important issue seems to be, first, the one that was raised by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe who pointed out that it is the responsibility of the Chair to protect the minority. That is an obligation that I understand and accept. I do not want to go into a long dissertation on the Irish question, but we understand that the minority can become a tyranny at some point. That, too, is a question that has to be looked at.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): If hon. members disagree with my observation of history, they can form their observations of the basis of a study of British parliamentary history and the thing that is called the Irish question. I do not want to go any further on that.

What I thought was an excellent suggestion by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton was that the Chair take some time to reflect, consider, and consult. That is something to which I referred a little earlier and I think is a rather good idea. If hon. members are agreeable, I would suggest that the House be adjourned until the call of the Chair, which I suggest would be approximately at nine o'clock. The Chair will consult with the Speaker and the Table officers. May I have that indulgence on the part of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Do I need to have a vote on that or may the Chair have that courtesy?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that you have accepted the suggestion. However, just before you leave the Chair I notice that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona and the hon. member for Burlington would like to say a few words to you, sir.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair has already made the decision not to recognize several other hon. members who have stood in their places to be recognized. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona has been recognized twice or even three times tonight. Before recognizing him, I would certainly recognize other hon. members who wished to contribute to this debate. Therefore, if the House is agreed, I will adjourn the House until the call of the Chair, which will be at approximately nine o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

At 8.28 p.m. the sitting was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 9.09 p.m.

Madam Speaker: I am now prepared to rule on the incident which took place some time ago in the House and on whether an hon. member should be heard on the motion which was about to be put.

Technically speaking, I think we can say that the process of putting the question had really begun when the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) rose, but I also think hon. members will recognize that the process of debate had not been concluded, and I want to remind hon. members what constitutes the full process of debate. I refer to Erskine May, who says that the essential stages in obtaining a decision of the House are, first, the moving of a motion; second, the proposing of a question by the Chair; and third, the putting of the question and collection of voices by the Chair. That process has three stages which are very clearly defined.

The nearest precedent we could find in the very short time available to us is dated December 4, 1962, when the House had agreed to a motion. The process of debate had been completed, as hon. members will see from the precedent I will quote, and there was then a request from someone in the House to revert to the prior business of the House, a member having alleged there was too much noise and turmoil in the House and that he could not properly follow what was taking place. On that occasion the Speaker said, and I quote from Hansard for December 4, 1962, at page 2287:

> For one thing, of course the Chair will not accept any suggestion that it is moving too rapidly. The Chair is following the well established practices of this House. In fact, if the hon. member will consult with me I can tell him the practice of some of my predecessors as to at what stage they were when the words "Adopté; carried" were put; they were almost around the back of the chair. However, there is no question that the bill was called. Third reading was moved and seconded, and I called it. The Clerk gave it third reading and it was adopted and carried. The house cannot toss its business back and forth.

That too is an important principle which I would like to recall to the House. However, the difference between that particular case and the one we have before us tonight is that the question had been fully put and the House had made a decision on that question, which had been fully put.

In the case we have before us tonight the process had begun, no doubt, and I think the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) admitted that the process had begun, but if hon. members will recall what constitutes the full process, the three stages of that process, then that process had not been completed. An hon. member interrupted it seeking the floor at the time the Speaker was asking for dispensation with respect to reading the question in toto.

I quote in support of my ruling Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 63 at page 51 which says:

> When the debate on a question is closed, and the House is ready to decide thereon, the Speaker says: "Is the House ready for the question?" If it is evident that no member claims the right of speaking, the Speaker proceeds to put the question by reading the main motion, and then the amendment or amendments in their order as the case may be.

I think we have adopted the practice in this House that even if the process has commenced and an hon. member rises to ask a question or make a point or order, the Chair, when the process is not completed, has always recognized a member and allowed him to express himself.

My ruling is very much based on the right of hon. members to express themselves in the House. This is the most sacred thing the Speaker must protect, and I am sure hon. members will understand that my whole approach to this particular incident was to try to protect the right of members to express themselves, which is not only given to them for themselves, but also for their constituents who have sent them to Parliament to represent them. The key words in Beauchesne, of course, are "If it is evident that no member seeks the floor". In this case it was certainly evident that a member sought the floor since an hon. member did rise and interrupted the Speaker in a process which had begun. I quite admit that, but it was evident that a member wished to speak. Therefore, I must recognize the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I am pleased to be able to participate in this debate which, contrary to what some observers might think, is on a motion to adjourn the House until October 14, a three-month period. It is not my purpose here to say anything about the postal dispute. Our party's and leader's position was stated earlier by my colleague, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell). We sincerely wish Judge Alan Gold, whom we all respect, and the parties to the mediation every success in getting the mail moving again, which is in the greater public interest.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kilgour: There are countless other matters of real concern to Canadians which should and might be discussed in this House this summer. Some of these include the past and present federal government fiscal and monetary policy which, I believe, has caused much of our current inflation of 12.6 per cent. I remind hon. members that Chancellor Schmidt, who is visiting here today, has inflation of approximately 5.5 per cent in West Germany, or less than half of that which we have in Canada. We do not have to have 12.5 per cent inflation. We do not have to be second from the bottom on the list of OECD countries in terms of keeping inflation down.

Second, we could discuss interest rates of 20 per cent plus which, as surely as tomorrow's sunrise, sooner or later will affect adversely virtually every Canadian in this land, and none more than home owners, present or would be, and the small business community. I remind the House that the small business community creates approximately two of three jobs nowadays in our country but obviously cannot continue to do so with interest rates of 20 per cent plus.

We might discuss energy policy which, in present form, has already cost western Canadians enormously in terms of lost jobs, and it will cost Canadians in my region and in other parts of Canada more jobs in the future. The policy is also costing us in terms of oil and gas self-sufficiency in the future. I remind the House once again that oil and gas are Canadian-made products. We do not have to continue to import more and more oil from Mexico, Venezuela and the OPEC countries. We could have self-sufficiency in Canada.

We might discuss national unity. We all might discuss national unity and why the federal government of the most fortunate nation on earth and the NDP could amend their joint constitutional package just before it went to the Supreme Court of Canada to provide that voter majorities in fully three western or three Atlantic provinces are necessary to block an Ottawa-proposed constitutional amendment. At the same time, a simple majority in Ontario or Quebec is of equal weight, this despite the fact that the Federal-Provincial Relations Office of the federal government concedes that it knows of no other parliamentary democracy in the world which weights the votes of its citizens for constitutional referenda on the basis of place of residence. If this is the Liberal-NDP idea of a just society in which Canadians everywhere can feel that they are full partners in their own country, I do not think many Canadians in or outside Ontario or Quebec will buy that idea of a just society in the future.

Next we might talk about crime prevention. We have a crime conference going on this very day in Winnipeg, which I had hoped to attend on behalf of my colleagues. We might talk about why, for instance, senior citizens, as we hear from the conference, are evidently more and more afraid to leave the safety of their home out of fear of being mugged. We might talk about why violent crime is increasing. In part, because of legislation of the past decade, in part because of some—I stress some—of the government's more unsuitable appointments to various benches and to the National Parole Board.

However, Mr. Speaker, we cannot discuss everything at one time. So in the time remaining I propose to discuss the uranium issue which makes me very mad, and very sad for my country. It will be the thrust of my argument that, perhaps better than any other issue we have today, this issue shows how little this government estimates the intelligence of Canadians, and how it deserves their contempt. To put it another way, Mr. Speaker, the government shines on the issue. It shines like the eyes of a long dead fish on a moonlit beach. From a long distance in the dark, the eyes of the fish look far better than it smells close up.

Let me begin with some history of this matter. I will try to avoid the facts raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn). Most of the facts have come out despite the best efforts of this government to prevent at every turn the truth from coming out about what they have been doing this last number of years. A little history, Mr. Speaker.

In the fall of 1970, the Canadian energy minister of the day, while in Japan, said it was time for uranium producers to get tough. In late 1971 and the first eight months of 1972, conversations took place between persons in Australia, South Africa, France and between various multinational mining companies. The details as to the cartel's workings were agreed upon in February, 1972—a long time ago, Mr. Speaker. For the rest of 1972, little information was provided by the participants as to the cartel's existence. Press reports noted only there had been meetings between government officials, but nothing as to the existence of a cartel. It operated, in fact, in a concealed manner with prearranged bidding practices, quotas dividing international markets, and a secretariat concealed in the French Atomic Energy Commission.

From 1973 to 1975 there were no references made to the workings of that cartel in the general press. There were vague references in some trade journals. In the period from September 1975 to March, 1976, Westinghouse announced its inability to fulfil uranium contracts. The U.S. Department of Justice established a grand jury investigation into the uranium activities of U.S. oil companies. In the summer of 1976, a U.S. congressional subcommittee initiated an inquiry into the international uranium cartel. In August of 1976 Mary Kathleen Uranium, known as MKU, documents were leaked in Australia, and transmitted to the California Energy Commission which in turn passed them on to the U.S. Department of Justice and a Congressional investigation.

In September of 1976, the U.S. Department of Justice sought testimony and evidence from Canadian mining officials and companies. The Eldorado Nuclear president at the time, Mr. Gilchrist, gave a deposition to U.S. authorities. In September again, Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada, the government of all the Canadian people, denied the existence of a cartel. On September 22, 1976, the energy minister of the day, Alastair Gillespie, released a statement outlining the history of what he called a uranium marketing arrangement. Again, no admission of a cartel. On September 23, 1976, the cabinet, of which not a few of those sitting opposite us tonight were members then, passed an order in council entitled "Uranium Information Security Regulations", ostensibly for reasons of national sovereignty. They rejected the cover-up argument. That was the gag rule.

One month later, Westinghouse filed a $6 billion law suit against 29 uranium producers worldwide alleging an illegal cartel. In the summer of 1977, the U.S. congressional subcommittee released formerly confidential documents involving communications between Messrs. Runnalls, Austin, and Canadian uranium producers, documents marked "specially confidential", despite objections by the U.S. State Department at the request of the Canadian government. The subcommittee rejected the Canadian government's request that the documents be kept secret. Freedom of information really does exist south of the border, Mr. Speaker.

In August of 1977 our party began to mount pressure in Parliament. We felt so strongly about it that we launched a suit in the Supreme Court of Ontario challenging the validity of these gagging orders in council. The judge reserved decision. In the meantime, the government simply revised its regulations to apply only to civil servants and employees of the private sector companies. Again in September, 1977, the Supreme Court of Ontario upheld the validity of the regulations on the gag. In October of 1977, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grace-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand), one of the few people wearing a white hat, so to speak, in the whole process announced a combines act investigation. Perhaps that is why he is no longer a cabinet minister. That was widely interpreted as putting the issue out of the public spotlight, at least for the period of the investigation.

Going ahead now to late 1977 and the first six months of 1978, Westinghouse sought evidence in the United Kingdom, but the Canadian government and some cartel companies applied strong diplomatic pressure to the House of Lords, I understand, to prevent the release of cartel documents. The House of Lords rejected Westinghouse's request for information. Shortly thereafter, the United Kingdom amended a statute to prevent the extra-territorial application of U.S. anti-trust law. In May of 1978, Gulf pleaded nolo contendere and was fined $40,000 by the U.S. courts in a criminal action. From 1975 to 1978, there have been numerous legal actions in the United States with respect to the cartel, but the U.S. Justice Department had decided not to proceed with civil actions arising from its investigations due to the controversy surrounding some of its early decisions.

In early 1979, the U.S. Senate judiciary committee sought access to the information held by the U.S. Department of Justice. The Canadian government—true to form—once again opposed the release of documents, and the court ruled that confidential intergovernmental information need not be released.

Those are only some of the facts, but the more important matters of course are the public issues involved. One of these issues is respect for this country's institutions, including the administration of justice at the highest level, and more important, the issue that justice not only be done, but that justice shall be seen to be done.

We have, we are told, Mr. John Brown of Blake, Cassells in Toronto as our special prosecutor. In contrast, even president Nixon had the courage at the time to appoint an outstanding American lawyer, Archibald Cox, and give him a free mandate. He was subsequently fired, but another outstanding trial lawyer one of America's best, was then appointed, namely, Leon Jaworski. The reason the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) tells us that he appointed Mr. Brown is that Mr. Brown worked with Mr. Bertrand for four years. Why do we not go to a fresh counsel, an eminent counsel, an experienced trial counsel? There are 30,000 lawyers in this country. Why does he not go to a number of the best lawyers and say, "In order that justice be seen to be done in Canada, here is the file, here is the Bertrand report. Go out and charge whomever you like. If it is our colleague, if it is this person or that person, do it. This issue is just too important to do otherwise."

• (2130)

My colleagues who have sat on the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs know that the Minister of Justice does not have the faintest appreciation of matters such as specializing in law, the finer points of law, what sub judice means, or anything about the more substantive points of law. The Minister of Justice tells us that he wants Mr. Brown because Mr. Brown worked with Mr. Bertrand.

As a matter of fact, I appeared on a constitutional case against Mr. Brown a number of years ago in the Supreme Court of Canada. We were both junior counsel and neither of us said much. Mr. Brown may be a perfectly competent lawyer, but is he a competent special prosecutor for this case? I did not know, so I telephoned a senior trial lawyer in the city of Toronto yesterday to verify that Mr. Brown was at least a competent prosecuting counsel. The lawyer in Toronto did not even know that John Brown was a lawyer in Toronto. He has been in practice for approximately 25 years, and he has never encountered John Brown in any court, in any trial at any level, in the city of Toronto. Mr. Brown may be a good civil litigation-constitutional lawyer but if he, like the Minister of Justice, knows nothing about the finer points of criminal law, is he the best person for a case fraught with half the problems of this one? We should have a special prosecutor at whom every Canadian can look and say, "That man will do justice for all Canadians, no matter what the cost to whomever". I suggest that this is not the case here.

The lawyer in Toronto asked a junior colleague if he knew Mr. Brown. This lawyer, with five years' call, had never heard of Mr. Brown or encountered him in any courtroom in Toronto. Then I consulted with Martindale-Hubble, which the lawyers here will know lists the specialties of lawyers, and I could find no specialty with respect to Mr. Brown's practice.

In my respectful submission, this is the most difficult case which has ever arisen in Canada because it very closely involves the government of Canada. If there ever was a case to appoint someone with supreme integrity, skill and a sense of justice and fair play to represent the people of Canada, this is it. As of now, no one has any indication that John Brown is the best man to conduct the case.

But the Minister of Justice tells us that Mr. Brown worked with Mr. Bertrand for four years and therefore he will continue with Mr. Brown, whether or not Mr. Brown has ever been involved in a criminal case in his life before. One thing which makes all of us who have been full-time Crown attorneys angry is the fact that the government appoints its friends—this is generally speaking; there are exceptions—to conduct its prosecutions badly, unprofessionally, and too frequently like legal patsies.

Mr. Dion: Oh!

Mr. Kilgour: It is true. I concede that there are cases where there are first-class lawyers doing patronage legal work, but let me tell my friend opposite that there are many who do not know anything about the cases they are prosecuting. The police are embarrassed, the witnesses are embarrassed, and those who have to stand in court are embarrassed to watch them chopping up their cases. This is not a case in which to appoint anyone other than the most competent lawyer who is respected across the land. If the hon. member knows of any other more important case, I wish he would tell me.

The really vital issue here is whether anyone's head is above the law including that of a senator and possibly other politicians. About 400 years ago, Sir Edward Coke established in another country that no one is above the law; not the king, no one. At the very least, I suggest that we will hear more about this matter in the weeks to come. There will be many Canadians wondering whether one individual, at the very least, is not above the law as far as this particular prosecution at this stage is concerned, namely the former deputy minister of energy with whom I will deal in a moment.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) read from some minutes of a Moss commission meeting which took place in the office of the then deputy minister, now Senator Austin. At the time even the youngest child in the gallery tonight would have asked himself, "Why are Mr. Runnalls and Mr. McNabb named as unindicted co-conspirators, and why is not Senator Austin at least named with them as an unindicted co-conspirator?" There has been no answer to that. We are told that it is sub judice. Mr. Chrétien does not have the foggiest notion of the concept of sub judice.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest to the hon. member that it is the practice of the House to refer to hon. members of the House by their constituencies or by their functions as members of cabinet.

Mr. Kilgour: In my experience with the Minister of Justice in many meetings of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and in the House, he does not have the foggiest idea about the concept of sub judice, what it includes and does not include. I think hon. members opposite know perfectly well that I am telling the truth.

Incidentally, "unindicted co-conspirator" is a legal euphemism. Let me advise the Minister of Justice that two people did not have to be named as unindicted co-conspirators. They could just be called as Crown witnesses. Someone with a little experience in criminal law should sit down with Mr. Chrétien and explain that to him. Perhaps he could look at some of the cases on conspiracy.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Kilgour: I am sorry, the Minister of Justice—

[Translation]

Mr. Cousineau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member persists in transgressing our rules, even after having been warned. Enough is enough.

[English]

Mr. Kilgour: I have a couple of comments to make on what is conspiracy, which I think the hon. member might like to hear. Criminal conspiracy occurs when two or more people plan together for an illegal purpose. If the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) hears the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) and myself forming a common purpose to perform an illegal act, the Crown does not have to name the hon. member for Red Deer as an unindicted co-conspirator; he can be called as a witness. The law of conspiracy is fairly clear on this, and I say this for the benefit of hon. members opposite.

Another issue is the question of freedom of information. Some of the members who are present tonight are on the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. They know we have spent a lot of time discussing a freedom of information bill, but everything the government has done since 1972 has been obviously aimed at preventing freedom of speech with respect to the matter of its involvement in a cartel which it now suggests by charges was illegal within Canada.

What is the definition of hypocrisy if it is not to say one thing and do something different? For ten years until today the government has tried to conceal information about these allegedly illegal activities. At the same time, it is pretending to believe in freedom of information in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Section 429 of the Criminal Code talks about conspiracy and conspiring to do an act contrary to any statute of Canada. I remind members opposite that the provincial attorneys general enforce the Criminal Code. If members opposite really believe in justice being done, why do they not refer the Bertrand report, the Henry report, and all the other data to the relevant attorney general of the province to see whether or not he lays a charge of criminal conspiracy under the Code, if a criminal act has been committed against the consumers of Ontario? If members opposite believe in freedom of information, why do they not have the courage, the honesty and the candour to send the material along to the relevant provincial attorney general?

I remind hon. members that the attorney general of the province in which this House is located has recently instructed his Crown attorneys to reveal everything in their cases to defence counsel. Crown attorneys who are worth anything do not hide matters from defence counsel. For the most part they show them all of their cases. Why will the Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Chrétien) not follow the same rule? Why will he not be up front about this matter and show everything to everyone? What is it in the Bertrand report that can cause him grief? Everyone knows that an attorney general, a provincial attorney general, or a Crown attorney does not pull fast ones, he does not hide things; he is as open with the defence as he can possibly be. I submit, given the indicated circumstances, the Bertrand report should be made available to members of Parliament, to the defence, and to all Canadians.

The next point I wish to deal with is why only six companies are charged? You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that there is not one single flesh and blood person charged in this case. Why? Hon. members will, for example, recall the dredging scandal case in which companies and individuals were later charged as parties to the offence. Why does the same not happen in this case? I think we are entitled to ask this question. The Canadian people are entitled to know the answer to it. Is the reason they do not charge anyone that if they were to do so, they would have to charge someone whom they do not particularly wish to charge?

We are told that only six companies are to be charged. Companies are merely legal fictions. I believe one of the defendant companies is only a shell. I suggest to the House that if the government were really trying to see justice done, it would at least explain to us, as members of Parliament, why it is that only companies are being charged and not individuals.

Would the government at least let us see part of the Bertrand report if it will not let us see the entire report? During ten years as a Crown attorney I cannot recall a case in which I was involved where a company was charged and the president of that company was not also charged. What is the point in charging the company with committing a commercial fraud and not charging the president of the company if he was the actual principal in the alleged crime? Often convicted companies are fined a nominal amount of money and the president of the company who was its guiding mind in the fraud gets away with it. Is that just? Is that the way to carry out a system of criminal justice which will win the confidence of Canadians?

I think I have raised some important issues, Mr. Speaker, which show that the matter before us is very important. It is an issue which will not go away. It did not go away for a certain gentleman south of the border. You cannot conceal things in a free society for very long despite the efforts made by members opposite. The Bertrand report will come out sooner or later. It cannot be locked up forever. I put it to hon. members opposite that if and when the Bertrand report is released, it shows anything different from what we have been told on faith to accept—and we do not have much reason to accept anything on faith on this matter from members opposite—that they will rue the day. We on this side will not let this issue go.

Some members here know that my political hero is Abraham Lincoln. I have a picture of him on the wall of my office. I recently had occasion to read Carl Sandburg's biography of Lincoln. I cannot believe that if Abraham Lincoln, or anyone of nearly his stature, had been confronted with this problem, as has the government opposite, he or she would not have said that this is too important for our basic institutions. He or she would get the best man or woman as a prosecuting special counsel, or a group of counsel. I think what Abraham Lincoln, or anyone who aspires to be like him, would have said, "Go ahead. Charge me. Charge my colleagues. Charge anyone whom you think should properly be charged in this matter."

I will end on a soft note. Members opposite do not live up to my standard of what a true statesman should do on this vital matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, after hearing the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour), I am convinced Abraham Lincoln would rather be in another office than his this evening.

Why are we here when all provincial legislative assemblies have adjourned for the summer? Why are we here preventing employees, honest workers of this House, from taking their summer holiday as they had planned? Why are we here keeping hon. members on both sides of the House from enjoying their vacation with their families as they had hoped? Because a handful of ultra-Conservatives have assumed control over the opposition. And also because, since the February convention, as we know, the Leader of the Opposition is no longer really the leader but only two thirds of a leader. As a consequence, those ultra-nationalists, those untra-Conservatives, rather, force Parliament to sit here because they have accounts to square with their own leader. I submit it is unacceptable that a bunch of ultra-Conservatives should try to coerce Parliament into denying postal workers their right to negotiate, that those ultra-Conservatives should want to oblige the government to make public reports that will harm innocent citizens who have not been accused of wrongdoing in the uranium cartel case, and also do irreparable damage to the accused who, until proven guilty, must be considered innocent. Mr. Speaker, every Progressive Conservative member who rose and spoke in this House today on the uranium cartel issue has flouted the most elementary justice, the fundamental rights of anyone who is deemed innocent until proven guilty before our courts of law.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept that this situation be allowed to last any longer. Last week it was to force Parliament to legislate the postal workers back to work. I quote an article published in the newspaper Le Droit and headlined:

> The Leader of the Opposition gave in before an ultimatum from his backbenchers . . . a week ago by extending the length of the session because of the postal strike.

That is what the rednecks in his party have said. The member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) in Ontario stated that the caucus meeting was a lot more serene this week than last week because his leader, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), had to eat his words to the effect that back-to-work legislation was not necessary. A Canadian Press article by Mr. Alan Arbuckle also says:

> The member for Halton said that his leader even thanked him for having forced the Conservatives to renege on an all party agreement under which the Commons would have been on holidays since last Friday.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that we are witnessing disorder, anarchy and total chaos among the Progressive Conservatives. Their leader no longer leads them. They no longer have a leader. There is not even two thirds of a leader. There is a whole bunch of ultra-Conservatives who are prepared to hold up to ridicule the rights of the citizens, the rights of the postal workers, as well as the rights of the accused in the uranium cartel case who are now before the courts. Mr. Speaker, at the next sitting of the House, immediately before the order of the day for resuming the adjourned debate on motion No. 51 in the name of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), I will move a motion that the debate shall not be further adjourned. This notice is given pursuant to Standing Order 33.

[English]

I think it is absolutely important that we say, today—

Mr. Clark: What a coward!

Mr. Ouellet: —that the only reasons given by the opposition—

Mr. Clark: What a coward!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Coward!

Mr. Clark: Afraid of debate! Afraid of the truth!

Mr. Ouellet: —for keeping this House sitting are absolutely irresponsible, and it is trickery on the part of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: Last week the opposition pretended that it wanted this Parliament to stay on to force us to legislate back the CUPW workers of the Post Office. That was the reason given last week, to carry on the discussion.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Closure!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Closure!

Mr. Ouellet: Now that members of the opposition fully realize that they are on the wrong side, that the public has realized that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark)—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: —is playing the game of Mr. Parrot, the leader of the postal workers, that he is playing his hand, and that, in fact, the Leader of the Opposition has become the best ally of the leader of CUPW, they now rush to find another subject, to find another reason for the House to carry on. Their view of last week is now forgotten. They no longer want Parliament to sit—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What a disgrace!

Mr. Ouellet: —to deal with the postal strike. They have found another reason.

Mr. Clark: We have achieved mediation.

Mr. Ouellet: They were not happy to replace the normal and legitimate process of collective bargaining. They now want to replace the legitimate rights of justice to be carried by the courts of this land. Today, opposition members, one after the other, have risen here, irrespective of the rights of accused, arguing that there was something wrong, that these people were already condemned, and there were probably other people who should be condemned.

Mr. Andre: Like the sugar refineries, eh?

Mr. Ouellet: I want to say that it is quite clear that the opposition is completely at a loss—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: —that the leadership campaign is already on—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ouellet: —among numerous opposition members. The poor Leader of the Opposition does not know where to go. Is he going to have the support of the one third, or is he going to keep the support of the two thirds? He is moving, week after week, from one position to another position.

[Translation]

That is exactly what happened in the famous question of the debate on capital punishment to which I personally—

[English]

Mr. Shields: I just want to identify myself, Mr. Speaker, as a sitting backbencher, and I fully oppose the indecent act the minister is about to introduce.

Mr. Ouellet: There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that this hon. member belongs to the ultra-conservative wing, to those who keep this Parliament running while all the other legislators in Canada are away taking their normal summer vacations.

I want to say that in relation to the Post Office—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Very uplifting debate.

Mr. Ouellet: —the intervention of the Leader of the Opposition has been absolutely irresponsible. If, today, we still have a strike in Canada, we could thank the Leader of the Opposition. There is no doubt that as long as Parliament would be sitting, there would be no incentive on the part of the leader of the union—

Mr. Clark: We achieved mediation. We achieved mediation.

Mr. Ouellet: —to arrive at the table to negotiate a collective agreement. There is absolutely no incentive. Now that a mediator has been appointed, it is even worse. The Leader of the Opposition made a statement to the effect that he only wants to check whether or not Mr. Justice Gold would be successful. I find it absolutely unbelievable—

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Ouellet: —and irresponsible on the part of the poor Leader of the Opposition who is currently so shaken.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the Canadian public who is witnessing this shameful spectacle of the opposition which has been going on for over a week will realize the futility of their action and their intervention. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it must be recalled that the opposition has kept us in the House one extra week and not one single important piece of legislation has since been adopted. The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) used up the precious time of the House this week—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—SOUTHEAST ASIA—ABUSES OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, this week in New York City 87 countries are meeting under the auspices of the United Nations to discuss the future of one of the world's most unfortunate countries, namely, Cambodia or Kampuchea. This show of activity is in strange contrast to the lack of activity that we have found at the United Nations during those years when Pol Pot and his henchmen were running rampant, killing, it is alleged, three million of their own countrymen, which represents one third of the total population of that tragedy stricken country.

An editorial in the New York Times today summed it up very well. In part it reads:

> Vietnam's crimes in Cambodia are real, and deserve the denunciations of a special United Nations conference this week. But the accusers pass too quickly over the crimes of Pol Pot, whose regime may have caused the deaths of three million Cambodians. He is "our" monster in this propaganda battle and his representative speaks for Cambodia at the U.N., thanks to an unholy understanding between the United States and China.

My purpose in rising tonight is to ask our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) whether we will be part of that unholy understanding which affects so tragically the people of Cambodia. Last autumn I asked the minister why Canada saw fit during the last session of the United Nations last autumn to vote for the seating of the Pol Pot regime at the United Nations. The minister's answer did not satisfy me and I asked for an opportunity to discuss the matter further. Prefacing that question, I referred to a motion which had been put in the House approximately three years ago which reads:

[Translation]

—when the House of Commons agreed unanimously to the following motion:

> —[that] all members of the Canadian parliament express their horror of that genocide, which is one of the worst crimes in the history of mankind, and ask all parliamentarians, and governments which maintain relations with our country to protest against that slaughter which has astounded the entire world.

[English]

That motion unanimously supported by this House, was presented by the present Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) when he was still a private member of this House.

[Translation]

In September of that year, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Jamieson, demanded at a meeting of the General Assembly of the United Nations in New York that the UN give particular consideration to the conditions in Democratic Kampuchea where murderous, brutal and massive repression was occurring and where human rights were being ignored. How can the Canadian government justify such a reversal? This is what I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The government submits that the vote in support of granting a seat in the United Nations to the Pol Pot faction is the lesser of two evils and that this in no ways indicates that Canada approves or supports the Pol Pot regime. In that case, what does this vote mean? On the one hand, it means that we have forgotten what all the countries which made up the United Nations shortly after its establishment had sworn never to forget, namely the horrors revealed by the skeletal survivors of Hitler's camps.

[English]

I see that my time is running out, but I have more to say. There have been a number of tragedies with regard to our treatment of Vietnam. We have made mistakes and we are continuing to make mistakes. I cannot believe that Vietnam is not ready to come to some sort of accommodation on Cambodia. She is prepared to come to terms with her neighbours. The present course recommended to Canada by Vietnam's southeast Asian neighbours will inevitably fail. It will make Vietnam even more dangerous. Most important of all, it will prolong indefinitely the human tragedy in Cambodia.

● (2205)

If anyone at the United Nations should speak for the tortured and dispossessed Cambodians, Canada with its image of a protector of the underdog should. It is obscene to have gone along once again with the Vietnam bashing that seems to have become the habit over the last 15 years by our friends south of the border. That elusive Vietnam victory has caused innumerable tortures for the Cambodian people. I would suggest to the minister tonight, in the name of human decency, that the next time the UN considers the matter, Canada remain neutral, that we do not cast our vote in such a way as to take sides. The southeast Asian situation is one we should keep clear of unless we are there on behalf of a humane, decent solution that will benefit the people of Cambodia.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, Canada has supported the seating of democratic Kampuchea in the United Nations General Assembly, because to have done otherwise would have lent legitimacy to the invasion and occupation of Kampuchea by the armed forces of a neighbouring country. This action does not imply Canadian government approval for the Democratic Kampuchean regime of Pol Pot or Canadian acquiescence in the abhorrent human rights abuses perpetrated by that regime during its tenure in power. In 1978, Canada played a leading role in denouncing the deplorable human rights record of Democratic Kampuchea. This was done by a submission to the UN Commission on Human Rights and by subsequent statements in the UN General Assembly.

The unseating of the Democratic Kampuchean regime in the United Nations might have been interpreted as a move towards the legitimization of aggression and the use of force by one nation to overthrow the government of another. This is why Canada along with a majority in the United Nations General Assembly last autumn voted for the continued seating of Democratic Kampuchea, much as we dislike what that regime did when it was the undisputed government in Kampuchea. It has been made clear that Canada would not be involved in any effort to restore the Pol Pot government to power.

Current efforts to seek a peaceful solution to this situation in Kampuchea are centred on the International Conference currently taking place in accordance with the United Nations General Assembly resolution of last autumn. Vietnam and U.S.S.R. are not attending the conference. In the circumstances, it is recognized that the conference will not be able to provide definitive solutions to the problems in Kampuchea.

Canada believes that the proposals presented to the conference, which include a cease fire agreement among the conflicting parties, the creation of a United Nations peacekeeping force, the supervised withdrawal of foreign troops from Kampuchea, and the holding of United Nations supervised free elections, are sound proposals which could offer the necessary guarantees for the parties involved. Canada is prepared to give serious consideration to these proposals but recognizes that they may need amendment or adjustment. They are, however, a first step in the right direction. It is also hoped that the conference will establish a framework for continuing discussions, which will, hopefully, in time, as the situation evolves, lead to genuine negotiations by the parties directly involved in the situation in Kampuchea.

ENERGY—FUTURE OF ALSANDS PROJECT AT FORT McMURRAY, ALBERTA (A) POSSIBLE COMMERCIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH OIL COMPANIES

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to question a reply given to me in response to a question I asked on July 13. I asked specifically if he was working on a commercial agreement with the companies currently contemplating development in the tar sands in northeastern Alberta, particularly Imperial Oil and the Alsands consortium. The minister replied:

> As far as the question of arriving at a satisfactory commercial arrangement is concerned, this is what we are negotiating with the government of Alberta at the present time.

Nothing could be more blatantly false than that statement. I must point out that a commercial arrangement must be made with the participating companies. Those companies are willing to invest at this point $12 billion in each of two separate plants, but they first must know what they will get for their production, what the taxing regime will be and what the royalty structure will be so that they can do an ordinary cash flow study and determine whether they will get a rate of return on this massive investment of $12 billion per plant in order to make it economically viable.

Both the Alsands consortium in Fort McMurray and Imperial Oil with respect to the project at Cold Lake have clearly indicated to this government and to the government of Alberta that they must have a rate of return of 20 per cent on a discounted cash flow basis because in the case of Imperial Oil it is investing nearly its total net worth in this project. It is asking for a rate of return which will compensate it for this massive investment.

We all know now that the Cold Lake project has been suspended. Imperial has suspended it, primarily because of the Liberal energy policy and its Canadianization factor which were brought in in October.

Since 1963 Imperial has been working on the technology for in situ production. Imperial wants to retain 50 per cent ownership in the project, but under the present National Energy Policy it is not able to do that. Imperial's rate of return is in the neighbourhood of 8 per cent on a discounted cash flow basis, and Imperial is saying clearly that it cannot continue on that basis. Therefore, it is postponing the project. If Imperial postpones the project, it has to get rid of its technicians. It must reassign them to other jobs, and that process is going on right now. In fact, Imperial Oil is attempting to reassign all its people before September 1 because they are married men with families in most cases, and their children have to be in school by September 1.

Once this group of key people is dispersed literally throughout the world to Imperial Oil projects elsewhere, it will take at least two years to reassemble a team, get a new contract and go through the bidding process again. We have lost at least 140,000 barrels a day for two years. That is a direct attack on the balance of payments of this country of somewhere in the neighbourhood, in today's dollars and at today's prices of $4 billion.

There is something much more drastic than that. All the components of the Imperial Oil plant about which we are talking are brand new. The technology is a radical departure from the technology already known in northeastern Alberta, and that is open pit mining. Most of the tar sands and the oil sands in northeastern Alberta are under too much overburden and oil must be removed in another way. The in situ process has been developed by Imperial Oil since 1963. This technology makes Canada the leader in the world with respect to the in situ process for the removal of oil from tar sands and oil sands. We are the leader of the world in this technology. Venezuela has tar sands. The United States has tar sands. There are tar sands literally in all the oil producing countries of the world, and we are the leaders in this technology. We have 200 years of domestic supply locked in the oil sands. We have technology which is saleable around the world, and we are letting this plant die. I find it incomprehensible that this government would allow that. This is the first plant of its kind in the world. There is a gamble which goes along with it, a gamble of $12 billion, which in two years will increase to at least $15 billion to $18 billion. It appears that the government has put its eggs in another basket. It is saying, "We will not develop the tar sands; we will go with the offshore and with the Canada lands". The Liberal energy policy of last October clearly has scrapped all activity in the western basin and in the tar sands and moved it out into the Beaufort Sea, to the Hibernia field off Newfoundland and to the offshore.

I think, Mr. Speaker, the government should clearly rethink its energy policy because they are gambling with the very security of our country. Every other nation in the western world has made a secure supply of oil a priority. We are the only country, by allowing the Imperial Oil tar sands plant to fold, to say, "no; control is our primary objective, not security of supply".

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, on several occasions in the past when the hon. member has raised the question of the future of those oil sands operations now in the developmental stage, it has been pointed out to him the federal government was fully prepared to see these projects go ahead last year. Unfortunately, the Alberta government refused to negotiate an arrangement that would permit them to proceed independent of a settlement on other issues. What the federal government wanted was to have an agreement on pricing and related matters which would meet the needs of these projects, but this was something that the Alberta government was unfortunately not prepared to negotiate. We are nevertheless working as expeditiously as possible with Alberta to get an agreement which, among other things, would permit these important projects to proceed in the national interest and with full regional benefits as well.

The hon. member has raised his question specifically in relation to the Alsands project. As he must know, the participants in the Alsands consortium are meeting in the near future to make plans for the project for the coming months. I do not propose to try to forecast the result of their upcoming deliberations but the sponsors have given much indication in the past that they are serious about the project and would like to see it proceed as soon as possible.

With reference to the Alsands consortium, we are pleased to note the favourable evolution of this project towards a greater degree of Canadianization. The fact is that an analysis made only a short while ago would have put the Canadian Ownership Rate, COR, at 32 per cent. Today, the COR is approaching the 50 per cent level. The recent new memberships represented by Husky and Dome constitute an expression of confidence in the project on the part of the private sector.

Regarding the question of commercial arrangements being negotiated, this is part of the federal-provincial negotiations which are proceeding expeditiously. From a commercial point of view, the impact of the federal tax system on a present value basis is essentially neutral, after taking into full account the petroleum and gas revenue tax. The availability of grants to member companies of the consortium under terms of the petroleum incentives program is a major plus for this project. On the other hand, Alberta would take considerable amounts out of the project through its present royalty system.

The project will have the advantage of a made-in-Canada price designed to take into consideration the various cost circumstances associated with its development and production. We want to see this project proceed, but not in terms dictated by companies controlled from outside Canada. We want to see it proceed in a way that will provide maximum benefits to Albertans and to all other Canadians, and make a good contribution to the security of supply objective of the NEP.

Mr. Shields: Don't you get tired of that garbage?

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—QUERY RESPECTING INITIAL WHEAT PRICES FOR NEW CROP YEAR

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael), who is here to answer my question this evening, will pay more attention and give a reply with a little more enthusiasm than we just had from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren).

I rise, Mr. Speaker, on the important question of initial payments to wheat producers in western Canada who fall under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. I asked a question in the House last Monday. As I am sure the parliamentary secretary will recall, I asked the minister at that time to confirm or deny that the price for Canadian red spring wheat would be $4.75 per bushel and that for durum it would be $4.75 per bushel. The minister declined to answer the question.

● (2220)

The announcement made yesterday by the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board in the Senate indicated that those prices were correct. In the case of durum, it is a reduction of $1.75 per bushel. It is down to $4.75 from the $6.50 which was the initial adjusted price wheat producers received in the 1980-81 crop year. This means that 27 per cent has been taken out of the pockets of the producers of western Canada in the case of durum. In the case of red spring wheat, 60 cents per bushel has been removed. We must look at all this in the context of rising costs, rising energy costs and rising interest costs because of the high interest rate policy of the government.

The reason that this offends those of us who are from wheat producing areas of the country under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board, every farm organization, hon. members of this party and hon. members of the New Democratic Party, is that early on they had called for the government to continue the policy established in 1971 and to make the announcement for initial payments prior to seeding. This would have enabled the producers and farmers in western Canada to have a very important management tool in order to make decisions on what they would plan or on what they would grow in the spring, because they would have an indication of the pricing.

The senator in the other place, the assistant to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), spoke in the Standing Committee on Agriculture. As reported at page 26:11, I asked the minister the following:

> If the farmers are going to be denied this management tool, they cannot dig up their crop in July, they cannot change their summer-fallow acreage, they cannot change their stubble acreage, they cannot change their crop in July; they have been deprived of something that is very important in managing their farms and their farm income. If that is the definition of orderly production or orderly marketing, I strongly disagree with it.

Senator Argue said:

> Mr. Chairman, I would be happy to respond to that question. My own judgment is that in the recommendations that I have made, namely for an increase in acreage for wheat of some 10 per cent for spring wheat, . . . an increase in acreage for barley of some 10 per cent—

By the way, barley was reduced by 15 cents per bushel from the initially adjusted payment in the next crop year. He indicated that these increases and the maintenance of the acreage in durum were strong indications to the producers of western Canada that the market will be there and the price will continue.

It appears from that statement and the reduction in the initial payments about which we heard yesterday that the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board deliberately deceived the producers of western Canada. He told them to increase their supplies and acreages. That was a signal that we would have strong prices. Then he turned around and took $1.75 per bushel off durum, 60 cents per bushel off spring wheat, and 15 cents per bushel off barley.

This is something the producers will remember, but of course in this instance they cannot take out their revenge on the Senator. The senator is not an elected member. The senator is ensconced safely in the other place and does not have to face the wrath of the farmers and wheat producers in western Canada.

One of the reasons we were given is that the price has gone down. We all have some respect for the Soviet Union in the way that they market and purchase products. Let us suppose that Russia goes around and buys grain from Canada, Australia, Argentina and some countries of the European Economic Community at a lower price, and let us suppose that it does not buy from the United States. Why? Because the minute it makes a large purchase from the United States, it is reflected on the Chicago market, which is what our Canadian Wheat Board uses to price its grain. An increase in the price of grain would follow. I think we can build a scenario that this will probably happen. In the meantime, the wheat producers of western Canada are paying 21 per cent and 22 per cent interest because of the high interest rate policy of this government. The government and the minister do not have the desire or, indeed, the inclination to put any faith in the ability of obtaining a great price for wheat from western Canada. It should be expected that the Government of Canada and the taxpayers of Canada should take some risk in underwriting initial payments, since the producers of western Canada, when the two-price system was in effect in the domestic market, were subsidizing consumers up to $100 million a day.

● (2225)

There is no way that this government is taking any steps to increase sales, unless I misunderstand the situation. If I do, I hope the parliamentary secretary will tell me differently. This year sales will have to be increased by 25 per cent. We had record sales last year and we will probably reach close to the same level this year. This 25 per cent increase in one year will be necessary so that the wheat producers can maintain their incomes because the price of grain has been lowered that much. I hope the parliamentary secretary will tell me what steps this government is taking to move an additional 20 per cent or 25 per cent so that the farmers will have the same income they had last year.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, when making comparisons of initial payment levels, it is important that we compare equivalent levels. The initial payments announced yesterday by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board have been compared to both the levels established in July, 1980 and the adjusted levels of last February.

The hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) is attempting to aggravate the situation by comparing only with the revised adjusted prices of last February. I suggest that the only fair comparison is with last July's levels. On that basis, the new initial prices are the same as, or in most cases higher than, they were last year except for durum. In announcing the new prices, the minister stated that if international prices strengthen in the next six months, as they did within the last year, he will certainly consider adjusting the initial prices as he did this year. The initial payment is contingent upon market forecasts, estimated crop yields and sales trends.

The hon. member knows, probably better than most of his colleagues, what the initial price system is designed to do. As some would have us believe, it is not designed to guarantee that a producer's income exceeds his income of the previous year. There are other programs which provide income stability, such as the western grain stabilization program and crop insurance. The initial price system does, however, provide security in the sense that a farmer is guaranteed a minimum price for the current year. But that minimum must reflect the fluctuations in international prices. This year durum is a case in point. Durum is traditionally volatile, and its present soft international price is necessarily reflected in the initial payment levels announced.

The hon. member can be assured that the realistic and responsible initial prices just announced provide producers with the best return on delivery of grain that is possible at present.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

At 10.29 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

CONDEMNATION OF POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, whereas the consumer price index for June was 12.8 per cent higher than one year ago, which is the highest rate of increase in 33 years, and whereas the government for the first time in history has invoked closure to shut down Parliament in order to divert the attention of Canadians to the glories of international summitry and away from the government's appalling economic failures, national divisiveness, and cartel scandal at home, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That this House condemns the government for pretending international triumph when in fact it has produced tragedy in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VISIT OF WEST GERMAN CHANCELLOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, previously visiting heads of governments of Canada's closest allies have been invited to address joint sessions of Parliament. Canada has a close political, cultural and economic relationship with the Federal Republic of Germany, one of our NATO partners. In not inviting the head of West Germany, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, to address Parliament the government has slighted our esteemed guest, the people of West Germany, and the Parliament of Canada. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House protests the decision of the government not to have our reliable friend, Chancellor Schmidt, address Parliament during his current state visit to Canada, and that this House extends its heartfelt welcome to the head of the government of one of our closest allies.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROTEST AGAINST INTENTION TO INVOKE CLOSURE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, there are times when I realize more than ever how valuable I feel this institution is, and I must say that I deplore it when anything is done which does damage to it. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House calls on the government to show respect for Parliament by withdrawing its announced intention to invoke closure under Standing Order 33 on the adjournment motion now before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TOURISM

CALL FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, in light of the fact that the tourist season in the country is in the midst of its peak period, and because of the potential of the tourist industry to assist in generating extra income for all sectors of the economy, and because thousands of tourist operators are experiencing severe financial hardship due to excessively high interest rates in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism take immediate action on behalf of the people he represents, and establish a program of financial assistance to aid tourist operators now when they need help and not after many have gone bankrupt or deeply into debt.

VIA RAIL

REQUEST FOR REVIEW BY CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, whereas proposals to reduce VIA Rail passenger service are before cabinet and a unilateral decision without public input could result in the cancellation of the Atlantic Limited, the only passenger train which serves New Brunswick's three largest cities and all of southwestern New Brunswick, and whereas the government appears to be prematurely reversing the 1979 CTC decision taken after extensive public consultation and remarkable progress by VIA on the shortest and most widely used route between Halifax and Montreal, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That the government be directed to refer the whole matter of VIA Rail service, CN and CP charges to VIA, and the question of the VIA corporate structure to the CTC for public input.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

QUOTA ASSIGNED TO BARLEY PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to the barley growers of western Canada who now find that their select barley has been rejected, and find themselves unable to deliver it because of the arbitrary April 30 deadline for quota re-assignment of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that there is presently a 100 bushel per acre quota on barley, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the Canadian Wheat Board allow those producers to re-assign immediately their select barley acres or move to an open quota on barley, which would make re-assignment unnecessary and allow those producers to fill the Canadian Wheat Board's need for barley that is indicated by the present high quota.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Al MacBain (Niagara Falls): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has drawn attention to the ongoing service of Priority Post during the postal strike, this service, along with many private couriers, has been picketed by striking postal workers. In view of this further example of interference in the postal strike by the Conservative party, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex (Mr. Bloomfield):

That this House pass the adjournment motion so that the new postal mediator, Judge Gold, is not sabotaged by the Leader of the Opposition in his attempts to end the postal strike.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VIA RAIL

SERVICE PROVIDED BY THE ATLANTIC LIMITED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, the Atlantic Limited is the most highly used train linking Atlantic Canada to the rest of the nation. Its use has increased significantly since VIA's inception of the service. Today, on checking availability of space, I have been informed that the train is sold out. This train of some 15 cars is usually sold out. I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That, as it is the stated intention of the government to eliminate poor ridership routes, and as it is obvious that the Atlantic Limited does not fit this criteria with passenger miles continually increasing as well as revenues, the Minister of Transport assures the tens of thousands of people who use this train annually that they will not have this vital transportation link discontinued.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMERGENCY MEASURES

PROVISIONS OF CABINET ORDER IN COUNCIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the government recently introduced by order in council sweeping measures which give the cabinet broad powers to direct arbitrarily and manage all aspects of Canadian life, and whereas this was done without the knowledge, assent or consideration of Parliament, and whereas there are serious dangers inherent in this arbitrary assumption of powers in the event of vaguely defined emergencies, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House opposes the imposition of order in council 1981-1305 giving the Solicitor General the responsibility to establish civilian internment camps, and directs government to bring the emergency planning order before this House in a bill which can be debated by the people's representatives instead of imposing these measures in secrecy behind cabinet's closed doors.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

DEMAND THAT NEW BUDGET BE PREPARED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The budget of the government is in a shambles. The cost of living has gone up 38 per cent since this government took over. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That this House demands that the Government of Canada prepare a new budget which will propose an anti-inflation policy to protect consumers from the double whammy of inflation and high interest rates.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE PRIME MINISTER

MOTIONS UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Trudeau government, at great expense—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. McMillan: —to the Canadian taxpayer, has provided the national and world media with a slick package of briefing material for the forthcoming Ottawa Summit. Included in this material is a backgrounder on the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in which he allows himself to be described as possessing "a keen, biting intellect", as a leader with world prestige, and as one who places party and country ahead of his personal desire to resign from the leadership of his party. For the sake of completeness, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

That the House calls upon the government to add to the backgrounder that the same man now has the distinction of being the first Canadian Prime Minister ever to invoke closure to close down Parliament to muzzle opposition criticism of his government's economic incompetence and cover up the uranium cartel scandal.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas Prime Minister Trudeau—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Taylor: —has become a great dictator with his clones carrying out his every wish—closure again—with this the first time in Canadian history that a Parliament has been adjourned in order to give the Liberals a holiday; and with the laying on of the Prime Minister's hands on Jim Coutts with instructions for Coutts to be named the Liberal candidate, etc., etc., I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell):

That this House deplores the actions of this dictatorial Prime Minister and his majority government who are betraying the people of Canada, particularly the Canadians who died in foreign lands fighting against dictatorship.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN RATE OF INFLATION

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question, in the absence of the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Louder!

Mr. McGrath: —is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. At a time when Parliament is being shamefully gagged by this government, we now face the highest increase in the rate of inflation since the immediate postwar period. It stands today at 12.8 per cent. That represents an increase of 38 per cent since this government took office.

My question to the Minister of Finance, or the Acting Prime Minister is: since we are about to close Parliament by the invocation of closure, can he tell this House and can he tell the Canadians what relief they can expect to get during the months ahead, when Parliament will not be sitting, from these rising prices in food, cost of living, high interest rates—the whole critical factor?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, we are sorry that the figure is that high, but the hon. member is asking what we expect as relief in the next few weeks and months. Of course the increase in the month of June had been principally caused, in the case of food, because of fresh vegetables and all these items which, beginning in July and August, will not be imported to Canada any more. We will have the benefit of the produce being produced in Canada. Therefore, in terms of fresh fruits and vegetables, the prices are likely to decrease during the summer months, so that will help.

The second aspect of the increase in the price index was caused by the rapid increase in the price of energy. Of course I think that at least we will not be following the advice of the opposition party—to increase energy prices rapidly to the world level—because otherwise the increase on that factor would be even worse.

Some hon. Members: Higher, higher!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Tell us about the cartel.

Mr. Clark: That is a lie. That is a lie.

Mr. Chrétien: So there will be no more increase.

Mr. Clark: You are a liar.

Mr. Chrétien: There were some in the spring, due to special circumstances, which will not be there in the summer.

MEASURES TO ASSIST LOW-INCOME GROUPS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Increases in the price of produce have gone up by 37.6 per cent over June of last year. The Acting Prime Minister cannot blame that on the farmers. There is only one culprit, and that is his government, and he knows it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: We now have the worst rate of inflation, with the exception of Italy, of any of the seven western industrialized countries which are meeting in Ottawa. There may be a problem at the Summit, but there is a crisis in this country. I believe that the low income earners, the unemployed of this country, and the old age pensioners have a right to expect some relief from the policies of this government.

I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister, in his capacity as Minister of State for Social Development, given the fact that the government's only response to date has been a $30 increase in the GIS, what relief can the poor, the unemployed and the old age pensioners of this country expect in the next three months when this Parliament will not be sitting?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I think I said earlier that, on the contrary, I am not blaming the farmers. I said that the farmers of Canada will be helping us, because we will have their fresh fruits and vegetables to eat, come July and August. Therefore, the farmers will be helping us, not hurting us. I do not blame the farmers. I said that, unfortunately, the prices of imported food increased very rapidly in the month of June, and we had to face that problem; but because of the Canadian farmers the problem will not be the same in July and August, because we will benefit from the work of our farmers. Therefore, the hon. member was wrong when he made that accusation.

The opposition is asking the government to spend even more money at this time, but it is the same group of people who complain because the deficit is too high. The hon. member is asking us to add to the many increases that we have put into the social programs over the last 18 months. In many instances it was to re-establish some payments which had been cut off by the hon. member's party when it was in power.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

QUERY RESPECTING USE OF CLOSURE

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): The minister makes a very unattractive Marie Antoinette because what he is saying to the people out there is that during the month of June he let them eat cake because they were faced with high produce prices.

• (1120)

I should like to put my next question to the Minister of Finance, or the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Minister of State for Social Development. Since this government took power the misery index that comprises the unemployment rate, the interest rate and the inflation rate, has gone up by a whopping 250 per cent. That represents misery. I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister, since the government has now taken the responsibility of invoking closure to close down this Parliament in the face of this crisis in the country, what measures we can expect—

An hon. Member: Joe is in trouble.

Mr. McGrath: No, my friend. You are in trouble and your leader, and you know it.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The question, please.

Mr. McGrath: I apologize, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Chénier: Ask the question.

Mr. McGrath: Groucho Marx always seems to speak from his seat.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Order. We will have the question right away, or we will not have it.

Mr. McGrath: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Surely, Madam Speaker, we are entitled to expect some indication from the government, since their monetary policies are not working, since they gave an undertaking that they would not—

Madam Speaker: Order. Order, please. The hon. member will ask the question immediately. One sentence, leading to a question, with a question mark—that is a question. He has had several preambles and I cannot be more patient with him.

Mr. McGrath: Does the Acting Prime Minister shamefully intend to adjourn this Parliament by closure, without doing anything about inflation in this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member in the first place that the unemployment rate in Canada is the lowest in five years and is therefore less than the rate that prevailed when he was a minister in the previous government. Secondly, when the Progressive Conservatives were in power economic growth was at an absolute standstill in our system. Since our return to power we have managed to increase the economic growth in Canada. Unfortunately, there is an aspect which we deeply deplore, and that is more inflation than we had anticipated. That is why the Minister of Finance is determined not to allow the government deficit to increase at the present time, which would only make inflation much worse. It is a situation we are now trying to deal with as quickly as possible, and this is no easy task, but I think that of the three factors I have mentioned, two of them are most significant. We have the lowest unemployment rate in five years. We are now in a period of economic growth, and I think that the policies of the Minister of Finance will succeed in the medium term in checking inflation.

[English]

CIRCUMSTANCES OF LOW INCOME SINGLE PARENT

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I want to direct my question to the Acting Minister of Finance. I would say to him, or to her, that the government is doing nothing while Canadians out there are hurting. I want to ask the Acting Minister of Finance about the case of a single parent, a mother, with three children, who is working but cannot quite make ends meet. This mother is without her family allowance cheque this month.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Miss MacDonald: Yet she has to go to the supermarket today. She has to go to the supermarket and she does not have her family allowance cheque. She finds that the price of vegetables is up by more than one third, and the price of dairy products is up by 15 per cent. Since the Minister of Finance said that he would not fight inflation on the backs of the poor, which is what he is doing, I would ask the acting minister what effort he is going to make on behalf of this single mother who may have to cut back on dairy products and fresh vegetables for her children, because of the government's lack of action?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, it is always very moving to single out an exceptional case and then try to appeal to emotions. If one wants the people to understand the policies and fully appreciate the current situation of the country, one should refrain from resorting to lowly demagoguery and make an effort to appeal to reason instead.

The hon. member said that the Minister of Finance has shown no compassion for the most underprivileged people in our society. I might remind the hon. member that when the budget was announced last September, her leader, herself and other members of her party were saying how imperative it was to maintain the indexation of the income tax schedules so as to shelter low income earners from inflation. The Minister of Finance did just that and therefore the people to whom the hon. member has referred ended up with $1.6 billion more in their pocket so as to be able to cope with soaring prices.

I should like to add as well that, when consultations were being held about the budget, we received many representations to the effect that certain social measures no longer be indexed. Indexation has been maintained for old age benefits, family allowances and all social assistance payments made by the government so that the most underprivileged Canadians were cushioned against the impact of rising prices.

• (1125)

GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS TO FIGHT INFLATION

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, obviously the minister does not care about those many Canadians who have to cut back on dairy products and fresh vegetables for their children. He mentioned the Minister of Finance. In May the Minister of Finance boasted that the rate of growth in the CPI had slowed down from 1.3 per cent to 0.7 per cent that month. Referring to the slowdown, as reported in Hansard at page 9631 he went on to say the following:

If that trend continues for the rest of the year, certainly it would register an appreciable drop in the over-all inflation rate.

That trend has not continued nor has there been an appreciable drop in the rate of inflation. Therefore what plans, projects or programs does the minister have in mind to take into consideration a situation that he did not foresee just two months ago?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They have nothing, and that is why they are running from Parliament.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): To answer that question, Madam Speaker, I think we must go further than a review of the current figures which represent the increases between June 1, 1980, and June 1, 1981, and analyse them. As the Acting Prime Minister said a moment ago, roughly 34 per cent of that increase is due to the higher costs of energy, fruits and fresh produce. As the Minister of Justice pointed out earlier, thanks to the efficiency of agricultural producers and, of course, to the current season, deliveries of fresh fruit produced in Canada will appreciably lower the price of such foodstuffs so that the people about whom the hon. member expressed concern will find it easier to buy them at more moderate prices. If we want to follow a policy under which Canadians will be increasingly relieved, we must continue to support the gradualist approach of the Minister of Finance as well as the policy adopted by the government with respect to energy prices.

[English]

GOVERNMENT'S CONSIDERATION OF ALTERNATIVE MEASURES

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, a very interesting motion was moved earlier under the provisions of Standing Order 43 about sabotage. The only sabotage going on here is that of the incomes of low and middle-income Canadians by the government.

My question is for the Minister of State for Finance, and I am hoping for an answer to it today.

Mr. Clark: You won't get one.

Mr. Skelly: The CPI is up, the bank rate is to be sustained for many months to come, and as a result all of us will be facing many hardships. The minister falls back continually on the fact that we gave $35 to an already inadequate pension base and that we have indexed pensions. That is not an acceptable answer.

What consideration has the government given to alternatives that we might produce if we stayed on a little longer? What consideration has the government given to tax reform legislation, a cost of living tax credit, the setting up of a fair prices commission, and a reduction or an offsetting of interest rates? What other alternatives does the government have that may help Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the kind of measures mentioned by the hon. member are, of course, of a fiscal nature and are normally announced in a budget. Since the Minister of Finance has indicated that there will be a budget in the Fall, various measures are now being considered by the Department of Finance to cope with the economic situation. However, I would like to remind the hon. member that measures have already been taken and implemented, such as the Small Business Development Bond, which will be of great benefit in the present situation of high interest rates and which will greatly help the small business sector. There are also many other measures. The hon. member could refer to the last budget to see what has been done.

BANKS AND BANKING

PROFITS OF CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, these measures have been very helpful to the banks. So has the government's interest rate program. Its energy policy has been very helpful to the oil companies. The only segment the government has not been helpful toward is low and middle-income Canadians and pensioners. The minister mentioned that food prices are going up. Possibly he can tell us how farmers will be able to produce lower-priced food when energy prices and interest rates are going up? We are not going to see reduction in the cost of living.

There were questions about bank profits. What is the government doing to prevent the windfall of bank profits that is occurring under the interest rate program? Is the government considering using that money as a possible offset against high interest rates, and attempting to ameliorate the cost of living?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They are trying to run away from Parliament, that is what they are doing.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, in his preamble the hon. member has referred to the lack of concern of the government for certain groups of people. In a previous answer I indicated that the basic concern of the government is precisely for those members of our society who need assistance the most, such as the senior citizens. The hon. member says that the increase in the guaranteed income supplement has been minimal, but it still amounted to $420 a year, plus the various increases provided by indexation. The child tax credit this year has reached about $238 per child. These are substantial amounts which apply to the neediest and the most disadvantaged in our society.

The hon. member would like the government to panic and implement such programs haphazardly whenever there are worrying signs in the economy. I must say that this is not how this government intends to manage the Canadian economy, because we want to take medium and long-term action which will bring back stability and not cause any upheaval in our economy.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

GROWTH IN CONCENTRATION OF CONTROL AND OWNERSHIP OF COMPANIES

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, the only panic in this House is indicated by the minister's tone of voice and by his lack of an answer. Maybe I can shift to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs because there does not seem to be much coming from the other direction. If that is care, I would hate to see contempt.

One factor, especially in food prices, is the degree of corporate concentration in this country and what appears to be absolute control over prices, with no competition. The taking over of Dominion Stores by Provigo is an example of concentration in the food industry. It is the same situation whether it is fish on the west coast or food in Ontario. Will the minister indicate what his department is doing to see that prices and the consumer price index are being held in line and that Canadian consumers are not being gouged by the government's failure to act positively for years on the degree of corporation concentration in this country?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the issue of corporate concentration in the food industry in Canada is of course a source of concern for the officials of my department and for government as a whole. That is why we have indicated our desire to introduce legislation in the new session to amend the competition Act and specifically to restrict take-over operations in Canada.

COMBINES

URANIUM CARTEL—MINUTES OF MEETING HELD IN 1972

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. It has to do with the desperate attempt by the government to cover up any evidence of possible ministerial involvement in an illegal cartel. We learned yesterday that not only is the Bertrand report to be hidden from Parliament, but also the Henry report. Now the government wants to throw members of Parliament out of the House of Commons so that we cannot continue to ask questions about the possible illegal activity of ministers of the Crown.

My questions have to do with what the government knew in 1972. I would like the Minister of Justice to confirm the accuracy of the uranium cartel minutes of a meeting held April 10, 1972, in the boardroom of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources at which was present Mr. Jack Austin, then deputy minister of energy, subsequently principal secretary to the Prime Minister and now, for his pains, a senator, in which Senator Austin is quoted in the minutes as affirming that the uranium cartel "could later become illegal if orders have to be declined by Canadian producers as a result of the arrangement". Will the minister confirm that Senator Austin gave that advice in 1972, and confirm that the advice which Senator Austin gave in 1972 was correct?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has again spoken about illegality. Some years ago this government asked Mr. Bertrand to look at the possible illegality of a cartel operating in Canada. He took four years to complete that inquiry. He hired some outside lawyers on his own to look at all the files and to make recommendations. They looked at thousands of documents and listened to hundreds of witnesses. Mr. Bertrand and his lawyers looked at all aspects of the legality of the situation and made recommendations to the Attorney General of Canada that six companies should be prosecuted.

I received a report from them which I have accepted. I accepted that recommendation, and I am prosecuting the six companies that had been recommended to be prosecuted. I repeat, I have received a report. I hired the same lawyers who advised Mr. Bertrand, to advise me. They gave me that same advice which they gave Mr. Bertrand, and I followed that advice. All those who, according to the four year inquiry, supposedly committed illegalities, are being prosecuted. There is nothing that I can add now that the matter is before the courts.

POSITION OF CABINET IN 1972

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the minister once again refuses to answer the question. That indicates why he wants to throw members of Parliament out of the House of Commons. We ask questions which he is afraid to answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Since he refuses to answer, we must assume that the quote attributed to Mr. Austin was correct, that Mr. Austin knew, that the ministers knew, that the government knew in 1972 that this would be an illegal act. We must assume that. Let me ask another question about the same minutes of that meeting in 1972 in the boardroom of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, a meeting of the cartel.

Mr. Austin, according to the minutes, stressed that the cabinet was in favour of the arrangement. That is what Mr. Austin said. Will the Minister of Justice stand in his place and tell us whether that statement by Mr. Austin as deputy minister is correct, and whether it is true that in 1972 the cabinet was in favour of an arrangement which it knew would have illegal consequences? Will the minister confirm that?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister replied to these questions the other day. At that time the government wanted to establish an international agreement with many nations to protect Canadian producers against the activities of the American government which was shutting out Canadian products from its market. We wanted to ensure that workers in Uranium City and northern Ontario were able to keep working.

● (1140)

The international agreement was known. It had been discussed and agreed to. It was completely legal. The point was, as indicated by the Prime Minister, that this did not give companies in Canada the right to fix the price in the Canadian market. That aspect was referred to a commission. The commission looked at the fixing of prices by Canadian companies in the Canadian market. This was illegal, and that is why I decided to prosecute the six companies which tried to fix the price in the Canadian market.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the other day the Prime Minister said he did not know until 1975, and he did not act until 1977. This evidence by Mr. Austin, which the minister cannot deny—and will not deny because he knows it is true—indicates that the Government of Canada had the knowledge that this arrangement could be illegal three years before the Prime Minister admitted he knew.

LEGAL OPINION PREPARED IN 1972

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, let me ask the Minister of Justice whether there was another opinion by the Canadian Department of Justice, again in 1972, which indicated that the arrangement approved by the cabinet would lead to a possible offence under the Combines Investigation Act by 1977 at the latest. Can the minister confirm that such a report was received in 1972? Can he confirm that the Department of Justice told the then minister of justice and the Government of Canada as early as 1972 that the course upon which they were embarked was a course which could break the law of Canada?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I would like to repeat again that when the Canadian government decided to establish an international agreement to make sure that the Canadian producer of uranium would keep producing uranium in Canada, it was to protect the Canadian product against the actions of the American government at that time. That was done. It was acceptable to everybody because it was the goal of all the people who were producing uranium to make sure we were not shut out completely from the international market because of the action of the American government. This was the problem of the international cartel or the international agreement, but it did not give permission to the companies to try to fix the price in Canada.

It was exactly this problem which was inquired into by a commission for four years. The commission had access to all the government documents it needed. Mr. Bertrand at one point asked to see cabinet minutes, and later on he declared he did not need them, so he had all the documents he wanted. He said that not long ago and, after four years of looking at all the aspects of the illegalities, he made a recommendation to me which I accepted. After four years of inquiry he found that six companies should be prosecuted. I accepted his report. The matter is before the court, and it is up to the court to decide.

DOCTRINE OF CROWN PRIVILEGE

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, what Mr. Bertrand in fact said to The Toronto Sun—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: —was that having access to the cabinet documents would help to confirm his suspicions.

Yesterday I asked the Minister of Justice for the assurance that he would not invoke the doctrine of Crown privilege to block testimony concerning the cartel, or to block the production of papers concerning the cartel in the court case, a doctrine which has been invoked in previous instances relating to the cartel. The minister refused.

In view of the fact that the government is today using its majority to padlock Parliament, will the minister give this House the assurance that under no circumstances will he invoke the doctrine of Crown privilege to frustrate the attempt of courts to get to the bottom of this incident?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, one of my colleagues established very well some weeks ago that when the source is The Toronto Sun it should not be relied upon too much.

The second thing is that I said yesterday—and I will repeat it for probably the sixth time—that in terms of Canadian courts dealing with Canadian laws and Canadian problems there has been a decision of the appeal division of the Federal Court which says that these documents would be available. I am facing a hypothetical question. I am the Attorney General of Canada. The case is before the court. I have no request from any court or any judge about documents at this time. I do not deal with hypothetical questions, but I would like to say that when we are dealing with Canadian problems before Canadian courts, the documents cannot be prevented from being produced in court because the rule was that foreign tribunals were not to force Canadians against their best interests.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, the minister is attempting to confuse the issue. The issue does not relate to the gag order. The issue relates to the doctrine of Crown privilege which was invoked by the minister of energy, mines and resources previously to prevent testimony by his officials before provincial government inquiries relating to energy. The issue relates to Crown privilege. The minister refuses to give any assurance that he will not invoke it again.

PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS IN COURT

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that there are some 40,000 documents Gulf has locked in a safe at McCarthy & McCarthy in Toronto, the release of which the federal government attempted successfully to block so that Gulf could not use them in its cases in the United States, and in view of the fact that the rationale used by the government was on the ground of national sovereignty, which does not apply in cases in Canada, will the minister give the House the assurance that he will take no action, including a re-amendment of the gag order or any other action, to frustrate the production of those documents or any other relevant documents which would be valuable to the defendants in this case?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I said earlier—and I have answered this question many times—that there is a ruling of the appeal division of the Federal Court on that. I do not have to answer a question about a situation I do not face. Nobody has asked me any question in any court about it. The case will be before the court. I do not want to have the trial in this House of Commons. There are some companies which are accused. They have rights under Canadian law. They will be before the court. They will make requests of the judge and, if I am faced with some problems at that time, I will cope with them.

I have given an indication that, in my view, when we are dealing with Canadian problems before Canadian courts in relation to Canadian documents, there are some rules which apply. The gag order will not apply in those circumstances because the gag order was in relation to the intrusion of foreign courts into Canadian affairs.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE—REMOVAL OF INSULATION FROM HOMES

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is also to the Acting Prime Minister. It concerns another disaster which really must be dealt with before this House closes for the summer. There are tens of thousands of home owners who are very worried and are experiencing increasing tension because they insulated with urea formaldehyde foam insulation. Their families have health problems. Their homes are worthless. Their life savings are gone, and the government has persistently refused to help.

In view of the fact that health officials in British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario have now agreed that testing is unreliable and inconclusive and the only solution to this disaster is to remove the foam from these homes, does the minister not agree that the government, which encouraged the use of this foam in the first place, should now have a responsibility to assist home owners to remove it?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the answer is no, because we are not as sure as she seems to be. Testing will be done over the summer and the Government of Canada has established a centre which is already operating and which satisfies the needs of many Canadians. An inquiry under the Hazardous Products Act is under way and I think we will have to wait for its findings before making any inferences, despite the hon. member's eagerness to do so.

[English]

Mrs. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I do not think the minister listened to the reference about health authorities in three provinces having proved that this will not do anything to solve the problem.

REQUEST FOR RE-ALLOCATION OF FUNDS

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance. I know that in times of difficult financial restrictions it is difficult for the government to find money to help home owners in the face of a real disaster like this. Therefore, I would like to ask the minister to take a proposal to the cabinet which would not cost extra money but would use funds which are already allocated.

• (1150)

Would the minister propose to cabinet, and particularly the Minister of Finance, that they re-allocate the $5 million budgeted for useless testing of UFFI homes, and will he also propose that they designate the $330 million recently approved for home insulation programs for use in solving the problem the government itself created, the poisoning of the atmosphere in homes?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the answer is no, since the programs and the funds allocated for such programs were fully justified.

Oral Questions

COMBINES

URANIUM CARTEL—POSSIBILITY OF HOLDING SPECIAL INQUIRY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. The minister is aware that the terms of reference of the Bertrand investigation were quite narrow. Mr. Bertrand, for instance, could not consider whether there had been violations of the Criminal Code provisions pertaining to conspiracy by individuals and corporations. Is the minister aware that Mr. William McKeown, a former director of the combines investigations branch, stated that the only way to deal with the involvement of the government and ministers of the Crown in the cartel is through a special inquiry under the Inquiries Act, and is the minister ready under the circumstances to launch a special inquiry?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, it is my view that Mr. Bertrand was in a position to make a full investigation of the matter. He stated publicly that he had obtained all documents needed for his investigation. He hired the best lawyers available under the circumstances. Those same lawyers are now working for me as Attorney General, with a view to securing convictions, and I am satisfied that the work done by Mr. Bertrand and his lawyers was quite complete. Further, I have no intention of recommending that a new investigation be conducted by anyone. I will leave it for the courts to decide.

[English]

REQUEST THAT REPORTS BE TURNED OVER TO ONTARIO ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, the answer demonstrates that the minister is one of the most pleasantly incompetent and naive justice ministers in history. He will say nothing of substance in either language.

My supplementary to the same minister, Madam Speaker, is this. Mr. Bertrand could not consider whether there were violations of the Criminal Code. Will the minister have the courage to turn over the Henry report, the Bertrand report, and all other relevant documents to the Attorney General of the ripped-off consumer province, namely, Ontario, to see whether or not any person or company has violated provisions of the Criminal Code for which the Attorney General of Ontario is responsible, not the Minister of Justice and not Mr. Bertrand?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I would like to say that I am the Attorney General of Canada, and if there was an offence in that matter, it was against laws which come under the jurisdiction of the Attorney General of Canada. I have fulfilled all my obligations in accepting the report of Mr. Bertrand and taking legal action against the six companies.

Of course some of the comments of the hon. member do not impress me. I am not at all afraid to compare my record in this House to the nasty little comments he can make, once in a while.

Some hon. Members: Bravo, bravo!

LEGAL ADVICE ON NAMING OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Justice. He will remember that on May 26 last he told this House, quite properly, that the final decision to prosecute was within his domain. Subsequently he said that he has acceded to the recommendations of Mr. Brown. The thrust of my question has to do with the recommendations given to the minister by Mr. Brown.

The minister is aware that a conspiracy is nothing more than an agreement between two or more people to commit an illegal act. Mr. MacNabb and Mr. Runnalls were named parties to this agreement, and there must have been a reason. I ask the minister a very plain and simple question. What was Mr. Brown's advice to the minister in recommending that Mr. MacNabb and Mr. Runnalls be named as parties to this illegal agreement, but not the deputy minister, Senator Austin, in circumstances where he was the president of Uranium Canada Limited during the formative years of the cartel?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the recommendations of Mr. Brown were very clear.

Mr. Clark: And confidential.

Mr. Chrétien: He recommended that I take legal action against six companies, and he named a certain number of people and companies as unindicted co-conspirators. This is not unprecedented. In previous answers I gave to the House the precedents where, in three different cases of a similar nature, there were unindicted co-conspirators. It is a technique used to give them special status in court in order to help make the case against those who have conspired.

These people are not accused because they did not commit an offence. Mr. Brown's advice to me is the same that he gave to Mr. Bertrand. After four years of work on that file he concluded that there are six companies which shall be prosecuted, and nobody else. I have accepted his recommendation.

REASON FOR NAMING OFFICIALS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): My supplementary is to the same minister. We certainly know what he has done; the questions we want to ask pertain to why he has done it. I ask the minister is it a matter of legal technique or a matter of policy that this agreement between Mr. MacNabb and Mr. Runnalls—because that is exactly what it was according to the indictment, an agreement to conspire to commit an unlawful act—is it just a matter of evidence and legal technique that they were named? Is that the only reason?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I do not want to start the case here.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I guess not.

Mr. Chrétien: I said I have accepted Mr. Brown's recommendations.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Chrétien: I have hired him as a special prosecutor in this case. He will have all his documents in front of the court and he will use them in order to have the six companies found guilty. His best judgment, accepted by Mr. Bertrand, was that the six companies should be prosecuted and no one else. I have accepted that recommendation, both from Mr. Bertrand and Mr. Brown, and I hope they will be successful in proving in court that the six companies involved are guilty of conspiring to fix prices in Canada.

According to Mr. Brown and Mr. Bertrand, the others were not part of it. After four years of hard work on that matter, I have no reason not to accept their recommendations, or change them.

CABINET POSITION RESPECTING URANIUM CANADA

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, one thing the minister cannot deny is that the Bertrand report recommended the prosecution of Uranium Canada. The minister will know that Uranium Canada is a shell company. I have the letters patent and certificate of continuance with respect to that corporation, which indicate that anything that company does is done under order in council. It is not run by a board of directors, it is run by the cabinet.

Mr. Clark: By ministers.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The minister has attempted to avoid taking any responsibility in this matter. Will he not now do the honourable thing, stand in his place and not let two public servants wither on the vine? Will he stand up and admit the fact that the Government of Canada, the cabinet in fact, was involved directly with Uranium Canada, and in fact was aware precisely of what was going on and stands convicted in this House of Commons?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I would like to say I have done the honourable thing.

An hon. Member: Oh!

Mr. Chrétien: I have accepted the recommendations of Mr. Bertrand and Mr. Brown. Not only that—

Mr. Clark: But you will not publish them. You hide them.

Mr. Chrétien: —I have asked Mr. Brown to be the special prosecutor in the case. On top of that, I took that on my own responsibility. I did not discuss that in cabinet with my colleagues. I faced all my responsibilities as Attorney General and it was only after the charges were laid in Toronto that I informed cabinet of the action I had taken.

I felt it was my duty as Attorney General to take the best advice I could get in this matter, which was from the people who did the inquiry. In fact I did not seek the opinion of the Department of Justice; I relied on the opinion of the lawyers hired independently by Mr. Bertrand. And I accepted the advice of Mr. Bertrand, too.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO ADJOURN

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the order of motions, and because I am deeply disturbed over what the government plans to do today, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin):

That the House do now adjourn.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. CLARK—USE OF UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have just had an opportunity to read the "blues" for earlier in the day, and I note that during remarks by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) in an exchange between the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) I am quoted in Hansard as saying, in reference to the comments of the Minister of Justice: "That is a lie. That is a lie". Later I am quoted as saying to the Minister of Justice: "You are a liar".

Whatever I might think about the conduct and probity of the Minister of Justice, those remarks are unparliamentary and I would like to withdraw them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: That point of order is well taken.

Question No. 901—Mr. MacKay:

1. For the fiscal year (a) 1978-79 (b) 1979-80, what was the number and total value of contracts let under the Defence Industry Productivity Program (DIP) (i) between $0 and $50,000 (ii) between $50,001 and $100,000 (iii) between $100,001 and $500,000 (iv) between $500,001 and $1,000,000 (v) over $1,000,000 (vi) in total?

2. For the same years, what were the expenditures under the program in the (a) Textile and Consumer Products Branch (b) Agriculture, Fisheries and Food Products Branch (c) Chemicals Branch (d) Electrical and Electronics Branch (e) Machinery Branch (f) Resource Industries Branch (g) Construction and Consulting Services Branch?

3. What was the total for all the branches listed in part 2?

4. For the same years, by province and territory, what was the total in grants and contributions by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce under the program?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. For the number and value of contracts let under the DIP program in 1978-79 and 1979-80, see list below.

2 and 3. Expenditures made by branches under the DIP Program and the total expenditure for 1978-79 and 1979-80 are given in list below.

4. The geographical distribution of DIP funds is given in list below.

RCMP SUPERANNUATION ACCOUNT

Question No. 1,977—Mr. Knowles:

1. What was the total amount at credit in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police superannuation account as at March 31 (a) 1978 (b) 1979 (c) 1980?

2. What rate of interest has the government paid for the use of this money during the fiscal year ended on the dates noted above?

3. What amount of interest was credited to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police superannuation account during the fiscal year ended March 31 (a) 1978 (b) 1979 (c) 1980?

4. What was the total amount paid out of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police superannuation account during the fiscal year ended March 31 (a) 1978 (b) 1979 (c) 1980?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General):

1. (a) 1978—March 31 $685,317,113.70
(b) 1979—March 31 $775,338,253.37
(c) 1980—March 31 $886,083,228.51

2. Interest is paid quarterly and the annual rate has been computed as follows:

1977-1978	7.32 per cent
1978-1979	5.77 per cent
1979-1980	6.36 per cent

3. (a) 1977-1978 $24,384,467.49
(b) 1978-1979 $45,555,695.00
(c) 1979-1980 $51,511,834.10

The rate of interest paid into the RCMP superannuation account does not in any way affect the amount of benefits paid to retired members. The benefit is computed on an employee's length of service and the average salary received over the highest paid six consecutive years of service.

4. (a) 1977-1978 $ 7,874,644.26
(b) 1978-1979 $ 9,982,353.16
(c) 1979-1980 $12,955,018.96

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

Question No. 2,288—Mr. Stewart:

Since 1945, were charges laid against individuals under the Official Secrets Act and, if so (a) how many (b) how many (i) were withdrawn or dropped by the Crown (ii) resulted in acquittals or dismissals?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): The Department of Justice: 1. Yes. (a) 25, (b) (i) 1, (ii) 13.

Order Paper Questions

VERAPAMIL

Question No. 2,514—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the Department of National Health and Welfare aware that a drug, generic name verapamil and trade name Calan or Isoptin, is about to be placed on the market in the United States?

2. Does the government have information with regard to the value of the drug for angina, arhythmias, abnormal heartbeats or other heart disorders and, if so, what is the information?

3. Was the drug tested in Canada and, if so, what are its merits?

4. Will the drug be approved for sale in Canada and, if so, on what date?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Yes. Verapamil in the injectable form is about to be approved in the United States. No. Oral form is under review by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) but has not been presented to their cardiovascular and renal advisory committee for their consideration. According to the information available to the Department of National Health and Welfare, there is no definite projected date for approval in the United States.

2. Yes. A new drug submission for Verapamil injection under trade name of Isoptin has received a notice of compliance. A new drug submission for tablets is being reviewed at present. Results of the review should be available in the near future.

3. The drug was/is being tested in Canada. Preliminary information indicates that the drug is likely to be effective in angina pectoris, and cardiac arrhythmias.

4. Verapamil injection was approved by the health protection branch on May 22, 1979, for the treatment of arrhythmias, and is now available as a prescription medication. Tablets can be expected to be approved barring any new adverse information. The projected marketing date for tablets is 1982.

DURHAM-NORTHUMBERLAND—LAWYERS UNDER CONTRACT

Question No. 2,608—Mr. Lawrence:

What are the names of all lawyers and/or legal firms within the constituency of Durham-Northumberland who have received or are receiving payments from the government for legal work since the government took office following the 1980 general election and, in each case, what was/is the amount?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): The Department of Justice:

Names	Amounts
Brooks, Harrison & Company	$13,935.45
Clark, James	$ 1,696.63
Fitzgibbon, C.D.	$23,704.27
Hamilton, Irwin A.	$ 229.25
Irvine & Irvine	$ 154.00

DEPARTMENT OF THE ENVIRONMENT—T & H PRINTERS LTD. CONTRACT

Question No. 2,614—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Department of the Environment issue contracts to T & H Printers Ltd., for $65,000 and for $42,000 for perfect bound booklets and, if so (a) what are the titles (b) what is the (i) number printed (ii) cost per booklet (c) to whom will they be distributed?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of the Environment and Supply and Services as follows: DSS awarded two contracts, for perfect bound booklets, to T & H Printers Ltd., on behalf of the Department of the Environment: one for $65,000 and the second one for $42,000.

Contract for $65,000

(a) (i) History and Archaeology.

(b) (i) The contract calls for a series of ten publications with an option for up to 20 additional issues. The number printed is to be determined at time of order.

(ii) The contract specifies that for a basic 75 French copies of 100 pages, the cost will be $912.00 and for a basic 100 English copies of 400 pages, the cost will be $3,178.00. There will be extra charges for additional pages, halftones, etc. and these are included in the total value of the contract.

(c) Department of the Environment distributes copies History and Archaeology primarily to Parks Canada offices nationwide as working documents; in addition, copies are sent to the National Library, the Library of Parliament and to the National and Provincial Archives. DSS distributes free of charge to the principal libraries in the country using a computerized mailing list, and will supply to others upon request; copies are sold to non-governmental researchers and to the general public through authorized retail outlets and directly in response to mail orders.

Contract for $42,000

(a) (i) Surface Water Data Publications.

(b) (i) The contract calls for ten books during the fiscal year 1981-82. The number printed is to be determined at time of order.

(ii) The contract specifies that the cost for 650 copies will be $74.90 per 100 pages saddle stitched and $223.00 per 100 pages perfect bound. There will be extra charges for additional pages, halftones, screened areas, etc. and these are included in the total value of the contract.

(c) The water resources branch distributes data publications to approximately 1100 agencies whose names and addresses are maintained on a mailing list. These agencies include federal government departments, provincial governments, American and foreign governments, municipal governments, universities, consultants, public and private utilities, libraries and private individuals.

Publications are also supplied to users (whose names are not on the mailing list) upon request. In addition, 200 copies of each publication are supplied to the Department of Supply and Services for distribution to government depositories.

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS—MOTION THAT DEBATE BE NOT FURTHER ADJOURNED

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 33, I move, seconded by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard):

That debate on the motion in the name of the President of the Privy Council (Government Orders, Government business, Number 51) regarding adjournment of the House to October 14, 1981 and any amendment or subamendment thereto, shall not be further adjourned.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Madam Speaker: All those opposed to the motion please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Madam Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Speaker: Call in the members. Shall we dispense with the ringing of the bells?

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I think now it would be in order for us to proceed with the vote without the ringing of the bells.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Ouellet) which was agreed to on the following division:

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pinard:

That, when the House adjourns on the day this order is adopted, it shall stand adjourned until Wednesday, October 14, 1981, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Madam Speaker, after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its "business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Madam Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees or the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in her stead for all the purposes of this order.

Madam Speaker: Order. Before I recognize the first speaker, I should like to point out to the House that normally, when such a debate is held, the Standing Orders provide that we recess for dinner from six o'clock to eight o'clock. Nothing is provided for Friday. The Standing Orders mention Monday, Tuesday and Thursday, but not Friday. I suppose you may decide that we should recess from six o'clock to eight o'clock, as if it were a regular week day.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, if that was put as a question to the House, then we would say no to the question.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I understand that you did not put a motion to that effect. You merely said that on a regular weekday, the House takes recess in the evening from six o'clock to eight o'clock. However, since it is Friday when usually the House adjourns at five o'clock, you conclude that we should normally recess for dinner from six o'clock to eight o'clock. That is what you said and we agree with your interpretation.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, we can talk about this all the time, but you were asking the opinion of the House. This government, which has for the first time in the British Commonwealth moved closure to shut down the House of Commons, is now suggesting that we take two hours of very valuable time enabling us to lambaste the bounders for what they are. The answer is no; they deserve the two hours of lashing they are going to get.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I regard what is now being discussed as quite unimportant; the damage has been done. Since there is not unanimous consent to adjourn for supper hour from six o'clock to eight o'clock, I take it we will sit through until one o'clock in the morning. As I say, the damage has been done.

Madam Speaker: Quite obviously, since the Standing Orders are not clear, I suggested an interpretation which could be taken. However, I would naturally need the unanimous consent of the House to determine we would adjourn from six to eight. Since we do not have unanimous consent and the Standing Orders are silent on this matter, I have to rule on the side of allowing Parliament to debate as long as possible. Therefore, there will be no adjournment from six until eight.

I believe I have two members rising on a point of order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

● (1440)

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, just to be clear, although I regard it as unimportant too, perhaps there should be an understanding as to whether we will have private members' hour between four and five o'clock or spend the time on this adjournment motion. It does not matter, but it should be clear.

Madam Speaker: It is quite clear in the Standing Orders that private members' hour must commence at four o'clock.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I see that the Postmaster General is seeking the floor. I notice in the record of last night's proceedings in the House that the hon. Postmaster General spoke. He announced his intention to move a motion, and he has now moved a motion. I think it could be argued, and I do argue, that we should consider that he has lost his right to participate further in the debate. He was not contributing very much, anyway.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Perhaps for the benefit of the House this should be done.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I find the attitude taken by the opposition House leader somewhat inconsistent. He complains that we are trying to muzzle them, and yet he now wants to muzzle the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet). Yesterday, the Postmaster General started his speech; he took only fifteen minutes out of the 40 minutes allotted to him. In his speech, he gave notice of a motion. He moved a motion today but not during the debate on the business of the House. He had the floor. He may therefore continue his speech, except that today, under Standing Order 33, if one reads it intelligently, he may not speak more than twenty minutes. Madam Speaker, if I may, I would like to quote from Standing Order 33 which stipulates that if the resolution is . . . resolved in the affirmative, no member shall thereafter . . .

And I stress "thereafter".

. . . speak more than once, or longer than twenty minutes in any such adjourned debate . . .

Therefore, there is nothing which says that the member who had the floor when notice was given no longer has the right to speak even though his time may not have expired. The minister never said that he had concluded his speech last night. He had hardly started, and I respectfully submit to you that he still has the right to speak today and, furthermore, that if Standing Order 33 were not being applied, he could go on for about half an hour since he only spoke about ten minutes. However, according to our rules, his time is limited to twenty minutes and he will comply with that requirement.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I was trying to save the House the trouble of listening to the Postmaster General.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) is absolutely right. Under the Standing Orders, which are quite clear, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) can continue his speech, and I therefore recognize him.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to take part in this adjournment debate and to note once again how some opposition members take pleasure in abusing the rules as well as parliamentary procedure.

Yesterday the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) was indignant that his colleague from Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) might be deprived of his right to speak. Today, resorting to the same Standing Orders, he tried to prevent me from taking the floor. That shows to what extent there can be a double interpretation of the Standing Orders of the House, namely one very cavalier and very generous interpretation on the part of the opposition, and another interpretation which the opposition wants applied very strictly when the government is involved.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to adjourn Parliament at this time. Today is July 17. We are now at that time of the year when hon. members usually go to their ridings to meet their electors. That contact with the ridings of the country is part of the task of a parliamentarian. It is obvious that the Parliament of Canada, more than all the provincial legislatures, sits during long weeks and long months in the course of a year. Too often our electors tell us that we spend too much time in Ottawa. They do not appreciate how demanding our parliamentary responsibilities can be. And I must say that if they were to spend a few days here, a few hours even, they would realize to what extent we are prisoners of an absolutely archaic parliamentary procedure, Is it conceivable that in 1981 we waste hours and hours because the opposition whip lets the bells ring unduly and does not return to the House to count the votes?

Is it conceivable that in 1981 the hon. member for Winnipeg-North-Centre (Mr. Knowles), who fancies himself as being a parliamentary expert, an ardent champion of parliamentary procedure and a lover of the parliamentary rules of the mother of Parliaments in London, would take it upon himself to waste the time of the House as he did this morning after Oral Question Period by needlessly moving the adjournment of the House for the rest of the day? Mr. Speaker, let people compare the proposition I myself made to adjourn Parliament with that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who moved the adjournment for the rest of the day because, he said, he is indignant that I proposed to adjourn the House business as we have been anxious to do after a week of useless work in the House where absolutely nothing has been accomplished thanks to the filibuster of the Progressive Conservative Party which has kept us here one week too many, in my opinion. Mr. Speaker, I was saying that it is important that Parliament be adjourned at this time so as to enable federal members of Parliament to spend some time with their electors in their ridings, close to the people who send them to the Parliament of Canada. We in Canada are going through a difficult period with respect to the relations between the provincial governments and the Canadian government.

The provincial viewpoint is constantly being explained and expounded by the MLAs who are in their ridings, sit during much shorter periods than we do and sit only three or four days a week while we have to stay there from Monday to Friday evening, at which time many of us have to take planes to go back to the Pacific or the Atlantic coasts, which means that we spend only a few hours a week in our ridings, while MLAs may spend at least two or three days there.

Since all provincial legislatures have already adjourned and provincial members are, if not on holidays, at least working in their ridings, we, federal members of Parliament, have the duty to go back home and explain to our constituents the programs and policies of the Canadian government. Parliamentarians have the duty to explain more fully the role of the Canadian government in this country. There is nothing better than personal and direct contacts to explain the aims and the role of the Canadian government in the face of the systematic encroachment of provincial powers. Now is the time to adjourn, Mr. Speaker, to get down to this work in our constituencies.

I have another reason for saying that now is the time to adjourn. The vote just held is a good illustration of this. It is easy to see how agitated and frustrated some parliamentarians have become when we look at some of the interventions in the last few days. It is obvious that while the rules of the Canadian Parliament are designed to protect the minority in Parliament, these rules were made in the last century on the basis of what we call the checks and balances of the British system and English fair play. However, these rules were never designed to give absolute power to an intransigent opposition which forcibly imposes its views and its instructions on a majority which was democratically elected by the Canadian people.

It is an undeniable fact, Mr. Speaker, that we have witnessed during this session an abuse of the technicalities of parliamentary procedure by the opposition parties, and especially by the Progressive Conservative opposition, in an attempt to counter the government's intentions and legislation. Parliament is undeniably the place where such issues should be debated, but it is first of all the place where legislation must be passed. And when the opposition abuses systematically its right to speak to prevent Parliament from voting, I suggest that our parliamentary procedure is seriously deficient and that we must soon correct this situation which allows Parliament to be held hostage by an inflexible and fanatical opposition. It is undeniable that we have not been able to dispose of a great many government measures because the opposition has insisted on extended debates, and even unacceptable debates in my opinion, because I remember interventions which were taken verbatim from previous speeches.

We have seen opposition members read word by word speeches made a few hours or a few days earlier by one of their colleagues, making exactly the same points, harking back to the same views. Not only did opposition members stage filibusters but they rehashed old speeches in order to hinder the normal parliamentary process. People who know the British system, the Parliament in Westminster, are fully aware that legislation introduced for second reading is passed on the same day. Second reading is an opportunity to consider the principle of a bill and the advisability of referring it or not to a committee where it can be examined clause by clause and amended if need be. Such a simple discussion on principle never requires more than one day in London. All important pieces of legislation introduced by the government during the course of the current session took hours and hours of repetitive debates by the opposition, and none of our bills was approved the same day. I find this quite unacceptable in a modern society that has a constant need of a vast number of measures from its central government.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we should stop to reflect on that sad state of affairs and as soon as possible after the summer recess ask for an in-depth, major reform of our parliamentary procedure. This would allow a freely elected government to do its work, admittedly with criticism from the opposition. Criticism however should be made with due form and within a reasonable time frame in modern society. And once the government has passed the legislation, the people can then judge whether the government was right or wrong. But as things stand now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the people cannot even judge whether the government's work is good or bad, because we have all the trouble in the world passing our legislation. We are impeded by a nineteenth century procedure that is no longer consistent with modern times and the hurried way of life of the twentieth century. In the few minutes left to me, I would like to say that the adjournment will have beneficial results on the current negotiations that have just started under the direction of Mr. Justice Gold, the mediator. Mr. Speaker, I think I have ten more minutes. Is this correct?

● (1450)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): According to my information the minister's time will expire at 3.04 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Thank you Mr. Speaker. I still have some seven minutes left to explain to the Progressive Conservative members the serious mistake they made this week by delaying the settlement of the postal strike and leading the Canadian Union of Postal Workers to believe that back-to-work legislation would be introduced. It was obvious, Mr. Speaker, that as long as Parliament would be sitting no pressure would be applied on the union leaders to return to the bargaining table and reach a settlement regarding their collective agreement.

The easy way out for the Canadian Union of Postal Workers is to have a settlement imposed upon them rather than have to go back before their members and tell them: "Here is what the government is offering us, we could not get more, and we suggest that you accept the results of the negotiations just completed with management representatives.

It is always embarrassing and difficult for a union leader who promised them pie in the sky to tell his members that he cannot deliver. But as long as he can give as an excuse the drastic and unilateral effect of a piece of legislation to justify his action, then his honour is saved. That is the idea the Leader of the Opposition and the Progressive Conservatives have tried to plant in the mind of the union leaders all week long by protracting parliamentary business. Now that we are adjourning, I think that Judge Gold will be in a position to carry out his mediation efforts because the two parties, the postal workers and the Treasury Board, will know that the solution to the postal dispute is to be found through negotiation, through a negotiated settlement, because it is the only avenue left now to settle this dispute. I am convinced that this situation will be beneficial and will make things easier for Judge Gold as a mediator.

In closing, may I mention that the opposition has claimed that we want to adjourn Parliament to cover up the so-called uranium scandal. Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting here in Parliament for several years now; not a single year has gone by without the Progressive Conservative opposition rising to claim there were scandals, that representatives or friends of the government had behaved shockingly. That is an old, lowdown traditional political trick of theirs. Every year, the Progressive Conservatives have nothing better to do than to try to discredit the government's authority and the integrity of the politicians who are members of the Liberal Party of Canada. Not one of them has gone before the courts and been condemned as a result of the alleged scandals dug up by the Progressive Conservatives. Never in all those so-called scandals that were supposedly exposed has anyone been found guilty before the courts!

In the case of the uranium affair, the Canadian government did absolutely nothing improper or illegal. We followed standard procedure; we have nothing to hide. The matter is now before the courts where it will be settled and decided whether or not a few companies broke the law in Canada. No aspect whatsoever of government activity is involved in the matter. To my mind, the irresponsible and unacceptable behaviour of the opposition in this connection is a complete aberration.

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, what we just saw in the tawdry and hysterical performance by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) was culminated by the use of closure for the fifth time in 25 years in this Parliament. It has been used five times in 25 years; yet it has been used two times by this government within the past 12 months. What we see is a pattern developing on the part of this government of gagging Parliament, of attempting in this instance to padlock Parliament to prevent—

Mr. Ouellet: That is because of the abuse of rules by the opposition!

Mr. Beatty: —the representatives of the people of Canada from discharging their business on behalf of their constituents.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, let us take a look at the history of closure the five times it has been used in the past 25 years. The first time was when the Liberals used it to gag Parliament on the pipeline debate. They said it was urgent that debate be ended and that the vote be taken. The second time was when the Liberals again gagged Parliament in the 1960s to terminate the flag debate. The third time was when they again used the closure rule to gag Parliament, using the same arguments as have been used today by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, to change the rules of Parliament to facilitate the government's getting its business through, unchecked by Parliament. That was the third time.

Mr. Ouellet: Oh, come on! Unchecked!

Mr. Beatty: The fourth time was last fall, when this government imposed closure to prevent debate on the Constitution of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Ouellet: After how many weeks?

Mr. Beatty: In all of those instances the government justified its activity on the ground that there were important matters that Parliament should be considering, that there was an urgent public business to be done; that there was a matter which should be dealt with by Parliament, that the debate had gone on long enough on the matter, and that it was time to move on to something else. How does this differ, now that the government has used closure for the first time in the history of the Commonwealth to close down Parliament, to padlock Parliament, to prevent debate from taking place? What is the urgent business which faces Parliament today?

If one listens to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and reads the speech he made last night, the urgent business is that it is time for MPs to go on holiday. That is the urgent business. That is the reason closure is being used, according to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Last evening Madam Speaker prevented the government from closing this Parliament down through subterfuge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: It was a courageous decision which Madam Speaker made. Let me read, just briefly, two sentences from that decision. She said:

> My ruling is very much based on the right of hon. members to express themselves in this House. This is the most sacred thing that the Speaker must protect—

Yet within one hour of Madam Speaker's preventing this government from closing down Parliament through subterfuge, and within one hour of Madam Speaker's saying that the most sacred right of Parliament and the most sacred obligation of any Speaker is to protect the right of freedom of speech of parliamentarians, this minister, whose conduct in the uranium investigation is very much in question in the House, moved closure which will prevent this Parliament from investigating the conduct of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: The minister said that nothing has gone wrong, that there was no illegal act and that there was no cover-up. Let us take a look at the facts and the history of cover-up on the part of this government in the uranium cartel.

Mr. Ouellet: Repeat the speech that your colleague made last night!

Mr. Beatty: There have been at least nine instances in which the government used the powers available to it to prevent a full investigation from taking place. The first was in the creation of the cartel. The government had two options. It could either have done it the honest and straightforward way by bringing legislation before Parliament, which would have disclosed its plans, and setting it up in the same way as it set up agricultural marketing boards, something which is quite legal, or the government could have done it through secret agreements, through hiding the facts, through subterfuge. It chose to do the latter.

Any study of the public record will show that at the time this was set up, there was very little news released to the public and to the general press. The only information which was released referred to a number of officials who had met to exchange marketing information. No information was released as to the existence of a secretariat, of a policy committee, of a quota system which divided the international marketing, or of a system of bid rigging that Canada engaged in with the knowledge of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. These facts are incontestible, and the government itself does not contest that bid rigging took place; yet all of that was hidden. The government operated by secrecy. Indeed, when it was raised by reporters at that time, Mr. Macdonald, who was the minister of energy, mines and resources then, disclosed the fact that something was up when they passed regulations. However, when the press inquired about that on August 24, 1972, The Globe and Mail reported this response:

"Because of the nature of the uranium export contracts, it would not be in the public interest to disclose further contract details at this time."

Therefore, the cover-up began in 1972, as this was set up.

● (1510)

The minister says now that they were not aware of anything illegal and that there was no problem. Mr. Speaker, one gets a sense of déjà vu when one hears a cabinet minister say that. I have in my hand a copy of an article which appeared in the Toronto Star, the House organ of the Liberal party, an unimpeachable source as far as the Liberals are concerned. It is dated September 1, 1976, and is headlined "Minister denies uranium price was fixed". The dateline is St. John's, Newfoundland, and the article reads as follows:

Energy Minister Alastair Gillespie has denied allegations that Canada has conspired with other countries to fix uranium prices since 1972.

Later, the article goes on as follows:

In denying the allegations, Gillespie said that if anyone could be accused of monopolistic tactics it is the U.S. itself.

Yet what do we find now, in the laying of charges, Mr. Speaker? We find precisely what the government is alleging, that there was an international conspiracy which Crown corporations participated in, which was set up—

Mr. Ouellet: Not true.

Mr. Beatty: —in the boardrooms of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in which senior officials of the government participated and whose activities were legitimized by actions of the Government of Canada. When the minister makes a statement like that, why should we trust his word now, any more than we should have trusted Mr. Gillespie's word then?

The second incident occurred in 1976 after the U.S. Department of Justice began its criminal investigation into the cartel. The U.S. congressional subcommittee examined the actions of international uranium producers, and information was sought in Canada. After Mr. William Gilchrist, president of the Crown corporation, Eldorado Nuclear, gave a deposition to U.S. authorities, the federal government at first flatly denied the existence of a cartel, which it euphemistically referred to as a "marketing arrangement", and then enacted the uranium information security regulation, or the gag order.

The regulations went far beyond what was necessary to achieve the professed aim of the government, namely, to prevent the extra-territorial application of the law of other countries. It was claimed that the issue was national sovereignty. What the regulations did was to prevent anyone in Canada from discussing or seeking any information about the cartel. The government admitted this in its subsequent enactment, 13 months later, of less restrictive regulations which applied to government and uranium company employees.

Note, Mr. Speaker, how the regulations dealt solely and expressly with the uranium cartel. The government justified its action, on the basis of a broad principle, that documents should not be subpoenaed from Canada into other countries, yet it rejected the proper course of bringing in legislation to deal with that broad principle. Instead, the government introduced a gag order which prevented discussion in foreign countries or in Canada about the Canadian government's participation in the cartel.

In the same year, the then minister of energy, mines and resources, the Hon. Donald Macdonald, also invoked Crown privilege to prevent the disclosure of information relevant to the cartel, regarding the case Duquesne Light and Electric.

You will remember that when I put the question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) today, Mr. Speaker, and sought the assurance that the government would not again try to impede these criminal cases by invoking the doctrine of Crown privilege to prevent testimony being given by federal officials or to prevent federal documents from being made available, the minister refused to give that assurance.

The regulations had the effect of preventing free discussion of the cartel for a year. In the summer of 1977, the U.S. congressional subcommittee released documents pertaining to the involvement of Gulf Minerals Canada Ltd. in the Canadian producers group. Correspondence from such people as Senator Austin and the unindicted co-conspirators, was included in the package.

Under pressure from the Canadian government, this Liberal government, the U.S. state department had "Specially Confidential" pencilled on the documents and requested the subcommittee not to release them publicly. Due to the Canadian government's past refusal to co-operate with the U.S. authorities, they, in turn, refused to co-operate with the Canadian government and they subsequently released the documents.

The fourth example of the cover-up was that the Uranium Information Security regulations were revised only after the opposition, the Progressive Conservative party, brought an action in the Ontario high court to contest their validity. In order to minimize the potential political embarrassment of a negative decision, the government enacted the less restrictive regulations. These at least permitted some public discussion of the government's involvement in the cartel but, of course, all the information came from the investigation conducted in the United States, not from discussions which took place in Canada.

The fifth example of the cover-up was the government's announcement of a combines investigation which came fully two years after the cartel was exposed in the world press. This development was the result of sustained opposition questioning in Parliament. Of course, there was the added benefit to the government that no information about the subject of a combines investigation may be made public while an investigation was in progress. This short-term political expendient had the effect of putting discussion of the cartel on the back burner.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that at the time the then minister of consumer and corporate affairs asked the director of combines investigations to undertake the inquiry, an article appeared in The Globe and Mail of October 4, 1977 which reads in part as follows:

> Mr. Allmand said Mr. Davidson would be able to look at all relevant documents, including privileged Cabinet documents, during his investigation. "His purpose . . . is to look at all evidence to determine whether there was an infraction of the combines investigation act. This means he has the right to look at documentary evidence, behavioural evidence, conversations and whatever."

But what happened when Mr. Bertrand, the combines investigator, asked to see those confidential cabinet documents? What happened was that he was refused by the government. Today, in the House, the Minister of Justice said that the documents were not necessary for Mr. Bertrand's investigation. That is not so. An article in The Toronto Sun of June 8, 1981 reads, referring to Mr. Bertrand, in part, as follows:

> He said that, although he was not allowed to see the secret cabinet minutes, they weren't necessary "to make things any clearer." He refused to elaborate.
> A cabinet trustee holding the minutes would not release them despite Bertrand's reminder former consumer affairs minister Warren Allmand had pledged cabinet documents would be available, Bertrand said.
> "I think now they're making a distinction between documents and minutes. Mind you, I never made that distinction."

How can the government ask for the trust of the Canadian people when its behaviour in this affair from start to finish, has been so tawdry?

The sixth example of how the government has engaged in this cover-up is that there were two provincial inquiries to nuclear affairs, namely the Cluff Lake inquiry in Saskatchewan and the Ontario Select Committee which sought testimony from the unindicted co-conspirators, Dr. Runnalls and Mr. MacNabb, who both worked for the government. In both these cases the government refused to allow them to speak on matters related to the cartel. This was so, notwithstanding the fact that these were domestic political inquiries and that no question arose as to the need to protect national sovereignty.

The government's argument in the cover-up, from the word go, has been that it was essential to have the gag order to prevent threats to national sovereignty. These were cases in Canada, Mr. Speaker; they were cases where the government sought to prevent evidence from coming out in Canada.

In the seventh example, the Westinghouse Electric Company in England sought evidence for its uranium supply court cases in the United States. This evidence, in the form of testimony and documents from Rio-Tinto Zinc Corp. of London, was crucial to Westinghouse's case, because it could not obtain evidence in Canada and in Australia.

The case was appealed up to House of Lords before it was disposed of by it, and an interesting fact came out; namely that Canada and the other cartel members had applied extremely strong diplomatic pressure to the government of the United Kingdom to step in and prevent the release of the Rio-Tinto Zinc evidence. This point was made by the British attorney general and solicitor general on the motion for leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

The next incident shows that the same sort of pressure was applied in the United States. As the Department of Justice grand jury investigation drew to a close, the U.S. state department prevailed upon the White House to vet the recommendations that the department had sought for criminal indictments. After diplomatic pressure was applied by Canada, however, Gulf Oil Corporation was charged only with a criminal misdemeanor, and was fined $40,000 after pleading nolo contendere.

In the ninth incident, the Government of Canada has consistently refused to make public the Bertrand report, the 1972 opinion by D. W. Henry, or the justice department opinion as to the cartel's potential illegality, as well as other government documents relating to the cartel.

We have seen incident after incident of cover-up taking place, so let the minister then not ask for the trust of the Canadian people and say that there has been no cover-up. On August 5, 1977, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) outlined to the House what he saw as the course that should be followed. At page 8074 of Hansard he is reported as having said the following:

> Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is obviously entering into a debate. I indicated yesterday that we would welcome this debate. We will put every fact we have before parliament so it can debate this matter properly. Obviously, this game of putting statements on the record of which I have no knowledge may be profitable for the hon. gentleman, but I do not think it advances the question whether the government at that time either acted legally or illegally. Nor does it answer the question whether we did so in the interests of the Canadian people or not. We are anxious to have this debated—

● (1520)

That is a firm assurance from the Prime Minister of Canada that all relevant documents will be put before Parliament, yet the cover-up has continued.

What is most extraordinary is that the Canadian government initiated the setting up of this cartel. It was set up in large part in the offices of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in Ottawa with that department's senior officials. The government, according to a Gulf internal memo dated April 12 from Mr. Coleman to Mr. Minks said that it would follow a four-point program outlined by the producers themselves that would result in a promise of non-prosecution from the Department of Justice and a statement of cabinet approval. Two days later the then minister of energy, mines and resources, Donald Macdonald collaborated by sending a telex advising of cabinet approval, and touching on the four-point program advised the following:

I have been authorized by Cabinet to advise you that the Canadian government . . . has followed carefully discussions among world producers, is preparing to allow Uranium Canada and Eldorado Nuclear Ltd. to enter into an informal world producers arrangement, that in order to be workable all Canadian producers should participate . . . your company is requested to make every effort to adhere to the common terms.

The government was so anxious that Gulf be part of the cartel that it gave Gulf officials department of energy stationary and allowed them to draft Gulf's invitation to join the cartel. This was done and then signed by the federal government.

Mr. Austin told the producers that they could, in effect, write their own quotas and allocations into Canadian law by simply supplying the appropriate figures for new regulations under the Atomic Energy Control Act.

Documents which have been released in the United States indicate that the government has taken every action possible to prevent prosecution from taking place. Even after cabinet made the decision to participate, the government solicited an opinion from the Department of Justice in order to protect the producers, "at least as long as the present government is in power", according to the memorandum of April 12.

This government may be able to close down Parliament. This government can padlock Parliament, but the issue will not go away. The truth will come out. We are determined to get Parliament back on the job. We are determined to get the truth. Nothing this government can do can prevent the truth from becoming known.

Mr. Jack Masters (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, as the House prepares to recess today until October, I go with a clear conscience because, like most other hon. members, I do not really go into a period of vacation but I go to do other things which are necessary to serve the country and my constituents, and to play my part as a parliamentarian.

Miss MacDonald: That is not what Mr. Ouellet said.

Mr. Masters: We have heard many remarks from the other side on the uranium cartel. I do not propose to comment on that because I have colleagues who are better versed in the matter than I am. However, my experience tells me that once the matter is before the courts, and we have been assured that all material will be made available to the courts, the courts are the proper place for the issue to be discussed. If there are other items to be brought to light, the courts, in their wisdom and with the resources available to them, will do whatever is necessary. On that score I feel very comfortable that the Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Chrétien) has behaved most properly.

I have said that we are going to move on to other things as parliamentarians. While I respect this chamber, it does not give the total picture to the public of our duties and own work.

I shall just run through some of the activities in which I will be involved this summer. They will begin on Monday. I will now have an opportunity to be in my constituency on a weekday. This is not possible while the House is sitting, except on rare occasions. I think that most hon. members will recognize that although I am one of the more quiet members, I am usually here from Monday to Friday, as many of us are. I look forward to the opportunity of being able to spend some time in my riding with my constituents for a number of very good reasons.

On Monday an important report on the airport at Thunder Bay will be released to the public. I will be meeting with the mayor and council, the advisory committee which helped prepare the task force report, with the media and many members of the community. I will be able to hear what all of them have to say on this matter.

Transportation is vital to Canada. This is particularly true in Thunder Bay. But while transportation by air is of immense importance to Thunder Bay, I submit that the transportation system which passes through Thunder Bay is vitally important to the rest of the country, particularly to the west. The port at Thunder Bay still continues to be the major eastern port for western Canada through which flows grain, potash from Saskatchewan, coal from Alberta, and so on.

While we are supposedly on holidays this summer, many of my activities will be devoted to meeting with representatives of the Lakehead Harbour Commission, with railway officials and with a special committee of the city council of Thunder Bay in order to discuss the matter of rail transportation as it affects Thunder Bay. While that is parochial in a sense, because I am concerned about what happens in my own community, it is important that the transportation system of Canada remains strong and remains in a position to serve the needs of the country.

We all recognize that rail transportation and our transportation system in general has basically served the needs of the country well, but the question remains: will it be adequate for the future?

Along with many of my colleagues and people in the area, I will be investigating the rail situation in Thunder Bay to see that that end of it is able to handle the expected heavier traffic from the west. On a more intimate basis, I want to study with people who are more knowledgeable than I the ramifications of the recent report on the Seaway, the bottleneck problems at the Welland canal and so on. There is fear that unless something is done over the next few years while the port of Thunder

Bay is operating most efficiently, as it is at this time, by 1985, although it is expected it will be able to handle the expected movement of traffic and goods, it will have difficulty moving the goods down the full length of the seaway. I know that the Department of Transport, along with many other interested parties both in Canada and in our area in particular, is cognizant of that fact and will work toward that end. That project alone will take up a considerable part of the summer for me as a member of Parliament.

There are other things that members of Parliament do over the summer, especially those of us who have far-flung ridings. We have an opportunity to meet the people in our constituencies who like to talk to their member of Parliament and express their concerns first hand. Similarly, we have the opportunity to submit those concerns to the government of the day.

We all recognize that, for the most part, we try to express our concerns to the government in this chamber. But if matters were to end there, the public would not be as well served as it is. I recognize that I am among many members who have vastly more experience than I have been able to accumulate in the 18 months I have been here, but I have observed that ministers are receptive to what a private member has to say, no matter on which side of the House he or she sits. While we go the public route of expressing our concerns in the House, we also have the opportunity to discover individual problems of a constituent or a region. These can then be forcibly presented to the minister by letter, a telephone call or at a one to one meeting. We are then directed to the proper authority in the department. That is part of the process of being a parliamentarian that does not or should not end when the House recesses.

• (1530)

We are supposedly coming back on October 14. However, it should be noted that at any time should the need arise, this House can be called back into session. It is not as though we are going to leave here tonight to enjoy a blissful summer of doing nothing and no longer having any obligations.

Mr. Mazankowski: Tomorrow morning.

Mr. Masters: I thank the hon. member. Very early tomorrow morning. I always was a morning person. We should note for the record that this House can come together should the need arise. All hon. members, certainly those on this side, are prepared to do their duty.

The impression is sometimes gained that if this House is not sitting, the members no longer have any input into government. That is not correct.

Mr. Mazankowski: The minister said you needed a holiday.

Mr. Masters: What the minister probably had in mind is that we have a holiday from being here to go and do other things, something I look forward to. The demands of this past session have been very great on all of us. The committee work has been onerous. The hours have been long. I do not think any of us complain about that. However, a perspective starts to develop here that is not necessarily the perspective we should have concerning the country as a whole. In other words, there is the very real danger of our getting away from the people we are here to serve.

I look forward to the summer recess and to meeting people in all parts of my riding and in other parts of this country. As members of Parliament, it is our duty when possible to visit people in other parts of this land so that we understand our country better. I look forward to meeting these people in more than a cursory fashion. It is an opportunity to hear their complaints and concerns. It is an opportunity for me to acquire a proper perspective in order to represent my area and the country as a whole.

There is something else that I look forward to this summer. In addition to seeing the riding and getting into some of the specific problems regarding transportation, which have more than a parochial connotation and in fact have an impact on the rest of the country, I look forward to a very positive event. It has been positive for Thunder Bay which this summer will have the opportunity of hosting Les Jeux Canada Games 1981. Sometimes we must find other things to do and to think about. We need to find other devices to bring us together.

Les Jeux Canada Games 1981 will bring together over 3,000 athletes to compete in Thunder Bay from August 9 to 22. This is the first time Ontario has had the opportunity of hosting these games which to date have been very successful. I look forward to the most successful games ever this summer.

There is a real need for these games. It brings our young athletes together to test their mettle in an environment that is second only in size to the Olympics. The games will bring to the very centre of this country people from the east, the west, the north and the narrow strip of the south. These people will be able to talk about other things in terms of national unity and getting to know each other.

The games are being brought to Thunder Bay not only because of its geographic location and ability to handle this large scale undertaking. It was recognized that Thunder Bay is a new city in the scheme of things, having come into being only in 1970, combining the old cities of Port Arthur and Fort William. Like this country, it has had to go through a shakedown period, and still faces a real coming together. A statute does not bring people together. That has to come out of mutual trust and contact and takes time.

I am very pleased to report that the citizens of Thunder Bay and northwestern Ontario have rallied around this focal point, Les Jeux Canada Games 1981, and have stopped worrying about whether it is Port Arthur, Fort William, West Fort William or whatever. They know they have a big job to do. They have the opportunity of playing host to Canada for a very important national event. In doing that, our communities have come together.

Some 3,500 volunteer workers will be involved in the staging of these games. In a community of 118,000, when 3,500 people become intimately involved, this has a tremendously profound effect on the unification of the community. There is a feeling of pride in this coming together in Thunder Bay. This will spill over on August 9 when we proudly open the games and welcome Canadians from across Canada into our community. Easterners will be meeting westerners, Francophones and Anglophones will be together in one place. They will be doing something constructive, striving together for excellence and getting to know each other a lot better.

Sometimes during question period in this chamber we do the country a great disservice. The job of the opposition is to oppose. In opposing, you strike a negative connotation in most instances. It is a job that has to be done. Sometime, somehow, all of us in this House must find opportunities to say, "This is good, this is proper". By creating a negative attitude, we do not serve the country; we do it a disservice. We must learn to recognize what is good and distinguish that from what needs to be corrected. We must maintain a balance.

Les Jeux Canada Games 1981 gives us something else to think about. It is something we can point to with pride. Athletes will be coming from British Columbia, the prairie provinces, Newfoundland, the maritimes and central Canada. They will be meeting together as Canadians, not as easterners or westerners. We often hear the expression, "We are proud to be Canadian." Sometimes we have difficulty in defining whether a Canadian is a Canadian or a Canadian from western Canada or a Canadian from eastern Canada or a Canadian from Newfoundland. However, at an event like Les Jeux Canada Games 1981, we come together as Canadians. I hope that that thought and feeling might have the chance to last a little longer.

As I mentioned earlier, there are many reasons why I look forward to the summer recess. It is not that I want to take a vacation, although I hope I have an opportunity to spend a little more time with my family, as all hon. members would like to do. I want to spend time with my grandchildren, but primarily I will have an opportunity to look at some of the matters which are pressing to northwestern Ontario but also have some impact, I respectfully submit, on the rest of the country. I look forward to having the chance to meet with people and to give them the time I cannot always give. None of us can do so the way we would like while this House is in session. It is only by being able to sit down with individual family men, businessmen and farmers that we can get away from the abstracts and get to the realities. Then we can come back and really try again collectively as a House to do the things which are necessary to continue this country's growth and prosperity.

Despite all the negative things which have been said, I think we can take a great deal of pride in Canada's progress over the last few years. I know hon. members opposite recognize the good things about our country. I hope when they have had an opportunity to reflect over the summer months, they will find that there are opportunities to say positive things. A good idea does not belong to any one party. If it is adopted, if it is good and if it works, everyone should admit it. We have that duty to the people of Canada so that their spirit is raised once in a while. We have a tendency in this chamber to make them feel down sometimes. I do not think we do that intentionally; I suppose it is just the nature of the beast.

As we go into the summer recess, I might say that it is not really a vacation period for any of us in this chamber. It is an opportunity to do other things and to come back in the fall—unless we are called back, for whatever reason, before that, which is still very possible, as we all recognize—recharged and prepared to continue to serve this great country of ours in a more positive fashion.

If I may be allowed just one last commercial, I hope the 1981 Canada Games in Thunder Bay will do its part from August 9 to 22 to provide a unifying voice here in Canada.

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in contributing to this debate I would like to touch briefly on a number of subjects, but first I would like to address myself to the events of the last few hours. All of us do silly things on occasion. The government party, for all its failings, usually can be expected to show a modicum of common sense, at least when it comes to questions of political tactics. In the last few days the party which forms the Official Opposition has been going through weird and wonderful motions to extricate itself from the awkward position its members irresponsibly talked it into. A little while ago they stood as fools for everyone to see. However, the government suddenly let them off the hook totally and made a fool of itself with what should initially have been a good proposition. That has to do with the importance and the good common sense there is in having this Parliament adjourn during this period of Post Office negotiations.

I listened yesterday with a great deal of interest to the comments of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan). He said—and I agree—that anyone with any experience at all in industrial relations would have to agree that if we expect either of the parties, particularly the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, to make any movement in their position in terms of Post Office negotiations, it has to be made clear—and the possibility of parliamentary adjournment provides for that—that there will be no intervention by Parliament to bring an end to the free collective bargaining process and the right to strike. To do otherwise, particularly with the addition of the irresponsible comments being made by representatives of the Conservative party, would simply delay, delay and delay the opportunity for a peaceful settlement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kristiansen: We all know it is important, and many of our constituents feel it is very urgent, that this dispute be settled soon, but it is even more important in the longer term public interest that when the new Post Office Crown corporation begins its work later this year as an independent agency, there should be, as much as is humanly possible, restored to that operation some good faith relationships between management and labour so that when they try to get their act together in an administrative way, they can also have an end, hopefully, to the built in hostility which has been locked into that institution for the last several years.

In addressing that locked in hostility which we all know has been created, we must realize that one of the reasons for it was that the Post Office was set apart from those laws in this country which allow other working people the right to have a say in technological change. When major changes took place within the Canada Post Office over the last few years and working people were denied the opportunity to have any direct say in how their lives would be affected and how the existence of their jobs would be affected, we were sowing the seeds we have been reaping ever since.

We are finally at a position where we have a management and a union which, in a sense, deserve each other. It is difficult to say where the problem started. What came first—the chicken or the egg? However, once we get into that situation, the last thing we want to do is to raise irresponsible ideas in this House which will make the matter fester even more and build in deeper the deep-rooted hostility which surely it is within the public interest that we eliminate.

I find it difficult to find appropriate words to describe the near contempt I feel toward the irresponsible jibberish which has been emanating from parts of this House over the last few days on this subject. Members of Parliament certainly realize some of the horror stories within the Post Office. I think we realize them more than anyone else because we get letters, when the mail is moving, we get telephone calls and we are constantly hearing from constituents about the problems and frustrations they have when dealing with that organization. There is no doubt that it has gone downhill over the last few years.

I find it particularly annoying to get mail from constituents bawling me out for not answering correspondence I have not received, and then I finally get the first letter after I have written back trying to explain what happened. I am sure I am not the only member of this House who has been through that exercise.

Hopefully, we are going through a period now when some of the hostilities will wear down. Hopefully there will be an amicable settlement sooner rather than later, but later if it must be. It is important to build an agreement with which both parties can live in a constructive way but, as I said earlier, it is even more important to set the new Post Office Crown corporation off on an even keel and give it a chance for success.

There has to be an opportunity to introduce new mechanisms, new management processes, and a new climate of industrial relations into that organization. Part of that, and there is provision for it in the new corporation, is to give the people who work in the Post Office an opportunity to have a say in management. That may seem like a pretty far out idea considering the hostility there has been, but I can speak with some personal experience, having been an employee of a corporation which for almost ten years now has had employees on its board of directors. While it did not eliminate the adversary system, which is a process appropriate to the grievance procedure and collective bargaining, it did lead to a much more understanding relationship. By checking out ideas before they were put into practice, we were able to provide employees with a feeling that they were genuinely participating in their own future. This is particularly important to the younger generation of workers. Indeed, the Post Office is a classic example of that, particularly in the major centres. They must find an outlet for the increased education and interest among today's generation of workers.

It saves money. Engineers can come up with all kinds of beautiful plans, whether for a postal system or a sawmill, but unless you check it out first and get some real input from the people involved in the industry, you are going to be wasting hundreds of thousands of dollars, sometimes hundreds of millions of dollars which could otherwise be saved. Again speaking from some personal experience, I know that money is saved and there is a great deal of production time saved as well. You can increase productivity, profits, you can increase good labour management relations. All of those put together are what we need in the Post Office if it is to serve Canadians properly.

Because we do not get the chance very often, Mr. Speaker, to deal with certain subjects in this House, I would like to say a few words now about the Canadian forest industry and some of its needs. Forestry is Canada's number one industry in many respects. It produces a greater share of our net trade surplus than does mining, fisheries, agriculture and energy, including both oil and gas, put together. That is not commonly known. It produces more jobs and revenue per investment dollar than do fisheries and agriculture, and it directly or indirectly provides close to one out of ten jobs in Canada.

The problem is that the industry, and those persons and communities dependent on it, are so widely scattered and diversified across this country that, in fact, they suffer from invisibility, not only to the public but particularly to politicians and governments, especially federal. Being everywhere, the industry is seen to be nowhere. Many members of this House and their assistants do not appear to recognize that the industry in many cases is the biggest employer and the most significant economic and political constituency within their own ridings.

That is a very odd situation. Most politicians are assumed to be a little more sensitive than that. When a lay-off or closure takes place in that industry, usually it is 100, 300 or 400 people affected rather than the thousands who are affected in the auto industry in Ontario. It does not make national headlines and does not appear in The Globe and Mail in the mornings before question period. That creates again a disadvantage not only for that industry, but for everyone of us, for government budgets, and for all the spending plans which each of us may cherish in our own way.

The forest revenues, which should be renewable, as well as the industry, suffer the same fate because the impact of such a closure is scattered in our communities. Canadians, whether they be private citizens, legislators or governments, simply cannot see the lack of forest for the trees. Again, being everywhere it is seen to be nowhere.

This is beginning to change, to the point where all levels of government are now beginning to pay at least lip service to the importance of that industry, the need for action and expanded private and public investment. However, the dollars are still far short of the minimum required, although they have finally stopped shrinking. While it is a subject which lacks political sex appeal, it is a vitally important industry and is extremely relevant to Canada's future. As the coalition of forest management, labour and professionals solidifies and expands—a process which is well under way in British Columbia and beginning in other parts of the country—it may well become increasingly relevant in a political sense. I would urge all members and the government to begin taking it more seriously.

About a year ago, a Mr. Les Reed was appointed associate deputy minister responsible for the Canadian Forest Service. That appointment was seen as a symbol of change and was welcomed by industry management, labour and professionals right across the country. However, we have been waiting and waiting. While there are some good, sound recommendations coming from that service and the deputy, again supported by the industry, we have yet to see meaningful action come out of Treasury Board or the Department of Finance which will give the go ahead to these recommendations so vital to the industry's future. I would urge all members of the government to take these proposals very seriously.

I suspect one of the problems in cabinet is that the forest industry, in spite of the fact it is number one in so many ways in this country, is totally outgunned when it comes to the inner circles of government where the decisions are made. As I said earlier, the forest industry contributes more to our net trade balance than mining, agriculture, fisheries and energy. Yet if you compare those five sectors with forestry, you find they have five ministers as opposed to a half or one third of a minister responsible for forestry because the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) has several other key responsibilities. He is outnumbered about 15 to one, in fact, in cabinet when it comes to pressing the case of an industry which has so much more to contribute in terms of growth. They are talking now about the possibility of the doubling of real forestry revenues in Canada by the year 2000. That is a possibility if we get our act together soon. However, because it is outgunned in cabinet to that extent, and because of the relative invisibility of that important industry, we are not getting results and people are getting more and more impatient.

In April of this year, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Forestry Association sent a letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) which I would like to quote from very briefly. It said:

> At the recent annual meetings of the Canadian Forestry Association and our national forestry forum, there was unanimous agreement that I write to you requesting formation of a forestry task force or special forestry subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

The letter goes on:

> The proposed Forestry Task Force or special sub-committee would allow selected members of the House of Commons to develop an in-depth picture on forests and forest use across Canada. It should be concerned with the resource as well as its many applications to society, particularly as the latter relates to present and future employment and development, as well as to its other direct and indirect values to our country.
> This Forestry Task Force or special sub-committee should be small enough to form a viable working group, should include the Minister of Environment or his designate, the official forestry critics from the Opposition Parties, as well as at least three other members of Parliament who have demonstrated interest and a knowledge on the subject. They should have sufficient funds to enable them to travel (primarily in Canada), to meet key people and visit representative as well as outstanding examples of forestry in practice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being four o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

THE CONSTITUTION

AMENDMENT RESPECTING TIMING OF FEDERAL GENERAL ELECTIONS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot) moved that Bill C-252, to amend the Constitution of Canada (federal general elections), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

● (1600)

He said: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might say at the outset that this is a good time for a motion such as this one to come before the House. It has been a somewhat comfortable period of time since the last election. I would not want to deceive anyone by telling him that the atmosphere in the House has been comfortable, but certainly the amount of time since the last election has been adequate. Yet, it will be some time in the normal course of events before the next election is called.

I should like to talk about including predictability in the government's calling of federal elections. Going back to the times of Sir John A. MacDonald, the first Prime Minister of Canada, during the Riel rebellion, in the heat and discomfort of that summer, dissolved Parliament for the calling of a federal election. The last election was actually called as recently as 1979, since the one forcing out the Conservative government was caused by a loss of confidence in the House of Commons. People can reflect back upon the last election call in 1979. There were expectations in early 1977 that we were going into an election. All through 1977, 1978 and 1979 the citizens of Canada were on hold, basically believing that an election was coming right away.

Essentially, my bill would provide a situation in which four years from the last election we could expect another election. To say that an election will fall on every anniversary date four years hence would cause some logistic problems. For example, the most recent election was a February election; it would commit us for a long period of time to having elections every February. Clause 1 of my bill seeks to repeal section 50 of the act to allow the government four months, either before or after the anniversary date, in which to call an election. Virtually, it is an eight-month leeway or four months either side of the anniversary date. Then the citizens of Canada would know that an election would take place within a specified time-frame. It ought not to be the prerogative of any government to hold off its best legislation, then put it through and, as a surprise, spring an election on the public. Certainly during the years when Lester B. Pearson was the Prime Minister of Canada the country was polled to sample the public mood. When the mood was felt to be a bit sour from the perspective of the government, there was no election announcement; but when the polls showed that it looked right for a win, the government went to the people.

What is wrong with the system as it exists now? The presumption is that the purpose of Parliament is to serve the government in power, whereas the presumption ought to be that the purpose of Parliament is to serve the people of Canada. They should be able to put in place their government, and the tools which make this place function ought not to be solely in the hands of the government. The government should not have the power to dictate, on the basis of polls favourable to it, the calling of an election. In the case of the 1979 election, the government held off for three years before finally calling an election. It would have been only a few more months before the Governor General would have been required to call an election.

The right opportunity for a win is not reason enough for an election to be called. If this bill were passed, the citizens of Canada would know that on the anniversary date four years from the last election, either four months later or four months earlier, or at any time within that time-frame the next election would take place. It would mean that opposition parties, government parties and the citizens of Canada would know what is going on. If the government holds off its best legislation until that period, then they would know what is up. It would be much better than what appear to be deceptive methods used now, where there is ongoing polling and the calling of an election when the government finds the time to be right. The government utilizes its ability to gather information in order to retain power. Elections are called today for the extension of power. They are not called, as they ought to be, with the presumption in mind that the people are the ones who should decide when an election is called.

There has been an ongoing manipulation in the calling of elections. This has been unfair, and the public has been deeply dissatisfied. In 1979, the public expected a snap election. Rumours were flying for at least all of 1977 and all of 1978, which was the normal year for an election. It did not come about because the polls were not ready. Then we were approaching the date in 1979 when the government would have been forced to call it. Yet, the government went almost to the death knell waiting for something to break, but leaving the people hanging as if somehow the running of this institution is only to satisfy the savouring of power by the elected government. I could say that of any party; it ought not to be its power nor that presumption.

I had the experience of attending a university in the United States for six years of my life. While there are aspects of the American system to be commended, others to be criticized and some to be condemned, I sensed the fact that they know that every four years they would elect their president and government made it a much more satisfactory arrangement than the one in Canada where we can have a majority government which on some issue it thinks is popular with the people can call an election and go for another majority government. This process is not used very much in the Parliament of Canada, but it is in some of the provincial legislatures.

We could have a majority government with a two, three or four-year range in which it can actually tease the people by saying that it will be going early. I do not think a majority government should be going early. It was sent to govern. If it has the people, it should be governing; it should not be talking about an election. Also it should not be tormenting the minds of citizens with the notion that next month there will be an election, and then not calling it. The people then wait for the next month, and it does not come. This keeps going on. The people wonder whether there will be a winter election. Then we come into the spring and through the whole next year, and still no election. It tortures the minds of Canadians in terms of when the members of this institution will be replaced. It is simply unsatisfactory.

I realize that putting a fixed formula in place has its limits in that it defies the parliamentary system. My bill would take care of that situation by providing a leeway of 40 days on either side, because a minority government could fall and the election could be called in the midst of winter.

I am sure hon. members will remember that the February election was rather uncomfortable. As an Albertan, I went about knocking on doors in Saskatchewan, and I should like to tell hon. members who are not from that province that it is pretty cold there in February. The steel doors on some of the houses were even colder. Four months later the election could have been held in the spring, and its anniversary date would have been sometime later.

I know how private members' hour works. If the subject matter is talked out, that means those who have talked it out will have denied what the citizens of this country want with regard to having some predictability. They do not want the government, this government or any other, using the election process purely for political reasons. I will sit down soon since this is not a bill which requires great and extensive explanation. The citizens of Canada know its value. They believe in predictability and want it. I expect that there will probably be a speaker from the New Democratic Party, which is normal. There should be one speaker from the Liberal Party. But if the Liberals choose to put up speaker after speaker until five o'clock, then the people of Canada will be denied the opportunity to have some predictability about when elections occur. That is symptomatic of what they are demonstrating here. They would like to cling to the power they have and embrace it to themselves and call an election for political reasons, not necessarily seeing it as serving the people of Canada but, rather, serving the political party in power. I believe that this bill, while simple in its form, has a great deal to merit its adoption.

I hope that hon. members will make a couple of short speeches and let this bill pass before five o'clock. As I have said, those who choose to speak until five o'clock are effectively denying Canadians the right to know when the next election is coming up, at least this is so in my own riding where I have conducted a simple poll. If Canadians know when the next election is to occur, they can work toward it. This allows them to believe that the government does not hold all the power with respect to when an election is called and to use that power at its whim.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to make a few comments about the bill which is before us today. I must say that it is an engaging piece of legislation and one with which I have some sympathy. Perhaps what outweighs any possible advantages I see in the bill is that in my opinion it is not fitting that a short private member's bill should be the avenue for changing our parliamentary system. This bill would perhaps cause the most radical change to our system if it were adopted. I am not saying it is a bad thing, but it is something which must be given a great deal more thought. Thus, in speaking on this bill I am not in any way saying we should not be looking at it in a serious way, but I do not think this is the proper vehicle to bring about this change.

The parliamentary system, as we know it in Canada, Great Britain and many other countries, is based on the notion that the executive, that is, the cabinet, has these powers but it is nonetheless at the mercy of Parliament. If Parliament decides at some particular point in time to vote against a government on a major issue, as took place on December 13, 1979, then the government is defeated and an election must ensue.

I can see some great advantage to having a fixed term. Certainly if you are sitting on this side of the House, as members opposite did a year or two ago, there is a great advantage to having a fixed term. It was of great advantage to my party a few weeks ago, when we were dealing with a major money bill, and we had only five or six more votes than the opposition. There are many times when members on this side of the House must be here. Anyone in government will know you have to be here more often than do members of the opposition since you do not know how many of them will come out to vote. There is a great deal of insecurity caused by this situation.

I would like to look at the American system for a moment. I think more of us are familiar with that system, perhaps, than with any other system, with the exception of our own. I would like to look at a system which operates under fixed terms, a two-year term for congressmen, a four-year term for the president and the executive, and usually a six-year term for the Senate. These terms are set out in the constitution and there is no possibility of change with regard to them. I think we should look at this system to see the advantages and disadvantages associated with it and then adopt the best provisions for our system.

For a good portion of my life I have been very interested in the American system of government. I spent a great deal of time studying the American system of government in university, and I have visited Washington many times. I am always amazed at how the Americans make the system work at all. It is a system in which the executive body is separate from the legislative body. In our system, they are one and the same. In the American system, there are so many checks and balances. For a long time it has been a mystery to me how bills ever get through the American system. One of the major reasons for this is the intense politicization which goes on in the United States. People are constantly lobbying their representatives. Politics is a deadly serious game. One of the reasons for this is that bills are initiated in the Congress or the Senate where there is no tight party discipline. If a bill is defeated, the government does not fall.

Let us look at some of the advantages and disadvantages of this type of system. I think one of the real advantages to the American system is the fact that it is much less adversarial than our system. In that system, you cannot sit down and make a deal with another member. In ours, you can sit down and reach agreement with your opposite number, which means that we are not constantly exchanging violent and rabid debate. We are not constantly fighting. As time goes on, and certainly with the advent of television in the chamber, and the upgrading of the question period, I feel that the adversarial part of our system is not working well. Some strains are developing because we are constantly fighting with each other. Perhaps the fight might not be as real, but the public perceives us as being constantly in a quarrel. That is not true to the same extent in the United States. There is no question that the fact that one may vote on one side or the other side of the issue and that party discipline is not nearly as strong is one of those things which removes the adversarial part of it, and I think that is an extremely important fact.

I have talked to congressmen and I have talked to people who work in the congressional office. I have talked to lobbyists in the United States. There is constant, ongoing lobbying and constant politics. Someone from another party may absolutely and entirely disagree with one's views; two people may disagree, a Democrat and a Republican, but one may still make a deal with them and say, "Do not be too harsh on this, and I will not be too harsh on that." That is constantly going on. I think that a lot of this, or most of this, comes from this fixed term idea. This is where one of the big disadvantages come in. When there is constant lobbying going on, when there is constant pressure, and when individuals are singled out, they could fall one way or the other on a bill when it is an individual sort of thing; and there is a great danger—I do not say that it is widespread—of corruption developing. As a matter of fact, I think Canadians get the backlash of this. Canadians look at the American political scene. American TV portrays congressmen as being politicians with their fingers in the till, as being people who are in some way corrupt. One sees this constant discussion about corruption in American politics. There is wheeling and dealing going on.

Mr. Malone: And in Canadian politics?

Mr. McRae: I think most of it is upright; but there is wheeling and dealing going on all the time, and we do not have that here.

Mr. Malone: You want to bet?

Mr. McRae: Maybe in committee we might sit down and make a deal on a certain amendment, but it is very rare. In the American system, it is a constant thing.

Mr. Malone: Where have you been?

Mr. McRae: We are politicians in this House, as there are politicians in the American Congress and in the American Senate. However, because of the closeness to the American scene, the fact that Canadians are exposed to American TV and so on, Canadians begin to see politicians in this light, as wheelers and dealers, as people who have fingers in the till, or people who are being influenced by this lobbyist or that lobbyist. That is not the correct picture in this House of Commons.

Certainly, there are some lobby groups which will come around; but basically speaking, we do not make deals, because we tend to be in an adversarial situation. One of the disadvantages that I think stems from this fixed term is that one develops this constant political activity, and from that comes some corruption, and from that comes the notion that politicians, in some way or another, are seedy characters who are influenced by groups which may or may not be on the up and up, and so on. Therefore, this is one of the disadvantages that I see. One leaves oneself open for the kind of corruption, or the kind of apprehended corruption, which is really not possible under our system.

I suppose I could count on one hand, in nine years in this House, the number of times that I have actually sat down with an hon. member opposite and said, "Can we get this thing through, or can we do something like that?" It is just not done to any great extent. It is done by the House leader, but it is usually only done at that level. There may be people who have opportunities to do more of this, but I do not think that is the situation. I think it is a shame that we as Canadian politicians and as members of Parliament are labelled as wheeler-dealers, because we really are not. We really do operate in this House in a very adversarial way, in a much more adversarial way than do the Americans.

I think there are other things we could say in terms of advantages and disadvantages. I have a feeling that when there is a fixed term, as there is in the United Stats, the election is constantly in progress. One knows the date, one always has it in one's mind, and one is working toward it constantly. When we are in this situation where we do not have a fixed date, where we have some kind of feeling that in three years down the line, or every four to four and one-half years, there will be an election in this country, one is not so tied down to a date and to an idea that one must meet a certain objective.

I watch the American congressional elections, and certainly, the presidential elections. I think that for a good two years, the Americans are at it. They have this date for the presidential election well in front of them. They are into primaries, pre-primaries, post-primaries, and a whole host of things, and it goes on for years and years. I do not think that is the case, to the same degree, in this country. Certainly we are well aware of the fact that two or three years down the line, that will happen. However, if there is not a fixed day, something that one can really grab, then I am not so sure that people tend to take it nearly as seriously or work only toward that objective, as they do in the American system. I think that is a rather bad feature of the American system. Again, it lends itself to that intense politicization which carries some dangers with it.

I do not come down on either side, because I thought about it. This is not something that I just thought about ten minutes ago, picked up and said that I would speak on it. I have thought about it a great deal. I want to say that I have not really decided, in my own mind, which way we should go. First, I would very much like to see steps in this House, through our parliamentary system, to limit, to cut down the amount of adversarial activity which goes on. Really, between parties, we are not all that far apart.

Mr. Malone: Oh, yes, we are!

Mr. McRae: Certainly, there are people on all sides who relate very well to people in other parties.

Mr. Malone: Not to you!

Mr. McRae: That is true. I may be one of the more progressive members of my party, but there are certainly people in my party who feel differently from me. It is certainly a good thing that we are able to sit down and talk to each other after we leave this House. But still and all, I think it is important that we work toward a less adversarial system. I think we should be trying to find more common denominators than we have. However, I have some really serious worries about intense politicization, the fact that we will be lobbying each other, and that we will be lobbied by everyone else if we come into a fixed term.

Therefore, for these two reasons, I would not support this bill at this stage, although I think there is a concept here which is really worth looking at. I go back again to say that I think it should be looked at in a much broader way, than just in a private members' bill. This is no reflection on the private member. I welcomed the fact that he raised it. However, we must also remember that the basic parliamentary system is based on the idea that the executive has the confidence of Parliament, and that when it loses that confidence of Parliament, that is, when it is defeated by Parliament, the government ceases to exist and an election is encouraged.

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C-252 is to provide an element of predictability in the calling of federal general elections at fixed dates, thereby replacing British North America Act section 50 which reads as follows:

> Every House of Commons shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs—

Section 50 could be repealed or amended to read as follows:

> Every Parliament shall continue until dissolved by the Governor General, which shall be not sooner than four years less forty days, nor later than four years plus forty days—

In fact , it would be established that general elections would be called at fixed dates every four years.

Of course, when the bill was introduced in the House, one of its supporters, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone), emphasized certain positive aspects, but with very little conviction, it must be admitted. It has been said, for instance, that if the dates were fixed we would be able to gather on Parliament Hill on July 1 and hand out certificates and other things. That is a positive aspect of rather limited value. On the other hand, we must recognize that such a decision, in my opinion, would lead to radical changes in the operation of Canada's current political system. A government in office must indeed enjoy a certain flexibility. It will always be argued that such a flexibility will be used only for political and partisan purposes, the fact of being able to extend a mandate somewhat, and hon. members opposite believe that the intent is simply to leave enough room for the government to call the elections at the best time, at the most appropriate opportunity.

However, it must also be realized that in order to administer the country properly and run the country's business, a government must have a certain flexibility. It must be realized as well that at times when crises occur and a government cannot set a date to adjourn Parliament and simply forget what is happening. For all these reasons, I find it somewhat strange to have such a bill before the House when we have so many more important matters to discuss. We could discuss setting fixed dates for sessions, such as is the case for the National Assembly in Quebec. We would then know when the session would begin and when it would end. There are many other important issues that could be discussed in this House. We could talk about parliamentary reform.

However, I do not believe that the bill now before the House should receive so much attention or deserves as much consideration as the hon. member opposite seems to want to give it. I shall therefore be very brief and simply say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not consider it most urgent or necessary to approve this bill. In my opinion, if we were to decide that this bill is more important than we realize, I would prefer that it be referred to a subcommittee to be studied in depth. However, for my part, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree that this is so, and I must say that I really cannot support this bill.

• (1630)

[English]

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this bill and commend the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) for bringing it before the House for discussion. This bill in no way suggests that we eliminate the British parliamentary system in favour of the American system. It provides that the government must always maintain and retain the confidence of the House in order to stay in power. In spite of what the hon. member for Thunder Bay Atikokan (Mr. McRae) suggested, I think that is the difference between the two systems. At no time does the bill suggest that the government should stay in power for four years if it loses the confidence of the House. But, as the hon. member for Crowfoot said, it provides an element of predictability.

As things are today, we do not know when an election will be called; it could be at any time during a five-year period. The only thing that we do know is that it must be held five years from the time of the last election. That is the only fixed date we have, and it is seldom used by governments in this country, provincial or federal.

I think the hon. member should be commended for his bill and I should like hon. members of the House to consider the merits of it. Does the bill do away with some of the difficulties we experience today as the result of having no fixed day for an election? If so, the sensible thing would be to send the subject matter of the bill to a committee where necessary changes could be made to it. The hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan mentioned he also had some thoughts along this line and it is possible that other members have as well. If the bill should go to committee, then we could receive input from different parts of the country and in the end, have a better Elections Act than we have at present.

One of the objections that I have to the present act is that it disenfranchises too many people. For instance, an election may be called during holiday time. No one knows how to plan his extramural activities in order to make sure that he is in the constituency at the time of the election. There have been elections in the months of June, July, August and September and, as a result, many people have claimed that they were disenfranchised. The election must be called within a limited number of days from the date of the proclamation, and there is a proposal before the House to reduce that from the present 63 days. Many people could be out of the country or away at college or doing anything at all and, under the present system, they could be disenfranchised. It could be argued that if there were a fixed date for an election, people would still be disenfranchised, but the number would be few because, generally speaking, they would know the date of election.

This bill provides that an election be held forthwith on the defeat of the government as is the case at the present time, and I would not want to see that changed. A government should never remain in power when it has lost the confidence of the representatives of the people. On the other hand, although this bill would make the date of the election flexible, it would give the government the opportunity to set a date for the election if it should lose the confidence of the House. It also has the advantage that instead of having a general election, the Governor General could call upon the Leader of the Opposition to form a government. That might well save the expense of an election, if the leader could get the confidence of the majority of the members of the House. An exact date would have a great deal of merit. But that has some disadvantages. This bill has suggested that 40 days be added or taken away from that particular date. That concept has some advantages and some disadvantages and is another reason why the bill should go to committee to be discussed. We should not think because we have one method now—that of calling an election only when the government wants to call one—that there is no better way.

The strength of the present system gives the Prime Minister of the country or a premier of a province the opportunity to call an election at a time most advantageous for his particular party. It might not be most advantageous for many people or in line with the general thinking of the population. Consequently, the present election system favours the party in power. That might be all right if you are in power, but if you are not in power, people could have different views with regard to that point. Putting the power in the hands of the prime minister or a premier of a province to call an election when he or she wants and when it is most advantageous for a particular party gives an advantage to one party rather than to the people.

However, there are some disadvantages with regard to a fixed date for an election. Some people say a fixed date means you have a four-year election campaign. I am not so sure that is so. In the period from April, 1977, through to 1979, thousands of people in Canada wanted an election, but it was not called until well on into 1979. The election was called almost at the time it was mandatory. Campaigning went on in anticipation of that election for almost two years. I suppose in the United States it goes on for four years. That same situation occurs here, too. I start my election campaign the day after I am elected by trying to serve the people who elected me. I think every hon. member should be doing that. All of us look forward to the next election whether it is a fixed date or not. I do not think that aspect will change very much. However, I think this bill has enough merit to go to a committee so we can get input from the people in the provinces. I emphasize the words so splendidly spoken by the mover of this motion that the bill not be talked out but that the merits of it, or otherwise, be looked at by a committee in order that we can have the best general election act possible in the country.

Hon. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the speeches made by hon. members concerning Bill C-252. When I look at a piece of legislation, I always ask myself the following questions: who will win, who will lose, who will benefit and who will not benefit. Immediately I see that the person who will not benefit is the prime minister of Canada. He would lose the power to call a general election at his convenience.

I think hon. members will recognize that when the prime minister does call an election at his convenience or otherwise, he has to live or die with the decision he takes. There is responsibility in the decision in that he must abide by the results of his action.

I thought it would be interesting to take a look at what has happened in the past. I ask hon. members to cast their minds back to 1957. An election was called by the then prime minister, Louis St. Laurent. He was defeated. We had an election in 1958 called by the then prime minister, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, who won the most overwhelming electoral victory Canada had ever seen. In 1962 an election was called by the then prime minister, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, who suffered the most significant loss of parliamentary seats that has ever been suffered by a prime minister. Such was the majority gained in 1958 that he was able to continue in power until 1963. In 1963 the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker lost the confidence of the House of Commons and he was eventually defeated at the polls. In 1965, the Right Hon. Lester Pearson called an election without a cause. He was rebuffed by the electorate. In 1968 an election was called by the newly elected leader of the Liberal Party who later became prime minister, the Right Hon. Pierre Trudeau. He received a substantial majority in that election. In 1972 he called an election at his convenience and was severely rebuffed by the electorate. He hung on to power with two seats. In 1974 the House of Commons again voted non-confidence in the Trudeau government, but his government was restored to power by the people of Canada.

Mr. Kilgour: That was a real tragedy.

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): In 1979 the Right Hon. Pierre Trudeau called an election and he lost that election significantly. In 1980 when the House expressed non-confidence in the Conservative government, the government headed by the Right Hon. Pierre Trudeau was restored.

Mr. Kilgour: That was another tragedy.

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Even though a prime minister may have this power to call an election, if hon. members look at what has happened, this power has not been abused. It is a power prime ministers have had to pay for having.

There seems to be no correlation between when a prime minister calls an election and what the results are. I would say there are two exceptions, however. In 1958 Mr. Diefenbaker used the power with devastating effect and in 1968 Mr. Trudeau used the power with devastating effect and in 1968 there was another set of circumstances at play. Both Mr. Stanfield, who was then leader of the Conservative Party, and Mr. Trudeau who was then the leader of the Liberal Party, were new and both were seeking mandates. The election of 1968 was welcomed by both sides. If we want to change the system, we must first find out where the abuses are. Have there been abuses? There has been no evidence, at least in the last 20 years, of abuse.

Mr. Malone: In 1979.

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): In 1979, the hon. member who is the sponsor of the bill says. I refer hon. members to what happened in 1979. The prime minister of the day was defeated. A new government took office. The point of the exercise is that the prime minister, having the power to call an election at his convenience, called it and he was defeated. It may be that he used the power incorrectly or he called the election at the wrong time. But I cannot understand hon. members saying that that was an abuse of power.

If you can find only one exception in the last 20 years, it seems to me there is no powerful case to be made, and the hon. member has not been able to make it.

I want to take another look at the equation. Specifically, who wins and who loses? In this case the prime minister would lose. Who would win?

Mr. Kilgour: Democracy.

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona says that democracy would win. I do not see how democracy would win by having an election on a fixed date.

Mr. Malone: Because the people would know.

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): The hon. member for Bow River indicated in his argument that it would be more convenient to have an election on a specific day. But convenient for whom? It would be convenient certainly for those of us in the House of Commons. He has indicated some doubt as to whether the totality of the population would benefit from the concept of an election at a fixed time. I see no particular argument for a fixed date. If one takes a look at what actually goes on, we do have elections at fixed times. We have an election on the average about every three and a half years. By stating an election must be held every four years we would be denying the Canadian people the opportunity to pass comment on their elected representatives more often than they do now.

• (1650)

I do not advance that as a serious argument, but I do say that the arguments of convenience or predictability do not hold much water. I say that for two reasons. First, there would be no predictability, as we have seen in the last 20 years. We have had three elections where governments have lost the confidence of the House. Under the bill of the hon. member for Crowfoot, we would still have elections. Those elections would be held when the time came, irrespective of whether or not there was a fixed time. The next election, presumably, if it went to its full term, would be held four years, plus or minus 40 days in advance or behind, a total of an 80-day variation.

Again we are not looking at predictable times or fixed times. What we are looking at is a bracketing of times. We are looking basically at removing flexibility in the system and putting it into a system which would have that much less flexibility.

We have to see what are the abuses we want to correct. The hon. member has not been able to adduce any. What are the benefits we would achieve by making this change and the benefits we would get by some form of predictability? On his own evidence and in his own bill, this would not be very much more predictable than that which we already have.

If the hon. member is not able to make a case that is powerful and strong in terms of abuses and powerful and strong in terms of benefits, why should we proceed to committee? Why should we put more time into this kind of proposal when the hon. member has not made his own case?

I want to deal with some of the questions which were raised by the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. McRae), that is the question of the American system versus the Canadian system. I must confess that I have a completely different focus of attention than he does. What we are dealing with is not necessarily the Congressional system versus the parliamentary system. We are looking at two contrasting parliamentary systems. It is important to recognize that when the American revolution took place, they basically adopted the British Parliament way and froze it. We have taken the British system since that time as it has developed and grown. Consequently out of that we have had two distinct political cultures.

One of the things people complain about in our system is that it is too adversarial. It may very well be, but by and large what we are here to do is to argue out different points of view. We are here to argue in this House at least three separate points of view on the issues that come before us. There is nothing in the party structures in the House that I have ever seen that has prohibited the very strong presentation of the regional point of view. In my view, nothing has stopped the government of the day from accepting those regional points of view in decisions that are made.

I can recall when I was in opposition that we had a problem with VIA Rail. The minister of transport of the day sat down with the two members concerned. We discussed it and he came forward with a solution which, while not everything that I asked for, certainly took into account the needs of my region. I have seen ministers on this side do that time and time again as well. There is an attempt to accommodate. I make the argument that while there is a political structure that operates in an adversarial way, that merely takes into account the kind of political culture we have and the types of political parties we have.

The second point I make is there is also room in the system, as we have all seen, to ensure that the regional interests and local interests of members are taken into account and to ensure that the government is flexible enough to take into account those needs which members on all sides of the House see as important to their areas, constituencies and regions.

I argue that when one starts to tamper with a system in a constitutional sense, the arguments to do so have to be powerful and strong. The point the hon. member is getting at in his bill is not one to be solved by dealing with the constitutional structure of the land. Instead, it is one that has to be dealt with in terms of the context of what I would call the political culture of Canada in the way in which we as parties organize ourselves in the House of Commons and in the country and the way in which we find it necessary to avoid setting any kind of fixed schedule which interferes with the political programs and activities we have in mind. I have been an advocate of fixed sitting terms for the House of Commons.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): So have I.

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rain River): We have not succeeded in being able to do that because by and large most members have found that it is more convenient for them in terms of the political responsibility which they bear not to fix the sessions of the House of Commons. The same argument applies equally, and perhaps more forcefully, to the constitutional proposal that my friend from Crowfoot has advocated.

I confess to having another reason for being concerned with proceeding with this bill. When you have a system that is seen by the Canadian people and the electorate as being reasonably acceptable and fair—note I did not say absolute but seen as a workable system and fair—it strikes me that when we begin to tamper with it, without powerful reasons for so doing, we begin to chip away at the kind of confidence that we have built up laboriously in our system over a long period of time.

I raise the point because if you look at the activities of a democratic system of government across the whole world, this kind of system of responsibility to the electorate is very much in peril and very much in a minority in the world. It is a system that is not growing. It is not a system where other countries are moving in to take advantage of it. We see a great many adaptations but we do not see the kind of four square democratic process that we enjoy in the North American and western countries. It is not a system that is growing. It is a system which is inherently fragile, one that has to be looked at very carefully and dealt with carefully as well.

When we start moving in to change the rules of the ball game without a necessity, without a powerful argument, without abuses to be corrected, then I have to say that I am not one of those who can see taking this bill any further. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) has performed a service. He has demonstrated the use of this rather unique private members' hour by bringing forward the proposal so that we can examine it. By so examining it, we can see whether the hon. member has made his case. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) made a number of points.

Mr. Kilgour: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would the hon. member permit a question if I do not interfere with his right to talk out the bill?

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Yes.

Mr. Kilgour: It is a soft question to the hon. member. If the hon. member does his arithmetic, he will discover that there have been ten elections since 1952. We have had ten elections in 29 years. Would he agree that works out to one election every 2.9 years? Does that affect his argument in any way?

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the sequence that I took started from 1957. However, it does affect the argument I was making. My argument was that by analysing each election that has taken place, to look at whether there have been any abuses of the power of the prime minister or whether there has been anything we could see as a culpable bona fide abuse of the system, my conclusion is that if you go back to 1945 you will find there was probably no abuse of the system. In fact, the only one I can think of that would be of real interest would have been the election of 1917 during World War I when, in my judgment, Parliament acted improperly, although not illegally. In my judgment, the election was not done properly, but again it was not illegal.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pinard:

That, when the House adjourns on the day this order is adopted, it shall stand adjourned until Wednesday, October 14, 1981, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the statisfaction of Madam Speaker, after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Madam Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees or the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in her stead for all the purposes of this order.

Summer Recess

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): When the debate on the motion to adjourn the House was interrupted at four o'clock, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen) had the floor and had three minutes remaining.

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, just prior to four o'clock I was making an appeal to the government that, in line with the request of the Canadian Forestry Association, there should be a special task force or special subcommittee on the forest industry.

It is one of the anomalies of the Canadian political and industrial scene that it sometimes takes a work stoppage such as the one now taking place in British Columbia, where the industry there accounts for significantly more than half of the Canadian industry, for people to realize how important the forest industry is to this country in terms of government revenues and the spin-off throughout the private and public sectors.

As do the Canadian Forestry Association and many others throughout the industry, I believe that a task force or some other means is needed to draw certain matters to the attention of the public in a concrete way. We must take advantage of the increased joint interest demonstrated, for instance, by the Canada Forest Congress held last September in the city of Toronto, and the renewed interest and the working together of management, labour and professionals throughout that industry from all parts of Canada. Such a committee could take advantage of that interest and that tripartisanship, which is really a first in the history of this country to take place on such a dramatic and important scale.

The attention of the public across Canada, including politicians, should be drawn to how vitally important it is that we begin paying some attention to the supply side in the country. I suppose I am what is sometimes called a supply side socialist. That in itself may be an anomaly to some people's way of thinking, but within the democratic left many of us have been very interested in the productive side of the ledger for many, many years. Most of the arguments, no matter from which party they emanate, seem to refer most often to the problems of distribution. It certainly goes without saying that unless the industry which produces more for our balance of trade than all of the other major industries, other than manufacturing, combined, is in a healthy state—and it is not in a healthy state today—we are in for very serious trouble as an economy and as a society.

The last point I want to make was commented on to some degree by the Minister of Labour yesterday. It relates in a sense to the stoppage not only in the Post Office but also in the forest industry. There are some in the House who decry the right to withdraw one's labour. That right is as old as Magna Carta. I believe the phrase was "No man shall be forced to build bridges". The right to strike was not granted by government. The right to withdraw one's labour was not granted by government. It exists because it was claimed and because it was exercised, and when government recognized that right it did, by so doing, limit it—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his allotted time has expired.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak this afternoon. Indeed I feel compelled to speak this afternoon in defence of the uranium industry. I feel that there should be some perspective put into this entire argument, and I ask members of the House to bear with me for a moment while I talk about the situation as it was in Elliot Lake, an area adjacent to my area, some years ago.

This area is a one-industry town. It is a uranium town, and I urge the people in this House again to ask themselves, "Was I there?"—I do not mean here in the House, I mean there in Elliot Lake—when the markets went bust. It was not a pretty sight. People who had invested heavily in brand new homes had to pack up and leave. People who had invested in businesses walked away from them. A brand new booming town boarded up is not a pretty sight. It was a very, very difficult situation, and those of us who lived in the north were suffering very badly in that situation. I was there. At that time I was the mother of young children. We were in business, and people such as ourselves were desperate. We were very, very grateful that the government acted responsibly and wisely to help the uranium industry.

The other day an hon. member was brandishing a copy of the UCAN annual report and suggesting there was something subversive in the report and something not of benefit to Canadians. However, the hon. member neglected to read the report. I suggest it is a success story and not a failure.

How did UCAN come about? May I fill in the background? UCAN is a Crown corporation created by this government. Why? To buy uranium when nobody else was buying it, to save an industry, to save jobs, and to save a town. It was successful beyond its wildest expectations. I would like to read the president's letter included in the annual report:

Sir,

On behalf of the Board of Directors, I have the honour to submit the Annual Report of Uranium Canada, Limited (UCAN) for the year ended December 31, 1980.

UCAN's task over the report year has been to administer the Government's general stockpile of uranium concentrates which were acquired during the 1963-70 period. As action has been taken subsequent to the end of the report year to transfer this residual stockpile to Eldorado Nuclear Limited, it is appropriate that I take this opportunity to review briefly the performance of the Corporation as manager of the joint venture and general stockpiles.

In summary, the following specific actions have taken place:

1. A joint venture uranium stockpile was developed with Denison Mines Ltd. and later sold to Spanish utilities over the period 1972-78 together with a portion of the general stockpile. UCAN's cost of acquisition for its 76 percent share of the joint venture stockpile and the acquisition cost of 1,075 tonnes of uranium from the general stockpile was $44.2 million; its net revenue from the sale was $81.6 million, resulting in a net profit for the Crown of $37.4 million.

2. As administrators of the Government's general stockpile UCAN sold 769 tonnes of uranium to Japanese purchasers and realized net revenues exceeding the original $10.5 million acquisition price by $13.2 million.

That is a profit.

3. The Corporation has also supported Canadian uranium producers and consumers through the loaning of stockpiled material as described in this report. Through these transactions the Corporation has realized actual revenues of $8.8 million plus long-term interest receivable of $18,147,966.

During that period.

As a result of these combined transactions the Corporation had either earned or was owed net revenues on December 31, 1980 totalling $132.2 million. This exceeds the original purchase price of the uranium sold by $77.5 million, which, in turn exceeds the original acquisition price of the residual 5,572 tonnes of uranium which has now been transferred to Eldorado Nuclear Limited.

Not only has the Government's uranium stockpiling program been a financial success, it brought stability to the dependent mining communities during the doldrums of the 1960s and has provided support to the mining industry during the chaotic marketing conditions of the early 1970s and the rapid expansion programs of the late 1970s. The uranium refining operations of Eldorado Nuclear Limited have also benefited in a number of ways.

For all these reasons, it is with considerable satisfaction that, on behalf of the Board of Directors, I submit this annual report of Uranium Canada, Limited.

For the Directors,

G. M. MacNabb
President

I suggest to members of this House that this is indeed a success story, and I shall tell hon. members that a visit to Elliot Lake would prove beyond their wildest dreams that what Canada did during that period, and what Uranium Canada did for the uranium industry, was indeed a success. I invite hon. members to come to Elliot Lake to see what a boom town is all about. I invite them to examine our uranium industry here in Canada to see how healthy it is and how well it has served Canadians and Canada. I personally find it offensive that those officials of this company who have worked diligently on behalf of Canadians for the industry are now being attacked by hon. members opposite.

The stockpile was intended to save the industry, and it has done that very well. I, for one, am very proud of the actions taken by this government during that very difficult period, and I can tell hon. members that the people of northern Ontario and the people involved in the uranium industry are extremely grateful for the responsible actions the government took.

● (1710)

I suggest to every member of this House that they take the time to read how thoroughly and how well the report has been prepared, and how well this government has been served. A substantial net profit has been realized here which came directly to the general revenues for the benefit of all Canadians. I suggest to the hon. members opposite they do their homework and read one of the latest stories in The Financial Post which came out just this last week, suggesting that many of the things they have been saying in this House are totally unfounded and irresponsible.

Mr. Speyer: Name some of them.

Mrs. Erola: I rest my case.

Summer Recess

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, we met here today under the shadow of the guillotine.

An hon. Member: Louder. Louder.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I would remind you and the House that I listened with great attention to the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola). I am operating under a time restraint because of closure. I hope I will be given the same courtesy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are operating under closure. Closure has been imposed for the first time in the history of this Parliament, indeed in the history of the British Parliament, on an adjournment motion. It is an unprecedented situation we are faced with today because normally closure is invoked to terminate debate. Here, sir, we have a situation where closure is being invoked to terminate Parliament.

Mr. Malone: Cromwell.

Mr. McGrath: Is there any wonder that this government's action today is unprecedented?

Now, sir, we have to ask ourselves why we are facing closure on the adjournment motion. Last week we were faced with an intolerable situation. Parliament was scheduled to adjourn on Friday, July 10. We had a national postal strike, negotiations were deadlocked, with both sides refusing to come to the bargaining table. As responsible parliamentarians we could not walk away from that situation, and we did not. The result of our staying beyond July 10 was that we now have both sides coming back to the bargaining table. A mediator has been named. I think that is important in terms of both the debate and the closure motion.

The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell), when he spoke yesterday in leading off the adjournment debate, made the position of our party very clear. We wanted the mediation process to work, we wanted the mediator to be given the opportunity to operate within a framework where there would be no pressure imposed on him by the parliamentary process. Consequently we made it very clear that it was not our intention to raise the Post Office dispute during the adjournment debate. So why, then, did the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet), of all people, stand in his place last night, serve the notice of motion of closure, and move that motion today?

An hon. Member: To settle the strike.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, we have to look beyond the postal dispute. The real reason why we are faced with a closure motion is because the government could not tolerate the heat of the cartel scandal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: It is no coincidence, Mr. Speaker, that the one who stood in his place to serve notice of the closure motion, and indeed moved that motion today, was the one getting most of the heat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Summer Recess

Mr. McGrath: He was getting that heat, Sir, in his capacity as the Minister for Consumer and Corporate Affairs, a minister who has the statutory responsibility of protecting the consumers of this country. I will get back to that in a moment with reference to the remarks of the Minister of State for Mines who just took her seat.

However, there was another event which took place last week with respect to the cartel affair. That was an information laid with the court in the city of Toronto on July 7, two days, Sir, before we were due to leave this place for a long summer recess. I suspect the timing was designed to coincide with the adjournment of Parliament, so that Parliament would not be around to ask the embarrassing questions we have been asking for the last several days. However, Parliament is still here and there are very important questions we must ask.

These charges, Mr. Speaker, are serious in that they are charges of a conspiracy to commit an illegal act. That illegal act was to prevent competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, sale or supply in Canada of articles, to wit, uranium, etc., and thereby commit an indictable offence contrary to section 32(1)(c) of the Combines Investigation Act. The information also names a group of companies as unindicted co-conspirators, including two public servants of this country, namely, Gordon M. MacNabb and John C. Runnalls.

Now, Sir, let us go back very briefly, and I do not want to repeat some of the excellent material laid before the House by my colleague, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty). However, what we are dealing with here—and this is why I wanted to go back and review it very briefly—is a concept the government seems to forget. That concept, under our rule of law, is that no person or group of persons is above the law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Not even the Government of Canada, not even the Crown, is above the law, Mr. Speaker. That is the principle we are dealing with here.

There has been a charge laid of conspiracy to commit an illegal act, namely, to breach the combines act. Well, sir, let us go back. On July 8, 1981, as reported at page 11326 of Hansard, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was asked when he became aware of the activities of the uranium cartel affecting prices in Canada. The Prime Minister's reply was this:

> It was several years, I think three years after the international agreement had been made, that this international cartel began to have some possible effects within our country. Once again, I am repeating information I received at the time—

He then went on to say:

> Until then, there had been no demand for uranium in Canada. It was only around the mid seventies that this demand arose.

That is the Prime Minister on record.

We know from what the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe said today that the information was in fact out. It is passing strange, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister would not be aware of it because, according to the Congressional Record of the summer of 1977, and from the minutes of one of the meetings of the cartel which were released under the U.S. Freedom of Information Act, a meeting of the cartel was convened by the deputy minister of energy, mines and resources, one Jack Austin, in the departmental headquarters in the city of Ottawa. All the people at that meeting, with the exception of the one who convened the meeting, Mr. Austin, the then president of Uranium Canada, have been named in the charges as co-conspirators or unindicted co-conspirators.

Reference was made to the minutes of that meeting yesterday and today in the House, and I would quote Mr. Austin from those minutes:

> He further stressed that the Cabinet is in favour of the arrangement and believes it to be in the best interest of Canada for the five-year period under discussion. He further stated that the Canadian government wanted to leave it to each producer to determine the legality of the arrangement.

It continues:

> At this point, Gulf inquired concerning the opinion that was to be obtained from the Minister of Justice as to the legality of the arrangement under the Canadian Combines Act. Mr. Austin replied by stating that an opinion had been obtained by the director of the combines investigation branch that the arrangement is legal as it is presently understood by the director but that it could later become illegal if orders have to be declined by Canadian producers as a result of the arrangement.

This was taking place at a time when the then minister of energy, mines and resources was stating on the public record in St. John's, Newfoundland, that no cartel existed. It must be said, notwithstanding the lack of knowledge of the Prime Minister or the fact that he did not know what was going on between 1972 and 1975, that it was not until the United States Congress began to take an interest in the matter in 1976 that the "gag" law was passed under the Atomic Energy Control Act by the Cabinet of Canada by order in council. It was entitled "The Uranium Information Security Regulation". It was not until that Congressional committee got around to an in-depth examination in 1977, by producing information and secret memoranda under its freedom of information act, that the then minister of consumer and corporate affairs decided that there would have to be an investigation under the Combines Investigation Act, because obviously there was a combine operating internationally and there was enough evidence to indicate that it was affecting prices in Canada.

No one will quarrel with the hon. intentions of the government in establishing this marketing cartel. I have no quarrel with what the hon. Minister of States for Mines (Mrs. Erola) had to say. The uranium industry had to be protected. It was the government's responsibility to protect Canada's uranium mining industry. I have no quarrel with that; the motives are honourable. But I find dishonourable what the government did when it discovered to its chagrin that the cartel operating legally in the international market was having an impact on prices in Canada and was in fact fixing prices in Canada. What did it do? What did the government do when it found out that they were breaching the laws of Canada? The government attempted to cover it up, that is what it did. That is what this whole shamefulness is about today, an attempt to cover up the fact that this whole affair was impacting upon prices in Canada.

We know that back as far as July, 1974, Ontario Hydro was told uranium would have to be bought at world prices, and that subsequently Ontario Hydro in fact complained. Going back to March 8, 1974, we know that a Gulf Minerals memo was produced under the freedom of information act in the United States which read in part:

> The EMR staff does, however, recognize that Canadian utilities must be prepared to pay the same prices that we could achieve from export sales.

There is no question that in 1974 the cartel was operating to fix prices in Canada. No action was taken until 1977, notwithstanding the fact that the Prime Minister became aware of it in 1975. His reason given in the House for not taking action until 1977 was that no complaint had been laid. This sounds like a rather strange way in which to administer the law. What we are dealing with here is not the honourable attempt of the government in 1972 to protect Canada's threatened uranium industry, but the attempt of the government to cover up when it discovered that the cartel was illegally operating in the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: The Minister of State for Mines talked about her gratitude to the government for saving the uranium industry. I would have expected the hon. lady to express her concern in the House on behalf of the Ontario consumers of electricity, since she represents an Ontario constituency. What was the effect of the cartel? Uranium prices rose from $6 per pound to $40 per pound to Ontario Hydro. We know that as of today and as of 1975 over one third of Ontario's domestic electricity comes from nuclear power, and that it will go to two thirds by the end of the century.

I am sorry the Minister of State for Mines is not in her place, but let us take a look at what happened to domestic electricity prices in Ontario during the period of the cartel. I am referring to Ontario Hydro's rates to consumers. In 1972 the first 750 kilowatts were charged at 1.7 cents per kilowatt hour. In 1974 it rose to 3.55 cents per kilowatt hour; here we see the cartel coming into play. In 1976 the first 750 kilowatts were charged at 4.8 cents per kilowatt hour. In 1978 it was 6.7 cents per kilowatt hour. In 1981 it was 9.25 cents per kilowatt hour. That is a 500 per cent increase. It is not all due to the operation of the cartel or to the increase in the cost of energy, but a large part of it is. Ontario consumers have been bilked illegally of millions of dollars, and they have a right to some redress.

Where was the minister of consumer and corporate affairs in 1977 when he started the investigation with respect to the impact on Canadian consumers? He knew at that time because it was brought to his attention. What action was taken when it first came to the attention of the Prime Minister in 1975? He did nothing, except to bring in a "gag" law by order in council in 1976 to shut up public servants who were beginning to feel uneasy. That is what he did, and the cover up carries on to this day.

I hope the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chénier) does not interrupt me. He will have to explain to his users of electricity why Ontario users have to pay prices based on an illegal cartel operating in the country.

We know that charges have been laid selectively. We know that the companies involved in the cartel have been charged. One of those companies is a Crown corporation, Uranium Canada. During the time of the setting up of the cartel, its president was Jack Austin, then deputy minister of energy, mines and resources. We know that the present chief executive officer of Uranium Canada is one of the unindicted co-conspirators. He had the misfortune to be the assistant deputy minister of energy, mines and resources in 1972. Yet it boggles the mind that the government refuses to tell the House and the country why the co-ordinator of the cartel in Canada, why one of the instigators of the cartel in Canada, namely, the then deputy minister of energy, mines and resources, the former principal secretary to the Prime Minister, the now Senator Jack Austin, has not been named as one of the unindicted co-conspirators. That is the question.

I submit that the reason Mr. Austin has not been named in the information is because if you get to the deputy minister, then obviously you are getting to the minister; if you get to the minister, you are getting to the government; if you get to the government, you are getting to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1730)

Mr. McGrath: Because, Sir, the government is not above the law and this government stands guilty by its own inaction, by its own stonewalling, of being not only a conspirator to an illegal act but of being engaged in an attempt to cover up an illegal act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has pointed out, time constraints do not permit anyone in the House to deal at any great length with the reasons why, on July 17, we are still sitting in the House of Commons. I share his point of view, too, that enough has been said about the Post Office and that Judge Allan Gold is one of Canada's top mediators. I can say that from personal experience, having sat in on more than one dispute with him, particularly on waterfront problems.

I, too, like the hon. member, would like to talk about the uranium cartel. One of the things which has always puzzled me, intrigued me, and at times upset me about this House, is the ease with which we can fabricate a picture, weave a story based on innuendo, half lies, and sometimes blatant disregard for the truth. Let one member opposite stand between now and 1 a.m. and accuse Jack Austin of wrongdoing—just one person.

Virtually everyone who has participated in this debate so far has emphasized that Jack Austin was a deputy minister, private secretary to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and is now a Senator. Without saying more, these hon. gentlemen are trying to weave a picture. They seem to imply that his progress could not be based on talent, ability or knowledge, that his progression had to be as a result of some intrigue, collusion, or unsavoury act, and that this goes on all the time. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) is an expert at this, if you read his questioning of the ability and talent of a lawyer named Brown, just as he questioned the integrity of a Senator not too many months ago. But I do not want to get sidetracked by rabbit tracks if I can avoid it.

I would like to talk for just a moment about the cartel. I think I recall a few of the events of 1972. I was in the cabinet at the time, and the minister at that time laid it out very clearly that Elliot Lake and other cities to all intents and purposes were bankrupt, as hon. gentlemen know. No amount of stockpiling by this government or Denison Mines could have prevented the total bankruptcy of this industry. As I recall, there were not less than 22 productive uranium mines at the time and, because of the selfish attitude of the United States, that number dwindled to only three. What was the attitude of the United States? Contrary to its responsibility as a signatory to GATT it simply let the world know, including Canada, that henceforth no uranium would be imported into that country at any cost. The U.S.A. showed a total disregard for its moral and legal obligations as a trading partner.

The consequences were obvious. The value of the stockpile certainly dwindled as that customer disappeared. The level of unemployment in Elliot Lake was a national disgrace. The minister explained in elegant style that the impact on small businesses and family life was obvious. As mines shut down, miners were surplus. The government did what it was expected to do, move in and do something legal about a horrible social problem.

What did the government do? It formed a cartel with other countries which also had vested interests, against the actions of the United States. And people talk about the Combines Investigation Act! Let me tell hon. members that the establishment of such a cartel for international purposes is perfectly legal, and section 32(4) of the Combines Investigation Act contains that provision. First of all, let us stop right there. According to the opposition, the government was irresponsible in taking advantage of a provision which the signatories to GATT considered to be perfectly legal and which the laws of Canada consider to be perfectly legal, that is, the right to form a cartel or trading bloc with other partners of like interest in the international sphere. That action, of course, was legal and if that cartel were to start—

Mr. Kilgour: That is just another red herring.

Mr. Mackasey: I suggest the hon. member opposite has said enough in this debate. This hon. gentleman has forgotten more about this House of Commons than that hon. member will ever learn. He should be reminded by his colleagues that one of the courtesies extended in the House in a debate of this importance is that you keep your mouth quiet, your ears open, and you might learn something.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: Canada, because of the value of the stockpile, faced with the terrible impact of the United States' actions on Elliot Lake and other like communities in western Canada, sat down with other uranium interests in order to protect itself against the selfish action of the United States which was, as I remind you, contrary to the spirit of GATT. Today hon. members have said that a meeting was held in the boardroom of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. Where did they want the meeting to take place? In the cellar, in the restaurant, or down the street? What was the meeting for? To do something which was perfectly legal under the laws of Canada. Why should the meeting not have been held at the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources since it was dealing with mining and uranium?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: I suspect the furtiveness is not to be found in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, but rather in the warped minds of some members opposite. I repeat, let one member stand between now and 1 a.m. and accuse Jack Austin of corruption or wrongdoing, or suggest that he, too, should appear before the courts. The innuendo has been there in the words of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, but let an hon. member have the courage to stand in his place and make charges.

I have seen so many reputations destroyed forever in this House of Commons, during the sixties. I remember a youngster named Guy Lord, working in the office of the late Guy Favreau, who had his reputation destroyed. Perhaps that is one of the reasons why the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) gets a little tired of these insinuations. I saw that youngster's reputation destroyed by innuendo to the point that, when proven innocent months later, he was still out of work and had to go to Paris to continue his practice in the legal profession.

As a personal friend of Jack Austin, I take umbrage at hearing members opposite remind us that he was once secretary to the Prime Minister, deputy minister of energy, mines and resources, and is now a Senator, and that he somehow must have done something terribly wrong by being one of the innovators of a legal action, the success of which, if measured by the alleviation of poverty and the return of prosperity to Elliot Lake, is already in the history books of Canada.

What about Ontario? The hon. member for St. John's East, for whom I have sincere affection, talked about the detrimental impact on the cost of electricity. I share his views. If there has been wrongdoing by these uranium companies they should be prosecuted. I think that is all the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) has suggested in implementing recommendations which people spent four years determining. But, as someone said earlier in this House, there are certain basic principles in this country. An hon. member opposite said that no one is above the law. But equally no one in this country is guilty until proven guilty, and that includes individuals as well as companies.

● (1740)

I wonder if anyone here would like to say that the six companies are guilty. Have hon. members opposite already set up their kangaroo court? Are they doing, in the House of Commons, what the courts of the land are supposed to do? Have we lost our concept of British justice? Have we presumed, by innuendo and already come to the conclusion that everyone attached to this cartel, to this alleged illegality, this alleged price-fixing in the domestic market, is guilty? Are we at least going to have the decency to wait until the courts prove their guilt? It seems to me that this is a fundamental concept for parliamentarians. Have we lost that concept, safe in the security of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) who quite often enjoys the immunity which members of Parliament are granted?

This immunity is abused by the opposition's innuendo's from time to time, when it talks about Mr. Austin—senator and deputy minister—being guilty of doing something wrong because he set up a cartel which was perfectly legal under the laws of the country, provided its impact was in the international markets. Mr. Austin left that department in 1974.

Incidentally, in 1970, when this was set up, the province of Ontario had a vested interest in its success. It was not in the market to buy uranium, but it too was concerned about what was happening in Elliot Lake. It was concerned about the social impact of the American policy on the lives of thousands of decent Canadians from Ontario who lived in Elliot Lake. When it eventually needed uranium, and when, as the hon. member said, it paid an abnormally high price, by certain standards, the hon. gentleman thought enough to say it was not strictly as a result of the cartel, because we all know that around that time uranium prices rose dramatically throughout the whole world.

The fact is that this issue is before the courts. No amount of alleged finagling or any kind of influence prevented the appropriate agency from investigating the charge of the illegality of price-rigging by certain companies in this country. The agency, after four years of investigation, feels there is a prima facie case. The recommendations of that agency to the Minister of Justice are very simple. And I am not a lawyer. It recommended that charges against these six particular companies proceed before the courts. I think there are six companies.

The Minister of Justice has not deviated from that recommendation. Imagine what would occur if he had deviated. Imagine the feigned anger of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona if we removed Mr. Brown and substituted another lawyer, called Mr. White! Imagine what he would say,"Oh, they do not want that lawyer with the great knowledge which he has acquired over four years to have any input. He knows too much as a result of going through papers for four years. Let us get rid of him and get some Liberal hack to replace him." So, how can the Minister of Justice win? The Minister of Justice is an intelligent politician, and a good and honest man.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: If the minister had appointed—reappointed, if you like—a lawyer named Brown, whom I am defending, though I never met him, I think it is because he believes in the quality of law in this country. He believes in the qualifications of lawyers. He did not, as the hon. member did, phone some of his friends in Ontario. I will just quote, because I do not think it is worth spending too much time on it. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona phoned his friends in Ontario and he claims they never heard of Mr. Brown. Some of them never heard of Mr. Kilgour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Time!

Mr. Mackasey: I have to say that I am at a disadvantage when I have to refute some of the arguments of my friend from St. John's East when he talks about the heat and the scandal. I say, what heat? It is certainly not from the question period. It is certainly not from the quality of debate. What heat is on the government? Really, the case is in court. What scandal?

I challenge anyone in the opposition to stand up and accuse Jack Austin of impropriety, or any other individual, or any member of the cabinet. The opposition can do it. It has parliamentary immunity. If hon. members want to prejudge the courts, go ahead. They are the eminent lawyers, and I am only a layman. They can tell the courts they do not have to go to the courts with this problem. They will prejudge it in the question period. They will prejudge it in the House of Commons. They will make speeches with enough innuendo and enough inference that it will make the right headlines, and after two or three days it will not be alleged impropriety—it will be improper conduct.

I may appear flippant about the subject, but in conclusion, I have always been concerned that when we review the rules of the House of Commons that we try to find a medium, some happy note. Those people whose names are dropped a little loosely in this House deserve some way of redress. In some way, we must learn not to abuse one of our parliamentary privileges.

We all know the history of how this happened, the immunity we have and the immunity we need if we are going to do our job. I am used to debate; however, it seems to me that in the 20 years I have been here too many people have been slurred, vilified, condemned, ridiculed, and tainted by innuendo, to leave me totally easy with the system. It makes us immune and above the law when we resort to that practice.

I come back to the young man I knew in the sixties, called Guy Lord, and a total stranger, because months later his father sent me a letter, thankful that someone got up in the House of Commons. "Perhaps the hon. gentleman, perhaps that lawyer, is not guilty. What happens?" I remember that question. One can see it in the Debates. Events proved that he was not guilty, but the press did not bother making that point. It was no longer news. His career around here had been effectively destroyed. I just make the point: go after the government, but let us be a little more careful in dropping names and weaving that great trail of innuendo, the suggestion that there has to be something wrong because the deputy minister of energy, mines and resources held an office in the boardroom—not in the bathroom, but in the boardroom—of the department, in order to sit down with the leaders of the uranium industry to put together a cartel which, under the Combines Investigation Act in this country, is perfectly legal.

In conclusion, if these firms are guilty, then the courts will decide so. Again, I might say that it might be stretching the patience of some of the members opposite if I suggested they are innocent until proven otherwise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great care to the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey). I agreed with certain things that he said, and I wish to point them out. Number one, I do not like abuse of parliamentary immunity. I will be willing to go outside the doors of the House of Commons and repeat anything that I say in my speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speyer: Second, no one can disagree with the basic and fundamental right of any accused that he is innocent until proven guilty, and that is beside the point in many of the matters that I want to draw to the attention of the House.

The uranium cartel, as it started out, had an understandable purpose. The last hon. member to speak was quite correct when he said that the uranium industry was, in fact, depressed throughout the late sixties and the early seventies, and that there was a need to take some action to protect the uranium industry. No one on this side of the House disputes that fact. What is at issue in this particular case is the manner and the method by which the cartel operated, and second, the actions of the government in implementing the functions of the cartel. I wish to address those two points right at the moment.

The first thing I wish to draw to the attention of the House is the uranium marketing investigation which was called in 1977. At that time the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) said that it would be in the public interest that the air be cleared and that the status of uranium arrangements under the Combines Investigation Act be thoroughly investigated. Not only has the air not been cleared but it has been muddied and it is murky. The investigation certainly has not been complete.

I think that in some ways too much of the time of the House has been spent considering some of the legalities and some of the charges and not enough time has been spent discussing morality.

No member of this House, including members on this side, has full information about what happened with respect to this cartel. For four years we have been asking, persistently and consistently, for information so that people's reputations would not be smeared, so that there need not be innuendo and that we would not know only a part of the truth. We have been asking for full disclosure so that the facts would be self-evident and that the law could take its normal course, and so that those who have to assume responsibility would assume responsibility.

We know certain facts which I would like to point out to hon. members opposite. We know how the cartel operated. We know that it operated through a secretariat in Paris and that this was agreed upon not only by companies whose ambition was to derive a profit but by a Crown corporation whose president was a deputy minister of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

In those circumstances, the cartel would meet in Paris. There would be lead bidders, there would be secondary bidders, and there would be tertiary bidders. The sham was carried out in secret, and countries like Japan had to compete with companies whose bids were rigged. Mr. Speaker, it is no different from the dredging scandal which happened in Hamilton, close to the riding of the hon. member—

Mr. Mackasey: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speyer: I question the morality of operating a cartel where there are fixed bids, where there is bid rigging in circumstances such as I have described and which is outlined all through the Maas committee testimony and report. I find this absolutely shameful, Mr. Speaker, and I Hope that hon. members opposite do as well.

I think we can all imagine that, if profit is the motive, companies might get together and say, "We have to fix the price; we need a floor price". I hope it shocks hon. members opposite to think that senior officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources were party to the rules that were established in Paris. That is absolutely clear, Mr. Speaker, and I will say it anywhere in Canada. We only have part of the documentation because we cannot get it in Canada. We have to get it in the United States where it is part of the confidential Westinghouse uranium litigation. There is a memorandum dated March 8, 1974. It should be of concern to hon. members opposite, as it is to me, in which the manager of Gulf said that "the EM and R staff, does, however, recognize that Canadian utilities must be prepared to pay the same price we could achieve for export sales." In other words, one can understand having an international price and having a domestic price. But can one understand when the officials of EM and R are saying, in these circumstances, that Canadian utilities "must be prepared to pay the same price we could achieve", especially when those prices are derived as a result of bid rigging?

There are many other aspects of this case, Mr. Speaker, but in 20 minutes no one could ever outline such a complex matter.

In 1977 the then minister of energy, mines and resources said in this House that there was no cartel, that a cartel did not exist. Yet, as I pointed out in question period yesterday, Donald Macdonald, in an interview on CBC last Monday, replied in answer to a question as follows:

> ... all the Canadian producers or in the case of Gulf Minerals and all the essential Canadian producers at that time were told that there was government policy to maintain a floor price on uranium for export and were required to participate.

What was the situation? There were a number of companies which were apprehensive about joining the cartel and they were not apprehensive about making the profits that they saw they could make. What they were apprehensive about was not only the litigation that they could foresee when they had lawyers like Bud Estey, but they were worried about what the effect would be in the United States. It should be remembered that the agreement apparently did not apply to Canada, in the United States. Counsel for all these uranium producers had the foresight to understand that when prices are fixed internationally, they will become the world price domestically.

Companies were compelled to join this cartel because otherwise they would not get uranium export licences. That is why they were compelled. Certainly Steven Roman made that clear after charges were laid, and the former minister agreed to it when he said they were "required to participate". Yet the Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Chrétien) says, "What you have done is you have violated the laws of Canada on the basis of reasonable information and belief," and launches a prosecution.

I do not know whether that shocks hon. members opposite as it shocks me. I want to know how a Canadian Crown corporation can be a named, indicted conspirator, how a Canadian corporation can be charged. We know that any corporation is just a veil. There are people behind it who make the decisions.

I have the indictment before me and I must ask many questions to which the government will not give the answers for the people of Canada. For example, the conspiracy occurred in Ottawa. That is in the indictment; that is what the Attorney General has alleged. The unlawful agreement—I am not talking about the agreement that happened in the boardroom but about the unlawful agreement that forms the substance of the conspiracy—that happened in Ottawa, up until 1978. We know that the regulations only applied until 1975.

What series of circumstances occurred between 1975 and 1978? The Minister of Justice has not been forthright about this, and there has been absolutely no statement whatsoever with respect to it. I cannot believe the stonewalling on the part of the minister. Like a broken record he gives the same answers day after day. He has quite properly made the assertion that he wants independent legal advice. No one could ever fault him for that. He has said that on the basis of that legal advice, charges were laid and that he acceded to those. No one could fault him for that.

One thing that the minister owes the House of Commons, however, is an answer to why charges were laid against some people and why other charges were not laid on the basis of the investigation. We could clear this up very easily, Mr. Speaker. Let me tell you how it could be done.

If the gag regulations were rescinded, then we could look at the document and we would know exactly what happened. That is not the case, however.

On May 26 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in this House that the underpinnings for the gag regulations remain the same, that is, to protect Canadian companies against American litigation. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice what American litigation is pending now. That answer was given before charges were laid. We know that Denison Mines has settled its lawsuit and Rio Algom has settled its lawsuit, so what litigation is still pending? What is the purpose of this muzzling of the Parliament of Canada so that it does not know what is going on? Can any member of the House on the other side give any factual justification why, in 1981, these regulations should stand?

I pose a further question, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) has said that every accused is entitled to a fair trial. Nobody can dispute that, Mr. Speaker, but part of a fair trial is provided for in the Criminal Code where it says that every accused is entitled to a full answer in defence.

As a full answer in defence, we know that Gulf Oil and many of the other defendants have in the vaults of McCarthy & McCarthy 40,000 documents which they are unable to use at the moment. Is it fair to their defence or to the defence of any other accused to have these regulations which will prevent the defendants from getting a fair trial. What possible purpose do they serve? The minister does not want to tell us exactly what happened. Innuendos have been flying around; there is no doubt about that. That is natural in view of this government's refusal to tell the people of Canada exactly what happened in this totally sordid mess.

Now that the horse is out of the barn, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) has put proposals for amending the Combines Investigation Act before interested people in Canada. One of the factors that he considers important is found on page 19 of those amending proposals respecting the Combines Investigation Act. Many hon. members on the other side might be surprised to see that the minister is recommending a ban on participation in international cartels to the people of Canada. The reason given is this:

> This proposed provision is designed to cover situations where domestic competitors make agreements or arrangements with foreign competitors which restrict exports from Canada or imports into Canada or otherwise adversely affect competition in Canada. As part of the conspiracy law, it would be a criminal law provision. The increasing concentration in world trade has given rise to concerns over the dangers of the cartellization of world trade and a number of countries have taken action recently against international cartels which not only affect prices in those countries but also their trade performance.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and I have been asking questions of the Minister of Justice in the last few days concerning this cartel. Mr. David Henry, now one of the most respected jurists in this country, occupied Mr. Bertrand's former position. Obviously there was a fear during the formative stages of the cartel about its legality and the best lawyers in Canada were consulted by the uranium cartel. The government had its lawyers and it was not unnatural for the Government of Canada to ask Mr. Henry who was head of the combines investigation branch what his opinion was. Why can the Government of Canada not now produce the opinion that was given so that we can all see it and can say once and for all whether or not the government was aware of the domestic consequences that would be visited upon Canadians, particularly upon the people of Ontario, as a result of the establishment of this cartel?

I defy anyone on the other side to stand in his place in the House of Commons and give a reasoned answer as to why the opinions of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) at the time and Mr. Justice Henry's opinion cannot be tabled so the people of Canada can understand. It is the refusal to make these opinions known and a refusal to rescind the gag regulations which will keep people, such as myself and every member on this side, asking question after question until we get the answers.

One problem has been pointed out by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey), namely the problem of innuendo and insinuations that will occur in circumstances when the government is not forthright with respect to this matter.

[Translation]

Mrs. Eva Côté (Rimouski-Témiscouata): First of all, Mr. Speaker, allow me to say that I am glad to take part in this debate. However, may I say as well that the reasons which explain our presence here this evening fill me with sorrow. I was elected on February 18, 1980, to participate along with all members in the administration of the affairs of my country. At that time I admit I thought I would be sitting here to do my share in building something or continuing to build something. Unfortunately certain events have shown me that people can also destroy just as illogically and, to my mind, that is distressing.

If we consider the work of a parliamentarian we realize that it can be extremely challenging and enriching, especially if we are concerned about doing it positively and objectively. Mr Speaker, for one year and a few months now I have been participating in various experiments, if I may put it that way. I had an opportunity to deliver a speech on the constitution. I have listened to a lot of speeches about the bills which have been introduced, but rarely did I hear objective and constructive remarks from members opposite. That puzzled me, and I wanted to know just what was the Canadian reality and especially what sensible Canadians thought of our performance in the House. So I gathered some very interesting statistics. In 114 years, from 1867 to 1981, we have had three different governments, that is three political parties which have administered the affairs of Canada: a National Union Party during four years, the Progressive Conservative Party during 35 years and the Liberal Party during 75 years. Does that mean that the party of the official opposition does not know anything about the Canadian reality? Is it really unable to understand what Canadians want, wish for and would like to see being accomplished in their country? Are we here to build or to destroy? Are we here to go forward or to go backward? Above all, Mr. Speaker, I was altogether astonished when I heard my colleague opposite state that the most absurd aspect is that we are debating what we called closure and that this motion has been moved by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), the head of a department which was established to protect the interests of Canadians. If I may say so, that does not surprise me, particularly when we bear in mind the fact that the House of Commons is costing Canadians $300,000 a day and that during five days spoke of nothing but matters about which the government properly discharged its responsibilities. In other words, we spent $1.5 million of the Canadian taxpayers' money wasting our time here.

As concerns the postal strike, I believe that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) said that there is a collective agreement, that there are standards and regulations, that we are living in a democracy, that Parliament has given the right to strike to these workers and that they may therefore use it. There are also mechanisms which provide for mediation, conciliation, and everything necessary to settle a strike. The government has seen to it. As for the uranium cartel, what has been done this week, except to try to tarnish the reputation of certain individuals and to prejudice decisions which could be made by our courts? I have the impression that in addition to wasting the time of the House, the opposition has dealt with the issues in an ignorant manner, and I do not know if this term is parliamentary or not, but in any case, as an hon. member opposite pàointed out this week, we have been listening to people who speak with forked tongues.

Mr. Speaker, I thought I had been elected to represent my constituents and to participate in the administration of Canadian affairs, as I have already noted. We have work to do in the House with regard to legislation. We must also sit on committees, because this is important. We must take part in the proceedings of the House and we must also work in our constituencies. Moreover, unless we were brought in by the stork, we also have a family, and for my part, I believe this is important even though we have not talked about it very much.

As I was saying, in our constituencies—it should also be said that the House of Commons sits five days a week, including three evenings, and that we must be here. This is perhaps not quite as important when you are in either party of the opposition, but when you are a member of the government and you want to live up to your responsibilities, you have to be here. If you want to represent your constituents, you must also be in your constituency to know what is going on. I would not want to speak about the problems of Elliot Lake because I am not from there, but it would be a terrible thing or a lack of awareness on my part if I could not speak about the problems of Rimouski and Témiscouata, a rural area which needs assistance and has an absolutely shocking unemployment rate, while we are wasting a million and a half dollars in this place. I must admit that I would have put this money to better use in my own area, and if I do not know what is going on there, how can I speak about it?

We must therefore go back to our ridings. We must therefore sacrifice our Saturdays or Sundays. How much time does this leave us for our families? If a member of Parliament has to become a slave to his job, it is time to change something in our rules, Mr. Speaker, because if members of Parliament have certain rights—and I think that they are abused at times—do the citizens who have elected us not have any? I am speaking about the right to meet their member of Parliament, the right to talk about what goes on in this place, the right to ask questions about the bills we pass that will influence their lives, about how we are shaping the society in which they will have to live, about how we are preparing the future for their children and ours. We must therefore sacrifice yet another day. What remains for our own family? What shall we do finally about our families? Are we going to forget them? Does the Canadian society really ask this of its members of Parliament? We are 282 in this place to represent a population of something over 23 million—

An hon. Member: 24 million!

Mrs. Côté: —24 million. We are, therefore, in a privileged position. It is a great thing for someone to be elected to a parliament anywhere in the world. The question that we must ask ourselves to day is this: Are we really working positively? When I see certain things and certain actions and when I hear certain speeches, I ask myself some serious questions about democracy in Canada, and I have to wonder who has only rights and who has only responsibilities or duties.

In our system, the opposition has the right to speak. I agree with that. But when that right is changed into tyranny, when the compulsion to speak at any cost becomes tyrannical, I submit that we are bordering on anarchy. When we are detaining citizens who did a good job, and by that I mean members of Parliament who did their jobs, the people working for the House of Commons who are here with us, the people at the Printing Bureau, the translators, the cleaning staff, all those people are unfairly compelled to remain here today in order to listen to what? I would rather not answer. I would rather not know the answer either. Something is disheartening, Mr. Speaker—the more they speak, the more they repeat themselves. I do not want to pass judgment on my predecessors, but I tell myself that at some point we should attack the problem, we should especially agree on how we are going to represent our constituents, how we are going to manage the affairs of Canada.

While we are here practically talking about nothing, there is in preparation something absolutely unique in Canada, if not on the American continent. I refer to the economic summit. I will not believe that no Canadian is interested in knowing what is going to happen there. But in the meantime, we are forcing the public to disperse their interest to follow what is or is not being said here. To some extent it is our own fault if they are not aware of what this country is about to experience, what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) succeeded in organizing, the meeting of the leaders from the seven most industrialized nations in the world, to discuss the problems of the haves and have-nots, while we are here wasting one and one half million dollars. Fortunately, there is a way out in the Standing Orders, otherwise we would still be sitting here at Christmas of next year. All that time, we have shirked our responsibility to tell our fellow citizens or allow them to hear what the country is experiencing.

Mr. Speaker, when I first came here, this is some sort of story, I met a reporter who asked me: Where would you rather be, here in the House of Commons making speeches, taking part in the legislative process and so on, or in your constituency meeting people? I must admit I was somewhat taken aback. However, I answered, "If you ask me what I would rather do, certainly I would rather be in Rimouski and in Témiscouata meeting the people, seeing what they are doing, what they need, how we could better help them." The gentleman from the press smiled, and I wondered what was so funny. He told me: "You amaze me. Probably you are new here, but many MPs would rather be here in Ottawa."

In the House of Commons everything is generally quiet, nobody is disturbed. If nobody comes to ask you to answer the phone, you will not go. Therefore, you will not know what is going on in your area. Is it possible that the House of Commons has become, for some, a kind of haven away from their constituents? If such is the case, it is high time we adjourned. Because there are some that need to go back in the field to see how the world is breathing. It is high time. Maybe this is why we are still here on July 17, to do what? Are we bringing anything positive to Canadians? We did not change the inflation rate 0.01 per cent. If anything, we contributed to it by keeping everybody here. But it is appalling to have a system which operates that way. Painstakingly, since the beginning of the session, the government managed to get some important legislation passed for the good of the Canadian people. No thanks to the opposition, it didn't happen with its help either. Every time a major piece of legislation was introduced, closure had to be imposed to get it passed.

Mr. Speaker, it would seem, and I have made inquiries in that respect, that it is the first time closure has to be imposed on a motion of adjournment. Allow me to say that this is no sign of progress, not at all. To my mind, it is a step backwards. It is about time that we should straighten this matter out because we are certainly setting a bad example for the young Canadians who might come and visit us in this House, that is for sure.

Mr. Speaker, I would have liked my comments to be more objective, more positive because, although I think I wasn't biased my remarks might not have been as dispassionate as I would have hoped. But when you represent, as I do, a riding with 43 municipalities, 75,000 people at least, 53,500 voters more or less, and an unemployment rate which fluctuates between 17 and 30 per cent you know that those people as other Canadians suffer from the same rate of inflation. They would have a lot of things to tell us, lots of advice to give us. At the present time a poll is being taken concerning some amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. We are not there. We are here doing God knows what. In the meantime our constituents have to look after their problems by themselves. One of my voters wrote to me to give me a piece of his mind because he found that I was hard to get in touch with. I understand that. I go on television on Saturday morning in Rimouski on the French channel—

An hon. Member: When they are not on strike.

Mrs. Côté: You understand his problem and I understand it too. I have sympathy for his concerns. He took the trouble of writing to me to explain how he was living through that, the strikes, the inflation, the energy problem, a problem which became more serious ever since the Conservative Party was in power. Fortunately, it was in power only nine months otherwise one wonders what might have happened afterwards. We are trying to solve the energy problem to the satisfaction of all Canadians. That particular constituent gave me his suggestions, his ideas. You cannot expect every citizen, every voter to take the time to write to you to tell you their experience and what you should do to be of greater service to them. Today we are dealing with the issue of tax agreements between the government of Canada and the provinces. We are not taking part in it, we cannot tell our people what is happening. We feel sort of powerless, but it is a self-imposed situation.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the motion moved by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs today has become a pressing necessity. I think it is unfair to waste our time and our money in such a manner, and to deprive people who have honestly worked for months at our service from well-deserved holidays. The present situation, that is closure being applied to an adjournment motion is an aberration because nobody here who has worked honestly, who has been assiduous, positive, openminded and constructive should be embarrassed to agree to an adjournment. Above all, we should not be afraid to meet our constituents. Mr. Speaker, I think that my time is almost up. I ask the understanding of my colleagues. This situation is the first of its kind, and I hope it will not happen again.

[English]

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It has come to my attention that the reading room and the library have closed down. This is very unusual. In my 16 years in the House of Commons, whenever the House has sat the library and the reading room have been kept open.

I wonder if the Chair would look into this matter and report back to hon. members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Yes, I will, and as soon as I have information on the matter I will report to the House.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak about this motion I must begin by saying that, despite my admiration for the hon. member for Rimouski (Mrs. Côté), I could not disagree with her more fundamentally. She suggests that Parliament and the provision of debate in this institution are a waste of time. I find that very difficult to accept. I know the hon. member speaks with a great amount of sincerity and feeling, but I must say that I am surprised that she would tend to treat the institution of Parliament so loosely.

If we believe in parliamentary democracy and the right to freedom of speech, then we must ensure that the rights and privileges of Parliament are always secure. I think those rights and privileges are very sacred. After all, Parliament is the foundation of and very fundamental to our basic freedoms, and to suggest that we might be better off without it frightens me very much. I have been here for 13 years and I have seen an erosion of the rights and privileges of individual members of Parliament. We as individual members of Parliament obtain our rights, privileges and powers, whatever they may be, from this institution, and I would hate to see them eroded further.

By virtue of a closure motion today we have a further contempt for and erosion of the spirit and privileges of this institution. I believe tyranny begins when parliamentary debate ends.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: We are being forced by a closure motion to adjourn at this time when there are very important issues facing this country. I too would like to get back to my constituency to deal on a first-hand basis with the people who sent me here, but at the same time I must say that I am somewhat embarrassed by the report card I must take back to them because the issues which were with us when this session began are still with us today, and in fact have been complicated and aggravated in many respects. We are sitting here in an extended sitting, which is quite unusual, but we are sitting here because there is, was and continues to be a postal crisis which is causing untold hardships and costing millions of Canadians across the country many millions of dollars.

The House has stood by. I believe it has accepted its responsibility, and it has produced some results. We now have a mediator, and we are all hopeful that the work of that mediator will be successful. I know we all wish him well in his very challenging task because we all recognize—and I am sure I speak for all members of the House—that postal service is very fundamental and basic to our country. It positively has to be considered an essential service, because when postal service stops our country suffers very, very much.

We are faced with a motion of closure to adjourn the House. Closure has been used on five different occasions in this House, but this is the first time it has ever been used to adjourn the House. This is unprecedented in Canadian history and, I suspect, in the history of the Commonwealth.

At the very outset I must say that I abhor this tactic. I find it offensive. I find it repugnant because it strikes at the basic fabric of our parliamentary democracy. Instead of having a parliamentary democracy, we have what resembles a parliamentary dictatorship. It concerns me very much that government members tend to gloss over this so lightly and that hon. members opposite are questioning the institution of Parliament and the institution of our parliamentary democracy as we know it.

I started out by saying that there are very important issues facing this country in addition to the Post Office crisis. There are serious economic issues including high interest rates, inflationary pressure and pressure on the Canadian dollar. There is economic depression in various parts of the country. To respond to my good friend, the hon. member for Rimouski, I must tell her that these are not insignificant matters. These are very important matters which affect every individual Canadian from coast to coast.

Much of the problem with which we are faced today has been contributed to by the failure of this government to negotiate an oil pricing agreement with the province of Alberta. The government has been in office for more than 16 months and we are really no closer to an oil agreement today than we were when the government assumed office. I find that very irresponsible and I will have more to say about it a little later on in my remarks.

The speakers on this side of the House have certainly raised many questions today about the uranium cartel, but we have not received satisfactory answers. The government is looking bad on this issue. It has every appearance of a major cover up. The government refuses to come clean and expose the documentation which it says justifies the actions it is taking. The exchanges which have taken place and the speeches made in the House only arouse more suspicion. Canadians are suspicious, and I think the whole matter smells.

Another important area which will affect many Canadians is the government's proposal to reduce rail passenger service in the country by approximately 20 per cent. This has very grave implications for many Canadians in many communities. It bothers me that the government seems hell-bent on making this announcement at a time when the House will not be in session.

I can only suggest that this action is cowardly and deceptive. The government will embark upon a very unusual practice. I am not suggesting that it has not been used before, but it will perform massive surgery on the rail passenger service without giving Canadians an opportunity to be heard and without giving them any recourse. The government will circumvent the regulatory process as well as the traditional and historic methods of doing things.

When I speak of "traditional and historic methods", I bring to the attention of the House that we are all aware VIA Rail was established under a dollar vote in the estimates and that it has not been properly constituted in the parliamentary sense. It forms the basis of report No. 12 of the Standing Joint Committee of the House of Commons and the Senate on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments which is contained in Votes and Proceedings. It is the continuation of an early report which read in part:

> The making of extensive subordinate laws on important matters such as VIA Rail Canada Inc., under votes in Appropriation Acts also produces laws and policies never debated by Parliament. Your committee's predecessor called for an end to this practice inimical to parliamentary sovereignty. It should stop and all existing subordinate laws made under Votes should be the subject of review as to merits by the appropriate Parliamentary Committees.

To follow up on that, the joint chairmen of the standing committee have been in constant correspondence with the Minster of Transport (Mr. Pepin) urging him to ratify in a parliamentary sense that which was done improperly through the estimates by bringing forth the VIA Rail Canada act so that the objectives, the mandate, the merits, the regulatory process, and all the pros and cons of VIA Rail could be debated properly before the House. We have a situation where a corporation charged with the task of providing rail passenger service will now have the rug pulled out from under it by a unilateral act, by a government edict which will reduce rail passenger service.

The other day the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) talked about parliamentary reform. If he wanted to give credence to his good intentions, he would begin by obeying the directions of the joint committee and by urging the Minister of Transport to bring forth a bill to ratify VIA Rail Canada in a proper fashion.

Before embarking upon the massive surgery of the rail passenger service which is contemplated, it seems to me that the minister should consider seriously a deferral of it until the VIA Rail Canada act is brought before the House so that we can debate its mandate and objectives. I call upon the President of the Privy Council to use his good offices to recommend to the Minister of Transport that this be done.

We do not know the rationale or the basis upon which the rationalization will take place. As for the proposed discontinuance of the Supercontinental Winnipeg-Vancouver line which goes through Edmonton, we really do not know upon what basis the decision will be made. I think an article in The Edmonton Sun put it in proper perspective:

> The generally accepted rule governing the continuation of any public passenger service is that the communities it serves must either use it or lose it.

On this basis there seems to be no case for the federal government to terminate VIA Rail Canada's transcontinental passenger train service through Edmonton. No case for the rail transport committee of the Canadian Transport Commission to approve an application for such termination . . .

During June, according to VIA, transcontinental trains leaving Calgary carried a total of 12,621 passengers. Those leaving Edmonton carried 539 more.

July figures for Edmonton are expected to be much higher. That's largely because VIA has been adding equipment to Edmonton trains since early June, and is still adding, in order to handle increased sales.

We would like the facts exposed. We should not be subjected to an edict by cabinet circumventing the regulatory process, with no recourse or opportunity for the Canadian people who are affected to express their dissatisfaction or objections to the move. I call upon the Minister of Transport and all members of the government to consider seriously the implications of this step before engaging in such wholesale abandonment as is proposed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I think the mayor of Edmonton summed it quite well in a telegram which he sent to the Minister of Transport. In part it reads:

At a time when Canada should be building communication links, your government appears to be attempting to destroy them in one of the most important areas in Canada. Surely at such a critical time in Canada's history we should be building a spirit of co-operation, and not separating parts of Canada. Any unilateral decision by your government can only be detrimental to a unified Canada.

Another telegram from the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce reads in part as follows:

This proposal is competely and totally unacceptable to the residents of this area. Such a move would greatly increase the feeling of alienation in western Canada.

The telegram from the Edson and District Chamber of Commerce reads in part as follows:

The Edson and District Chamber of Commerce strongly recommends that the federal government prior to any firm decision being reached allow the communities and the persons involved the right and opportunity to voice their objections to this proposed partial or total withdrawal of this essential rail service.

I am sure concerns and objections are being expressed in every part of Canada. If the Minister of Transport does not want the CTC to deal with the question, then he should refer his proposal to the parliamentary committee before he makes a firm decision. He should let the parliamentary committee consider the package and hear witnesses who want to express their views. Then he could make a decision. It should not be done unilaterally. It should not be done by a decree which can only hurt the people in the community and add to the divisiveness in the country.

I am sure the minister will be aware of the fact that VIA Rail is deeply starved for capital to improve its equipment. I think it has done an excellent job in merchandising, but it has to back it up with the product. VIA Rail is at the point right now where it can almost be charged with misleading advertising. It has a good marketing approach, but it needs the product to back it up. They need at least $200 million worth of capital each year over the next five years to refurbish and build the kind of fleet and infrastructure which is required to provide a realistic and effective rail passenger service.

We must have clarification whether rail passenger services are to have priority over freight cars. That is another issue which has still not been resolved. VIA really have no power and no authority. It plays second fiddle to the railway companies; it has no lever against the railways. It has to subscribe to an open-ended contract. It is a contract but at the end of the year it is renegotiable and additional charges which the railways incur are charged back to VIA Rail. It is really no way to run a railroad and the costing order has to be revised.

I urge the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), who is sitting in the House at the present time and who is occasionally nodding in the affirmative, to clean that mess up before starting to perform wholesale surgery on the route structure, thereby denying the rights of many Canadians to passenger service in this country. I say this in the most objective and non-partisan fashion of which I am capable. I know it is an expensive service but we, as Canadians, have to make up our minds whether we want a rail passenger service in this country. Every indication I have seen, all the testimony I have read before the CTC, shows that Canadians by and large support, and will continue to support, the provision of an effective rail passenger service in this country. I urge the government to pay attention to this.

Another issue which has not been adequately dealt with in this session is the energy situation. We really have an energy crisis which is fueled by the suspension of the $12 billion Cold Lake heavy oil plant as well as by the prospect of suspension of the Alsands project. The suspension of the Cold Lake plant can only be described as one of the most destructive decisions which has ever been made in the energy sector in Canada. I have to say this quite categorically and quite bluntly, Mr. Speaker. The blame for this has to be laid at the foot of the Liberal government in Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: It is well outlined in an editorial which appeared in the Edmonton Journal for Friday, July 10, 1981. Incidentally, Mr. Patrick O'Callaghan, the publisher, was at one time a pretty good Liberal. I think he has seen the destructive policies which have been levelled against western Canada and he certainly is very supportive of the current administration at the present time. That is not to say that he is not still a Liberal, but he has expressed a point of view which I must say to you, Mr. Speaker, is shared by most Canadians in western Canada. In an article entitled "Ottawa's failure", he writes:

Imperial Oil has shelved its Cold Lake heavy oil plant. And Alsands will probably suspend its plant north of Fort McMurray within two weeks. The responsibility for these tragic delays rests with the Liberals in Ottawa.

Canada desperately needs this oil. Conventional oil production will fall from 1.3 million barrels a day now to 710,000 barrels in 1985 and only 400,000 barrels in 1990. Canada has no hope of energy security without vast new oil production. Even with Hibernia, Alberta's oil sands are essential to Canada's economic health and national security.

There are two issues: permits and prices, the first political, the second economic. The Liberals have failed completely on both counts to encourage oil sands development.

Alberta has the power to grant permits but will not do so unless there is a comprehensive energy agreement with Ottawa. Marc Lalonde failed the Canadian people miserably last year when he made no perceptible effort to reach such an agreement with Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: And so you have headlines like this: "Esso decision could leave businesses out in the cold"; "Cold Lake exodus"; "Ontario loses too". It is not only the communities of northern Alberta which will suffer, the whole economy of Canada suffers. Our ability to secure energy self-sufficiency is a goal that is lost. We are losing expertise, research, and Canada desperately needs the oil. The fact that this delay will postpone the development of this plant for about two years will, in itself, cost the Canadian people some $5.6 billion. So, Mr. Speaker, we cannot continue on this way.

If we look at the economy, interest rates, unemployment, inflation, energy—there really is not anything good one can say about this particular session of Parliament. This session did not produce one iota of good in fostering national unity. The country is literally being torn apart. Not one piece of legislation to improve the economy has come before us, Mr. Speaker. Not one piece of positive legislation in the area of energy has been enacted. We are relying more and more on imports every day and it looks as though that situation will worsen. We are no closer to agreement. There is the suspension of Cold Lake and the possible suspension of Alsands. Gasoline and oil prices have risen and the tensions continue. Mr. Speaker, there has not been one piece of legislation introduced in this session which would help the average Canadian. This government is not only a failure, it has been an absolute flop.

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, like many members in the House at the moment, and probably like many members who will appear here at one o'clock tomorrow morning, I am somewhat surprised that we are here tonight. But considering that, and considering some of the difficulties and problems still facing this nation, I may not have appreciated having to be here last Monday on the pretext that it was in some way going to help the postal workers reach an agreement with the Government of Canada in their dispute. I do not think there are any delusions in this party that the sitting of Parliament will not really contribute anything to the collective bargaining or negotiations between employers and employees. However, it has given us the opportunity this week to ask some questions about some very important issues which still face this nation.

The question of rail transport in Canada, VIA Rail, and the possibility of large-scale abandonments of those rail lines which many Canadians still support in terms of the need for rail transportation, is a very important issue in mainland Canada, and also on Vancouver Island. The closure motion which was imposed by the government this afternoon, which I think was quite unnecessary, gives me the opportunity to explain to the government some of the concerns which people on Vancouver Island have about VIA Rail and some of the activities which they have been involved in over the years to ensure that the rail service continues.

The continuation of this service is supported by people on Vancouver Island who recognize that a rail system can form a very important link between the communities on Vancouver Island from Victoria in the south to Courtenay in the north and Port Alberni inland. That rail service joins 24 communities, some of them very small, but others fairly large and growing. It takes some of the pressure off the road system on Vancouver Island, and could take off far more pressure if it were given a chance. It appears that the government of the day will do what the CPR of yesterday was not able to do and was not permitted to do by the Canadian Transport Commission, that is to say, abandon the rail line on Vancouver Island. For many years the CPR attempted to curtail its passenger service and maintain a freight service on the island.

In 1978, in a hearing held in Victoria on an application by the CPR to curtail that line, many community groups, municipal groups and individuals such as railway union workers made presentations to the CTC chairman at that time, Edgar Benson. Half way through the hearings, everyone was elated because they had heard that rail passenger service was going to be maintained on Vancouver Island. The E & N, indeed, was going to get a reprieve and four more years of passenger service would be provided.

The true significance of that event was not immediately known or recognized because people thought that the CTC was directing the CPR to continue its obligation to provide passenger service to Canadians and to people on Vancouver Island; but what had happened was that the government decided that VIA Rail would take that losing proposition away from the Canadian Pacific Railway and would subsidize the losses of CPR by renting equipment from the CPR and taking the losses of rail transportation passenger service on Vancouver Island. Therefore, CPR, after having the land grants, the mineral grants, the forest timber leases and all the real estate that it had developed, was able to get out of a losing proposition, and the Canadian taxpayer was allowed, quite magnanimously, by the Canadian government to take on that losing proposition.

Now we have a situation, three years later, where the government itself, in its restraint program, is prepared to do what the CPR could not do, and is prepared to do it in a far more cynical way. We will not even have the opportunity to have public hearings to indicate to the government the feeling of Vancouver Islanders about the necessity of a railway system on Vancouver Island, and what we would like to see that rail system really do, because it is not doing what it could do or should be doing at this moment.

I think my colleague, the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), in asking a question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) the other day, summed up the attitude of the CPR when it was running passenger service on Vancouver Island, and also what VIA Rail, because of lack of budgeting and lack of finances, has done. The hon. member for Regina West says that if a passenger train is run old enough, late enough, slow enough, and dirty enough, no one will get on it and the route can be abandoned.

That is exactly what the CPR was doing, to the extent that it allowed two railway trestles north of Parksville to become so worn out and so unsafe that there was no service over those trestles. The CPR had no intention to repair that bridge until the CTC required it to do so.

If one does not want people to ride on one's rail system, one does what has been done on the E & N. We essentially have a rail system which can be considered to be a heritage rail system. The stations were built in the early 1900s. The plaster is chipping off the walls. They may have had paint. It is doubtful if they have had new roofs. However, if we want to make it a tourist attraction on Vancouver Island, and I think there are some possibilities to use that railway system for the tourist industry, we already have railway stations which were built in the early 1900s.

Another way to prevent people from using the railway system so as to abandon it, as is likely to occur, is to not let anyone know when the trains are running, or run them in such a direction that the traffic flow at that time of the day is opposite to the direction of the train. That is being done on Vancouver Island.

In 1976, there were 6,585 people who used the E & N bud car, a single car. In 1977 11,000 people used it. I can understand why the CPR was asking for abandonment of this rail line. In 1977 there was an increase in passenger service and use of that train to 11,343. In 1978, when the railway union and people became aware of what was happening and that there was a real danger of losing that system, and publicity became prevalent about the E & N, the number of passengers rate went from 11,000 in 1977 to almost 44,000 in 1978. When people understood that there was a system and were interested in taking a trip from Victoria to Courtenay, to see the beautiful Vancouver Island scenery, in 1979 that passenger service provided service for 57,000 people. So it increased, from 6,000 people in 1976 to over 57,000 in 1979 because people knew there was passenger service. In one year the CPR spent $175 advertising that service.

There is all kinds of other information and evidence to indicate why people were not using it. One of the problems with the E & N railway is the speed at which the trains travel. The track bed, the rail, the ballasts and the ties are so bad that for safety, in some parts of that route, passenger trains are down to five miles per hour, in many places 10 and 20 miles per hour, and the maximum is 40 miles per hour. That is an indication both of a desire to discourage people from using rail service in Canada, particularly on Vancouver Island, and second, it is an indication of how poor the track is and how poor the CPR has been at maintaining the track bed.

Hearings were held in Nanaimo in March of 1980, at the insistence of myself and other groups within the community. Representatives from the CPR, the RTC, represented by the Vancouver regional director, Mr. Jim Eisler, people from the community, including fire departments, municipal councils, regional board directors, union people, ecological alliance people, and the E & N steering committee president or chairman made representations about the track and the desire to maintain the track and rail service.

Coming from that meeting was a very comprehensive report done by Mr. Eisler of the RTC. The report was submitted November 1, 1980. It is called "A Report on Certain Engineering Aspects of the Esquimalt & Nanaimo Railway". We were informed that this would be one of the more comprehensive reports on any rail track bed taken in Canada. It was a kind of pilot project to do a detailed study of that track bed and relate that to standards and safety standards of rail systems. Mr. Eisler made some recommendations to the Railway Transport Commission in Ottawa dealing with derailments. I quote as follows:

> There are no readily discernible trends as regards frequency of occurrence, however it has been noted that oscillatory behaviour of equipment has been a factor in four of the last seven reportable derailments on the E & N.

Oscillation occurs at certain speeds on rails systems, and often at very slow speeds. Four of the last seven derailments on that system have been because of harmonic oscillation. Trains are going very slowly because of safety factors. Because they are reduced to that speed, they are going so slow that the wheels of the train virtually creep off the track and derail that train. That is the kind of track condition we had on Vancouver Island. Because of this report, there have been some improvements.

Much of the track is 80 or 85-pound rail which was installed in 1900, and it was designed for much lighter cars than those which are going over the track now. Some of the big tank cars carrying propane, caustic soda and other hazardous goods are in the 22,000 pound range and they are not built to go over tracks of 80 to 85 pounds.

● (1900)

Most people on Vancouver Island are concerned about the ties. As one walks down the rail line it can be seen that ties and spikes are defective. A lot of reports made to the meeting in Nanaimo referred to those ties. We appreciate the attention paid by the CTC to the residents of Vancouver Island who expressed concern about safety.

The CTC report of November 20, 1980, had the following to say about ties:

> Sampling has indicated that prior to the commencement of the 1980 work season there were well in excess of 200,000 defective track ties in place on the E & N. It was determined that 60 per cent to 70 per cent of the trackage did not comply with CP "in house guidelines" for permissible defective ties and that about 4 per cent of the trackage did not meet FRA safety standards when such criteria were applied for comparative purposes.

The CP in-house standards were not met, Mr. Speaker, for 60 per cent to 70 per cent of the trackage. That is why trains were travelling at five, ten or 15 miles per hour. The only way that safety can be maintained on a rail system like that is for trains to go slower and slower and slower until they stop. Nobody gets on the train. This is what was happening.

There was the same kind of problem with ballast. In fact, the report points out that in some places on the E & N Railway the trains were virtually travelling in the mud. We now have the spectre of the CPR, in order to eliminate some of the vegetation on the track, proposing a major spraying program in areas of the island, going through watersheds in communities such as Bowser in the north part and south of Courtenay and using round-up to alleviate the vegetation problem. I would submit that a lot of those vegetation problems would be eliminated if proper ballast were put on the railway system and plants were not allowed to grow in the mud and soil, as is the case at present.

It is no wonder that Canadians do not use rail transportation. They are being discouraged from using it just as they were under the CPR. VIA Rail has not been given the access to the capital needed to improve the system and upgrade stations—or to double track. We just want one track on Vancouver Island; we are not interested in double-tracking. What we are interested in is the opportunity to go before the CTC and make the point that we want the rail transportation system on the island. If VIA Rail abandons it, it is doing exactly what the CPR wanted to do. That transportation corridor on Vancouver Island could be used by municipalities for rail transportation and for access to the highway.

Canadians have subsidized the CPR long enough through land grants. They have been betrayed by the CPR which has not provided rail transportation. We would like to see this government take action to take over some of the assets of the CPR. If Canadians have to assume all the losing propositions, perhaps we should start looking at some of those rail lines that have been abandoned, with a view to taking the property itself and using it to better advantage.

We reject the government's attitude of abandoning those lines without giving people in the communities access to the CTC in order to make their points.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Before I recognize the hon. member for Manicouagan (Mr. Maltais), the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) asked the Chair to investigate the use of the library and reading room facilities. The library is open and will remain open until the House adjourns. The reading room is now open and will remain open until 10 p.m., after which time members are asked to use the identical services of the library.

[Translation]

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that it is not with pleasure that I intervene in the debate on the adjournment motion but rather through duty, since, normally, in a meaningful and worthwhile debate, it would have been interesting to talk not only about our constituents but also about a concrete bill, which I assume, must have gotten far ahead of the actual work of the committees, and to debate concrete bills aiming at promoting the welfare of all Canadians.

A poet once said, "Liberty! How many crimes are committed in thy name!" On hearing what is being said on the other side of this House I feel that not only is history being relived but it seems it will always be so.

Mr. Speaker, I shall direct my comments to you although they are really intended for my fellow Canadians. I heard the Hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) say this afternoon that we should not waste the precious time of this House. Yet, it seems unbelievable that at this very hour, at 7.05, there are no more than 30 members in attendance out of the 282 who were elected, from which I infer that if this debate had been really so important, there would be more of us participating. I am pleased to note that the Government side is better represented than the two opposition parties combined.

In his play "Les Femmes savantes" Molière wrote that if blue-stockings were short of imagination, they at least had an elaborate vocabulary which enabled them to sound impressive. Just about the same thing could be said about this Chamber. Since 1 p.m. nothing meaningful has been discussed, and I admit to being as guilty of glibness as anybody else around here. I would have liked to deal with important matters, but since we are expected to focus on the adjournment motion, we have to demonstrate the urgency or the importance of breaking up at any given moment, so that we may resume our business in our constituencies. Government members agree and so do opposition parties. I had the opportunity to travel with the Hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) last year. We went around Canada to study transportation problems, and I think that in normal circumstances, it would have been interesting, instead of making those pompous speeches, to address ourselves to the question of transport, as you have so rightly pointed out when we were dealing with that subject in your area and in Western Canada. Now, what have we been doing for a week? We said, "Let's keep the House busy at any cost, because there was the mail strike and it is the only subject we dealt with." Later on, we jumped on the opportunity to introduce the subject of the uranium controversy. As far as the post-office is concerned, our colleagues opposite who are just as well-meaning, well-informed and competent as we are, know full well that once a mediator was found, appointed and set in his office, the House as such had not much more to do about that. Even if we meant to bring moral support to the two parties, namely the Post Office and the union who are now discussing with the mediator, we would not have achieved much. On the contrary, by insisting on hanging around here like watchdogs, we seemed to imply that we expected a failure. This is the very argument put forward by the Right Hon.

Leader of the Opposition when he advocated our staying on, here in Ottawa, to put pressure on the Post Office and send the postal workers back to work.

Why is it that a week after, just when a mediator has been appointed and negotiations have resumed only today, they oppose the adjournment motion? Why? For political gains? To show Canadians that they have their interests at heart? How commendable! But we know full well such is not the case. We know very well that the only reason we are here is that it gives the opposition the opportunity to show that we can do more than what a mediator can accomplish or what the opposing parties could do. But that is not so. As the government has said, nothing more can be done for the time being. There will be no special legislation. We will have to go along with the mediation process until we find a common ground for negotiations. That is provided for in the statutes. The opposition is always clamouring for freedom, freedom of speech and the right to be heard.

We do indeed enjoy freedom and the right to speak, but where does a right begin and where does it end? Because there has been abuse, at some point we have to be more reasonable and show some self-discipline. Members have the right to eat any time they want, twenty-four hours a day if they wish. But we know very well that using that kind of freedom would make one sick. In fact, what all members on both sides of the House should understand is that once they have voiced their opposition to some government proposal or regulation, their right has been respected. Opposition members have indeed been able to voice their opposition to a government measure and they have had press coverage.

But that is not the kind of freedom they want. They want to abuse freedom to hinder the due process of democracy. What can the opposition gain by keeping government here all summer? They will say that we must stay here because otherwise interest rates might go up, the postal service will not be restored, the uranium cartel will only get worse, while knowing full well that the report is in the government's hands. What more can they achieve? That would be akin to a doctor refusing to leave the hospital at any time, day or night, for fear that new patients might come in. At some point one has to draw the line. You have shown your opposition. The people understand. The press has reported your arguments accurately. It is not for us to judge the validity of those arguments, yet at some point one has to call it quits. I know that the hon. member for Vegreville represents a large riding whose problems are very complex, as he has told me many times. It is the same thing for me. I wish I could have attended to the construction of a road where one has yet to be built. I also wish I had had the opportunity to discuss matters with the candidate to the leadership of the Conservative Party, the president of the Iron Ore Company, my friend, Brian Mulroney. I would have tried to find a solution to the problem of those 150 fellows in Schefferville who have been laid off, but it still has to be solved.

That is why I have been unable to do everything I should have as vice-chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport since the month of January, at which time I met Mr. Mulroney in an attempt to find a solution for the workers who have been laid off; Mr. Mulroney himself wants the members opposite to be reminded of that. The president of the Iron Ore Company congratulated the Minister for Small Businesses, the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Lapointe) and myself on the measures taken to help the people in Sept-Îles and Schefferville; this is the government that came forward with this special budget proposal for industrial restructuring and community adjustment. But one problem remains, that of Schefferville. Under normal circumstances, I should have been there to help the parties involved find ways and means of implementing the plan to greater advantage. But for 15 days now, I have had to postpone all that because, day after day, a debate has been extended which in itself is useless. Anyone can ask the president of the Iron Ore Company whether or not the plan set up by the government party during the winter has been of help to him and his company. Such a plan is mostly responsible for the collective bargaining without a strike. However, hon. members opposite will not mention that. I think that as a member from an area which has known 2,000 lay-offs last winter, we have more important things to do than to discuss an entirely fictitious extension of this session. Some people, as the hon. member for Rimouski-Témiscouata (Mrs. Côté) put it very well earlier, have done their best for us throughout the fall and spring and they should normally be entitled to holidays. Families are involved in this. The opposition is showing how irresponsible it is. If it cannot be more responsible in the House of Commons, how could it be given responsibility for the public administration as the government? This is important.

The hon. member for Rimouski-Témiscouata also raised the issue of families. When hon. members get together what do we often hear? That the life of a parliamentarian is not easy, that it is difficult and complex. We are far from our families. We would like to be closer to our children and look after their education. However, we are the first ones to burden ourselves and to become martyrs in a cause of our own making. We would be much more responsible if we were in our constituencies, with our families, working normally, finding out what is going on there rather than trying to solve the issue of interest rates within the next six weeks or trying to solve the postal conflict when the ability of the mediator has been acknowledged by both sides.

Let us deal with the uranium issue now: the new problem this week. Hon. members opposite know quite well that the report delivered to the Attorney General of Canada comes from the officials of the departments involved. Unless we want to question the professionalism of those people, all that remains to us now is to do exactly what the Attorney General is doing, that is to defer everything to the courts. Now Parliament is not a court. Parliament is supposed to legislate. When the reports are tabled, when the proceedings are launched, we will be in a position to know what it is all about and to ask questions if we should probe deeper into some matters. However, this is absolutely not the case at present. This week, we had nothing but presumptions and innuendoes. How can we possibly have a serious debate when all we are doing really is to try to mark time, to show interest in an issue which does not concern us for the time being since it is before the courts. I am surprised that mature people who were members of the previous government cannot assume their responsibilities with more seriousness.

A moment ago I said that there were 30 of us when we started off. I see now that there are two members on the NDP side and four members of the Progressive Conservative Party. I am still thinking of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) who was saying that above all we should not waste the precious time of the House. There are very few people in the gallery and not many members in this House. I think we ought to be more serious because if the people saw what is going on here they would be quite discouraged because we are not doing democracy any good. Quite the opposite. When we travel through our ridings and hear what people have to say about the institutions which represent them, there is no reason to be surprised to see how little respect they have for those institutions and even for parliamentarians.

The type of comedy—that is exactly what it is, I think—we have been witnessing for the past week does not do anything at all to enhance the calibre of the debates we should be having and above all does not contribute anything to restore the fame and the lustre of an instituton such as Parliament. I for one am far from being proud to see the situation we have gotten ourselves into as parliamentarians because we did not want to co-operate and especially because we did not want to be reasonable.

We are the first to ask in the name of public interest that reason triumph over passion and that we have some parameters to guide us in certain institutions and certain conflicts, but when the time comes to apply such things to ourselves, I often have the feeling that we are unable to accept that kind of discipline. We may have a tendency to act somewhat childishly as though we were in boarding school, but this is not the way to inspire the Canadian people with respect for parliamentary institutions. And I know that people of my own generation often have a tendency to smile when we speak about Parliament.

When I first came here myself, I had the impression that Parliament was much more serious than this. We must admit that we deal with serious issues, but the rule which gives us the right to speak does not necessarily mean the freedom to abuse this right, even though the two are often confused. This does not restrict democracy but shows a certain discipline, and we should normally be able to do so as responsible people. It seems much easier to have good intentions than to do something concrete. What gets somewhat irritating in this House is the fact that they always want to speak, and even though I have taken 20 minutes to speak, I would have found it much more normal to be in my own region representing my fellow citizens than to repeat what has been said earlier and to say things which will be repeated later by members on both sides of the House, even though nothing will have been gained. I am certain that, sitting in his place, the hon. member for Vegreville is aware of this, and he should be free to say so, but I believe he is prevented from doing so by a mental restriction, because basically there is common sense on both sides of the House. However, there is always a tendency to say what we want to say and to ignore the rest. I remember one of my teachers who always said: It is better to keep quiet and be thought silly than to speak and prove it. I have the impression that it would often be better here if we kept much more quiet—

Mr. Shields: Why didn't you?

Mr. Maltais: Perhaps we should apply this principle on this side of the House, but perhaps it has been better illustrated this past week by the other side. That is the difference. What I want to say in closing is that we should amend our rules as early as possible during the next session, because I am told that the same situation has existed and the same things have been repeated for 114 years. I would prefer the party opposite to be much more progressive than conservative, because I often feel that the opposite is true now and that they are more conservative, more limited in their creativity and their imagination than able to do something positive to see to it that our rules are changed as quickly as possible.

I have to say in all honesty that it was perhaps a good thing a few years ago to have long debates and long speeches, but I believe this is no longer the case. What is important is to outline principles, to make the public aware of the regulations and to see to it that the opposition has the time to explain its objections, and then we can vote. That is a democracy. All the rest is talk and discussions which lead nowhere unless, as the hon. member for Rimouski said earlier, we do not want to have any contact with our constituents and prefer remaining in Ottawa to enjoy the weather.

I do not think that Members of Parliament in general want this. Most of them would like to go home. It seems to me that we have fallen into a trap much deeper than we could have imagined. The hon. members should now admit that the government had no other solution than to impose this motion of closure and finally draw the line so that we could go back to our ridings. I know that the opposition would perhaps have liked to show more strength, but this changes nothing in the role of the opposition. What is important when you express an idea is the strength of your argument.

It does not matter how long nor how vigorously they argue, it will not change a thing. I think their leader expressed the views of their party quite clearly and what was said after was just a rehash. It does not matter whether we stay here a year, a month or a week longer. What the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said on the government side does not change the situation either. It is like a dog running after its tail. I do not think we are getting anywhere by staring at each other here on this Friday July 17 at 7.30 p.m. when we could be doing some concrete work.

Finally, I would add that it is not by sitting here, by making speeches like the one I am now making that we are going to change the country or make interest rates go down. That is for sure. I remember that when the opposition party was in power, we had to increase productivity. What is happening today? Our productivity is certainly not excessive. And I remember also that when we had 14 per cent interest rates, it was the party across the way which renewed the mandate of the head of the Bank of Canada for another seven years: It was the government of the day which confirmed the president of the Bank of Canada in his position. If we want action, if we want to find formulas, it is not by arguing as we have been doing for the past five hours now that we will do it. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the guillotine be applied, for lack of anything better, but that as early as the next session, we really get down to work in order to find rules much more appropriate not to the twentieth century but to the twenty-first century ahead.

[English]

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I listened with some interest to the speeches this afternoon. If one listened to them and looked them over, one could lump together the hon. member for Manicouagan (Mr. Maltais) and the hon. member for Rimouski-Témiscouata (Mrs. Côté) who both seemed terribly dissatisfied with the rules of this House. I wonder who they think brought them here. The rules of this House were brought in with closure by a Liberal government. It took the spending authority out of the House. That is when this House lost its authority, effectiveness and responsibility.

That is one of the main reasons for the small attendance in the House these days. Besides, this is the dinner hour. The hon. member should not think that the shortage of personnel belongs to only one party in this House. I recall to his memory the last time, and it was a very rare occasion, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) decided to speak to us, and over 100 Liberals were absent from their places.

Mr. McKnight: I don't blame them. It was a terrible speech.

Mr. Maltais: When was that?

Mr. McKinnon: If the hon. member cannot remember when the Prime Minister spoke, he may have been one of those who were absent.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Dubois) on a point of order.

Mr. Dubois: I would like the hon. member to give us the specific date and time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): That may be something the hon. member would like to know or ask to the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), but first, it is not a point of order, and second, I should like to remind the hon. member that the hon. member for Victoria is not required to answer in one way or the other.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: I can only say that I endured the Prime Minister's speech on that date. When I spoke shortly after, I pointed out that there had only been 42 Liberal members present. I believe that leaves over 100 members absent. I will look up the date and give it to the hon. member. I obviously do not have time now to look it up.

I suppose it would be fair to say that this adjournment debate actually started over a week ago when the motion respecting the summer recess was introduced by the government House leader. Adjournment debates are often looked upon as opportunities to review the performance of governments. Time never permits it to be done comprehensively or in detail. Therefore, I can only speak of a few of this government's many faults.

First let us turn to the atmosphere in the House. In my eight and a half years here I have never seen anything like it. It has been an extraordinarily long session. Much of the time has been spent in the struggle between the official opposition and the government over the arbitrariness of the government. The struggle has had two quite disparate facets. One was the Constitution debate. The other was a grouping of items which could only be put under the heading of general incompetence of the government. It surfaced as a national energy program, an ineffective budget, the uranium cartel, the paranoia about hiding information, and the cessation of mail service.

● (1930)

The struggle concerning the Constitution resulted in a victory for the Official Opposition when the government finally agreed that the Supreme Court of Canada should have an opportunity to look at the legality of the course the government was set upon. Had it not been for the determined stand of the Official Opposition, the Constitution question would long since have been sent to another country for amending, with the amendments not having been provided by the several parts of this confederation but by the federal Liberal Party only. What a travesty of federalism!

In his speech eight days ago when the government House leader first attempted to send this Parliament home in the midst of the worst scandal to strike the government in 15 years, in the middle of a mail strike and at a time when the highest cost of living of all time was upon us, the government House leader attempted to console us with a litany of the bills which had been passed. To me it was a rather incredible performance, particularly when he stated, as recorded at page 11426 of Hansard:

> During this session, we have passed more economic or financial bills than ever before in previous sessions—

Later he said:

> —there is a lot of major and most important legislation related to financial matters, related to budget, and related to other major subjects, like the Post Office, the Bank Act and others.

Why do I consider these remarks incredible? It is because of the results so far obtained by the government. We have the largest national debt ever, the highest rate of inflation ever, the highest interest rates ever, the largest deficit ever and, worst of all, the highest cost of living ever. There is no plan for resolving our economic problems.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), when not in seclusion, seems satisfied to let things drift, hoping that a recovery will occur in the United States which might drag us up with it. That is a most peculiar attitude, in that if our government seems to be heading in any direction, it is directly opposite, economically speaking, to that of the United States.

Now the government has produced the final insult to democracy. Beset with all these difficulties, which of themselves demand action, the government has decided to abandon Parliament and to adjourn it by closure, a step never taken before in our history or, as far as I know, in the history of any mature democracy.

I believe it is quite appropriate that the cabinet minister selected to move this vicious closure does so not in his role as Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) but, rather, in his position as Minister of Corporate Affairs. The uranium cartel scandal falls within the responsibilities of that department. This is a minister, hon. members will recall, who promised that the Bertrand report would be made public. He now has the effrontery to claim that by passing it in secret to the secretive Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) he has, by his version of Orwellian double-speak, made it public. I am a salmon fisherman, but I have never seen a fish try as hard to get off a hook as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has tried to get off the hook of cabinet and ministerial responsibility in this matter. He has squirmed, he has jumped, he has dodged and run, but all to no avail.

What about the uranium cartel? I have watched carefully during the past weeks the stonewalling, deception and cover-up being practised by the mover of this closure motion as well as by his colleagues, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice. The last two particularly try to answer every question on the subject by saying that their government initiated the Bertrand review. They carefully stay away from dates. This is simply begging the question.

The facts are, first, that in 1971 the government began to consider forming a cartel to control the price of uranium on an international basis. In April 1972 the deputy minister of energy, mines and resources chaired a meeting in the boardroom of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources when both the deputy minister, now known as Senator Jack Austin, and the former director of the combines branch, opined that the cartel would be illegal according to Canadian law if it affected the price of uranium within Canada. Senator Austin stated that the cabinet agreed with the arrangements. Although Mr. Austin was the president of Uranium Canada, a Crown corporation now charged as a result of Mr. Bertrand's report, Senator Austin has not been charged or even listed as an unindicted co-conspirator.

The price of uranium skyrocketed in the early 1970s, and Ontario Hydro was forced to pass the extra costs on to the purchasers of electricity. I must say that I found the remarks of the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) perhaps rather influenced by the district from which she comes. She was proud that Uranium Canada had, subsequent to this, made a lot of money. This may go over well in Sudbury where mining is the chief local industry, and in that particular respect I have often wondered how the Minister of State for Mines would feel if a large excise tax were imposed on nickel as this government has imposed one on natural gas which is found in my province, in Alberta and in Saskatchewan only.

In any event, the extra costs which built up that profit were paid by consumers. Consumers paid extra charges for electricity. This, of course, also rendered the cartel illegal in terms of Canadian law, and anyone connected with its management and operation, if possessing knowledge at all, would appear to be in a very serious legal position. The question then arises: was the cabinet aware of this? Was the then minister of energy, mines and resources aware? Was Senator Austin aware?

The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey), a former minister, spoke with his usual eloquence an hour or so ago, but I am sorry he did not see that as a good time to clear up one matter which is bothering all of us, and that is just when the cabinet did find out that the effects of the cartel were in fact raising the cost to consumers in Canada and therefore indulging in an illegal practice.

I will get back to the question of just who knew about this and who did not in a few moments because that really is the crux of the present debate.

In 1975 the effects of the cartel were known. Subsequently a group of Conservatives started an action regarding the matter. Still the government did nothing.

In 1977 the government commissioned Mr. Bertrand to investigaste the cartel. At the same time or shortly after, it passed a secret Privy Council order forbidding any disclosures or discussion of the matter in public. That was the famous gag order. In fact, it was seriously questioned as to whether members of Parliament should be allowed to ask questions on the matter.

To get back to whether the appropriate companies and persons have been charged or not, first I might point out that two of the firms are Crown corporations the correctness of which surely must be of interest to parliamentarians. The individuals about whom we are concerned were also either senior employees of the Crown or cabinet ministers at the time. For such individuals to be held blameless, as the Minister of Justice has determined they are, they must have had no knowledge of the illegal activities carried out during what has been considered an illegal operation—and so considered by the Minister of Justice, I might say.

The government is asking us to believe that all those against which there was viable evidence have now been charged. Therefore, we assume that he considered that no cabinet member or deputy minister of the day knew anything about the illegality of the cartel, and I am speaking in so far as the effect the cartel had on the prices in Canada only.

If anyone believes the Minister of Justice, he must believe that Senator Austin chaired a meeting at which the director of the combines branch, Mr. Henry, stated that the cartel would be illegal under Canadian law if it affected prices in Canada, and yet the Minister of Justice claims that Senator Austin is innocent. If one believes the Minister of Justice, one must believe that Senator Austin, then deputy minister of energy, mines and resources, pointed out that the cabinet agreed with what was happening but, on the other hand, that he knew nothing about it. If one believes the Minister of Justice, one must believe that the deputy minister of energy, mines and resources never told his minister, the Hon. Donald Macdonald, anything about the questionable practices the cartel was engaging in.

While on the matter of Senator Austin's not even being named as an unindicted co-conspirator, one must consider that as deputy minister of energy, mines and resources Mr. Austin was also president of Uranium Canada, a shell of a company now charged as a result of the Bertrand inquiry. The additional question concerning Senator Austin is a statement to a cartel meeting, held again in the board room of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, that the cabinet approved the agreement. If the cabinet approved, one would presume it knew about it. One wonders if the one-time secretary to the Prime Minister ever found time to brief the Prime Minister on this important matter.

The Minister of Justice expects us to believe that all cabinet members, including the Prime Minister and all deputy ministers, were in blissful ignorance of these matters. The hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) told the Minister of Justice that he was stretching our credulity to the breaking point. I will go somewhat further. The Minister of Justice long since passed the breaking point of my credulity. I simply cannot believe that all these people knew nothing about what was going on.

No more do I believe the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, that model of rectitude who assured the House that when the Bertrand report was completed it would be made public, and then passed it in secret to the Minister of Justice who refuses its release. It has been a sorry story. The government first helped to organize and coerce Canadian companies into a cartel that shortly turned to illegal practices in Canada; then, when discovered, the government passed a "gag" privy council order to stifle and to make illegal all discussion of the matter.

When one listens to the Minister of Justice at the centre of this debate, one should notice that he answers nearly every question by stating that the Liberal government set up an inquiry that lasted four years and that this should exculpate them from any complicity in the alleged illegal operation. The Minister of Justice never states when the four years were.

There are just three or four dates to remember. The cartel started in 1972. During the period 1973 to 1975, the effects of the cartel were well known but no action was taken. The Prime Minister has admitted himself that he knew of the illegality in 1975, but nothing happened until 1977. The four years the Minister of Justice boasts about were the last four years, from 1977 to 1981. Thus, during the nine-year course of this disgraceful and devious deal, the government took five years of price gouging, bid-rigging and other nefarious practices before they did anything.

Now the government has decided to adjourn Parliament, using closure to do so. This will give them three months away from the critical voices on this side of the House. They will no longer even need to make a pretence of answering questions or accepting responsibility for the Canadian situation.

It is bad enough to close Parliament with the economy in serious difficulty, the mails not operating, rampant inflation and high interest rates devastating businesses and individuals alike, but to do it by using closure is an affront to democracy in this country of ours. It is a sorry day indeed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I will start my speech by saying that I am a little surprised at the last remarks of my colleague opposite for whom I have a great deal of respect, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), who for a good many years has been sitting here in this House, except to say that when he says that the use of closure is an insult to democracy, an attack on the members' rights, Mr. Speaker, such remarks do not sound true to my ears. I am a little surprised at such a statement when we are told that while we have high interest rates, high inflation, a postal strike, there are now problems to be solved and closure is being applied as a means of closing a debate.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the debate on the adjournment motion started a week ago, on Friday. Bill C-48 was reintroduced at the report stage, the opposition put an amendment forward and there has been endless talk. One after the other, opposition members have discussed the amendment. I submit they did not accomplish much, and after sitting here for a whole week I do not think that many problems have been solved because the opposition insisted on remaining here.

This in no way means, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to deny opposition members the right to speak. I myself chair a committee, and I see here my hon. friend from Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), who sits on the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, where we were examining the access to information bill. I tried as chairman to give people every opportunity to express their views and put questions. But faced with this whole situation here with so much talk and empty words, I would say as an experienced member of the legal profession that when we have to proceed in court and make a case either for the plaintiff or the defendant, at some point the judge says enough, and that is that. I feel unfortunately that our Standing Orders are really antiquated.

There is something that is unbelievable. I have no intention, of course, of denying the opposition their basic right to speak. Under the Latin maxim audi alteram partem, used in the courts of justice, the other side has to be heard. That is important. But there comes a point when enough is enough, and I feel that faced with that whole problem, we ought to make some change. On this side of the House, there are 146 or 148 members, we have a majority, and there is the opposition, but something is amazing. This government or rather the House can easily be opened under an order from the Speaker, but it cannot be closed without the use of a section of what I could call the code of procedure. It cannot be closed without consent.

Some ministers who used to be House leaders used to say that the House of Commons only works with consent, and it is my experience over a year and half that indeed the House does not work without consent. House leaders, both from the government, the official opposition and the New Democratic Party, meet and discuss the various bills that are to be called in order to know if they are to go through or not. There must be consent. Without consent, the bill cannot go through, and without consent the House cannot adjourn. This is a vicious circle, Mr. Speaker. What should we do? The House can be opened but cannot be closed without invoking a standing order, Standing Order 33, and the other side says this is an insult to democracy, an infringement of the right to speak! I understand that my hon. colleague from Nepean-Carleton and my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre, have been sitting, along with the hon. member from Drummond (Mr. Pinard), on a committee dealing with parliamentary reform.

As far as I know, everyone was agreeable to cutting down on the time members would be allowed to speak. Their right to speak would not be infringed upon but we were going to cut it down in order to update this institution. In fact, it would have to be done because the present situation is quite extraordinary. While respecting the right to speak of every member how can we explain that after one week of debate on different subjects, and mainly on the motion of adjournment, that we are now forced to resort to this procedure, that is Standing Order 33? I think this is an abuse. Can we say, that as a result of being here for the past week there has been some progress in the postal strike situation? Has there been a settlement? Has something happened in that respect? Nothing has been done. A mediator was appointed. Is it because the opposition as well as the government were sitting in the House that the matter got settled? I have said that the House can be recalled quickly, that it only takes a telegram from the Speaker requesting the calling of the House as has happened last fall when we reconvened on October 6 instead of the 14th or the 15th of October as scheduled. The House could have quite easily gone on summer recess last Friday and it could have been recalled if necessary by the Chair to continue with the debate.

Mr. Speaker, all this points out to the fact that our rules are quite out of date and that they should definitely be changed. Let us give members the right to speak, I agree. But, nothing in our little green book of Standing Orders denies honourable members of this House the right to ask questions or to participate in a debate. Mr. Speaker, if, during question period, the Chair had to recognize as many government members as opposition members, honourable members opposite would feel discriminated against and denied the right to speak. But in fact, it is in the Standing Orders that members of the government have as much right as members of the opposition to ask questions.

But what has happened? A custom developed as a result of which opposition members ask more questions than members of the party in power. However, the traditional right, under Standing Orders of the House for any member to ask questions, is the same for everyone. If the rules were applied to the letter, every time a member of the opposition would get up, a member of government should get up also if we were to follow the rules and the floor should be given to a member on the left and on the right and on the far right, thus we would draw a circle and as many members from this side could speak. But, members across the floor would complain that they are being denied the right to speak. However, that is the rule! Mr. Speaker, for all those reasons, I think it is about time we bring improvements to the standing rules and orders of this House. But if I am referring to the present situation, it is to point out that although some of those orders may appear outmoded, they did not preclude 65 bills from reaching the third reading stage and royal assent since April 1980. These include Bill C-16, an Act to amend the Old Age Security Act, Bill C-36, an Act respecting the national anthem of Canada and several other bills which were adopted.

Regarding the bill to change the Post Office into a Crown corporation, I remember that when the bill reached the third reading stage, in this House, hon. members from the other side came to congratulate the Postmaster General who is also the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) on what they thought was a very good bill. I recall that even my colleague from Nepean-Carleton crossed the floor to commend the minister for that bill. I do not remember exactly who did likewise on behalf of the New Democratic Party but one hon. member did.

● (1950)

[English]

Mr. Paproski: After the next election you will be able to ask all the questions you want, you will be in opposition.

Mr. Dubois: Do you think so, my friend? It has been just about 17 years that you have been in opposition.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —the justice committee.

Mr. Dubois: Don't talk about the justice committee. You are a member and very often not there.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, as far as the Post Office is concerned, I think that everyone is hoping that after September 1, the situation will greatly improve, an improvement which all Canadians would very much like to see. It is one of the bills which have been adopted, and I think this House has every right to be proud of this achievement which will make many if not all Canadians very happy.

An hon. Member: What about the Italians?

Mr. Dubois: Italians are Canadians as well. However, we must also remember that many bills which should have passed did not. I am referring to Bill C-37 to amend the Holidays Act. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is a situation most Canadians expected, and I was very disappointed to read in the Hansard of June 29 that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, for whom I have great respect had proposed that this three-line bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, whereas since—

An hon. Member: What about Justice?

[English]

Mr. Crosby: It is your fault.

Mr. Dubois: It is your fault, my friend.

[Translation]

—1966, Mr. Speaker, concerning the name of Canada's birthday, 22 private bills have been introduced to substitute the word Canada for the word Dominion. Again in Hansard for June 29, 1981 I read the remarks made by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) when he was saying something about various newspaper articles, as recorded on page 11045, I quote:

> On June 30, 1970 . . .
> . . . in Le Devoir under the title Next Year, Canada Day . . .

And one week later the subject came up in the July 6 issue of the Gazette. Here we are in 1981 and it has yet to be done. What surprises me is that the day after, on the other side, on July 2, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) asked a question and said this, as recorded on page 11130, and I quote:

> Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday we had Canada's birthday—

Well, one day the opposition members say that we must keep the expression Dominion Day and on July 2 the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre, who was a minister in the former government, talks about Canada's birthday. So where does that party stand?

It will be recalled that very recently in Quebec the Progressive Conservatives tried a new approach, saying that the Progressive Conservatives wanted closer ties with the ethnic groups. I have here a letter, or rather a telegram which was sent by the president of the Quebec Federation of Ethnic Groups, and I will read it, Mr. Speaker:

> Right Hon. Joe Clark
> Leader of the Official Opposition
> House of Commons
> Ottawa, Ontario
>
> Dear Mr. Clark:
>
> At a time when Canada is marshalling all its forces to free itself from the remnants of colonialism and recuperate all the privileges and prerogatives of a sovereign state, we had the unpleasant surprise to learn through the media that the Progressive Conservative Party which you lead has conducted a filibuster in the Commons to delay or, perhaps, to block the adoption of a bill introduced by the Hon. Francis Fox, the Secretary of State, to replace Dominion Day by Canada Day. Is that not an anachronistic intervention within the antiquated context of the past era of the Dominion which casts a shadow on our pride as Canadians?
> We would have liked that law to be proclaimed on the 114th anniversary of Confederation, to the great satisfaction of all Canadians of every allegiance from coast to coast, but unfortunately you blocked the adoption of that bill. We are disappointed about that.
>
> On behalf of the Quebec Federation of Ethnic Groups Inc. and in my name, we hope that you will change your attitude and we thank you sincerely.
> Dr. Kévork Baghdjian, M.C.
>
> President of the Quebec Federation > of Ethnic Groups

So we responded to the ethnic groups in Quebec. We replied to this letter, this telegram by saying that this was a bill respecting Canadians, that we are proud of Canada, that we were proud that the bill provided for a holiday called Canada Day, but that unfortunately it had to be referred to committee because some believed that this issue had not been discussed long enough.

● (2000)

[English]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): On a point of order, please. I have been listening with a great deal of attention to the comments made by the hon. member. However, he claimed that on July 2 the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) rose to ask a question. I would read the English of the version.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Excuse me. "Yesterday we had Canada's birthday"—

[Translation]

—Canada's birthday, that is a mistranslation. Yes, but he said it in English, precisely!

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Despite the comments to my right, it is interesting enough that the hon. member has pointed out a fault in translation in Hansard, and that is perfectly within the rules of a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Speaker, with respect to Hansard for July 2, the French translation does indeed say "fête du Canada", I know that my hon. colleague—who by the way speaks excellent French—was present that day and that he would prefer it to be Dominion Day still, that is obvious from what he is saying tonight. In any event, Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed by the turn of events. Some suggested that this was a hasty bill, yet it had been tabled in June, 1980. I wonder if one can still talk of haste after a year.

Mr. Speaker, despite all these pieces of legislation which were or were not introduced, I would like to speak of certain policies put forth. Why do we not speak of the Farm Prices Stabilization Board for example? I know our hog producers got a lot of help from the federal government, but I do not think we can say as much about the Quebec government. What was extremely important also for my riding was the new textile and clothing policy.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that Canadians and Quebecers were waiting for this policy, which was well received both by management and by labour and which will enable our textile and clothing industry, which represents many jobs for Canadians, to keep up with the times, to become truly competitive and to give us a really Canadian product while maintaining and increasing the present level of employment. Mr. Speaker, I shall go on to something else, and I believe—

[English]

Mr. Crosby: Tell us about the freedom of information, first.

Mr. Dubois: Yes, we will talk about the freedom of information.

[Translation]

With regard to freedom of information legislation, Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not the fault of the party in power, but rather that of the opposition if it has not yet been passed. In any case, Mr. Speaker, I believe that in view of the attitude of the members opposite, the government was certainly right in using the provisions of Standing Order 33, and this is why it will certainly be very happy to see its members go back to their constituency this evening.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, with respect to Bill C-43, the freedom of information bill, I wish that the hon. gentleman would correct the record with respect to the matter of which party was at fault, because we have not reached that.

An hon. Member: You both are!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I think it is quite important that he do so, in view of the undertaking which I gave to the hon. gentleman, as chairman of the committee, with respect to the willingness of our party to carry this matter on.

An hon. Member: Don't mislead the House. You have already done it once.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I realize that the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Dubois) might like the opportunity to reply, but that was not really a point of order. It was a point of debate. Unless there is unanimous consent—

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): —because the hon. member's time has expired, I cannot recognize him. Is there unanimous consent to hear the hon. member?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) for giving me the opportunity to reply to his question. As concerns the freedom of information bill, at a certain time during the proceedings, a member of the New Democratic Party, who is unfortunately not here now, asked many questions, and later, before the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, he moved that the debate be limited to 10 hours. Before that, it had seemed to me that the official opposition was willing to agree to the bill. When the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) mentioned this limit of 10 hours, the official opposition stated that it was not ready to agree to the bill. Then, let the House be the judge: Is it the official opposition or the second opposition party which did not allow passage of that bill? One thing is certain, consideration of that bill stopped right there.

[English]

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, it is always a privilege to speak in this House at any time, although

I think this evening it is a sad occasion when we are speaking against a time limit, when we know the ability of elected members of this House to speak will cease, and they will be silenced, not because of the fact that they want to go home but because of the fact that they are being forced to go back to their constituencies, by this government. All of us would agree that we have been here a long time. In fact some of us would welcome the opportunity to go home. I think I would include myself as one of them. However, there are many pressing matters with which Parliament could be dealing if, in fact, the government chose to deal with them.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) when he led off the debate on this adjournment motion this afternoon. I noticed that he referred to many—

An hon. Member: Don't forget this. This is your last day.

Mr. Mayer: I have not even started to speak, and hon. members opposite are getting excited. When the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs led off this debate he used many phrases to which I would like to refer. He said that a democratically elected majority should be able to govern. I do not know why he should talk about that. That is what parliamentary democracy is all about, and a democratically elected majority should be able to govern. By implication he is saying that the opposition should not oppose, and that it should simply lay down and let the government roll over us.

Surely one of the most basic things about any democratic system is how one treats the minority once the majority has assumed power. In some countries people are beheaded, and in other countries everything possible is done to silence the opposition. Some countries do not have closure. As the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) said earlier this afternoon, closure is just as ominous to us, in terms of cutting off debate and our ability to speak in this institution, as a physical guillotine is to some other countries less fortunate than ours, as far as democratic principles are concerned.

The hon. minister also talked about the excessive abuse of parliamentary procedure. I think that was, by inference, an insult to the Chair. The Chair is here, on behalf of all hon. members, to see that rules are evenly applied. I think that it is more than a direct insult to the Chair when a minister of the Crown talks about abuse of parliamentary procedures. Anything that the opposition has done has been done in strict accordance with the rules and practices of this House. The Chair has been there to observe them, and I think that what we witnessed at eight o'clock last night bears this out.

If there was an excessive abuse of parliamentary procedure, it was attempted at eight o'clock last night by the party in power. I think that it was a grave error in the minister's judgment when he talked about that earlier on today. He further stated that in the British system, second reading of bills is really approval in principle and for those who know anything about it, second reading is given in one day. We would be more than happy to give second reading approval in one day if we could discuss bills that were simple and straightforward. However, in many cases what we have had are so-called omnibus bills which contain several clauses and refer to many subjects. For example, Bill C-57, which has not been passed yet, contained 123 clauses in 122 pages. I do not know how a minister can expect a bill of that size to receive second reading in one day. It defies my sense of fair play and logic. It would not be at all responsible of the opposition to allow the government to get away with passing a bill of that size in one day.

• (2010)

The Bank Act, Bill C-6, has 468 pages. It looks like a telephone book. We did not pass that in one day, of course. Members of the agricultural committee and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Ostiguy) will remember that we gave Bill C-46 second reading in one day. It was a straightforward bill so the opposition co-operated in getting it through without a lot of debate. That is what happens with straightforward bills.

If the minister wanted to be fair and not to talk nonsense, he would see that some of his criticisms of the opposition are not fair. Bill C-46 is important to cattle producers in this country and we have been trying to get this legislation for four or five years. Now, however, if the House adjourns until October 14 there is a danger that if we move into the second session of this Parliament, without Bill C-46 receiving third reading, we will lose the bill. That would mean that we would have to go through exactly the same procedure again. Yet we gave that bill second reading in one day, but it took some prodding of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) to get it on the Order Paper. For the first four months at the beginning of the year nothing was referred to the agriculture committee. We would have dearly loved to have had Bill C-46 and, had the government been interested or organized, the bill could be law by now.

The minister also said that there is contempt and erosion of the privileges of the members of the House of Commons. I think we saw that erosion take place in this precedent-setting closure motion which was pushed through by this government in order to pass the adjournment motion.

We could deal with many things if we stayed, Mr. Speaker, and one of them is interest rates. A lot of people in the country regard the subject of interest rates as a time bomb. The longer we go without considering their effect on the small businessman, on householders, on families, on people trying to make mortgage payments, the greater trouble we get into.

I should like to put on record some figures that refer to the cattle industry. The average price of a pound of beef over the counter is $2.75 to the consumer. Of that $2.75, approximately 70 cents is attributable to interest charges. I refer to meat for two reasons. First, it is a major component in the diet of most people and, second, it is a product with which I am familiar and for which I am able to get figures. I suspect that the situation is the same for other foods. We need to reflect on these figures, Mr. Speaker.

We have often been accused by the government of simply opposing and not making suggestions. But many suggestions have been made by members of both parties in opposition, Mr. Speaker. They may not be earth-shattering suggestions but they are sensible suggestions on how to hold down interest rates yet the government has chosen not to adopt them.

Recently the Canadian Cattlemen's Association ordered a study from a consulting firm to show what American farmers pay in interest charges. It was found that in many cases they were paying five to six percentage points less for operating capital than farmers in this country. When one considers that a quarter of the cost of one pound of beef is attributable to interest charges, it would seem to me that in order to bring down food costs the government should be willing to consider some of our suggestions, yet it has chosen not to do so.

In the United States there are production credit associations which have been in existence for a long time. There is also what is called bankers' acceptance finance and local banks. The Americans have a unit system of banking whereas we have a branch banking system. Their small banks operate as individual banks and that is what is meant by local banks. They also have federal land banks. The Americans make use of all these things. We do not necessarily want to copy them, but it would seem to me that we should consider the vehicles that they find work for them, but the government has not even done this. This would not only help the producer but also the consumer.

Today, figures show that inflation is very close to 13 per cent. A major factor in that is food. I do not understand why we should want to close Parliament down when there are things that could be done to help the producer and the consumer.

I have some additional figures that pertain to the cattle industry, Mr. Speaker. When a producer sells an animal, about 30 per cent of the money received is attributable to interest costs. That is a very large factor and in most cases is larger than the winter feed bill for the animal. The value of the average cow, which is the basic production unit in the beef business, is $600. At today's interest rates, the cost of carrying that cow for a year is $120. In some areas of western Canada that $120 would represent more than the cost of producing feed for the animal for all winter. That gives us an idea of the magnitude of the interest charges in the beef industry.

In many cases, because interest charges are high and unpredictable, producers are choosing not to produce at all, and that means increased prices about a year and half from now because of reduced production.

I have dealt with farming because I am familiar with it and because I am sure that many small businesses, hardware stores, grocery stores, machinery businesses, small contractors and clothing stores, all have the same problems and could attribute roughly the same percentage of their costs to interest charges. If some of our suggestions would work for the agricultural industry, I do not see why they would not be useful tools for other sectors of the economy as well.

● (2020)

We have made suggestions in this session of Parliament that the finance committee look at the whole question of interest rates. On the first day of Parliament under the Clark government a motion was accepted under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to refer the whole subject of interest rates as a special topic to the finance committee. At that time interest rates were between 13 per cent and 14 per cent. But this government is not willing to do that.

As far as interest rates are concerned, there are many things we should be considering. In my view, money should no longer be considered only a medium of exchange. If we are basing our monetary policy and some of the government's fiscal policy on that kind of a concept, it is, in many cases, outdated. Money now has to be considered as an input and we have to look at the problems we cause as far as total costs are concerned when we raise the cost of that input. The cost associated with money when it is considered as input is interest. Simply to base our monetary policy on old concepts which need rethinking and to consider that money is simply a medium of exchange misses the boat in terms of the effectiveness of some of the policies that we have designed to deal with the interest rate problem.

Another way to judge the performance of a government is by way of a report card, which the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) mentioned. I will now quote briefly from the Speech from the Throne where it touches on agriculture. Under the heading "Developing our Economic Potential", the third paragraph on that page reads:

> Food and agriculture are going to be increasingly important to the Canadian economy in the 1980s.

I agree with that statement completely. The paragraph continues:

> To further strengthen the industry, my Government plans to create a Canadian Agricultural Export Corporation to expand markets for Canadian producers.

We have not even seen the Canadian Agricultural Export Corporation, called Canagrex, even referred to the agricultural committee, which is one of the least partisan committees in this House. This proposal could have received second reading, and I am sure if the committee had sat during the period January to April we could have examined some of the ideas the government had with respect to the establishing of Canagrex.

The paragraph continues:

> A Meat Import Act will be introduced to protect both consumers and producers.

We have not seen the meat import bill come to third reading. I am sure the government will not give much priority to Bill C-46 when we come back in the fall. If that is so, then we are in danger of losing that bill. If that happens as I said previously, we will have to go through the whole procedure again. That would be a shame and it would send a signal to the beef industry in this country, which is a very important industry, that the government does not care about Canadian beef producers.

Summer Recess

The following paragraph in the Speech from the Throne reads:

> Transportation is a vital part of industrial strategy. My Government will ensure that the Canadian transportation system has the capacity to meet the economic challenges of the 1980s. My Government regards the production, transportation, handling, and marketing of Prairie grain as a national priority. Rail facilities will be upgraded, and port facilities improved. You will also be asked to consider, on an urgent basis, legislation concerning the transportation of dangerous goods.

I would like to give the government a bouquet in this instance because we did pass the transportation of dangerous goods bill. We have a very good transport committee and we were very pleased to get that bill passed. It was passed quickly because the Clark government had done a considerable amount of work on the bill, and it was non-partisan.

As far as other things to do with transportation are concerned, nothing has happened. We saw a delay in the construction time-frame for a new grain terminal at the port of Prince Rupert. If we are to meet our export targets for grain, Prince Rupert will have to come on stream. Those facilities have been delayed by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) because he tried to renege on some of the agreements that had been signed by the previous minister of transport. It is now under way but it is probably a year behind what would have been the schedule had the hon. member for Vegreville remained as minister of transport.

The situation with respect to the Crow rate is also in sad shape. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) washed his hands of the issue and said that unless prairie producers could come to some unanimous agreement on the Crow rate, the government would not do anything about it. It is fine for the Prime Minister to be unilateral as far as the Constitution is concerned, which I think we agree is fundamentally more important than the Crow rate, but when it does come to something that is controversial and requires some leadership, the government either does not have a feel for it or does not care, because the government has no members from that part of the country. Yet the Prime Minister expects the producers who are affected by the Crow rate to come to a unanimous decision.

There are many other things that could be talked about, that should be priorities—why Parliament should be sitting and why the government should be looking at some of the positive suggestions which the opposition has put forward. It is a sad day for Parliament that when we are responsible as opposition and put forward sensible suggestions, we have to face closure sending us home on an adjournment motion. As I said, it is a sad day for Parliament, and I hope hon. members opposite know the kind of sad precedent they are setting for this honourable institution.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to follow a federal fellow colleague from Manitoba. I am pleased to provide some response to the comments made by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer). I am particularly pleased that he seems to be so enthusiastic about continuing Parliament. I want to welcome him back to Parliament after his extended and well-versed tour of Germany. I am sorry that others of us were unable to share in that opportunity to gain some respite from our parliamentary duties. I am sure that now he is back with us this gives him some reason for his new found enthusiasm for staying here over the summer.

Several members have referred to the fact that this adjournment debate gives us the time to reflect on past events and accomplishments of this Parliament. That is a very useful exercise. It is not often during the drumbeat of daily discussion that we have a moment to step back and ask ourselves what we have produced in our labours. There have been some suggestions that the report card we present to the public might have a few emissions coming from it, but as the hon. member for Portage-Marquette said, there might even be some errors of omission.

On the other hand, we have to be judged by the standards we set for ourselves and which the people of Canada set for us when they elected this government, at least 15 months ago.

Mr. Wilson: It was 16 months ago.

Mr. Axworthy: The people of Canada wanted a government that was prepared to tackle the tough issues.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: The people of Canada wanted a government which was not going to change its mind on the road to Jerusalem—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): You have never even seen Jerusalem.

Mr. Axworthy: Here we have the anvil chorus going again with its loud litany of vituperation and paranoia. I am hoping that for a moment they might listen to a song other than the one they sing, because they have been out of tune for the entire parliamentary session. If the prime member of that anvil chorus wants to take a lead role, I am sure he will have an opportunity to do that when I am finished. He can get on his feet and perhaps sing solo for a change, instead of hiding in the back benches.

The people decided in that election that they wanted a government that would make decisions about tough issues. The tough ones are obviously those which create a sense of division and strong emotion. But there must be decisions made, and we have to make tough decisions.

Mr. Kilgour: What decisions?

Mr. Axworthy: If the hon. member in the anvil chorus wants to give me a chance, I will be glad to supply them. When this government came into power there was one dominant issue facing Canadians, and that was the unity of the country. There was a separatist government in Quebec that was using every single ounce of resource and propaganda to break this country apart. It was through the efforts of this government and the members here that we were able to fight against that act of separation, and we were able to make a commitment to the people of that province and the people of Canada that a new constitutional framework would be put into place, and they would never have to suffer the kind of threats of separation that we had before. How many generations have had the opportunity to create a new legal framework, to put into place a foundation that will supply, for countless generations in the future, the opportunity to develop a brand new country? It is this Parliament and this government which took that tough decision. We did not back away from it. We put in place not only a new legal framework but a charter of human rights that will defend the rights of ethnic minorities and all kinds of people who have suffered from discrimination.

We know that members opposite are obviously not in favour of those kinds of measures. They sort of camouflaged their opposition. They say they like a charter of rights but they do not like the way we are going to do it. The argument was very clear and plain. They, who are so mired in their deep reactionary position of not wanting to make a decision that would change the status quo one whit, were afraid to move to a charter of rights that would provide this country with the kind of guaranteed protection of civil liberties that we have long needed, and that would provide a framework for an expansion of freedom in the future. That happens to be a major accomplishment. Every member on this side of the House is proud to have been part of that accomplishment.

Mr. Paproski: Tell us what you have done for women.

Mr. Axworthy: I will come to that. The hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski) has never talked about women's rights in his life. Maybe he will give me a chance.

We came here at a time when there was a very serious and difficult issue with the energy programs and policies, or lack of them because the other government which we followed was not able to reach a decision. They could not arrive at a consensus on development. They did not have a made-in-Canada energy policy. They were simply following the dictates of their corporate friends in Calgary and elsewhere in Alberta. We know where their energy policy was made. It was made in the boardrooms of the oil patch. Even then, when it was reflective of that particular corporate interest, they still could not get an agreement with their fellow colleague, the Conservative premier in the province of Alberta.

Mr. Kilgour: What about southern Saskatchewan?

Mr. Axworthy: That paragon of paranoia over in the corner could not convince his premier of Alberta to come to an energy agreement. I suggest that he redirect his efforts westward, because that is where they really belong.

We now have in place an energy policy that is for the benefit of Canadians. It is designed to restore the ownership of our resources to Canadians, to make sure that the development and control and management of our resources will be done by Canadians. That is an accomplishment of which I am proud.

Mr. Kilgour: How many jobs in western Canada have been lost with your policy?

Mr. Axworthy: If I may be allowed just one small digression for the hon. member of paranoia over there, I will point out to him that the last employment figures in the province of Alberta show a decrease in the level of unemployment over the year for the month before, and the month before that. It is the lowest record of unemployment in the province of Alberta in the month of June. I know it is difficult for the hon. member to read figures, but I suggest he go back and look at what is really happening to the economy there.

The problem in the west is not lack of work. It is making sure that we can supply enough workers for all the jobs that will be there. That is the real issue. That comes back to the other kind of tough decision that had to be made. It was to put in place a series of programs and policies that would amount to a major attack upon the problems of industrial economic development in this country.

The hon. member for Portage-Marquette asked about transport. Let me remind him that there is a new harbour policy in place. It will provide for full scale management of our new harbours, for a change. We are now establishing a new air policy in this country.

Mr. Paproski: What about VIA Rail?

Mr. Axworthy: In terms of VIA Rail, how many members on the other side of the House have preached for years about the need for an efficient use of resources and how we must capitalize our railway to get far better performance? That is what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has put into place. The reason is because we have a Minister of Transport who is prepared to make tough decisions, not to back away, not to hide his head in the sand, not to get himself confused in a web of paranoia and fear, and simply allowing himself to be yelling into a rain barrel, but to make tough decision, because that is what we were elected to do.

If there has been any problem with bankruptcy in this country, it has been the bankruptcy of ideas, commitment, or anything positive by the members opposite. The only answer that they have is to engage in character assassination. We have here, as a final tribute to their contribution to the debate and discussion of political issues in Canada, the great issue of the uranium cartel. We have listened now for two solid weeks to all the innuendo, allegation and picking in the garbage can members opposite trying to dredge up something to hit what they think to be a Liberal.

What they refuse to recognize is that the steps that have been followed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) have been prescribed by law, and the common law of this country. It is to investigate any suspicion, to develop a report, to have that report referred to the Minister of Justice, and to take it to court. Members opposite appear to have lost their respect for the law and due process of the law. If that is the case, then we are in a sorry state of opposition in this country.

We have heard very often about the need to refer matters to the courts. One of the great principles we have heard from the Conservative party is, "Let's go to court." We heard that week after week in the constitutional debate. They said it was the only institution we could trust with objectivity. They wanted to go to the courts because they were the only ones we could trust. What happens when we get to the uranium cartel and take the issue to court? They say, "Don't trust the courts." Well, they cannot have it both ways.

The same kind of gross political expendiency has been displayed once again in their great act of statesmanship in the postal dispute. I read some of the statements of their once or future leader. He says, "We must broaden our base, appeal to the working people of this country, and respect the whole question of labour."

Here we have an industrial dispute, one that was carried out under the proper arrangements of the law of this land. They are a public service union. We may not like it, we may not in any way advocate their stand, but the union has the right to strike. But the first moment that it strikes, what is the call from the other side? Get them back to work!" The problem is that they did not even allow the proper due process of industrial bargaining and relations to even show what it was prepared to do. Instead, they stuck their big feet and big nose into it and prevented us from getting the kind of settlement that we needed when we could have got it. As a result they used Parliament as a battering ram to forge themselves and their own political objectives, and forgot about the public interest, which was to get that dispute resolved and settled. If there are people in this country who are responsible for holding up the resolution of the postal dispute, I am looking at them right now. Their erstwhile leader, who is so anxious to stay in Parliament, has not managed to stay around for the debate in the final moments of his glory. We are sorry he is not here to share in these final moments of quiet reflection about the past record.

It is a sad day for politics in this country when one man, for his own political expediency and his own political future, is allowed to disrupt the public interest of this nation. The hon. member for Portage-Marquette said that majorities must be careful about their privileges and powers. That is true, but equally so must minorities. There is no minority in this country which should be allowed to blackmail the rest of the country to serve its expedient political purposes.

Who in the House will ever forget the spectacle of Conservative members of Parliament yelling and screaming and shaking their fists in the centre of this chamber? They talk about respect for Parliament and respect for the rules. Who will ever forget how little respect was shown that night when they stormed the Chair, surrounded the Table, shook their fists, and yelled at the top of their lungs because they could not have their way? That is the party which does not respect Parliament.

Hon. members opposite showed that evening that their respect for Parliament goes only so far as their interests are served. It is difficult for us to accept their cries and pleas about respect for the propriety of Parliament when we see the flagrant and abusive way they are prepared to trample the rights of Parliament into the carpet in the centre of this chamber.

An hon. Member: Take another 20 minutes and we will all go home.

Mr. Axworthy: We are running out of time.

Some hon. Members: More!

Mr. Axworthy: It will continue only if I have the unanimous consent of the House.

There is no question that we are dealing with difficult and turbulent times. All the countries whose leaders are gathering here this weekend for a Summit are facing major problems of inflation and problems of trying to find responsible management of their economies. However, the one requirement in each of those cases is to make tough decisions. This government is prepared to do just that, but we are prepared to do it with a sense of compassion and understanding. We should not simply tighten the belt, and kill the patient while doing so, but that is what the previous government was prepared to do.

While hon. members opposite are whiling away their summer hours beside a lake listening to the loons, which I know the hon. member from Edmonton does a lot, I ask them to reflect on how often they have held up as an example the programs and policies of Margaret Thatcher. During the debate on the budget we were asked by them to look overseas at the example being shown to us by the government of the United Kingdom in the way it was cutting back, restraining, cutting back employment programs and cutting back job creation. They said that is the way to run a country. This last week we have seen what the price of that has been. Short-term gain for long-term pain has been the policy of that government, but we are not prepared to follow those false prophets into that kind of program. That would force this country into the same turbulence the United Kingdom is now facing. We are proud that we have tried to stand up against the false cries we heard from hon. members opposite in the budget debate.

We have tough decisions to make. We recognize that those tough decisions will at times result in cries of alarm. They will result in emotional outcries, and create deep divisions with respect to approach, but we are prepared to make them.

I would like to close by saying to hon. members opposite that we now have a time in which all of us can do some reflecting. I hope when we come back for the next session of Parliament hon. members will show the spirit of co-operation, dedication and willingness to make tough decisions that this government has shown in this session of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister one question. He said he would answer. What exactly has he done for women in 1981?

Mr. Rossi: Something you couldn't do.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to answer that question, but it would take me at least another 20 minutes even to begin to provide the answer. If the hon. member and the House are prepared to give me the time, I would be quite prepared to have another full round and respond to that question.

Mr. Paproski: Just tell me one thing you have done.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would tell us about the arrangements he made for Mr. Calamusa.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. Setting aside the possibility that hon. members may wish the minister to take a second round, his time has expired, and I think I should recognize the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson).

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have listened to a great big silence for the last 20 minutes on what the minister responsible for the status of women has done for the women of this country. The greatest thing the minister could do for women would be to go to Spadina, work for Laura Sabia and bring her up to this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: The minister is responsible for minorities in this country. One of those minorities is the Liberals in western Canada. I want to remind the minister that there are 21 Liberals representing eight provinces and two territories. I think hon. members opposite should recognize the tremendous responsibility the minister responsible for Liberals in western Canada and the status of women has, and that he should treat them with a little more respect than he does. Hon. members opposite should build them up in their party. It is important to the rest of the country.

A minute ago the minister said that it is a sad day for politics in this country. Today this House is witnessing a government in great distress. It is a sad day for politics in this country because never before has a government in the British Commonwealth invoked closure on a motion to adjourn, but that is what we have today. Why is it that the government has seen fit to padlock Parliament?

Mr. Chénier: It is the quality of the opposition.

Mr. Wilson: I will tell you the reasons, Groucho Marx. The reasons are the high cost of food, the high cost of energy, high interest rates, the postal strike, and the uranium cartel which has been the subject of such debate. The government cannot stand the heat. That is why we see such a row of green. We have seen empty chairs over the last two days because ministers cannot come in and face the music. I see a whole row of green. Hon. members opposite cannot face the music; that is why we have closure today—that and the energy failures in this country. The only reason the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) has given us for invoking closure today is that members of Parliament need a vacation. Hon. members on this side of the House do not want a vacation. We want to sit here and watch hon. ministers opposite stew in their juices and feel the heat resulting from their failures of the last 16 months. That is what we want to do for the next few weeks.

Last night we saw one of the greatest examples of trickery as hon. members opposite sneaked into the House and tried to force an issue. You, Mr. Speaker, were an unwitting, unindicted co-conspirator in that trickery.

● (2050)

My party has brought the important issues of this session of Parliament before the government. Hopefully hon. members opposite will take these issues home with them, think about them over the next three months, and come back with some new approaches to solving the problems of the country. The last 16 months have been a total failure, and there must be a change.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson: There is a lot of noise from hon. members opposite who cannot stand to hear the truth. Hopefully they will come back with some new ideas to reverse their sorry record.

I should like to talk about some of the things which constitute that sorry record. For example, I refer to the uranium cartel. I listened carefully to what the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) had to say about our comments. He missed the point entirely. He said that we were casting aspersions and using innuendoes to cast a cloud over some of the people involved in the matter. That is not the point. We are being stonewalled regularly day after day.

Hon. members opposite will not accept the political responsibility of coming forward and telling us what happened during the years from 1972 to 1975. This is what we are attempting to obtain. Two senior public servants have been named as unindicted co-conspirators, but it is essential to know who authorized this. Was it a deputy minister, a minister, or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)? We are asking for those documents to be made available, so that we and the people of Canada can make that judgment. We are not finding out that information. Day after day we are getting the fifth amendment from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The deputy minister is on the record as stating that he clearly knew the impact upon domestic prices. Back in 1974 there was a Gulf Canada memorandum which indicated that the officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources recognized that Canadian utilities had to be prepared to pay export prices. What did the government do about it? What did it do to protect Canadians from the impact upon their prices?

I am glad the hon. member for Lincoln is present in the chamber this evening. I hope he will respond to anything I say which is out of order; I am sure he will. The department was aware of what was going on and that there could be an impact. What steps did it take to reduce the impact of the international cartel forced upon Canadian companies?

Also we want to know what the government did in response to the legal opinion of Mr. David Henry, now Mr. Justice Henry, to the effect that the cartel could later become illegal if orders had to be declined by Canadian producers as a result of the arrangement. Clearly we are looking at a case of supply and price. What did the government do to satisfy the needs and interests of consumers? What did Canadian producers do to achieve appropriate balances between supply and price, in the face of the cartel forced upon them by the government?

We do not want to send people to jail. We want to know where the political responsibility lay at that time. The matter of prices is a very important issue, especially when we consider the high prices with which people are faced today.

Today it was announced that the consumer price index is at its highest level, on a year-over-year basis, since 1948, at 12.8 per cent. The startling figure which leaps off the page of that report on prices over the last few months is the price of gasoline which has risen 42.7 per cent over the last 12 months. I asked hon. members opposite why they imposed closure. This is a good enough reason for imposing closure. Hon. members opposite, and particularly the sea of green, the ministers, cannot answer questions as to why there was a 42.7 per cent increase in the price of gasoline. What have we received for it?

During the 1980 election the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said, "Vote Liberal and we will keep prices down." I do not think anyone who voted Liberal expected to see gasoline prices increase by 42.7 per cent. It is the most deceitful outcome of the 1980 election. The voters of the country were tricked, they thought prices would stay down, but there was almost a 50 per cent increase. The hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) should get out his slide rule. He has not graduated to using one of these new electronic push-button calculators. If he uses his slide rule, he will see that the increase works out to 60 cents per gallon.

What have we received for the 60-cent increase? There is a deadlock with the province of Alberta, imports are increasing, and 40 per cent of the drilling rigs which are at the heart of employment in the oil and gas industry in western Canada will have left the country by the end of the summer. Approximately 170 have already left, and there has been a cancellation, which the minister likes to call a suspension, of the Cold Lake heavy oil project. What else is to come from the national energy policy? I am waiting for hon. members opposite to yell across what we are receiving. I hear a dead silence, not a word. Canadians might be prepared to pay that 60 cent increase if they thought they were receiving more.

There is little prospect that we will receive any relief from high prices. The government is doing absolutely nothing to solve the problem. The high interest rate policy is directly related to the national energy policy. We have an unprecedented outflow of capital from the country, amounting to $8 billion to $10 billion over a 12-month period. This can be related to capital moving to other countries in the world from Canadian-owned companies which were supposed to be helped by the National Energy Program. Capital which used to come to Canada from Germany is now being redirected to the United States.

Companies are sending money down to the Williston Basin, Denver, Colorado, West Texas and Australia. The Canadianization of our oil and gas industry is really the Canadianization of the Williston Basin, Denver, Colorado, West Texas and Australia. This is what Canadianization means to the companies in western Canada. This is why the National Energy Program is such a bitter pill for these companies to accept. Some members opposite have asked me, "What do you mean by saying that the National Energy Program is causing high interest rates in this country? How does that work? I don't understand."

• (2100)

Some hon. Members: We never asked you that.

Mr. Wilson: I can tell hon. members opposite that I have been asked by some of their colleagues about this. They are starting to wonder what is going on. They are wondering what is going on in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. They want to know what is causing this drop in the value of the Canadian dollar which is causing the high interest rates. This outflow of capital which we have seen over the last few months, and which will continue over the next few months, is putting downward pressure on the Canadian dollar.

If members opposite will read why the Governor of the Bank of Canada is putting so much upward pressure on interest rates, they will see that he believes we must maintain the level of the Canadian dollar. He says that if the Canadian dollar falls further there will be more inflation in our country. Thus, the Minister of Finance, who I saw just a little while ago sitting in the back benches, which is probably a good spot for him, wrings his hands and says that he cannot do anything about the situation because those people in the United States are forcing interest rates up.

If the minister were following an inflation policy with a broad program to fight inflation, plus an energy program which would solve our energy problems rather than confronting every element of the energy industry and the provinces involved, we would see the dollar higher by 3 per cent to 5 per cent. As a result of that the Bank of Canada could allow interest rates to settle at a much lower level, probably in the order of 3 per cent or 4 per cent less. That is what I mean when I say the National Energy Program is having a negative effect on the whole country, not just little Alberta, or little Saskatchewan, but the whole country. Everyone in the country is feeling the impact of high interest rates, which is why we must have some changes in our energy policies. I hope the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and the Minister of Finance will come back to this House with a few ideas on how to effect these changes.

I would like briefly to refer to the economic record of this government. In terms of inflation we rank second. The only country which has a higher inflation rate than Canada over the last 12 months is Italy. In terms of unemployment we have the third highest rate at 7.3 per cent. We are not leading in economic growth either; we are down at the bottom. We are number five at 0 per cent growth over the last 12 months.

Those are the economic problems which this country is facing, problems which must be solved over the next three months. This is what ministers opposite must go home and think about. They must consult with their experts. Hopefully, they will consult with people in the private sector who have some understanding of what is happening in the real world today. We can only hope that they will come back with some new ideas and fresh solutions to the problems we now face.

I would like to refer to a document which I have in front of me. It says, "The National Energy Program will work." That is a bit of a joke. It says, "Oil and gas supply will be enhanced". Let me ask members opposite how oil and gas supply will be enhanced by the suspension of the Cold Lake project, the possible suspension of the Alsands project over the next few months, plus the marginal wells which are being shut down by the production tax. How will that enhance supply?

I wish to refer to another comment in this document. It says that the oil and gas industry will continue to be the envy of every other major industry in Canada with its rapid growth rate and high rates of return. That is nonsense. That is why investors are looking elsewhere to spend their money. This is why U.S. companies are selling out and moving their capital outside the country.

Mr. Peterson: Oh, come on!

Mr. Wilson: I am sure the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) will be able to tell his former clients how envious companies are of the Cold Lake project and how people in Imperial Oil are having to shut down that project because of the lack of agreement between the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the minister of energy in Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: After 16 months we have had nothing but total failure in terms of our energy policy in this country. I would like to talk about that failure. We have had 16 months without agreements being reached with Saskatchewan, British Columbia or Alberta. We have had 16 months in which 40 per cent of our rigs will have left the country by the end of August. We have had 16 months of inaction on the part of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who tells us that he is negotiating. Yet we all know that is a charade. He does not want to reach an agreement; he wants to impose, impose, impose, as he did last October. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, he will do it again. We have had 16 months of failure to come to grips with the over-reliance on oil supply from the Middle East. The biggest failure in that 16 months came just two weeks ago. I was absolutely shocked by the attitude of the minister—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Al MacBain (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to enter into the adjournment debate at this point. The postal matter is in the hands of the mediator. The uranium cartel matter is in the hands of the courts. Therefore, the best course to follow is to leave them alone for now. Let us get the members of Parliament back to their ridings to meet their constituents to find out what positions we should take on various matters when we come back in the fall.

I have before me the report of the Parliamentary Task Force on Alternative Energy and Oil Substitution. It is an excellent report compiled by the members of all parties who served on that committee. I am extremely proud of each and every one of them. By showing members the report tonight I hope they will take it home with them and read it during the summer recess, if they have not already had the opportunity to do so. I hope the public will ask their members for copies of the report, regardless of which party their members belong to.

I want to make particular reference to two members of that committee. They were not Liberal members. The hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin), who was in the House a few minutes ago, lent to the committee his considerable experience in science.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacBain: The chairman, the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle (Mr. Lefebvre), was very proud of him and all members of the committee. The other member of the committee who I wish to mention is the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose). When I came to the committee I came as a supply man and not as a conservation or demand man. From my experience I thought we could almost do anything in Canada, and in the world, not only in energy but anything we really set our minds to. But from the very beginning the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody, in his eloquent manner and in a very considered way, made our chairman and all the members of the committee aware of the importance of conservation and demand to the energy scenario in this country and the world.

Tonight I wish to give my overview of the world energy situation without getting into detail, since at this hour of the night, as we near the time of adjournment, I know hon. members do not want to get into detail. However, let me say that I think we can all agree that energy is the life blood of a modern society.

I say to every hon. member of this House, regardless of party, that if there is an energy shortage in this country at any time, our people will blame the national government. They will not look to the provincial governments. I say in all sincerity to all members of the House that we should be wary of this. There is a responsibility on the government of this country to provide an abundance of energy at an affordable price. Having said that, I again reiterate the great importance of conservation, which was one of the main recommendations of our committee.

We learned, on the committee, after about a year of study throughout the world, of the relationship between energy and such elements as the economy, population, conservation, food production, the North-South dialogue and the environment. In particular, we learned of the effect of the supply of energy and its use on the environment, which is very detrimental in many instances.

Early man lived in peace with his environment by fishing and hunting and foraging for food. For thousands of years, mankind on earth saw literally no environmental damage. He lived only by his own energy and that of his helpers in the group. The dawn of agriculture, in the history of mankind, was what Alvin Toffler, in The Third Wave, called the First Wave. In this era, one saw mankind live still in comparative harmony with nature. Energy sources, in addition to manual, were water, horses and oxen, forests, some coal for heating, and wind in some areas. Energy sources were such that the environmental damage was minimal.

Some considerable destruction took place over wide areas of the old world during the agricultural era. While the era extended over a period of several thousands of years, varying by area, it was only a glimpse when compared with the length of the previous era of which I spoke. For the first time, the agricultural era saw man experience the feeling that he had to conquer nature, that mankind was against nature. This idea was born in the agricultural era. Certainly mankind found itself in an uphill battle with nature and his environment.

The next era, which we call the industrial revolution, or the Second Wave, as Toffler referred to it, lasted less than 500 years; some would say 300 or just slightly over. The era was ushered in by the steam engine, and the history of this period, the industrial revolution, is well known to every one of us. We know that for energy during this period man turned to the steam engine, to electricity from water and later from coal, and hydrocarbons and uranium. Later during this period the internal combustion engine was the big user of hydrocarbons.

During the latter part of the industrial revolution, we had the use of nuclear fission. These energy sources, particularly hydrocarbons and nuclear fission, put our land, our water and our air at risk. The long-term effects of carbon dioxide on the atmosphere gives many people grave concern. The supply of hydrocarbons is diminishing. However, it is very important to note that many think the use of hydrocarbons will come to an end, not because of supply but because of the damage to our environment. That is why the recommendations with respect to this matter are found in this report to which I earlier referred.

The report, as basic recommendations, brings forth the idea for discussion of an economy based on electricity and on hydrogen. We also see conservation as an important part of our energy picture in the short, medium and the long term. Electricity and hydrogen are energy currencies, not fuels in themselves. We see electricity and hydrogen from the water—hydroelectricity from Niagara Falls, for example. We see conventional hydroelectricity from conventional sources like that. However, we also see it from my former province of Nova Scotia, by the way, in tidal power. We see the use of wind in the future, photovoltaics, the continuation of nuclear fission. We see fuel cells, and in the long term we see nuclear fusion. I will have something to say about that later.

At this point, I want to say only this: I know that there are those who fear nuclear fusion. I understand and appreciate their concern. I think all of us do, from the standpoint of what will be done with the waste and the danger from the operation of the fusion reactors. However, I just want to caution all hon. members that the use of hydrocarbons has been very detrimental to the environment, and we must be able to give nuclear fusion an honest appraisal and not just close our eyes to what has happened from using hydrocarbons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Honest appraisal. We like that!

Mr. MacBain: The energy mix of the future will consist of a great number of fuels and technologies. To a considerable extent, and hopefully more and more as the years go by, the reliance will be on renewables; for example, alcohol, methanol or ethynol. As I stated, we are hoping, in the long run, that fusion will bring an abundance of safe energy. It will not be inexpensive.

Our report suggests that the hydrocarbons, so far as is possible, be reserved for the feedstock for the petrochemical industry. However, our report and our committee were wise enough to appreciate that it will be a considerable length of time before the use of hydrocarbons can be brought to an end or to anything like that. The consensus of the committee was that the environment cannot take or tolerate the use of hydrocarbons until they are consumed in full, even if such were advisable, which would not be the case.

The committee asks our citizens and our fellow members of Parliament, especially the ministers of the government, to take a careful look at where we have been and where we are going from an energy standpoint. We made 65 recommendations in the report, and of course some are more important than others. For example, we suggested that there be a minister of state for alternative energy and conservation. All hon. members appreciate, especially those who are more senior than myself, that this is a recommendation which comes directly within the authority of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), but the committee hopes there will be serious consideration given to a ministry of state for alternative energy and conservation who would serve under the minister of energy.

We also suggested a commission to be known as Hydrogen Canada to look after the research and development, demonstration, commercialization and utilization of hydrogen. That is an obvious need, since our report puts such importance on hydrogen as the energy currency for the future. It is pretty obvious that the world is moving to the use of hydrogen. We made that point in our report and I think this will become more obvious as the months go by.

Canada now leads the world in the technology necessary to produce hydrogen. As with other nations, we have not done the research and development, demonstration and pilot projects that are necessary in order to make the expansion of hydrogen plants viable.

The committee has asked the government to consider making sufficient contributions to nuclear fusion research to at least permit this country to sit at the international scientific table on fusion. The Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts) has indicated that this advice will be followed. We must now ask what is the position of nuclear fusion in the future. I say unequivocally, Mr. Speaker, that my personal position is that the answer to an abundance of energy in the future will be fusion.

There is no scientific reason why we cannot have fusion and there is no engineering reason why we cannot have it. I hope the money will be found for the research and development necessary for the commercialization of fusion. Although I feel, as do members of the committee, that conservation is important and will always be important in the area of energy, when you consider that the world's population will increase from over four billion to 11 billion in just over 50 years, even with conservation and the other renewables that I have mentioned, important as they are, having regard to the supply of hydrocarbons and the danger in their use, it seems obvious that we must consider fusion for the long term.

I take the position that we in the North have a burden that we must carry to supply energy for people of the South. I do not see how we can make available to the billions of people in the South the energy they will require in the future to bring their quality of life to anything near that which we enjoy, unless we can offer fusion. I know that fusion is expensive. We are perhaps $200 billion away from the first commercial reactor. It will, however, give us an abundance of energy without the dangers of nuclear fission.

When hon. members and ministers are speaking in their ridings, I would remind them that it is very easy to forget about hydrocarbons and worry about the dangers of nuclear fusion. I would like to see balanced thinking in the future and I am sure we will achieve this.

I appreciate the opportunity to put forward a brief overview of the energy picture in the world as I see it. Where I have gone beyond the report—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Regina West.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. About 7:30 this evening the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Dubois) raised a point of order and demanded that I tell him the exact date and hour when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was speaking in the House and over 100 Liberals were missing—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please, the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin).

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, I rise with modesty and enthusiasm to take part in this debate. I have not had a chance to do this for several months so I find it somewhat ironic now. Usually governments want to keep us here to pass legislation and opposition parties vote against that. The government recites a long list of items on the Order Paper that it feels are important and should be dealt with. On this occasion, however, the official opposition started the fracas, saying they would not leave until the postal strike is settled, so we sat here this past week.

My hon. friend and colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) today moved the adjournment of the House. The government voted against adjourning the House and so did the official opposition. It is no wonder the voters are confused by what has been going on in the past day or two. The performance of the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) at ten minutes to ten last night caused—and this would take some doing—my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to talk about reconsidering our position on recessing this Parliament. That performance last night was less than worthy of the minister, the Liberal party and the government.

We did reconsider and my colleague moved a motion today to adjourn the House. Those who want this Parliament to sit this week and the week after, or however long it takes, had only to remain in their offices until four o'clock this afternoon and Parliament would have been sitting next week. But who folded? Who was the bowl full of jelly? The Tories. They were going to keep us here "till hell freezes over", as I think one of them said. They were going to keep us here until the Post Office strike was settled, they said.

I would like to see us sit for another two or three weeks or however long it would take to get a lot of other issues debated. But who caved in, who cut and ran at 1300 hours today? It was those members who wanted us to sit until the Post Office strike is settled. They chickened out. I do not want to hear from any more Tory speakers in this debate tonight, Mr. Speaker.

• (2130)

My colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, and I agree with him, that because of what the Postmaster General tried to pull off at ten minutes to ten last night, and again because of what he said today, puts us on the side of the official opposition. We get on the side of the official opposition and we look around at one o'clock this afternoon, but they are all gone, heading for the hills.

An hon. Member: You should have known better.

Mr. Benjamin: You guys had them sized up better than we had. It was all bluff and fluff in the first place.

Now, let me get you fellows.

Mr. Shields: You are in bed with them. What are you talking about?

Mr. Benjamin: The Post Office strike is nothing more than a symptom of disease. I predict, and I hope I am wrong, that we will be back here in August or September on back-to-work legislation, on matters relating to the Seaway workers, on matters relating to the seamen's union and, the grain handlers. You name it; there will be a list as long as your arm. Those are the reasons the Conservatives should be keeping this Parliament sitting.

The postal strike is only a symptom of disease. We will have half a dozen more symptoms the rest of this summer, this summer of discontent. This discontent has to do with things like tax reform, interest rates, housing, bankruptcies, the fair prices commission, energy policies, and another little one that happens to be a pet of mine, and that is VIA Rail. Everyone is in the act.

I raised the matter on June 29 and I am extremely pleased and proud of my colleagues from all parties who have been raising hell about that matter since June 29. I tried to be courteous by sending material that I had from a secret-type source and I even spread it around among Conservative and Liberal members of this place. Those are the things that we need to be here for next week.

If the boys from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick want to get up and ask about Atlantic Limited, they cannot do it if they cave in tonight. They caved in this afternoon. They gave up. I would like to tell some of my colleagues on the government side from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) wants you out of here when he makes his announcement next week or the week after about VIA Rail cancellations. Hon. members will not be able to raise the matter in their own caucus, let alone the House of Commons.

Mr. Corbin: We have.

Mr. Benjamin: But what did you get? You got kicked in the head, and you will get kicked in the head some more.

It is not just the postal strike, VIA Rail or a number of other matters, it is asking Parliament to sit for the rest of the summer if necessary to deal with matters which will require in some cases a 180 degree turn in present government policies. Governments of all political stripes have had to do that now and again. Governments have had to face up to making about turns. And, by the way, if they did have the guts to do that, they could get some credit for it.

You cannot continue to have the kind of performance we have had in Parliament in the past week, with big talk from the official opposition that they will keep us here until Christmas, and then they fold and quit. They are the first ones to fold up.

I happen to disagree with my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre. I thought from day one that we should keep Parliament here for reasons other than the Post Office strike. But the government after its performance last night and today has a lot of nerve moving closure on a rule which has not been used since 1913. How desperate can the government get? the government wants us out of here. The government does not want anyone asking questions. The government does not want even its own caucus members around to fight and raise a little bit of heck.

Mr. Gimaïel: Look around you.

Mr. Benjamin: Let me get on to why I think Parliament should sit next week. I could mention the herd maintenance program. My colleague the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) has been trying to get something out of the government on that, as have some members of the official opposition. That is one reason to have Parliament sit next week.

Members from all three parties have been trying, either in this House or in their own caucuses, to get something done about interest rates. That is another good reason to stay here next week.

Then there is the matter of bankruptcies. I have had phone calls from businessmen in the last couple of weeks. That would be a good reason to stay here next week. What are we going to do about that situation?

Then there is the fair prices commission. That might be a good reason to sit here next week.

Those are reasons why my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre moved his motion to adjourn the House today. But the Tories chickened out. They cut and run. They were big talkers over the past week.

The problem is not only the Post Office dispute. You cannot put the state of the economy of the nation on the backs of the postal workers. There are many other things equally or more serious than the Post Office. Such as energy and transportation.

I come now to my main point. Here sits a government with a bunch of Liberal members from various parts of central and Atlantic Canada who are in the process of raising the cost of transportation and ignoring the energy issue. This government is abandoning 16 rail passenger routes and is reducing the frequency of five more. I am pleased that both Liberal and Conservative members from Atlantic and central Canada have been on their feet and saying things in public. I hope that gets a message to the Minister of Transport. But this government does not want us to sit here and talk about those matters.

The Canadian Transport Commission has already ruled that 15 of those 21 routes on which they have held hearings should be retained. Liberal members from Atlantic Canada and Tory members from western Canada agree with that. I think I can safely assume that is a topic we could discuss next week. But the Liberals want out of here and the Tories have caved in after all their big talk about the Supercontinental through Saskatoon and Edmonton. And now they want to go home. Members from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have moved motions under the provisions of Standing Order 43 concerning these matters. Would it not be nice if we could sit here next week and discuss those matters with the Minister of Transport?

A creature of this government, a child begotten by this government supported by the official opposition, by my party as a last desperate resort to bail out the CPR and CNR from hauling people around Canada was something we supported. Three years later, where are the people who supported it? They are all worried about the route to their own constituency. They are not worried about transportation in Canada as a whole. Everyone wants to go home this weekend for the rest of the summer. The Tories have chickened out. The greatest victory the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) could have won is if he and all his colleagues had stayed in their offices until four o'clock this afternoon and Parliament would be meeting on Monday. But they chickened out.

I do not want to hear any more words from government members, some of whom have phoned me and asked me where I got this argument about my railway line. We should continue to sit for the larger reasons of interest rates, transportation, energy, housing, you name it. If the NDP is nothing else, it is well organized. There will be a third of us here tonight, a third here next week and a third the week after. When the crunch comes, we will be here. I wonder about those who ask where the NDP will be. The guys who said that Parliament has to keep sitting, where the hell are they? Less than half of them were here today. They are ones who were going to make Parliament sit until the postal strike was settled. They blew it this afternoon. They just emptied their big bowl of jelly and they blew it. I do not want to hear another word from any Tory about what should be done by this Parliament starting next week. They caved in this afternoon at one o'clock.

Mr. Kempling: Where were the NDP?

Mr. Benjamin: I remind the whip of the Conservative party that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) moved a motion to help the official opposition keep this House sitting next week. What did they do? They voted with the Liberals. They ran for cover. They had a dog fight in the lobby here at one o'clock this afternoon, ran for cover and then voted with the Liberals. That is something they have been wanting to do all week.

My colleague had the courage to say that, as a result of the idiotic things the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) said last night, we would reconsider our position. He had the courage to move a motion, but where were the Tories?

Mr. Blenkarn: How are you going to vote tonight?

Mr. Kempling: Where's Broadhead?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It might be interesting for the Chair to hear what the hon. member for Regina West has to say. I invite hon. members to listen to that hon. member for his remaining three minutes.

Mr. Benjamin: I want to inform my colleagues and friends to the right—

Mr. Blenkarn: Are you voting with the Grits tonight?

Mr. Benjamin: As a result of what the government did last night and today, we have been reconsidering our position. I ask the hon. member to wait for the vote. However, I am prepared to give him odds that we will vote against adjourning the House.

Mr. Blenkarn: You don't know how to vote. You are waiting for Stanley to tell you how to vote.

Mr. Benjamin: If a political party, whether it be in government, the official opposition, or the third or fourth party in this House, decides on a cause and makes it plain it is going to fight that issue on a matter of principle, unless it sticks to that and sees it through, even if it should lose, that denigrates not only the House of Commons but our political system, which happens to be our party system of government. All parties have problems internally. There is no denying that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: I would ask the parliamentary secretary why he was so angry tonight when one of his colleagues decided to change places with me. I personally believe there are good grounds and cause for this Parliament to sit for the rest of July and into August. It is not the issues which cause the postal workers and a lot of others to go out in strike and continue to strike for the rest of the summer. I resent this playing of games, this bluff and fluff, this bowl of jelly.

Mr. Blenkarn: How are you voting?

Mr. Benjamin: I ask my colleague to wait until 0100 hours. However, I will meet any one of them behind the curtain for a bet or a punch in the mouth, which that hon. gentleman is going to get.

Surely the whole exercise over the past week requires this Parliament to continue to sit. When a government decides that in spite of all the legislation on the Order Paper that it would like to have passed, it wants out of here, and the official opposition wants to leave, there is something wrong.

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to follow the huff and fluff member opposite. I have the highest respect for every member sitting in this House. Whether that member be a backbencher, minister, member of the Conservative party or the NDP, I hold respect for that person. I respect especially the more senior members such as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey), who reminded us today that we should not abuse our parliamentary immunity and should not accuse someone before that person has been charged and proved guilty.

I lose some of my respect for members when I see a deliberate obstruction of Parliament, when I see Parliament being hijacked, valuable time being wasted and other members being held here as hostages. Last night we experienced an episode where the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton was protecting the rights of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour). That was very praiseworthy. It took a whole hour. Today two hours were wasted on the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. That is three hours in which we could have passed very important legislation through this House. However, that time was wasted. That is when I become disappointed and start losing some of the respect I hope I will continue to hold.

● (2150)

I was very disappointed when the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton tried to deny members on this side the right to speak. The hon. member said, "I was trying to save the House the trouble of listening to the Postmaster General". The House leader of the official opposition preaches about the right of every member to be heard and then stands up in his place and attempts to deny a minister the right to speak. I suggest it is not the role of the opposition to hold members of this Parliament hostage. I suggest it is not the role of the opposition to waste time deliberately, to hijack Parliament and to delay deliberately the passage of important bills.

I do not mind sitting here all summer. I can sit through July, through August and through September if the opposition has something constructive to contribute. But what have we heard from the opposition? We have heard no constructive or worth-while suggestions. Have they made one worth-while suggestion respecting inflation?

Mr. Blenkarn: Yes.

Mr. Flis: About now to reduce interest rates?

Mr. Blenkarn: Yes.

Mr. Flis: About how to bring down the deficit?

Mr. Blenkarn: yes.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member would care to comment on the tricky business behind the curtain.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I lose respect for hon. members who do not even know what a point of order is.

We heard from the other side that, yes, they have made concrete suggestions about reducing the deficit, but what do we hear every day in the question period? The expense of carrying out every request they make would drive this country to bankruptcy.

I would like to make another point. Some hon. members have made it already, but I would like to reinforce it. When the House rises, that does not mean all members go on holidays. As the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) reminded us, we have a duty to our constituents. I owe it to my constituents to spend a certain percentage of my time with them. Because of the deliberate delaying tactics we have experienced during the Constitution debate and so forth, I could not do justice to hearing the concerns of my constituents since I would make an appointment and then have to dash back to Ottawa because there was a vote. At least give me some time over the summer break to work in my constituency so that I can hear the concerns of those Canadians and bring the concerns here on October 14.

I feel I have a duty to my family too. There is work around the house to be done. I think we have to do our jobs as fathers and mothers. I think I owe it to my family and to myself, but I owe it to Canada to spend a proportionate amount of time in the House and in my constituency with the people who sent me to this House.

As members of Parliament I think we should be setting an example for other Canadians in our political roles, either on the government side or in the opposition, as well as in our private lives. I do not have statistics to quote, but I would hazard a guess that members of Parliament probably have the highest rate of marriage break-ups. Why? Because if the opposition had its way, it would reduce us human beings to things. When we are reduced to things, we cannot think creatively or constructively. We cannot play our roles as fathers or mothers in our families. We cannot work with our constituents. I for one refuse to be reduced to a thing. I am a human being. I am an elected member of this House of Commons and I refuse to be reduced to a thing. I am a human being and I want to be respected for that.

The hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) who preceded me said that hon. members on his side of the House do not need a vacation. That is true; they do not. They have been on vacation all year. That is why they do not need a vacation.

I mentioned that I respect all individual members in this House. I would also like to pay tribute to and show my respect for the two opposition parties in the House because I lived in a country where there was no official opposition for a full year. There was opposition to government but no official opposition. I think this is what makes the democratic system so strong. I will always hold a very high respect for members who play a constructive role on the opposition side.

However, I think the public would have a greater respect for the two opposition parties if they would show some co-operation and some trust in the government. On Wednesday the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) said, "I do not trust the government." That is recorded in Hansard at page 11583. I think hon. members in the official opposition do not trust the government because they have not learned to trust themselves. They have not learned to trust their party. They have not learned to trust their leader and, because they cannot trust their leader, their party and themselves, it is no wonder they have lost trust in Canada and any government which would be ruling it.

Hon. members in the official opposition should start regaining trust in their own leader, their own party and themselves. Just because they have lost that trust, for God's sake they should not take it out on us. Why are they taking it out on us? They should put their own house in order. They should not bring their lack of trust out here, but that is what appears to be happening.

In any debate I think the debaters should make recommendations. I recommend that the official opposition change its attitude because that is important to Canadian unity and to the development of our country.

The official opposition appears to be obstructing any policy or bill which is good for the country. I do not know why it is doing this. Let me give just one example. In the Speech from the Throne of October 9, 1979, the then prime minister of Canada, the present Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), said, "My government is committed to making Canada self-sufficient in energy by 1990." Yet today the official opposition is doing everything it can so that the National Energy Program of the government does not meet its objective. Why? It is one of the same objectives of the previous government. The process of meeting that objective may differ, but surely there must be some co-operation in meeting this objective since both governments felt that was an objective which was good for Canada and all Canadians.

In debating Bill C-48 hon. members opposite were telling us all week to disband our energy policy. The Conservative party ran in 1980 on the platform of disbanding some of the energy policy. Hon. members opposite said they were running on the platform of disbanding Petro-Canada. The people spoke. The people told them what they wanted. They wanted Petro-Canada. They wanted this National Energy Program. However, somehow that did not sink in; the message did not get through. I hope the official opposition will change its attitude.

My concern is that this type of destructive attitude is creeping into the parliamentary committee process. I had the privilege of chairing the special parliamentary committee on a national trading corporation. This was one of the special parliamentary task forces represented by all parties, the Liberals, the Conservatives and members of the New Democratic Party. I think this is what added strength to the committee.

All year it was a pleasure to chair this committee because partisanship was put aside. We were given a problem to solve. We went out, tried to identify the problem and then tried to come up with a solution to that problem. As I say, it was a pleasure to chair such a committee because partisan politics were almost non-existent. We heard from 450 witnesses, had 270 meetings and travelled across Canada coast to coast, and Canadians told us that this was an excellent process because finally parliamentarians were listening to grassroots Canadians. It was their testimony which helped the committee come up with the recommendations it made.

The problem identified was that in Canada, as large as it is, we do not have a corporation or a consortium large enough to bid on huge capital projects funded by the World Bank or the Asian Bank. I am speaking of capital projects worth $50 million and up. The largest companies in Canada admitted to the committee that they cannot afford to take the risks involved in exporting such huge capital projects.

All three parties agreed that this was a problem. Another problem which the committee identified was that some assistance had to be provided to small and medium-sized business in order for them to get into the export trade business. This was also agreed to by all three parties. The committee came up with many recommendations such as improving more financing for EDC, and providing an export training school. One major recommendation was that Canada needed a trading corporation. The witnesses told the committee that the private sector could not do this alone and that they did not want the government doing it. Thus, we had no alternative but to come forward with a recommendation that it should be a joint co-operative effort and that such a corporation should be formed, funded by the private sector and the government. The more the private sector funds the corporation, the less the government will have to fund it.

Two Conservative members agreeing with the problem did not agree with one major recommendation. As chairman of the committee I suggested to them that they should provide the committee with alternative solutions or suggestions and that we would try to work them into the report. We went to the final stages of the report, and the two Conservative members did not provide any alternative solutions. But they employed various delaying tactics such as the ones they used in the House. Their deliberate delaying tactics which hamper the work of Parliament concerned me because they were creeping into the work of the committee. I was sorry to see that happen. Alternative recommendations never came forth, until the report was tabled in the House. At that time these two Conservative members issued a press release to the media, not to the committee or the House, indicating their position and why they dissociated themselves from the report. How low can one stoop in the parliamentary process? It was a cheap shot. I hope hon. members of the official opposition will change their attitude and return on October 14 in a more co-operative spirit.

In closing, I remind hon. members and Canadians that the fact that Parliament rises for the summer does not mean that all members are going on holiday. Some of the minds of hon. members of the official opposition have already gone on holiday; this is why we are not receiving any constructive suggestions. Many of us will be working in our constituencies, many of us will be taking French or English immersion classes. I owe it to my constituents and to Canada as a whole to spend a portion of the time in my riding as well as here.

The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) said this afternoon that the government was attempting to gag Parliament. How can we gag someone who has nothing to say? Also he quoted the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) as saying that it is time to go on holidays. That is not what the Postmaster General said. He said what I have been saying this evening, that is, how important it is for us to work in our constituencies.

I should like to take this occasion to recommend one more thing. When Parliament rises, I recommend that its break coincides with the school break which is normally in July and August. My recommendation would be that that is when the House should rise. We do not need three months; two months would suffice. At least we would be assured of that time to spend with our families. We would show the example that we should show as fathers and mothers, and we would be more effective when we returned.

When we all return on October 14, hopefully we will all have done some soul searching. Perhaps I will have to change my attitude. If so, I certainly will. We should all come back with more positive attitudes so that we can work more effectively and constructively. One group of people will benefit if we do that, that is all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments in this adjournment debate which reflect upon how the last nine months are viewed by my constituents, by myself and, more generally, by the western prairies, especially southern Alberta which reacted as we did to the federal political scene of the last nine months. I suggest there are two interlocking issues which have dominated the scene, not only in Parliament but all across Canada. I am referring to the Constitution and the energy issues. It is appropriate that I make some remarks about these two issues and their impact upon my constituency and, in general, upon southern Alberta. Then I should like to relate them to the approximately 100-year history of southern Alberta and generally of western Canada.

Most of us remember 1967 when we celebrated with almost a spontaneous enthusiasm our one hundredth anniversary as a nation; it was our centennial. I am sure some hon. members and their children went to Montreal for that special birthday party, Expo '67. I was privileged and pleased to do so. As a nation we were on an enormously great high and possibly more united than ever before in our history.

A decade later we all lived through and survived the trauma which ensued when one of our ten provinces, Quebec, proposed to separate, and our remaining nine provinces and especially the federal government went to great lengths to try to convince Quebec people to remain in confederation. But today, just after our one hundred and fourteenth anniversary as a nation, we are more divided than at any time in our history. Why? How could we go from the 1967 high to the critical and even desperate state of affairs today? I think it is a fair question which we should all ask each other. It is not easy to explain because there are a number of complex and historical factors involved.

For instance, the three prairie provinces were created in 1905 without the legal right of ownership of our lands, including natural resources. During the first 25 years we were so busy keeping out of debt that we never even missed the ownership right, at least until the dirty thirties came along and out of sheer desperation those rights were returned to us. It is ironic that the same natural resources of oil, gas, coal and, most important, our fertile soil and fresh water, add to the complexity because of an incredible national preoccupation with energy and the economic crisis today.

Suffice it to say, the three prairie provinces have experienced a dramatic change. They have evolved from have not to have provinces. Central Canada, Ontario and Quebec have difficulty accepting this readjustment in Canadian history. The politics of this readjustment hit home with a resounding shock wave at 8 p.m. on election night, February 18, 1980, when we switched on our radios and televisions in western Canada to hear that the political decisions had already been decided by just two provinces, Quebec and Ontario, before our western votes had even begun to be counted. We will never forget that moment.

I should like to refer to the constitutional issue. Last October 1980, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced his intention to have the government patriate the Constitution in a very specific and new approach. This subject was not an election issue or campaign promise of any party. In those early weeks there was an indication of broad public support to bring home our own Constitution, the British North America Act. Most of us need to be reminded that the BNA Act was formulated here in Canada, by Canadians, under the leadership of Sir John A. Macdonald and it was kept, by our choice, by the British Imperial Parliament. It was kept there to be amended from time to time at our direction. While there is widespread public support to bring it home, we are clearly divided on the proposed process to bring it here. Most of us are deeply concerned about the indecent haste to have our Constitution amended before it leaves Britain and about the unilateral aspects of the patriation, specifically that none of our provinces should be consulted or should be allowed to participate in the process. The only explanation which this Parliament and this nation have ever been offered for this haste was to carry out the Prime Minister's promise to Quebec during the referendum campaign.

In my opinion it is a combination of the Constitution and energy issues which appear to be dividing our nation today, certainly in western Canada. Certainly, 20 per cent interest rates and record inflation which show no sign of abatement will not help solve our troubles.

I suggest there is another aspect which should be mentioned and not overlooked, especially by us in western Canada. I ask hon. members to reflect on the make-up of our population in western Canada today. I want the House to consider that over 100 years have elapsed since the west began to be settled. Essentially the make-up of the west is the end result of three sources over that 100-year history. First, there were the pioneers who came west prior to 1900, many of them prior to the coming of the steel in 1885. The second group were the homesteaders who probably came to the west from 1900 to 1920. Third, there is the present-day movement of new Canadians, and a significant number of Canadian-born younger people who have migrated from the central and Atlantic provinces. All three groups, in their respective times, shared a common philosophy and need. All were prepared to leave their homes and, very often, their country of birth to come west and begin a new life. The first two groups in particular endured incredible hardships over many years and several generations in this re-establishing process. All three groups shared a common goal and desire to be part of a new country with that visible and tangible evidence of owning their own home or farm and contributing as individuals to a new way of life.

This is why the property rights issue is so important to all of us in the west. It was almost an obsession with us when the indication was so apparent that the reference to God and property rights were to be left out of the Constitution. We have not forgotten that. I am confident we will emerge from this political crisis essentially because of the history, the circumstances and make-up of our peoples. I am referring, of course, to western Canada, which has much to be proud of and much to work for as we approach our second century in the west.

We must not settle for a unitary style of federal government in a country so vast in physical scale and so rich in resources in all its parts and in its peoples. Above all else, we must develop not only a new desire for, but a new way to make our Canada truly a confederation of its parts, its regions and its provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hargrave: After the last two days of debate we should remind ourselves often of this bigger and more important picture.

I would like to make a few specific comments about the agricultural sector. Members of this House will be aware of my genuine concerns over the many years about drought in western Canada. I have spoken on this subject on numerous occasions over the last eight and a half years, and as recently as this spring. I have much pleasure tonight in describing an incredible turnaround in moisture and growth conditions throughout most of western Canada. Grass conditions in the short grass ranching parts of the southern prairies, which covers all of southern Alberta and most of the southwestern corner of Saskatchewan, are the best I have seen since 1953—that is 28 years. Grain crops are equally favourable with harvest only a few months away. This wonderful turnaround has given us all immense satisfaction and has restored our confidence in the ability of the prairies to come back and produce perhaps our largest total farm crop in history.

There is still one unfinished item from the 1980 and early 1981 drought which I hope will be attended to. I understand that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) is now to be responsible for the herd maintenance program. I am sure he is aware that there are still some unsatisfied claims left from the drought program for last year and this spring.

I urge the minister to consider once again the excellent priorizing of the new disbanded review committee. They went to a great deal of trouble and much labour to categorize four categories, and category one and two were of the highest priority which now total about 2,500 producers. I suggest most sincerely that they should be received by the minister and assessed since there are many in that group worthy of receiving some attention under that herd maintenance program. This number includes a small number of cattlemen on the Alberta side of the Alberta-Saskatchewan border, on the south slopes of the Cypress Hills going right down to the Montana border. The only possible explanation which may exist for this omission—and I regret having to say this—is that they are all in the Province of Alberta.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Hargrave: I think that's a tragedy.

All Canadian cattle producers are disappointed that the meat import measure, Bill C-46, has not cleared the standing committee. There are only three witnesses still to be heard. Surely they could have been scheduled for hearing over the last two or three weeks. Surely that could have been arranged. There was lots of time when we were not sitting as a committee. The committee just seems to have folded, and this started about three weeks ago for no apparent reason.

It would be reassuring and helpful if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) would make a positive statement as soon as possible with respect to Bill C-46 that the committee work will continue in the next session without any repetition. I once again remind the Minister of Agriculture about the serious reservations expressed by many of the witnesses about Bill C-46—expressed during the committee sessions—about the GATT agreements, the related items of guaranteed minimum access, those levels of imports of beef as determined by that guaranteed minimum access through GATT and the human population growth factor, that condition which Canada was evidently forced to agree to but no other country, especially the United States, had even to consider.

● (2220)

Both of these items must surely be renegotiated. The Minister of Agriculture has been in Alberta all of this week attending the annual meeting of provincial ministers. Of course, with him were the ministers of agriculture from all our provinces. They do this every summer. I sincerely hope that they discuss, in some detail, such timely topics as one or two items I want to mention now. I would point out that it is still apparently too early to even hear some of the subjects which were discussed. However, these are very important meetings and I hope that they had some serious discussion about the harmonization of the increasing number of provincial stabilization and subsidy programs for both hogs and beef cattle. It must now be obvious to all of us that the increasing trend to balkanization by various provincial programs could very well invite American border restrictions or even closures of that border for hogs and pork and for beef and cattle. That would be a tragedy.

I hope the ministers seriously considered the cattlemen's carefully developed plan for what we now know is a deferred income-averaging trust concept that would essentially provide an individual stabilization program for cattle producers. The funds from such trust accounts could very well be used to supplement the Farm Credit Corporation which is now so short of capital funds.

Finally, I hope the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin)—I am sorry he is not here—will not give up on the Crow freight rate issue. I appreciate his genuine interest in this very touchy subject, especially last fall, when he made a determined effort to travel around the country making some comments on it and occasionally speaking in the House on it. He knows the concerns of some of us on this very special issue, and I appreciate his genuine interest. All I can say is that the Crow issue must be resolved. The two major agricultural groups are close to a compromise right now. These two, of course, are the western agricultural conference and the commodity coalition group. I urge the transport minister to once again renew his interest in this fundamentally important issue and encourage a final compromise by the farmers of western Canada themselves. I thank Your Honour and hon. members for this opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted of course to take part in this debate. However, at the same time I feel somewhat distressed in view of the fact that for the past week we have been rehashing the same subjects and making the same futile and totally useless remarks in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I would be inclined to describe this debate as a demagogic marathon. In fact it is almost embarrassing to have to take the floor here tonight and to repeat once more what has been said a million times. Yes, Mr. Speaker, a million times. The speeches I have listened to for nearly a week could all be summarized in one single speech.

It seems now that honourable members opposite have just made a discovery. It seems that all our domestic problems and perhaps even all international problems should be settled before the adjournment of this House. It makes one wonder whether the provincial legislatures and all the legislative assemblies of other countries settle all those problems before adjourning. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe so.

Therefore, I shall be very brief because, as I have just mentioned, we have already listened to this kind of speech a million times. But what have we also heard Mr. Speaker for the past week? Let us try briefly to analyse the situation. First, the opposition makes me think somewhat of a family with children some of whom are learning to walk and others who already know how to walk. The opposition makes me think a little of the former who are unable to follow their big brothers attempting to run. The opposition tacks on to the government somewhat in the same way, trying to run behind their big brothers and sisters but they trip and fall. Their only alternative then is to cry, to get angry and to hang on. This is somewhat the situation which occurs in this House at the present time with an opposition which is tagging along with the government.

What have we done over the last week? To begin with we talked about the postal strike. Imagine! The House had to sit. The government had to stay in the House to legislate the postal workers back to work. Big deal. Although the normal negotiation process was going on. Of course, we would all like to see this dispute settled but there is never a strike which has not been harmful to someone. It is quite clear that strikes are no joke but it is not the duty of the government as we have said on many occasions, to rush in every time a strike occurs somewhere and to attempt to settle it in all sorts of ways especially through legislation.

Then, all of a sudden they realize the weakness of their argument and they gradually shifted to the issue of the uranium cartel. I could tell honourable members opposite that they too represent a cartel, the demagogy cartel. When we were dealing with the constitution, they attempted by all sorts of innuendos to tarnish some reputations—

Mr. Dionne (Chicoutimi): A Conservative specialty!

Mr. Tousignant: A specialty indeed of making innuendos against this one or that one.

Mr. Dionne (Chicoutimi): Wrecking reputations!

Mr. Tousignant: Giving people a bad name!

For a while, the opposition has been demonstrating its inability, its lack of intellectual power and its real incapacity to act as an efficient opposition in collaborating with a government which is determined to give a good performance.

There have been talks of insults to democracy. Imagine that! I will not linger on that point, I shall merely let the House decide who is showing contempt for democracy. Today is already July 17, and I shall add 1981, because I have the feeling that some people around here have lost all sense of time and of the value of time. Today being July 17, 1981, we ought to be in our constituencies working, as tomorrow is not a holiday. The members opposite are in no hurry to adjourn as many of them are on a holiday all year around. When a government has a majority of only 12 members it stands to reason that they must be in the House everyday, from Monday to Friday. Canadians must understand that. Of course, I admit there are hard working and dedicated people in the opposition, and I can see some right now for whom I have a high respect, but there are also quite a few who are away and that makes strictly no difference to the working of Parliament. Those members have no fear to be overthrown, they are already. But on this side of the House, with a majority of only 12 seats, we are duty bound to be here on a Monday to Friday basis. Ministers must leave to represent the government somewhere. I had said 12 members but I had included Madam Speaker, so it is more like 11. As I said, ministers have duties outside the House and must absolutely absent themselves to represent the government. Therefore if we do not want to find ourselves under the threat of an election, we have to be here. Meanwhile what is happening? We are away from our ridings to do our job as law makers in this House but we also have the responsibility of working as representatives of our constituents.

How can this be done? We leave on Fridays and rush to our constituencies where we work over the weekend. Many people are not aware of the fact that MPs, particularly government MPs have a very tough job—

Mr. Dionne (Chicoutimi): Seven days a week.

Mr. Tousignant: Yes, as my colleague from Chicoutimi has said, it is seven days a week. For my part, I can say that I have been a member of Parliament for two years and that I have still not taken any holidays. That is a fact. I must also say that before being elected, Mr. Speaker, I had a house in the South and I have had to sell it because I cannot get away. That is true for most people here. We work from 15 to 16 hours a day. Members of the government have to be on the Hill at 8 in the morning for meetings, and every day, we stay here until 10, 10.30, 11 or midnight. Since the beginning of the session, we have not been idle, and in addition, we go back to our constituencies, not to rest but to work, and not simply to meet individual voters, but also various social groups, individuals, municipal bodies, and so on, to learn about their problems. If we really want to govern this country properly, we have to start by seeing what is going on in our own regions, at the grass roots, and by talking with the people to determine how their problems can be rectified.

The opposition is holding us hostage. Mr. Speaker, we hear a lot about the hijacking of airplanes, but for me, what is going on here is political hijacking. For heaven's sake, today is July 17, the days are beginning to get shorter, and still no thought has been given to the fact that those who work for the House should be able to take some time off. As for us, as I said earlier, our work does not stop here. In spite of all this, we have to try to see something of our family, our children, who no longer know us when we go back home, and also to see people and learn about their problems.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, as we must be philosophical when faced with such situations, we have to tell ourselves that there must certainly be a positive aspect to all this.

I hope that if there is to be a positive side to the current situation it will be, as this has been said so often this evening, the opportunity to get rid of this antiquated system under which Parliament operates, and to go ahead as early as next fall with some type of parliamentary reform that will make this Parliament more effective, without palavering and loss of precious time.

Mr. Speaker, based on the yearly cost of operating this House, each day costs some $360,000. But who cares about that? If we chose to, we could reach a much higher level of efficiency by using very simple means, if we took the trouble next fall, under parliamentary reform, to address those problems, to ensure that we do not fall back into that same masochistic ghetto. We tolerate this situation, it goes on and on, and we see no improvement over the years. Every time a new member first arrives here, he hopes that things will improve, but over the years everything remains almost static.

To conclude, I would express the hope that next fall, hon. members from both sides of the House will work together on in-depth reform. We are here 282 MPs elected by the citizens of this country. It seems to me that we would be in a position to manage the country if we gave ourselves the tools to do so. But we entrench ourselves in what I called that ghetto that literally impedes our operations. Therefore it is useless to go on much longer, Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat bitter that we still are forced to make speeches here tonight and repeat the same comments for the nth time.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in military manoeuvres if you want to deceive the other side and not let them know what you are doing, you set up a smoke screen. Tonight we have seen the masters of setting up smoke screens in regard to public affairs. We saw it first of all in the speech of the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) who had a lot to say. He told us that he would gladly have gone home a week ago had this party not held Parliament here. Mr. Speaker, few members of that party have been in the House during this entire week. The financial critic has not been here nor has the energy critic, yet the hon. member talked as if he wanted to stay here all the time. Today his party moved a motion to adjourn the House, using it as a smoke screen, pretending that they did not want to go home, when it is obvious that they have been trying to go home since last week.

This party voted against the motion because we are opposed to an adjournment. We did not want to waste this last day, neither do we want to adjourn now but it is being forced upon us.

Just a few moments ago the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis) also set up a smoke screen, pretending that everything is well but that this party had caused difficulties in committee. Mr. Speaker, we had people come from the province of Alberta to that committee. They spent a lot of money to come here and plead with the finance committee to give them a few more days so that they would not have to borrow money or at least would enable them to extend their bills for a few days. The chairman did not even mention that in his report. Now we have the hypocrisy of hon. members saying that they want to stay on. They have the hypocrisy today to say that they want to stay. We would have been gone a whole week ago if this party under its leader had not insisted we stay. During that week we saw progress made. We saw a mediator appointed. Before that the government negotiator and the Post Office negotiator were not even speaking. They would not even get together. We had one at one end of the city and one at the other. Now we have a mediator and we hope that this matter will come to a settlement. People of Canada deserve to have their mail delivered.

● (2240)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: We are prepared to stay here longer if necessary. But now for the first time in the history of Canada the government brings in closure. Maybe we should not be surprised because this government is becoming more dictatorial all the time. As a matter of fact, why should we be surprised because this government has a dictator as a leader?

Let us look at some of the things which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been doing. He lays his hands on Jim Coutts and annoints him as the candidate for Spadina. He tells the people they have to have him as a candidate. Is that democracy?

Let us look at the difference in our party. Eight hundred to 1,000 people gathered and named a candidate in a democratic way. The leader of the Liberal Party would not fight against totalitarianism, communism or facism. He pretended that he was going to be a priest while his comrades fought overseas for his country. Many of them died overseas. He rode a motorcycle and had a gay old time while his comrades were fighting for Canada. The Canadian people should not forget that. We have a dictator for our leader. And the fact that the clones around him say "Yes, yes, and oui, oui" to everything he says does not reduce that dictatorial attitude one bit. They may set up a smokescreen.

Look at what happened with respect to the Constitution. Again we saw a dictatorial attitude and unilateral action. That was the very opposite to what this country has been used to. We have ten governments and two territories, but we have one man who says "I will do it. I will tell you what to do". What if the territories and the governments did not come to an agreement over a few years? That is not the point. We have a system of government in this country set up under the BNA Act with ten governments, and every government should have had a fair say on the Constitution.

I hope the Supreme Court will throw out the Constitution. But whatever the court says, even if the matter is legally right, it is morally wrong and it is contrary to everything we have ever had in this country. Again, that is a dictatorial attitude.

The Prime Minister would not even meet or talk with our premiers. But he goes to Cuba and talks to Castro. He wouldn't talk to our premiers or try to solve the problems of Canada. He is trying to solve the problems of the world. The country which is his responsibility is full of problems but he does not have time for those. He wants to help world government. He wants world government. He would like to be the dictator of the world. He talks about an international police force.

I do not believe in world government. I believe in the sovereignty of every nation. I will fight world government to the very last ditch. We do not want that in this country. We do not want anything to do with it. I say to hon. members over there that they can tell their Prime Minister that.

What about the gun control he brought in? Does he not want us to have any guns? There may be some reasons for that, but there is none to deny people the use of rifles and guns in this country.

The Prime Minister has a don't care attitude. Do hon. members over there realize that he will not sign certificates or golden wedding anniversaries any more? A couple in my constituency requested a certificate signed by the Prime Minister of Canada for their golden anniversary. What happened? A certificate was sent out without the Prime Minister's signature. The couple showed it to me. I told them that the Prime Minister was a busy man and perhaps it had slipped his mind. I asked them to give me the certificate to take to Ottawa. I sent the certificate over to his office. The Prime Minister's staff sent it back and told me that he did not have the time to sign these certificates any more.

What a difference there is between our leader and the dictator on the other side. Our leader tells us that he will send all messages for the member to deliver. I asked for a letter from the Prime Minister the other day for a couple who wanted a letter of congratulations for their golden anniversary. His secretary told me that that could not be done. We gave the Prime Minister a month's notice, but we were told it takes three months to have one of these letters made up and then certificates are sent without signatures. The Prime Minister does not care. That is his attitude. That is not the attitude of our leader. Our leader is trying to reflect the thinking of our people. I am glad to be a supporter of the leader of this party. I am not ashamed of that. I am proud of that.

The hon. member for Parkdale-High Park said that we wasted three hours today. That is again a Liberal smokescreen. However, what he said was partly true. We did waste three hours. But the other part of what he said is not true at all. We could have been studying bills. The government did not have any bills to study, not one. We did not want to waste time either. We want to stay here until the business is done.

Our inflation is the highest since 1948 at 12.8 per cent. Hon. members over there wonder why. But the very way this government is tackling inflation is causing inflation. The first component is the 20 per cent interest rate. The stores have to add 20 per cent on to the cost of their goods and people have to pay 20 per cent more. That is inflation. Everyone wonders why inflation keeps going up and up. Hon. members over there wonder why we are not telling them what to do. But we have told them what to do a dozen times. If they resigned, that would help. We have also told the government to get the small industries working, the small businessmen and the farmers. More production would beat inflation. We have told the government that. Raising interest rates up and up will not beat inflation. What we have to do is to get the hundreds and thousands of entrepreneurs producing in the country. We have to increase our net worth. If all these things are done, we will see inflation go down. This government wonders why we have more and more inflation, but the very things this government does produces inflation. The government asks why our businesses go bankrupt. Businesses are going bankrupt because of high interest rates and the policies this government follows.

This government talks about energy. The province of Alberta has no reason to be in this mess with energy. We have no hope of being self-sustaining by 1990 now. That opportunity has passed. The Premier of Alberta offered the Prime Minister of Canada on July 25 last year a deal that would have given us a good program in Canada. The government talks about sharing. We were prepared to share under the offer made by Premier Lougheed to Prime Minister Trudeau. The Prime Minister turned down that offer. That offer would have provided $24,000 to the rest of Canada from every Albertan. That amounted to more than $48 billion, but Trudeau turned it down.

An hon. Member: Order, please.

Mr. Taylor: It would have provided a pipeline—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member should refer to the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Taylor: Okay, the Right Hon. Prime Minister. But he turned it down. We would have had the Q and M Pipeline underway by this time. We would have had $2 billion for western transportation. But the Right Hon. Prime Minister turned the offer down. He did not want to accept it. That would not be in line with his plan for disunity in this country. He wants disunity in Canada, and that is the way he is doing it.

What about the cost of living today which is going up and up and up? Heating oil is up 52 per cent more than it was a year ago. Gas is up 42.7 per cent and fresh vegetables up 37.6 per cent over a year ago. The cost of living is going higher. Every time we talk about the poverty of many of our people, all we hear is what the government did a year ago when it increased the amount for senior citizens. Sure it did, but what has it done lately? Does it expect the old age pensioners to live with that increase forever? The members here could not live on what they were getting. Let us show these people the same consideration we showed ourselves.

Then there was the smokescreen of the cartel. I listened with interest today to the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey). He said that Senator Austin is innocent. I hope he is. If so, why not produce the documents? What is the government afraid of? Clear him of suspicion. What is there to hide? Why not let the documents come out? That is what those on this side are asking for. Come clean if you have nothing to hide.

I have been trying to ask a question in this House for a few days. Last Monday there was a sign on the entrance gates to Banff National Park which read "20 per cent interest on American money". That is more than the banks are paying. I was told the people there had never seen so many American $100 bills. I can understand that we need hard currency for the Third World countries, but the United States does not happen to be a Third World country.

Why is the government being so generous with the taxpayers' money. It pays higher interest than the banks. There is not another business in Banff that pays more than 18 per cent, and certainly not more than 19 per cent. The banks were paying 19 per cent. However, the government of Canada is paying 20 per cent, using the taxpayers' money.

We have a $14 billion deficit and an $80 billion debt. Nothing is being done to help small businesses. Sure the small business development bond was brought in, but those who need it most cannot get it. You have to be incorporated in order to get the bond. The government will not let them use it on their inventory. They deny that use. Then the government uses that bond as an example of what it is doing to help small business. All it is doing is helping to send small business into bankruptcy. Just look at the number of businesses going bankrupt.

The government talks about its energy policy and the uranium cartel. This afternoon the minister of mines said it had saved a lot of jobs in her city. The coalminers in my town have had to go without government help. They lost their jobs when coal was no longer competitive. They have watched the Ontario government bring in coal from the United States, something it is still doing.

What about the acid rain problem? We bring in high sulphur coal from the United States when in this country we have coal that is almost acid free. Why not reduce acid rain and at the same time create jobs for our coalminers?

There is tremendous potential in this country. This is a wonderful country stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the 49th parallel to the Arctic. However, we need policies that will encourage development and investment. Stop sending all the oil rigs to the United States. Stop cutting off the desire to invest in this country. Remove the energy policy which is causing so much hardship. The energy minister said the National Energy Program is needed to advance Canada's economy. Look at the results. What good has it been? We are paying a lot more for our gas.

We bought Petrofina. Petro-Canada does not act like a private corporation. Why did it not buy Petrofina and charge it to its profits? No. The price at the pumps was increased in order to pay for Petrofina. What good is it to the people of western Canada? No good at all. What good is it to the people of eastern Canada? No good at all. Why not put that money toward producing more oil and thus reaching toward self-sufficiency?

An export tax was added. We talked until we were blue in the face about what this was doing to production. It made no difference to this government. It just does not care.

The government would not consider our amendment to the excise tax bill. The government thought up this tax and it is going to get its pound of flesh, even if it destroys life in this country. The government says how well it manages this country. All it does is to spend money.

An hon. Member: Like a drunken sailor.

Mr. Taylor: A drunken sailor spends his own money but this government spends the people's money and is not giving value for it. When is it going to get our industries working? There is a lot of potential in this country. There would be co-operation if the government brought in a bill to develop this potential. I was in the legislature for almost 40 years. Never once in that time was closure brought in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. W. Bennett Campbell (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, this being the first occasion that I have had an opportunity to address this House, I want to say that it is indeed an honour and a privilege for me to serve the people of Cardigan in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Campbell (Cardigan): Before I address the subject at hand, I want to pay tribute to a great Islander who preceded me as Cardigan's representative in the House of Commons. All of us who counted Dan MacDonald as a friend considered ourselves richer for having known him. There are many in this chamber and on Parliament Hill who share that experience and understand the special place that he had in the hearts of Islanders.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Campbell (Cardigan): It was impossible to spend five minutes with Dan MacDonald without feeling that your life was touched in a rather unique way. He will always be remembered as an example of a high degree of courage and devotion. We will remember him for his sense of humour and his genuine concern for others, especially those with disabilities or those who were victims of misfortune. He will also be remembered for never believing he himself was handicapped.

• (2300)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Campbell (Cardigan): I am very honoured to represent Cardigan, and I will certainly endeavour to uphold the example of excellence set by Dan MacDonald during his years in this House.

My remarks will be influenced to some extent by the fact that I recently fought a byelection during what was the most intense period of the constitutional debate. Conventional wisdom would suggest that the electorate would use byelections to show its displeasure with the party in power. Indeed, in all three of the recent campaigns the opposition used the slogan "Send Trudeau a message". They did!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Campbell (Cardigan): That message was loud and clear. In all three cases, in three out of three byelections, victories in different parts of the country demonstrated the frailty of the opposition arguments.

During the byelection a number of major issues arose which related directly or indirectly to matters before this House. The people of Cardigan—indeed, the people of Prince Edward Island—were concerned about economic conditions which affect their daily lives. They were concerned about paying the highest energy costs in the country. They were concerned about the major effects these costs would have on production and marketing. They were concerned about their electrical and home heating costs as a result of changes in oil prices, which affect each and every one of us.

In addition, there was a critical need in Prince Edward Island for a greater degree of economic growth to make our province more productive and more self-reliant, and to provide more employment and investment opportunities for its people. Over and over again the need for more jobs was raised during the recent byelection campaign. The people of my constituency share the desire of all Islanders for secure and meaningful employment in their own province, and surely that must be an objective for this nation of ours in order that we can ensure that economic opportunities are realized in all parts of the country to make each of them better places in which to live and work.

I was a member of the government of Prince Edward Island during most of the 1970s. We were committed to achieving a higher standard of living through the development of our resources and other opportunities for economic growth. We entered into various cost-sharing agreements with the federal government which related directly to our social and economic objectives.

The inability at the moment of our present provincial government to maintain a harmonious relationship with Ottawa indicates an unwillingness on its part to co-operate. In my opinion, the government of P.E.I. does nothing to enhance employment opportunities in my province. It is becoming increasingly obvious that the government of my province has reneged on its responsibility for job creation and has left this void to be filled through federal initiatives.

In fact I sat in the gallery in the legislature during the last provincial session to hear the minister of labour of our province say he had no direct obligation, or his government had no direct obligation, for job creation in P.E.I.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Campbell (Cardigan): The particular needs of P.E.I. are not met by each and every federal program, but collectively they have been successful in meeting the needs not just of Islanders but of all Canadians. We are full partners in Confederation. As Canadians we want to realize our social and economic objectives, whether we are talking about energy, the need for job creation, the need to strengthen and develop our resources or the need to have our rights protected and the need for guarantees in that respect. We share those needs with other Canadians.

The people of my riding are resourceful people. We make our living on farms, in fishing boats, in tourist establishments, and in the small business enterprises which exist throughout my constituency. During the recent byelection campaign I made a commitment to the people of Cardigan, and I repeat that commitment here today. It is a commitment to represent their needs and interests as best I can, and to ensure that federal policies and programs recognize and respond to their needs and interests.

As a former provincial politician I would not be here today if I did not believe that there are opportunities to reflect our goals at the federal level as well as at the provincial level. The people of Cardigan, like the later member who represented them so well, recognize and meet their responsibilities as Canadians. My goal as a member of Parliament is to ensure that the people of my constituency are provided opportunities, not through charity or the largesse of a remote federal government but by a government in which they are full participants.

Since becoming a member of this House, and as a former legislator in the provincial legislature for a few years, I have always been an admirer of the parliamentary system and particularly an admirer of what I call the Mother of Parliaments in Canada, the House of Commons. In the short time since my becoming a member of this House I have followed attentively the performance and the actions in the House of more senior and experienced members on both sides in the hope that I might use some of them as models, learn by the mistakes of others and, in essence, do the best job possible on behalf of the constituents I represent. However, over the past month there have been events in this House which have left me wondering somewhat about the parliamentary process. Just a couple of weeks ago there seemed to be a very clear indication that this House would adjourn on or about July 10.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): My God, you just got here.

Mr. Campbell (Cardigan): Yes, I realize that, but that is not my fault. We arrived at the date of Friday, July 10, only to be advised by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that the House would not be allowed to adjourn until the mail was travelling again. I wondered why the Leader of the Opposition took that position. Since that time I have found out that he was pressured into that position by some of his backbench members.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Campbell (Cardigan): As a result the Leader of the Opposition took the position that this House should not adjourn until the issue of the mail service in our country was resolved, as if to suggest to members of the House and to all Canadians that to adjourn the House would in some way seriously impair the ability of the Government of Canada and this House to address the issue if it was not resolved through regular means.

● (2310)

I have the greatest respect for the hon. Leader of the Opposition, but I am sure a man of his experience knows the difference between the word "adjourn" and the word "prorogue". He knows that if it is necessary to recall the House after adjournment it is a very simple matter, but he suggested that the House should continue in session until the mediator had an opportunity to attempt to bring the two parties together and to resolve the dispute by normal means. I can understand the Leader of the Opposition interpreting the word "adjourn" in a much longer time-frame than most hon. members. One need only return to 1979 when the same Leader of the Opposition was elected Prime Minister of the country in May, and took almost five months to call the House into session on October 9. That is an indication of his interpretation of the word "adjourn".

In the meantime, I sat back and listened to the debate of the last week and a half. I sympathized with the Leader of the Opposition for the impossible situation in which his members placed him. The hon. member who spoke prior to myself talked about a smokescreen. I suggest to him that the smokescreen is not on this side; it is over there.

After being pressed into a position of initiating a filibuster on the postal strike, the Leader of the Opposition found himself with his knees kicked out from under him, so to speak, because progress was made with the appointment of a mediator. Then he was forced to find another issue to delay the House. Thus came the great cover up, or what has been discussed over the last week as the uranium cartel! As time proceeded, the motion to adjourn was placed before the House for debate. The motion was put a few days ago. The Leader of the Opposition found himself completely boxed in, because he had made a commitment to Canadians to keep the House going until the postal issue was settled. He knew full well that Canadians understood that a motion to adjourn would merely close the House until such time as it was necessary to recall Parliament to take whatever action necesary for the matter to be resolved.

I followed the debate very closely, but this morning I was completely baffled because the Leader of the Opposition, who all this week indicated opposition to the motion to adjourn, suddenly found himself with the majority of his members interested in going home. Thus, he had to find an out.

When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) introduced a motion to adjourn this morning, the Leader of the Opposition and the members of his party, if they were really interested in coming back next week, would have stood up and supported it. All members knew that the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was that the House should adjourn today and come back on Monday. If they did not want to associate with that motion, they could have very easily stayed out of the House until four o'clock, at which time the Speaker would have called private members' hour and the matter would not have gone to a vote.

Instead, the Leader of the Opposition and his members voted against the motion to adjourn, knowing that they would have their out and they would be able to tell Canadians that their right to speak was choked off by a closure motion introduced by the government. Thus they were able to save their leader and to have their justification, but I say to hon. members opposite that in history and in due course the people of Canada will judge their actions of the last week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. Campbell) on having delivered his maiden speech. I say to him that I understand why he dwelt so frequently on the term "Leader of the Opposition". Knowing him as I have from a previous political incarnation when he had many trials and tribulations in this particular position in Prince Edward Island, I would tell him that it has been my privilege and honour to have known all the members who have represented Cardigan since 1957. I know he will try to emulate the very high standard they have set, each and every one of them, over the years since 1957.

We are engaged in the final moments of a closure debate. There are a great many issues that those of us who have an opportunity to speak in the dying moments of this debate want to bring forward. I want to deal particularly with the latest news today which Canadians have had thrown to them in a dramatic fashion with regard to the cost of living. It is the highest cost of living the country has known since 1948. For anyone on the other side who doubts what those headlines mean, they mean trauma, suffering, and hardship for hundreds of thousands of Canadians across the country. This is what the headlines mean.

Last December 18, just as the House was to adjourn for the Christmas recess, Madam Speaker granted the right to hold an emergency debate in the chamber. What was the emergency at that time? I might recall to the House the words of Madam Speaker on that occasion. As reported at page 5888 of Hansard she said:

> In this case both hon. members have drawn my attention to the juxtaposition of circumstances of rising interest rates, the rising cost of living index, the rising rate of inflation, and the decline in the dollar.
> The hon. member for Oshawa pointed out, moreover, that because of the Christmas adjournment there will be no opportunity to debate any of these matters for a period of three weeks.

On that occasion in that debate member after member stressed the need for the government to respond to what was termed a very serious economic crisis. Central to the critical economic situation which existed at the time was the fact that the cost of living had risen 11.2 per cent, the highest level then since 1975, while interest rates stood at 17.36 per cent. Because the House would not be in session for a three-week period, Madam Speaker felt that it was enough of an emergency to grant an extraordinary debate. Members felt there was enough of an emergency to demand immediate government action to ease the hardships which people were feeling from one coast to another. Mr. Speaker, compare the situation of last December 18 with what confronts Canadians today. If what we had in December was an emergency or crisis, then what exists today is nothing short of an economic disaster.

• (2320)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Yesterday the Bank of Canada interest rates were reported at 19.04 per cent, and today the increase in the cost of living index reached 12.8 per cent, the highest year over year rate since 1948. Last December's figures, which were considerably below those of today, triggered an emergency debate because the House would be recessed for three weeks. Today the Liberal government has moved to cut off debate and shut down Parliament for the next three months. It does that in the face of the figures with which we were presented yesterday and today. It has used the ultimate weapon of closure at a time when Canadians from coast to coast are asking for some measure of relief from the hardships which the government's ill-fated and ill-considered policies have induced. Obviously the government would much rather not hear about the difficulties which Canadians are facing.

No doubt cabinet ministers suffer from the delusion that if only they can get rid of members of Parliament and avoid their bothersome questions, if only they are not reminded that their policies are not working, then somehow all the country's problems would go away. Things just do not work that way, Mr. Speaker. The problems remain and, what is worse, they are becoming more deeply imbedded and ingrained in the country's economic psyche with every passing day. Shutting down Parliament will not resolve anything. The axe of closure is not able to chop away at the high cost of living.

I sometimes wonder, as I listen in frustration to the responses to questions which cabinet ministers provide, if they have any sense or any idea of how bad things are for a number of Canadians—not everyone, to be sure. I do not place everyone in that bracket. But for people who live on fixed incomes, or for those who are striving to break even—the working poor—the situation gets more desperate day by day. Therefore, I must ask, do not government members, Liberal backbenchers, ever hear from any of these people? Is that the reason they can ignore them? Indeed, is that the reason they can close up shop here in Ottawa and go home without responding to any of their problems? Earlier this evening the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis) had the effrontery to complain that he was being held hostage here because people were trying to deal with the problems of Canadians.

If government members do not hear from their constituents about the high cost of living and high interest rates, I do. I not only hear from my own constituents about what a mess the government is making of the economy, but I hear from people living in constituencies elsewhere in the country. I wish to read a couple of letters into the record which I received recently from constituents in the riding of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen)—while the mails were still operating. The first one says:

I wrote to the Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister . . . and to the head of Canada Mortgage and Housing in Halifax with no answer from any of them, so I decided to write to you.

Mr. Clark: And they didn't even answer?

Miss MacDonald: No, they did not even answer.

My mortgage has gone up from $183 to $408, a month. I am the mother of eight children, five children in junior and high school, two in vocational school and one at home. My grocery order a week is $160. My oil is $135 every four weeks, house payments $408, not counting gas, lights, water, car payment and other bills. We are finding it very hard to make ends meet. We only signed our mortgage renewal for only one year and when it comes up we will be looking at another big jump. We signed the mortgage renewal with no other choice. We signed or be put out on the street with no concern for the children. Where can you find a place to rent for ten people? My husband's take-home pay is $230-$240 per week after taxes. It does not leave much for clothes for the children after everything is paid. I don't know what the government expects of miners. Everything is going up but the take-home pay . . . The going is rough with eight children and I know they are going without to make the house payment.

That letter comes from a Mrs. Campbell who lives in the riding of the Minister of Finance.

I have another letter in front of me from someone else in the minister's riding. It says:

I have written to so many people in government concerning my financial problems that I am fed up with them all . . . and no one can lift a hand to change matters, I end up with the same old answers. They try to run our country but they couldn't run a dog show.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: The letter goes on:

I am a widow woman with four children to try and look after on a pension of $480 per month social assistance. I am nearly crazy trying to make ends meet. I have a 20-year-old son who has tried everywhere for work but can't find a job. I have a daughter 18 who is graduating in June and she has gone everywhere she can think of for a job and she ends up baby-sitting for $45 a week. Then my 14-year-old son is trying to get any small jobs, mowing lawns or cleaning yards or whatever he gets in the way of an odd job. My little girl, 11, is here with no shoes for her feet and I just cannot afford to get her any . . .

Four years ago we were getting $425 a month and I could buy a 3-lb jar of peanut butter for $1.89. Now I get $480 a month and the same jar of peanut butter is $5.30 and that's no lie. My fuel bill four years ago was around $40 a month, now its over $100. A family of five should have at least $100 a week for food alone, not to mention your fuel, lights, clothes, bills and other necessities . . .

Its not living when you are worried every minute where your next meal is coming from.

That letter was from Mrs. MacMullen from the minister's riding. The letters I have referred to, Mr. Speaker, reached me in June while we still had postal service. Their writers, who voiced despair at the situation a month ago, now must contend with the highest increase in the cost of living in our peacetime history. What can you say to a mother with a number of children when you know she cannot afford the increase in the cost of milk, fresh fruit and vegetables for her children? These people do not write letters to members of Parliament because they are looking for penpals. They write because they are hoping and praying that someone will listen to their cries of distress. It is no good for the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to shake her head at me—these are the kinds of things people write about.

Cabinet ministers have not listened through these last long months. They are confronted with this situation again and again, and still they do not listen. They have sat in their seats in stony silence, or they have risen to their feet to intone that Canadians have never had it so good. Small comfort, that, to a woman with a family of young children for whom she must provide.

● (2330)

If cabinet ministers have not listened to the pleas of the less fortunate while the House has been in session, if they have not listened in this last number of months, who will force them to listen to anything in the next three months when we are not here? They relish the chance to get rid of the opposition confronting them with their shortcomings. They do not like to be confronted with these shortcomings, and they jump at every opportunity to get rid of them. However, during this debate today one does not hear from any of the Liberal backbenchers getting up on their feet to demand, from their Liberal cabinet ministers, some countermeasure to the high cost of living about which we have heard today. We have not heard a single word from any Liberal backbencher about it. Instead, like the cabinet, they have ceased to listen, and that is the trouble.

In the past year the government has made a mess of constitutional reform, it has made a mess of the economy, and it has made a mess of the Post Office. I just want to plead with the government: for God's sake, please do not touch anything else, because your incompetence is ruining the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: I say to Your Honour that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has a great opportunity in these next few days. He has an opportunity to listen and to learn from the leaders of other industrialized countries. He might ask them how they are handling inflation, how they are handling the cost of living in their countries, and what their record has been over the past year. This is what he would hear from them. He would hear that in Italy the cost of living has gone down from a year ago, when it was 20.8 per cent, to 20.6 per cent. In France it has gone down from 13.7 per cent to 12.7 per cent. In Britain it has gone down from 21.9 per cent to 11.7 per cent. In the United States it has gone down from 14.4 per cent to 9.8 per cent. In West Germany it has gone down from 6 per cent to 5.6 per cent. In Japan it has gone down from 8.2 per cent to 5.4 per cent. In Canada it has gone up from 9.4 per cent to 12.8 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Shame! Shame!

Miss MacDonald: That is what the Prime Minister has to bring to the economic Summit. Canada is the only country at the economic Summit to show an increase in the cost of living over the past year. All the other countries have reversed the trend. The Minister of Finance and his Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) lay great emphasis on the gradualist approach that they are adopting, on the gradual way in which they are attacking the country's economy. The only result they are having is to make the economy and times in Canada gradually worse and worse for more and more people of this country. It is worse now than it was in May, when the minister reluctantly forecast an appreciable drop in the over-all inflation rate; and it was worse in May than it was in February, when the Minister of Finance sat there and smiled or smirked about the questions which were put to him. My fear, given the record of this government, given its inertia, given its lack of political will, given its lacklustre performance, is that during the next three months, when the House will no longer be in session, the cost of living will soar beyond the wildest estimates.

This is a very difficult time for a good many people in this country; 1981 has not been kind to them. Some are out of jobs because of the government's fiasco of an energy policy. It is driving people out of business, and business out of oil rigs, and out of the energy future of this country, and some people are out of jobs because of the bungling of the government's handling of the Post Office situation. Small business after small business, collection firms and magazine outlets, are having to close because of the government's bungling of the negotiations. Some people are out of their homes because of the runaway mortgage rates in the country. They look to government to provide leadership through difficult times, and the government hits them with a double whammy of a record high cost of living rate and record high interest rates. Is it any wonder that Canadians are becoming fractious, cynical, and angry? Government policies are not only adversely affecting their livelihood, but they are also sapping the strength, the vitality, the energy and the spirit of Canadians. The country deserves better than this. Certainly, it deserves a better government than this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: I mentioned that Canadians were getting cynical. Is it any wonder that they are getting cynical when they remember what the Liberal party promised in response to a Financial Post questionnaire on February 16, 1980? The Liberal party said this about the cost of living and inflation:

> Inflation is the key problem. If it can be reduced, the problem of high interest rates will be lessened. To deal with inflation, we must deal with expectations. While the Liberal party remains committed to gradual reduction in the growth of money supply and government expenditure restraint, more important, it will not contribute to a buildup in expectations through inflationary tax hikes or excessive oil price increases.

That, from the party that 13 times, since it has come to office, has increased energy prices in this country! That is what it has done. Is it any wonder that Canadians are cynical about things which are said to them before an election, and then the opposite is done by a government in power after the election? I suppose that it would be too much to expect any cabinet minister to have entered this closure debate today with some positive suggestions as to how our cost of living could go down for a change instead of always going up; but surely it is not too much to ask, to demand that, when this threadbare bankrupt government meets the House again this autumn, it do so with a budget designed to stimulate the Canadian economy rather than suck from it the last vestige of vigour and strength that it possesses.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, during this adjournment debate it seems it is not only desirable for us, but probably our duty, to carry out an assessment of the past, to identify our problems and to seek solutions, so that we can learn not only from our successes but also from our mistakes, and also try to improve the future. It seems to me to be a tragic but indelible part of our political mythology to act as if our own party never makes a mistake and that the other party can do no good. It seems to me that if that is our approach, one can never learn or grow, nor, for that matter, can one gain the trust of others with such an obviously simplistic point of view.

Some of my constituents have said to me that when they see me on television, either speaking or seated in the House, that I look serious and sombre. I look serious and sombre. They wonder why that is the case. Perhaps it is because that is the way I look but I think it is mainly because that is the way I feel.

• (2340)

Each of us when we ran for Parliament had our own hopes. When we ran for Parliament we had our own expectations for our work as an MP and also for what we hoped to find in the House of Commons. Certainly I can say I had hoped there would be more room and scope for dialogue and much less confrontation. I hoped we would be evolving from the sterile systems of the past that played up to extremism, extreme statements and scapegoating, and that instead we would be moving forward with the introduction of television, because people would be watching us, to a system that would be more sincere, more adaptable, productive and useful, as we move toward the twenty-first century.

But no, Mr. Speaker; our ears are daily assaulted with loud accusations or venomous attacks directed against hon. members. If not that, then insinuations of guilt by association such as, unfortunately, we have endured for the last several days in remarks directed against Senator Austin and people who cannot defend themselves because they are not here but in another place.

There have been attacks against civil servants who are not here and cannot defend themselves. It is an irony that Parliament should hold people guilty until they are proved innocent.

This is hardly the place then, to come for reasoned or logical argument. There is very little genuine communication taking place here in this chamber.

As we look back over the session so far, each of us may have his or her own personal opinions about it. Old timers may compare it with former sessions and rate this session, on the basis of their broad perspective, as being either better or worse in this area or that area than previous sessions.

Newcomers, some of us who have been here for only a few sessions, may be less objective and more impatient. Perhaps we are comparing it, not with what has been but with what it could be or should be. Each member, then, has his or her own personal value system by which he or she assesses what Parliament should be. What I am about to say, then, is certainly a personal reaction as I keep in mind the constituents whom I try to represent. I do not pretend they are the views of other members or of the government or of my Liberal party.

My assessment of what has happened in this session so far to date is that we have worked very hard and very long; that we have met a host of very urgent and pressing problems; and that the government has launched on a courageous effort to deal with many major and long-range issues. I also observe that the existing parliamentary process suffers from many outmoded, antiquated procedures that were meant for a totally different era and situation, and that this system of schedules and rules and attitudes is becoming less and less capable of dealing with matters of state in the 1980s.

To put it gently, our present parliamentary system engenders hostility, invites abuse and misuse, and in the eyes of the public is increasingly earning disappointment, if not cynicism.

Perhaps those who have worked with the system for a long time or have learned how to manipulate its rules may derive ample satisfaction. Perhaps they know how to use the system, but in the view of many in the public who watch television I am afraid I hear that business is not done here, it is blocked here. We remember the scenes from the constitutional debate. We recall the extent to which members would go to try to inhibit debate or progress in the affairs of this Parliament.

I said that in this session we had successfully addressed ourselves to many fundamental issues. We have hardly been toying with superficial matters or tinkering or fine tuning. To the discomfort of many, we have bitten the bullet and come to grips with such issues as the Constitution, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and all that that entails. We have had a budget debate. We have insisted on the right of Canadians to claim their fair share and control of their own natural resources, oil and gas. We have seen the development of a national energy policy that embraces all phases of the energy issue, including exploration, diversification, energy alternatives and conservation, for decades to come. This Parliament has sought to adjust our economy to changing market conditions, including priority on research and development. We have undertaken risks to address global issues that impinge upon us as threats to our survival and that of billions of other people, whether they include environmental pollution, demographic explosion, the suffering of millions of refugees, the horrors of violence and terrorism, or the entire story summed up by the words "North-South relations".

Yes, this Parliament has tackled a very large package of issues in a fast moving world that will not wait. Whether or not one is satisfied with what the federal government is doing in each or any of these areas is another question. Indeed, it is the task of the opposition and the media and every one of us to analyse and criticize, and if we can to suggest profound, alternate solutions.

Personally, I have not been stimulated by the opposition, which from where I sit seems to have been more preoccupied with fishing expeditions to find scandals, and to scramble to get "onside", with public opinion polls, than it has been to generate rationally the challenges and the debate that these enormously complex issues that I have mentioned deserve.

But whether the government or the opposition has done well or poorly is obviously a matter of opinion. I have expressed mine; to that I am entitled. But my point and major concern here is not to play that game. Rather, it is that our parliamentary system has not lived up to our present day needs. If we do not pay attention to this we are inviting disillusionment in our political system, and nothing could be more tragic.

Like children, nations, parties and politicians play games. But the games we play are games with our own future. Sometimes they are games of bluff, of posturing and pretence. They are dangerous games. Today we need to move away from political games and move toward political management. We need to move toward communication, toward reason, co-opertion and, above all, toward dialogue. If we do not take the steps to reform our system, we will lose out to the extremists and the violent who will offer quick answers to those who are becoming impatient with our ponderous and obsolete game playing.

The reforms of which I speak are really not my ideas; these reforms of Parliament are not new ideas. They come from the opposition, they come from the New Democratic Party, they come from our benches, they come from committees that have met year after year. For some reason, however, we have not taken the step to bring about parliamentary reform.

Perhaps we need to challenge those guardians of the past who cling to a system which has long passed us by. When we ask what the suggestions are that have been made on all sides of the House to reform this Parliament and make it more effective, what we have heard over and over again is, let us work for ways to increase participation and involvement; let us encourage the excellent experiments of all-party task forces which have just begun; let us try to be more effective and better organized in our parliamentary committee; let us give more members an opportunity for debate; let us adjust the rules; let us consider more free votes in the House and fewer motions of confidence; let us question the archaic system of bells and surprise votes. In short, let us treat one another with greater respect, as adults, with a schedule which will permit sound management and organization.

Mr. McDermid: Tell that one to your leader.

Mr. de Corneille: I suggest that these are things on which all parties can work and which would find all-party agreement. Perhaps some of the venom and the vitriolic accusations we have heard in the past week would not be made and would not be obstructing our parliamentary procedure.

My second area of concern is that we are not making the urgent and necessary efforts needed to avert the same disaster of confrontation and violence in this country that is raging like a conflagration in the rest of the world. I do not think we take enough pride and satisfaction that we have thus far avoided violence, assassinations, bloodshed and political extremism which have poisoned all the other nations of the world, including France, Britain and the United States.

● (2350)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Eglinton-Lawrence has the floor.

Mr. de Corneille: What makes us think that we can so easily escape the ravages of frustration, racism and moral decay that is consuming other western nations whose positions of democracy are older and more established than our own?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am hesitant to rise because I have never experienced anything like this in the almost nine years I have been in Parliament. Maybe it is because I am a woman and the first to sit in this House from the province of Quebec. Not only am I a French Canadian but I am an immigrant to this country, and I resent all forms of discrimination. I do not particularly like the joke which the Tories are playing on our colleague right now. Whatever status or job in life—

An hon. Member: Order.

Miss Bégin: —of someone, one is not supposed to play tricks like that, and I consider it an attack on a member's privilege.

An hon. Member: Talk to your own caucus; they were having just as much fun.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Everyone was laughing.

Mr. McDermid: You are laughing as hard as anyone, Mr. Bockstael.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sure all hon. members are conscious of the need to maintain the dignity of the chamber. The hon. member for Eglington-Lawrence has the floor.

Mr. de Corneille: One could hardly find a better illustration of the point I was talking about than what has just transpired on the other side. I hardly think it befits the dignity of the whip of the opposition party to pass around a plate as if for a collection, which is a mocking of the church or a mocking of the Christian faith. I do not find that amusing. I do not think it should be amusing to members in this House. I do not mind something that is a good joke, I think I can take that; but I think it is particularly out of taste when I was talking about the tragic need for dignity and solemnity in this House of Commons.

I was trying to point out how grave is the need for the people who watch us on television to have respect for this House of Commons. When members continue to make a mockery of it, it cannot elicit in the people who watch us a sense of confidence in our political system.

As I was saying, we should realize that our House of Commons is in great peril.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. de Corneille: It is in peril when members mock it, deride it and do not have sufficient respect that they can give their ears to their hon. colleagues.

What are we here for if that is the behaviour we show?

An hon. Member: Closure. That is what.

Mr. de Corneille: I am sorry if that is how it behooves members of the opposition. They do not mock me. They are mocking themselves and Parliament.

Mr. McDermid: Look who is mocking Parliament.

An hon. Member: You are closing Parliament so you can go on holidays.

Mr. de Corneille: We should be proud of this country and of the peace and tranquility we have. We should not mock it. How dare we mock the system. How dare we drag it into the dust.

Tragically, in this country we have seen altogether too many politicians fanning the flames of separatism and regionalism, stonewalling instead of talking and negotiating.

Mr. McDermid: Stonewalling. Look who is talking about that. That is the pot calling the kettle black.

Mr. de Corneille: In the 1950s I worked on programs to bring about dialogue between people of different churches. In the 1960s I worked on programs to bring about dialogue between Christians and Jews. In the 1970s I worked to try to bring about dialogue between Canadians of different cultures. In 1969 I went to the Harrison Hot Springs conference to discuss ways to apply the principles of dialogue to our national scene, to seek participatory democracy to reduce confrontation. I ran for Parliament ten years later to pursue those same goals, to look for unity and to find ways to bring people at least into dialogue, if not agreement.

I am trying to challenge all members of this House. I implore members of the opposition to hear what I am saying. We should try to seek dialogue, to seek to talk together and to listen to one another. People ask me why I look so serious. They may ask me when I will stop looking so serious on television. That will be when we stop playing the game of politics and engage in political science; when we stop the game of scoring points and conduct the affairs of state; and when we sit across the table as well as across the aisle.

I am proud of what we have been able to do this session. But I suggest it is long overdue for this Parliament and our system to be made more dialogical so that we can better represent and better serve our people. I hope that parliamentary reform will be at the top of the list of all parties in the fall and, of equal importance, that we give priority to bringing about more dialogue and less confrontation.

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to join in this adjournment debate—

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, with the indulgence of my colleague who is speaking, may I ask his permission to put a question to the hon. member who has just finished speaking?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The time of the hon. member for Eglinton-Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille) has expired. The hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox-Addington (Mr. Vankoughnet) has been recognized.

Mr. Prud'homme: I will return to it later then, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Vankoughnet: The all too frequent motion of closure is used with abandon by the government whenever it attempts to get its own way at the expense of Parliament and the Canadian people. The serious state of our economy which the government is disregarding is hard to understand when this country has so much potential.

I understand this is the first time in the history of the Commonwealth that closure has been used on an adjournment debate. It is just another milestone for the present government as it goes on its misguided way. We saw this same government use closure on the constitutional issue in an effort to ram its proposals through, and now we see it rear its head once more.

The government could use its majority in constructive ways to address positively the many problems facing Canada and Canadians today. Instead, it uses its majority to usurp the traditional functioning of Parliament by again bringing in a closure motion at a time when there are serious issues with which to deal. We have in Canada serious problems facing home owners, businessmen and the everyday citizen which the present government seems to ignore, such as inflation, high interest rates, unemployment and an ill-conceived energy policy. We hear of such issues as the uranium cartel which the government does not seem too anxious to discuss in a Parliament which represents the people of Canada.

I am sorry to say that many Canadians no longer look upon the Post Office with the same degree of admiration they once did. Rural mailmen, however, still deserve that past reputation for excellent service. These people do deserve an increase in the allowable limit for their contracts. When compared to the generous increases urban workers have received in the past, rural carriers deserve adequate compensation for a job well done. I hope that the government can address some of these problems and improve our mail service and ensure fewer interruptions in the future for this vital necessity.

Our country is at a turning point in its history. The issues facing us are complex and interrelated. They are accompanied by a deep sense of urgency and concern. I believe that we must confront them head on, but we must also approach them cautiously.

The most serious issue facing us is our economy. Our economic situation should be our main priority. The production of goods and services in Canada must grow, not continue to decline. The present government continues to accumulate a deficit, which is snowballing out of control.

Many people predict prolonged, double digit inflation. Against this background. Is it any wonder that businessmen and unemployed Canadians do not share the present government's one-sided concern towards the Constitution? This will not create more jobs or help those people fortunate enough to be employed cope with the ravages of runaway inflation. There is no question in my mind that the government has used the constitutional issue to divert attention from our dismal economic situation. Canada's economy has to get back on the rails, but this challenge seems to be met by the government railroading Canadians.

Serious problems must be met head on with serious solutions. Long-term problems require long-term plans and solutions, not self-serving hit and miss policies, as the present government sees fit to spread around.

The budget introduced last October is certainly no answer to Canada's serious economic problems. In fact, it does not even measure up to a serious attempt to deal head on, up front with problems faced by Canadians. Real problems demand real solutions, and the first step the government should take is to introduce a budget based on long-term financial planning. It must address the problem of the government debt and take concrete measures to bring this debt under control. It must deal with getting Canadians back to work and getting our industries working at capacity. It must wrestle inflation to the ground and keep it there. The budget must possess the intestinal fortitude to correct the problems facing Canadians today so that we can regain that high standard of living our ancestors worked so hard for us to enjoy.

This is the concept that Canada was built upon. Honesty, hard work, fairness; these are Canadian words reflecting some of the high standards that our heritage was built on and that our future will continue to be built on. We need policies that are honest and fair to work as a sound guiding force for all Canadians. We do not need a crafty, cagey load of doubletalk which is passed off as a budget but which in effect passes for no more than wind.

Canadians get more than a bad taste from this latest closure motion, uranium cartel, postal service, interest rates, National Energy Program, Constitution and much more. Canadians are facing difficult times. They need and deserve responsible and sincere leadership. They need a government which not only is in touch with all Canadians on the real issues facing Canadians, but one that will do something to correct what is wrong.

The great potential of Canada will only be realized if we regain control of our cost structure and become more productive. The result has been an increase in inflation, which is nothing more than a symptom of our demand versus supply dilemma. Inflation should be our main concern. We can reduce our inflation rate if we increase our productivity.

We have all seen how the present government uses its majority to try unilaterally to impose its ill-conceived policies on Canadians. We are seeing strong public reaction now to the government's energy package, its so-called budget, and the constitutional proposals. Why does this government not see fit to use its majority in a constructive way to address the very real and pressing problems of inflation and unemployment?

The Canadian public is not so easily fooled by this government's way of doing things. The present government has been avoiding the real issues for some time. The business community is one of the most important components in our economy. This is one of the first areas the government should look to to help. New innovative programs to help Canadian business grow and compete in Canada and worldwide are desperately needed.

Interest rates in this country are soaring higher than the government's ego, with the prime lending rate now over 19 per cent. It is hard enough these days in business, with all of the government bureaucracy to face, to have to cope with these crippling interest rates. Bankruptcies are at an alarming rate. Initiative is being stifled. People simply cannot afford to take the risk of borrowing money at such high cost. Empty stores and factories are more and more evident as the government's mismanagement is turning Canada's economy into a wasteland.

As each day passes while the government ignores the very real problems faced by Canadians, businesses are closing down and more Canadians are becoming unemployed. People with ideas, initiative and sound business sense are having a difficult time these days due to the state of our economy, caused largely by the lack of sound, long-term policies from this government. I feel that we must solve the very real problems facing Canada at home in order to reach our potential before we go looking for other causes to follow.

Farming is another important part of the Canadian economy. One out of every four Canadians works in a field related to the food and agriculture industry. A healthy and growing agricultural economy helps contribute to a healthy and growing Canadian economy. With record unemployment and inflation in Canada today, the economy needs all the help it can get.

The last budget put forward by the government virtually ignored agriculture. There was no mention of updating valuation day values and allowing rollovers of the sale of farm lands in a registered retirement savings plan. If farmers are not protected against the peculiar capital gains aspect of their industry, then the selling price of farm land could reflect these high potential capital gains and as a result the high start-up costs could be prohibitive to many who would otherwise enter farming.

What about those already in farming? They are affected as much as or more than anyone by the skyrocketing interest rates. Farming today is big time business. Machinery and land costs are very expensive as it is, but to try to pay for them with interest rates as they are going is not a pleasant thought. Canadians can see what is being done, or should I say what is not being done?

Exploration is slowing down in Canada. Drilling rigs are moving to the United States. The oil industry has a multiplier effect in our economy and when exploration and production slow down, industry looks elsewhere and the whole Canadian economy suffers. The longer the government takes to help the industry achieve self-sufficiency in Canada, the more foreign oil will have to be imported at huge cost to our economy. The government has already run up a huge national debt. Where are we going to get the money to pay for this expensive energy policy? More borrowing on international money markets will add to the amount of money Canada has to pay back.

• (0010)

Energy is a very important aspect of our economy these days. It affects our productivity, our inflation rate, our employment prospects and our real income. We must embark on a major program to increase our domestic supply of oil and alternate energy sources. Unfortunately, our plans to make Canada energy self-sufficient were stymied, at great cost to the energy future of our country.

We are now seeing the disastrous results of the government's energy policy. Canadians are seeing through the packaging of this misguided policy to the harsh reality beneath its surface. Why is it that we are more and more forced to look at what is lurking beneath the surface of government policy? It is because we can no longer trust the government to attack things out front.

Future generations of Canadians will bear the brunt of paying off the huge debt run up by the present government. The government has a responsibility to advocate policies which are in the best interests of Canada and Canadians.

We have a strong blend of heritage and much to be proud of and build for. Our ancestors built this country up with a strong foundation. They suffered hardships and challenges, but they persevered and overcame these various challenges. The present government does our heritage little justice as it turns a blind eye and a deaf ear to our present problems.

The present government does not deal in substance and foundation but, through its shortsighted policies, seems more bent on tearing down this country rather than preserving and building it for the future.

Most parents want to provide better lives for their children than they had for themselves. If a child requires a basic item such as a pair of shoes, they do not substitute a colouring book. The present government tries to give Canadians off-colour policies such as unilateral alterations to our Constitution, against the wishes of most of the provinces and the majority of Canadians, when what Canadians really want are jobs, relief from inflation and high interest rates and a sound energy policy formulated by elected representatives who are free to express the views of their electorate without being silenced.

I feel that the present government is setting a dangerous precedent in its over-use of closure. It seems that every time the government gets embarrassed or frustrated over an issue, regardless of the importance of the issue to the country and the people, we see the increasing use of closure. This is unacceptable and an alarming abuse of Parliament.

We are here to represent Canadians, and the government should respect that fact. The government should also deal with the real concerns and issues facing Canadians in a direct and fair approach.

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane-Superior): Mr. Speaker, as the House grinds finally to a close until the fall, I would like to take this opportunity to reflect on a few current issues. As we sit here in Ottawa even in the full bloom of summer, it is not too difficult to recite these issues. We all know them and perhaps see them a little differently. Some are distressing in varying degrees, vexing, troublesome and disturbing. Others, if we take the time and have the capacity to examine them objectively, do give us cause for some hope, even if not full-fledged rejoicing.

On balance, I think we can say that ours is a very favoured and fortunate nation, but is it not rather strange that it never seems very politic to remind our citizens that such is the case? I am not sure why. However, many people say it for themselves, especially those who have had the opportunity or the privilege to travel outside Canada. Upon returning from abroad they say, "It is good to be home; ours is a great country; we are a fortunate people." It seems as if they return to see life around them with fresh eyes.

Nevertheless, it is distressing to be in the midst of yet another postal strike. Small and medium-sized businesses are hurting, and they are hurting badly. These businesses are the economic life blood of this country and, with accounts receivable choked off and facing a serious cash flow problem, these small and medium-sized businesses are in serious trouble.

At current interest rates it is not a very attractive proposal to suggest that they take a trip across the street to visit their friendly neighbourhood banker, even if his door is wide, wide open—and it seems to be these days. I cannot confess I have ever heard them, but I have listened to hear if anybody can come up with strong, counter-arguments against the view that our banks today are the most greedy, grasping institutions in our society. Well, let that be for now; back to the Post Office.

Nearly everyone agrees that the only way to get a decent contract is by way of collective bargaining. It is not always efficient as a method, but it is usually effective. It does seem to me a pity, however, that some union leaders are so quick—so trigger happy—to deploy their ultimate weapon of strike, sometimes even before talks get under way or even before real negotiations have begun in earnest.

Mr. Gamble: Remove the right.

Mr. Penner: My hon. friend says "remove the right". I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. Collenette: Go fight Joe instead.

Mr. Penner: I do not accept his position at all.

The costs to all concerned of deploying the ultimate weapon too quickly are terribly high and often unnecessarily so.

I am sure there is much within the Post Office which requires urgent attention. In fact, in a recent interview, Mr. Warren, the man who will head the new Canada Post Corporation, referred to some of these problems, and I would like to quote just a little from that interview. He said he is convinced that one of the fundamental problems with the Post Office is a lack of pride and job satisfaction on the part of the postal workers. Often, he said, that mood has been manifest in demands at the negotiating table for unreasonable salary increases and substantial improvements in fringe benefits. Postal workers, he said, might not be as strident or inflexible in their demands if they were happier where they worked. Mr. Warren said one of the things he is considering as part of his corporate strategy is a series of sweeping measures to improve working conditions. He said that when money becomes so centre stage, you have to ask yourself if there are not other things and whether the work environment, the safety environment and other things do not come into it.

The postal workers have the right to strike and the right to collective bargaining under law. A positive step has been taken with the appointment of a mediator. I believe we now should be able to adjourn this House in an optimistic frame of mind, optimistic that a fair and just settlement will be negotiated quickly. That is what the postal workers want, that is what the people of Canada want and that is what the Government of Canada wants.

The postal strike, high interest rates which hurt home owners and small businesses in particular, and the rate of inflation are distressing, troublesome and extremely serious issues. It is illusory, however, to lead people to believe that solutions are either simple or readily available. The British government's hard line on inflation is creating serious social unrest in that country. Great Britain today has more than its share of problems. British members of Parliament have their hands full, more than they can cope with.

• (0020)

Recently at a parliamentary Commonwealth Conference in Colombo, Sri Lanka, the President of the Republic spoke to the delegates quite frankly about some of the problems on his island. The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) who is sitting opposite heard the speech. The president referred to violence in the northern part of his island and to the efforts of his government to restore peace and order. There has been looting, murder, raping, wanton destruction of property, and all that accompanies violence and disorder. President Jayewardene noted that a number of British members of Parliament had become deeply concerned about the problems in Sri Lanka. Some of them had even sided with those who were creating the disturbances. President Jayewardene warned those British members of Parliament not to meddle. "Solve your own problems first", he said, "before you cast your eyes elsewhere". Later at a reception I told President Jayewardene that I thought he had tendered good advice and as a Canadian I agreed with him.

I mentioned high interest rates. We all know that the United States Federal Reserve Board is using this policy to attract capital back into the United States rather than to fight inflation as is sometimes claimed. We in Canada are directly affected by the United States policy. The financial critics of the official opposition know this as well as we do. Others are affected besides those of us in Canada. Even the new socialist president of France has had to succumb to the devastating influence of this made-in-U.S.A. policy. Let us hope that the Economic Summit which is helping to push us out of town will be successful to some extent in modifying the high interest rate policy of the United States.

It is not necessary for pessimism to prevail about everything economic. There are also some very important aspects of Canada's present economic state which are extremely encouraging. I should like to mention three: Economic growth, employment and the deficit. There are signs of growth in the economy.

The spring update of the Economic Council of Canada indicated that the outlook for the Canadian economy is brighter now than it was last fall. The figures relating to the gross national expenditure, the GNE or the economy's total demand for goods and services, are more encouraging now even after taking the inflation rate into consideration. For example, the council now projects that for 1981 the GNE will increase by 2.9 per cent. Its previous projection last fall was only 1.4 per cent. For 1982 the council is talking about a 3 per cent increase, and for 1983 it is talking about a 4 per cent increase. Thus, we can see that a moderate recovery of the Canadian economy is expected over the next three years.

Also the Economic Council of Canada indicated that the productivity growth is likely to recover in the 1981-82 period, with an increase in manufacturing productivity of between 2 per cent and 2.5 per cent per year. In addition to these figures, the first economic forecast of the Conference Board of Canada for 1982 projected a decline in the rate of inflation between now and 1982, as well as some growth in exports and in business investment. In fact, it projects an increase in exports by 4.6 per cent next year, compared with only 1 per cent this year. That is economic growth.

The employment picture is also improving. For example, higher growth in employment is forecast over the first three years of this decade because of higher real economic growth. The economic council study indicated:

> From now through 1983, the economy should be able to generate enough new jobs to increase employment by about 3.1 per cent a year instead of the 2.3 per cent projected last fall.

Therefore, the unemployment rate is expected to decrease more rapidly from 7.2 per cent this year to 5.3 per cent by 1985. When we compare Canada's unemployment figures with those of the other OECD countries, we find that Canada is the only country with a jobless rate which decreased from the first quarter of 1980 to the first quarter of 1981.

An hon. Member: Now give us the rate of inflation.

Mr. Penner: Be patient my friend; I will come to that. Britain had an increase in that period of unemployment of 4.7 per cent under a Tory government. The United States had an increase of 1.2 per cent. Only Canada, among all the countries, had an actual decrease in its rate of unemployment.

Finally, I should like to refer to the federal deficit of $14 billion. It is a gross understatement to suggest that this is not a healthy situation. In fact, such a deficit ought to give all of us some sleepless nights. The spring update of the Economic Council of Canada once again provides some encouragement. It indicated that the projections of the federal government's fiscal position have changed dramatically since last fall, principally because of the government's National Energy Program. The Economic Council previously projected a deficit of 4 per cent of GNE in 1981 which would fall gradually to 1.3 per cent of GNE by 1990. In its spring report, the council forecast a deficit of approximately 2.4 per cent of GNE for 1981 instead of 4 per cent, and a surplus position by 1985 instead of a deficit of 2.5 per cent of the GNE. With those projections and figures and that kind of optimism, let us hope that the new budget in the fall will have no large tax increases for Canadians and that there will be no abandonment of the indexation of tax deductions. It is obvious that we do not need them.

It is about time for hon. members of Parliament to return home, to renew relationships with family and friends, to get back to their constituencies, and to enter actively into another aspect of our work—the listening phase. Perhaps if we listen well between now and October and hear what is actually being said rather than what we want to hear, our time here between October and Christmas may be very productive.

In conclusion, I want to express a word of commendation to Madam Speaker. Presiding over the House is seldom an easy task. Madam Speaker has demonstrated the most admirable of all human qualities—the capacity to grow on the job and to respond to the demands of the task. In my opinion, she presides over the House with wit and charm, with intelligence and grace. She is a credit to Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, good morning; it is now after midnight. I will not take too long, but I wanted to spend a few minutes to tell the House why we in this party intend to vote against the adjournment motion which was placed on the Order Paper by the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). I wish to do that by pointing out that yesterday the House leader of our party made a speech before a few of these events took place. At that time he said as we had instructed him, that our caucus had decided to support the adjournment motion in order to give Judge Gold a chance to get both sides together in the postal dispute and reach a mediated settlement. But our House leader also said during his remarks, as reported at page 11607 of Hansard:

● (0030)

I hope it is in order for me to say that I have been told there will be no closure on this motion, Mr. Speaker, and on that assumption and understanding we had said we would be supporting the government to adjourn the House.

As I said, a number of things have happened since then. First, at eight o'clock last night some 30 odd members of the Liberal Party came very quickly into the House, using some devious trickery and calling for the question to be put. This was very unfair. I think it showed the Liberal Party's lack of respect for Parliament and parliamentary traditions, something we did not expect. More important, last night at 9.45 p.m. we heard a Minister of the Crown introduce a motion for closure. For the first time in the history of Parliament we are seeing adjournment by closure. Because of that our House leader has recommended, and our caucus has supported voting against the adjournment motion at one o'clock this morning.

An hon. Member: You have only three members here.

Mr. Nystrom: I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, and I can tell from the interjections and heckling, that the Liberals have not learned to treat this institution with the respect it deserves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: A few years ago their leader said that once members of Parliament leave this place they become nobodies. The Liberals do not respect this institution.

We will have to reform Parliament to make it a more democratic institution in which members from all parties can have some real input into legislation. By bringing in closure the government slaps the face of this institution which is so important to the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Because of the government's action there is no way we can support adjourning the House. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, once again, I am called upon to rise before this hon. assembly, and I am always very happy to do so, especially since it is extremely important for the representatives of the Canadian people to be able to express their views in this place. Unfortunately, I am doing so under strange circumstances since, if my watch is right, today is July 18, 1981, and all the provincial legislatures have recessed and we should now be in our own constituencies speaking to our voters and meeting the people who elected us to learn about their needs and where we are going. You know, Mr. Speaker, it is always easy to try to get attention for all sorts of reasons. What I find most surprising in Parliament, where I have been for about 15 months, is that in addition to getting increasingly familiar with the system, because we learn as the months go by, I am now starting to know human nature somewhat better. And the more I know about those on the other side, the more questions I have to ask myself.

When a political party defines its ideas clearly, puts them forward, follows a policy and represents the people who elected it, one may say that democracy is being respected. One may say that politicians are true politicians. I can hear the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) laughing. I shall get to him, Mr. Speaker, I shall get to the right hon. member for Yellowhead because I am very concerned about him at this time. I would like the hon. Leader of the Opposition to note—

[English]

Mr. Paproski: The "Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition".

Mr. Gimaïel: The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition who is the successor of the Right Hon. John A. Macdonald, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker and many others.

[Translation]

Many others, from a long line of individuals who had a sense of what they owed to their country, who led a political party to help Canadians build a country, who wanted to give individual rights to Canadians, who came here with ideas and who fought for them. I had always thought that those were the men who were chosen as leaders of national parties. But unfortunately, this evening, I must admit that the most recent choice of the Progressive Conservative Party is not from this line, and I say so after 15 months of work, with no second thought, no malice and in all honesty. Why do I say so? To try to wake some people up. Certain tactics have been used in this House which I cannot accept as a member of Parliament representing 80,000 people in the constituency of Lac-Saint-Jean.

I have witnessed a boycott aimed simply at harming an institution which is sacred throughout the country, namely the House of Commons of Canada, which is the foundation of our democracy. No attempt was made to defend ideas when it was time to speak about the Canadian Constitution. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition simply blocked the proceedings by points of order, questions of privilege and all sorts of tricks that had nothing to do with the future of the Canadian people and nothing to do with our country.

Mr. Clark: Why don't you put the question to the people of Lac-Saint-Jean?

Mr. Gimaïel: Now that we are having a debate, now that we shall be going back to our constituencies to see to the needs of our people, what is happening? Once again, from his lofty height, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition tells us: Let us obstruct for all kinds of reasons! Now it is for a strike, later it will be for something else. It is simply unacceptable, Mr. Speaker, for the leader of a national party to behave in this way. It is intolerable that a man who was Prime Minister of Canada during nine months should act in such a way. We are now told that we should stay here to work. Name me, Mr. Speaker, one government who has done as much as we have done during the past 15 months. I only have to mention the Bank Act, the Canadian Constitution, the development of the prebuild, the purchase of F-18 planes, the manufacture of trucks, the complete re-equipment of the army, the consideration of Bill C-48 in committee. Those 15 months were well filled. What was the record of the previous government after 9 months in power?

It was a highly visible record that had consequences lately. Everything connected with Canada was affected. Loto-Canada was destroyed. Petro-Canada was going to be sold. They are against Canada Day, what they want is Dominion Day or Steinberg day. Well really, it is unthinkable. I ask the Leader of the Opposition to reconsider his position and his views. If the Leader of the Opposition wants to act as a juvenile, to play that mindless game without any planning or thought for the future, he should resign. I know some Progressive Conservative backbenchers who are deep thinkers and would make a major contribution to their country.

If he wants to carry on in the same way, I ask his colleagues to open their eyes. A country is not built in a day, Mr. Speaker, with party leaders who do not work for the future of their fellow-citizens, but merely to get some publicity out of major events occurring in this country. That is not the way to work. And if that two-third leader is not capable of making the Progressive Conservative Party regain its former strength at a time when its leaders came here to put forward ideas, then let him retire! There are backbenchers in that party who know where they are going. I could name a few, but I do not want to create problems. And if he does not have the guts to do so, let the Progressive Conservative members do their jobs. They were elected in their constituencies to give the people who elected them the leader they deserve. It is as simple as that.

I would not like to forget my friends from the Non Development Party and No Decision Party, I do not know how to call them. We had another nice experience today, yesterday or today, we do not know what time it is exactly, everything goes so fast, so many things happened after a fantastic job done, the honourable member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) decided to introduce an adjournment motion in order apparently to force us to come back next week. This is unbelievable. I asked myself, as a young politician, what can motivate a party to bring such a ridiculous idea when we know that everybody needs us in our constituencies. Just like that, at the last moment. I looked for an answer, and I found one I will share with you, Mr. Speaker. I am not sure it is the right one. Because the newspapers gave somewhat more attention to the Progressive Conservative Party because, as I said, of some type of hijacking, they decided to join in that same hijacking in order to get some publicity too. But there must be an end somewhere. I appreciate that the Leader of the New Democratic Party spends his time travelling between El Salvador and Canada, but at some point we will have to call him a bull rather than by his name. At some point we have to look at what is going on in this country. Canadian people have needs. I have some work to do. In fact, the 80,000 people I represent are my direct responsibility. I must go and visit 22 municipalities, meet their leaders.

An hon. Member: What a responsibility!

Mr. Gimaïel: That being so, if I am kept here simply because the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and the hon. leader of the second party of the opposition have decided that the House will sit longer, I feel that up to a point it is unfair towards the people, because if I lived here all year round as they do, if I did not go back to my riding frequently like them, then I would understand. I would tell myself, "they see my face often enough on TV, they see me often in the newspapers, I shall be re-elected anyway; it really does not matter." We can stay around longer and keep on talking; it is quite pleasant before the cameras; all's well, the cameras are there. But the truth of the matter is very different, because some hon. members in this House have to go back home every weekend, and work there, find out what their people think, find out what their needs are, and come back here and fight for those needs, to do their work and forge ahead.

In the last few months, the opposition parties, and specially the Progressive Conservative Party have gained some kind of momentum. If I dared, I would call it a type of constipation, in that every time we are about to achieve results with a bill, there is a hijacking or a filibuster akin to the juvenile reaction that moves pupils to take pleasure in disturbing the teacher in school when he is writing on the blackboard. The idea is about the same. No logic, no basic principles, no lofty ideas are put forward. Just a bit of BS. All that so they can say later on: We have done very well; we have managed to slow down the government. I say such actions are childish, immature.

An hon. Member: How true!

Mr. Gimaïel: Canadians deserve a better opposition than that.

It will have to be done one of these days because, if we do not find a solution, Canadians will open their eyes and realize that when an opposition party does not do its job in the House of Commons, in their ridings and elsewhere, the whole society pays for it. I now return to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, the former Prime Minister. True enough it is not interesting to become Leader of the Opposition again after having been the head of the country. But the fact remains that something very important is attached to that position and I hope the Leader of the Opposition will draw some inspiration from the long line of men who preceded him. I saw that same leader visit my riding in Chicoutimi and sign a petition sponsored by the Parti Québécois in support of sovereignty-association, against what was going on here in Ottawa. It is unacceptable that a party leader who claims to be a Canadian—

An hon. Member: A federalist.

Mr. Gimaïel: —signed a petition like that one, just as it is inadmissible that the leader of a Canadian party cannot accept that July 1 be called Canada Day, just as it is inadmissible that the leader of a Canadian party cannot accept Petro-Canada. It is unbelievable that the leader of a Canadian party put the axe to Loto Canada.

An hon. Member: It is true!

Mr. Gimaïel: The Leader of the Opposition can laugh, he can laugh, but I want to point out to him that he is beginning to saddle his colleagues with his own defeatist and negative approach. There is one member in the House for whom I have always felt much admiration and respect, and that is the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). Something happened yesterday which greatly disappointed me. I heard that same member say earlier today that we would have to sit between 6 p.m. and 8 p.m. because some members still had not had a chance to speak. It was enough to discourage me because at 8.20 p.m. last night that same House leader was not in his seat in the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: Quite true!

Mr. Gimaïel: He was not here, Mr. Speaker, he was not here!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel) has the floor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona on a point of order.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, we cannot hear him well, could he speak a little louder?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean has the floor.

Mr. Kilgour: Louder, Pierre!

Mr. Gimaïel: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona that last night, he spoke very loudly.

An hon. Member: He was alone, by the way.

Mr. Gimaïel: I was saying that I am sorry that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition said to us in this House tonight that he would like to sit between 6 and 8 p.m., instead of letting everybody out for dinner, as yesterday this same leader did not return until 8.20 and consequently the debate had to be postponed for 45 minutes. I think one should not go too far in pretending that everybody is cheated as far as the right to speak is concerned in this House. Let us not exaggerate. I feel I ought to emphasize that during the work of the committee, those poor Liberal members have to put up for long hours with the silly rethoric of the opposition parties, and after that they claim they are not given the opportunity to speak in this honourable House. Therefore, I think it is about time we become serious. Now if the government has decided that it is time for members to go home to their ridings, it is because their constituents have needs and this is a fact the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition should be aware of, as well as members of the New Democratic Party. The best advice I can now give Progressive Conservative members is to return to their constituencies and ask people what they think of the present leadership of their party. What do they think of what they are doing in the House at this time? Do they think they are doing anything constructive to develop their country? They will soon realize that apart from destroying a few ideas, from boycotting in a very childish and disorderly way, this way of abusing the openness of the parliamentary system of the English-speaking world, only stems from a lack of leadership which is rubbing off on the members who are supposed to work for the people.

As a representative of one particular region, I cannot accept that. I want to say something. The day I have reached that point I want my colleagues and my constituents to say to me: Pierre, stay home, we do not need you to go and cry in Ottawa. I came here with the purpose of building not destroying and, especially not to waste the time of those who want to work.

One thing I hope, Mr. Speaker, is that the light of understanding shine on everyone. This applies also to the New Democratic Party. Listen, gentlemen of the No Decision Party, there is a limit to going from left to right, from one side to another, to changing one's mind from one day to the other. That can do for a while, but then it becomes hijacking because we do not know what the party line is, if one indeed remains. At one point, one did not know whether the NDP was more concerned about—I was going to say El Salvador, not Labrador, that is too close to us, they are not concerned about those kinds of things—about El Salvador than the economy of our country. Other times, other issues, they change their minds almost every day.

Beside, it is of the utmost importance that this party should establish a party line because it means a lot to all the Canadian people; this is what makes a healthy democracy and it has never been anything else but that. And how can you explain that this government, the government of the Liberal Party of Canada has been in power for such a long time in this country? It is because this party has based all its policies on one premise, that is individual rights and freedoms and free access of the riches of this country to every Canadian, not just one class of Canadian, not just one generation of Canadians, not just one kind of Canadian but to all Canadians. But they will never understand that, that is impossible.

Mr. Speaker, when a party leader or when members are just the messengers of provincial premiers, where is that political party going if it is not to total destruction and this is forthcoming. And I say to my Progressive Conservative colleagues: Wake up because tomorrow you will be divided into ten parties with ten premiers to guide you. And you will then be facing a great and strong Liberal Party with a strong leader who is now going to lead the seven most powerful nations of the world into discussions with a view to achieving the security of the riches of this world so that everyone on this earth could share in them. Whatever those foot draggers may think, whatever the members of the Permanently Constipated Party may think—

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, whatever the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel) has been smoking, I think he should pass it around the House.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member, after reflection, would like to withdraw those remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to withdraw those remarks. This is the most enthusiasm I have seen in the Liberal party in a year and a half, and I congratulate the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: This has been an interesting session; a session when there has been tragedy in this country. The tragedy is that gas prices have risen from $1.07 to $1.60 when, in the last campaign, it was promised that they would be kept down. Interest rates have gone from 14 per cent to 20 per cent. Inflation has risen from 9.5 per cent to 12.8 per cent, which is the highest in modern times, and the dollar has fallen from 86 cents to 83 cents and below, as compared with the American dollar.

Probably the most positive thing that has happened in this session is that the Attorney General was awarded an honorary doctorate of law. That is about the most positive thing we can say about this entire session.

As a relatively new member of the House of Commons, I am very disappointed that the government keeps bringing in closure on important issues. It invoked closure on the Constitution. As the member for Brampton-Georgetown, I was unable to speak on that bill because of closure. Then it brought in closure on energy issues and now it has brought in closure because it wants to go on holidays. It is shameful, Mr. Speaker.

I listened to the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. McRae) and I listened to the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean and others telling me that that they have to go back to their ridings to listen to the people. I do not know where they have been for the last year and a half but when they get back to their ridings, they are going to get an earful. I have been going back to my riding every weekend to listen to what the people have to say.

That party over there is in a lot of trouble. If I belonged to it, I would not go back to my riding; I would stay in Ottawa.

I get great enjoyment from some of the pontifications and lectures from the other side, Mr. Speaker. Today we heard about how we opposed everything. That is not true, Mr. Speaker. We have supported good legislation. I have seen many bills get three readings in this House in a matter of an hour because it was good legislation and we were able to support it.

We oppose those things that are wrong for this country and we amend those bills that we feel we can make better. That arrogant government opposite does not listen but rams things through. If things do not go its way, then it wants to close the House down.

Yesterday, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) announced that there was to be mediation in the postal strike. I am glad of that and all of us in this House are glad of that. We hope it works and that they reach a negotiated settlement. I see the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) is present tonight and I am sure he would like to see a negotiated settlement so that he may enjoy a few days' rest.

But the Minister of Labour said that they cannot operate in mediation when we are looking over their shoulders. Mr. Speaker, every time this government goes to mediation, does that mean we have to close the House? Can we not operate and discuss other important bills? Just the other day the government House leader was telling everyone that there are 25 important pieces of legislation to be passed. We are prepared to discuss those while the mediation talks go on, but the government wants to get away. Hon. members opposite want to go on holidays. They got their pay raise, as we all did, but we are willing to stay here and work for it while they want to go off for the summer.

I see the chairman of the Quebec caucus hollering and hooting over there. I never see him on his feet. He always speaks from the seat of his pants. He does not have enough nerve to stand up. He is sitting on his best part.

I heard the Liberals say today that they cannot get the work of the House done. I have attended many committees, Mr. Speaker, where Liberals did not show up and it was not possible to have a quorum and carry on the meetings. I know why. All those guys on the back bench were putting pressure on the cabinet for a number of things, one of which was a summer holiday. They finally won. They fought the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) and the government House leader (Mr. Pinard) into closing the place down for the summer. That is a shame and it is disgusting.

• (0100)

We do not have postal service in this country, inflation is running rampant, energy prices are going up and people are suffering under the detrimental effects of a non-caring government and a cabinet that has hardly been here the last couple of weeks. They have been on holidays already.

An hon. Member: What has Jack Austin got on you guys?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, listen to hon. members over there. It is now three minutes past one. I get my full 20 minutes but they are calling for the vote now. They are in a real rush to get out of here. I am going to use my full 20 minutes. Let us take a look at the increased cost of energy. Since this government has been in power, it has raised the price of gasoline 13 times. In the province of Ontario it costs around $1.60 per gallon. I have listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) tell me they want another small piece of the pie. That is all they want. Right now, out of $1.60 per gallon the federal government gets 58 cents which is about 33 per cent. Now the federal government wants more. It is sad that most of the government's 33 per cent take is shipped out of the country to Saudi Arabia, Venezuela and Mexico.

Mr. Smith: And Brampton.

Mr. McDermid: I wish it were shipped to Brampton, we could use it in Brampton. We could use mail delivery in Brampton, too.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: Not only mail delivery when the Post Office is supposedly working, but some of those new subdivisions that have not had mail delivery for two years. They deserve it as well. What does the Postmaster General say? He tells people not to worry because when the Post Office becomes a Crown corporation, it will take care of them. I hope he is right because he has been telling that to everyone over here. He has been saying that the Crown corporation will solve all the problems of the Post Office. He has been putting a great deal of pressure on Michael Warren. I hope the Postmaster General is right, although I doubt it.

Mr. Benjamin: Do you want to stay next week?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown has the floor.

Mr. McDermid: We will sit next week. Hon. members opposite are the ones who are closing the place down. You want to stop the work of the House.

I want to get back to the price of energy because I think this government has been hoodwinking the peopie of Canada. I want the Prime Minister who is not here and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who is not here, to explain to the Canadian people why they want more and more of the energy pie. This government already takes 33 per cent. How much more does the government want?

An hon. Member: All of it.

Mr. McDermid: That is right.

The Prime Minister likes to call all the backbenchers nobodies. The reason he does that is that he does not give them an opportunity to speak. Nobody can speak in this House. Any time there is an important issue, the Prime Minister invokes closure. I know the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) is as embarrassed as anyone over there by the closures which have been brought in on at least two very important issues. This issue is as important as the Constitution and the energy discussions. What does this cynical government do? It appoints a backbencher to the Senate who has served in this House for a relatively short period of time. Then that cute little cherub from the Prime Minister's office is parachuted into Spadina because he could not get elected in Alberta, the province from where he comes.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He won't get elected in Spadina either.

Mr. McDermid: I tell you now we are going to put the boots to Coutts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: I see them all laughing over there. They think the great annointed from the Prime Minister's office, the laying on of the hands, is going to walk right in. Now I hear leather lungs from Newfoundland hollering. This is bothering them. They know this was a bad move. First, members over there are very upset at the Senate appointment. I see a hundred people over there who deserve it more than the one who got it—maybe not a hundred.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: At least the Liberals will have somebody with sex appeal now.

Mr. McDermid: We are going to win Spadina. We have a terrific candidate in the person of Laura Sabia. You can all smirk over there but wait until August 17.

An hon. Member: She will finish third.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Coutts will be back here. One of you lucky guys may get him as an assistant.

An hon. Member: Maybe even a secretary.

Mr. McDermid: I shouldn't tell you that because it will probably encourage you to work to get him elected.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I wish to draw to the attention of the hon. member that his remarks should be addressed to the Chair.

Mr. McDermid: Through the Chair, Mr. Speaker, we are going to put the boots to Coutts.

To sum up, we on this side are very disappointed. We have had a session where we have seen closure brought in three times on three of the major issues facing this country today. The small businessmen in my community, many of them whose cash flow has been cut to under 50 per cent, who are carrying stock at 22 per cent at the bank who cannot afford any more loans to pay their staff and are laying them off while this government says "go away, do not worry about it, if we need you, we will call you back. There is no emergency now."

There is an emergency in this country. It is a very serious one. It is called a postal strike and we have to solve it and solve it quickly.

We are prepared to sit here and discuss all the government business. Bring on the bills. I say to the government House leader, bring on the 25 government bills and we will debate them while mediation goes on. We want to stay here to be assured that the postal strike is solved this summer.

● (0110)

The little pink rump to my left is nattering away. We know that the government has a majority and that it is going to put the padlock on this place until October 14. It really does not care about what is going on in this country. It wants to get away from here because the heat is too much. They are getting out of the kitchen. They do not like the heat of the uranium cartel. There are too many things that are bothering them.

The government doesn't like the pressure with regard to VIA Rail. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) should be ashamed with what is going on with VIA Rail. It is disgusting. The government does not like to see interest rates around 20 to 22 per cent. It does not like questions about what it is going to do about it. The government does not like questions about what it is going to do about people living in AHOP developments who are being kicked out because they cannot go from an 8 per cent mortgage to an 18 per cent first, plus a second mortgage to pay back the loan that the government so graciously made to them in the first place.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. In accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 33, it is my duty to interrupt these proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Pinard) which was agreed to on the following division:

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. As we are breaking now for a long period of time I wonder if it might be appropriate if I express, on behalf of all members of the House, our thanks to all members of the staff—security, pages, officers at the table, the Hansard staff, and all of those who have served us so well and so faithfully and who have done their best to make our life here as comfortable as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, may I join the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton in the expression of good will which he has conveyed? I should like to add to those whom he has mentioned others who have served us—the press, who cover us in one way of another—

Some hon. Members: Boo!

Mr. Knowles: I referred to the press who have covered us in one way or another.

Finally, special greetings to Your Honour.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, besides those who have been mentioned by my colleagues from Nepean Carleton (Mr. Baker) and my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I should like to thank our pages who acquired quite an exceptional experience and who have been very useful to us. I wish to pay them tribute.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pinard: On behalf of the government, we should also like to thank all the press people who have to adjust their schedule to ours, as well as the families of all parliamentarians and all those whose work is related to that of the House, for their patience and understanding in the circumstances.

[English]

Madam Speaker: May I wish everyone a very happy holiday. I rejoice in the thought that their families will recuperate them. They must have thought they had lost them for all summer.

I also want to say goodbye to our pages who are just as sad to leave us as we are to see them go.

[Translation]

Have a nice holiday and may God be with you.

At 1.44 a.m. the House adjourned until Wednesday, October 14, 1981 at 2 p.m.
