Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works) moved that Bill C-13, respecting the relocation of government agencies, as reported (without amendments) from the Standing Committee of Miscellaneous Estimates, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I had understood that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) was going to make a statement on third reading. I had actually asked him about that, and he did indicate that he would.

Madam Speaker: I understand the minister will make a statement on third reading.

When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Cosgrove moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on previous occasions when speaking to this bill before the House I indicated that, in view of its long history before the House, the bill was one of a housekeeping nature rather than one of substance. In fact, the legislation really conforms with the physical facts that pertain and are in existence. In other words, those head offices—for example, the Economic Council of Canada, Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Canadian Transport Commission and the Public Archives—which were transferred to Vanier and Hull in recent years are not now in accordance with the technical legislation giving them their jurisdiction in the first place. Accordingly, the bill moves to put the legislation in accord with the actual physical location of these boards and commissions.

In addition to that, the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Pension Commission and the Pension Review Board are operating in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, and that is not in accord with the technical introductory provisions of the legislation giving rise to the jurisdiction exercised by those agencies.

I took the position that this bill was housekeeping. In fact, the legislation has been before the House, not only as legislation emanating from this government, but it was introduced by the former Conservative government through Bill C-22.

To refresh hon. members' recollection of the bill, I want to say a few words about it. The bill affects those departments or agencies which are subject by statutory requirements to having their head offices and to performing in the city of Ottawa. As I have indicated, the majority of these bodies have been moved to Vanier and Hull with the exception of the one to Prince Edward Island.

In the case of the Department of Veterans Affairs, instead of reading "rather than the head office shall be the national capital region", which would embrace the first commissions I mentioned, the amendment shall read: "or whatever place designated by the Governor in Council".

While the present bill is identical to Bill C-22, it differs from the previous bill C-23 in that all reference to the Farm Credit Corporation has been deleted. This change was introduced following the last government's decision in July 1979 not to relocate the Farm Credit Corporation to Camrose, Alberta. It was judged appropriate, therefore, to delete reference to that move in the present bill. If you do not think this is technical, I do not know what is. The bill is very short and plain. It is a housekeeping matter. This is the position the government has taken all along. With that, I rest the explanation of the legislation.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is not our intention to carry on debate on a bill which the minister described as housekeeping. But in terms of the issues involved, under which the act occurred, this is the act to develop "Fort Fullerton" in Hull. As you know, Mr. Speaker, being the member for Ottawa West, there were great difficulties with regard to the development of the city of Hull, a move that was and still is in some quarters regarded as a surreptitious move of departments across the river. They are there. The buildings are there. When I park my car in the morning, I see those buildings. There is nothing one can do about taking them down brick by brick and moving them back, even if one wanted to. I would not volunteer for the job.

I do not think the bill should be described merely as housekeeping. It is a major piece of legislation in the sense that it involves making legal that which is illegal. It will continue to be illegal until this bill passes here, goes to the Senate and receives royal assent. One wonders what causes of action there might be from the point of view of class actions if people felt like bringing actions with respect to the moving of head offices of government.

The minister was quite right when he said that our government had to look at the facts as they existed when we took office. We had to look at the realities. I do not know of anything that was handled in a more, to put it at its kindest, unusual way than the development of Hull. It was handled by the previous Liberal government almost without consultation between the Government of Canada and the local municipalities.

When the Portage bridge was to be developed, it was announced by Mr. Fullerton, then chairman of the National Capital Commission. It was going ahead and that was all there was to it. There had not been any consultation with the provinces of Ontario and Quebec or the local municipalities on either side of the river. It was a dreadful mess.

I want to quote what I said on second reading because it is important with the minister being in the House. This is what I said with respect to the relations that ought to exist in the national capital area with local governments. I said at that time, and I quote from page 2525 of Hansard July 2, 1980:

> So that members of Parliament will have no doubt about my feelings with respect to the matter, let me say quite frankly that I do not begrudge the good fortune of the city of Hull with regard to this development. However, I say to the House that the government handled it in a very ham-handed, unconsultative way. As a result of how it was handled, a great deal of misunderstanding developed in the national capital area. An opportunity for consultation which should have taken place with the provincial authorities, regional government and others, did not take place until after those moves were made.

I would feel much better if the minister would give an undertaking that this kind of thing will never happen again with respect to his government. I hope it would never happen with respect to any government formed by our party. It did cause difficulties and a great number of misunderstandings. There are still spillovers in the area.

The question comes up about what we should do about it. The buildings are there. In this bill we are looking to make legal what heretofore has been illegal. I am told there is a great deal of goodwill and consultation takes place at the staff level of the National Capital Commission with the local governments on both sides of the river. That is to be applauded.

I have felt for some time that things like this and other surprises can happen if there is not the same degree of consultation at the policy making level of the National Capital Commission. I intend in another session of Parliament to put down a private member's bill that will make room on the board of commissioners of the National Capital Commission for incumbents in the chairmanship of the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton and the Outaouais municipality so that both sides of the river are represented in this federal agency.

I must confess there is one disability with respect to that, and that is that I cannot provide in a private member's bill for any compensation, even for the usual daily expenses. I hope that when that private member's bill comes forward the government will grab hold of it and make it part of government policy. Is there any good, sound reason why, in an area such as Ottawa-Hull, the major landowner and therefore the major mover and shaker of events, the National Capital Commission, ought not to have represented on it representatives of the provincial governments which constitutionally have jurisdiction over property and civil rights, zoning and land use?

In the Outaouais region and the Ottawa-Carleton region, the planning process has been moved more and more away from the provincial governments and into those two regional municipalities. If the right hand is to know what the left hand is doing and if we are to have agreement and consensus with regard to how this area will be developed in the future, it is not unreasonable to suggest that all of the players should be at the table and understand one another.

The reason I would like the government to adopt this suggestion is that it can provide for the normal day-to-day expenses of a commissioner in the person of the chairman of each of those municipalities. I am not suggesting that the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton or the Regional Municipality of Outaouais must appoint that person, but there would be a place at the table for them. I suspect that if that were the case, they would take advantage of it. I can see no reason why they would not do that. I hope the minister will consider that matter even before my bill comes up. I am satisfied that a bill to amend the National Capital Act in that regard would get very swift passage in this House.

Since we are dealing basically with relocations within the National Capital Region, the question comes up as to where the moves should occur. There has been a tremendous concentration in the centre of the city of Ottawa and the centre of the city of Hull, the core of the National Capital Region, by the federal government. In some respects the land use planning of the National Capital Commission and the local governments have collided rather than colluded. That is to be regretted.

I want to call the minister's attention with respect to relocation to the fact that there are official plans of local municipalities within the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton, and I dare say within the Outaouais region, which have within the terms of the planning process provision for the location of government agencies, whether head offices or otherwise. There are some now within the city of Nepean and I know more would be welcomed. The official planning of the city of Kanata with an industrial park, the official planning of the township of Goulbourn, again with provisions for industry, have been designed to welcome that kind of location in those areas. I know the city of Nepean is anxious for a site to accommodate high technology development, and this involves consultation between the two levels of government, the local and the federal governments.

There is an attempt being made to diversify the employment and assessment base within this area. In fact, within the National Capital Region we have the potential for the second growth industry in Canada, energy being the first, the second being high technology. It would be helpful to all those areas in terms of commitment by the Government of Canada to have a demonstrated commitment to the growth of the area as a whole rather than to particular municipalities, not denying them anything to which they are entitled. It is important that the Government of Canada make some commitment in those areas. I know the electoral district of Ottawa-Carleton, taking in as part, as it does, the township of Gloucester, is suitable and I would hope that the Department of Agriculture might look at sites in the officially planned municipalities of Osgoode. Rideau township now has some with respect to Parks Canada, and there are places for other kinds of agencies of the Government of Canada.

What I am trying to say is that I would like the National Capital Commission, the Government of Canada, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) and others to concentrate their thinking in terms of planning not merely on the core of the National Capital Region, but rather to look out into the regions of the national capital. I can speak, I think, for the municipalities on this side of the Ottawa river, and other members can speak for municipalities on the other side because they know the cases more intimately. This is something I would ask the minister not to lose sight of as he deals with the very important program of planning the national capital, because this bill makes legal something which, when it was brought about, had a great effect, not just in terms of the movement of people but certainly in terms of the development, indeed the well-being, of the central part of the city of Ottawa and Ottawa-Carleton.

It is for that reason that I have joined with the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) and the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) in trying to assist as best I could the Government of Canada in making a decision regarding the Rideau Centre. That kind of development, the convention centre which will follow it and the hotel that will come, can do great things for the central core of this area, and from that pebble being dropped in this lake the ripples of advantage can flow out across the area.

If we are to develop, whether in terms of high technology industry, the tourist industry, or even in terms of other forms of employment for our young people, this will take a great deal of co-ordination by all levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal. This will take a vow by governments, whether formed by the Liberal party or the Progressive Conservative party, that never again will we allow to take place development in the way in which there is no consultation whatsoever, which causes such great upset. That is what we are trying to make legal here by the passage of this bill.

As I said at the outset, it is not our intention to hold up the passage of this bill unnecessarily. I felt I wanted to put that case to the minister, and I intend to keep putting it to this government at every opportunity.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words about Bill C-13 before the House today and I shall be brief.

Much of the bill is basically symbolic, although it deals with a number of very important moves made in the past. I want to associate myself at the beginning with the words of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), who talked about the lack of consultation before the move to Hull. I can remember not only concern by people on the Ottawa side of the river, but a lot of concern by people on the Quebec side. I remember the 1976 election campaign in Quebec, for example, when the move was an issue in the local Hull constituency, and was one of the reasons a lot of the people in that constituency voted against a long time Liberal member and voted for the Parti Québécois, electing to the National Assembly a friend of mine, Jocelyne Ouellette. One of the issues was the relocation of federal buildings without adequate consultation with the government of Quebec, which by the way was the government of Mr. Bourassa in those days, and the city of Hull. The federal government failed to practice what I call, and perhaps this is a new term, democratic federalism. The very essence of democracy is to involve people and consult them before one makes very important decisions. I hope in the future that kind of consultation will be carried on automatically by the government of this country.

For example, many people in that part of Hull were moved out of their homes very quickly. There was not adequate compensation in many cases. Neighbourhoods were destroyed and people were dispersed throughout the city and throughout the Outaouais. I think that is a very sad reflection on the predecessor of the present minister who now occupies the position.

In terms of the bill itself, it is essentially changing the name of the city of Ottawa as it pertains to the Economic Council of Canada and other agencies and the location of head offices of these agencies in the National Capital Region. We have moved now to the concept of a National Capital Region, which I and members of this party support. The reason for that is that the national capital must be as reflective as possible of the country. It is very important that we recognize in this country that we have many cultures, that we have a very diversified Canada with two official languages, English and French. Since Ottawa is right on the border of Ontario and Quebec, it is very important that a number of the head offices be located on the Quebec side. I believe that could be very, very important indeed.

I think it is also important to say a word or two about reforms of this nature in the years to follow. I have already mentioned the importance of consultation, which the government has not done adequately in the past. We should look at reforms to our institutions in this country which serve all of Canada, that serve that federation, and we should have as an objective as members of Parliament making these institutions as national and as reflective as possible of the country as a whole. Too often that does not occur, though they are more reflective now, perhaps, because some of them are in Hull and the people who work there may be more aware or cognizant of the French fact in this country.

I believe we must make more of an effort not only to have Francophones in the senior echelons of the public service, where they are still underrepresented, but also to bring into government and our national institutions people from other areas of the country, such as northern Canada. There should be more Indian and metis people, western Canadians and people from Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Lalonde: And Saskatchewan?

Mr. Nystrom: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) says even people from Saskatchewan. Perhaps. We have done very well. There are many ex-CCF public servants who now run many agencies of government. One is Al Johnson, who is head of the CBC, and there are many others indeed.

Mr. McKenzie: What a mess the CBC is in.

Mr. Nystrom: No comment.

Mr. Knowles: The Saskatchewan mafia.

Mr. Nystrom: As my colleague says, the Saskatchewan mafia. I believe an effort must be made to bring people from all parts of the country into the centre of the country rather than having ideas from the centre being imposed on the various areas and regions of Canada.

In the same vein we should look seriously at reforming some of our national institutions to make them reflect better the country as a whole. With respect to constitutional change, perhaps some members of the Supreme Court should be appointed by the provinces and perhaps the directors of the Bank of Canada should be appointed in part by the provinces. Because what the provinces do is very important in relation to the court and in the case of the Bank of Canada when it comes to monetary policy. These institutions should be made to reflect the country—to be a mirror of the country—and I think in some cases that is not as much the case as it should be.

The last matter upon which I want to touch briefly deals with the whole question of decentralization. I believe an effort should be made to decentralize more federal government departments to various areas across the country so there is more of a federal government presence in the regions. I am talking about decentralizing relevant departments or relevant departmental agencies. For example, it made sense to locate the head office of Petro-Canada in the city of Calgary, the oil capital of the country. I think it would make sense to do some more relocation of that sort in other areas. Perhaps there should be more decentralization of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to Atlantic Canada or to British Columbia. Perhaps there should be more decentralization of the Department of Agriculture to the prairies than is presently the case. Other departments could be relocated and decentralized in order to bring the government closer to the people of all regions and to make government more relevant to the citizens of each and every province.

I did not want to take up too much time, but I did want to make those two or three comments. I think it is important to make the institutions of our country more national and to look very seriously at a well-planned program of decentralizing some of the departments and agencies of departments of the federal government.

The last point I should make is that when departments are decentralized it is important that we do not replace one bureaucracy of a department which was here in Ottawa with another one. Let us not duplicate services. Let us make sure the services are available, but let us not build empires. In a modern society of high technology and sophisticated communications it does not make much difference whether the Department of Agriculture operates its major functions in the province of Manitoba, for example, in Saskatchewan or here in the city of Ottawa. With mass communication it does not make any difference at all. We can now communicate instantaneously right around the world. I think the government and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) should look seriously at a program of relocating more of the agencies of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak just for a few moments on Bill C-13 respecting the relocation of government agencies. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) pointed out that this is more than a housekeeping bill and that the government could use it for moving other government departments. I want to comment on a couple of points the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) missed with respect to this bill, and I will do that in a minute.

I am interested in making a few comments on the move of the veterans pension commission to Prince Edward Island and the serious problems that is causing for the department and especially for veterans. This is covered under Part II, which deals with the Pension Act. There is a reference to the Statutes of Canada, P-7, which is a direct reference to veterans affairs and the Canadian Pension Commission. In addition, the Department of Veterans Affairs is very much affected by the Public Archives Act.

Another point the minister did not cover is that if we are going to be moving government departments either across the river or across the country, it causes very serious problems for the departments concerned if staff do not want to move. The matter whether employees have to move if a government department is being moved was raised just a few weeks ago in the Public Accounts Committee. Mr. Brittain, the deputy minister of veterans affairs, gave the following answer to the Public Accounts Committee:

—there is indeed nothing to force a person to stay in his or her job or to resign. There is no job guarantee for the people who choose not to move to the Island. Under the Public Service Employment Act, there is a provision that they be looked at first by other departments who are recruiting. If they have the qualifications to meet the requirements, then they are offered the job. That is the way the Public Service Employment Act and regulations are written. They have no trouble finding jobs.

It is fine that the employee has no trouble finding a job. The trouble in connection with the veterans pension commission is that the chairman of the commission cannot find suitable people as replacements, and he has to hire new people. Many of the new people do not want to move. It now takes up to five years to process veterans' applications. It is all very well for the government to be moving government departments around, but then heads of departments cannot find suitable people to run the departments. There is no advantage to anyone in a situation like that. We are losing all of the expertise in the Department of Veterans Affairs. The staff do not want to move to Prince Edward Island and we are not getting any clear-cut answers from the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs as to what he is going to do about it. In the standing committee he always tries to slough it off on his officials. He will not commit himself to anything.

I want to refer to an explanation given by the chairman of the Canadian Pension Commission, Mr. Solomon, at the last meeting of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. He pointed to the problems he is experiencing with the Canadian Pension Commission going to Prince Edward Island. The government will have to consider seriously leaving the Canadian Pension Commission here in Ottawa. Mr. Solomon made a statement to the press today that things will get worse. We cannot accept that things will get worse at the veterans pension commission.

Mr. Solomon pointed out in the committee, and I quote:

—the question that was directed to me really related to the staffing problem and whether we are going to continue to have this problem with respect to the Prince Edward Island move. Certainly, as far as the pension commission is concerned, there is no doubt that we have had a very severe staffing problem. We believe the staffing problem has been caused, in the main, by the fact that members of the staff and, unfortunately, trained members of the staff, do not want to go to Prince Edward Island and have left or are leaving or are planning on leaving.

Where does that leave him? That leaves him holding the bag, and he does not know how to correct the problem.

I am not through with that issue. I was not satisfied with the answer I received from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on Tuesday, so I have written him a rather lengthy letter respecting the serious problems with the move of the Canadian Pension Commission to Prince Edward Island. I hope the Prime Minister will take a serious look at the issues I raised in my letter to him. I will not go into all the details of that here this afternoon; I just wanted to highlight the problems we have with respect to moving government departments.

If we move a government department just across the river to Hull or a little further into Quebec, there are language training problems and problems respecting the language laws of the province of Quebec. Several civil servants who were to be transferred to the province of Quebec have come to me with very serious concerns about whether their children would be able to learn in English. These things have to be taken into consideration.

With respect to the Public Archives, the Canadian Pension Commission requires access to service documents which are held in Ottawa in the personnel records centre of the Public Archives. They are walking over there across the street practically every day, I should imagine, to go through the archives for detailed information on a veteran's background. I do not know what they are going to do if they all move to Prince Edward Island. Somebody mentioned we have great communication today; I do not know whether they are going to be phoning the archives every day to rummage through the files to find out where some veteran was in 1939 or 1940. The government is certainly going to have to think about that.

They have certainly found a way of streamlining pension applications in the United States, Mr. Speaker. There it takes only 60 to 90 days to process an application, whereas in Canada it takes from one to five years. In fact, we have evidence of some which will take up to six years to process. Mr. Solomon is in an impossible position with the commission move to Prince Edward Island and, as he says, it is going to get worse, not better.

So I hope the Minister of Public Works will take into consideration the Public Service Employment Act regarding employees who do not have to move if they do not want to. If we are going to have a policy of decentralization and only about 5 or 10 per cent of employees want to move, I do not know how we are going to have room for all the civil servants here when their department goes. We are going to hire staff there, untrained, and I certainly would not want to be a head of a pension commission or government department with an arrangement like that. I think the government is going to have to take a serious look at the Public Service Employment Act in that respect.

I thought these points should be put on the record this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, in regard to these bills. I hope the Prime Minister, the Minister of Public Works or the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs will come up with some answers in the very near future, especially for the veterans service organizations across Canada who are deeply concerned, and for the many veterans who are dying off before their pension claims can be processed.

[Translation]

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking part in the debate on Bill C-13, but after listening to the comments made by the hon. members for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), I feel that I must make a few comments. I appreciate the concern of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. Of course, he is looking after the interests of his constituents, but the fact that the cities of Hull and Gatineau are also included in the National Capital Region, is always overlooked. As for the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, he referred to the election of 1976 and said that the construction of federal buildings was partly to blame for what occurred. I must point out to him that the constituency of Papineau did not get any new large buildings and still elected a PQ member. There was a general feeling of discontent in the province, and there still is. We shall try to fight against it, but not by saying that constructing new buildings in the province of Quebec is one of the reasons why the people voted for the PQ in 1976, and perhaps also in 1981.

At this time, I would like to tell the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) that it is unfortunate that the government thought about crossing the Ottawa River and forgot to do the same for the Gatineau River because it is also part of the National Capital Region. I would ask my hon. colleague, the Minister of Public Works, to go around Rockcliffe and to look across at my constituency, and then to cross the Ottawa and Gatineau Rivers, drive along Jacques Cartier Street and look at Rockcliffe; he will note a very big difference between the two towns.

Let the government keep up the good work! I approve of this bill. Let us hope, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. minister will not forget the constituency of Gatineau in the future.

[English]

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a few words concerning an aspect of this bill that has been brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie). I am sure all of us agree that, whatever views we may have had about the move of the Department of Veterans Affairs to Charlottetown, that move is so far along that there is no point now in arguing it should not have taken place or should be stopped. However, I do want to underscore the view that this should not be allowed to work against the needs of our veterans.

The fact of the matter is, as has been stated by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine, that the handling of cases by the Canadian Pension Commission is not catching up as we thought for a number of years would be the case. It is really admitted that one of the problems is in getting personnel to move to Prince Edward Island who are capable of handling this type of work. For one thing, a great many doctors are required to assist the commission in its job. It has even been suggested to me that it will take more doctors to do the work of the commission than it takes to meet the needs of all the people of Prince Edward Island. After all, it has a pretty small population.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said at the start, I am not complaining about the move. I had my doubts about it to begin with but it is an accomplished fact, but let us not make the veterans pay the price of it. Let us not take the view that this move must be made in a way that saves money. If it is the government's position that departments and agencies are to be centralized in various parts of the country, that may cost some money and it may cost money to engage doctors and additional staff and specialists in veterans affairs to handle these cases. I urge very strongly that this be given consideration not just by the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs, but by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), indeed by the whole cabinet.

It has been very interesting to me across the years to note the way in which the Royal Canadian Legion and other veterans' organizations adjust their priorities according to the needs of the time. It is only in the last few years that they have put the concerns of widows right up at the top. I hope the whole House is aware of that concern through my raising the question so often.

The number two issue in the recent brief of the Royal Canadian Legion and other veterans' organizations was the time it is taking to deal with cases that come before the commission. As I say, Mr. Speaker, now is not the time to assess the blame for that situation, but it is a fact and the veterans should not be made to suffer. I hope the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) and the Minister of Finance will realize that the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs is making a very valid request when he asks for more money so that doctors and other necessary personnel can be employed in order that the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Canadian Pension Commission in Charlottetown can do the job that our veterans, their families and survivors deserve to have done for them.

Mr. McKenzie: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I just want to clarify my position. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) referred to the move of the Department of Veterans Affairs to P.E.I. I just want to make it perfectly clear that I was just referring to the pension commission and their problems with the move. I was not referring to the department's moving. I just want to clarify that.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

SUPERANNUATION AMENDMENT ACT, 1981

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING EARLY RETIREMENT OF AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-65, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act in respect of the early retirement of air traffic controllers, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to propose that the Public Service Superannuation Act be amended to establish special pension arrangements for air traffic controllers. These proposals will introduce, for the first time, pension arrangements which are particular to employees in a specific occupation. The problems of the optimum career pattern for air traffic controllers, their early retirement, and alternative career opportunities have been, as hon. members know, significant issues for many years. The new pension arrangements will facilitate the management of the controller work force and ensure fair treatment for controllers who must be removed from operational service or who have spent many years as operational controllers.

Although controllers' wages and other working conditions already recognize the unique nature of their duties, experience has shown that many operational controllers cannot cope with the demands of operational air traffic control up to the time of normal retirement. Much like professional athletes, air traffic controllers must be in top physical and mental condition. Anything less would compromise air safety and would be clearly unacceptable. At least once a year, air traffic controllers are required to pass complete medical examinations and demonstrate technical proficiency in order to continue to operate as controllers.

[Translation]

Controllers certainly have shorter careers than other civil servants. A number of countries, including Belgium, France and Switzerland, already offer their controllers special retirement schemes. The Americans introduced in 1972 a complete early retirement plan which we have used as a model. The proposals submitted today are part of a program put together by the Department of Transport with the assistance of the controllers' union, the Canadian Air Traffic Control Association. Their purpose is to help, through an integrated scheme, air traffic controllers to prepare for a second career through retraining or to seek a new position, allowing them to collect the whole or any part of the pension benefits to which they are entitled by way of compensation for their loss of income.

The Department of Transport now provides capability assessment services, vocational guidance and retraining courses to controllers who are retired automatically after at least ten years of operational service. The retraining program has only been available recently. Its effectiveness, therefore, cannot be assessed as yet, but my colleague the Minister of Transport and the controllers themselves appear to be quite satisfied with the early results.

[English]

The pension part of the program is contained in Bill C-65, which provides for early retirement for air traffic controllers and, under special circumstances, for the payment of partial pensions while continuing work. The proposed pension arrangements will provide a means whereby controllers can be removed from air traffic control—or can voluntarily remove themselves—without severe economic penalty when the state of their health or technical proficiency might affect their performance and compromise the safe and efficient movement of air traffic. Because the government agreed to the pension proposals in the early part of 1976, the new benefits will be available to any eligible controller who left operational service on or after April 1, 1976. In return for these special pension features, controllers are to make an extra 2 per cent contribution to the pension plan, to be matched by the government as employer.

The proposals in Bill C-65 were included as part of the pension legislation introduced in the House on October 26, 1978. However, as hon. members know, that legislation was only at report stage when Parliament was dissolved on March 26, 1979. The air traffic controller provisions had received general approval at that time, with the exception of deferred indexing of the special benefits and the requirement in certain circumstances for the extra 2 per cent contribution.

I will deal with indexation in a few minutes, but first I would like to explain the problems created by the additional contributions. During committee hearings on the previous bill on the public service superannuation, the president of the Canadian Air Traffic Controllers Association stated that many members of the association were against paying additional contributions of 2 per cent after the age of 55 and 30 years of pensionable service. According to him, those employees were already entitled to full pension under the existing provisions of the Public Service Superannuation Act and the additional contributions would not translate into more benefits for them. On the other hand, since it is indeed a group plan, it seems contradictory that certain controllers be exempted from paying the additional contributions. Therefore, the government has decided to wait until the new plan has proven itself before making a decision.

[English]

The bill now before this House therefore requires that all controllers in operational service make the extra 2 per cent contribution. However, I would point out that no retroactive contributions will be required for the period between April 1, 1976, and the date of enactment. The 1978-79 pension bill proposed that controllers make the contribution for the first nine months of the retroactive period. However, for reasons of equity primarily, and administrative difficulties secondarily, it has been decided that the requirement for employee contributions for the first nine months should be waived.

I spoke a few moments ago, Mr. Speaker, about the indexing arrangements in the earlier bill, which had as one of its general proposals that there would not be any cost of living adjustments paid before age 60, except for disabled pensioners and survivors. CATCA, that is, the union, argued strongly and convincingly that there should be immediate cost of living adjustments for air traffic controllers who are removed from their position. The present bill therefore includes such a provision, and is also less restrictive than in the earlier bill for employees who leave of their own accord. I would add, Mr. Speaker, that these indexing arrangements are in line with the original 1976 agreement.

Apart from these two exceptions on contributions and indexing and some technical fine tuning, the bill before us is essentially the same as the proposals presented in 1978. As in 1978, we are proposing that any employee with at least ten years of operational service who is moved from air traffic control be allowed to retire on a reduced pension, or draw a partial pension while remaining employed in some other capacity. Employees required to leave after at least 20 years of operational service would be eligible for a partial pension if they move to another job, or if they retire from the public service altogether for an unreduced immediate pension.

Controllers are required to leave operational work if, for example, they cannot meet the medical requirements of an ATC licence, if they have lost their technical proficiency, or if management is concerned that continued service would seriously jeopardize their physical or emotional well-being.

[Translation]

Controllers aged 45 or more who want to retire after at least 20 years of operational service would be entitled to a reduced pension as soon as they resign from the public service. Controllers aged 50 or more with 25 years of service would be paid full pension. Those who voluntarily leave the service in the operational service would not get any partial pension.

[English]

As hon. members know, we are examining a number of the features of the public service pension plans with an eye to possible change. I have already indicated our intention to prorate the first cost of living adjustment for anyone retiring on or after January 1, 1981, and we plan to introduce further amendments at a future date. But the provisions in this bill cover pension arrangements for air traffic controllers only. They are designed to recognize the need for earlier retirement and to preserve the safety and efficiency of the air traffic control system. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member who just sat down knows, there has been a great deal of discussion about this bill and the importance of it to air traffic controllers over the last number of years. If one were to ask an air traffic controller what he thought about this bill in terms of its introduction, he would say that it is long overdue. I do not say that in the sense of any criticism, because I know how these things happen. However, that is what he would say.

I think that all members of the House who look at the bill as described by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) would have to say that it contains a great element of fairness. It recognizes the peculiar nature of the work of air traffic controllers, work which has stresses which few of us could imagine unless we were placed in their shoes, and that is impossible. However, anyone who knows an air traffic controller or a group of them and has spoken to them knows the peculiar strains which their work can have on their health and ability to function. Therefore, somehow or other, the government has had to marry the concept of safety on the one hand, which is important, with the idea of fairness on the other. The third concept is the recognition of the facts as they apply to a particular profession.

We have a special bill. What do we do with that bill? It is possible for us to debate the bill this afternoon and send it to a committee where it can be studied; but I think that would be most unfair. I think it is the kind of bill which should be dealt with here and now, today, in a Committee of the Whole House, and we can do that later on this afternoon. Then it should move immediately into the third reading stage and the bill should move out of this place into the Senate. It is a bill which has been around for a long period of time and I think it serves, quite appropriately, a group which need assistance in a particular way because of the nature of their work.

During the course of his remarks, the minister made a statement with respect to a program within the Department of Transport on the retraining of air traffic controllers, who are people who still want to function within the public service. He indicated as well that it was a matter, the efficacy of which he could not as yet comment on because it was quite new. Speaking for my own party, I hope that a year from now we can have a statement from the minister, whether or not it is in the House of Commons, about how that program of retraining is working. There are great changes, and not just this one, having to do with health as it relates to safety in transport. However, there are great problems within the public service, of which Your Honour is well aware, problems of change as government programs change and priorities change and as restraint takes hold, which involve the shifting of public servants from one occupation to another within the public service.

I have spoken in the House of Commons previously about the necessity of training. The government has made statements with respect to the necessity of training and retraining these people in order that public servants will not be victimized by change. I hope that while the President of the Treasury Board will be assessing the particular training problems which affect the licensing of air traffic controllers, and the strictness which must be observed so that public safety can be protected in terms of that licensing, he will also not let his attention stray from the importance of developing, within the public service, retraining programs for public servants who find themselves caught in a process of change which seems to be moving rather quickly.

There have been consultations with various associations, I know. The president of CATCA spoke to me the other day and indicated the importance of this bill to the members of his association. I have looked at this problem before, and I can only say "hear, hear" to what he told me on the telephone.

Therefore, I am glad that the bill is brought forward today. I am very pleased to be able to say, on behalf of our party, that in order to speed it through so that it can get through the legislative process as quickly as possible, we are prepared to deal with the bill in Committee of the Whole this afternoon and go on to third reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has suggested that the bill be considered in Committee of the Whole instead of being referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. This would require the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I was going to make that suggestion, so we agree to it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: So ordered.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, thank you for taking care of that point so that we can deal with this bill today, through all of its stages so far as this House is concerned. Since the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) has referred to his conversations with CATCA, since the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has indicated that he, too, has had a conversation with CATCA, if I then say I had the same conversation, it sounds as though CATCA is pretty effective. It is satisfied, more or less at least, with the provisions of this bill. It has come out of what amounts to collective bargaining discussions. I think that since there has already been a couple of years of delay, there should not be any further delay and we should put this bill through today.

I welcome very strongly the idea that there are certain kinds of employment which create so much stress and strain that earlier retirement should be considered. I think that that principle, so far as this bill connects it to air traffic controllers, who are public servants, is a good one. We are glad to see it implemented in this legislation.

I have studied the bill which is before us. It seems to me that the various provisions, such as the arrangements where the service is ten years, 20 years or 25 years, are satisfactory. I believe that the minister's explanation about the extra 2 per cent is a reasonable one, at least until the whole matter can be reviewed.

Therefore, as I say, we welcome this bill. We are quite prepared, after it has been given second reading, for it to be dealt with in the Committee of the Whole, and by leave of the House, to be given third reading today as well.

There are times in this House when a bill to amend a statute creates a desire in the hearts of some of us to get into other phases of the statute than those mentioned in the bill. That can lead to procedural arguments and to stress and strain for the Chair, to the point where he thinks he should have early retirement as well. However, I do not intend to digress. I do not intend to get into the Public Service Superannuation Act generally. Even so, there is one point which is brought to a head by this ealier retirement for certain people which I want to mention. Then there is one other point which the President of the Treasury Board mentioned on which I should like to make a comment. I hope Your Honour will agree that I am staying within the confines of this particular piece of legislation.

As I say, this bill provides for a number of people to have earlier retirement. That is bound to increase the number of cases where a retired public servant marries after retirement and then finds that when he dies there is no pension for his widow. That is a rule in many pension plans. It is a rule in the Public Service Superannuation act across the board. It is the rule in the pension act that applies to members of Parliament. It is a rule in railway pension plans, and so on.

However, many a person comes up against this and is quite surprised. Many a retired person says, "I have worked all those years, I contributed to the fund. My first wife died some years ago; I married again just after I was retired. But no matter how many years my second wife may have looked after me, there is no pension for her."

• (1630)

I suggest that this situation is becoming more and more one that has to be looked at, partly because longevity is increasing and retirements are taking place earlier. There are more cases of these marriages. I should not call them second marriages and I always write back to these people and tell them the problem is not because there is a second wife involved, it is that the marriage took place after the man's retirement. A first wife, if married after retirement, would not qualify and a second wife married before retirement would.

The number of people that this affects is increasing, partly because of longevity and partly because of earlier retirement, and I think the problem has to be addressed, Mr. Speaker. I wrote a letter at some length on this subject to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) some time ago because it came up in some House business discussions. He assured me that he would send copies of my letter to the President of the Treasury Board, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne), the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) and others who have these plans before them.

I raise this point now to ask the President of the Treasury Board to address himself to the problem in any further reviews of the Public Service Superannuation Act that take place. The problem is already there. I have raised it a good many times. A number of years ago when we were in committee on the Public Service Superannuation Act, I thought we had almost got to the point where we were going to remedy the situation but the government backed off.

As I say, the problem has increased through early retirement and greater longevity and it is an issue that the minister should consider. Perhaps when we are in Committee of the Whole on the bill he might answer this representation on my part even if all he can say is that he will study it a little more than it has been studied in the past. I hope that at least he will do that.

Still complying with my own stricture that we deal only with what is in this bill, I draw attention to the fact that, in referring to Bill C-12 of a couple of years ago, the President of the Treasury Board noted that it contained a provision to adjust the first indexation that takes place in January after a public servant retires in order to put it on a prorata basis. The minister says that the government has already announced that it intends to do that this year, making it effective as of January 1, 1981. I was not surprised when I heard that announcement because, as I say, it was part of Bill C-12, which we considered in the Thirtieth Parliament.

I should like to make this point to the President of the Treasury Board before he pushes that matter too far. Plausible though it may sound to give a public servant who retires in November or December a much smaller increase in January than would be given to the person who had the whole year, that would have been acceptable in the days when inflation was not so severe and when the changes over the last six years of employment were not so great. In other words, when those changes were not so great, and when a public servant retired with, say, 30 years of service, which would give him 60 per cent, it was 60 per cent of the average pay for those last six years, and the average of those last six years was not very much below what he was making at the point of retirement.

At the present time, however, in a public servant's final six years there can be a tremendous increase in his salary over what it was in retirement minus six to what it was at the point of retirement. When he is given only 60 per cent for 30 years' service or 70 per cent for 35 years, on the average of those six years he will receive a much greater drop from his pay in the last year he was working to his superannuation than has been the case over the years. I know that public servants who are concerned about this will admit that it sounds plausible to go for this pro rata basis but, say, by retiring in November or December the little bit of bonanza they get in January makes up for the other.

I will tell the President of the Treasury Board that I am not asking for it both ways. I am not asking to change the six-year basis and keep the bonanza. If he cannot change the six-year basis, however, then they have a right to think that the bonanza, as I have called it, is something to which they are entitled.

I would urge that the minister be very careful about removing that right to full indexation in January before he does something about the six-year average. If he will change that, I think it has to come down to two or three years. Then I would say that it would be quite fair that the first indexation would be on a pro rata basis. I hope that the minister will look at that very carefully.

I have been asked a few times why it is that some of us do not ask as many questions about public service superannuation as we used to. I suppose the plain fact of the matter is that we did not want to put ideas in the minister's head to do things to restrict the Public Service Superannuation Act. We still want improvements. We want the two or three-year average. We want the corrections with regard to wives as survivors where a marriage takes place after retirement. We want guarantees about the maintenance of indexation. In fact, I have said many times, and it has been said by Liberals too, that the answer to those who complain about public servants getting indexation is not to cut it back or take it away from them, but to legislate indexation for all pensions plans.

I must not carry on much longer, Mr. Speaker, or you will say that I am violating my own stricture that this is a restricted bill. I leave it at that. We welcome early retirement for air traffic controllers. We think the arrangements set out in the bill are good and fair. They are certainly acceptable to the Canadian Air Traffic Controllers' Association. We are happy to see the bill go through all the way today, but I hope the minister will give consideration to the other points to which I have referred.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Francis in the Chair.

Clauses 2 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 1—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, since Clause 1 is the title and is general in nature, I wonder if the President of the Treasury Board would give me an answer to, or make a few comments on, some of the points that I raised. I refer especially to the point that is brought into the open by this early retirement bill, namely, the right of the survivor of a pensioner to a survivor's benefit, even though the marriage may have taken place after the date of retirement.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member mentioned during the course of his remarks, the whole area of survivor benefits is one that we are addressing. I think there are a number of areas besides the specific one which he has brought to our attention this afternoon which must be examined. I noted with interest and will pay heed to the suggestions he has made. I cannot guarantee that we will move as far as he would like in many of these areas but his point with respect to the increasing number of early retirements, and perhaps the increasing incidence of persons marrying after the date of retirement, is one that should be examined.

The hon. member touched on a number of other points as well, particularly with respect to the retroactive adjustment. I think hon. members recognize this generally has been the subject of some abuse and criticism in the past. I believe that is why it was first considered in Bill C-12.

The hon. member raises the question of this retroactive adjustment as a bonanza, which perhaps should provide some compensation for the fact that with the kind of inflationary rates we have experienced the six-year average for best years of income, used in terms of the basic pension benefit, is somewhat distorted by inflation in his view. Hence the amount of the so-called bonanza goes in some measure to compensate for that.

I would certainly look at this kind of proposal, although I would judge if we are to make changes in our legislation with respect to the six-year period, or any other period for that matter, or if we are to compensate in any way for the inadequacy of that formula, I would like to think it would be done on a more scientific or rational basis than leaving in this measure, which, in my judgment, has been subject to some abuse. As I indicated earlier this year, we intend to correct that. Clearly, we do not have legislation before the House, but in fairness to those public servants who might be contemplating retirement, we made the announcement so that they would be aware of our intentions and the date when we expect to introduce legislation and from which it would have effect.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, first I would like to thank the President of the Treasury Board for his commitment to study the question that I raised about marriages taking place after the date of retirement. I appreciate the fact that he accepted as valid my contention that with earlier retirement and with greater longevity the situation is one that does arise more often than used to be the case. I hope that the matter will receive the study I feel it deserves.

With respect to the other question, that of doing away with full indexation in January for a public servant who has retired late in the previous year, I agree with him that one should not correct one wrong by another method which has some element of abuse in it. In other words, this bonanza in January should not be the permanent answer to the fact that when public servants retire they lose because of the inflation that takes place in their last six years.

I quite agree with him that there should be a more scientific way to deal with it, but I believe even having admitted that, that I have a case for saying that one should not do one without the other. One should not take away something that is there, whether it is scientific or not, which is a measure of compensation until the other has been corrected.

I think the minister would find it much easier to get the House to accept a bill—if he is going to bring one in this year—that had in it both elements, something that got rid of the abuse which takes place in some cases but corrects the other situation at the same time. If he does not, many public servants will feel that the unfairness they suffer by still having to base their pensions on the average of the last six years, when salaries were going up so much in the last six years, will be very real. I thank the President of the Treasury Board for offering to look at that as well. I felt that the offer in the first place was a little more meaningful, as though he really might do it and get right at it, despite the fact that these things take time; but in the case of the latter, I urge that very serious consideration be given to not making a correction this year without going all the way and correcting the situation caused by the six-year average in a time of inflation.

At any rate, we are ready for improvements in the Public Service Superannuation Act and we are ready for improvements in the indexing of pensions across the board. We hope that the government will soon get its policy straightened out in this regard.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, as the minister knows, there is a concern with respect to public service pensions. My friend ranged rather wide in terms of his question, given the clause that we are dealing with.

May I ask the minister a question. With respect to the general revisions of the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, there has been some discussion in the House relating them in some way to what would flow out of the pension conference recently held here in Ottawa.

Could the minister tell me now whether in terms of bringing in legislation, a white paper or however it is to be dealt with, the situation will be dealt with in the context of an over-all review of the pension system of Canada, or is it the intention of the government to bring in a special piece of legislation dealing with public service superannuation and supplementary retirement benefits and those related areas in which the minister knows I have an interest?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, the outcome of the National Pensions Conference has been of great interest to us in terms of conducting our own review. During the course of that conference, as well as before and after, in terms of response from various sectors, some quite helpful commentary has come in.

I also believe the time has come for us to move forward with a number of amendments to our own legislation. It is my hope that what we bring in will be compatible with the kind of consensus which has come out of, and I think will continue to come out of, the continuing negotiations in all sectors on pension legislation.

The act, I believe, clearly requires some adjustments in a number of areas. We are working toward bringing forward some proposals for my cabinet colleagues to consider, I hope in the relatively near term.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I gather from what my friend is saying that it is not the intention of the government as far as the public service is concerned to deal with this from the point of view of a white paper, or even a green paper, in anticipation of any legislation, but to deal with it in legislative terms fairly soon. Would I be embarrassing the minister if I asked him to tell me whether it is the intention of the government to introduce a piece of legislation prior to Christmas, 1982?

The Chairman: With respect to the hon. member, the measure before us is a very specific one. The hon. member is ranging just a little from the subject before us, but perhaps the President of the Treasury Board might want to comment.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, the issue is under review. When I am satisfied, and when I can satisfy my cabinet colleagues with the kind of measures which should be introduced, I will then be in a position to bring legislation forward. Hon. members know, particularly the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, what a difficult and complex area pension legislation is. I believe it requires a great deal of study. There is a lot of knee-jerk reaction around the country to pension legislation and various provisions. There is much folklore associated with pension schemes, to a degree associated with the public service pension schemes, not only at the federal level but at other levels as well.

This question is obviously one which must be handled with great care. It is one area of high priority with me, but I would be very reluctant to put a specific timetable before my colleagues in the House when at this point I have no basis to proceed. I am just not at that point of making a statement as to when any such legislation might come forward.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I just want to make one comment. I am delighted to hear the attitude of the minister toward the folklore, mythology and other things which have developed around public service pensions. I share that attitude.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

CURRENCY AND EXCHANGE ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING ISSUANCE OF GOLD COINS

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services) moved that Bill C-68, to amend the Currency and Exchange Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: First of all, Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank hon. members for their eagerness to co-operate and their willingness to deal expeditiously with this legislation. I will try not to abuse the patience of the House while making a few remarks on the nature of this bill and its importance for Canadians.

[English]

Consequently, I am pleased to propose the second reading of Bill C-68, an act to amend the Currency and Exchange Act, first reading having occurred on June 22, 1981. The aim of this bill is to permit the governor in council to issue gold coins. Permission was already granted further to an amendment to this act, approved June 20, 1978, which amendment was limited to January 1, 1981.

The debates of the committee and of the House of Commons before the adoption of Bill C-39, in May, 1978, centred on the opportunity of launching a Canadian gold bullion coin program, as suggested by the Canadian Mining Association and other groups from private industry as well as by the Canadian gold mining industry. These discussions raised considerable interest and a great deal of enthusiasm from both sides of the House, after which the members of the opposition recommended a prompt start to the program.

Following representations by certain members of the opposition, Bill C-39 was modified to limit the legislation's power relative to the issuance of gold coins to January 1, 1981, and also that the minister responsible report to Parliament on the administration of the program during the month of December 1978 and every six months thereafter. The aim was to permit gold coin programs for a three-year trial period, after which we would undertake the evaluation of the results.

Afterwards, the Royal Canadian Mint was authorized by the governor in council to launch a gold bullion coin program and the board of directors of the Mint was commissioned to evaluate the results of the program, to eventually inform cabinet, through myself as minister responsible, of the advantages of such a program to Canada and also of the consequential effects on the Canadian gold mining industry as well as the relevant facts that come into play, such as inflation, the balance of payments, the profitability of such a program and other aspects.

Consequently, the board of directors of the Mint retained the services of Price Waterhouse Associates to evaluate the gold Maple Leaf program and, in effect, gave them broad terms of reference for their evaluation. The evaluation has been completed and the report submitted to the board of directors of the Mint. The board of directors has approved that recommendation and I can only qualify the recommendation from Price Waterhouse as being completely positive.

[Translation]

The report from Price Waterhouse Associates was approved unanimously by the board of directors of the Mint, who then recommended that I seek the necessary authority to continue the gold Maple Leaf program on an ongoing basis. The Royal Canadian Mint has never asked the government for financial assistance to carry out its operations since it became a Crown corporation in 1969. The last report to be tabled in the House after the Currency and Exchange Act was amended in 1968 indicates that for the period from July 1, 1978 to December 31, 1980, the gross receipts from the sale of gold coins amounted to $1,456,911,000, and the net profit to $31,682,500. The gold coin programs have benefited the various private companies involved in the advertising, processing and sale of precious metals, the supply of materials, the provision of transport services and comprehensive insurance. They have benefited as well every government which levies a provincial tax on coins sold in Canada.

Last year, in northern Canada, that is north of the 60th parallel, I had the opportunity to explain to the inhabitants of that area the exceptional benefits of the program now under way, and I am very pleased to see that the hon. member for the Northwest Territories, for the riding of Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson), will be here to voice the official opposition's views. I look forward in a very positive frame of mind to hearing his remarks which I trust will be approving. The gold required by the Canadian Mint for making the coins authorized by the government, as a result of the amendment to the Currency and Exchange Act and the 1978 amendments, came from Canadian mines or, whenever there were shortages, from the gold reserve of the foreign currency account of Canada.

The gold Maple Leaf coin, offered for the first time in September of 1979, was very well received throughout the world, as results proved during the first four months of sale in 1979: one million coins were sold. That coin was considered a valuable option for dealers in gold, international bankers and investors who were looking for an alternative to the South African Krugerrand which had been on the market since 1967. The only reservation ever expressed about the Canadian gold leaf coin was that the program was only temporary. Such a reaction influenced the strategy adopted for the marketing and promotion of the coin. Official North American and European distributors were therefore most reluctant to encourage investment in a product whose future was dubious. All those who took part in the gold Maple Leaf program, and more specifically the representatives of the gold mining industry, are very anxiously waiting for a favourable decision on the part of this Parliament, hoping it will agree to extend the gold coin programs.

[English]

That is why I am most pleased at the prompt and complete way this chamber has decided to deal with this bill at this time.

The Canadian gold coin program, that is, the $100 gold coin commemorating special events and the $50 gold coin commonly known as the gold Maple Leaf, are prestigious items for Canada and have attracted world wide attention to the importance of the gold mining industry in our country. I hope the House would proceed with the debate, but I would call it five o'clock. I understand the Chair will be reading the questions to be debated on the late show this evening, and then perhaps we will proceed with this debate.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): No, with private members' hour.

Mr. Blais: I thought we had done away with that.

Mr. Knowles: No, just Mondays and Tuesdays.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Let me deal with the questions to be debated at the time of adjournment this evening. It seems to me from information I have received that there is no agreement to dispense with private members' hour, so we will be proceeding with notices of motions, specifically No. 33 and the continuation of the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Laniel). Perhaps while I am dealing with some of these topics we will discover whether there is an understanding. I will deal with the matters I have before me at this time.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—The Economy—(a) Statements made by Leader of Liberal party in Ontario. (b) Low interest rate paid on government annuities; the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek)—Energy—(a) Request for reduction in federal share of revenues. (b) Energy tax rebate program; the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster)—Environmental Affairs—Result of minister's discussions on acid rain with United States Secretary of the Interior.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions (papers), public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

REDUCTION OF SHAREHOLDINGS BY TATE & LYLE HOLDINGS LTD. IN REDPATH SUGAR LIMITED

The House resumed, from Thursday, February 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Herbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all agreements, correspondence, notes and other communications relating to the requirement by the Foreign Investment Review agency that Tate & Lyle Holdings Ltd. reduce its shareholdings in Redpath Sugar Limited.

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to continue the remarks I began the last time motion No. 33 was before the House on February 12, 1981. Notwithstanding all the opinions which were expressed in good faith at that time, I think it is my duty to put forward some of the facts and rules laid down in the law which dictate the actions of FIRA, the Foreign Investment Review agency.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, as I have just said, I am pursuing the comments I started on February 12. The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) moved that an order of the House do issue for copies of all agreements, correspondence, notes and other communications relating to the requirement by the Foreign Investment Review agency that Tate & Lyle Limited reduce its shareholdings in Redpath Sugar Limited. It is surely not the first time that this motion has been discussed in the House, since the member introduced a similar motion in 1979. On that occasion, the House was told that the Foreign Investment Review agency had been advised by its chief legal adviser that the said documents were deemed to be privileged under section 14 of the Foreign Investment Review Act.

The motion was discussed further on November 22. The member for Vaudreuil again introduced that motion during this session, that is on January 14 last, and I advised him in an answer which I gave in the House on behalf of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), minister responsible for the administration of that act, that the agency had received a legal opinion once again to the effect that the said documents were privileged.

What the hon. member is again asking is that the government disregard the provisions of an act adopted by Parliament. Section 14 of that act clearly stipulates as follows, and I quote:

Except as provided in this section, all information with respect to a person, business or proposed business obtained by the minister or an officer or employee of Her Majesty in the course of the administration of this act is privileged and no person shall knowingly, except as provided in this act, communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto any such information or allow any person not legally entitled thereto to inspect or have access to any such information.

Without such provisions, Mr. Speaker, for all practical purposes the review process prescribed in the act would be well nigh impossible. Let me explain. When filing a notice the investor must describe his intentions and during the meetings which generally follow he reveals, perhaps not details of a confidential nature, but at least all sorts of information concerning his operations. How can anyone expect an investor to disclose to the government, through the agency, every aspect of his situation, his projects and his intentions if that information is not to be held confidential? He has therefore every right to expect that this information will not be released, at least prematurely, to third parties and, in particular, to potential competitors.

Before deciding whether a proposal is likely to be of significant benefit to Canada under the terms of the act, the government must obtain from the investor very precise information on his projects as well as on the parent company on which he depends and, should it be the case, on other corporate branches. It is obvious that in many cases the disclosure of that kind of information might be detrimental to the investor in the conduct of his business. That is why it was absolutely essential to include section 14 in the act, which reads as follows, and I quote:

Any information with respect to a person, business or proposed business obtained by the minister or an officer or employee of Her Majesty in the course of the administration of this act may,

(a) on request in writing to the agency by or on behalf of the person to which the information relates or by or on behalf of the person or group of persons carrying on or proposing to carry on the business or new business to which the information relates, be communicated to any person or authority named in the request, or

(b) for any purpose relating to the administration of this act, be communicated to a minister of the Crown in right of any province or to an officer or employee of Her Majesty in right thereof.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the minister cannot disclose confidential information on an investor other than within the scope of the act and, to do so, he must secure the expressed and written authorization of the person from whom the information comes in the first place. On the other hand, it may happen that, over and above that permission, if a company files an application with the review agency and makes certain details public or publicly announces that it has applied to take over another company, then a certain part of the information is disclosed because it has already been made public.

Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member raised the matter in 1979, the agency had asked the company concerned to authorize the disclosure of the information involved but this was not allowed. Such a refusal should not come as a surprise. Those papers include, among other things, very confidential information on the financial situation of Redpath Sugar Limited and of its parent company. If that information was ever supplied to the government, it is precisely because those companies were protected under section 14 of the act. Otherwise, probably it would not have been disclosed . Those companies did not want that information to be made public, and therefore they did not permit the agency to disclose it, which they had a right to do under the Act.

● (1710)

Section 14 provides for access to information which is essential to the assessment of a proposed investment while assuring the investor that the information is obtained under the seal of secrecy. On the other hand, because of that secrecy requirement, the reviewing process appears to be an operation which the government wants to hide from the public. On the contrary, we try to make the implementation of the act better known, better understood. But we are forced to comply with the act as it is now.

If the minister is planning to amend it so that in certain circumstances some information can be made public or made available to some people, under certain requirements, then we shall see. In the meantime, this act is the law of the land and those who have to implement it must comply with it.

This act gives a privileged character to the information provided by an applicant in the reviewing process of his proposed investment. It would simply be illegal and shameful not to abide by section 14. It would be a breach of trust, just as if we publicized information drawn from income tax returns, and submitted it to the government with the understanding that it would be used only for specific and limited purposes and that it would be kept secret. Would the hon. member himself be willing to let information contained in his income tax return and provided under the seal of secrecy be made public in a high-handed way if he had submitted an application for investment? Corporations have the same right to confidentiality as individuals.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vaudreuil is well aware of the laws that govern the business community and of the fact that the disclosure of confidential information concerning the way a corporation operates may have detrimental effects.

I am sure that many businesses operating in Vaudreuil, especially along the Trans-Canada highway, would be reluctant to submit an application for investment, acquisition or some other type of transaction if they thought that the data they are submitting to FIRA could be made known to all members of this House. How could FIRA be made to operate efficiently if, as a result of a motion such as this one, the government could disclose information provided under the seal of secrecy? Do you know of any investor who would be willing to make his plans, projects, financial situation, and R & D programs known if there were any risk of having all this information made public because of a motion introduced in this House? Do you know of any corporation who would want to invest in Canada if it thought that any data submitted in support of its application could be disclosed?

Did the hon. member not express some concern that implementation of the law would have a negative effect on the inflow of foreign investment? This would certainly be the case if we were to change the rules of the game so that the information provided by the investors to the agency when making an application could be disclosed. In fact, there are people who maintain that the very existence of a review procedure, the fact that a company has to provide information and meet requirements, does act as a deterrent to foreign investors. These people consider this procedure bad economic management since they believe that we in Canada need all the foreign investors we can get, whatever access they might choose to get into this country. Therefore, if we want to go on promoting investment, the procedure used must reduce significantly the risk that the information which any company wants to keep confidential will be made public.

However, data obtained from many sources belie the contention of the hon. member and of those who believe that the agency discourages investment. Until now, and this is probably due to this same section 14, according to a recent report published in the United States entitled Survey of Current Business, American subsidiaries in Canada were planning on investing over $11 billion in 1981, and this figure is second only to the investment forecasts for the United States as such. The reviewing procedure in its present form does not discourage direct foreign investment. It simply ensures that such investments will bring significant benefits to Canada. I shall come back to this point later on.

However, when one analyses the direct foreign investment figures, it is important to remember that this type of investment represents only a very small portion of foreign investments in Canada. They are greatly exceeded by portfolio investments, which do not come under the Foreign Investment Review Act. Moreover, foreign investment, whether direct or by portfolio, represents a very small part of all capital invested in Canada. Thus, since 1961, direct foreign investment accounts on an average for less than 3 per cent of the total savings used by Canadians or Canadian businesses to finance capital build-up in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, to come back to the role of the agency and the reviewing procedure, it would be wrong to believe that it is limited to recommending granting or refusal of an investment application as it was originally submitted. Consequently, it would be wrong also to think that the agency does not fulfill its role in posting authorization rates between 80 and 90 per cent. This is definitely missing the point. The agency and the review process were set up to ensure that direct foreign investments would bring significant benefits to Canada. The major part of the agency's assessment work is aimed at improving the quality of the proposed investments and negotiating other particular commitments. For example, according to a recent survey by the agency's research personnel, $5 billion has been invested and 70,000 jobs created as a result of foreign investments.

I am going to conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, although I cannot reach the end of my notes which I would have liked to do. However, I should like to suggest to the hon. member that what he is now attempting to do, and I appreciate this, is not to destroy the agency, because he himself paid tribute to those who have been operating the agency over these last few years. According to the honourable member, his request is aimed at ensuring that the agency can receive an extra mandate, under which it could, once a favourable decision has been rendered, have the legal means either directly or through the government, to make recommendations in such cases where a company committed to "Canadianize" its operation or do research and development work would fail to live up to its commitments, then the agency or the government could move and even publicly accuse or blame the company for it. Certainly the reason behind the hon. member's request is quite valid, and I am happy to see that he has a few minutes left to conclude the debate and perhaps explain the extra means he is contemplating for the agency, and how certain confidential information that cannot now be made public under the act could be publicized.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. In the absence of any other hon. members' seeking the floor, I will recognize the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). He will have five minutes to conclude his remarks, and that will end debate on this motion.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, neighbour and good friend, the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Laniel), stole a few of my notes in his closing remarks, but I will briefly summarize. My colleague says I raised this matter in 1979, but I raised it many years before that. In fact, I spoke in much the same vein in 1977. My bringing this subject to the floor of the House, as I said in the speech I made in this House on February 12 of this year, was stimulated originally by my interest in the subject of sugar, sugar imports and the promotion of the sugar trade with Caribbean countries.

I mentioned in my notes, in addition to the implications of the Foreign Investment Review agency, that in the case in question there was also the involvement of the Export Development Corporation and the Canadian International Development Agency. I said that I certainly liked this kind of co-operation. However, I am certainly not going to take issue with anything said by the parliamentary secretary concerning the review agency. Why should I? I was chairman of the committee that studied the Foreign Investment Review Act which led to the creation of the agency and tabled the report of that committee in this House. However, I took the opportunity in my remarks on February 12 to express some of my concerns, and if I can quote from a letter:

> —you and other interested Canadians . . . cannot become party of information which, if released, might put Canadian firms at a competitive disadvantage.

As I pointed out before, we should be a little careful here since there is often far more information released in the United States than here. We are probably going to have to look soon at the limitations we put on disclosure in Canada.

My main concern in connection with this case was that Tate & Lyle Holdings Ltd., the parent of Redpath Sugar, was to divest itself of its interest in Redpath as soon as the financial position of Tate and & Lyle recovers sufficiently. And I said on February 12:

> —it means in effect we are waiting for a time when Canadians can be expected to pay more for those shares.

That is what bothers me. I also said:

> There is no public accounting of how well companies have fared in meeting the undertakings to provide significant benefit, and the agency at one time estimated that approximately 20 per cent of the cases failed to meet the original undertakings.

At some point in time surely we are going to have to have some more public accounting of the manner in which these companies are allowed to skip off without meeting the original undertakings. As I also said on February 12:

> —in the minds of members of the public there is some doubt as to whether there is any strength to the original agreement, and we are . . . concerned about enforcement.

I think I have made my point. The parliamentary secretary has replied and there is obviously no point in going any further with this issue. I have raised it now on at least three separate occasions. I understand the minister at some time in the near future is likely to be bringing to the House some position paper on the agency which may change the regulations somewhat to provide for a greater degree of disclosure. This is my small effort in trying to push the minister into coming forward a little earlier, I hope by the beginning of the next session, with some minor changes in the operation of the agency that will get rid of the degree of concern which the public has at the present time as to the way the larger companies may be getting around the agreement.

With that, Mr. Speaker, if I can have the agreement of the House, I would ask that the motion be withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Does the House agree to the request of the hon. member for Vaudreuil and give unanimous consent to the withdrawal of motion No. 33?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn and order discharged.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I understand there may be a disposition to have the Chair call it six o'clock. Is that correct?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 5.30 p.m. the House took recess.

CURRENCY AND EXCHANGE ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING ISSUANCE OF GOLD COINS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C-68 to amend the Currency and Exchange Act be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Before I recognize the hon. Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais), I might mention that I have been informed by one of the Table officers that we would go down in history if the Chair itself were to call a quorum; but time is getting on.

When debate was interrupted at five o'clock, the hon. Minister of Supply and Services had the floor.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I had nearly completed my remarks. I was just about to wind up. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is saying that I was just going to distribute samples; but I placed a condition that there would have to be more than 35 hon. members in the House at the time that we resumed debate. Unfortunately, we are missing about fifteen.

I would simply like to wind up my statement by stating that the program has been a very positive experience in the past three years. I am hopeful that it will receive very prompt passage by the House so as to remove the uncertainty in the marketplace in terms of the ongoing nature of the program. As Your Honour recognizes, initially this program was to be for three years. As of the first of January, 1981, there is no possibility for us to proceed with this program unless this amendment is accepted by the House.

One can imagine that in the marketplace where, in effect, gold coins are purchased for collection purposes, and indeed for speculation purposes, there is a great deal of interest in terms of whether or not the program is to be continued. We have managed in the recent past to take something like 30 per cent of the Krugerrand's market away from it. With the very aggressive marketing which has been conducted by the Mint and by officials of the Mint, I am sure that we would be able to take a larger portion of that particular market. Having said that—

I suggest that in the very near future, the bill be passed in all stages, in order that we may remove the uncertainty which exists on the domestic and international market.

[English]

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to be able to follow the hon. Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais), who gave an excellent dissertation on the Canadian Maple Leaf coin program. He told us that this has been a very successful program, and I am inclined to believe him. In fact, we have every evidence to suggest that it has been a very successful program. The minister was kind enough to send over to me at short notice, the report that Price Waterhouse had made on this program. Of course I have not been able to read it in detail, but have just glanced over it. It would appear that the conclusion reached by that firm is that the program is operating as it should and there are no major faults with it. As the minister said, we have been successful in taking over about 30 per cent of the market for the Krugerrand-Maple Leaf type of coin.

This program has been in effect for three years, and it has benefited collectors and people who appreciate the Canadian Maple Leaf coin as a work of art. It has entered the speculative market and it has also provided a vehicle for people to maintain a store of value. With ever-increasing inflation under a succession of Liberal governments, it is no longer possible to store value in dollar bills or in bank deposits. Therefore, many people who have looked to the Krugerrand, and then, three years ago, to the Canadian Maple Leaf for this store of value, are not really speculators but they need such a vehicle because they have so little confidence in the Canadian dollar, with good reason.

I would certainly also like to extend my congratulations to the section of the Royal Canadian Mint which deals in numismatics. I have written that word down because it is sometimes hard to pronounce.

Perhaps the Minister of Supply and Services would be kind enough to confer with his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), because, as I understand it, some of the blanks for proof coins cannot be manufactured in Canada. Most of the gold is Canadian gold, or is said to be Canadian gold; but to obtain the very lustrous and very fine finish on some of the blanks, I understand that this work must be done in the United States. The gold is shipped out of the country for a certain amount of processing and shipped back into Canada. I believe the actual stamping is done over in Hull.

It would appear that large profits have accrued to the Canadian Mint and to the Government of Canada as a result of the Maple Leaf program. Had these profits been made in the private sector, I am sure that our good friends to the left would have had a good deal to say about the matter; but since the profits which have been realized have been helping to defray general levels of taxation in Canada, that meets with everyone's approval. We on this side would certainly like to see the Canadian Maple Leaf program extended. We have certain objections to the bill as it stands before us, but that is not one of them. We want to see this program go ahead. We think it has been of benefit to Canada. We were pleased to be supporters of the project some three or four years ago, when it was first brought to the attention of the government by the Canadian mining industry and by coin dealers in this country. It is one of those areas where something was able to be done, with the support of all parties in the House, and has proven to be successful.

Our concern in this matter relates to the blanket authority which the Minister of Supply and Services is seeking forever and ever. If Your Honour will recall, when the amendments to the Currency and Exchange Act were made approximately three years ago with Bill C-37, it was done with a backdrop of the problems which had been experienced with the issue of Olympic coins. That program did not work out anywhere near as well as it should have, and certainly not as well as the Maple Leaf program has worked out. We have obviously learned from our mistakes. At that time, we on this side of the House had a concern. We did not want to give the government blanket authority forever and ever to issue gold coins in whatever denominations it wanted, or whatever purity, or whatever type or whatever specifications. That is why at that time we put the deadline at January 1, 1981 and I think we would like to keep it to that. It might be argued that the program has proved to be successful or that historically, the issue of coinage has often been a matter of royal prerogative. Apparently that has not necessarily been the case in the past in Canada, although in a lot of jurisdictions the right to issue coinage has remained with the Crown and outside the control of Parliament. In Canada, the practice has been to have a fair amount of parliamentary control over the issue of coinage.

Apart from that particular concern, which I shall return to later, Mr. Speaker, I have a similar but slightly different concern with Section 4(2) of the act as it stands at present and as it will become if amended by Bill C-68. It seems that we are specifying something in a schedule to an act of Parliament and then giving authority to the governor in council to change the act by means of an order in council. It would be my contention that if something can be changed by order in council rather than by an act of Parliament, then, in the first place, it should be left to regulations. Regulations can be changed by that mechanism. However, if it is important enough in the first instance to be put in an act of Parliament, then why should we give to the governor in council the authority to change it?

This particular case does not involve anything of great, overriding concern, but there have been cases in the past where Parliament has come a cropper by granting that type of authority. I might cite the Northern Pipelines Act, for instance. Certain conditions were laid down in that act—not in the regulations but in the act—and then the authority was given to the governor in council to change them. We might just as well have left them in the regulations in the first place. All we did was to give ourselves a sense of security that never really existed.

I believe that the minister and the Royal Canadian Mint would like to see the bill passed into law as quickly as possible. I can understand that all ministers want their bills passed into law as quickly as possible, and always consider that their bill should have the highest priority. However, in this case I can well understand the concern of the gentlemen at the mint. Perhaps the minister has not been as diligent as he should have been about bringing this legislation forward so that we could give it the full examination it should have. Whereas we cannot accept the bill in its present form and would not give unanimous consent for it to be dealt with in committee as it stands, and then give it third reading today, if certain changes were made, then I think that might be possible.

If the government would accept an amendment to limit the time period and instead of substituting the words "from time to time" in Section 4(1) and (2) for "at any time before January 1, 1981", "at any time before January 1, 1985", that would buy an extra four years. It would put a four-year limit on the authority to be granted by Parliament to the Minister of Supply and Services. That approach would certainly meet with my approval.

Perhaps during the time that remains of my speech, some form of arrangement could be made along those lines. I hope it can because we on this side really do not want to jeopardize the Canadian Maple Leaf coin program.

I was looking forward to the opportunity to ask some questions on the Price Waterhouse report in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to which the bill was to have been referred. I had also hoped to have an opportunity to question officials of the Royal Canadian Mint. If that opportunity does not present itself because of an arrangement that may be reached in this House tonight, perhaps it will be possible at a future date. Many of us have a great deal of interest in this subject.

I represent a gold mining area, Mr. Speaker. I am coming now to the part of my speech that the Minister of Supply and Services warned me not to go on about at length and that is to extol the virtues of the gold mining industry in my constituency. I shall be as brief as possible.

The gold mining industry is of great importance to the Northwest Territories. We produce about 200,000 ounces of gold per year. That brings about $100 million of new wealth into the Canadian economy. We are justifiably proud of that and I should like to think that some of our gold goes into the Maple Leaf coins and that a fair number of those coins come back to investors in the Northwest Territories. There is a program of capital expenditure of around $150 million in progress and on schedule, to develop another major Canadian gold mine.

Gold mining is of such importance to the Northwest Territories that on May 1, 1981, native gold was proclaimed the official mineral emblem of the Northwest Territories. If you would permit me, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read that proclamation into the record. It is not very long and reads as follows:

WHEREAS Gold has long played a major role in the development and prosperity of the Northwest Territories;

AND WHEREAS Gold is emblematic of the enduring value of the wealth of the Northwest Territories;

AND WHEREAS Gold is a fitting symbol of the bright prospects and future of the Northwest Territories;

NOW THEREFORE, by virtue of the power vested in me by the Northwest Territories Act of the Parliament of Canada

I hereby order and declare:

That gold be hereafter deemed and recognized to be the Mineral Emblem of the Northwest Territories.

Done at Yellowknife under the Seal of the Northwest Territories, this 1st day of May 1981.

John. H. Parker
Commissioner

I just thought that somebody might be interested in that.

A part is played in the gold mining industry of Canada by the mint that many people are not aware of. Most Canadian mine production is refined at the Royal Canadian Mint. I should like to take a few minutes to say something about this as I have never heard it referred to in Parliament.

In particular, I should like to compliment Mr. Roger Parisien, the manager of the gold refinery at the Royal Canadian Mint. This is one of the few federal Crown corporations about which I have anything good to say. It never seems to make political headlines and we do not hear very much about it in the press. That indicates the good job the mint is doing. Their charges for refining are quite reasonable. They go out of the way to assist the smaller gold producers and the smaller dealers in scrap gold and scrap jewellery. I think the refiners who work there, and there are several of them, deserve the compliments of this House. I referred to the increasing necessity to refine scrap jewellery at the Mint. That is, of course, having some effect. This particular material is rather hard to deal with. Very often it has a low gold content and many impurities mixed therein. During the chlorination process, an abundance of fumes are given off. If possible, I would like the Minister of Supply and Services to go to the refinery at the Mint where they process some of this low-grade scrap jewellery so that he can see for himself the type of working conditions which the people have to endure while they process this material. Because of the fumes, the atmosphere cannot be that healthy. Much of their equipment is somewhat antiquated and is not really designed to handle scrap jewellery. Perhaps the minister could keep that in mind.

I do not always agree with the over-all gold policies of the government. One aspect of the government's policies which I find most objectionable is that of selling Canada's gold reserves by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). I have to admit that the proposal to do this was made originally in the 1979 budget. The idea was to sell off about one million ounces of Canadian gold reserves. But amounts considerably in excess of that have been sold to generate money. Maybe because of high gold prices, that policy has realized a fair amount of profit to the Government of Canada. I may be faulted on that statement, but I would not like the Government of Canada to be engaged in speculative activity on the international gold market. The use of Canadian gold reserves from time to time to produce Maple Leaf coins, when the amount of gold coming in through normal commercial channels is not sufficient, might be okay if we can use our reserves to make up a fluctuating supply. But as a general idea, just to sell off reserves is not something we should do, in my opinion. Reserves in the order of 20 million ounces are about right for a country like Canada. If we take a look at European countries, such as France, we see they are very reluctant to let a draw-down occur in their gold reserves. They like to accumulate gold. I do not think that we in Canada should go overboard accumulating gold, but, by the same token, we should not let our reserves draw down too far.

The classic example of draw-downs on stockpiles of that nature happened in the United States under the Nixon administration. It was used as a technique for getting more money without imposing additional taxes. They allowed the sale of much of the GSA stockpile, strategic minerals for which there was a requirement. But that was done to get ready cash. I hope that we in Canada will not be following that procedure.

That is as far as I want to go on this subject. In general, we are in agreement with this act, with the one provision that I have mentioned. We would certainly like the Canadian Maple Leaf project to continue and grow from strength to strength. That being the case, I hope I have allowed sufficient time for some kind of accord to be arranged. I hope that this bill can receive as swift a passage as is possible.

Mr. Kelly: Mr. Speaker, in a spirit of compromise I would like to ask with the consent of the House, that we proceed through all stages of the bill this evening.

Mr. Nielsen: No, I do not think we can give that consent, Mr. Speaker. What is the compromise?

Mr. Kelly: Mr. Speaker, I am asking if there is agreement on the figure originally mentioned by the last speaker.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, if I might be helpful, there was discussion at the outset that an amendment might be forthcoming to provide for a ten-year period.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member mentioned four years.

Mr. Blais: I know that will show in the official record, but I had the impression at one time that there was an offer to proceed with the program for another ten-year period, which was acceptable.

We are very concerned about the marketing aspect. As the report indicates, the marketing aspect is one of the areas on which we have to concentrate, and the uncertainty of an additional short period, such as that contemplated in the initial trial period is detrimental to the marketing plans for the Maple Leaf coin. We would like to provide a sufficiently long period to give investors and development dealers in the international marketplace a certainty that the program will continue for a relatively substantial period of time. Anything less than ten years would not be substantial under the circumstances.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. If the bill were confined to the Maple Leaf program, that would be one matter and the compromise suggested would probably find acceptability. But the bill goes far beyond that. It goes into the unlimited minting of gold coins at any time that the governor in council should choose, for whatever program. Therefore, it is not confined to the Maple Leaf program.

I appreciate the problem with the Maple Leaf program, and I want to facilitate that. Could the minister, on this point of order, answer two questions? First, since Parliament is in essence relinquishing its control over the minting of gold coins to the cabinet, would a five-year term affect the marketing concerns which the minister and the government have? Would it be too short? If so, perhaps an explanation could be forthcoming.

Second, if the bill went to committee, what effect would that have on the Maple Leaf program in terms of the marketing concerns expressed by the minister?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): If the House is prepared to give its unanimous consent, the hon. Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) might reply to those questions.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, first, the impact of the five years is that it would create uncertainty in the program. As the hon. gentleman knows, the Maple Leaf coin is minted on the basis of whatever demand there is in the marketplace. In effect, we deal with international dealers who receive certain allotments on the basis of the demand in the marketplace. Individuals will of course gear their own inventories based upon the certainty that there will be an available supply for the long term. That is the basis of our distribution system. That is why the five years is not satisfactory.

I would point out to the hon. member that we are not removing parliamentary control. There is a provision in the previous amendment to have a report tabled every six months on the administration of the program. That provides an opportunity for members of Parliament to review the administration of the program and to offer criticism. I have a responsibility of course to provide the ability to proceed with orderly marketing of the commodity. That is the system I am now advancing. There has been a trial period. A report has been prepared as a result of that. The report is positive. However, it does indicate that there have to be some additional aggressive measures taken in terms of marketing, and we are proceeding to do that. We cannot do that without having a period of time available to us which is sufficient for us to meet the requirements of the market place and our distributors.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the other part of the question which the minister overlooked answering, I presume because he forgot it, is whether it would in any material way affect the concerns of the minister with regard to marketing the Maple Leaf program if this measure did not go through all stages tonight, but went to a committee where members would have the opportunity of perhaps hearing from the domestic dealers and gaining some idea of the international implications of the marketing program. Would sending it to committee seriously prejudice the marketing of the Maple Leaf program?

Mr. Blais: I did not understand that question. I must have been discussing some other matter at the time it was being posed. Yes, it would create some difficulties. The hon. member has been here for a long period of time.

Mr. Nielsen: Don't get personal.

Mr. Blais: He knows there is a great deal of uncertainty attached to House schedules, additional House scheduling, and that hopefully we will be out of this place some time before the end of July. What is going to happen in that regard is a matter of some future statement by the government.

The distributors are anxious to have a decision so that they can gear their demand for the Maple Leaf coin with the marketplace and market demand, not only in Canada but abroad. Unless this bill is passed as soon as practicable, we may be in a situation where our market efforts abroad will be seriously impaired by distributors who do not want to take our coin because they do not know when the program will go ahead or what form it will take after it gets through the committee. That is why I am concerned about it. I know the hon. member for Yukon and the hon. member for Western Arctic are as well because of the importance of this gold coin program to the gold industry in Canada. Therefore, any co-operation I can obtain from hon. members to get this bill through this evening would indeed be appreciated.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, will the minister provide us with a copy of the amendment which he will be proposing to clause 1 of the bill? I presume it will be deleting the words "from time to time" in subsection (1) and (2) of section 4 of the Currency and Exchange Act and substituting therefor, the words "at any time before January 1, 1990". I presume that would be the amendment.

Mr. Blais: 1991.

Mr. Nielsen: If we could see the wording, we would be very happy to consider it.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Yukon comes pretty close to a suggestion I was going to make. Indeed, Your Honour must be wondering under what rule we are operating having these questions with Your Honour in the chair. I wonder if we could agree to give the bill second reading and take it into Committee of the Whole instead of sending it to a standing committee. These questions back and forth could be asked and answered and there could be an understanding that if there was not a satisfactory resolution, there would be no proceeding to third reading tonight.

Mr. Nielsen: What rule would we operate under?

Mr. Knowles: By unanimous consent we can go to Committee of the Whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I understand agreement is near. That is why with the unanimous consent of the House the Chair tolerated the question and answer period. I have the wording before me. It seems to reflect exactly what the hon. member for Yukon is suggesting. I sense that the Minister of Supply and Services will shortly produce that for everyone's consideration. I would suggest that the only way to proceed now is exactly as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that is that I seek unanimous consent to move to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Nielsen: You might have the wording before you, Mr. Speaker, but I do not. No one on this side does. I would like to see it. If we follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and go to the Committee of the Whole, we lose the possible option of going from second reading to the standing committee. I do not want to lose that option before seeing the wording of the amendment.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the wisdom of the hon. member for Yukon and his drafting ability knows, of course, no comparison. In his very astute impromptu amendment he captured the essence of what is sought to be achieved. Surely once he advances that, and I agree with him, on the terms of the formula of what I advanced, he ought not to be concerned that, in the event there is some comma missing in the drafting, I will not agree to the placing of that comma. In the event he is dissatisfied with the amendment on second reading, we could agree to send the bill to committee. I give him that undertaking.

Mr. Nielsen: Like the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) I am from Missouri and I would like to see the wording. If the wording is going to affect those four words in those two subsections, I think that would find acceptance on this side. I see no reason why we cannot have that wording while we are in second reading stage. I see it is coming, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: Read it out.

Mr. Nielsen: It is the minister's responsibility to do that, but I will read it out. I cannot extend the same compliment to the minister on his drafting. However, the minister suggests:

That clause 1 be amended by deleting in subclause (1) and (2) of clause 1 the words "from time to time" and substituting therefor the words "until January 1, 1991"

If the amendment were worded in that fashion, it would find acceptance here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is there unanimous consent to referring the bill to Committee of the Whole?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Blaker in the Chair.

On Clause 1—

Mr. Blais: Mr. Chairman, I am ready to proceed with the adoption of clause 1. However, I notice the hon. member for Western Arctic is getting up in order to ask a question.

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to know why the minister proposes to change the manner of the wording as its exists in subclauses (1) and (2) at the present time. It says "at any time before January 1". He proposes to use the words "until January 1" in such and such a year. What is the reason for this change?

• (2050)

Mr. Blais: Mr. Chairman, I think the point is well taken. The hon. gentleman will know I have not put the amendment yet.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The Chair is awaiting what I understand is an amendment to clause 1.

Mr. Blais: I would be pleased to propose that now, Mr. Chairman. The proposal is that Bill C-68 be amended as follows: That clause 1 be amended by deleting from paragraphs 4(1) and 4(2) the words "from time to time", and substituting therefor the words "at any time before January 1, 1991".

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It is moved by Mr. MacEachen:

That Clause 1 be amended by deleting in paragraph (1) and paragraph (2) of Clause 1 the words "from time to time" and substituting therefor the words "at any time before January 1, 1991".

Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 1 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 1 as amended agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Title agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill reported.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services) moved that Bill C-68, to amend the Currency and Exchange Act, as reported (with amendment) from the Committee of the Whole, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave now.

Mr. Blais moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO SHORTEN PERIOD REQUIRED TO HOLD ELECTIONS

The House resumed, from Tuesday, June 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières, that Bill C-58, to amend the Canada Elections Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday evening when we were discussing Bill C-58 to amend the elections act I was making a few brief remarks. For the information of many members who happen to have city ridings or ridings which are not as large as those some of us represent, I was trying to bring to the attention of the House that those of us who are incumbents in our constituencies have a profile, having served our constituencies for some time, and we can well appreciate that the 47 days compared to the 60 or 59 days would be of considerable advantage, an advantage not enjoyed by those who are seeking election for the first time within a constituency. While that may be desirable to those of us who are incumbents, I suggest the government is shortening the time because it has more incumbent members than my party or the NDP, and therefore this would be an unfair advantage over the two parties which sit opposite the government. It would be an advantage only to the incumbent members.

I have heard members on the government side, specifically the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher), when speaking to this bill, state that there is money to be saved by shortening the time from 59 or 60 days to 47 days. It has been suggested that those of us representing the constituencies would be able under the present act to initiate savings in our areas as well. However, I would draw to the attention of that member that we will still have advertising for the 47 days, and many of us with larger constituencies will find it impossible to complete our campaign in that 47 days.

My own constituency is some 1,800 square miles and the largest centre of population is 6,000 people. That happens to be the Saskatchewan side of the border city of Lloydminster. My constituency flows along the Alberta border along the North and South Saskatchewan Rivers. Coming along the Alberta side, my constituency touches upon three other federal constituencies: the constituency of Vegreville, the constituency of Crowfoot and the constituency of Medicine Hat. My riding follows the North Saskatchewan River all the way around and back up through North Battleford, joining the North Saskatchewan River and back to within 35 miles north of Lloydminster.

When I first started campaigning after being nominated in 1977—and this is for the information of members who do not have to travel great distances by road—I purchased a car and used it exclusively for political work. I bought that car in April 1978—I hope the people from the Department of Revenue are listening—and put 54,000 miles on it by the time of the election of May 22, 1979. Even then I did not have enough time to canvass every community in my constituency. It may be an impossible goal for a member to canvass every dwelling in his constituency, but to do so in 60 days is certainly impossible. The people of Canada deserve the opportunity of meeting their prospective member of Parliament. They should not be denied that opportunity by decreasing the time by 13 days.

When considering the other problems associated with the present elections act I find it strange the government feels that by decreasing the election time by 13 days it will in some way solve some of those inadequacies. I find nothing in the decrease by 13 days that will help those who are shut in at election time. I find nothing in the decrease by 13 days that will help those who feel it is undesirable to vote by proxy but would like to see mobile ballot boxes. This problem is not solved by decreasing the time by 13 days.

Let me draw to the attention of the House some of the problems that will not be solved by the 13-day reduction. The first relates to the provision of a list which is adequately kept up to date, and the second is the differential between the appointment of rural enumerators and urban enumerators used to provide the information for this list.

In regard to the urban enumerators, the party that obtained the greatest number of votes at the previous election would appoint one enumerator, and the party that obtained the second greatest number of votes would appoint the other enumerator in that constituency. However, with regard to rural ridings, I find that under this bill only one enumerator is to be appointed. I do not see how the incumbent member of Parliament can have any influence in the appointment of that enumerator, if that member happens to sit on the opposition side. Although some might say the government is using this as a form of patronage, I feel it is just an oversight on the part of the government. The government does not realize it has treated rural constituencies in a manner different from the manner in which it has treated urban constituencies.

Provincial constituencies are much smaller than federal constituencies. A federal election campaign in Canada lasts 59 or 60 days. A provincial election campaign in Newfoundland lasts 21 days; in Alberta, 29 days; in British Columbia, 38 days; in Manitoba, 35 days; in Ontario, 37 days; in Quebec, 32 days; in New Brunswick, 36 days; and in Prince Edward Island, 26 days. My constituency is larger than Prince Edward Island. There are more than 30 provincial members in the province of Prince Edward Island; I am the only member from my constituency; I feel I should have for an election campaign at least double the length of time allowed for a campaign in Prince Edward Island. A provincial campaign in the province of Saskatchewan lasts 28 days. There are approximately four and a half provincial constituencies within my constituency.

I do not suggest that I as one man campaigning or any one person assisted by party workers campaigning in my constituency should have four and a half times the number of days to meet the constituents there, but I suggest that the 60 days provided for should not be changed. Forty-seven days is less than double the amount of time a provincial member covering less than one-quarter of my constituency would have to cover his riding. That is one of the reasons we feel that this bill to shorten the period for election campaigns is not something which we would want to see passed without further study.

The hon. member for Mississauga North went to great pains when he was speaking in this debate to point out that several newspapers of our country have called for shorter election periods. He pointed out that the February 3, 1981 Saskatoon Star-Phoenix said the following:

> Even a minimum of 47 days appears to be too long in this age of speed in communication with voters.

The Chronicle-Herald said the following:

> The bill should be put through and made ready for the next election, and not allowed to be withdrawn for consideration until another session.
> And while the MPs are at it, perhaps they might consider further reducing the time allotted for campaigning.

The hon. member for Mississauga North quoted the Winnipeg Free Press as follows:

> This time, Canadians, by accident, had a campaign of more nearly European length with no ill effects.

It is a very debatable point that there are no ill effects, when we consider the outcome of the election. The article continued:

> No one could seriously complain that, in the six weeks they gave themselves, the parties did not have an opportunity to get their messages across to the public. Indeed, the job could have been done quite adequately in a couple of weeks less.

The Toronto Star said the following:

> Shorter, sharper election campaigns would benefit Canadian democracy by concentrating debate and focusing public attention on the issues and policies involved.

If the basis of this bill's having been brought forward is editorials or statements made by several newspapers in our country advocating a shorter election period, I suggest this government, by following that rule and not following some of the recommendations made in editorials which have been presented in the last six months condemning the government for other actions, is reversing its policy. The government should not justify shortening election campaign periods by 13 days with statements made by newspapers. Its justification should be the will of the people.

Some constituents have complained that election campaigns seem to be unduly long. Some people have been absolutely fed up with listening for 29 days to political advertisements on television, seeing them in the newspapers or hearing them on radio. However, this will not be affected by the change in this act. I think it is therefore an injustice to anyone seeking election to this House of Commons to shorten the time. The constituents I serve feel they are too far removed from their member of Parliament. I am 2,000 miles away. I am here for five days a week and home only for two. My constituents do not have an opportunity to discuss with me the issues they feel are important. By shortening the period of election campaigns I think we cause people to be further removed from their members of Parliament and further removed from the House of Commons. They are further removed from their representatives, and I do not feel that that leads to good democracy. I do not think that further removing constituents from their members of Parliament will add anything to the democratic process.

In my constituency and in others we have the benefit of fairly good main thoroughfares. However, some of us must follow railroad lines, some of them built 70 years ago. Many of the villages in Saskatchewan were established along such railroad lines anywhere from six to 12 miles apart. The rationale was that that was the distance a wagon of grain could be hauled by a good team. However, people still live in those small villages. There may only be 12 or 20 people. In the larger ones there may be 100. In some towns there may be 500 or 600 people. If we travel by road, we have to stop and get out. We have to go into cafes and elevators. We have to knock on a dozen doors per town. We have to have some time.

I think we would all like to find some way of avoiding extending election campaign periods, but when I was a candidate first seeking office I would have felt that by shortening the campaign, a disservice would have been done to me. If my opponent had been an incumbent, I would have been placed at a considerable disadvantage, especially if I were seeking election for the first time. I was fortunate that my constituency was a redistributed constituency. The member who held the majority of it prior to the May, 1979 election chose to run in a different part of the constituency. My opponent was a former member of Parliament who had been defeated in 1974. He was known throughout most of the constituency. My other opponent enjoyed about the same recognition as I. However, if I had been running against an incumbent, I would have had much more difficulty.

As I said at the outset, I campaigned from October of 1977 until May 22, 1979, and I did not cover my constituency. I did not meet every member of the electorate, as I would have loved to do. By shortening the election campaign period, we are denying the electorate the opportunity to meet members, we are denying members the opportunity to meet their constituents and we are placing new office seekers running against incumbents at a disadvantage.

In closing, I would like to say that I cannot possibly speak in favour of this bill and support it when there are so many inadequacies within our election system. The inadequacies of which I speak are greater than and in addition to the difficulty in having to campaign for 60 days.

I think everyone is aware this bill was originally drafted by our government, and the reason it was drafted then was that we were in a minority position, an election was imminent and we did not have the ability the present government has of waiting three or four years before having to go to the people. Right now, Mr. Speaker, we have three or four years before another election. We are now in the middle of the ten-year census started June 3, which will bring forth more information as to population distribution and redistribution of constituencies, and indeed, Mr. Speaker, as to whether there will be more seats added to this chamber after the census.

I could understand it if the government had brought forward legislation encompassing the whole of the election act so that we might better be able to conduct an election on the basis of the 1981 census. If that were done and the census information were included—although I do find difficulty in accepting the shortening of the campaign period—and if it were coupled with some moves that I felt were of advantage to the people of Canada, I could accept it. However, as I look at the act now and this shortening of the campaign time, I find it is of advantage only to incumbent members, therefore of greater advantage to the government members because they have more incumbents than we do. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would not be able to support this act.

I would also like to say, while we know that in speaking to this bill we are confined to general statements about the reduction of time, Mr. Speaker, there is again the need to establish a permanent voters' list. There is a need for mobile ballot boxes, and a need to ensure that those unable to vote at a particular time are still able to cast their ballot. I do not see that in this bill. I do not think it is anyone's intention either on this or on the government side to deny anyone the right to vote, but when we look at this bill and at the things I just mentioned, we do not see them. So what we would like to say, even though some of us are speaking against the bill as it is, is that we would very much welcome the government bringing about additional changes to the elections act so as to bring democracy closer to the people of Canada.

There is one thing that has always concerned people of urban and rural constituencies, and in looking at this bill I see it has not been changed. People in rural constituencies who are left off the election list can have a neighbour who is on the list vouch for them and affirm on the day of the issuance of the writ that they are residents. The urban voter does not have that right, I do not know why. I do not think it is because the government of the day felt that the people in urban Canada have no neighbours. I am sure they have them, as we do on the farm. So I think in terms of equality that provision should be in the bill.

I would like to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to speak on this bill, and let me say again that if this bill had in it more changes to the act than merely the shortening of the campaign period, I could find myself supporting it.

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express some very serious concerns, many of them along the same lines as those raised by the previous speaker. As an individual who has been active in the voluntary political process for more years than I care to remember, I find no redeeming social or political value to this bill whatsoever. The bill is described as follows:

> The purpose of this Bill is to shorten the period required to hold a general election from approximately sixty days to forty-seven days. The proposed period would apply to both general elections and by-elections and would be obtained by replacing the requirement that preliminary lists of electors be printed and sent to electors with a requirement that preliminary lists be reproduced in reduced numbers by photographic or other means and that a notice of enumeration be sent to electors.

There is nothing in the bill that refers to any meaningful reform in the electoral process along the lines suggested by the previous speaker. I agree with some, disagree with others, but there is no mention of electoral reform here at all.

The major reason for my strong disagreement is that I believe the bill is wrong in principle and worse in practice. Elections and the political process are too important to be left to politicians alone. They are too important to be left to those who hold elective office, to the paid pros in the political business. They are too important to be left to those who benefit directly in the advertising industry, the professional public relations "flacks" and, if I may use the term—and I mean none of these terms in a derogatory sense at all—the few, the regulars, the party hacks—and I use that in the best sense of the term because I have the utmost respect for those people who continually give of themselves on a paid or unpaid basis in a profession or field which is singularly unappreciated, I think, by most Canadians. However, it is too important a business to be left to those who engage in it for reasons of livelihood or merely because they have a great deal of zeal for the game of politics itself. The political process and elections are too important. To me and to many others, it is important to have people involve themselves in political activity who, while they realize and understand that the business of government is important, usually have other things on their mind, such as earning a living, running a home, paying the grocery bill or trying to build their own business, whatever 1001 things ordinary people see as their priorities in day to day living. Politics is not the be-all and end-all for them, but if democracy is to be healthy, it is important they become involved at some point. You need time to generate activity during the course of an election campaign because ordinary Canadians, the average Joe and Jane who are not thinking about it day in and day out, are not really hit by the fact that they have a choice to make and should become involved when an election is called. For those relatively few in this society, and in most societies for that matter, but for those tragically few in Canadian society who take a serious interest in the business of government and in the business of politics on a continuing basis, to go out and find the people to tap whose interest must be shaken and awakened to get them to participate requires some lead time before you get into the active part of a political campaign.

It seems to me it is vital, and to many others with whom I associate, that we provide the lead time required after the calling of an election, especially in rural and widespread urban-rural constituencies. We must provide time for those ordinary Canadians who have an interest, but not an overriding continuous one, in political and public affairs to be located, activated and mobilized in the democratic participatory political process. Apart from any other differences which we might have in our background and ideologies, surely all of us have a commitment to the idea that more ordinary Canadians should be involved in this business.

Another aspect which was touched upon by the gentleman from Saskatchewan who spoke just before me was the fact that most of us realize that it is important to provide more time for personalized contact between those seeking public office and those who provide the support for candidates who succeed. Whether it be the time taken going house to house or farm to farm to visit with different organizations, whether they be unions or chambers of commerce, to provide personal contact which will make the business more relevant and more meaningful allows those people contacted the chance to feel involved. It will give them the feeling that someone out there really does give a damn.

Unfortunately, many of them out there do not think so, incorrectly, I would suggest. I think almost all of us do sincerely care, but there are a great many people out there who do not share that view. In a day and age when more people feel alienated from society in general, and from the political process in particular, I suggest that it would be absolutely wrong to create a bigger gap by allowing less time for that kind of meaningful personal contact between those seeking elected office and those whose responsibility it is to grant the honour and privilege of representation. By shortening the period of election campaigns, we would be allowing less time for individual contact, less time for the kind of effort which can be made at low dollar costs in terms of involving people and getting the message across in a personalized and direct way. I would suspect that not very long afterward the push would be on to go to greater maximums of political expenditures so that we can make up for the other by again stressing the heavy capitalization of adverstising in the mass media. As was mentioned before, that is the kind of campaigning that I object to.

During the last two campaigns, and I am sure the hon. member was referring to the 1979 and 1980 campaigns, a height was reached in terms of the head bashing commercials which went on. It appeared that no one in the media was saying anything positive at all. Whether by cartoon, by card tricks or by pictures of shell games, however it was carried out, there was a sickening attitude felt by the body politic out there which I feel those who drew up those kinds of schedules really deserved. The fewer people we have personally and directly involved, the more of the same we will have. More emphasis will be placed on that kind of meaningless and hostile type of commercialization. It will not be an informative political campaign as witnessed in the last two election campaigns.

In a 47-day campaign how can you begin to organize in a constituency such as my own? I have 13 municipalities in my riding. The last election was a winter campaign and I hope that we will never get into one of those again. But if we do, how do you go about setting up all-candidate forums in 13 municipalities and a number of other rural communities in a widespread rural-urban constituency?

Mr. Jelinek: It was an accident last time.

Mr. Kristiansen: Yes, it was, and you were the accident, my friend.

How do you organize in 13 different communities and do the advertising necessary to allow people to come in and participate? What most people did in our area, and what I suspect they do in many other parts of the country, is to conduct an old-style political forum where people can be tested, where a battle, of wits can be witnessed. In these types of forums the candidates can be cross-examined and put through their paces. That is a healthy process and that is how it should be, if politics is to survive as a meaningful way of life on this continent over the next number of years.

The hon. member who spoke before me mentioned newspaper editorials and the fact that almost all of them called for shortened election campaigns. Quite apart from the fact that I feel they are misled, I feel that it is the media which has the most to gain by over-emphasizing paid commercialism in politics. Over the last number of years, we have become aware of the lucrative opportunity associated with election campaigns. Perhaps they rate next to Christmas, Father's Day, Mother's Day and Easter in lucrative opportunity. I see no redeeming social value to the shortening of campaigns, and certainly the enrichment of the media is not a very worthwhile one either.

As far as the mechanics of election campaigns are concerned, I have had enough to do with returning officers and deputy returning officers over the years to realize how difficult it is for them in many circumstances, even with a 60-day campaign, to find enumerators, deputy returning officers, poll clerks and the hundreds of other people who must be drawn away from their jobs or homes to successfully provide manpower for a campaign at its present length. The same people are not always there to be called upon. In many cases we tend to rely on the same people year after year, so when a winter election is called, people who would normally participate just cannot manage. It is then that the returning officers in the constituencies must go out in a mad scramble, utilizing all parties, which is good, just to find people who are available and able to be trained in a short period of time. Quite apart from the printing time, it will be very difficult to find people to train, since a great many returning officers go more than a little grey, even with the 60-day provision.

The final point I would like to raise, which has been made before, has to do with the element of surprise being always in the hands of the government. Those within this country who are continually going forth on the binge of calling for fixed election dates often use it as an argument that too much power is in the hands of the government of the day, enabling it to call an election at any time it chooses. I think there are more advantages to the public weal of the current process than there would be in having fixed election dates, such as the process which exists south of the border. There would then be year-long election campaigns, rather than 60-day ones, and the government would be largely inoperative.

However, to shorten the 60 day period even further would really stack the deck, not only in favour of the government of the day, but also in favour of all incumbents. While we who are here at this point may feel rather comfortable at the prospect, we may not always be here, and we certainly were not always here.

I suggest that it behooves us to take a look at what is to the benefit of society at large. One can go overboard. The union to which I once belonged went so much overboard in trying to ensure what it perceived to be the democratic process that at one point it printed its ballots in circles so that no one's name would be on top. That was based on the old western, radical, wobbly tradition. Perhaps that was a little excessive, and no one is suggesting that we ought to go to those lengths, but surely it is not too much to suggest that there should be some lead time provided in order that those persons who have been nominated and have full-time occupations, or those who have not yet been nominated, may have sufficient time. It is not always a matter of choice as to whether or not one thought ahead about one's nomination. Even if one has, and one's occupation is such that one must continually apply oneself to it, one is not that free to get out into the community to become known or to be able to compete on anything approaching an equitable basis until the actual election campaign is called, and that in itself involves sacrifices.

Therefore, I would submit that for all of those reasons there is no compelling argument for the shortening of elections. There is a feeling among the public that elections should be shorter. That is agreed. However, the period to which they are referring is that period which is now restricted, I believe, to approximately 30 days, which is the limited period in which we can now conduct commercial advertising. That is the part that the public finds offensive. If one wants to limit the period that the public finds offensive, let us cut it down by an extra week. Our purpose here is not to subsidize the advertising industry, after all. In any case, none of us seem to use that time all that constructively in terms of putting solid information or options before the Canadian people. The time is used much more on product identification and repetition than on anything of substance or value.

The other point which was mentioned briefly as well was that while the main and only thrust of the bill is, in fact, to shorten election periods, it might have some value if it dealt with some other reforms, or even opened the door by presenting a few. However, it seems overly limited and does not really provide, within its driving thrust, any option to add items which would involve serious electoral reform. As a British Columbian perhaps, because we have had this process in the province for many years, I think that the process of an absentee ballot would be worthwhile. It is subject to much less abuse than the proxy system. It requires much less bureaucracy and finagling than does the proxy system. It can be utilized well, provided that there is a period of some one to two weeks in a country of our size. Of course, it would have to be a little longer than the one week provided within the jurisdiction of a single province to allow for a delayed count for those absentee ballots. It would provide in this country immeasurable opportunities for a broader classification of people than the very limited numbers of those now eligible to use the proxy, and would be of benefit to those people on vacation or away from their residences for considerable periods of time. It would be a major opening.

However, I am not prepared to take seriously or to agree with the proposition that urban voters, as well as rural voters, should be able to swear in on election day. I have been involved in this business for many years. I have been active in downtown Vancouver and in Vancouver centre, right back to the late forties. I was pretty small then, but not small enough that I could not observe what was going on. From observing downtown Vancouver, Atlantic Canada, southern Ontario and northern Ontario over the years, I came to realize that there are reasons why people can swear in to vote on election day in rural polls where people know each other and are readily identified as being actual residents, and what can happen in a downtown area where no one knows anyone and very seldom knows the person living in the next apartment.

I may be an idealist in some sense, but I do not believe in throwing temptation at people and daring them to take up the challenge. There is very often too much at stake in the real business in which we are involved to put that kind of temptation out in front where it counts. There are many reasons for all the rules and regulations, which exist in the elections act which have been built up over the years. The political process is much more alive, democratic and accountable now than it was 20 or 30 years ago, and certainly more than it was 40 years ago. It is much more open and honest. While I prefer to think the best of people, I would not want to throw out temptations to encourage them to do their worst.

I said at the beginning that I strongly believe that elections and politicians are too important to be left simply to the politicians. The major reason I oppose the shortening of election campaigns from 60 days down to 47 days, or shortening them by any time when it comes to the number of days from the call of the election to the day on which the ballots are actually cast, is the importance of elections to the people.

I am sure that many hon. members of this House—and certainly those who organize and work for them—realize how vitally important it is that we maximize the number of ordinary people—not the fanatics, not the zealots, and not just the paid hacks—who become involved and feel that they have a vested interest and a real stake in democratic society. For that reason, I do not know nor do I care what my other colleagues, either in this House or in my own party, think about this particular issue. I have been involved in it for much too long in an organizational sense and I have been too involved with digging out ordinary people who are affected by what happens in this place and in other chambers but who, in their day to day life, have other priorities also. It is important to get those people to take some part despite whatever reasons there may be for the shortening of campaigns.

If we limit the period of voluntary involvement, it will give rise to yet another surge of the kind of hyped up media campaigns which I think most members, and I know the Canadian public, find extremely distasteful. It turns them off not only the political process, but it turns many of them off the idea of democratic politicians.

I am opposed to the bill, and that is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, it was interesting to hear the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen) speaking and giving us a point of view which was I suppose, from what one would call a professional from within his party. There are many of us whose experience with elections goes back as far as his but who have gained it on the basis of running in elections themselves. I can assure Your Honour that I weighed what he had to say very carefully, because it seems that while this bill proposes to shorten the time of an election period to 47 days, it also has some very important and complicated consequential amendments. One thing that no one has referred to is the elimination of the different nomination dates, and the elimination of the schedule 3 constituencies. Now everyone is nominated on the same day.

What is the purpose of this bill, besides shortening the period of the election by 12 days? With 282 members in this House, I dare say that there are at least 250 divergent opinions on how the Canada Elections Act could best be devised for a particular individual.

I concede immediately that I, who have a tightly knit urban riding, have nothing in common with a rural riding in the Atlantic provinces, or perhaps one of the less populated constituencies in Newfoundland or, even closer to home, one of the large, entirely rural seats in the prairie provinces. The two constituencies just do not mix. One thing that we have in common is what we feel is the short attention quotient of the average voter. Now that the voter relies more and more on television, we know very well that the attention given to any program depends on the action. As soon as the advertising comes on or as soon as a public affairs program comes on, that is the time to go to the washroom, to put on a pot of coffee or do something else.

The same thing applies to political advertising. There is no point in individual candidates trying to develop a budget which will cover any amount of direct discussion on the issues, on television. The act is stupid in that it has not increased the amount allowed for expenses, yet the cost of printing and television time have escalated far more than the cost of living. Those things are therefore left to the national budgets and that is one of the chief difficulties. In the last election all major parties got their tails caught in a grinder over the nature of their programs. I would be the first to admit that ours was disastrous, as was that of the Liberals. Every time one went out, one had to face irate voters or constituents who had seen the latest episode of nonsensical advertising of the party.

The election campaign nowadays is used by the media to train their young reporters. They go out and listen to a party leader make a speech, then give us their deathless version of what was said, depending upon their own personal prejudice and "the public be damned". That is why there is such a distortion.

While the objective of this bill may be all right, we all suffer from frustration when we consider the inadequacies of the proposed changes. I listened to the intervention of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) on Monday or Tuesday when he said it was quite wrong to talk about matters that were not included in the bill. With the greatest deference to the hon. gentleman, it is at second reading that one speaks about those things which are not in the bill but which should be there to make it effective. As I understand the rules, one cannot speak about new matters on third reading and there is no more resolution stage, so these things have to be debated at second reading. That is the way to conduct a debate in this House. One must be able to talk about those things which are not included.

All I can say is that, regardless of some of the background noise that comes from individuals who stand behind the curtain and refuse to make a speech on the subject, we will carry on. I am glad to see that hon. members have raised particular points which could have been brought forward along with this bill so that they could be considered by committee. When this bill goes to committee, why can it not receive representation on a variety of subjects? Once the bill has been voted upon by the House, the committee will be limited to the consequences of shortening the time from 59 days to 47 days.

We could engage in speculation about whether a voter is better apprised of an election, where his polling place will be, what the hours of voting will be, if he gets the little card which is now to be the notice of enumeration, mailed by the deputy returning officer of the constituency, instead of getting a copy of the electoral list of the polls with the information of where the poll will be held and stating that the list is certified, and signed by the deputy returning officer. I do not know that the postmen will be any more faithful in delivering those notices to the enumerators than they were in delivering the voters' lists.

In the past, the voter who was reasonably au fait with what was happening during an election and his right to vote was aware that he was entitled to a copy of the list. He did not have to go down the street about three blocks to see it on a pole. Now there are new aluminum light poles to which a voters' list cannot be attached. In any event, the lists would only last about 24 hours because of the neighbourhood kids delight in tearing them down. It is part of the game. How does "John Q. Citizen" verify that he is on the voters' list? He can go to his party headquarters and ask whether he is on the voters' list. But the individual wonders how dumb people will think he is, not knowing whether he is on the voters' list. Yet he should know he is on the voters' list. That card comes late in the game. It is only determined after the twenty-fifth day before the election. That card will not get to the individual voter because, dear know-it-all parliamentary secretary, on the thirty-fifth day prior to an election, the deputy returning officer starts compiling his lists so they shall be ready no later than the thirtieth day. Then copies are made, some for distribution and some for availability. That is the time during which the list is compiled. Based upon those lists, cards have to be written up, addressed and sent to the individual voter at his or her address. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary can devise something quicker than between the thirtieth and the twenty-fifth day. The twenty-fifth day is the day when the cards are sent out. It is also the time when the deputy returning officer will announce the totals of the preliminary lists upon which the candidate's expense account will be based. Those again are details which come later and later in the game in so far as the candidate is concerned. Incidentally, they apply across the line to all constituencies now, urban and rural. Class three is eliminated. All that will be required now, as I see it, is that nominations are to be held 14 days prior to elections for everyone concerned.

In some parts of the country where I think the greatest pressure comes for shortening the election campaign, nomination day is really when the election campaign starts. That is when the active campaigning takes place in many constituencies in the province of Quebec, constituencies which have been won by both major parties. Very little was done before, except for lining up. There was no door-to-door campaigning. Meetings were held. In these last 14 days, meetings were hot and heavy. People came to hear the issues discussed. But try today to get a meeting together to discuss the issues in any election outside of sponsored forums. But farming organizations in western Canada, undoubtedly in the province of Ontario and, perhaps across the country, perform a human service in arranging these forums so that candidates from all parties are before the people who want to hear them. That does not help my friend, the hon. member for the Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson), however. He has a very difficult time getting around his territory because it is so extensive. Even by chartering aircraft or boats, there is no way that candidates in the western Arctic, the eastern Arctic or in some of the other ridings will see the people in their constituency other than perhaps during a swoop in an aircraft when they can wave and throw out some leaflets. Somebody suggested that he might throw out a few cases of beer too. That is quite wrong, but it has been known to happen. That is another aspect of the campaign.

But we should not pay so much attention to this shortening of time in isolation when there are a lot of changes that could be proposed to help put across a much more intelligent election campaign. For one thing, my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) has a private member's bill in which he proposes that the closing times for the polls be uniform as to the exact moment. In other words, if there are five time zones, there are five different times of closing. We would not have that silly consequence of people in Vancouver, living on Victoria Island or in any part of British Columbia, being four or five hours away from poll closing time, knowing the results from Newfoundland and the Atlantic provinces. That is a mockery. This is precisely what we criticize in the U.S. election system, that you can always stampede the last voters by the trends. They like to feel they are part of the bandwagon and if there is a trend toward one party, this will encourage them to do so. That is totally wrong. It is particularly wrong here in Canada. In the last election, for instance, by the time our people were ready to vote two or three hours before poll closing time, and in the city ridings two or three hours before poll closing time is about the time that 70 per cent of the vote is cast, those people knew that what they were doing was not going to help at all. The election was already decided. That is wrong. That amendment, if included in this particular bill, would have been far more meaningful.

There is the question of indexing expenses. Election expenses have now been geared to the 1975 CPI. It has not been changed. It is total nonsense to have that sort of thing.

I find this bill so totally inadequate that I am almost compelled to agree with our colleague from British Columbia that we are not going to have this bill imposed on us piecemeal. This should be part of a meaningful change in the electoral act. There is plenty of time between now and the next election. That is what we should have had in 1979 if the government had thought fit to come forward with this part bill. That would have been fine 18 months ago when elections were imminent. Now it is not so. I would say that it would be far better if we voted against this bill now and told the authors to go back to the drawing boards and come forward with a decent bill.

Some hon. Members: Question.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

THE ECONOMY—(A) STATEMENTS MADE BY LEADER OF LIBERAL PARTY IN ONTARIO; (B) LOW INTEREST RATE PAID ON GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, June 22, as recorded in Hansard at page 10838, I put some questions to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). I used as a basis for my questions statements that had been made over the weekend by the leader of the Liberal party in Ontario to the effect that it was time to impose more taxes on the rich so that the government would have funds to provide more benefits to the poor. Pensioners and others were mentioned in the statement by the Liberal leader in the province of Ontario who had declared inflation to be a Robin Hood in reverse, robbing the poor and benefiting the rich.

Frankly, the purpose of my question was to get to one or two specifics where I felt money should be used for the benefit of those in need. The Minister of Finance said exactly what I thought he would say. He set about telling us that the government has an indexing plan under which all pensioners are thoroughly and completely protected. That is a myth which does not gain any more substance by the telling of it over and over again.

I went from that to one specific group for whom there has been no indexation since 1975. I refer to persons who are holders of Canadian government annuities. For many years the benefits paid under Canadian government annuities were based on interest rates of 3, 3½ or 4 per cent, sometimes a little more. In 1975 that rate as a basis for a calculation was raised to 7 per cent. There it stands. It is still at 7 per cent.

Accordingly, those who are drawing benefits from Canadian government annuities today are getting pensions which are based on a calculation which assumes that their money is earning interest at the rate of 7 per cent. In fact, interest rates today are twice that or more, and I wanted to ask the minister to do something about it. In view of his claim that the government is prepared to protect pensions, why not do again what was done in 1975, namely, raise the rate of interest used in calculating government annuities?

The Minister of Finance, as he so often does in answering questions, wandered all over the lot and never even mentioned the subject. If one looks at the record in Hansard, he will find at the end I asked, "What about government annuities?" That was my reason for putting the question for a late show. I have already indicated to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) that that would be the thrust of my question. I did not come here tonight to argue about Stuart Smith. I came here to try to get the answer to the question I was putting to the minister, is it not time to improve payments under Canadian government annuities?

Sometimes when we raise this matter we are told that they are different. Every time something is not done, it is different from the area where something is being done. We are told that this is a contract and that that contract cannot be upset. Canada Pension Plan benefits are a contract. Old age security is a contract, for if you live in this country and pay taxes, you get old age security. Pensions under various superannuation plans are all contracts, so there is no weight to that argument at all. Canada Savings Bonds are certainly contracts. They are bought at a certain rate of interest that is printed right there in the bond. Yet the government has now come to the realization that with inflation the way it is, it has to adjust these interest rates. Why are the holders of Canadian government annuities left out in the cold? I know that in 1975 we were told, "do not look for this every year, it is not permanent, it is just a one-shot effort." But the facts of the matter are that inflation has got much worse, and this is one group the government seems to have forgotten. I would like to hear from the parliamentary secretary tonight, now that he knows this is the thrust of my question, whether the government is giving consideration to doing now in 1981, or certainly not later than 1982, what was done in 1975, namely to increase the benefits under the Canadian Government Annuities Act. I confess that I have a personal interest in that piece of legislation. As I have said a good many times, it was passed the day I was born. I do not like to see it stifled.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg Centre (Mr. Knowles) is essentially seeking, as we have all heard, an increase in the rate of interest paid on Government of Canada annuities. As the hon. member indicated, they are, indeed, long-term assets if the legislation was introduced on the day he was born.

Mr. Knowles: Seventy-three years ago.

Mr. Evans: Members will recall that the act provided, as the hon. member mentioned, for a change in those rates effective April 1, 1975. At that time annuities that were paying between 3 per cent and 5¼ per cent were raised to the level of 7 per cent.

Undoubtedly the hon. member is aware of Section 5(2) of the Government Annuities Improvement Act which reads:

> The governor in council may, by regulation, amend the schedule in respect of any annuities or category of annuities.

Pursuant to this provision, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) has been closely monitoring the appropriateness of the rate of interest payable on government annuities. In assessing whether this rate of interest should be increased, it is important to bear in mind a number of considerations which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has brought to our attention. Foremost perhaps, is the contractual nature of annuities and the potential effects of a substantial change to the terms of these contracts on other financial instruments, both in the public and the private sector. Related to this is the fundamental issue of the equity of an increase in this rate vis-à-vis all those other Canadians who are also adversely affected by inflation and high interest rates, such as investors in other Government of Canada long-term instruments.

The government's present assessment of the situation, which includes a comparison with returns earned on similar instruments in the private sector as well as an appreciation of the over-all implications of a further positive adjustment, is that no such adjustment should be made at this time. In this connection, it is important to bear in mind that comparisons with rates of interest payable on short-term financial instruments, such as Canada Savings Bonds and guaranteed investment certificates, are misleading in that they overlook the fundamentally different nature of these instruments we are referring to here. This is particularly inappropriate in a situation characterized by high and volatile, short-term interest rates such as we now have.

The government continues to be of the view that the only viable solution to this difficult problem lies in the pursuit of monetary and fiscal policies which will serve to reduce inflation and thereby reduce interest rates for all Canadians. To the extent that narrowly targeted measures of relief lead to pressures for more broader-based measures, these are difficult to reconcile with the ultimate objective of the government.

Mr. Knowles: The government is wrong again.

ENERGY—(A) REQUEST FOR REDUCTION IN FEDERAL SHARE OF REVENUES; (B) ENERGY TAX REBATE PROGRAM

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of last year the price of gasoline at the gas pump in Ontario has increased by 60 cents per gallon. There have been 12 increases in the price of oil products since March, 1980, and all but three of these were increases in federal taxes; not an increase to producers, to refiners or dealers, but an increase to the federal Liberal government. The federal share of the increase in the price of gasoline at the pump is 36 cents per gallon, a 36-cent per gallon increase in federal taxes alone. That is twice as high as the 18-cent per gallon increase proposed by my party, the Progressive Conservative party, just over one year ago.

Our proposal of 18 cents would not only have gone toward the subsidization of offshore imports, it would have provided an energy tax rebate to low and middle-income families, an energy tax rebate for farmers, an energy tax rebate for fishermen and an energy tax rebate for urban transit. In other words, our national energy policy would have led Canada toward energy self-sufficiency during the next decade while at the same time protecting those who could afford increases the least. We had a pricing agreement with the producing provinces in principle, and the only agreement the Liberals have today is an agreement to purchase more oil from offshore. We have more dependence on offshore imports, and we all know the price differential. The cost of a barrel of oil from offshore averages $43. In Canada, the cost is $17.75 per barrel. But the Liberals prefer to pay higher prices for offshore oil and to ask all Canadians to subsidize the difference. The subsidization has reached staggering $5.158 billion this year alone. We pay for it, and that subsidization is growing.

What did the Liberals say before those increases took place? In the 1980 election campaign, for example, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) went from one side of the country to the other saying, "Vote Liberal, and energy prices will stay down". That is what the minister said last February. However, we do not have to go that far back. On May 27, 1980, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) said: "Every rise of one dollar a barrel in oil and its equivalent in gas increases the rate of inflation by almost half a percentage point". I agree with that. We all agree with that, but the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his government have increased the price of gasoline at the gas pump and the price of energy generally in Canada. It has not been to the producers or refiners, at least not to the tune of 36 cents per gallon. That is the information provided to us by the minister's department. It is no wonder we now have a record high inflation rate which leads to record high interest rates which lead to a record high cost of living and which leads back to record high inflation.

Then, believe it or not, the travelling Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—who is too busy to answer questions in the House because he is meeting with his new socialist friend, the President of France—said in this House on June 9, 1981, when speaking about energy revenues: "We would like the over-all result to be the federal government's sharing 23 per cent or 25 per cent of the take". That is my whole point. The Prime Minister would be satisfied if the federal government took in 23 per cent or 25 per cent of the take of energy revenues.

The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has provided us with the following information. In Ontario—and we must look at this one province at a time because prices differ in various provinces due to provincial taxes and other matters—the price of gasoline at the pump is $1.66. The federal take through such charges as sales taxes, excise taxes and the Canadian ownership charge so that Petro-Canada could nationalize Petrofina, is 56 cents, or 33.7 per cent. If the Prime Minister would stay in this country long enough I would like to ask him, if he would be satisfied with a 23 per cent or 25 per cent take of energy prices, why the government does not now lower energy taxes across the board to at least 25 per cent. If the government is not willing to do that, it should at least be compassionate enough to bring in an energy tax rebate to be taken from the excessive revenues it gets from energy resources. The government should be compassionate enough to bring in energy tax rebates along the lines of those the Progressive Conservative party proposed in the Crosbie budget.

Mr. Simmons: God help us.

Mr. Jelinek: Yes, energy tax rebates—I hear guffaws across the way—for low and middle-income families. The Liberals said: "Let us not increase the price by 18 cents." They have more than doubled the taxes. There is no energy tax rebate for low and middle-income families. Why no energy tax rebate for fishermen, farmers and urban transit? Those are the questions we and Canadians are asking, and those are the questions I want answered today.

● (2215)

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite is in such a state of confusion and so befuddled by his pseudo statistics that he clearly has no real understanding of the situation with regard to oil pricing in Canada today. The fact is that at the Toronto pump the price of a litre of gasoline is less today than it would have been under the Conservative formula.

Let us examine the situation in its true light. The fact is the recent increases are composed of a number of factors. For example, wellhead price increases under the Liberals between January 1, 1980 and January 1, 1981, amounted to $4. Under the Conservative budget, it would have amounted to $6.25.

Mr. Jelinek: Hogwash.

Mr. MacLaren: The Syncrude levy, an important part of the total cost at the pump, was and would have been pursued by the Conservative government had it been able to hold on to office. That increase would have been automatic whatever government was in office. Also, the petroleum compensation charge to offset the higher cost of imported oil would, in the Conservative case, have had to be found from general revenues. It is imposed at the pump itself in our case. I do not think there can be any doubt which is the preferable way of imposing that levy. The compensation charge, that money does not go into the general revenues of the government; it is passed on to the refiners. For the hon. member to speak as if somehow that charge was to the benefit of government revenue is to simply misunderstand the situation in Canada today.

As for the special compensation charge to offset the cost of additional imported oil in light of the production cutbacks by government of Alberta, we have indicated that if Alberta restores production, that levy would be immediately removed.

Finally, the Canadian ownership charge brings real benefit to all Canadians through acquisition of assets for the national oil company, Petro-Canada; in this particular case the acquisition of Petrofina. So not only are prices lower in Toronto today than they would have been under the Conservative government, but the other benefits of the Liberal policy should now be evident to the hon. member opposite who is in such a state of confusion about the true state of affairs.

Mr. Jelinek: How can you say that with a straight face.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS—RESULT OF MINISTER'S DISCUSSIONS ON ACID RAIN WITH UNITED STATES SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on April 8 I asked the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) if he could assure the House that as a result of his meeting with the Secretary of the Interior, James Watt, the previous week, the United States would not reduce its powers under its clean air legislation to control acid rain. The minister said at that time that he confirmed the word the President of the United States had given Canada that the United States expects to begin negotiations leading to air quality agreement early this summer.

Those were encouraging words, Mr. Speaker, but last night I was reading a copy of the Ottawa Citizen in which the Minister of the Environment told the Commons on Tuesday that he is extremely concerned about the draft proposals aimed at relaxing air pollution standards in the United States. The article went on to say that the draft legislation suggests the elimination of the U.S. federal power over acid rain pollution. Instead, individual states would take control of this area. There can be no doubt that acid rain is one of the most serious environmental problems facing our country today. Indeed, the costs of this pollution in our northern lakes in the sport fishery, for example, have been estimated at a billion dollars a year across our country if no action is taken. Likewise, the cost of acid precipitation, for example the effects on crops and forests, is estimated to be some several billion dollars annually throughout North Amercia.

It was the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) speaking at New York State University in Buffalo on May 2, 1981, who pointed to the solution to the problem. I believe it must be a joint solution, with action taken by both Canada and the United States. In that address the minister said:

> I believe, also, that legislators in the United States are unlikely to fly in the face of our historical methods of resolving problems common to our two countries. Canada and the United States have developed a long tradition over the years of solving their environmental problems effectively, fairly and with careful attention to international law and responsibility. The Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement is a particularly fine example of how our countries have co-operated to deal effectively with a large-scale pollution problem.

I think it is that spirit of both countries acting together which I believe can be the most effective approach. So it was with some concern that I read this report by the Minister of the Environment wherein he said that he is concerned that the control by the United States federal government may be lost. I contrast this with the action taken by the House of Commons last year when it unanimously provided the authority, through amendments to the Clean Air Act, to meet our international obligations, especially with the United States.

I hope that the parliamentary secretary responding tonight can give us some positive information. In my own constituency, the Department of the Environment and other agencies of the federal government are carrying out a very extensive research program at the Turkey Lake research facility, located some 50 kilometres north of Sault Ste. Marie, where last year some 15 person-years and some $800,000 from the Great Lakes Forestry Research Laboratory has been dedicated to learning more about this critical problem facing our nation.

I am hopeful that this action within our own country, the research imposing tighter limits and controls on our industry, and ensuring that new industry has adequate control combined with an effective new international agreement with the United States, will lead to a better position relating to this problem. I hope that the minister will be able to assure us that the actions of the United States will not have an adverse effect on those areas of Canada which suffer from these transborder pollutants.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first of all let me thank my colleague and friend, the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), for raising this issue in the adjournment debate tonight. It is an issue which is coming in for a lot of discussion, and so it should. We welcome the opportunity to discuss it here again this evening.

I believe his concern is well founded. I hope I am wrong. For that reason, I hope he is wrong. However, we get some disconcerting signs from the United States. We saw the leaked cabinet document, in the last week or so on the subject of proposed revisions of the Clean Air Act in the U.S. We saw some of the appointments to positions of environmental authority in the United States. Frankly, they constitute fairly disconcerting signals.

Against that, we have a number of assurances which have been given to us by the U.S. administration, both by the former administration of Mr. Carter and by the present administration of Mr. Reagan, and assurances from the office of President, right on down to other positions of authority in this particular area.

First of all, let me just reflect for a moment on the memorandum of intent which was signed last August between the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) for Canada and the then secretary of state of the U.S., Mr. Muskie. First, that memorandum committed both countries to begin formal negotiations by June of this year, which is this very month. Second, it also provided for five joint working groups to do some work preparatory to the beginning of negotiations. Third, it committed both countries to taking certain interim control measures under existing legal authorities to reduce transboundary air pollution.

As I say, that memorandum was signed last August under the former administration of Mr. Carter. As Your Honour will know, Mr. Reagan was here in Ottawa some months ago in March. At that time, in meetings with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and with the Minister of the Environment, the U.S. President gave full commitment that the undertaking and the memorandum of intent of last August would be honoured, that it was the U.S. administration's intent to pursue the work of the five working groups that I mentioned earlier, and it was also its intent to begin negotiations with Canada in the month of June of this year.

Subsequent to that particular meeting, the Minister of the Environment went to Washington and met with the new secretary of the interior, Mr. Watt. At that time, we received similar assurances to that which we had received from the U.S. President earlier.

Two days ago, the negotiations actually began in Washington. They were somewhat clouded by the uncertainties over the Clean Air Act review in the United States. On that particular subject, the Canadian delegation recorded very strong concern that domestic regulation be adequate to deal effectively with transboundary air pollution.

Finally, let me say that as we see it, the battle is far from over. We in Canada cannot let up for a minute. There are strong lobbies in Washington which want to convince the U.S. administration that there is no problem. There is a lack of awareness among the American public. Our job is twofold. First, we want to raise that awareness. We are doing that through pamphlets which we are distributing in the U.S., through speech-making in the U.S., and we are also continuing to impress upon the U.S. administration the need to honour its commitment made last August, and subsequently.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock.

At 10.28 the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

INDUSTRY

INTEGRATION OF RECYCLING INDUSTRIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing and considerable importance. In view of major energy, environmental and conservation gains through recycling of many products, including iron, copper, aluminium and paper, and in view of the recent comments by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) regarding his appreciation of the opportunities, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek):

That the government integrate the already considerable recycling industries into a development and industrial strategy for Canada, and provide direct and indirect encouragement to the Canadian Association of Recycling Industries.

I would also like to urge, Madam Speaker, that the government start by asking the Association to recycle the scrap art that adorns the Ottawa airport parkway.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TREATMENT OF NORTHERN TRAPPERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, whereas the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) in his crackdown against northern trappers has, through his officials in Edmonton, told trappers that they face a tax penalty of 25 per cent going back to 1977, and has refused to allow deductions for the upkeep of dog teams which have to be fed throughout the summer, as well as the trapping season, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek):

That the Minister of National Revenue cease his retroactive persecution of trappers, particularly those who are unable to read and write, and who live in remote villages hundreds of miles from the nearest accountant, and that he seek a remission order to give trappers similar tax benefits to those he has already given to public servants and employees of large corporations.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLITICAL PARTIES

CONDITIONS NECESSARY FOR LIBERAL-NDP COALITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, in light of the Prime Minister's statement in France that the inclusion of four communists in the French government was no different than his attempt to include members of the NDP in his government, and whereas this is an insult to 32 members of this House who have been supportive, to a greater or lesser degree, of government policies, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski):

That this House direct the Prime Minister to make a statement on motions concerning the terms and conditions upon which the coalition between the Liberal party and the federal NDP could take place, whether security sensitive portfolios in cabinet will be offered to NDP adherents, and whether he makes any distinction between communism and democratic socialism.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RAILWAYS

NEED FOR NEW SAFETY INSTRUCTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Madam Speaker, whereas the CN train that crashed in Sundridge, Ontario, was the third such derailment in 18 months involving trains containing dangerous, explosive goods, and whereas the government during that same time has responded with all the necessary studies, with new legislation and with new regulations, but all of this is stalled while the CTC conducts yet more public hearings, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni):

That this House urges the Canadian Transport Commission to hurry up, to recognize that we are going to run out of miracles where nobody is killed, and to get started on the last stage, the most important attack on this deadly threat by issuing new safety instructions to the railroads.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

BAN ON PARTICIPATION OF FEMALE PLAYER IN SOCCER TOURNAMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity which I know will receive the unanimous consent of the House.

In view of the fact that a member of a Danish soccer team has been barred from playing in one of the world's largest youth soccer tournaments, the Canadian Robbie International, simply because she is a female, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House requests the Minister of Labour, who is also the minister responsible for sports, and the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who is also responsible for the status of women, to intervene immediately with the organizers of this tournament and advise them that public funds used to support this organization will be withdrawn until they bring an end to this practice of sexual discrimination.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT BORROWING COSTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that commercial borrowers can borrow on commercial paper in the United States at 15 per cent, or borrow on bankers' acceptances for 90 days at 16.5 per cent, that international corporations can borrow on the Euro-dollar at approximately 17.5 per cent, that the American government can borrow its 90-day treasury bill money at 14.3 per cent, and in view of the fact that this government today paid 18.83 per cent to borrow its 90-day money, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That the government immediately constitute a special committee of this House to inquire as to why the Government of Canada pays significantly more to borrow money than commercial corporations pay in the United States, than multinational corporations pay on the world market and the United States government pays on its treasury bills, and that this House does censor this government for deliberately maintaining a high interest rate policy in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AVIATION HALL OF FAME

SUGGESTED FEDERAL FUNDING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, the City of Edmonton has established the Canadian Aviation Hall of Fame to preserve and highlight the heroic flying deeds of some of the early bush pilots of the north. These pilots are national aviation heroes. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the federal government generously support, by way of an annual monetary grant, this very worth-while endeavour that is in the national interest and, furthermore, that this House strongly recommend to the board of directors of the Canadian Aviation Hall of Fame that it give due recognition to the aviation exploits of Mrs. Don Bartsch, an outstanding northern Canadian bush pilot.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIRPORTS

CASTLEGAR, B.C.—PROVISION OF SAFETY FACILITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on an urgent matter of potential life and death. Earlier this spring the Ministry of Transport supplied Castlegar airport with a long awaited large foam truck to replace the smaller emergency vehicle previously available, but the ministry failed to act on the linked request for the larger fire hall and garage required by the change. Thus, the new foam truck will be left sitting useless outside during the coming winter with its tank drained to avoid freezing. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That this House urge the Minister of Transport and the government to give immediate priority to this emergency request for. basic air safety and fire protection at Castlegar, and quite literally stop two-bitting West Kootenay air travellers to death.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the Minister of Agriculture's recognition of the justified complaints of the hog producers of this land when he announced this week a complete change in the hog stabilization program for this year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

● (1115)

That this House congratulate the minister for changing his mind, providing an example which other ministers can follow on misguided policy, especially in the hope that the Minister of Agriculture can have some influence with the Minister of Finance to change the government's usurious and unconscionable interest rate policy which is punishing all primary producers and thereby adversely affecting all Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance has responded to questions in a way which implies that he understands the economic crisis which primary Canadian producers are facing now, small businessmen and farmers. He says he recognizes the crisis. He is also aware of the offer this side of the House has made for a one day's extended debate, or whatever is required, to allow expansion of the small business development bond to include operating capital and venture financing, and also to include unincorporated businesses.

I wonder if the Minister of Finance can tell the House and the Canadian people whether he intends to make the announcement he has discussed, or whether we are forced to go through the summer without knowing before the end of this session of Parliament whether or not this will be an opportunity to which small businessmen and farmers can look forward.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has referred to the small business development bond which, in its present operation, is of very substantial benefit to small business. As I have indicated previously in the House, the Canadian banks have dedicated about $750 million for the use of the small business development bond already, and I am told by the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism that when all the institutions together are added up, the total amount dedicated to the small business bond is about $2 billion. That is a very substantial source of funding at about half the market rates for small businesses intending to engage in expansion and modernization.

There is, in addition, a provision in the bond by which funds can be made available to small businesses in financial difficulty. As I have indicated in the House previously, we have had discussions with the chartered banks to make it possible that wider use be made of this particular aspect of the bond in order to help small businesses in refinancing difficulties. In the present circumstances the small business development bond is an extremely useful and effective instrument, and in that light it is not my intention, for example, to recommend its extension to unincorporated businesses because of almost impossible administrative problems which would be involved.

GOVERNMENT PLANS

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, I am familiar with some of the figures the minister has mentioned in terms of the financing of the bond and in terms of the amounts of money which have been dedicated by the institutions. The point I would really like to make in my supplementary question is the impact there is on primary producers because of the high interest rate policy and the fact that the small business development bond as it stands now does not address that, and that the primary producers cannot continue to produce with interest rates of 20 per cent to 23 per cent. They cannot continue to stay in business.

The minister is well aware of the number of bankruptcies. He is well aware of the impact on the total economy. There must be an extension of that program. There must be a provision for opening that up to relieve the financial pressure on agricultural producers and small businessmen of the country. Because of the impact there is now and the impact there will be on the total economy, people who were initially hurt are now becoming tremendously aggressive and angry.

The minister must look at some other measure. If he does not wish to use that measure, is there any other specific measure the minister has in mind which he will introduce before this session of Parliament ends so that these people have something to which they may look forward?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has asked a very general question, and I have answered already about my view of the small business development bond. I am also investigating the use which could be made by members of the agricultural community of the small business bond in particular instances. I had discussions on this subject last week with the treasurer of Ontario, Mr. Miller, to see in what way incorporated farms might be able to take advantage of the small business development bond. I acknowledge that there is a problem facing cattle and hog producers particularly, not only because of interest rates but because of market conditions and other costs which have added to their operating costs, such as the cost of fertilizers. It is not my intention to go beyond that at the present time.

NEEDS OF PRIMARY PRODUCERS

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my final supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I asked a specific question which he did not answer, as to whether or not he was expecting to introduce any other specific measure before the end of this session of Parliament so that these people would have something to which they could look forward.

If the minister is saying that he will introduce a measure and expand it for the agricultural community, I accept it very gratefully. But my real question is that in the time period we have now, how can the government maintain its credibility in discussions with the OECD at the upcoming summit meeting if we do not address ourselves, as members of Parliament, to the economic needs of the primary producers of the country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it seems to me the best way for Canada and the government to maintain their credibility is to continue a strong anti-inflationary policy. As I have said very frequently in the House of Commons, any anti-inflationary policy will totally lose its credibility if at the same time the government attempts to insulate the whole community from the effects of the anti-inflationary policy. This seems to be the view of the official opposition. I have said that we will attempt in particular hardship cases to ensure, where it is humanly possible, to help either home owners, small businesses or farmers to live through what is undoubtedly a very difficult situation. This is the policy we are attempting to implement. I believe in the long run it will be successful.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT BORROWING COSTS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my supplementary questions are directed to the Minister of Finance. I point out to him that he must develop some credibility before he can start maintaining his credibility. He does not have any credibility on this side of the House, he does not have any credibility to the small business people and home owners who are paying 18 per cent and 19 per cent interest rates.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blenkarn: The minister is not prepared to look after small business people and farmers. What will he do with respect to the cost of carrying Canada's debt?

He made certain proposals and suggestions at the time of his budget. At that time I pointed out to him that the treasury bill rate was about 12 per cent. It has been 16 per cent, 18 per cent, over 18 per cent, and nearly 19 per cent for the past 6.5 months. What is the increased cost of carrying the government debt to be borne by all people of Canada because of the high interest rate policy of the government at this time? What are the minister's estimates?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is obvious the increased interest rates which have occurred since the budget must be included in any estimate for the fiscal year 1981-1982 and that the outlays required to finance the debt will be substantially increased. I regret it very much. I argue very strongly that we ought to take every possible step to stay on track and to reduce the deficit in order to avoid the very substantial outlays which are required in order to finance the debt.

REQUEST FOR REORGANIZATION OF GOVERNMENT'S FINANCIAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, we have not seen much in the way of suggestions from the other side on how to decrease the deficit. I point out to the minister that the Americans borrow their treasury bill money at 4.5 per cent less than he has to pay.

I ask the minister, if this government is not prepared to do anything for farmers, small businessmen and the home owner, why does it not at least do something for itself? Why does it not reorganize its financial affairs so at least it does not have to borrow at 18.8 per cent where the cost of whatever you borrow doubles or triples in three and a half years? Why not do something for itself if it cannot do something for the people of Canada?

An hon. Member: They don't care.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, of course I dispute totally the suggestion of the hon. member that we have not been doing anything for small business, home owners or the farmer. The facts are totally opposite to what the hon. member states.

An hon. Member: You are doing it to them, Allan, not for them.

Mr. MacEachen: He talks about the short-term interest rates in Canada and compares them with the United States. Yesterday there was a treasury bill auction in Ottawa with a very slight increase. Why? When the hon. member poses his questions in the House he might pose one or two to himself and ask why there was that slight increase yesterday? The answer is that there is a very strong demand for money in this country, propelled by a very strong economy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —and producing a lot of inflationary expectations. That is the answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POST OFFICE

LABOUR RELATIONS—RECOMMENDATIONS OF CONCILIATION BOARD CHAIRMAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board concerning the important negotiations going on with the postal service. Considering that the conciliation board chairman made important recommendations on health and safety, annual, statutory and maternity leave, and that the union has accepted these proposals with only a slight modification to one, could the minister tell the House why the government has not accepted these recommendations, and in fact why it is going back to its January position? Is this not a perfect illustration that the government is bargaining in bad faith and in fact is trying to provoke a strike?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, this is just utter rubbish.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: And completely and fiscally irresponsible. The government is making every effort to reach a satisfactory conclusion with the postal workers. We are in negotiations, and they are not taking place on the floor of the House of Commons; they are taking place at the negotiating table where they should be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

COST OF PROPOSED MATERNITY LEAVE BENEFITS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): The minister should know a lot about rubbish; he specializes in it. It has been the union that said the government is not taking the negotiations seriously and that it is back to its January position.

On maternity leave specifically, since only 239 women among all the inside postal workers took advantage of maternity benefits under unemployment insurance last year, would the minister confirm that the cost of implementing that one item is minimal and, if so, why does the government not live up to its pledge last year in Copenhagen to all Canadian women by agreeing to this very reasonable proposal that its own impartially appointed conciliation board chairman recommended?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am gratified at least by the interest the hon. member is taking in women's rights. I would like to point out that we, over a period of several years, have been moving forward on a variety of fronts, and I have had very few comments from the hon. member for Oshawa with respect to part-time employment policy—

Mr. Broadbent: Rubbish.

Mr. Johnston: —or with respect to a very generous maternity benefit package last year. I did not hear the hon. member for Oshawa stand up and tell us what a wonderful thing it was at that time, with respect to flexible time.

● (1130)

Incidentally, I would hope to make an announcement later in the day with respect to day care centres. With respect to our affirmative action programs, and with respect to equal opportunities for women's programs, I have only heard criticism from the opposition. These are other things that we have been doing. We are fully committed to the principle of maternity benefits, as we have demonstrated in the past.

Therefore I say to Your Honour that we are negotiating all items. I think we have been moving forward on all fronts for a period of years with respect to rights for women in the work force. It is about time the hon. member of Oshawa stood up and congratulated the government for some of the initiatives which it has already taken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the minister knows that there is not a women's group in the country which would agree with what he has said on affirmative action programs or maternity leave benefits. This government has been a complete cop-out, and the minister knows it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Even the province of Quebec, the minister's home province, has a maternity leave benefit which is twice as good as what the government is even considering, for all its civil employees in the province of Quebec.

GOVERNMENT POLICY TOWARD PUBLIC SERVANTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Since the secret document which the minister dismissed, a secret document which came out of the cabinet in January, which I released a few weeks ago, indicated that the government was going to single out, amongst others, postal workers and other civil servants as a kind of whipping boy for its anti-inflation program—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Will the minister now admit that the position the government is taking in bargaining with the inside postal workers is a perfect illustration of its attempt to make a scapegoat of public servants—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: —as a substitute for a serious anti-inflation program?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, that is even more rubbish.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: Earlier this year when the hon. member for Oshawa produced this secret document, it was then established that it was not a cabinet document. At that time I told the hon. member for Oshawa exactly what our posture was, and it has nothing to do with fighting inflation on the backs of public servants.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT FORMER CHIEF OF COMBINES BRANCH APPEAR BEFORE PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. On Tuesday the minister flatly denied that he had any knowledge of an RCMP investigation into the Combines Investigation Branch of his portfolio. Yesterday, in reponse to my questions in the House, he again refused to acknowledge it, despite the confirmation of the RCMP, and of his colleague, the attorney general. Finally, he broke under questioning from the official Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Corbett: I suggest that hon. members opposite take the time to read some of the transcripts of what takes place in this House. Perhaps he will now respond to my question as to whether he is prepared to call the former chief of the combines goup, Mr. Bertrand, the chief investigator, before a special parliamentary inquiry to testify not only about this very serious matter, but also about the uranium cartel and the oil and gas price rip-offs, regarding all of which Mr. Bertrand must have very in-depth knowledge. If the minister is not prepared to call Mr. Bertrand before a special parliamentary inquiry, will he inform this House why not? Just what is he afraid of?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, my answer is very simple. Mr. Bertrand did his job, completed it and published his report, and this file on the uranium cartel is now on the desk of the Minister of Justice. I do not see any point in asking Mr. Bertrand to come back and do all over again a job he has already completed. As to the first question of the hon. member, who was smiling when he asked his question, I understand that he is somewhat embarrassed himself by the evolution of that case and of his questions, and that he fully appreciates the fact that it is best to let the RCMP perform its duties.

[English]

ACTION TO STOP LEAKS FROM DEPARTMENT

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, there is no embarrassment on my part. I can assure the minister that if there is any embarrassment it should be on the part of that very callous government which apparently knows no shame regarding any matters under consideration in this House. Let me tell the minister that he has a responsibility to this House—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Corbett: —and he also has a responsibility to the people of this nation.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Corbett: The combines investigation group is in his department. As the responsible minister for that department, has he satisfied himself of the source of the leak, and is he sure that there will be no further outbreaks of that nature, and no further leaks from within that department?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the hon. member now knows that the RCMP is looking into this matter. I think that should satisfy him. Obviously, thousands of people work for the government and there is no way a minister can be expected to vouch for the conduct and the behaviour of all his employees who work not only in the federal capital but throughout the country as well. Asking the question amounts to giving the answer. No individual can possibly be absolutely sure that all the people who work under him are doing their work properly. What is the issue and what is important is that, if someone is guilty of an offence, steps must be taken immediately to correct the situation. That is being done and the hon. member ought to be satisfied with that.

ENERGY

ENERGY SECURITY—NEWFOUNDLAND AND QUEBEC SITUATION

Mrs. Eva Côté (Rimouski-Témiscouata): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and deals with the tabling of a draft bill on energy security as well as the statements made by the Quebec premier during a press conference yesterday. Could the hon. minister tell the House whether the proposed amendments to the act on energy security would affect in any way the conditions that now exist between Quebec and Newfoundland and interfere with the contract signed by these two provinces?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, as I was listening to Premier Lévesque's press conference, I was saying to myself that insults are the ultimate weapon of those who do not have valid arguments. In fact I want to make it absolutely clear that the draft bill which was tabled will bear no impact on the contract signed by Hydro-Quebec and the Churchill Falls Corporation. This is a legal and valid contract which can be amended by either party. The draft bill that was tabled will not have any effect on that agreement. The bill will merely make applicable to interprovincial or international power lines the provisions which for years have applied to oil and gas pipelines.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF GAMBLING PROGRAMS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister of fitness and amateur sport. When the original Olympic lottery was introduced in order to defray the costs of the Montreal Olympics, the Liberal government at that time gave Canadians and the House its assurances that no further lotteries or gambling operations would be initiated. That promise, as the minister knows, has already been broken. It has now come to my attention that the minister is well on his way to extending federal gambling programs to what is known as all-sports betting, in other words, reducing the government to the status of bookies for betting on hockey games, football games and so on. Without once again copping out by giving a stock answer blaming the previous government, can the minister confirm or deny whether his government is contemplating such action?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. member has asked me this question because, in doing so, and in indicating that he has this information that we are well along our way toward planning a system whereby one can place a bet on any game or any sort of sport, he shows that his information is as accurate as it usually is in those benches. I would inform the hon. member that the government has no such plans.

As the hon. member was so badly misled by his usual poor informants or sources, le me say to him that when he talks about the question of gambling, life is a gamble in many ways. Certainly politics is. The gamble which the former government took with its budget did not work out. At the present time the provinces of Canada are raising approximately $350 million from lotteries in the country, and the federal government is not operating one.

I hope the hon. member shares my belief that some of the money realized from lotteries should be used for those responsibilities in culture and sport that are at the federal level, as well as having a very large amount of it go for provincial aspirations.

Mr. Jelinek: The minister does not have to tell me about the needs of amateur sport.

Mr. Rossi: You don't know anything. You should listen to him.

CONSIDERATION BY OFFICIALS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Is the minister telling us that neither his department nor any other department of government has been considering sports betting? If not, can he explain why officials from at least four federal departments have confirmed that this proposal is under consideration? At the same time can he assure the House that all sports betting or any other new gambling operation will not be implemented, now or in the foreseeable future, by that government?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has asked me to explain why officials of four departments told him that we are going into all sports betting. I do not believe they did that. If well-meaning public servants said anything in that regard, I think the hon. member has misinterpreted or misunderstood what they said. When he talks about us going into all sports betting, he is skating on very thin ice indeed. I assure him that it is important that we have funds for amateur sport, as he himself has indicated. I say to him that we are looking at other possible sources. We have said again and again that we would love to get back into the lottery business, which was given away unreasonably by our predecessors. We do not contemplate any such scheme as the hon. member has mentioned.

PIPELINES

ALASKA GAS PIPELINE—AMENDMENT OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister is aware that we meet in court on Monday in Vancouver over the prebuild of the Alaska pipeline.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Which one is the accused?

Mr. Waddell: In view of the fact that Mitchell Sharp, the pipeline commissioner—no, he won't be there but our lawyers will be there—the head of the pipeline company in the United States and the American bankers have said that the line cannot now be completed before 1985, and the government's order in council said, as hon. members will recall, that it would be completed by 1985, does the government have any plans to bring in legislation to amend the Northern Pipeline Act properly?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I wish my hon. friend good luck in his court case. Usually court cases are fought before a tribunal and not in this House. I suggest that if my hon. friend wants arguments for his case, he will have to develop them himself. I am not going to fight his case for him.

Mr. Waddell: I am not asking about the rightness or wrongness of parliamentary procedure. I am asking the minister to deal with the issue of the whole pipeline.

FINANCING OF PROJECT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): The fact is that the pipeline cannot be financed right now. As the minister knows, we on this side of the House want the whole line to be built. When the minister was in opposition, the minister expressed the view that if we built this span alone, we would get more and more pressure to export Canadian gas rather than building the complete line. He said that when in opposition. Let's deal with the reality. First, is the minister prepared to encourage the Americans to finance the whole pipeline by encouraging the settlement of native land claims in Canada? Second, when the Prime Minister meets with President Reagan on July 10, will he be prepared to discuss the pipeline completion and the guaranteeing of adequate financing for the whole line?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member suggests that the line cannot be financed. That has not been demonstrated at this time. Discussions are taking place between the utilities, the producers, and in financial circles in the United States. Steps are being taken to amend the presidential order to facilitate the financing of this project. This issue was discussed with President Reagan when he was here. He reiterated the full support of the Government of the United States for the construction of the whole pipeline. I am happy that the New Democratic Party is also in support of the construction of the complete Alaska pipeline.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They are going to raise the money for it at their convention.

Mr. Lalonde: Negotiations regarding the land claims with the native people of the Yukon are taking place at the present time. They are very active. The government is taking every step to ensure that this important project for Canada will be realized. I just ask my friend to have more confidence in the government.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DETENTION OF CANADIANS IN PERU—POSSIBILITY OF INVESTIGATION BEING ESTABLISHED

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Last week, both in this House and elsewhere, the situation of Canadians held or interrogated in Peru was discussed, and it appeared from the answers given by the minister that the RCMP had not been involved with Canadian citizens in Peru. However, on Monday, two Canadian women just returned from Peru stated that, far from doing nothing, the RCMP had played a negative role and used what has been described as torture in dealing with Canadians in that country. In view of this information, has the minister looked into the matter and can he tell the House whether the RCMP has been involved in some way with Canadians held in Peru?

[English]

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, there is an important exchange of information policy between the RCMP and other police forces touching the international movement of drugs. In Peru we have an RCMP liaison officer who informs local authorities about movements of suspected drug dealers. We obtain similar benefits from foreign police services with regard to movements to Canada.

There was a particular incident in which a member of the RCMP acted as an interpreter during an interview which took place in Peru, but that was a simple translation function. I can categorically confirm what I said in the House last time, that the RCMP certainly did not participate and did not witness the types of incidents that were described by Miss Durand that I read about in the media when she came back to Canada. In fact when Miss Durand was arrested in Peru by Peruvian authorities, since the RCMP have no authority to act as policemen in foreign countries, 5.5 pounds of pure cocaine were found and an illegal drug factory was discovered. The decision not to proceed with prosecution of her was not made by Canadians but was made by duly constituted Peruvian authorities.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL PROJECT—SOCIOECONOMIC IMPACT

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion with regard to the possible involvement of his department in the development of coal mines in north-eastern British Columbia. Has the minister examined his position to determine the need for a socioeconomic impact study and whether it would be advisable to convince the province of British Columbia and the companies to negotiate terms relating to socioeconomic conditions that will be imposed on the area? I ask that with the particular view in mind of helping not only the new community but the existing community to cope with the massive influx of new population to assure that the additional costs that will be placed on the area will not be too onerous.

• (1150)

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): As you know, Madam Speaker, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion did participate with the province of British Columbia on feasibility studies and socio-economic impact. Further to the respresentation of the hon. member a few days ago about those studies, and there are over 100 of them covering several aspects of that major project, I have undertaken to have all those 100 studies placed in the Library of Parliament to be available to all members. As for future commitments of my department for the implementation of that project, that will, of course, be a decision of the whole government. As you know, negotiations are going on at this moment.

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC HEARINGS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, as the minister knows, there has not been any type of public hearing; in other words, there has not been any input either from individuals or municipal leaders in the area with regard to the whole development. In fact these studies the minister has referred to have not been available to municipal leaders in the area, even though the project is already committed and the tenders have been called.

Will the minister undertake to discuss with his counterpart in British Columbia and with his cabinet colleagues here the advisability of holding a set of public hearings in the area to determine the socioeconomic impact, with input from the local area and, having done that, insist on the establishment of a set of socioeconomic terms and conditions under which the project should proceed henceforth, before he makes his decision to spend public money to help the project along?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, it is precisely in response to the representations of the hon. member, bringing to my attention that all those studies, co-financed by my department, were not made available to the community and to the local leaders of that region of British Columbia, that I undertook that they be made available in the library. I could not send copies of those 100 separate studies to every member of Parliament.

As for the question of scheduling public hearings so people can present their own views about that project, I think the paramount authority there is the provincial government, but I would certainly support the view of the hon. member that the community in that region should have an occasion to put forward its own point of view about the development and the impact of that major project.

Oral Questions

EXCISE TAX

EFFECT ON PRICES IN CANADA

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who will recall that earlier this week this House passed Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, which contained a provision providing for an ad valorem tax on the items covered by that act. The provisions with regard to ad valorem have the effect of increasing the amount of tax that is generated in the event the price of the product increases, and reducing the amount of tax that is extracted from the public if the price of a product is reduced. There is no known Minister of Finance who would want to reduce the tax extracted from the public; accordingly that bill in itself must have as its object the increasing of tax. The minister just returned from an OECD meeting in Paris, France—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Gamble: You will have the question. He suggested there that the main objective of the government was to "break inflationary expectations", and he has recited that purpose in the House a number of times. How does he equate that alleged objective, so announced in Paris and in this House, with a bill passed by this government which has the absolutely opposite effect, telegraphing as it does to the Canadian people that the government expects prices in Canada to increase?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the bill does not telegraph any such message at all, in my opinion. It is not now the government's bill, it is the bill of the House of Commons as it was passed on third reading by a very strong vote and received the endorsation of the House.

CANADIAN POLICIES

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, I can proudly say that on all those occasions I had an opportunity to vote against that horrendous legislation.

One of the high interest rate impelling reasons that has been given is the need to sustain the value of the Canadian dollar; in the event that our interest rates in Canada dropped and were not in fact tied in some way to those in the United States our dollar would suffer a genuine battering on the monetary markets. The minister will know that—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Gamble: The minister will know that just recently the Conference Board of Canada has suggested—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I can sometimes accept that a first preamble might be a bit long, but certainly not a second one. Would the hon. member put his question.

Mr. Gamble: Madam Speaker, would the minister indicate to the House why, during an election campaign, we may have a made-in-Canada oil policy for pricing, but while his government is in office we cannot have a made-in-Canada interest rate policy for this country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I tried earlier to explain to the hon. member for York North that there is presently in the Canadian economy a very strong demand for loans. Yesterday when we had the auction for treasury bills the pressure on the treasury bill rate was established by Canadian bidders for funds. While I do acknowledge that there is obviously an impact on Canadian interest rates as a result of rates in the United States, and there is a balance between interest rates and the exchange rate, nevertheless I think there is at the present time in Canada a made-in-Canada inflation that is resulting in a made-in-Canada pressure upwards on interest rates.

INCREASE IN FARM BANKRUPTCIES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, in light of the last answer by the Minister of Finance, perhaps he could explain how it is that the dollar volume of personal and small business loans plunged by 60 per cent and 47 per cent respectively during the first quarter of 1981, according to Statistics Canada? This would seem to fly in the face of what he has just told the House.

My supplementary question to the minister has to do with this, Madam Speaker. We have had more figures released today that show that farm bankruptcies in Ontario have gone up 51 per cent and across Canada they have gone up 31 per cent. In light of what the minister has been saying about the need to have anti-inflationary policies, and we all agree on that but we want anti-inflationary policies that work, will he explain how farm bankruptcies, how cutting down on farm investment, and how cutting down on food production is conceivably anything other than a totally inflationary policy, because this cuts down on supply?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has used a percentage increase in the rate of farm bankruptcies which in itself might create anxiety, as any bankruptcy would, but the hon. member knows that, because of the very small number of farm bankruptcies, that percentage increase is not a very meaningful figure. The fact of the matter is that of the very large number of farms in Ontario the number of bankruptcies has been very, very small, and that testifies to the stability of agriculture in the province of Ontario. There have been some cases that are related to interest rates, but there have been some other important causes as well.

I do not think the hon. member ought to attribute all the developments in the agricultural industry to interest rates. There are such things as markets and crops and other costs which have added to the problem as well.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, with respect to the complacency of the government and the minister in light of what has gone on, I am reminded that yesterday the government appointed Gerald Bouey to the Order of Canada, with interest rates of 20 per cent. One can only conclude that, if interest rates go to 30 per cent, Mr. Bouey will be named Governor General of Canada.

IMPACT OF UNITED STATES INTEREST RATES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the minister. It has to do with the very, very mixed signals we are getting from the government. When the Prime Minister speaks to this House he tells us that it is the fault of the Americans. He tells us that when he conducts the Summit he is going to be joining with his European colleagues to tell the Americans that they have to get interest rates down, that that is the message the government is going to be taking to the Summit, and that that is one of the consequences or results the government hopes to get out of the Summit, yet when we listen to the minister we get an entirely different answer. He tells us that interest rates in Canada are a product of what is going on in Canada.

I would like to ask the minister a very simple question. What is the message the Government of Canada is going to be taking to that Summit with respect to interest rates? Is it that interest rates are too high because of what is going on in the United States, or is he going to be telling President Reagan to keep interest rates up in the United States, that we are going to keep them up here, and that this is the policy which is really going to work?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member obviously was not listening to an answer I gave a few moments ago to another hon. member when I talked about the obvious impact that interest rates in the United States have on the Canadian economy. There is no doubt about it. There is an impact on the Canadian economy and on every European economy.

However, that is not the whole story. There is a very strong demand for loans and money in Canada at the present time which, the addition to the pressure from the United States, is adding to the upward drive on interest rates in Canada. It is not just one cost; it is several. The hon. member is a master of complexity, and I would like him to apply his talents to this particular field as well.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

INTRODUCTION OF OMNIBUS BILL

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. Has the President of the Treasury Board been able to settle his differences with the Minister of Finance over the omnibus Crown corporations bill? If so, when will the bill be tabled in the House of Commons?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am grateful that the hon. member brings to the attention of members of the House this very important piece of legislation which, when brought forward, will essentially govern Crown corporations which are responsible for billions of taxpayers' dollars. Hence it is obvious that it can only be done with the greatest care and consultation. The Minister of Finance and I have been consulting for some weeks on the matter, together with other members of the government, and I think great progress is being made to bring forward a bill which all members of the House will recognize as being a major step forward in the control and accountability of our Crown corporations.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I would have loved to have had the English translation of the minister's answer.

GOVERNMENT PRIORITIES

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, may I bring to the attention of the President of the Treasury Board the answer he gave to the House on May 14, 1980, as recorded at page 1093 of Hansard when he said, and I quote:

> It is my intention to bring forward a Crown corporations bill incorporating such amendments to the proposed legislation as may be necessary to resolve some of the difficulties which have been raised. I hope to do that at an earlier date. I also regard that, as the hon. member does, as a priority item.

That was 13½ months ago. If that is the way the President of the Treasury Board feels about a priority item, how does he feel about matters of lower priority?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, not only is it a priority item but it is also a very important one. That is the point I made in my first answer. I do not think we should act precipitously in terms of legislation which is going to govern the control, accountability and direction of all our Crown corporations for many years to come.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. As the minister knows, there is great concern within the business community and the international community about introductions of changes to the customs procedures in Canada. I want to ask the minister a simple question. Is he intending to introduce a new Customs Act prior to this House rising or before this session ends?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, there is a new Customs Act being prepared in consultation with my colleagues, but I do not anticipate that it would be introduced before the present session ends.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

INTRODUCTION OF NEW TRUST COMPANIES ACT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister of state for financial institutions. At the time of the consideration of the revisions to the Bank Act the minister used as a trade-off the pending introduction of a new trust companies act. During the past several weeks we have seen an unseemly disorder in attempts to take over major trust companies in Canada. Would the minister tell us when that legislation will come forward, and will it follow the principle of the Bank Act to limit the size of individual holdings in major financial institutions in this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, with regard to the first part of the question asked by the hon. member as to when we intend to introduce a bill to revise the legislation on trust and loan companies, I can say that I would like to do so as soon as possible. As concerns the policies on which this bill will be based, unfortunately, I cannot announce them until they are approved by cabinet.

[English]

MINISTER'S VIEWS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, will the minister agree with me that at the time of the discussions on the Bank Act he expressed serious views with regard to major holdings and attempts by major individuals in the country to take control of our senior trust companies?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, as I recall the discussions we had in this regard, they dealt mostly with the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Bank Act. Both these acts contained provisions on the limitation of share ownership and I commented on the position of the government concerning the provisions of these two measures then before us.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

TABLING OF POLICY RESPECTING LEGAL FEES FOR MEMBERS AND FORMER MEMBERS

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, following the questions put yesterday in the House by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), I would like to table, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), a copy in both official languages of the policy of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police concerning legal fees for members and former members.

PETITIONS

MR. FLIS—SUPPORT FOR RECOGNITION OF JULY 1 AS CANADA DAY

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table petitions from the metropolitain Toronto Canada's Birthday Committee supporting the proposed Bill C-37 officially recognizing July 1 as Canada Day. I am pleased that all three parties have agreed to debate Bill C-37 in this House on Monday, June 29. The passage of this bill will emphasize our belief in a united country belonging to the people of Canada and will express our pride in our great land.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

CONCURRENCE IN EIGHTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra) moved that the eighth report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, presented to the House on Tuesday, June 23, 1981, be concurred in.

He said: Madam Speaker, in moving concurrence in the eighth report of the Public Accounts Committee I just want to say a few words of explanation before asking the House for its concurrence.

It has been a short tradition—but, nevertheless, a tradition—for all chairmen of public accounts committees in Canada to meet once a year. This third meeting is to be held next month in St. Andrews, New Brunswick. I, as chairman, am unable to attend this year and the vice-chairman, the hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Desmarais), also cannot attend. Therefore, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), former chairman of the committee, will attend.

It was decided at our meetings last year in Winnipeg that it would be helpful if a member of the research staff of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts attended and, of course, his expenses will want to be covered.

This meeting is held at this time so as to correspond with the meeting of legislative auditors from across the country, and I am happy to say this year's order of business will include the so called Kelly report prepared by John Kelly for the Canadian Comprehensive Auditing Foundation dealing with Standing Committees on Public Accounts. It will be most helpful if the House will concur in meeting the expenses of the research officer and the member of the committee travelling there.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 63, 111, 2,304, 2,505, 2,558, 2,569, 2,570 and 2,585.

METRIC CONVERSION

[Text]

Question No. 63—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What was the average cost to merchants in the test cities Peterborough, Ontario, Kamloops, British Columbia and Sherbrooke, Quebec, where metric conversion was put into practice on an experimental basis?

2. Did many merchants purchase scales at an average price of $5,000 and, if not, what was the price?

3. Is the government aware that the United States government has estimated the cost of metric conversion between forty and one hundred billion dollars and, if so, do the figures conform proportionately to the situation in Canada?

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): In so far as Metric Commission Canada is concerned:

2. The exact cost of scales conversion to merchants in the test cities of Peterborough, Kamloops and Sherbrooke is not known. However, the cost of converting scales varies with the type of scale involved as follows:

Modern Electronic Digital Scales—These have a built in conversion capability and are usually converted at no charge.

Early Models of Digital Scales—Conversion costs vary from $300 to $1,000.

Mechanical Scales in Good Condition—Costs vary from $100 to $400, depending on the type of conversion chosen.

Automatic Labelling and Prepack Scales—These scales are only used in larger supermarkets and are convertible at $800 to $900.

It should also be noted that many merchants took the opportunity of metric conversion to upgrade or replace scales which had obsolete price ranges, e.g. scales which had a maximum price range below today's price requirements.

2. The only scales with an average price of $5,000 or more are the sophisticated automatic labelling scales used by the larger supermarkets. Such scales are convertible and do not need to be replaced.

The average price for normal electronic digital scales is in the $2,000 range and for new cylinder scales around $1,000.

3. The basis of estimates of $40 to $100 billion as the cost of conversion in the U.S. is not known and thus no comparison can be made with conversion costs in Canada. Experience has been that actual costs are normally much less than original estimates, for example, General Motors have found the cost to be less than 1 per cent of their original estimates.

METRIC CONVERSION OF "CALORIE"

Question No. 111—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the "calorie", under the changes to the metric system, a metric measurement and, if so, is it planned to drop the word and to substitute with "ergs, joules, kilojoules" and, if so, what is the purpose of dropping a word or measurement with which Canadians are familiar to be replaced by such difficult names?

2. In what way does the government feel that this will benefit the Canadian economy?

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): In so far as Metric Commission Canada is concerned:

1. The Weights and Measures Act of 1971 specifies the International System of Units (SI) as the latest evolution of the metric system to be legal in Canada. The calorie and the erg are obsolete metric units which, not being coherent, in the case of the calorie, nor a preferred sub-multiple, in the case of the erg, are not used with International System of Units (SI). (Source—CSA "Canada Metric Practice Guide" 1979 Edition). The joule and its preferred decimal multiples and sub-multiples will replace both the calorie and the erg. The kilojoule is equivalent to one thousand joules.

Most everyone is familiar with the SI unit of power, the watt, and the expenditure of energy at the rate of one joule per second produces a power of one watt. The energy consumed by a 100 W light bulb is 100 J/s (joules per second), and if one leaves a 100 W light bulb burning for one hour the energy consumption is 360,000 J or 360 KJ (kilojoules). Other ways of expressing this are obviously 100 W.h (watt hours) equals 360 KJ (kilojoules) or 1 W.h equals 3.6 KJ.

The use of the kilojoule was recommended for the human diet by the Intersectorial Committee on the Adoption of the Kilojoule in its 1975 report and again in its revised 1980 report. This is a committee of Metric Commission Canada under the Health and Welfare Sector. It is made up of volunteer members representing diverse groups such as: Canadian Medical Association, Canadian Dietetic Association, Canadian Grocery Products Manufacturers Association, Consumers' Association of Canada, and the Sports Federation of Canada.

2. The benefits of adopting the joule parallel those of adopting the International System of Units, including rationalization of energy terms and simplification of energy calculations.

(a) Rationalization

The use of the joule will promote consistency, rationalizing the many units now used for energy into a single unit. This one unit, the joule, will replace the several calorie terms such as large calorie, kilocalorie, thermo-chemical calorie, cal 15, IT calorie, in addition to replacing other energy terms such as British Thermal Unit and therm.

(b) Simplification

Various types of energy are interconvertible. Because the joule will be the sole unit used to describe energy, time and money will be saved by reducing the number of calculations required in converting among energy units. Only one energy unit will need to be taught, thus saving time in the educational process. It is the internationally accepted SI unit for energy.

Potential benefits of this are: it will facilitate tracing of convertible energy in the ecological cycle; facilitate economic studies for the efficient convertibility of energy; simplify comparison of data among scientific disciplines; and facilitate cost-benefit analyses of energy required for crop production versus energy released by metabolization of crops produced.

TASCHEREAU PAPERS—CBC NEWS COVERAGE

Question No. 2,304—Mr. Cossitt:

With respect to the Taschereau Papers as dealt with in the House on March 25, 1981, did the CBC news program "The World at Six" on that date and the news program "The World at Eight" on the day following ignore this subject completely and, if so (a) what are all the reasons (b) is this policy based on the possibility that persons with former and present CBC connections might be named in the Taschereau Papers?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications):

I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: the hon. member's question in the House on March 25 was not mentioned in "The World at Six" on that date or "The World at Eight" the following morning. However, the Taschereau Papers were mentioned in "The World at Six" on March 26 in a reported interview with the Hon. Allan Lawrence, PC, QC, MP.

(a) It was an editorial judgment not to report on the question.

(b) The editorial and journalistic considerations involved do not constitute a CBC policy. With regard to the remainder of (b), see Beauchesne, fourth edition, Chapter 5, section 171(i) re questions containing imputations.

PERSONAL INSURANCE CO. OF CANADA

1. Have departments become involved in providing information to employees concerning methods of obtaining personal insurance on automobiles, houses, etc. through the Personal Insurance Co. of Canada and, if so (a) which departments (b) under whose authority was the step taken in each department?

2. In each case, were competitive proposals or bids obtained from any other insurance company and (a) if so, what are all the details (b) if not, for what reason?

3. To the knowledge of the government (a) what are the names of all the directors, officials, etc. of the Personal Insurance Co. of Canada (b) what was the annual premium volume in each category of insurance written by the Company in each of the past five years?

4. To the knowledge of the goverment (a) is the Royal Insurance Co. the largest insurance company in Canada (b) what was the annual premium volume in each category of insurance written by the Company in each of the past five years?

5. Did the government investigate whether or not the selection of the Personal Insurance Co. of Canada was based on any form of patronage from the Liberal Party or from any government official and, if not, does it intend to do so?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Treasury Board and the Department of Insurance as follows:

1. The Treasury Board is not aware of any department or agency coming under its purview being so involved.

(a) not applicable;

ASSOCIATION CANADIENNE DES VÉTÉRANS DU HOCKEY—FINANCIAL SUPPORT

Question No. 2,558—Mr. Gamble:

Did any department provide financial support during the fiscal year 1980-81 to the Association canadienne des vétérans du hockey and, if so, in what amount?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour):

The Association canadienne des vétérans du hockey received a contribution of $79,112 from Fitness and Amateur Sport during the fiscal year 1980-81.

TREASURY BOARD—NUMBER OF DEBTS WRITTEN OFF

Question No. 2,569—Mr. Cossitt:

In each of the past four fiscal years, what was the total amount of debts under $5,000 owing the government that were written off by the Treasury Board, including the number of debts involved and the dollar value by year?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board):

In each of the past four years the total amount of debts not exceeding $5,000 due to Her Majesty deleted by the Treasury Board and the number of debts involved is detailed in Public Accounts under the following references:

TREASURY BOARD—DEBT DELETION

Question No. 2,570—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Over the past four fiscal years, were debts over $5,000 owing to the government reduced to one dollar to get around the fact that debts in this category could only be wiped out by statute and, if so, how many?

2. (a) What was the total amount of the actual debts before such reduction in each year (b) what was the actual dollar value before reduction to one dollar in each year?

3. What is a complete list of all such debts over the four-year period, including the full amount and the name of the person or corporate enterprise involved?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board):

1. No debts in excess of $5,000 were reduced to $1 to get around the fact that debts in this category could only be wiped out by statute. By section 18 of the Financial Administration Act, Parliament has reserved the right to delete debts exceeding $5,000. Traditionally, the authority for the deletion of debts has been included in supplementary estimates by means of a nominal $1 vote. The $1, which is not actually spent, is required for the item to be included in the related Appropriation Act and its passage legislates the deletion because of the vote wording.

2. (a) Pursuant to the explanation provided in 1. above, the total dollar value of the actual debts deleted by vote through an Appropriation Act over the past four years is detailed in Public Accounts under the following references:

1980	Section 31	page 31.7*

*The debts approved for deletion by the Treasury Board in this year were not deleted by parliament.

(b) See 2. (a).

3. The manpower and other resource costs required to list the name of the person or corporate enterprise and the full amount of each debt is prohibitive.

TREASURY BOARD—PERSONS IN TEMPORARY ASSIGNMENT POOL

Question No. 2,585—Mr. Howie:

1. How many persons were employed by the Treasury Board in the temporary assignment pool as of April 1, 1981?

2. What was the salary level and what were the duties of each position?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board):

1. Forty-three.

2. The temporary assignment pool is a group of senior executives and officers who can undertake priority assignments of a temporary nature within departments at the request of the deputy minister.

As of April 1, 1981, the distribution of TAP positions, the salary ranges and duties were as follows:

Position: Senior Policy Advisor

Classification and Salary: SX 3 / $46,800 to $64,000

Total number: 9

Summary of duties:

Under terms of reference established at the deputy ministerial level, the senior policy advisor assumes responsibility for planning, program evaluation and policy analysis of major programs in the department to which he is assigned.

Examples of the responsibilities associated with such assignments would include the following: review and analysis of legislative and constitutional basis of departmental programs, and the development and presentation of proposals for amendments to enabling legislation for cabinet consideration; representing the department, in respect of assigned areas of responsibilities, before the Treasury Board and cabinet, Parliamentary and Senate committee.

Position: Policy Advisor

Total number: 14

Summary of duties:

Plans, directs and co-ordinates projects associated with the analysis, evaluation, organization and/or development of departmental capabilities in respect of new or revised programs of major consequence to departmental operations.

Examples of the responsibilities associated with such assignments would include the following: Development and presentation of proposals for revisions to legislation for consideration by the deputy minister and/or minister; analysis of departmental programs, objectives and requirements in light of changing economic social or political requirements, and development of associated advice and recommendations to the deputy minister and minister.

Position: Policy Advisor

Summary of duties:

Plans, directs and carries out assignments relating to the appraisal, analysis and development of policies and programs on behalf of federal departments and agencies: review legislation, policies and precedents relating to assigned areas of responsibility, and developing and presenting proposals and recommendations on new or revised programs, changes to legislation and/or amendments to policies to senior management of the department; develop and present, for consideration by senior departmental management and/or the minister concerned, recommendations for improvement in the effectiveness and efficiency of departmental operations.

Position: TAP Officer

Classification and Salary: AS 8 / $33,600 to $41,500

Summary of duties:

Under the general direction of a senior executive, conducts a program of study and evaluation of the department and more specifically of the areas of assigned responsibilities; evaluates the effectiveness and efficiency of existing programs in terms of departmental objectives and legislative responsibilities and analyses departmental requirements to meet these responsibilities; develops and presents recommendations for changes in policies and programs; provides consultative and advisory services for the implementation of changes in policies and programs; directs assigned staff resources.

Position: Policy Analyst

Classification and Salary: ES 7 / $43,922 to $47,859

Total number: 2

Summary of duties:

Under the general direction of a senior executive conducts major project evaluations of the effectiveness of actual or proposed departmental policies, programs or projects, in realizing the objectives of the government and the department to which he is assigned at the lowest cost in terms of other objectives. The policy analyst is responsible for providing recommendations on the concepts and methodology necessary for the development of the project proposals, and prepares project reports, summaries and advisory memoranda for senior officials of the department to which he is assigned.

Note: All TAP positions with the exception of the 2 ES positions are to be converted to the new management category. Salaries will be revised accordingly effective April 1, 1981.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58(10)—ALLEGED FAILURE TO BRING BEFORE PARLIAMENT ECONOMIC POLICIES

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey) moved:

That this House condemns the government for failing to bring before Parliament effective economic policies to deal with the present economic crisis and end the disastrous interest rate squeeze on the small business, industrial and agricultural sectors.

He said: Madam Speaker, this motion is put forward on our final opposition day of this session at a time when there has been criticism of this party in terms of the motions we have brought forward previously, and also at a time when there is a question in terms of government inaction in addressing the economic difficulties faced by Canada today.

I would like to restate the motion we put forward because I think it is really at the heart of the difficulties in terms of the government's viewpoint and what needs to be done:

That this House condemns the government for failing to bring before Parliament effective economic policies to deal with the present economic crisis and end the disastrous interest rate squeeze on the small business, industrial and agricultural sectors.

That is a fairly strongly worded motion, Mr. Speaker. The word "condemn" is there, a word I think none of us likes to use in normal conversation, particularly when addressing the Government of Canada. However, it is an appropriate word because the inaction of the government in addressing what is truly an economic crisis threatens in the long term to put us in a position where economic recovery will be impossible. In the short term it addresses the issue of what will happen to the primary producers of this country.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has heard all this before. The difficulty is that he is not addressing the problem. He answered some questions today in a way that really slips through and slides around the issue and difficulties being faced by producers, small businessmen and the people of Canada who are facing the brunt of these economic policies.

Whatever the minister has said so far, the bottom line of the whole issue is that what he is doing is not working. If he argues that his high interest rate policy is to reduce consumer spending, he makes the case very well today that the pressure for loans on the banks is as high as ever. The fact is that we are facing continuously high interest rates which have not decreased in the face of government policy over the past six or nine months, ever since, in fact, the government took power. The situation is not improving; rather it is deteriorating.

One of the main problems faced by the government, and the Minister of Finance addressed this very directly in some of his comments today, is that the high interest rate policy by itself is not the single problem. There is no question about that. It indeed happens to be the biggest single problem faced by producers, by entrepreneurs who would like to start a business, or small businessmen who have an opportunity to expand but cannot because they cannot face the interest rate charges. He talked about fertilizer in the agriculture industry.

The Minister of Finance just spoke proudly of Bill C-57. He has to know that in that bill he imposes a 30-cent tax which affects the cost of fertilizer, the cost of home heating for numerous Canadians, that in fact affects our ability to export because exports of natural gas to the United States are down 25 per cent. Minimum quantities of gas are being taken because American consumers do not want to face that additional charge and they are now looking to their own supplies. So instead of taking the maximum amount which would return revenue to the government, they take minimum amounts, which again reduces government revenue. Farmers must face the higher fertilizer costs in combination with the other pressures they have. Home owners and people who must pay heating bills have to face these higher costs. So it is in fact a combination of effects as a result of the government's total economic policy which has led us to the crisis we are now facing.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, individual Canadians are proud people. They do not want to face financial losses such that they have to declare bankruptcy. They do not want to suffer what they consider to be the shame in their own minds, if not in others, of incurring the losses and failure identified by the statistics we call bankruptcies. That is why those statistics do not tell the story about Canadians who withdraw from or do not enter into business activities or farming. They do not tell about the people who quietly go their way without complaint because they have pride, a pride which we should try and foster.

It is a little like the farmer I talked to last night who has farmed for his entire life and has a son who would like to farm. He would like to help him but he is faced with a situation now, with interest rates being the single most significant economic factor, where he has sold his farm and will sell the rest of his property and withdraw completely from agriculture because he sees no future in it. That person is representative of the over 1,000 people in Ontario who withdraw from agriculture each year.

The Minister of Finance spoke about the strength of the agricultural community. Indeed, that is true. There are 700,000 people in Ontario alone who are either directly or indirectly affected by and depend on agriculture for their livelihood. That figure is vulnerable today because that community is vulnerable as a result of the combination of effects, with interest rates being the most important.

Last fall businessmen responded to a survey by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. On questions regarding the effects of high interest rates on their particular businesses, 55 per cent of them responded by showing their profits were in fact reduced as a direct consequence of these rates. That is a sector of our economy, Mr. Speaker, which accounts for somewhere near 60 per cent of employment. Those people are vulnerable. They face the same kind of pressure. Indeed, they are the same kind of people who do not want to face bankruptcy and who will withdraw, if they can, quietly and proudly in order to avoid the shame of bankruptcy. The number of those people is the number which is really important, and the number of those people will be quadrupled by the fall of this year.

The question which must come up is wherein the responsibility lies for the present crisis. We know from the statistics of 1980 that consumer spending figures are fantastic. The amount of money Canadian consumers have spent on consumer goods is somewhere around $167 billion. In one way or another the people of Canada are entrapped in a situation which has left them as individual consumers at a point where they have a habit of spending perhaps more than they should and have a credit habit which has been fostered over years of affluence.

The government has been in power now for 16 years with the exception of nine months. The government itself must set an example. In looking at the example the government has set for them, these people must ask themselves these serious questions: Where is the government coming from; what is it saying; what is it doing? The government has campaigned and repeatedly indicated the effort it has made to reduce its deficits and the effort it must make to reduce its spending. The bottom line is what the government is actually doing in contrast to what it is saying or the example it would like to set for Canadians. We know that we are spending well over $60 billion this year and that the deficit has risen to $14 billion. This is the kind of example Canadians have come to look to; it is the kind of model they have to follow in their own personal lives. This is one of the critical reasons why there is great difficulty in looking at a resolution to this problem.

The other aspect is the banks. Are the banks the ones to blame? What is happening with the banks? If we look at some of their statistics and quarterly figures, we will see some amazing results in terms of operating profits and revenues. In the case of one bank, in the first quarter of 1981 its operating profit was $211 million. In the second quarter of 1981 the profits rose by a factor of four to $1,140 million. Not all banks have followed the same dramatic increase; there have been some changes.

The minister was talking about the small business development bond this afternoon. He discussed the amount of money which was put into the small business development bond. In fact, it is somewhere around $700 million and it could be about $2 billion, if things keep going the same way, by the end of 1981. Those figures have not really influenced the profits of banks. In that case they will not influence the taxation aspect of the banking system. The banks have indeed done well. There is no question that it is costing them more money to borrow and there is a balance somewhere. The banks have been part of the scheme. Their rates have been usurious. They have been criticized. In fact they are the focal point of individuals faced with bearing the brunt of high interest rates. They are part of the system, and the bottom line of the system is the government which needs to provide leadership but has provided no example at all.

The government's example is so ingrained and so much a part of the system that there will have to be a dramatic reversal in a number of areas in order for there to be any improvement. The specialization which occurs in the different branches of government is one of the key issues. These are broad issues which will not provide us with the answers today, but they are worth mentioning because they are important.

Let us compare the people in the Department of Finance with those in the Department of Agriculture and in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. These people are focused in their own territory. They have become highly specialized in one area. They have no sense of the integration which is required or of the ripple effects of their actions and directions in a number of areas. These people are well qualified. They have come up through a system which has perpetuated very understandably their own self-interest. They have a position, they have a territory. Unfortunately the necessary overview for economic survival and enhancement of the whole system is not there. It is somewhat like a specialist in pediatrics who deals with infants. He is topnotch in his own area, but he wonders why the mother of his patient who is on welfare goes out and becomes pregnant again; perhaps he will treat another child with the same congenital disease.

The problem is that there is no one focusing and putting together the different aspects. There is no one who has a feeling for it. As capable and well-intentioned as is the Minister of Finance, he does not have a grasp of what is really happening in terms of the energy future, the agricultural aspects of the economy, or some important things which are necessary for economic recovery. The integration of all those matters is not there.

The Minister of Finance likes to discuss the international aspects or the impact of such things as interest rates in the United States upon the Canadian scene. It has been mentioned many times before but it needs to be mentioned again that not only do we have a unique situation in Canada in terms of opportunities, distances, and a range of important elements but we have a system of government which has developed over a period of time.

Within that system we have developed a particular rationale for economic and monetary policies which does not take into account any of the other things happening in the United States at the present time, such as the bill before Congress to reduce taxation by $35 billion. The Americans brought in bills which deregulated the oil and gas industry to allow the private sector to thrive, to do the things which needed to be done in terms of exploration and development, and to do everything necessary for their energy future to be as secure as possible. Canada has not dealt with these matters in the same way. This is not good. It is really like trying to avoid the real issue by saying, "Yes, interest rates have an impact on our system and what we do in Canada with interest rates". But we cannot do this in isolation. If we look upon the Americans as an example of what to do, we should look at what they are doing in other areas as well to regenerate their economy. Perhaps we just hope to slide along with them in the event they are successful.

My final point concerns government priorities. A moment ago I mentioned the criticism that we on this side of the House have endured because we chose to use one allotted day to consider a moral issue. The day after, the government chose to introduce a bill on hijacking. The government has numerous opportunities, endless days, wherein it can introduce any legislation it wants. We on this side of the House would be more than pleased to co-operate and to deal with the serious economic issues with which the country is faced rather than the peripheral issues that are important in many ways but have no real effect upon the economic situation of Canada.

What are the results of this interest rate policy which we now have in this country? I think that the most succinct expression of this comes from a letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) from the Canadian Institute for Economic Policy, which I would like to read. I am sure that the Minister of Finance has read this letter. There are six points in it. These points state, in terms of what I consider to be a very credible body, the effects of the interest rate policy. I would simply like to describe them now. First:

> They have slowed down the rate of growth in the economy with the result that we have higher levels of unemployment than should be permitted.

That unemployment level is now well over a million and may be 1.25 million.

> The cost of unemployment, the under-utilization of our human resources, can be measured in economic terms. But the social cost represented by the frustration of those who cannot find jobs, and sometimes the broken homes that are the result, are no less real even though they cannot be measured statistically. Moreover, a sluggish economy means that government revenues are depressed and thus government deficits are considerably higher than they should be.

I am sure that the Minister of Finance has heard of the Lefler Curve, the disincentive in terms of taxation and the experiences which have been gained in other countries, and the disincentive for individuals, for entrepreneurs and for business to engage in business activities because of the taxation rate. I think that is the emphasis of the first point which this report has brought forward. Second:

> Small and medium-sized businesses—most of which are Canadian owned—tend to borrow heavily from the banks for their capital requirements. As interest rates have gone up, more of these businesses have been driven into bankruptcy. The number of bankruptcies in March 1981 was 29 per cent higher than for the comparable month a year ago. With interest rates now payable by small businesses of 20 per cent or even higher, more bankruptcies can be expected.

The minister, in answer to questions earlier, responded by saying that the total number was not bad. While he is in the House, I would like to say that, in fact, the absolute numbers are not that great when one looks at Canada as a nation. However, when one talks about those numbers, one is really not talking about the impact that these interest rates are having because of the number of Canadians who voluntarily withdraw, first of all, from their businesses and their enterprises, whether it is farming, tourism or whatever. It really goes beyond that, because at some point in time some of those people who have been severely affected even tend to withdraw from our system and lose confidence in it.

Third:

> High interest rates discourage all business enterprises, both large and small, from investing in new plant and equipment. The exact opposite is needed in the interests of improved productivity.

Fourth:

> High interest rates have increased costs all through the economy and, therefore, are themselves inflationary.

This is another principle which the Minister of Finance continues to deny, will not accept and will not face:

> In particular, they have added substantially to the cost of housing. This makes it very difficult, if not impossible, for young people starting life to purchase a home of their own, which is still the dream of most Canadians.

Fifth:

> High mortgage rates are causing considerable difficulties for home owners and for some farmers. Some have lost their homes as a result.

Finally, sixth:

> The Bank's continued efforts to encourage an inflow of capital, by keeping interest rates high, has resulted in a substantial increase in our foreign debt. And the carrying charges on this debt have added to the deficit on current account in our balance of payments.

Those are the six consequences of the high interest rate policy of the government. I think they are well stated. They give a broad picture of what is happening because of the government's policy.

One of the critical issues which comes as a consequence of decreased business activity is a dependency on government to seek revenues in other areas. This is part of the disastrous cycle in which we now find ourselves in Canada. It is part of the rationale and the motivation for many of the measures which have been brought forward in bills such as Bill C-57.

The effects caused because the government wants to increase its revenue have strained the fibre of our national unity to almost the breaking point in many regions of our country. The issues are really premised on two things. They are premised on a question of central federal control which in many ways I would support, and I think it is appropriate; but they are also premised on the basis of government needing revenue because its other policies demand it. It does not invest or manage the economic affairs of the nation in a proper way. Therefore, it requires these revenues which, in themselves, defeat the purpose by decreasing activity in a number of areas.

Mention was made of the inflationary aspect of an ad valorem tax. This is unfortunate type of tax. Any ad valorem tax is unfortunate. However, it is unfortunate in the sense that, in itself; it again adds to inflationary pressure. It gives an example to everyone of the kinds of things which the government is going to do to maintain a revenue base when, indeed, the government should be trying to develop a tax base from a healthy economy instead.

I think there is no question that the only way we can achieve any resolution here is through economic leadership which must be provided by government. The banks will not do it. Individuals are now caught in circumstances where most of them really do not have an opportunity. Some larger corporations which have a considerable amount of equity may find some ways. However, in many cases those people are using a tax system which certainly will not provide increased revenue to the government in the short term, but they are avoiding taxes by doing things which larger institutions and corporations can do. In the end result, there might be a final concentration of power into larger corporations, chain stores and the sectors which can survive and withstand the pressures of the government's policies, or the government itself might expand and continue to have to try to provide support and relief measures for those people who have been disadvantaged and, in fact, thrown out of work by the policies which the government itself has created. People demand from the government and, in fact, need from the government the welfare support which is the only answer for their own personal survival.

However, the only way we can get recovery is through leadership from the government on an economic policy which will face, in terms of the productive sector, the needs it has in terms of borrowing costs, other advantages, the taxation system and deregulation and decontrol of the many aspects which are frustrating the production of many materials, including agriculture. There was an estimation that by simply deregulating, by simply taking away the massive controls and regulations which impose themselves upon the agricultural sector, the agricultural community, the primary producer, would save $1 billion a year in Canada.

There were a number of questions on the small business development bond earlier in the day. While the minister is now here, I would like to spend a moment on the small business development bond. At this time, according to the available figures, we have a diversion of funds through bank profits and other institutional profits of somewhere in excess of $700 million and calculations which bring us to $2 billion by the end of this year. Those funds are directed into specific areas, to specific groups which are able to qualify for them if, in fact, those institutions are prepared to provide that funding within their own economic situation.

The amount of money which will be diverted into that bonding mechanism by individual banks varies from bank to bank. There are some banks which have notably used that system well and have promoted and advanced it. There are many other banks, particularly as one goes away from the larger branches of those banks, which, first of all, do not have a clue about the terms of reference, which is partly their fault and, I suggest, partly the government's fault. However, one finds that at the small branch level individual managers are not familiar with all of the provisions of those bonds, and this has, in fact, been a major difficulty for local people in taking advantage of them. There is no question about this. It is a real fault in the system. If it is, in fact, going to function in a way which will help primary producers and small businessmen, those banks simply must be better informed. They must understand the issues and the opportunities better. They must be able to communicate clearly and succinctly in informing people whether their cases might be applicable to the bonds.

The minister also mentioned the question of being able to divert funds in certain cases to operating capital and to allow people to use these funds for other than new expansion in cases where there is economic difficulty. But the difficulty is with the limitation imposed. The bank is required not to lend that individual or incorporated business any further funds. That is a stranglehold and something which makes it impossible for any movement within a certain economic situation any individual farmer or small businessman might have.

The minister talked about the bureaucracy and the difficulties in administration. An application came to the department four months ago. The minister knows that these applications have to be considered on a case by case basis. As an example, four months ago an application was made on the part of a unit which was economically viable on the basis of being able to qualify for this bond. Today that unit is frustrated and is in more economic difficulty because of the interest rate charges. The company is now looking at selling out completely.

This sort of thing happens partly because of lack of familiarity and partly because of the hesitancy of the individual banks to use the mechanism. The banks feel vulnerable because of repercussions if the taxation department tells them the loan was not justifiable in the first place. The banks are concerned about their own situation a year or so down the road in the event that the taxation department comes back to tell them it was not the right thing to do. If we are going to use this mechanism, we should address it. It should be clearly stated and clearly identified and made to function in a way which would expedite the provisions so the people who could qualify would qualify. That is the very least the government can do right now. That requires an administrative change. It is something that is sitting waiting to be done right now, and it should be done quickly.

The other point which the minister made concerned the agricultural community. He said that the agricultural community might expect the minister would look to either unincorporated farms or incorporated farms. I was not clear just how he stated it.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It was unincorporated farms.

Mr. Gurbin: He mentioned that there might be a provision within the bond to allow a special opportunity outside of this failure situation. Perhaps he could clarify that point.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It was incorporated.

Mr. Gurbin: Incorporated would present a difficulty for many farmers, but it can be overcome.

In conclusion, the time-frame is critical and important because it will end with this session of Parliament. It is important because the banks in my area specifically have shown leniency and the farmers have withdrawn from any aggressive action. But if we do not have measures that are identified and will address the problems, the whole situation may flare up, so much so that they will benefit neither the farmers, nor the banks, nor in the long run the government.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to follow the hon. member who has moved this motion. In moving the motion he has pointed out the seriousness of the situation, and in particular the very real difficulties which are being felt by farmers, small businessmen and Canadian industry as a result of the Canadian government's interest rate policy.

I must confess to a certain sense of frustration, having spent a great deal of time this session arguing that the government's policies do not make any sense and, that they are having a very harsh effect on Canadians. Also, convinced as I am, and as our party is, the harshness is essentially futile in that the government is lingering under certain illusions with respect to the consequences which this policy it is following will have on inflation.

We have heard from the minister, and we heard from him again in question period today, that this was the only policy the government can follow which will have an anti-inflationary effect. We have heard the same statements from the minister in different ways. I took some interest in reading the speech he made while he was in Paris attending the OECD meeting. The minister seemed to align himself with those, particularly in the United States and Britain, who have taken the view that the way to fight inflation, which is causing such problems not simply for the Canadian economy but for all western economies, is to carry on with the restrictive monetary policy, that this is the essential ingredient in the war on inflation.

I want to say to the minister that I do not think we can carry on very much longer with a sense of confidence that this policy is really having a great deal of effect. For example, he made much of the fact today that the demand for loans was still very high and was, in fact, inflationary.

Mr. McDermid: Consumer loans.

Mr. Rae: Yes, he mentioned consumer loans. He went through a range of areas where the demand for loans was causing this kind of inflation. I have mentioned to him, and I mentioned it again today during question period, that the evidence from Statistics Canada released just this week is that demand for consumer loans, personal loans, dropped very substantially in the past year by 60 per cent. The demand for small business loans dropped 47 per cent in the first quarter of 1981. That tells us something. It is a signal that the government must look at the situation, that we do not have interest rates which in a sense reflect the demand pull. We have interest rates which reflect the policy of the government with respect to the Canadian dollar. That is the hard fact of the matter.

The root of the interest rate policy of this government has, for some years, been a conviction that protection of the value of the dollar at a certain level was the sine qua non of its anti-inflation policy and that interest rates had to respond to events in the United States in order to protect the value of the dollar. Even if one accepts the premise about the dollar—though this is not the terms of the discussion today and I do not want to go into it at length—the consequence for the domestic economy is something that has to give rise to concern. The minister's answer to that has been to say that growth in the Canadian economy has been fantastic. We had fantastic growth in the last quarter of 1980 and we are experiencing it again in 1981.

I say to the minister that I suppose it depends from what point you see the growth. If you look at the basic rate of capacity utilization right across the economy, I do not think there is any great cause for optimism. I do not think the economy is working at full capacity or that it is the nature of domestic activity in the economy which is really driving our rate of inflation up. I do not think there is any evidence to suggest that is the case.

I am reminded of the debate we had a couple of weeks ago in the House when the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada was before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs talking about productivity. The Minister has frequently talked about increased productivity as being the key to breaking this inflationary cycle in which we find ourselves. There is no question that increasing productivity of Canadian industry would do a great deal to reduce inflation. However, there was one thing which the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada made very clear, and he made it very clear in his report, and that is that, you cannot hope to increase productivity when the economy is being kept down at the level of capacity it is now.

This is the argument that should be going on in public with respect to the policies of the Bank of Canada. If we are serious about breaking the inflationary cycle, we are under a tremendous illusion if we think the way to do that in the current world context is to keep capacity down, working at far less than real potential. It will cause hardship in the economy. That is the inevitable, tremendously uneven effect of interest rates and inflation. This government is committed to an interest rate policy for reasons of exchange controls. The only kind of exchange control the government is prepared to contemplate is interest rate policy. That has been the case so far. Its interest policy is a form of exchange control. The government must face the task as to what other measures can be taken, fiscal, economic and planning, to deal with the consequences of high interest rates.

Let us look at the economy and the effects interest rates are having on patterns of home ownership and small businesses. There are problems of concentration in the economy. Real problems must be faced by the average businessman as a result of the fantastic cost of credit.

The farm industry was spoken of eloquently earlier. It is also affected. There is no sign of any letting up because the minister is convinced his policy is absolutely necessary. If we continue with this policy, it will have a devasting effect on the average Canadian businessman, home owner, potential home owner and farmer.

I want to deal briefly with those three sectors. First, I want to reiterate the point I made earlier with respect to the farm industry. I honestly do not see how a policy which restricts supply can be described in a sensible way as anti-inflationary. The minister mentioned in particular the hog and cattle sector. Credit has become the largest cost to the farmer. The level of indebtedness of farmers is fantastically high. Farmers are being driven out of business.

We have had in this House personal, anecdotal and statistical evidence, evidence of all kinds. The minister says it is not relevant because the number of bankruptcies is not that high. Bankruptcy is the end of the road. A lot of things happen before somebody goes into bankruptcy. They cut down on supply, sell off parts of the operation, go into a joint venture with somebody else for part of the operation, attempt to refinance, or sell the farm to a larger corporate entity, such as is happening in many parts of Ontario and right across the country. These things happen well before a farmer goes into bankruptcy. That is why looking at the absolute number of bankruptcies as an indication of what is going on in the agricultural sector is not a realistic way of assessing the problem.

The statistics merely show that the problem is much more severe now than last year. We did not need statistical confirmation of something we already knew. The fact is that farmers are being driven off the land. We are encouraging the process of corporate concentration and agribusiness and destroying the family farm. That is what the government's policies are doing. That is the slow, steady, persistent impact of the government's policies right across the country with regard to agriculture.

We have a Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) who sometimes thinks he is the minister of finance. The other week he was in the town of Nukko Lake in north central British Columbia to speak at a farmers' convention. At that time he produced the Nukko Lake manifesto, the personal manifesto of the Minister of Agriculture. The Canadian Press report of June 20 reported the minister as saying that "some serious work is being done about changing the banking system in this country." He must be referring to the work of the NDP; I do not know what else he was talking about. He said the government will change the banking system if the chartered banks do not do something to help farmers.

The Nukko Lake manifesto was not the first manifesto of the Minister of Agriculture. We have had a number of them. They are amusing examples of an attempt to establish himself as a populist candidate in the one day, some day, forthcoming Liberal leadership race. It is a condemnation of our process when the Minister of Agriculture pretends that the government is serious about the effect interest rates are having on farmers. The minister pretends the government is doing something about the banking system and interest rates. The Nukko Lake manifesto, to put it bluntly, is an example of the big lie. Either the government is doing something about the banking system or it is not.

An aide to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the news report does not say who, stated "it is all new to me". In the House the next day the minister stated that he had no intention of reviewing the Bank Act. The government sent the Minister of Agriculture to deliver himself to various farmers groups. He was to tell them that the government was serious about doing something with respect to the banking system. However, we know it is not serious.

In conclusion, the government's policies do not make any sense to the average Canadian. It is becoming increasingly difficult for a home owner in a housing development who must renew his mortgage at 18, 18½ or 19 per cent while his next door neighbour with exactly the same accommodation is paying 12, 13 or 14 per cent because he bought at a different time. That is the roulette, arbitrary, random, and totally unfair effect that interest rates are having on Canadian consumers and businessmen. Eventually the government will have to recognize that it has a responsibility to minimize, even out and bring some rationality into an interest rate policy which affects people in ways that at the moment are totally arbitrary.

I see that the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) is shaking his head. When he gets up he will deliver himself of a Friedmanite defence of the government. We have the Friedmanites and Senator Lamontagne in the other place, and the minister somewhere in the middle telling us that he is not quite sure what the message is that he will take to the Summit; it will be on the one hand or the other hand. We have the Nukko Lake manifesto from the Minister of Agriculture.

We have the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) talking about the need for child tax credits. However, when it comes right down to it, the government is not doing anything with respect to the real effect that these policies are having on the Canadian people.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock, at which time I expect to recognize the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans).

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure today to speak to this opposition motion which condemns the government for failure to bring in effective economic policies to deal with what the hon. member has termed "the present economic crisis", and in addition to that to end the squeeze that disastrous interest rates are placing on small businesses and others in our economy.

● (1410)

The interesting thing about that motion is that it says there is an economic crisis and, in addition to that, a squeeze caused by high interest rates. If I could, I would like to try to deal with the question of the economic crisis first and then move on to discuss the interest rate situation. What are the underlying causes of the current interest rate situation? What are the alternative policies open to the government? I want to try to explain once again to hon. members opposite precisely why it is that the government is pursuing the policy it is.

To my mind, the motion is rather nonsensical because by any standard there is no economic crisis in this country today. There are high interest rates, to be sure. We all admit there are high interest rates, and we know the impact high interest rates have on a large number of people. However, to talk about an economic crisis is to talk about masses of people being out of work. It is to talk about economic growth which is in recession proportions or depression proportions. "Crisis" has a very real meaning to the public, and to us as well, and certainly "crisis" does not describe the situation facing our economy today.

Mr. Lambert: Nonsense.

Mr. Evans: I see the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is going right up his tree. That is not unusual.

Let us look at the economic indicators which are usually used to define "crisis" in an economic sense. Economic growth in the fourth quarter of 1980 was, at an annual rate, over 9 per cent. The long-term potential growth of the economy is generally accepted to be somewhere in the range of 3 per cent or 3.5 per cent, but we are talking about an annual rate of growth of over 9 per cent. That is phenomenal growth. What happened in the first quarter of 1981? Annual growth was over 4 per cent, still above the long-term average potential growth of the economy. There is no crisis in economic growth.

The unemployment rate now stands at 7.1 per cent, the lowest rate since 1976. Over 61 per cent of the Canadian working age population is now working. That has been the case for the last two months, and that again is a historical record for Canada. In the last 12 months this economy has generated over 417,000 new jobs. There is certainly not a crisis in job creation. There is certainly not a crisis in unemployment. There is certainly not a crisis in economic growth.

The problem we face is the problem of inflation and the consequent high interest rates which follow from a high level of inflation. The policy of the government is designed to attack that inflationary problem and get it under control so that growth, employment, inflation and job creation will all be at levels we want to see.

The government brought forward its framework for economic policy in the budget on October 28. Hon. members have been saying that that economic policy was inappropriate in one way or another ever since the budget. The budget brought forward a balanced approach to economic policy. It did not go holus-bolus after the deficit in an attempt to reduce it at all costs. Nor did it go after inflation in that way. We did not say we would beat inflation regardless of the cost. The government took a balanced approach to try to ensure that minimal damage would be done to the economy, and in a great many areas, as indicated by the statistics I have just quoted, the government is succeeding quite well.

What was that policy? First, it was to hold the rate of expenditure growth within the trend growth of the gross national product over the next four years. We are working on that policy well. We are achieving those results.

The second aspect was to reduce the deficit and financial requirements over time. The figures given in the budget respecting deficit reduction and financial requirement reduction were in fact exceeded in 1980-81. Our deficit was $1.4 billion below what the budget forecast. Financial requirements were $1.8 billion below what the budget forecast. That part of the program is being attacked with success.

The third goal was to reorder priorities toward economic development, industrial adjustment and manpower retraining—in other words, to try to put in place those policies which would lead to a stimulation of economic growth and development in the country. We know there is work going on now on the final phases of an industrial strategy. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) has been working on that, discussing it in his speeches and so forth. The just announced textile policy will help that particular industry adjust to higher rates of competition and to the removal of trade barriers over the next five to six years. That is a policy of industrial adjustment which is extremely important, not just in this part of the country but across the country. There are textile workers in Vancouver and Winnipeg as well as in Quebec and Ontario. That is an extremely important policy.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) has announced a number of manpower training programs and employment-generation programs, and he will be announcing further programs.

Mr. McDermid: Peanuts.

Mr. Evans: Regardless of the comments of hon. members opposite, these policies are working and they will continue to work.

The fourth part of the policy of the government as brought down in the budget was a monetary policy consistent with a reduction in inflation. The government is supporting the efforts of the Governor of the Bank of Canada to bring down the rate of growth of the money supply so it will be more in line with the real output of the economy.

That is a balanced economic policy which, as I said, has not only had, but will also continue to have, successes on a wide range of fronts. Not only is it a balanced policy, but it is also a consistent policy.

Mr. Lambert: Consistently bad.

Mr. Evans: We have been saying for some time now that what the business sector is demanding is consistency, stability of policy and a certainty that it knows what the government is going to do in the area of economic policy. That is precisely what this government is attempting to provide. The government is attempting to provide a balanced economic policy. It is not a stop-go policy, it is a balanced policy. It has been well announced, it has been followed, and we intend to continue to follow that policy in order to provide that kind of stability and confidence in the business sector.

We have heard much from the other side about disagreement among economists and other observers as to economic policy. I would like to tell hon. members that that simply is not true. There is not disagreement on the fundamentals of the policy. There may be disagreement with regard to the extent to which certain levers are pushed or pulled, but there is no disagreement on the fundamentals of the policy. All economists, economic observers and analysts are indicating—and they agree with us—that there is a need for both monetary and fiscal restraint if we are to beat inflation. There is no question in the minds of any of those observers that inflation is the number one problem which has to be beaten if we are to get the economy back on a long-term path of growth and prosperity. That is precisely what the policy of the government is intended to do. Its goal is to get the economy on a long-term growth path in order to provide prosperity and growing wealth for Canadians, stable price levels and lower interest rates by far than those we have now.

What about the opposition? From what we have heard for the last many months I would say that the opposition parties are totally confused as to what is appropriate economic policy and what is not. Now, Mr. Speaker, what do we hear? We hear cries from the opposition that we should immediately take steps to reduce interest rates. On the other hand, they say we must get the rate of inflation down.

Mr. Lambert: Herb Gray said he would resign.

Mr. Evans: I intend to show very shortly that those two objectives are mutually inconsistent. If we are to bring interest rates down immediately, the only result can be much higher inflation and consequently much higher interest rates in the very near future.

Another point, Mr. Speaker, is that we are being asked all the time—in fact, the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin), who I respect as a conscientious and hard-working member of this House, asked us again today—to expand expenditures; in this case, the small busines development bond, but in other cases it is mortgage interest and property tax credit, assistance for farmers, assistance for this or that group, assistance for consumer borrowers. Yet in the same breath the opposition says we have to reduce the deficit, get it under control.

Mr. McDermid: You are not doing either.

Mr. Evans: Again, they are mutually exclusive objectives. You cannot increase your expenditures at the same time as you reduce your deficit, unless opposition members are saying we should have a major increase in personal or corporate taxes. That is one possibility. Or we should go through the government and slash literally billions from expenditures in other areas.

Mr. McDermid: You could do that.

Mr. Evans: I would like to know exactly where they are. If in fact the opposition is saying we should increase what have to be considered social transfers, areas within the social policy envelope, then the only places left to cut would be, for example, defence, or we could slash economic development. However, is either one of those consistent with what the opposition would like to see, especially economic development? If we are to get the economy moving again and see long-term, sustained growth, we cannot reduce our expenditures in the area of economic development. So that is the inconsistency on the other side which comes through day after day. The opposition does not have an understanding of the needs of the economy.

Mr. Lambert: You have to be smiling when you say that.

Mr. Evans: It does not have a consistent economic policy. I think any objective observer of this House day after day, listening to the admonitions of the opposition members, will agree with me 100 per cent.

Mr. McDermid: You are worse than when you were in the civil service.

Mr. Evans: Let us look, Mr. Speaker, at one of their options. Hon. members opposite say we should reduce interest rates immediately. Let me try to indicate what that would mean. It is clear our goal of reducing inflation over time will lead to lower interest rates; there is no doubt about that. If the policy is adhered to, as inflation comes down so will interest rates. However, I think the opposition misunderstand the causes of the current high interest rate situation. As a result they do not understand which remedies are possible and which are not.

As I have said a number of times, there are three factors contributing to the high interest rate situation. The first is the rate of inflation. If you annualize the monthly rate over the last four or five months, we have rates of inflation in the 13 per cent range, perhaps more. There is no way in the world people saving for retirement, to buy a house or for other reasons can be expected to lend their money for less than 13 per cent. If they do, the money they get back next year is going to be worth less than it is today. So the rate of inflation is always the bottom level for interest rates. You have to add to that the right savers have to at least some real rate of return, perhaps one or two percentage points above inflation. If you do that, you already have about 14 or 15 per cent. Then if it goes through a financial intermediary who is paying 15 per cent for savings, they have to have enough to at least cover their costs, so let us add another one and a half points. Now we have 16 or 16.5 per cent. Somewhere in there is the bottom line on interest rates today given the inflation factor. That is the primary driving force behind our high interest rates.

Now, on the other hand we have, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) indicated this morning, a fantastic demand for credit from a number of sources. When you couple that with the fact that now and over the last two to three years the Bank of Canada has been gradually reducing the growth rate in the money supply, you have a reduction in the credit available through the financial system at the same time as you have a big demand for credit because of inflationary expectations or other reasons. Those supply-demand considerations tend to push up the real rates of return individual savers demand.

The third factor, Mr. Speaker, is one which has been raised and bandied about on both sides of the House; that is, the high rates of interest available to Canadian savers in the United States. Those pressures are very real, but as the minister indicated this morning, we have not said and are not saying now that the U.S. interest rate situation is the only factor causing our high interest rates. The underlying cause is the inflation factor exacerbated by this demand-supply divergence.

I think to a great extent inflationary expectations are caused by the fact that a great many people say the government is not going to bring inflation under control; they are not really serious, they are not going to stick to the policy. As a result, they say they had better borrow and buy today because inflation is going to be a lot worse tomorrow.

Those inflationary expectations have to be broken, and the only way to do that is if the public becomes convinced the government is in fact going to stick to its policy. If the government reversed itself on this policy, you can count on inflation going right through the roof along with the expectations of inflation, with interest rates going even higher.

So, Mr. Speaker, we hear from the opposition members that the way to solve our high interest rate situation, to bring interest rates down, is either by decree or by putting on exchange controls; that if we do that and stop money flowing to the United States, interest rates will immediately tumble to 12 per cent. Well, Mr. Speaker, it just is not so. The basic underlying inflationary situation in this country would not allow that to happen. The credit supply and demand in this country would not allow that to happen.

The situation we have now is that the market is far stronger than the Bank of Canada. There is no way the Bank of Canada can stand out in the street and by decree say interest rates will be such and such. The bank simply does not have that kind of leverage or muscle to go against the dictates of the market. The market is setting those rates, the treasury bill rates. Hon. members are saying yes, but the Bank of Canada is in there back and forth, in and out. But the effect of that is of the second order of small; it is minimal. The bank cannot stand against the wind week after week. If the tide is coming in, it is coming in; if it is going out, it is going out. The bank can moderate fluctuations but it cannot stand against the tide. That is the truth of the matter, Mr. Speaker.

It is not a policy of the government to say interest rates will be such and such. We have an inflationary situation in this country that we have to deal with. We have demand-supply conditions which are necessary if we are going to get inflation under control. And, of course, the last factor is the U.S. interest rate situation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to summarize, how do you reduce interest rates? You do it by bringing down the rate of inflation. That, as I said, cannot be done by decree. The bank could do two things perhaps to make a short-term dent in interest rates. It could give up control of the money supply. It could say we are going to flood the market with new money tomorrow.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that in the very short term that flood of new credit coming into the system would depress interest rates. But the effect over a period of six months to a year would be an acceleration in the rate of inflation and interest rates a year hence would be much higher. We have seen this happen in other countries where governments have decided the way to fight high interest rates was to flood the system with all the credit it can stand to put more pressure on interest rates in an attempt to bring them down; more money means that the price of money should be cheaper. The flaw in that logic is that more money in the system also creates excess demand, which creates inflation. Then we are faced with a situation where individual lenders say, "I will not lend at less than the rate of inflation or take a negative return on my savings". This means that interest rates go up as well. It is a fool's game. That option should not be followed.

I suppose hon. members of the NDP have put forward the other option, that the bank could simply say, "Let the dollar drop wherever it wants to go; by doing that, we will be completely independent of the United States, and its rates will not have any effect upon us". As I indicated earlier, there are two other factors which would tend to keep our interest rates up substantially within a very narrow band of where we are now.

What would happen if we did that, if the dollar dropped substantially and interest rates came down? It would have an immediate inflationary impact. As soon as the dollar drops, everything we import from the United States or from any other country to which our currency is relatively depressed rises in price. Every product produced and sold in Canada, as well as being sold in export markets, rises in value in the export market. Therefore our producers are inclined either to send more of those goods into export, or they will raise the price here to match the price they can receive in export markets. Those two factors together mean an immediate burst of inflation in Canada and, once again, higher inflation leads to higher interest rates, not lower ones.

Another factor which should be considered is where it will stop. If we hold a differential between our rates and those of the United States, as was tried in Britain, the currency keeps flowing out. It is like turning on a tap. It does not only flow out for a short period of time, it keeps flowing out as long as the differential is maintained. Thus, how far down do we let the dollar go? Do we let it go down to 78, 75 or 72 cents? How far does it go down before interest rates are finally forced back up to stop it? It is a mug's game.

What effect will the decline in the value of the currency and its induced effect upon inflation have on wage settlements? Certainly when unions become involved in wage negotiations they ask, "What is the rate of inflation likely to be? We want at least to get that much as well as a real increase in our wages". If they see inflation accelerating the pressure will be to say, "No, we will not accept 12 per cent; we want 14, 15 or 16 per cent". But the pressure then builds upon wages. If such wage settlements are achieved we build in increased unit labour costs.

This is what happened in 1974. We were going through a period when suddenly there was an explosion of wage rates, with wage settlements at the 20 per cent range or more. This increased our unit labour costs and made them uncompetitive with those of the United States. Ultimately it led to a devaluation in currency to 83 cents, but it was largely responsible for the drop from $1 to 85 cents. There was a change in relative unit labour costs between the United States and Canada and the adjustment had to be made.

If we drop the value of our currency and it leads to inflation, which leads to higher wage rates here than in the United States or in other countries with which we trade, and our unit labour costs get out of line, it means the currency value will not recover. It is not a matter of dropping the currency value for a period of six months or a year, and then it will bounce back. It means we have ratcheted the currency down and it stays there.

The idea that we should go through a series of devaluations to solve our problem is a fool's game. It does not solve the problem. The problem is inflation; basically it is a monetary problem. It is one with which we have to come to grips and for which there is no easy solution. There is no painless solution to removing inflation from the system.

We have heard comments about increased expenditures. To alleviate the difficulties caused by high interest rates, we are being encouraged to increase expenditures in a number of areas. Certainly they are laudable objectives, but where will those moneys come from? Should we cut defence spending? Some people would say yes. Should we cut economic policy spending to assist those who are being hit by high interest rates? Should we increase taxes or the deficit? Despite what members of the opposition say about their commitment to deficit reduction, if push came to shove they would say, "Let the deficit go up a little".

What does this mean? How much are we talking about? We hear that we are supposed to help home owners, farmers, fishermen, small business people and consumers. When we stop to think of it, we are talking about everybody. Everyone who borrows money is being adversely affected by high interest rates; there is no doubt about that.

What are we talking about in those four main areas—home owners, small business, farmers and others? I should like to deal with the small business development bond extension and the mortgage situation. The Conservative mortgage interest and property tax credit, if fully implemented, would have been a $3 billion per year program. The small business development bond program is already running in the $200 million range. If it was extended to finance inventories, which would mean that all small businesses could refinance their inventories under this program, we could be talking about half a billion, three quarters of a billion or a billion. The estimates are hard to come by, but certainly in those two areas we are talking about an increase in expenditures of between $3 billion and $4 billion per year. If we increased the deficit by that amount in that fashion, I guarantee we would have to tell the Bank of Canada to forget about controlling the money supply and to buy our bonds because they cannot be put on the market. If that is the case, it will be inflationary and will cause higher interest rates.

If we do not tell the Bank of Canada to monetize that debt and we go straight to the market to float another $4 billion worth of bonds, we will put upward pressure upon interest rates because we will be taking additional revenues or savings out of the system. Thus, in an attempt to protect people against high interest rates we create conditions which in fact lead to higher interest rates. Again I say it is a fool's game. Either we have to come to grips with the problem and deal with it or forget it.

There is no way societies can allow inflation and all of its debilitating societal effects to persist, to accelerate and to worsen. We must come to grips with the problem. I am convinced the government has come up with a program which will work. It is a program which will bring inflation under control. It will lead to greater economic growth in the future. It will lead to prosperity. It is a balanced program. It is not one which singles out any particular group in society to suffer as a result of the policy to bring down inflation. In a very real way, all of us will have to take some of that pressure, and in fact we are all taking some of it.

In conclusion I should like to say that the policy has a number of possible alternatives, all of which are worse. The good Senator Lamontagne from the other place indicated another possible alternative, effectively saying we could bring on some kind of an incomes policy and turn loose monetary policy. As I said before, that is like putting the kettle on the stove, sealing the top and turning up the heat. The only thing one gets out of that is an explosion. The only question is, when does one get it? Is it sooner or later? Therefore, that is a policy option which should certainly not be followed by this government, and I would certainly not recommend it.

With that in mind, I would like to conclude by saying that certainly and stability of policy are required in the system now. The public must be assured that the government is serious about the fight against inflation in order to beat inflationary expectations. Business must be assured that the government does not intend to follow a stop-go policy, if investment decisions are, in fact, going to reflect the long term policies of the government. In other words, what is needed in this country today is a balanced approach. That is what has been and what is the policy of this government.

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) gave us an elementary lecture in finance, but he did not tell us that a succession of Liberal governments got us into the mess in which we are today. Canada is today in a period of economic instability; there is no doubt about that at all. Its economic performance is much below its true potential and its capability. Repeatedly, Canadians today are worried about the changes to the Canada of the future brought about by the government's patriation package and its national energy policy, inflation and lack of or changing over-all industrial and social policy, and by increasing instability in the world at large.

I want to look backwards a bit, before I look forward, to see what has happened in Canada over the last three and one-half decades since the war, because it is a period in which successive Liberal governments have generally been in power. I want to list about eight areas of considerable importance in the growth of Canadian society, and then look at some of the problems that we have to solve as a Canadian society from here on in, in the eighties.

First of all, let me say that we have been very generous in allocating funding for education. We have educated ourselves, as a people, to one of the highest standards in the world. Our education has been broadly based, with a wide, non-constricting and non-dogmatic perspective. It was moderately permissive and generally directed toward material rather than spiritual ascension. It followed predominantly, though not totally, the American mould. However, we have built into our social and economic structure an enormous technological and productive potential which we are really not using to its full capacity at all.

Second, we apply technology extensively. I speak as a person coming from the technological field. However, most of it was imported from the United States of America, through the media of the multinational corporations, though we have excelled in a few areas, but not very many, like nuclear energy. One of the most remarkable things is that an engineer or a technologist in Canada could simply pick up a phone and call someone in the United States for advice, for a solution or a piece of equipment. No other country in the world has the access to the technological might of the United States that we have in Canada. I have some concern that recently we have been acting as a government in moving toward cutting off this lifeline of Canadian progress, or throttling it to some degree.

We have extensively used the multinational corporations and their access to American developed technology. These corporations became dominant in owning our resources and our industrial wealth. As a nation, we became an intermediate manufacturing and exporting nation with declining competitiveness in world markets. Indeed, our competitiveness today is cause for considerable concern.

Third, economically and on an over-all basis, we have had phenomenal growth of our national economy, primarily based on the harvesting and selling of our vast resources by the multinational corporations. The Canadian economy grew by approximately four times in constant dollars during the last three and one-half decades. Our population only grew by about 75 per cent. Therefore, we became rich as a nation, though other nations surpassed us extensively in terms of productivity. We built in Canada a physical plant system of unprecedented inefficiency, and only now are we realizing it as world energy costs are skyrocketing. Our own economy is agonizing with high inflation and low productivity.

Fourth, economically and socially the nation experienced an intense preoccupation with security against almost every eventuality: sickness, unemployment, old age, catastrophe, business bankruptcy, etc., mostly backed or sponsored by government action. We built a humane society based on government redistribution of wealth. Our system adopted tenure as a right rather than a privilege tempered with responsibility. We provided undisputed tenure to our civil servants, professors, teachers, professions, and thereby generated an increasing demand for tenure without productivity requirements in all of organized labour.

With increasing tenure, productivity waned. We became lazy, and the pride of doing was replaced with the enjoyment of loafing. Elaborate procedures and refined specialization became a substitute for performance. We demanded more and more from our governments, and governments acquiesced to the public demand.

Fifth, we became preoccupied with enjoying all the material goods of life at an increasingly younger and younger age. Homes and suites and cars and goods of all sorts were demanded and extensively promoted for the young. In providing all these goods, we established a vast credit system to give us what we wanted now, and increasingly mortgaged our future because we bought most of it on debt. Mass advertising created the appetite. Credit provided the means. Mass production and technology and imports provided the goods and lowered prices. We spoiled ourselves, and obsolescence, redundancy, style, throw-away and fraud prevailed. Our appetite increased and our frugalness decreased, and we damned the future and lived for the present. We continued to demand more and more from governments.

Sixth, yes, we demanded more and more from our governments, and our governments grew dramatically and involved themselves in every facet of our lives. Governments at the three levels grew without attention to political ideology or rationality or prudence. Politically, we dashed madly toward de facto socialism, with the three levels of government this year expected to tax some 43 per cent to 45 per cent of the gross national product of Canada and redistribute it. Governments have engaged themselves massively in wealth redistribution at rates which exceed the nation's ability for wealth production. Our appetite as government is so voracious that massive debt formation has overwhelmed us. I expect that the deficit of the federal government alone will be in the order of $15 billion this year. In the past, as debt rose we printed more money and in doing so institutionalized inflation rates in double digit figures. Of course, we have high inflation. As governments we have caused it with uncontrolled spending and lack of productivity over these last several decades, but particularly over the last four or five years.

What is inflation, Mr. Speaker? It is a reminder of the reality that we are living beyond our means; that we are getting poorer and must increase our productivity and competitiveness as a nation. Instead, we borrow more, print more money and delay the final reconciliation with fiscal prudence. But we all know that we cannot escape. Finally the government has found some backbone and now says we cannot escape; we have high inflation and we have to live with it. That realization is amazing after all these years. The unfortunate thing is that in the period of readjustment it is the poor and the needy, the weak and the old who suffer most. The time for readjustment is here. It is the poor and the needy, the weak and the old and the small businessman who are going to suffer most.

Politically our nation has evolved peacefully. Partisan politics has become ideologically blurred with all parties moving significantly for greater socialization and greater government involvement in the economy. Provincial governments have grown and gained significantly in posture and prominence over the national government in the last several years.

For a while, the world around us grew in stability but it is now beginning to come apart at the seams. Political, social and economic instability is increasing. World-wide inflation is causing a severe form of economic dislocation. Economic issues, resulting primarily from nationalistic protectiveness and resource pricing policies, are now foremost in the minds of world leaders. The risk is that the operation of the international economy may spin out of control and present a more grave threat to world order today than even the nuclear arms race or the struggle between differing political ideologies. The high rate of inflation is testing democracy itself as it has not been tested for the last several decades.

That, in a nutshell, Mr. Speaker, is the situation, both internally and externally, that is facing Canada in the eighties! Have we built a strong financial and economic house? I think we have built a house upon shifting sand. We have many adjustments to make and many difficult problems to overcome in the eighties. I should like to set forth some of them.

First, can we revise our economy and re-establish private enterprise as our motivating force for accelerated wealth production or, at the very least, can we find a workable and productive partnership between the private and public sectors? It is going to be difficult. The former Progressive Conservative government, which was in power for only nine months, attempted a beginning in this area.

Second, can we contain the voracious appetites of governments and restrain their growth rates by re-establishing the community, the home and the family unit as the prime motivator, caretaker and babysitter of the social dislocations of our society, instead of turning over those problems increasingly for governments to solve? We must make a start in this direction at the earliest opportunity.

Third, can we in the organized workplace rediscipline ourselves to increase productivity and innovation and the deployment of new technology to improve our competitiveness in the national and international marketplace? We have an example of this today in the Post Office dispute and the impending strike. This was our intent and policy as a Progressive Conservative government during the nine months we were in power. What initiatives has the present government evolved? What direction is evident in its policies for dealing with labour-management relations and the resulting low productivity?

Fourth, can we control inflation and its ravaging effects upon the less fortunate? To a large degree I accept that the present administration is a victim of American dictation and follows the U.S. interest rate structure like a child. It has literally no other option. It has not built in any options within the last decade, although it could have. There is no nation that has the potential for building economic options that we in Canada have with our vast resource potential and our resources going out of the country as raw material. The capacity to upgrade our own resources is immeasurable and would increase wealth in the country, but we need definitive and honest and difficult federal policies put in place.

Fifth, can we meet the challenge of energy self-sufficiency in all forms of energy use, and in particular, will we be able to meet the world food crisis resulting from environmental, climatic and population growth patterns? The next five to ten years will be critical in regard to world instability, and perhaps the North-South conference in two weeks' time is an omen of the critical conditions developing in the world.

Sixth, will we be able able to cope with the inherent economic and social restratification needed to cope with an increasingly aging population? We must examine seriously our pensions systems and anchor them to a more solid financial foundation than that which exists today.

Seventh, will we be reaching for greater brotherhood rather than increasing isolation in our urban conglomerates as we move toward a new century of civilization? Will equalization serve us well in the future so that Canadians everywhere in this vast country can enjoy a standard of living second to none in the world? Because we have the capacity.

Eighth, can we meet the challenge of constitutional patriation and redefinition and renewal to truly represent all regions in a national institution in the eighties? I think we can, Mr. Speaker.

In particular, we must permit those areas of our nation which have enormous capacity for growth, like the west, to grow without undue throttling. We must immediately undertake incentive policies to upgrade our resources before they enter international trade. What is needed is boldness, courage, openness, analysis and action. The parliamentary secretary mentioned balanced economic policy and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) repeatedly referred to gradualism. If there ever was a time for boldness and courage and substance and analysis and action, it is now. Timidity, trying to help everyone at the same time, or gradualism is hardly a policy that will build a viable, progressive, dynamic economic and industrial sector in this nation in the next decade.

● (1500)

In conclusion, let me read the resolution we are discussing:

> That this House condemns the Government for failing to bring before Parliament effective economic policies to deal with the present economic crisis and end the disastrous interest rate squeeze on the small business, industrial and agricultural sectors.

Of course we have a crisis in the nation. There are two kinds of crises. One might be likened to the idea of an egg falling off a ten-foot high fence and smashing to bits. The other crisis is a snowball rolling—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. However, he may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Yurko: The second type of crisis is the one which can be likened to a snowball rolling downhill which gathers momentum and grows larger and larger with greater and greater force. I suggest that if we do not move fairly soon as governments in the nation in this area of strengthening the economy, we will have a second order crisis in our economy five or ten years from today.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) in his closing remarks drew the attention of the House to the wording in a close reading of the motion before the House which gives me an opportunity to begin my contribution to the debate today. I draw the hon. member's recollection to this time last year when the first piece of legislation with which I had the honour to be associated in this House was an act to increase grants for assistance to municipalities. This legislation, hon. members will recall, increased the amount of money transferred by the federal government to municipalities in lieu of taxes.

It is an obligation of the federal government to pay for municipal services afforded to federal properties located in areas right across the country. It was a distinct pleasure, because of my past experience with municipalities, to be able to say that the federal government was providing $25 million extra which would be, I am sure, an advantage to those municipalities when it came time for them to look at the way they were carrying out their responsibilities and when it came time for them to strike their tax bills. In turn, that would have a direct impact on the ability of home owners, small businessmen and industrialists right across Canada to pay municipal taxes.

The hon. member has indicated he faults the government for taking action to assist in the economy of this country—I give that example to counter specifically those clauses of the resolution before the House this afternoon. It is not necessary, thank heaven, for the Government of Canada, in all of the things it does to address the economy, to come before the House with specific legislation, word, period, comma, semi-colon, in order to address the community at large. I say thank heaven for that. Quite frankly, as a new member of this House, again with my background in municipal politics, I was appalled that it took this House two months to debate an amendment to a constitutional resolution. This was an amendment put by the party opposite which now complains that this government has not brought legislation into this House for action to address the economy. How could we have done so when we were held up for a full two months on one resolution? You are aware, Mr. Speaker, of the acrimony that was introduced in this House. Yet, at the same time, the opposition complained about the government not taking action. The opposition can hardly complain that we are taking no action when in essence the opposition hijacked Parliament, which is a forum for addressing these problems.

Mr. Knowles: What have you done since then?

Mr. Cosgrove: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) invites me to go to the next part of my speech. What have we done since then?

I was privileged to attend a meeting with the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) with representatives of the Trust Companies Association of Canada yesterday afternoon. We took that step to meet with representatives of the private sector who have a large segment of their portfolio directed toward assisting home owners. We met with these people because of statements made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) who alleged there existed a crisis and widespread foreclosures and defaults in home ownership.

I shall cite some facts and figures which were obtained yesterday from representatives of the national trust companies holding the major portfolios for mortgages in Canada. In the case of the Royal Trust, foreclosures have reduced, not increased, from .34 per cent to .27 per cent in the year since the legislation to which I referred was introduced in this House. In that year it shows that the figures are for conventional and high ratio loans and the trend is actually downward, while there has been an increase in the amount of mortgages taken out during that period of time.

Canada Permanent Trust reports the same thing. In recent months, the situation of arrears of three months or more has actually improved. Montreal Trust reports the same thing. Montreal Trust indicates that, for example, in May, 1981, compared to May, 1980, the default rate was .35 per cent compared to .41 per cent. National Trust repeats the same experience with the figures given. Victoria and Grey reported a picture similar to the other companies. In May, 1981, the percentage of legal action commenced on borrowers was .07 per cent.

Those are the facts in the area of foreclosures and defaults, and the hardship being experienced by people. There are fewer people experiencing these difficulties, and those figures illustrate the situation up to the first of this month. Yet we still hear members opposite saying crisis. I do not know where they get figures to illustrate a desperate situation in the home owner renewal problem. I say that because facts show we do not need legislation. It has not been necessary in the year for the government to come with specific legislation in that area.

It was not necessary for we to receive instructions from the party opposite to meet, as I did, with the President of the Royal Bank of Canada on Tuesday morning of this week to get the same figures from him advising me that the crisis allegations of the members opposite are not founded on fact.

It was a concern for people over the differences in the interest rate this year as compared to last year, for those home owners and small businesses refinancing, and it was my concern for the difficult time these people are having that prompted me to raise this matter in Washington last week. I met with the secretary for housing for the United States, the HUD, housing and urban development, and the undersecretary for housing for the United States. I brought to their attention the difficulties being experienced by Canadians, especially those facing the roll-over problem, not to mention industry, as a result of interest rate increases.

As the member who spoke before me indicated, we have followed the world situation in terms of interest rates in order to have capital funds available to assist us in the housing industry and small business. If we did not do that, where would the capital come from? I addressed this issue of high interest rates with the secretary responsible for housing.

I had an opportunity to speak to senators and the House of Representatives leader in Congress. I indicated to them the adverse effect the high interest rate policy of the United States is having in this country. I gave the example of the government moving to do something in order to illustrate our concern. I pointed out the impact this is having on our domestic institutions such as banks and trust companies. I encouraged them to be sensitive toward Canadians who must renew their mortgages, as well as small business faced with the same situation.

What else has the government done? That is a gratuitous question because of no interruption. We have not had to come to the House, for example, to extend the AHOP plan, a provision which provides a safety catch or safety value for those facing an increase in interest rates in order to protect those people whose shelter costs exceed 30 per cent of their earnings. Those subsidy programs have been renewed.

Just two weeks ago the government announced, with regard to the assisted rental program, the subsidy would be increased on a per unit basis from $120 to $180 per month to attempt to address the hardship of renters.

What was the reaction of the housing critic for the official opposition? He maintained that increasing that subsidy was a benefit for the landlord. That is not true. We were concerned about 120,000 families which would otherwise face the inconvenience and hardship of disclocation as a result of foreclosure. We addressed the problem by introducing a subsidy which in the long run will result in a saving to the taxpayer.

What did we get from the opposition? We got criticism for taking the very steps that the motion before us today says we have not taken. The opposition has to make up its mind. For example, the MURB provision, reintroduced by the Minister of Finance in the budget last year had been allowed to lapse by the former administration. That administration was lauded by the previous speaker for its attention to those people in need.

The one provision of our tax system which has been identified as a useful and effective way of generating housing activity in this country is the capital cost allowance for construction of multiple buildings. It lapsed under the previous government and was reintroduced by this government in the budget. That move contributed considerably to a surge in the housing industry in the first quarter of this year. The annual rate of housing starts of 125,000 in June last year bounced dramatically to a rate of over 242,000 in the first quarter of this year, a five-year high.

The action of this government in supporting the industry with that capital infusion which encouraged developers was part and parcel of the resurgence of the industry. The hon. member says that the government is not concerned about the needy when it allows interest rates to rise dramatically. It was this government which moved to increase allocations under the National Housing Act for social housing starts of 25,000 to 30,000 last year in order to assist those in the modest income levels to have access to housing. The government has an annual account of some $300 million which goes toward carrying the costs of some 400,000 existing social units. We felt it necessary to address the tight market situation in social housing, which we did, and we believe it has been a stimulant to the industry.

I will conclude with one final observation. I will contrast what this government has done with what was done in the nine-month regime of the last administration. The Matthews report recommended a withdrawal of support for all types of housing programs by the federal government. I have contrasted that with the initiatives we have taken. We have taken iniatives to work with the private sector to assist those facing hardship at this time. That is a stark contrast, one that I cannot help but make after hearing some of the comments made earlier in the debate today.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) has consistently, and one might say with fervour and almost with passion, supported the economic policies which this government has put in place. He justified them each time as he mentioned the cost to government of the various steps which have been taken. His most recent endeavour in this regard relates to the plea by members on this side of the House and by economists in Canada in general to extend the SBDL principle on a wider basis. He has justified the narrow and constrictive pattern in which this is exercised by saying "it will cost". That is purely and simply the Keynesian economic position, one that has been practised by this government for years. It is the negative approach to the cost of an incentive. It is not the positive approach of what the incentive would actually produce in other sectors of income for government. That is significant.

I think it must be recognized that as tax rates in the United States have gone down, revenues have gone up because of the stimulus to the economy. The member can treat this with scorn, as he has, but it would do him some good, his constituents some good and his small businessmen some good if he would just take a look at the other side of the coin, as some of us on this side of the House have tried consistently to do.

Government revenues do not go down in a stimulated economy, they go up. As the net gain of a stimulated economy under an extension of the SBDL principle to farmers, more small businessmen and more sectors of this economy will make the revenue of Canada not costly but incremental. I would imagine that little bit of an increase in mortgages just mentioned by the last speaker was probably more necessary to buy bread and butter than to buy new houses.

The agricultural aspect of this motion is intended to bring to the attention of the public the very critical position in which this industry now finds itself. It is no longer adequate for the minister to say repeatedly that we have the best farmers in the world and the best government in the world. The representations made to him, to the committee on agriculture and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), coupled with the news of the performance of other governments around the world, certainly negate the statement that we have the best government in the world as far as agriculture is concerned, and emphasizes the crass neglect by that government and that Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) who sits on your right, Mr. Speaker.

I certainly accept the statement that we have the best farmers in the world, but they probably receive the world's lowest recognition of their needs by means of this government's fiscal and monetary policy.

The European Economic Community, for instance, has established a fund which protects virtually every aspect of agricultural production of that area of the world against catastrophic losses which we are now experiencing. If there is no market at home, subsidies will be arranged for the disposition of surpluses somewhere in the world to the detriment of world markets and also to the detriment of those countries such as Canada which have been supplying the deficiencies of the world's food supply for years and are dependent upon its income. But no mercy is exhibited by that agricultural program.

In the United States there exists a multitude of laws of protection of agriculture against unnecessary hardship. We lack those laws. Imports can be controlled, bridge financing can be arranged and U.S. government purchases of surplus production has extended a stability to the economic structure of agriculture which we do not have the privilege of enjoying. Farmers today are borrowing money at a rate of simple interest as low as 12 per cent, and many of those farmers who are in beef feeding production are getting money for 16 per cent simple interest compared to the more than 20 per cent compounded on a monthly basis.

Former international trade negotiations have neglected to recognize the importance of this industry and its requirement for international markets. At the same time, to provide markets for other items for Canada in foreign markets, we have granted more favourable access to the Canadian market for agricultural products produced here. The combination of these two shortsighted policies has contributed in a major way to the economic difficulties we are presently experiencing.

Virtually every farm organization in Canada has made representations to this government pleading for reconsideration of both our international trade policies and our financial assistance programs which are so vitally needed at this moment in time.

Canadians as a whole recognize that certain industries need special considerations at special times and, as we in this House have done, have supported the policies of import quotas for the textile industry. Why then is it impossible for this government to recognize the need of such a vital industry as agriculture and to take prompt and immediate emergent steps to provide at least bridge financing for this industry?

Among the representations which have been made are those by the Canadian Horticultural Council pleading for recognition of the inflation factor as it applies to capital gains, and the recognition of the need of tax consideration for fuels and energy conservation materials used in the greenhouse industry. In these representations they have also asked for the small business loan limit to be increased to $200,000 and for the recognition of the accumulated requirement to consider the inflationary factor, along with an updating of the values established in the Advance Payments for Crops Act. These recommendations are made in what one may consider emergent economic circumstances and they need immediate and emergent response if these sectors of agriculture are to be helped. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture has made a representation to the Agriculture Committee, and I wish to read it into the record as follows:

> Federal government failure to take immediate action to relieve the farm debt problem amounts to a scandalous lack of concern for the disruption of the lives and livelihood of growing numbers of family farmers.
> An emergency farm credit program, through the federal farm Credit Corporation, is required to provide special refinancing for those farmers who are going under through no fault of their own.
> Farmers hit hardest are hog and beef producers who are being destroyed by a combination of rising costs, low farm prices and stratospheric interest rates. Cash crop producers financing major inputs are also facing serious credit problems.
> This is an emergency. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture is most concerned about the increasing number of actual farm bankruptcies and foreclosures. The evidence is that there is a rising flood of farmers in trouble, and current bank interest rates are the crushing blow that will put them under. If this is not so, a federal emergency program will get at the truth and no harm done.
> Farmers in this position who now have nowhere to go for help must have some program which will give them a chance for survival. Failure by the federal government to act and act quickly on this matter would be quite simply, irresponsible.
> The federal government has the capability of launching an emergency program nearly overnight, at very little cost to the taxpayer.

Please note I am not suggesting the expenditure of money, but rather bridge financing. The brief continues:

> 1. It has a fully developed, trained administration in the Farm Credit Corporation for doing the job.
> 2. It has the capability of providing funds at more moderate and/or deferred interest rates in cases of special need.
> 3. Surely it can get the co-operation of the banks not to foreclose on loans until the Farm Credit Corporation has a chance to review each applicant farmer's position and take necessary action.
> The action being requested by the CFA does not require large government expenditures and subsidy. Funds provided to the FCC for lending are not a government expenditure. They are an investment and a good one, that will be repaid. Government budgetary practice that calls them an expenditure is a misnomer, and it is important not to be misled by it.
> The CFA is requesting a helping hand to farmers with fundamentally sound farm enterprises who are being ruined while the FCC sits by unable to do the lending job which it can do and was created to do, because of lack of funds to lend.
> It is not valid to argue that the increasing bankruptcies are a result of bad management on the part of people who don't deserve help. Let's have a program that can help those that should be helped. There will be a lot of them. We challenge anyone to say it was bad management because a farmer in 1978 or 79 didn't foresee interest rates at 20%, when the banks willingly lent them the money that has now become such a disastrous burden.
> If the federal government does not act and act quickly on this matter it will be a black mark on its record. The CFA asks for assurance at once that the Cabinet is urgently considering this request. We believe a serious and responsible review of the matter cannot result in any other decision than to accept the action which we are proposing.

Let me quote from the Toronto Star of May 18. The article is so pertinent it merits reading in full, but time will not permit. It states in part:

Canada's farmers are among those who are the hardest hit victims by the Bank of Canada's deliberate policy of high interest rates to battle inflation and when farmers for whom interest rates spell disaster in today's capital intensive agriculture are pushed into bankruptcy and farm abandonment, the entire economy suffers.

That is from the Toronto Star. Let me quote again from the same article:

● (1530)

Hugh Moss, a cattle farmer, says, "The only way I can afford to pay 20 per cent interest is if I get over $1 per pound for beef". Right now he only gets 80 cents a pound and plans to sell off part of his farm to get the money to pay his debt... Ralph Barry, of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, estimates for every farmer who declares bankruptcy there are at least ten others who decide to sell their land and equipment and drop out of agriculture while they still have some measure of solvency. He says that this province loses about 1,000 farmers a year. It's got to stop.

Again from the Star, and I quote:

If Canada allows her agricultural community to be crippled by unmanageably high interest rates not only will we not be in a position to offset world shortages of food in years to come, we will also be at the mercy of the high cost of imported groceries.

Perhaps the most pertinent part of this article is the following:

Canada has traditionally recognized the particular and irreplaceable contributions that farmers and farming make to the economy by offering agricultural enterprise relatively low interest loans through the Farm Credit Corporation.

Please note that this did not come fron any farm magazine or farm organization. This is recognition by a non-farm paper of a crisis situation which exists. Let me quote again the traditional aspect of the last excerpt of this paper. It reads:

Not only has the traditional supply of money not been available through FCC, but traditional recognition of agricultural needs through price stabilization payments has been equally abandoned.

Two traditions are gone.

Antiquated cost of production figures, for instance, in the potato industry would indicate that if a price stabilization payment were to be made—

For this commodity.

—it would be made on the basis of something less than 60 per cent of the cost of production of this commodity.

Historically and traditionally the formula would have been on a stop-loss basis, not on a 60 per cent of cost basis.

Let me quote from The Financial Post of May 2 in respect of fruit and vegetable production in Canada as follows:

Fruit and vegetable cash receipts amounted to $770 million last year, with 31 per cent from fruits, 26 per cent from potatoes and 43 per cent from other vegetables. This is an industry with a big and growing trade deficit, more than one billion dollars last year.

I have gone out of my way to quote non-agricultural sources to substantiate the case for agriculture, and I believe that these quotes do that adequately. When The Financial Post says that we have a $1 billion trade deficit in the fruit and vegetable industry—and we can produce most of those fruits and vegetables—there is something wrong with the fiscal, monetary and agricultural policy of this nation. I repeat that I have gone out of my way not to quote farm papers for this purpose.

On May 19 the Minister of Agriculture was interviewed on CBC. His principal theme was that the banks should do more. Apparently the banks have lent approximately $16 billion or maybe $18 billion to farmers, but the Government of Canada is not prepared to put even a part of a billion dollars at the disposal of the Farm Credit Corporation as an advance for bridge financing for agriculture.

The minister gave some economic history of his own and discussed the possibility of his making representations to the government for a better deal for agriculture, but as usual he could not be pinned down in this interview to an adamant statement of his own that he would in fact make demands of the government as the Minister of Agriculture. He just gave his usual evasive gobbledygook support to the government and was unwilling to take a positive stand on behalf of the industry he represents.

The time for ministerial reflections upon the great history of agriculture is now past. The time to consider what steps the government can and must take to extend financial assistance to this industry is now. Is it not as important as Chrysler and Ford? This does not imply criticism of aid to those companies. I merely wish to emphasize the neglect on the part of the Minister of Agriculture of the industry he so halfheartedly represents.

Representations have been made by every agricultural organization in Atlantic Canada pleading for a recognition of their plight. If the Minister of Finance and this government in general do not recognize disaster when they see it eyeball to eyeball, and if the Minister of Agriculture is not prepared to put his portfolio on the line, not only will the 76 per cent increase in farm bankruptcies grow larger but the total economy of Canada will also suffer.

If the government is not interested in farmers, it should be interested in the total economy of Canada and the impact on that economy of a declining agricultural industry.

Recently there has been criticism of the repetitive nature of speeches in the House of Commons. The previous speaker made a criticism regarding the time consumed in debate in this House. When we have a responsive government which recognizes ability across the floor as well as in its own hallowed and divine precincts and when there is compromise and joint planning, debates will not linger, they will not be extended, and we will be able to get on with the business of the House. But this House will not lie down in front of the introduction of regulatory legislation rather than legislative legislation. It will not lie down in front of the extension to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) and extend to them the power to control by regulation the Minister of Agriculture and the policies which he should and must introduce. The Minister of Agriculture must have freedom to function in an independent and recommending way for his industry.

I received today a letter in response to some questions I asked in the committee on April 2. It took the minister two months and three or four weeks to respond. I asked for reconsideration of the feed freight subsidy in Atlantic Canada. That has been put over for study by the Feed Board of Canada in the face of absolutely pertinent and proven documentation making a case for an increment to the feed freight subsidy presented by a host of organizations from Atlantic Canada and eastern Quebec. It is going to be studied.

Potato production in Atlantic Canada is in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. A storage program for potatoes will take place in Kentville, Nova Scotia. With all due respect to Nova Scotia,, which has a small potato industry, the climate is not quite the same. Results from that station will be good, but this work should be done in the potato-growing area. It should be done either at Charlottetown or Fredericton, but not Kentville.

There is a Meristem program for agriculture and the promotion of better seed potatoes in Canada. There will be a conference on that in Ste-Anne-de-la-Pocatière. The Meristem program is supposed to promote a better seed industry in Canada, but the seed industry is not in Ste-Anne-de-la-Pocatière. The export seed industry for which this is designed—as well as for improvement in quality—is in Atlantic Canada, but the conference will be in Ste-Anne-de-la-Pocatière. If the west does not just raise hell, no doubt we will soon be looking after rapeseed in St. John's, Newfoundland. That would be as logical as the answers I received.

Let me go one step further. The minister closes his letter by saying, "The program is in place". He was referring to several, one of which is the storage subsidy program for perishable products. Yes, the program is in place, but it is just like the subsidy program for the fishing industry. No money was put into it. The minister exhorts farmers to use a program for which he does not see fit to get any money.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. However, he might continue if he had the unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Agreed.

[English]

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I will try to be very brief in my conclusion. I want to talk about the general economic climate which has been created by this government through its fiscal and monetary approach. I have here a list of 18 companies—I obviously do not have time to read it—which have been inspired to invest their money abroad. These are but 18 reported in the last ten days. The business of these companies ranges from real estate to oil and represents billions of dollars.

● (1540)

I want to say to you that as we have had a single approach to the economy and the value of our dollar, we have neglected the international position of fishing, farming, forestry and oil. The result is that the markets for these basic products of Canada except oil have declined in virtually every viable market except the United States. They have declined 24 per cent with respect to Britain because the pound is worth so much more; 21 per cent with respect to Germany; 10 per cent for Japan and some 21 per cent for Sweden.

Now, fishing, farming and forestry products from Atlantic Canada are dependant upon those markets and the U.S. market to survive. They are getting from 10 to 24 per cent less of those markets because we have not kept an eye on the currency of countries to which we export. As a result, Atlantic Canada's primary industries are suffering. The U.S. economy, of course, on which we have based ours does not offer the usual market because it is stymied, as is ours. Let us get away from the Keynesian approach. I appeal to the government to do that. Let us get back to a stimulative approach. It will not cost you, it will make you money.

Mr. Evans: You are 180 degrees out of synch.

Mr. McCain: You, sir, are still in the Keynesian economic bible and you have no intention of getting away from it. Let us look at the reality of inflation today.

Mr. Evans: You do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. McCain: Let us cut back expenditures and deficits. Let us realize what we can do to give incentive to industry for a better future. Let us not look to stagnation and regulating industry out of business as the Keynesian hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) would do.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You have been uncovered at last.

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, thank you for recognizing me in this debate. Once again our friends opposite are talking about the disastrous interest rate squeeze on the small business and industrial sectors. The hon. member who had the floor just before me spoke of economic incentives and urged the government to go ahead with policies of exaggerated expenditures at a time when inflation is the most difficult problem to cope with. However, speaking more specifically of economic incentives to which the hon. member referred, in all likelihood he does not have time to read the newspapers or else he does not understand what he reads, Mr. Speaker. I read in the Financial Times of June 22, 1981 an article entitled "Government Aid to Business Now Tops $6 Billion a Year".

In that article the Financial Times lists a series of programs in the fields of financing, loan guarantees, labour training assistance, investment tax credits, research and development tax credits, as well as all the special programs we have implemented since we returned to office, Mr. Speaker, precisely to spur the economy and the industry.

Hon. Members of the opposition have such a limited understanding of the economy that every day they ask us: Where is your industrial strategy? Where is your economic development strategy? We would have to label each decision we take and say: You on the other side, wake up, because that is part of the industrial strategy. They keep forgetting certain achievements such as for instance the fact that as recently as last week we announced a strategy for the textile and clothing sector under which $250 million will be earmarked for the restructuration of businesses and for assistance to employees who might have to relocate as a result of our import policies. They also fail to mention that we have launched our $350 million industrial restructuring program which the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) had announced in his budget last October. They fail to mention our assistance program for the micro-electronic industry, another $50 million. As recently as this morning I was in Sherbrooke to announce that the local university would become one of the six leading electronic technology centres in Canada. A similar announcement was made in Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Toronto and, as I just said, Sherbrooke, and within a few weeks we will be announcing another leading electronic centre in the Maritime provinces.

And then we have a bigger budget to promote productivity in defence materials. We also have the new policy in the field of exports where my colleague the Minister of State for Commerce (Mr. Lumley) has drastically increased the budget to boost export products and set up the mixed credits program. All this is part of an industrial strategy of major government investments. The Financial Times quotes a figure of $6 billion. I will not quote the government press release because my colleagues opposite will say that I am trying to mislead them, that is why I refer to a serious paper like the Financial Times, and I would suggest that hon. members read a little more economic publications in order to understand what goes on in that area.

Of course, some have again argued that high interest rates are the only cause of bankruptcies in the small business sector, and I would refer them once again to the Financial Times, because members across do not readily accept what we say. So I would refer them to an article published in the Financial Times of June 22, 1981, and I quote, Mr. Speaker: "Don't blame high rates for bankruptcies".

[English]

Dun & Bradstreet Canada Limited statistics of May 29, 1981, indicate that business failures are up 17 per cent over 1980. We all agree with this figure, Mr. Speaker, but in the same publication Dun & Bradstreet reveals there is no concrete information to indicate specifically that high interest costs are causing small business to fail. The same study adds that 97.6 per cent of the 1980 business failures were due to bad management.

So enough of this witch-hunt, of trying to prove that high interest rates are the cause of ever-increasing small business bankruptcies. These bankruptcies are tragic, of course, and it is harmful to the economy as a whole when companies are forced out of business, however we tend to forget that even though the bankruptcy rate was 17 per cent in 1980, the rate of increase or of creation of new small businesses was 20 per cent, Mr. Speaker. So we should take a closer look at what higher interest rates mean for small business.

Let us suppose, Mr. Speaker, that you are a small businessman and that your working capital or your line of credit at the bank is $100,000, and you know as well as I do that over 80 per cent of small businesses in Canada have working capitals and lines of credit under that amount. But let us take 100,000, it is an easy figure to work with, and let us say that last year or two years ago your working capital was costing you 12 per cent, now in 1981 it is costing you 22 per cent. Over a period of one year, that represents an additional charge of $10,000, but one has to consider the entire financial picture of a company before saying that interest rates are the one and only cause of bankruptcy. One has to remember that there have also been increases in the cost of electricity, oil, gas, telephone and rent, as well as in municipal and provincial taxes. So if one reviews these financial statements, Mr. Speaker, one realizes that the issue of increased interest rates is a relative one. There are several alternatives to deal with this additional charge of $10,000: cut the personal expenses of the owner, cut back on the inventory, review the hiring policy, and there are countless other ways that can be used in a fiscal year to allow a business to cut its costs by $10,000 in order to meet this increased charge.

We are being told that the government does not want to stimulate the economy. It is obvious, when we look at the figures, that the argument about the $6 billion per year injected in the Canadian economy is not valid. When they say that interest rates are the only reason why small businesses go bankrupt, I say that those people know nothing about small businesses or the balance sheet of a Canadian business. And when they say that the government has no strategy, no master plan, I say that those people are blind. As I said earlier, we will have to stick a label or ring a bell each time we take a decision and tell them "Wake up, this is part of the economic strategy of the government, we are putting forward programs to assist the Canadian economy".

I have commented some of them, but there are many others. A few weeks ago, my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais), announced the Suppliers' Development Fund. With him, I helped organize throughout Canada the exhibitions called Contact 81 through which we tried to put the government's major customers in contact with the smallest suppliers in each region, whether Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg, Toronto, Halifax or Montreal, so that major Canadian companies can find an increasing number of sub-contractors among Canadian suppliers.

During these nation-wide exhibitions, Mr. Speaker, we were able to identify 2,500 additional sub-contractors who will be able to market new products which we now have to import and some of whom will be able to benefit from the Suppliers' Development Fund to develop in Canada new products to replace imports. But my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, went even further. Ten months ago, last August, Mr, Speaker, I had the honour to announce in co-operation with his department our sub-contract program. Under this program, we decided as a government to use our purchasing power to improve the small business sector, make it even more active and give it more opportunities.

Under this purchasing policy, we indicated in 1980 that 39 per cent of all purchases would be from small businesses, which represents about $900 million. With the approval of the government, my colleague and myself decided that our target would be 45 per cent of all government purchases, and we want to spend through our purchasing policy $1.4 billion a year, which will be directly injected into the Canadian economy to help small businesses.

We are told that we have done nothing concerning interest rates. I would like to speak about another program which has had even more success than expected, namely the small business development bond program. My colleague, the Minister of Finance, announced this program in his budget, and my colleague, the Minister of State (Finance) (Mr. Bussières), accepted my amendment to provide an extension of these bonds.

We now expect that, thanks to this government policy and under this program, banks and financial institutions in Canada will provide loans to small businesses wanting to purchase new equipment, expand their business, purchase land or expand their premices at a rate of about 10 or 11 per cent, or 50 per cent of the current business rate, and in this way inject $2 billion in the economy. I am not making up this figure. It was the figure quoted by the President of the Canadian Banking Association, a figure which we get when we add all the amounts that chartered banks and financial institutions allocate to the small business development bond. Two billion dollars, Mr. Speaker! The members opposite might think this is insignificant!

For my part, I believe that it is an absolutely fantastic amount which will enable the small business sector in Canada to continue to grow, to create employment, to develop new technologies and to make the Canadian economy healthy, because as everyone knows, and the government best of all, the small business sector is the most dynamic in Canada and was responsible for 62 per cent of all new employment created in Canada in 1980 and is responsible annually for 40 per cent of all employment.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we want to help this sector and this is why we have decided first of all to implement all these programs, such as the Suppliers' Development Fund and the Microelectronics Assistance Program, through which small businesses can obtain 100 per cent financing from the government for feasibility studies to determine whether electronics can be used in their business and can obtain subsidies of 75 per cent for the installation of electronic material and manpower training.

In addition to those programs and the obligation we have to promote the expansion of small businesses, the goal of our whole purchasing policy is to pour into the economy huge amounts of money to help, protect and develop this sector in which we believe.

Mr. Speaker, several indicators would lead us to believe that the policies we have initiated are working and helping small businesses. Before rising in the House, I was looking over that part of my annual report dealing with the Small Businesses Loans Act. In 1980, $400 million in loans were granted to small Canadian businesses involved in various activities, which is an increase of 72 per cent over 1979. And when we consider the figures for the first quarter of 1981, we realize that they represent an increase in value of 58.6 per cent over the corresponding period in 1980.

As far as the Federal Business Development Bank is concerned, over 40,000 small businesses in Canada are being assisted under various loans programs. In fact, over 40,000 businesses in this country are taking part in the Federal Business Development Bank's Counselling Assistance to Small Enterprises program; I could mention also the 50 per cent investment tax credit which was announced in his budget speech by my colleague the Minister of Finance, jointly with his colleague the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) for the benefit of the less-developed areas of our country. This 50 per cent provision means that if you decide overnight to go to the Gaspé area, the Maritimes, northern Quebec or northern Ontario and to invest $100,000 to set up a small business and create jobs, you will get $50,000 back from the government. That is the way to stimulate the economy and develop this very important sector.

The opposition is complaining that interest rates are suffocating small businesses. It is a fact that we are going through difficult times, Mr. Speaker, but we have put in action the necessary mechanisms to alleviate this problem and help this section develop. Everyone knows as well as I do that today is an opposition day—

Mr. Pinard: What opposition?

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): —the Tory opposition who introduced a motion, according to them, of basic importance to the very future of this country. Too bad, Mr. Speaker, the television cameras cannot focus on their benches. Only one of my colleagues and friends is sitting there to represent my Progressive Conservative friends, Mr. Speaker. That just shows how interested they are in the Canadian economy. I approve the decisions and the directions taken in matters economic by the Minister of Finance when he tells us: I do not want to stifle the Canadian economy by making cutbacks that would hinder economic expansion. But, on the other hand, in view of the current inflation, I simply must cut spending to some extent. To my mind, the Minister of Finance advocates and follows, as well as the government, a policy of common sense through this inflation period. Let us not delude ourselves, Mr. Speaker, current interest rates are not a threat to our economic health, but inflation is. We must apply all our wits, all our tools and resources, all our economic levers to fight against the curse that afflicts not only the farmers, homeowners, individuals, small and big businesses, but absolutely everyone.

It is essential, in implementing the policy put forward by the Minister of Finance, that we pursue it in order to succeed in reducing interest rates and thus allow all sectors of our Canadian economy to thrive and all Canadians to enjoy an improved social and economic life. In my view, the motion put forward by the members of the Progressive Conservative party is practically meaningless and of no interest to those members, judging from the empty seats. And that motion disregards the facts as well as the major economic efforts of this government and our sensible policy.

[English]

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity to address this House on the important motion placed before it with respect to the condemnation which we should have of the government for its inability to deal with the economic policies described in the motion and, in particular, with its inability to deal with the high usurious interest rates prevailing in Canada today. We very clearly recognize, and even hon. members from the government side, do so that those rate are excessive in terms of what they ought to in Canada. They have been officially established by the Bank of Canada, encouraged, promoted and prompted by direct government intervention and action. We can recall the days when we did not have the fixing of these rates by a Thursday auction of government bills, and when the government itself took the responsibility. Now the government does it in an indirect manner by instructing the Governor of the Bank of Canada as to what he should do. On Thursday of every week, we wait with bated breath to determine the interest rate which Canadian home owners will ultimately be paying, Canadian businesses will be paying, and Canadian consumers will be paying for the money that they borrow. Today, we have an effective rate, as established by the Bank of Canada, at 19.08 per cent. That rate translates into an effective rate of between 22 per cent and 23 per cent for consumers who are fortunate enough to borrow their funds from conventional sources, and a similar rate for small businesses in Canada, and an effective rate of between 18 per cent and 19 per cent for those who are renewing mortgages or acquiring new mortgages for their homes.

The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) has commenced upon the fact that insolvencies and bankruptcies which have occurred in the small business community have, in large measure, been due to a number of causes and ought not to be directly attributable to the high cost of money. His suggestions are very interesting. He suggests that if one is, indeed, in the position of a small businessman who finds that on a $100,000 loan, to which he makes reference, interest has increased over $10,000 in a period of a year, what one should do is to cut down one's staff. He suggests that we lay off some people. A moment later he gets into an explanation as to how, if one wants to establish a small business in Quebec, or Gaspé or northern Ontario—

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): I did not say that at all.

Mr. Gamble: —that one can get a government loan to hire more people. I wish he would make up his mind. Does he want small businessmen to lay off employees, or does he want them to hire more? The fact of the matter is that in our country we rely, in large measure, for employment to be provided by the small business community in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism on a point of order.

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. I am not in the habit of doing so. Admittedly he listened patiently to my comments, but I would like to respectfully ask him not to try and mislead the House. At no time did I suggest that small businesses are laying off employees.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for York North has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Gamble: It is regrettable that the minister cannot weigh his words appropriately so that they come out the same, both when he is talking about the cutting of employment and when he is talking about increasing employment. That is a common failing of the members of the government. I can well understand how he is led into that trap.

The simple fact of the matter is that this nation cannot survive on interest rates which are consistently and permanently in excess of 20 per cent. Rates of that nature will have the direct effect of sucking the lifeblood out of the entire economy. It is the responsibility of the government to do something about it. Today in the House, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), in answer to one of my questions, relied upon the fact that the major enemy of government is inflation and inflationary expectations. I know the government relies on that fact. The minister said, upon return from a meeting of the OECD in Paris, France, that the object of the government is to break inflationary expectations. Those comments with respect to inflation and the need to combat it have been referred to by the hon. Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans).

However, the question is, has the government in fact taken the necessary steps to achieve its laudatory goal? The answer to that question is that very clearly it has not. This morning in the House I asked the Minister of Finance how he equated that objective with a bill which was passed by this House on Monday, Bill C-57, dealing with an amendment to the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act which included a provision therein for the fixing of tax on an ad valorem basis. I pointed out that in fixing that tax in that fashion, it was obvious to anyone who is aware of that bill and the changes to be brought about as a result of its passage, that the government, ever mindful of its need to grab more and more taxes from Canadians, expected that the price of the commodities subject to that tax would increase. The government, by its own legislation, has told the public in Canada that it expects the price of certain commodities to go up. How does it therefore equate its objective to break inflationary expectations when its own actions have indicated to the public that it believes that price in Canada will increase? Accordingly, it has encouraged the public to believe the very thing that it suggests it wants them not to believe. Not only has the government done that, but it has also taken more funds from the public and will continue to do so under this piece of legislation. Therefore, it has fuelled inflation itself.

Doubtless people are motivated by a desire to place in their own pockets, for their own purposes, and in the pockets of their families for their families' purposes, additional revenue. For that reason, Canadians have generally adhered to a work ethic in Canada. They believe that if one works harder and works longer, one will make more and keep more. In the event that the government tells them that it will cost them more to live because the government is taking more of what they earn, they will, indeed, want to earn more. That is a logical conclusion which the government, had it any wit at all, would recognize.

The more the government takes, the more the public will demand for both the services and goods produced by the public. That is fuelling the inflationary expectations and fuelling inflation itself. Yet the government sits back, and the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism suggests that it is appropriate to reduce one's staff or, indeed, maybe move one's plant to some other area in the country. The fact of the matter is that the public in Canada, small businessmen, farmers and fishermen, know best what to do with their funds. It is no answer for the government to invoke program after program directing the economy in a particular course. Businessmen in Canada know best what to do with their revenues. Businessmen will be better served if the government reduces taxes and establishes an economic climate in which they can flourish. Home owners are better served if their after tax revenues are higher so that they can look after their own needs. The public in Canada is not asking for a handout. They are asking for a hand off. And the hand off which they seek is the heavy hand of the Government of Canada.

These are the primary issues with which we should be concerned. Now I know that the Minister of Finance has indicated in this House that our real growth, after allowing for inflation, may well, on an annual basis, be in the neighbourhood of 4 per cent this year. He examines that annual growth and says that we do not have an economic crisis in this country. We can see that our unemployment rate is at a level which is lower than that to which we have become accustomed and that is recognized. Let us not dispute it. But that is today, Mr. Speaker. The wisdom of a government should surely be reflected in its determination to take steps which will affect the future of this country. I am not talking about the future in ten or 15 years, I am talking about the future around the corner, within six months when most people who have acquired homes at 18 per cent and 19 per cent interest, when those small businessmen who have expanded an operation and had to borrow money at 22 per cent or 23 per cent, recognize that after six months they cannot bear the interest charges. That is what is happening in this country. If the government does not realize it, I say it is shortsighted and should, in the words of this motion, be condemned.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Hear, hear!

Mr. Gamble: We have heard the statistics. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) read off some statistics which had been provided to him by various lending institutions. Those statistics referred to foreclosures on personal residences. The Minister of Public Works, before he came to this House, practised law. If he were to consult with people who are his former partners, he might well ask them to give him the figures for judicial sales of property or writs of possession. If he would add them all up, he would find the real measure of hardship among Canadian home owners because there has been a recent development furthered by the actions of the lending institutions, not to foreclose but, rather, to have judicial sales of property, even have writs possessions so that the homes may be extracted from the owner and rented, until a more appropriate time for a subsequent judicial sale may occur.

Those figures in themselves are meaningless, Mr. Speaker. He might also like to confer with his colleague in the House who is complaining about the fact that there were not very many Conservatives in the House when he was speaking and who has now left. He suggested that the small business community was not in as bad a position as it might be, and in fact some of their financial ills might have resulted from an increase in hydro charges and real property taxes or business taxes on their establishments. The fact of the matter is he might well consult with him and determine what number of those small businesses have not been put into bankruptcy, and of course there are a large number who have, but who have been forced into voluntary liquidation. Some small businesses recognize that it is better to sell out now at whatever price than to lose everything by holding on another few months. In other words, these are the very people who foresee the path set for them by present government policies. But there is nothing said of that and there is relatively little concern shown for them.

Government action today, Mr. Speaker, is destroying the foundation upon which this nation has been built. It has been built upon the concept of hard work and prudence which would result, after a reasonable length of time, in individuals acquiring their own homes. It has been built upon time, hard work and the enterprise of individuals who wish to transform small businesses into large businesses in Canada, thereby not only offering the employment that the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism would like them to reduce, but at the same time building the nation. Policies which have been advocated by this government, that is to say, policies of shifting tax money, allocating funds to projects which the government thinks are important, have no regard for what the public thinks is important and what small businessmen and home owners think is important. Those are the issues which have prompted them to work and strive to achieve their goals.

This government has been the most know-nothing, say-nothing and do-nothing government this country has witnessed in a long time. Since it has taken office, inflation has spread and increased despite the fact that it has itself recognized that inflation is the chief enemy.

The government looks with some pride at the fact that perhaps the GNP may be increasing somewhat this year. But it does not pay heed to the hardship and the heartbreak that a lot of people must suffer. What action has the government taken since October 28 to curb the insatiable appetite for funding which it extracts from the public? It is true that inflation is indeed the core source for high interest rates in this country. But who is responsible for inflation? Is it the man who is working on the production line at General Motors? Is it the farmer who is selling his products and is obliged to sell at whatever he can obtain? Is it the fishermen, or the small businessmen?

The prime source of inflation, Mr. Speaker, is the government itself, and there are two ways in which this regrettable circumstance occurs. It is either as a result of the increase in the money supply or the extraction of more and more funds from individuals and businessmen in Canada, or both. In the first case, while this government and its predecessor Liberal administration were in office, we had circumstances where the increase in the money supply on an annual basis exceeded 14 per cent per year.

How can increases of that nature ever retard inflationary growth? The answer is that it cannot. Today, I give the government credit to some extent for the fact that through the Bank of Canada, it has reduced the increase in the money supply to something in the neighbourhood of 6 per cent. Mind you, that is still above even the projected growth in the GNP, but it is a marked improvement over the historical use of money supply by this government in the past to feed inflation in this country.

What about the second element of the true growth of inflation? I do not have the statistics for today, but the last ones I saw showed the federal government extracted 43 per cent of the total GNP. In the United States, the federal government there extracted 31 per cent over the same period of time.

I know the response of the Minister of Finance is, "Don't you understand that we take some of those funds and we distribute them among provincial governments?" If the federal government distributes them among provincial governments it is because of a national policy. It is no answer to say the money goes elsewhere. The money is, in fact, collected and then it is disbursed in a fashion which the federal government desires. It is its responsibility to account for its constant groping for tax dollars resulting from the hard work and efforts of Canadians.

Where has all this led us? It has led us from the time the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office to a government spending program which has grown from some $12 billion to some $66.6 billion. It has resulted in an interest element on the national debt of $12.26 billion, or almost equal to the entire budgetary estimates of the Prime Minister who is now in office, when he came to office—almost an equivalent amount is now spent paying interest on the national debt. But, Mr. Speaker, even these figures are wrong. We learned from the deputy minister of finance last week that the Canada pension fund is fully $102 billion unfunded. The plan would be insolvent if it were called upon to meet the obligations it has to Canadians who have looked upon the Canada Pension Plan as a contract between themselves and the Government of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the $66.6 billion to which I have made reference does not include—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

● (1620)

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, it is always interesting to hear members opposite complaining about the amount of government expenditures. I have been here almost 13 years—I was not here during the 1979-1980 regime—and I have yet to hear a recommendation from members opposite about areas in which the government should be cutting its expenditures. This was very much in evidence when the official opposition formed the government. I did not see too many significant cuts but I saw significant increases in expenditures. Fortunately this House saw fit to defeat that budget, otherwise we would have been in dire straits and possibly in the economic crisis which the opposition alleges is taking place today.

In my position as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, I would be remiss if I did not publicly compliment the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), who is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières). In a short period we have had the Bank Act, which is a massive piece of legislation, and Bill C-57 before the finance committee. Whatever your views were on either one of those pieces of legislation, Mr. Speaker, they called for a great deal of homework, study and understanding. The parliamentary secretary made a point of briefing himself so that he could intelligently cope with the matter as a member of that committee, but he has been given the significant tribute today of handling this debate on behalf of the government in a motion raised by the opposition. I compliment him for the work he has performed.

We hear about an economic crisis. I do not think the people who raise that kind of issue have talked to the people at FIRA. The Foreign Investment Review Agency has never received more applications, or had more people from outside of this country endeavouring to invest in Canada because they realize it is an excellent place to invest. We can keep our interest rates below those of the United States because we are a country where people are not afraid to invest their money. As a matter of fact, every day people are seeking ways to buy, to invest or to start up new industries.

Mr. Gamble: Sell out the whole country.

Mr. Cullen: The economy could not be in crisis if that were the situation. I hear hon. members opposite saying "tell that to the farmers" or "tell that to the small businessman". Anyone who talks about the economy being in crisis is really doing a disservice to the small businessman and to the farmer. It is as though we were going to hell in a hand basket, if you listen to members opposite.

The facts have been spelled out in statistics. Fortunately for the government and for Canada we have a very sophisticated group of Canadians who understand that all the faults and all the problems we have cannot be placed on the government's doorstep.

I agree with the hon. member who preceded me in one area, that it is to the government's credit to have cut back the monetary supply. I agree with him that earlier we had expanded the money supply and risked some inflation in the interests of keeping jobs in the economy. It was a trade-off at that time. If we had cut back on the money supply instead of increasing it, we would have faced a much more serious problem of very high unemployment, in the late 1960s and the early 1970s. The government took the conscious decision. It is all well and good to say in hindsight that it was wrong to increase the money supply at that time, but they were not prepared to face the problems that Canada would have had with hundreds of thousands more unemployed. Therefore it was a conscious, legitimate, bona fide decision in the interests of saving jobs. Had we not had the quadrupling of the oil prices, I suggest with respect, that move would have been complimented and not criticized at the present time.

I hear members opposite saying that we could solve all the problems in Canada if we could just get the energy situation, the pricing and the distribution of the money settled. But I was surprised to hear a member from Alberta suggesting the other day that we could solve all our problems immediately by going to 75 per cent of world price. First, it is irresponsible to suggest that we should tie our prices to a world price when we have seen OPEC quadruple the price of oil overnight. Who is to say that OPEC will not double it overnight at some stage? Why should we tie our price to the world price? Second, by going overnight to 75 per cent of world price, can you imagine the impact on provinces like Quebec and the four Atlantic provinces, just to name those provinces that would have more difficulty coping with that particular sudden rise? I suggest that all of Canada would suffer if we moved in a precipitous way to that price.

We all know that the price of oil is too low at the present time. We all know that the price has to rise. But surely common sense dictates that we must find a procedure whereby we can augment this cost of oil and do it in a careful, appropriate and sensible way. We must not say that all our problems will go away if we yield to what the oil producers are saying, particularly the oil producing provinces, and go to 75 per cent of world price overnight. That will not resolve anything.

What I do welcome are those suggestions coming to me from my riding. As Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, I get other suggestions from across Canada. One suggestion came from a constituent who suggested that the government give consideration to tax exempt bonds. In this way an individual could earn a certain amount of interest, say 50 per cent of the going rate, and that money could then be loaned out to help small industries. This would be another source of revenue. That suggestion has been criticized because it would be beneficial only to those who have money and there are other avenues whereby they could get tax advantages. But, of course, if you are going to get money, you are going to get it from the people who have it, those who are prepared to buy these bonds knowing that they will be tax exempt. It would be of significant benefit to Canadians and to farmers if the money were used in that particular way.

Mr. Gamble: When are you going to bring in that provision?

Mr. Cullen: I have made about four or five suggestions to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Nickerson: He hasn't taken any notice.

Mr. Cullen: Whether he sees fit to adopt all or any of them, we will have to wait for the October budget. I think we do a disservice if we are afraid or do not stand up to be counted in areas where we think moves should be made by the Department of Finance. Political palliatives that we hear from members of the opposition will not do the trick. They are talking about mortgage protection. Members of the NDP are talking about a modified form of exchange controls, but they are very careful not to spell that out. They talk about freezing interest rates but not having to accept the responsibility of what would happen to the Canadian dollar. Senator Lamontagne said the other day that the value of the Canadian dollar in terms of the U.S. dollar might go down to 78 cents. He has no guarantee that will happen. I suggest, with respect, that he is way off base on that suggestion.

I understand I am allowed 20 minutes in this debate, but in the interests of allowing one of my friends opposite to participate, I will cut my remarks short. I had other things I wanted to say, but I will only mention one. I watched television last night and I was appalled that the banks have indicated to the Minister of Finance that they are prepared to "bend over backward" to help out industry or to help out the small businessman. A bank has decided to move in on a business run by three generations of one family in Bridgeport, Nova Scotia after having been told by the family that they needed two or three more weeks in order to succeed. When banks do not play their part in an area such as that, they are doing a disservice to their customers which they have been pleased and proud to have in the past. When businesses like that get into difficulty and the banks have to make a move, it should be a move in the right direction, which is to help their customers as every other business is required to do at the present. But if banks move in this way they are not, in my view, meeting their social obligations.

There are other areas on which I want to comment but I have agreed to give some of my time so that other members have the opportunity to speak.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member who has just concluded his remarks and allowed me to speak this afternoon. I am pleased to speak on the motion presented by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin) concerning the economic crisis in this country brought on by the government's handling of interest rates. We do not always look at the question of interest rates as widely as we might. I do not intend to spend a lot of time in my remarks dealing with the why of interest rates. However, I want to deal with the two basic answers we usually hear from the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) as to why we have high interest rates.

Sometimes he says it is to attract money to this country. That sounds reasonable. At the same time members of the official opposition say that too much money has been manufactured in this country. When we look at the assets of the banks in this country we see that in 1970 they had approximately $32 billion in assets to loan. In 1980 this had increased to $340 billion. The amount of money that is available beyond the direct control of government has grown at a phenomenal rate.

We had the Bank Act before us within the last year. The amount of reserves that the banks are forced to keep were reduced. That results in the amount of money which they can loan for every dollar invested with them increasing that much quicker. Therefore, we have not done very much with regard to regulating the banks. We have virtually allowed the interest rate to be set by an auction every week. I am not certain it has had the desired result.

Our finance critic pointed out that Statistics Canada reports show that consumers and small businessmen have reduced their spending between 40 and 60 per cent. Therefore, they are not bidding up the price for goods and services. They are reducing their spending. However, interest rates keep going up, ostensibly to force us to reduce spending. I do not know where the vicious cycle will end. I know it is affecting farmers in particular, and it is my responsibility to speak for them in this House on behalf of our caucus.

I wish to spend a few minutes to make the House aware of some of the difficulties that have been created for farmers and small businesses. There are a number of cases I could deal with, but I will review two with the House. These are not beginning farmers, poor operators or poor managers. They have grown very rapidly in their first 10 or 20 years in the business and were at a level of production that is considered to be an economic unit, yet both are in trouble.

Case number one is a Saskatchewan farmer who added a half section of land to a section and a half that he was farming just three years ago. The half section which he added cost him $130,000, all of which he borrowed. That was and still is the only debt he has. However, he had a three year renegotiable mortgage and the three years are now up. His interest payments will double from $16,000 to $32,000 per year. The extra increase in interest payments that are due each year equal or exceed his net income for the previous year.

This man is 43 years old, is operating what is considered to be an economic unit, has a good turnover, fairly good grain prices and is considering selling out. That is because the increase in interest rates will virtually wipe out his net income. If he offers the land for sale, the amount of money he will have to reinvest at today's interest rates will easily give him a net income of $60,000 a year before taxes, and possibly more than that. For doing absolutely nothing, he will triple his income. Another relatively young farmer will be going out of business.

The other case involves a tobacco farmer in Ontario who is ten years younger, in his early thirties. He has had two difficult years. His tobacco crop was damaged by frost and disease during the last two years. It reduced his income by about 20 per cent in each of those two years. As a result, his debt load has been increasing.

This man sent me his financial statement for the two years. For the year ending April 30, 1980, his interest payments amounted to $26,934. For the year ended April 30, 1981, carrying very little more debt, they totalled $58,163. He has attempted to reincorporate his farm to be eligible for a small business development bond. However, he may not be eligible. Going to SBDB would bring the interest load down $18,000 or $20,000, which would allow him and his wife some money to spend.

These are the kinds of situation that farmers are getting into. Many farmers have to re-mortgage their land because mortgage rates are usually slightly lower than operating loans. It is reminiscent of the old Woodie Guthrie song which went like this:

> The mortgage worked the steadiest and the hardest of us all.
> It worked all week and Sundays, it worked each holiday,
> It settled down among us and never went away.

Indeed, mortgages on farm land are not going away. Debt on the farm is increasing much faster on an annual basis than almost any segment of our economy. The economic analysis being done by the finance minister perhaps identifies some of the problems in this country. When the finance minister was studying and indeed teaching economics, the country was considered to have three sectors to its economy. In the fifties, the primary production sector made up 30 per cent of the economy, the manufacturing sector 30 per cent and the service sector 40 per cent. To some extent, our monetary and fiscal policies still seem to run with those basic concepts of the economy.

Unfortunately, the situation has changed considerably. Our primary production now employs about 7.6 per cent of all those employed in this country, that is agriculture, forestry and fisheries. The manufacturing sector which processes the goods and manufactures the tools and equipment accounts for about 25 per cent of our employment. The service sector in today's economy accounts for well over two-thirds of our employment, or 67.4 per cent. When we look at the new situation, we see that the old solutions will not work. In the old days, with the old economics, the agricultural sector was considered to have too much labour. We are always told that we are underutilizing our labour, that we have far too much of it and all of the policies are aimed at getting people out of agriculture. I think nearly all agricultural economists have been of the opinion for the last five or ten years that, if anything, there is a shortage of real skilled labour in agriculture. When we see people like the young tobacco farmer or the grain farmer in Saskatchewan being forced out of agriculture, or coaxed out, by the kind of interest rate policies we have, we realize we are losing a very unique and important part of the economy of this country.

Seven or eight years ago there was a study done which indicated that in terms of the gross national product agriculture was responsible for producing or contributing something like 42 per cent. That may have changed a little in intervening years, but it is still a very sizeable amount. Even though it does not employ very many people, it is still responsible for providing goods that can be used in manufacture and for providing services to the point that a great number of people still rely on it in this economy.

Although the policy of high interest rates under old economics might not bother the government very much, the fact that we are losing some farmers is going to have a disastrous effect. I would cite some of the reactions that some of the farmers in my part of the country are indicating when talking of high interest rates. Many of them are mixed farmers producing hogs and beef.

There is a man in the Rosthern area, for instance, whose father and grandfather have produced registered hogs since the opening up of that part of the country. He is considering shutting down his farm, which will mean about 2,000 pigs per year out of production. Not only will this take hogs out of production, it will do away with a number of fairly important breed or genetic lines which have been introduced into the livestock business. He is doing this for a very simple and fundamental reason. By selling off his livestock, he will have a bit more money to reduce his debt load, thus reducing the amount of interest payable.

What happens one or two years down the road when he no longer has these 2,000 pigs from his farm coming into the economy? What impact will the consumers feel? We have seen an Economic Council report complaining about marketing boards and how they are costly to consumers, but what happens in this free market system when we put people out of production and we do not have that production for consumers to consume? How is that going to fail to be anything but costly to consumers?

We think there has to be a better way of handling the economy. We think interest rates to farmers should be reduced. We have offered in this House and to the minister in committee a number of proposals to increase the use of Farm Credit Corporation loans. We have outlined ways of increasing the amount of money available to the Farm Credit Corporation without having to come to Parliament and without having to increase government allocation. There are many people who are selling farms who would reinvest that money in corporation bonds if there was a tax provision allowing it. We think there are a number of things that can be done.

I see my time is up, Mr. Speaker, but I would again reiterate that high interest rates are killing the people on the farms, small businessmen and home owners, and something should be done about it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being 4.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 58(10), to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the Main Estimates, Supplementary Estimates (A) and (B), and for the passage of all stages of the bill based thereon, subject to the order made Thursday, June 25, 1981.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 1, PARLIAMENT

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That Vote 1, in the amount of $12,692,000 under Parliament for the Senate—Program Expenditures, in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982 (less the amount voted in Interim Supply), be concurred in.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not object to this matter being handled in this way, but I think it should be part of the record that the reason a vote on this item is being singled out is that under Standing Order 58(4)(a), on behalf of our party, I filed a notice of opposition. We intend to vote against this $12 million for the Senate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member has filed a written notice, but at this point I am putting the question to the House. All those in favour please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to an order made Thursday, June 25, 1981, a recorded division on all further proceedings stands adjourned until three o'clock p.m. Tuesday, June 30, 1981.

Shall I call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being five o'clock p.m., the House stands adjourned until Monday next at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 4.47 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CONDEMNATION OF GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to introduce the following motion. Whereas the latest May figures show that inflation in Canada is now at 12.3 per cent, far in excess of that of our major trading partner, the United States, at 9.8 per cent, and higher than any other western country, with the exception of Italy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott):

That this House condemns the Liberal government for its inability to come to grips with inflation and for its callous disregard for the human misery caused by its policy of ever-increasing prices and the destruction of the Canadian people's savings.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

PRICING AGREEMENT NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCE OF ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Each day more orders are being cancelled, more people are being laid off, more rigs are leaving the country, more businesses are going bankrupt and more taxpayers' money is being wasted buying foreign oil at $40 plus per barrel when all of this could have been avoided had Prime Minister Trudeau accepted Premier Lougheed's offer last July. In addition, Alberta would have provided money for the Q & M pipeline, some $2 billion for transportation in the west, along with other national benefits. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Vankoughnet):

That this House urges the Prime Minister even at this late date to accept immediately Premier Lougheed's offer and get this country back on its feet.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

SIGNING OF NORTHLANDS II AGREEMENT WITH MANITOBA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the need for the development of roads, schools and economic opportunities in northeastern Manitoba, and in view of the desire of the government of Manitoba to proceed with the Northlands II agreement, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion sign forthwith the Northlands II agreement between the federal government and the government of the province of Manitoba.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED MEASURES TO AID CHILDREN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Inasmuch as it is now two years since the International Year of the Child and the government has taken no major action on behalf of Canada's children, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the federal government reform the child tax credit to benefit low-income children, beef up the Canada assistance plan to include preventive programs, and introduce a New Horizon type of program for "kids" so that young families will be strengthened and preschoolers in all regions of Canada will have a better start in life.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GARRISON DIVERSION

SENDING OF ALL-PARTY DELEGATION TO WASHINGTON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It concerns the issue of the Garrison diversion project in the State of North Dakota and the fact that the United States Congress may overrule a recent United States court decision which halted construction of the controversial project. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That this House seriously consider sending an all-party delegation to Washington to impress upon the United States Congress the concerns of the people of Manitoba.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INTERNATIONAL WHALING COMMISSION

WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN MEMBERSHIP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the announcement made over the weekend indicating that Canada will be withdrawing from the International Whaling Convention, and because many Canadians feel that Canada, although no longer a whaling nation, can still exercise a role of constraint among convention nations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan):

That this House require the appropriate minister to make a statement on motions explaining the government's cop-out in backing away from a firm decision on the ban on whaling and, in particular, in withdrawing from full membership in the International Whaling Convention, thereby denying itself the role it ought to be playing in the international community and the preservation of endangered species.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

● (1410)

EMPLOYMENT

CONTINUATION OF OUTREACH PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On Friday 25 representatives from 19 Outreach women's employment centres met in Ottawa in an effort to persuade a departmental official to recommend to the Minister of Employment and Immigration that the eight year-old Outreach program should be continued. Once again the minister, who is also the minister responsible for the status of women, refused to meet with these representatives. In light of the significant help women have received through Outreach centres in overcoming obstacles such as day care, housing, transportation, and insensitive husband problems, problems which Manpower centres are not equipped to address, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That this House demand the minister immediately meet with women's Outreach representatives, or if he continues to refuse to take a personal interest, to resign as the minister responsible for the status of women.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

PROPOSED MEETING WITH INDUSTRIAL REPRESENTATIVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the energy service industries of western Canada have suffered an employment drop of some 20 to 30 per cent since the introduction of the Liberal energy policy, in view of the fact that many highly trained individuals are being forced to leave the country, and in view of the fact that most of these companies are 100 per cent Canadian owned and an important part of their local economy in the west, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That this House urge the government to follow the lead of nine Progressive Conservative members of Parliament and arrange to have a group of Liberal members of Parliament travel to Alberta and meet with representatives of the industries to see first hand the damage being inflicted upon them by the Liberal energy program.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RAILWAYS

FUNDING TO UPGRADE SYSTEM IN WESTERN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise to request unanimous consent to move a motion. In view of the fact that Senator Perrault has said the federal government plans to ration western Canadian rail capacity because of congested rail lines, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That the federal government provide funds to upgrade and electrify rail lines in western Canada and that the President of the Privy Council begin issuing large rations of common sense to cabinet colleagues in light of the severe shortage of that faculty in the government.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

MOVEMENT OF "E" DIVISION FROM VICTORIA TO VANCOUVER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The inability of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) to answer in a cogent and complete manner any questions concerning the cost of the move of headquarters "E" Division, RCMP from Victoria to Vancouver, at least up to the present time, has clearly indicated that he authorized the move without the faintest notion of what it would cost in either financial, human or social terms. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House direct the Solicitor General to put this mistaken redeployment on hold until he has completed social and economic impact studies on the whole matter.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE LATE TERRY FOX

TRIBUTES TO A MAGNIFICENT CANADIAN

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it occurs very rarely in the life of a nation that the courageous spirit of one person unites all the people in the celebration of his life, and in the mourning of his death. Such a man was Terry Fox, whose death yesterday at the age of 22 has touched all of us with a sense of personal loss.

Canadians wanted desperately for Terry to live, to win his personal battle against the ravages of cancer. Yet it does not occur to any of us to look upon his death as a defeat or a failure. The reason, of course, is that we do not think of this remarkable young man as a victim, but as a victor. We do not think of him as one who was defeated by misfortune, but as one who inspired us with his example of the triumph of the human spirit over adversity.

When Terry lost a leg to cancer in 1977, he must have been sorely tempted to give up on life, to sink into the depths of self-pity and despair. Who among us could say that, in similar circumstances, we would not have done exactly that? Learning to walk again, after such a soul-searing shock, would have been remarkable enough. But Terry went beyond the merely remarkable, and gave new meaning to the word magnificent.

Terry Fox chose to react most audaciously to his personal misfortune. He chose to set for himself a challenge which even our best athletes would likely consider to be beyond their ability. He decided not to walk but to run, and not only to run but to run across a continent. And he decided to do all that not for his own satisfaction but to bring hope and help to others.

For the magnitude of his courage and of the task he accomplished, we pay him tribute and quite rightly consider him as a hero. For the way he was able to inspire the country, we will be grateful forever to him. Terry did not complete his marathon of hope. He left us a part of it so that we may run it together. Let us get down to that task, while keeping in mind the example of a young man who devoted all his energy to that noble and generous objective—to spare others cancer, or at least to give them a better chance of recovering from it.

• (1415)

[English]

Let us keep fresh in our minds his example of boundless hope and courage. To that end the Government of Canada will establish the Terry Fox Humanitarian Award program, an endowment fund which will finance scholarships for some 250 young Canadians each year.

The program will give help and encouragement, in Terry's name, to young people who are pursuing excellence in their academic studies in the fields of fitness, health and amateur sport, or in fields related to community service. That will be one way of keeping the spirit of Terry Fox alive in our land, one way of remembering a young Canadian who gave far more to his country than his country was able to give to him.

In the midst of mourning, let us also celebrate the inspiring life of one who has touched all our lives and enriched all our lives.

I know, Madam Speaker, that all hon. members would want you to convey to Terry's parents and his family the profound sympathy of the House of Commons. But I also believe we want you to express to them more than our sympathy. We would like you to express as well our profound gratitude for the gift which Terry gave to all of us, the gift of his own boundless courage and hope, the gift of his magnificent and unselfish generosity, the gift of a life which has inspired us all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I want to join the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in expressing both the deepest sympathy and the deepest gratitude of this House and the Canadian people to the family of Terry Fox.

I think some images last forever in our memory. None of us who saw it will ever forget that one young man, running alone against impossible odds; running, because quitting was no part of Terry Fox. He called his run the Marathon of Hope, and it did bring hope to millions of people who have battled cancer or other disease, or who have battled despair. But, Madam Speaker, hope was the result. The cause, the essence of the man we mourn, was courage. He ran alone and proved to all of us who have lesser troubles that one individual, alone with his will, can change our world. He did what Parliaments and philosophers talk about, and he enlarged the lives of everyone who knew his story.

[Translation]

I know that today all Canadians mourn together for the death of Terry Fox, a son of whom Canada can be proud. He led a long and hard fight against death, and his courage will remain a great source of inspiration for all those who have to cope with illness or fear. Terry has done more things during his short life than most of us ever do in many more years.

● (1420)

[English]

Terry Fox was a Canadian hero whom the youngest children could understand. Yesterday morning he lost one battle, but his life was a victory, a victory of hope, of courage, of example. I pray that we in this Parliament and this country may be worthy of the standard of Terry Fox.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I am honoured to have the privilege of associating the members of the New Democratic Party with the tributes which have been given so eloquently by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

We are all deeply conscious of what a hero Terry Fox has become in the life of this country. There seems to be a bit of significance in the fact that this man, though most of what he did was done last year, has in this International Year of the Disabled become such a hero. Indeed, he has shown by his courage and his determination that there are many disabled and afflicted people who are prepared to try to turn disability or affliction into a challenge to the spirit. We believe this young man has done that for all of us.

Death is always hard to take or hard to understand. It is not so difficult when many years have been lived, but when it comes at such a young age it is very hard to take. Even so, as those who spoke before me have said, who could live a more creative, a more successful and a more effective life than Terry Fox has lived in the few years he has been on Canadian soil? We pay our deepest respects to him and to his memory.

There are times when older folk are inclined to wonder whether the younger generation has what it takes to carry on and build a better world. No one in Canada is saying anything like that today. If the generation between the ages of 20 and 30 can produce a Terry Fox, the future of this land is in good hands.

ACTION TO ENSURE ESSENTIAL SERVICES IN EVENT OF STRIKE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board, who will be well aware—as, unhappily, the nation is—that some 23,000 postal clerks and mail handlers are on the verge of a national strike at midnight tonight. The minister knows that when such a situation develops the people who suffer most are Canadians who are in need of government cheques, and Canadians who are in need of the services of the Post Office to keep their businesses functioning.

I wonder if the minister, on this eve of a strike which could be so damaging to the country, could tell the House of Commons what steps the government is taking to ensure that those vital Canadian postal services will be maintained for the Canadian public in the event of a strike?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, as in the past, arrangements have been made, not for postal service per se, but for distribution through the Department of Supply and Services of all socio-economic payments of the kind referred to by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

CONCILIATION BOARD REPORT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, we are in this situation in part because the government, through the Treasury Board, which had invited the union to return to the bargaining table, has now rejected the union's request that the conciliation report be used as a basis for agreement.

Since the government appointed a neutral conciliator to make recommendations and to submit a report, why does the government now refuse to accept that report as a basis for bargaining?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, today the union has refused to return to the bargaining table unless the government agrees in advance to accept those specific areas of the chairman's report which the union wants accepted. I might add, we, on behalf of the government, have accepted a large number of the chairman's recommendations, including those related to wages and COLA. In addition, the union has also indicated it wants to negotiate the other items on the basis of the minority union nominee's report. A combination of these things taken at their maximum would increase costs by approximately 28 per cent over last year's payroll costs.

However, I should advise hon. members that I issued a release at lunchtime indicating we have delivered a full package on our position as a government on all the outstanding issues, and also indicated our willingness to return to the bargaining table and negotiate specifically maternity benefit leave provisions.

GOVERNMENT'S POSITION ON INDIVIDUAL ITEMS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, there seems to be some dispute at least between the publicly stated positions of the union and the government. I, naturally, will not challenge the government's interpretation of the elements in dispute as the minister has just given it, but I wonder if the minister could tell this House which elements, if any, of the conciliation board chairman's report the Government of Canada is not prepared to accept, and why?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, in the hope that the parties will be returning to the negotiating table some time today, and we have an outstanding invitation to that effect, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to deal specifically with these items. I believe hon. members are aware of the report's terms and conditions, items I have discussed in the past, and I really think it would be appropriate to let the parties get to the negotiating table and obtain a fair and just settlement for both sides.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

NEGOTIATIONS TO SETTLE LABOUR DISPUTE—CORPORATION POSITION

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State and it has to do with labour problems in another sector of the public service. Why is it that the CBC is not content to accept the very major concession from the union which gives the corporation, for the first time, unrestricted access to independent television producers to produce programs which would increase the amount of Canadian content? Instead, it is demanding the right to use independent producers to do current programming and to produce parts or segments of programs, and the ability to hire freelancers to do technical work without the necessity of ensuring that CBC's own staff of NABET members are fully employed.

Does the minister not agree that what the CBC is proposing will inevitably lead to duplication of effort and services, forced featherbedding, and inefficient use of manpower, resources, and public funds?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I met with members of NABET's executive on Friday. They had the opportunity of making their point of view known to me, which is exactly along the lines of the question the hon. member has raised. I am meeting with CBC management tomorrow morning to go over those specific items.

TELEVISION COVERAGE OF SUMMIT CONFERENCE

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, does the minister not agree that already the corporation has wasted several millions in relinquishing the coverage of the 1981 Summit conference in Ottawa, rather than negotiating a settlement with its employees? In addition, thousands of northern Canadians who rely on CBC as their sole communications link with current affairs have a right to expect an early restoration of this vital public service after 40 days of footdragging.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, obviously we would like to see the strike settled as soon as possible. That is one of the reasons why the CBC is indeed continuing to negotiate.

As far as the Summit conference is concerned, the CBC offered to host the conference once again. It asked NABET for guarantees that it would be able to do so but they were unwilling to give those guarantees. That is why the CBC has had to relinquish its rights as host broadcaster. Of course on this side of the House, as on the other, we would very much like to see the situation resolved before the Summit, and in any event as soon as possible.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF SIR MALCOLM FRASER, PRIME MINISTER OF AUSTRALIA

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to draw the attention of the members of the House to the presence in our gallery of Sir Malcolm Fraser, Prime Minister of Australia.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST THAT CHIEF GOVERNMENT NEGOTIATOR BE CHANGED IN ATTEMPT TO AVERT STRIKE

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question also relates to the postal situation, and it is for either the Right Hon. Prime Minister or the President of the Treasury Board. I hope my question will not be taken as asked in a provocative sense, but in an effort which we all share to get the dispute settled before midnight tonight.

In view of the fact that the postal workers requested today that the government side of the bargaining be transferred from the President of the Treasury Board to the Postmaster General, due to the fact that the Postmaster General has had success in recent occasions, would the President of the Treasury Board consider stepping aside, or would the Prime Minister consider making that change in the hope that, in the last minute bargaining this afternoon and this evening, a postal strike might be avoided?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member would recognize that in all forms of negotiations, but particularly in the matter of industrial relations, each side should be left free to designate its negotiators. I have designated, as is the custom, the President of the Treasury Board. I feel we cannot find a more expert negotiator on behalf of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: If developments this afternoon indicate that the suggestion of a change should be implemented, I hope it will yet be considered.

ITEMS SELECTED FOR NEGOTIATION

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, may I say to the President of the Treasury Board that we welcome his offer to put maternity pay on the table at any meetings which take place this afternoon. Is it not possible to put one or two other items there, such as 12 statutory holidays per year? What is wrong with that in this day and age?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles: There are now 11; one a month is not out of the way. Another item could be the discontinuance of further installation of television surveillance in the hope that, although postal workers are saying they want the whole package recommended by Mr. Jasmin, if there is a willingness to compromise there might yet be a settlement.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I should like to repeat my comments when I responded to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. As much as I would love to engage in dialogue with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I really believe this is not the appropriate forum. Let us hope the parties get back to the negotiating table this afternoon and I will have good news to report to the House tomorrow.

RELEASE OF INFORMATION ON GOVERNMENT'S FINAL OFFER

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Realizing that disclosure now might hamper negotiations, might I ask the President of the Treasury Board if, in the interests of public awareness, he will release the details of the government's final offer immediately upon the commencement of any strike action?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I believe it important the public be aware of the respective positions of the parties should such an event occur, and I imagine that is what we would do.

RATE OF INFLATION—COMPARISON WITH UNITED STATES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Today it was announced that Canada has the highest rate of inflation of all industrialized countries in the world with the exception of Italy. Our inflation rate today is well above the average for industrialized countries, but of greater concern is the fact that it is about 2.5 percentage points higher than that of the United States, whereas a year ago we were three percentage points below the United States. Thus there has been a deterioration of about 5.5 per cent.

Has the government undertaken any studies of the performance in the United States to see whether we in Canada can learn anything to improve our performance?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member uses the consumer price index to make his comparisons. It is quite obvious, and a study of the consumer price index confirms this, that a short-term analysis based on this index often shows a wide gap between inflation rates in the United States and in Canada. However, if the same figures are applied to a longer period, the gap tends to get narrower. Other measurements might be used and considered by the hon. member. I urge him, for instance, to look at the inflation rate included in the GNE. He will see that for the last four quarters, including the fourth quarter of 1981, the inflation rate in the GNE is 9.6 per cent in Canada and 9.4 per cent in the United States. Of course, the hon. member may reply that you can use whatever figures best prove your case. However, one must take all the figures into account in order to draw logical conclusions.

[English]

CONSIDERATION OF NEW POLICIES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I was using a longer term than the minister. I was talking about a full year's experience where we have seen a very major deterioration. It is not who is playing with the numbers; it is he.

One of the major causes of the deteriorating performance in Canada relative to the United States is the inflationary expectations which are much more prevalent here than in the United States. We see that in the differential in wage negotiations and also in the wide spread between borrowing costs for long-term borrowers in the two countries.

My question is directed either to the minister or the Prime Minister. Is the government considering any new policies to broaden the battle against inflation so that it is not just a monetary or high interest rate policy, but a broader package of policies which would give Canadians the confidence that something is being done up here to fight inflation, similar to the package which was developed in the United States? If a package is not developed here, the credibility of the government will stay where it is now, that is, nil.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I am very glad that the hon. member has stressed in his preamble that inflationary expectations are more prevalent in Canada than in the United States. He is well aware that those inflationary expectations must be checked if both the monetary and the fiscal policy of the government are to be effectively supported. However, I would point out to him that these inflationary expectations are often fed by the comments made by his colleagues when they talk about interest rates or other effects of inflation. I would also like to remind him that, in the October budget, the Minister of Finance undertook to reduce government spending and the government deficit. These commitments support the monetary policy advocated by the Bank of Canada, and if we succeed in putting a stop to these inflationary expectations, these measures combined together will help us reduce in the middle term the inflationary pressures in Canada.

AIRPORTS

HAMILTON CIVIC AIRPORT EXPANSION—COMPENSATION TO PROPERTY OWNERS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Given the fact that the minister's special assistant met with the mayors of Ancaster and Glanbrook in my riding last week on the subject of compensation for property owners adjacent to the expanded Hamilton Civic Airport, and since those people who will be drastically affected appeared before an official expropriation hearing all last week, is the minister now in a position to say what possible compensation will be available to those who could be really badly hurt by this airport expansion?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the answer is none. When the decision was made to expand the airport at Hamilton, it was known that the runway would have to be extended. This has affected a number of houses located nearby, and 16 or 17 houses are now being expropriated. A number of houses—possibly 80—will be affected noisewise. The answer in that regard is that, first, the noise effect will not be substantial and, second, there is no policy for expropriation of houses in the situation where noise has an effect.

REQUEST FOR SPECIAL TREATMENT

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Given the fact that many of these people bought their land before the airport was developed, could the minister not assure my constituents that his department will update the policy to take into consideration the injurious effects on the people? Will the minister judge the Hamilton airport situation on its own merits as a unique situation, and not ask the people to bear the cost of something which benefits the whole region? In short, will he listen to the concerns and the representations made by the people at the expropriation hearing?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have in mind, as I am sure the hon. member does, the very strong representations which were made to me a few months ago before a decision with respect to the extension of the Hamilton airport was made. The hon. member was one of those who pressed me so hard I could barely stand up straight!

This is a policy which has been reviewed a number of times, that is, of no compensation for noise. I repeat that the noise factor in this instance is not of a considerable nature. If the department does not have a policy of compensation for the effects of noise, it is simply because of the consequences of creating a precedent. We would obviously have to revise our position for every airport in Canada. This is a position which we cannot sustain, unfortunately. I regret that.

INTERNATIONAL WHALING COMMISSION

WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN MEMBERSHIP

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Perhaps he will answer; I am not sure.

Over the weekend the government announced that it was withdrawing from the International Whaling Convention. The Prime Minister and I have exchanged correspondence on this matter over the course of the last few months. I simply ask him why?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I quite honestly thought that was the thrust of many of the environmentalists supported by the hon. member, that is, the thrust of their wish.

Mr. Nielsen: Their what?

Mr. Trudeau: The thrust of their wish, their desire, their expectation, their hope.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We had the choice of either staying in the IWC and incurring the blame of environmentalists or of getting out, and now we fail to obtain the support of the hon. member. I think what is crucial to the understanding of this matter is that we are withdrawing as members but we will still be present as observers.

We are not ourselves a whaling nation. We will still be able to express whatever arguments we can to the commission. Simply put, we will not be a full member and, therefore, we will not be part of its decisions, of those nations which continue to be whaling nations and which, if I understand the hon. member's representations correctly, are catching too many whales for the good of the cetacean species.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, since we are in fact dealing with the endangered species of whales, and since those nations which will remain on the commission, if every other nation took the same position which Canada has taken, will be whaling nations, which are the very people who are endangering the species, surely it would make more sense for the Canadian government to continue to sit at the bargaining table, to continue to have a vote and to continue to have an opportunity to influence the outcome, rather than to abdicate responsibility and ultimately destroy the entire species?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I remember using that argument myself, particularly in an exchange I had with the hon. member. But this did not result in the withdrawal of the pressure which he and other environmentalists were placing on us. We were being blamed for the decisions of whaling nations with which we did not agree. I repeat that is why we have given notice that within a year we will withdraw from the commission as a member but will continue to participate as an observer.

REASONS FOR WITHDRAWAL

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Given the fact that Canada's withdrawal from the IWC amounts to a shameful international cop-out, and given the fact that our withdrawal from the IWC will seriously impair our ability to influence the two principal whaling nations, the U.S.S.R. and Japan, and since that will have serious consequences on our own ability to regulate the situation in our own waters where whales are destroying the gear of fishermen on the Atlantic coast, will the minister tell the House why Canada decided to withdraw? Is Canada prepared to reconsider this shameful international cop-out?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, when Canada first entered the International Whaling Convention in 1946 we were a whaling nation. But since commercial whaling was abolished by government order in Canada in 1972 our policy has been under constant review. In the last year we have had an intensive review of this question, and as a result of that we have decided to remain associated with the International Whaling Commission as an observer and in its scientific work, using its scientific conclusions and contributing to them but no longer being a formal voting member of that body. It seems to me this is perfectly consistent with our interest at the present time, which is that of a non-whaling country.

CANADIAN RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, given the fact that only two of the 25 signatories to the IWC have a commercial whaling operation and that if all other member countries were to follow the rationale of Canada there would be no international whaling convention, there would be no conservation, no control, surely Canada has a responsibility not only to preserve these magnificent animals but it also has a responsibility to our own fishermen. Given all of these facts, surely Canada has an obligation to remain a member of the IWC. Will the minister reconsider?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, it seems to me our obligation is not to a convention but to the conservation of the species. We are living up to that obligation. We are continuing to work with the scientific division of the International Whaling Commission. We are continuing to offer them our support. We continue to urge that a larger whaling convention, and a better one, replace the 1946 convention. In all of these areas we are completely and fully involved. That is our obligation, one which we are fulfilling.

STEPS TO PREVENT EXTINCTION OF WHALES

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Now that Canada has not only removed itself for all practical purposes from the International Whaling Commission but has also undermined that major international body by withdrawing in the fashion in which it did, would the minister tell the House, the people of Canada in particular, and conservationists and environmentalists around the world who are concerned about the fate of the whale, what specific steps the government intends to take outside the International Whaling Commission to prevent the extinction of this important mammal?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I was not speaking of steps outside the whaling convention but of steps in accord with the International Whaling Commission and in accord with its scientific mandate and interest. We are continuing our association with that body. As I mentioned before, we are also continuing our interest in a large and better whaling convention which would replace the 1946 convention.

IDENTITY OF ADVISERS

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Surely he would admit that all the initiatives to which he has referred would be much more effective if Canada were a full member of the International Whaling Commission rather than a second-class member on the outside looking in. In view of that fact, would the minister share with Parliament and the people of Canada, upon whose advice did the government act to withdraw from the International Whaling Commission, thereby undermining this important international body? Is it not true that every single major environmental and conservation group in Canada has urged against the action which the government has now taken? How can the government justify such stupidity against expert opinion, both within government and outside it, including expert opinion from its own advisory committee on the subject of whaling?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, as I have said, every year before the meeting of the International Whaling Commission we have a review of all aspects of the whaling problem, and of our continued participation. After last year's meeting we launched an intensive review within the government, and I am sure the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will join with me in assuming the responsibility for persuading cabinet, on the basis of advice from our own officials, to take this step after full consideration. At the same time we reiterated our determination to contribute to the conservation of the species.

TRANSPORTATION

FEDERAL AID TO MUNICIPAL TRANSPORTATION IN MONTREAL REGION

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Last Friday the minister met with his counterpart in Montreal and announced that the Canadian government would be contributing some $80 million to the upgrading of public transit in greater Montreal. Members representing that area, who have been working towards this end for the past ten to 12 years are of course overjoyed by this announcement. My question is as follows: will the provincial government act alone as project manager? What was the provincial share announced at the press conference? Will the federal government have some visibility as far as its share is concerned, since this money was collected from taxpayers all across Canada, or will all the merit, credit and visibility for this project be given only to the province, as is the case in all other cost sharing programs?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, last Friday in Montreal I recognized the contribution of all those, either ministers or ordinary members of Parliament, who had taken part in the development of this project. The federal share of $80 million is made up of three components: $10 million from the CN, $30 million from UTAP, which is a federal program designed to assist the development of urban transportation in the provinces, and $40 million made up of special subsidies.

In view of this substantial contribution, the province and the Montreal Urban Community will now be responsible for developing the project. They will be project managers since they will be responsible for the operations as well as any deficit incurred. I strongly emphasize that the federal contribution is now paid out directly and I think that Montrealers will recognize that it is quite substantial. The federal money will be used strictly to put commuter trains back into operating condition. Any improvement, transformation or updating of equipment will be the responsibility of the Quebec government and of the Montreal Urban Community.

[English]

SITUATION IN TORONTO AND IN NATIONAL CAPITAL

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Now that the minister has made an announcement with respect to Montreal, when does he intend to make an announcement with respect to the promises made in 1974 with respect to Metropolitan Toronto, and the promises that previous governments have also made to deal in an upfront way with transportation commissions within the National Capital of Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am not too sure what my hon. friend refers to. If he refers to Toronto, the Go train was realized, if I remember well, after 1967. At that time, the federal government made a substantial contribution of $10 million which, if my hon. friend wants to index, constitutes quite a lot of money in today's terms.

I would like to ask the hon. member again what he has in mind when he talks about the Ottawa situation. Does he have air transportation in mind? I do not know. Therefore I had better ask him to start over again and restate his question.

Oral Questions

RAILWAYS

FUTURE OF VIA RAIL PASSENGER ROUTES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I would like to stay with the Minister of Transport.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Benjamin: Of course I would like to have my back to the wall and my gun loose in my holster while I am doing that.

A source which has always been very reliable in the past, as far as I am concerned, has informed me that the minister has received representations from departments of government and has proceeded to get cabinet approval for the abandonment of 16 VIA Rail passenger routes and reduction of five other routes, and that he will be making an announcement some time between now and the middle of July, certainly by the end of July, for these abandonments or reductions to take effect before the end of 1981. Can the minister tell me if that source of mine is reasonably accurate? Is he giving consideration to or has he received approval for such an order?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, a few months ago my hon. friend had a piece of paper and he informed Canada of its existence. Therefore, he is aware and knows very well that a study of the VIA economic situation has been going on for a number of months now. He is probably aware, better than anyone here, of some of the success of VIA in recent months, in the recent two or three years; but he is also aware of the extraordinary growth of VIA's operating deficit which was at the level of $300 million last year and will be going up to $550 million in 1983-84, unless something is done about it.

I am quite sure that the hon. member expects the Minister of Transport and the government to do quite a responsible job in trying to save the good aspects of VIA and, at the same time, rationalize it to the greatest possible extent.

ROLE OF CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, the minister said himself that there has been a magnificent increase in passenger handling by VIA Rail. In light of the fact that the Canadian Transport Commission has held hearings relating to 15 of these 21 routes, and recommended that they all be retained, may I first ask the minister whether it is correct that CTC has not been informed of any decision made by cabinet, or which will be made, that CTC will be bypassed, and there will be no public hearings held on any abandonments? In light of the return of the train, in view of the energy crisis, can the minister give any assurance that he will reconsider any decisions to abandon passenger train routes?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am quite sure that when the government makes a decision, if and when it does so, CTC will be properly informed.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

PROLIFERATION AS SUBJECT FOR SUMMIT CONFERENCE AGENDA

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Given the recent bombing of the Iraqi nuclear reactor and the subsequent reactions and comments which have followed it, all of which have served to increase the danger of the manufacture and the use of nuclear bombs, and given that the major supplier countries in the world of nuclear materials and nuclear technology are the very countries which will be meeting here in Ottawa, for the Summit in July, will the Prime Minister indicate to the House if it is his intention to have this threat of greater nuclear proliferation added to the agenda of this Summit in July?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, in at least one or two of our meetings we will be discussing the international political situation, including that in the Middle East. There is no sub-item on the agenda which would cover the area which the hon. lady suggests, but it is quite possible that it will be discussed, as it was in previous Summits which I and, I presume, she attended.

REPROCESSING OF NUCLEAR WASTES

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): The Prime Minister will remember, as I stated in the recent foreign policy debate, that with the bombing of the Iraqi nuclear reactor the world crossed a new threshold in nuclear proliferation. Now we have the fear of nuclear bombing leading to an attack, or to a hostile act by one country against another.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he does not feel, on Canada's behalf, that he should be prepared to put forward proposals by which the reprocessing of nuclear wastes or the enriching of uranium could be added to the agenda of the Summit so that these matters could be dealt with and not be allowed to escalate into greater fears of nuclear proliferation.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As the hon. member knows, these matters have been discussed in a very consistent way by Canada in its bilateral meetings with—the hon. lady says no. I presume she did not discuss them, but we discussed them. I remember discussing them very specifically and urgently in a tour which I made to Germany, Italy and several other countries in 1975. We were then attempting to impress—

Miss MacDonald: Do you not consider it more urgent?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. lady has a supplementary question, Madam Speaker.

URGENCY OF ISSUE

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he does not now consider this issue to be more urgent and pressing, following what has happened in recent weeks with the bombing of the Iraqi nuclear reactor, than it has been in the past.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I cannot say I feel it more urgent, because I have always felt it to be extremely urgent. Indeed, the hon. lady herself will recall that when she was foreign minister, one of the reasons why Canada was not able to sell a nuclear reactor to the Argentine was because we felt more strongly about safeguards than did one of our competitors. It was under her government that this contract was lost. Therefore she must have felt it was urgent then to make the point; otherwise she would not have lost a great contract for Canada.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION DEPARTMENT'S HIRING PRACTICES

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Does the minister's department follow the stated policy of his government on mobility of labour, namely, that geography plays no role in hiring practices?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, it is the purpose of our department to assist workers who are out of work to make choices to move to other areas. Of course we agree with the general commitment of this government, which is clearly enunciated in our charter of rights, that Canadians have the right to choose where they want to work in this country, to do so by right, and thereby overcome many of the false barriers raised by other jurisdictions which prevent workers from going to areas which they consider to be under provincial jurisdiction.

ELIGIBILITY OF JOB APPLICANT RESIDING IN NORVAL, ONT.

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, can the minister then explain why his department will not consider an application of a constituent of mine, a civil servant, who wants to be placed in a competition for an immigration counsellor, because he lives in Norval, which is one hundred yards outside an arbitrary boundary set by those who do the hiring? Will the minister ask that this method of weeding out applications cease immediately?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, it is difficult for me to respond to a specific case not having been given prior information. However, I will be very pleased to receive the information from the hon. member and to look into the case to determine the facts and how we can deal with them.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

SIGNING OF NORTHLANDS II AGREEMENT

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact that the province of Manitoba has been ready to sign the Northlands II agreement and that roads, schools and economic development are desperately needed in northern Manitoba, about which there have been a number of communications with the minister, could he give us an answer as to whether or not he has signed the Northlands II agreement on behalf of the Government of Canada? If not, when does he expect to sign it?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Madam Speaker, I have authorized the expansion of that agreement for a year so that both governments will be able to study further the proper measures that should be continued in the north and also the kind of mechanism that should be used to continue development of the northlands.

REASONS FOR DELAY

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, the minister knows that the year's extension was not in keeping with the general agreement that was to be signed namely, that there was to be a general secondary phase agreement. Why is it just one year rather than the normal general agreement that had been signed earlier? Is it because cabinet has not authorized additional money? If we take a look at some other supplementary agreements, they are not being signed either. Why the delay in this matter?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The delay is certainly not for the reasons outlined by the hon. member, Madam Speaker. It is so that both governments can study what the best avenues are to continue development of the north.

USE OF EQUIPMENT PROVIDED FOR SUMMIT CONFERENCE COVERAGE

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the CBC, and it is supplementary to an earlier one. It relates to the provisions for coverage of the Summit conference.

A very substantial investment has been made in plant and equipment under the original CBC host broadcast proposal. In the arrangements with CTV to act as host broadcaster is it the intent that all of that equipment which CBC built be dismantled and the money spent be paid back to the government as planned, or is it the intent that CTV take over that equipment and use it as host broadcaster? If that is the case, the government will put the NABET CTV technicians in a position that they must not work because they will be in a sympathy strike position.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know that the organization for the Summit is not in the hands of the Minister of Communications. It is in the hands of another department. As far as the CBC is concerned, I believe that it took the only position it could take at this stage, that it would try to see to it that the Summit was covered. The only way to do so was to ask its technicians for a guarantee that they would allow it to proceed if the CBC did proceed with coverage. In the absence of such guarantees I do not believe that the CBC had any other option but to release its hold on the Summit as the host for the conference, and to allow the Summit organizers to retain other people to bring coverage to Canadians and to the world.

ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN CORPORATION AND SUMMIT ORGANIZERS

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I asked the question specifically of the minister responsible for the CBC because it is a labour question within the CBC. Perhaps I can repeat the question because it has not been answered. Is it the minister's understanding that when CBC released its host obligations that it intended the equipment which it has, paid for by the government, be turned over and used by the Summit, or is it not to be used? The minister will know that if the CBC does that, the NABET technicians at CTV will be put in a position whereby they must not work because of the work stoppage existing at the CBC by NABET technicians. It originates because the CBC was granted the deal in a sweetheart way rather than the government understanding that it would be offering these things in the beginning to all broadcasters.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam speaker, I will be pleased to check into the details of the arrangement between the CBC and the organization for the Summit. As the hon. member knows, this government does not interfere in the normal operations of the CBC. The CBC, when it has labour relations problems, is responsible for negotiating those problems, and that is what the CBC is endeavouring to do.

IMMIGRATION

EMPLOYMENT OF FOREIGN DOMESTICS—ELIGIBILITY FOR SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In April the minister received a report which indicated that foreign domestics working in Canada are contributing $2 million a year in the form of payments to unemployment insurance and the Canada Pension Plan, yet domestics are not able to collect benefits from either of these programs. Given that these people are not the most affluent in the country, what steps has the minister taken to correct that iniquitous situation?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the purpose of the report was that it be used as a basis for discussion by a wide variety of groups, including my colleagues and members of provincial governments, to determine how we could revise regulations relating to domestic workers. That report has now been distributed. A number of replies have come in during the past month or two and we are looking at them. I hope that we will be able to bring forward a series of changes and reforms by September of this year.

PROCESSING OF APPLICATIONS MADE BY FOREIGN DOMESTICS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, approvals of applications for domestics are only being registered, I understand, for those domestics who are prepared to live in the home of an employer. Applications of domestics in the country for renewals, or new applications for domestics who want to work in Canada but live outside the employer's home are not being processed. Would the minister explain the reasons for that kind of a decision?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, that has been the state of affairs for several years now. As I said, I am looking at that particular issue in the report as to what are the requirements. There is no specific requirement to stay within the home itself, that is the basis for the application to come into the country. I indicated about a month or so ago that if a domestic runs into problems with an employer and wants assistance to go to another place of employment, the individual should contact the local office of the employment commission and we will provide advice and assistance in making that move.

GARRISON DIVERSION

SENDING OF ALL-PARTY DELEGATION TO WASHINGTON—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of External Affairs but since he appears to have left the House I will direct it either to the acting minister or to the Prime Minister, if I can get his attention.

It has to do with the question of the Garrison diversion project in North Dakota. The United States Congress may be very near the process of overturning a recent court judgment on the Garrison question. If that is done it would allow further construction to take place. Is the government prepared to allow an all-party committee of the House of Commons, made up of a member from each party together with a member of the provincial legislature of Manitoba, to appear in Washington before the various committees dealing with this issue so that the concerns of the province of Manitoba may be carried directly to the politicians who are making the decision at that particular level in Congress?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Acting Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, if I might answer as the Acting Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, on the occasion of the meeting with the President of the United States the matter was raised, as well as with the external affairs minister. They have received assurances from the new American administration that there will be no action taken on the Garrison diversion that will in any way endanger Canadian waters. That seems to be a very firm assurance. Therefore it would not require the kind of representation the hon. member is suggesting.

LOBBYING OF UNITED STATES CONGRESS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, that is exactly the same line being given to almost every representation made to Washington by any Canadian official. Frankly, people from the province of Manitoba, certainly members of Parliament, are getting sick and tired of that kind of official line. It is not working. Obviously construction does, from time to time, take place. I will repeat the essence of my question. Is the government prepared to allow a committee to go to Washington to lobby directly with the Congress of the United States on this very matter? That seems to be the only thing that would work. If we do not do that, the Garrison diversion may become a fait accompli.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Acting Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I again suggest to the hon. member that he is raising false expectations. Very firm assurances have been given. I met personally with representatives of different groups in Manitoba which deal with or are concerned about the matters of Garrison. Their fears and anxieties are not nearly as severe as those of the hon. member. They realize that a very firm commitment has been given. There has been no action taken whatsoever to extend the present project. We must deal through official channels until proven wrong. In this case, the good faith is being lived up to.

Committee Reports

AIR TRANSPORT

MEASURES TO PREVENT WORK SLOWDOWNS BY AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the United States air traffic controllers union will appeal a federal district judges' decision upholding a 1970 injunction against a work slowdown, and in view of the fact a work slowdown at airports creates utter chaos in passenger services, will the minister ensure that no work slowdowns of air traffic controllers will take place in Canada and, if necessary, make such work slowdowns illegal?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the air controllers in Canada are still under an injunction. Therefore, should they proceed to do anything which is not according to contract, the injunction would apply. I want to emphasize that we are, nevertheless, trying to get a good working relationship with the air controllers. Bill C-65, the superannuation for air controllers bill which was passed last Thursday, is a good indication of the willingness of this House and the Canadian government to deal with them in a fair fashion.

MR. CLARKE—LANDING FEES AT VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by 630 Canadians resident in British Columbia. It is a petition that was circulated by the Canadian Owners and Pilots Association concerning the landing fees at Vancouver International Airport and other major airports which have been tripled from $1.65 to $5 each. This is particularly important because no alternative landing site to Vancouver International Airport has been provided, as has been done at some other airports. The petition asks for a delay in the imposition of the new fees pending a complete review.

CANADIANS HOLDING TOP POSITIONS AT UNITED NATIONS AND ITS AGENCIES

Question No. 2,521—Mr. Fretz:

How many Canadians hold top positions in the United Nations and in its agencies such as UNICEF, HABITAT, the World Bank, etc. and, in each case (a) what is his/her name and position (b) is he/she seconded, on sabbatical or a permanent employee (c) which department or non-governmental organization (NGO) does he/she represent?

Return tabled.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I was wondering whether the parliamentary secretary could indicate why we have not received a reply to questions Nos. 1,774 and 1,775 which were put on the Order Paper last November 20?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I cannot give any specific reason at this point in time, but I will look into the matter for the hon. member.

Mr. Stevens: Again, Madam Speaker, I would ask the parliamentary secretary whether he can indicate why question No. 2,042, which was put on the Order Paper January 29, five months ago, has not been answered? It deals with the Prime Minister's December-January world tour and the expenses therefor.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I have to give the same answer.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether he can give any indication when questions Nos. 1,548 and 1,557, placed on the Order Paper on October 6 and October 7, will be answered? The first relates to airport improvements at the Victoria International Airport, and the other relates to the exempt staff of the leader of the government in the Senate. Both are very simple questions I would have thought, particularly since the airport improvements are, I understand, almost terminated, and I am sure the exempt staff should be well known since the cheques are being issued.

Mr. Collenette: I will look into that too, Madam Speaker.

HOLIDAYS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications) moved that Bill C-37, to amend the Holidays Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

He said: Madam Speaker, before I begin my speech I would like to echo the remarks expressed in the House earlier this afternoon by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the House leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Knowles), and extend my condolences to the family of Terry Fox.

[English]

I think we all know that Terry Fox's bravery and stamina have made an indelible impression on this country, and particularly on the youth of this nation. His deed and his name will live to inspire young Canadians. His courage knew no barriers and exceeded all bounds. I am honoured to have the opportunity on Friday to announce the opening of the Canada Youth Centre in Ottawa which will bear the name of Terry Fox. I can think of no name more appropriate for a Canadian youth centre than the name of a young Canadian who has shown so much courage and so much commitment to his country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I would now like to bring to the attention of all members of the House the importance of Bill C-37, to amend the Holidays Act. The bill, as we all know, received first reading on June 19, 1980, just a little more than a year ago today.

As hon. members of the House know, many attempts have been made over the years to change formally the name of that special national day on our calendar when we as Canadians proudly celebrate the founding of our nation.

I do not want to give a detailed legislative history concerning the subject, but I would like to point out that since 1966 some 22 private members' bills have been introduced concerning the name of our July 1 holiday. This underlines the continuing interest shown by numerous members of Parliament and governments over the years in changing the name of our national anniversary to reflect more accurately our true sense of national identity.

An act of Parliament in 1879, 12 years after confederation, first established July 1 as a legal holiday under the name of "Dominion Day". The word "dominion" was the term which had been adopted at the time of confederation, some say at the suggestion of Sir Leonard Tilley, to refer to the union of the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick into one political entity. The term, as we all know, was taken from Psalm 72:8 "He shall have dominion from sea to sea". In fact, the choosing of that psalm in 1867 showed a degree of optimism. It was to take many more years, the building of a great railway and the influx of thousands of new citizens from other lands before Canada could truly reach a mari usque ad mare.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the word "dominion" has always created problems for us and they are rather well known. According to Grolier's Encyclopedia Canadiana, and I quote:

> One of the difficulties it creates is that it has no satisfactory equivalent in French.

They indicate that over the past ten or twenty years people have had a tendency to avoid using it, opting instead for adjectives such as "federal" or "national".

Professor W. L. Morton shares that point of view. He states that "Dominion of Canada" is an historic expansion which does not mean much in English and even less in French when it is translated by "Puissance du Canada". According to Professor Morton, and I quote his translated opinion:

> Failure to define precisely—and with the required solemnity—what was in gestation, namely a new country in the British Empire, was at the source of much confusion in the minds of Canadians.

The word "dominion" was used for the first time in 1867 to designate Canada. Before that it had been used for Virginia, then a British colony, which was described as a former dominion. After the birth of confederation, the British were to use it to designate New Zealand in 1907. And in the Statute of Westminster of 1931, that word applied all at once to Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland. The word "dominion", which seemed appropriate at the time of confederation, has certainly lost some relevance with the passage of time. Canada has changed drastically over the past 114 years. The same thing goes for the way Canadians look upon themselves.

[English]

Little more than a century ago, Canada had just begun to take its first faltering steps as a sovereign nation. Canada's national identity was only beginning to emerge. Our evolution has been from a colonial entity, part of a great and far-reaching empire, to a mature nation, a mature nation assuming an important place within the family of nations. We have, indeed, come a long way from what Sir John A. Macdonald referred to as "a subordinate kingdom in the empire". Even that great empire from which we grew has itself evolved. Today that empire has become a Commonwealth of Nations, each equal in status.

This evolution, with respect both to Commonwealth members and to Canada in particular, has been a natural and progressive process. Moreover, a necessary part of this process has involved the reappraisal of the various symbols of our nationhood in order to ensure that such symbols properly reflect our attitudes and collective sense of identity as a sovereign and mature people.

Since the end of World War II Canada has steadily moved away from the word "dominion". This has not been motivated, as some may suggest, by a rejection of our heritage. Rather, it has been a manifestation of our need for a more modern and, perhaps more accurate description of our national self. Today Canadians see themselves not as citizens of a dominion—with its suggestion of control, dominance and colonialism—but as citizens of a proud and independent nation, Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: Consequently, it is time, after 114 years of nationhood, to adopt for ourselves a truly Canadian day on which to celebrate, together, the anniversary of our nation's birth.

The name for this day must surely reflect the true nature of our collective identity. It must reflect the self-image which, I am sure all hon. members will agree, is already deeply and securely entrenched in the consciousness of today's Canadians. It must reflect, in a formal way, the consensus which exists across this land, reaffirming who we are and what we have become.

The annual observance of Canada's national day is a relatively recent phenomenon. Between 1868 and 1958 our national day was celebrated on precisely three occasions—once in 1868, again in 1917 marking the fiftieth anniversary of confederation and again in 1927 on the occasion of the sixtieth anniversary, or diamond jubilee, of confederation.

[Translation]

Since 1958, Canada's national holiday has always been celebrated on Parliament Hill, except in 1976, when there were no great festivities to mark that day, even though there was a citizenship award ceremony. So we can say that since 1958, we have always celebrated our national holiday.

[English]

It has now become customary throughout Canada to talk of July 1 as "Canada Day". Indeed, the words "Canada Day" are used by literally millions of Canadians in all parts of the country in referring to our national day.

I think it would be fair to suggest that the word "dominion" means very little to present generations of Canadians to whom colonial days are past history. This is not a reflection on the words "Dominion Day" or on that honourable and historical title, "Dominion of Canada". The phrase "Dominion of Canada" has been a proud and worthy appellation but, as the Montreal Gazette said in an editorial on March 10 of this year, and I quote:

> The word "dominion" does have a secure and honoured place in Canada's history. But not all historical labels remain accurate; this one certainly has not.
> At the time of confederation the word "dominion" was hit upon as a new coinage to describe a country which was not, in fact, a sovereign state (as Canada was not in 1867).
> But for the past 50 years Canada has been, in all but a narrow constitutional technicality . . . a truly independent nation. It should not retain a label which was coined to describe a colonial link.
> Furthermore, "dominion" is not nearly as felicitous a word in French as in English. For French-speaking Canadians it is a verbal oddity which serves mainly to inflame old colonial wounds.
> It is time to retire "Dominion Day" gracefully in favour of a name of July 1 which surely no one can find objectionable, Canada Day.

Surely it is time to call our national day by the name by which this country is recognized at home and abroad—Canada. Such recognition is in keeping with the growing sense of national consciousness shared by all Canadians.

Once again the Parliament of Canada is called upon to act on behalf of all citizens of this nation to change the official designation of Canada's most important national holiday. Will this call to action be answered, as in the past, by indecision? Will 1981 be added to the long list of dates whereon recognition of our national identity was once again proposed and once again denied? In proposing that the Holidays Act be amended to change "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day", Parliament is asked for no more than formalization of the consensus on this matter which already exists among the vast majority of the people of Canada.

Undoubtedly there will be some Canadians who will question or will even oppose such a change. It was not that long ago that similar concerns were voiced when proposals were brought forward to give Canada its own truly Canadian flag. Yet in the relatively brief period since its adoption by Parliament in 1964 our flag has become a proud and universally cherished symbol of our national identity.

On July 1, 1980 we proclaimed "O Canada" as our national anthem. Hon. members will agree with me that the adoption of national symbols is part of our growth process as a nation. The year 1981 could be the year we decide to make more relevant that one day of the year on which we celebrate the anniversary of Canada's birth.

This bill is representative of the pride we have in this great country called Canada. It is symbolic of the hope we have for the future of the Canadian people, the future which will be built by Canadians for Canada. It is fitting, therefore, that the special day on our national calendar when we Canadians proudly celebrate not only the founding and past of our nation but also the strength of its future should be called "Canada Day".

Undoubtedly there will be some hon. members who will speak in opposition to this bill.

Mr. Neil: You bet.

Mr. Gamble: You can count on that.

Mr. Fox: Hon. members opposite say, "You bet". Their party has spoken of constitutional change and wants constitutional change to take place in Canada by consensus, but the refusal of some hon. members to make even the most minute change, such as changing the words "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day", is a clear indication of the attitude of some hon. members opposite which would see any kind of evolution in this country paralysed. I know that is not the general attitude of hon. members opposite, but it surely is the attitude of some.

I call upon all hon. members of this House to act, hopefully by giving approval to the proposal that henceforth July 1 be known and celebrated with pride by all Canadians as "Canada Day".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of attention to the fitting and appropriate opening of the speech of the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) a few moments ago when he referred to Mr. Terry Fox, but I express a sense of true sorrow that in the latter part of his speech he departed from that magnificent view he has of a person who was a magnificent Canadian and sullied that view by an attempt—I think in the wrong way—to raise a sense of partisanship about an issue which is important to the country.

At the outset let me say that I associate myself completely with the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the words today of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the words of my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), about the importance to our country of the contribution which has been made by Mr. Fox to that sense of togetherness as a nation for which we all continue to strive. I applaud wholeheartedly and without reservation the steps the government has taken to establish in the name of Mr. Terry Fox a youth centre here in the national capital. I join with every Canadian in recognizing the appropriateness of Mr. Fox being named a member of the Order of Canada.

When the news of his death came on Sunday morning, it occurred to me that there was a sense of grief shared in this country in the same way and to the same degree that there was a sense of joy at his undertaking and the great success of his undertaking. It was grief over his being removed from this earth when he had made a contribution larger than anyone could make after a full life. Canada's birthday on July 1 will be dulled somewhat by the fact he will not be here to celebrate it with us.

That brings something else to mind. He has demonstrated, I think in a very humane, direct and understandable way, the importance of the concept that this country is greater than the sum of its parts, and that there is a depth of humanity, courage and determination in ordinary Canadians that surprises us all from time to time. As Canadians we have a great duty to treat everything, including national symbols and their creation, with respect. I hope that will be the spirit of this debate as we talk about an important symbol, a name for a day.

I do not agree with Professor Morton who, in effect, said Dominion Day is only an historical term, with emphasis on "only". To many Canadians it is much more than that. I do not agree with those who say that the 22 private members' bills over the years, given the way they are dealt with in this House, is a way for us to consider and determine absolutely, without reservation, that the time has come to act. I intend to speak about that a little later.

However, the government has brought in a bill, the first time since I have been here that this matter has been dealt with as a government bill, and I intend to deal with it that way. The bill before us prescribes a change in the name of our national holiday which the government and many Canadians would like to see. Equally so, it is a change many Canadians do not want to see. This difference of views is one which the Parliament not only should but has a duty to consider carefully. We are not debating a law in the ordinary sense of defining a code of justice or a standard of behaviour; we are judging the patriotic response Canadians give to the long standing and legal name of our national holiday, Dominion Day, as contrasted with the proposed name Canada Day.

I believe that before we make this change the government must satisfy the House that the overwhelming majority of Canadians will respond enthusiastically. They must show there will not be millions of Canadians who will feel they were irrationally robbed of the benefits of an imaginative compromise reached by the Fathers of Confederation in 1867. It will not be enough to say that we are simply confirming current usage.

We all know the promotion of the change is government policy, and the name-in-waiting has been vigorously pushed through government usage and ad campaigns. Dominion Day is never mentioned. All around us the government's propaganda machine talks of Canada's day and sometimes, very daringly, of Canada Day.

We might ask: Why bother about the bill at all? The government has abandoned Dominion Day without legislation. Perhaps the legal change will save money by eliminating the need for a yearly advertising campaign. It is really right that the name Canada Day, reasonable as it may seem as a name for Canada's day, should be imposed by the government and its advertising? Must the answer to that question inevitably be yes? If it is to win the hearts and minds of Canadians, should it not emerge from Canadians themselves? Is it really proper to adopt the name by executive decision in majority vote without consulting Canadians themselves? Is it proper to drum it into the Canadian people as an accomplished fact by lavish advertising, and then introduce a bill on the pretence that everyone seems to want it anyway? Symbols of nationalism should emerge from the people. We should be sure that Canadians want this change before we impose it on them. Is it unreasonable to be sure before we act, Mr. Speaker?

According to the government the change is desirable for three reasons. First, Canadians use Canada Day all the time anyway. I suggest that even if Canadians feel uncomfortable with Dominion Day, it is reasonable to ask if a spontaneous cry has gone up for Canada Day across the nation. It is reasonable to suspect instead that it is part of a government inspired larger pattern over the past 15 years of putting "Canada" in front of, behind and on top of every agency, body, function or activity of government in this country.

An hon. Member: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Second, we are told it is perfectly natural to name the national holiday after the nation. Well, it may be natural but, oddly enough, it is not common around the world. I did a survey among Commonwealth nations. I have to tell my friends that Australia has called their holiday Australia Day since 1901. Apparently they have no hang-ups over that; it is their tradition.

However, New Zealand called their day Waitangi Day, or New Zealand Day synonymously. Quite a controversy surrounding the day has arisen in New Zealand because it commemorates the ceding of Maori lands to the British on February 6, 1840. The native people are very sensitive to the symbolism and the land issue there. When they tried to change it to New Zealand Day there was a great deal of protest. The preference of the majority is for Waitangi Day.

India has two national holidays. They call one Independence Day, August 14; and Republic Day on January 26, commemorating their constitution. In Nigeria, October 4 is National Day and it has never been called anything else. If you go to Great Britain, it is not called England Day, English Day or even United Kingdom Day. It is called St. George's Day. That happens to be a holiday when they do not close the shops or anything like that but they celebrate the great tradition of St. George. There is another day there called the Queen's birthday. It is not a holiday but it is celebrated on the closest Saturday to the Trooping of the Colour ceremony. So, Mr. Speaker, if the Secretary of State's argument is that it is traditional, I have to say with respect that he is wrong.

Then thirdly, Mr. Speaker, we are told that "dominion" conjures up the wrong spirit among Canadians, that there is something wrong with the word. There maybe something in that, and I will return to it in a moment. There are some good arguments for calling July 1 Canada Day. Whether or not the demand for the change is spontaneous, which I doubt, it is not inevitable that a country's holiday should bear the name of the country.

I have mentioned St. George's Day and the Queen's birthday. In France it is Bastille Day; in the United States it is Independence Day. There is a reason for those names. Each of those names in those countries evokes a moment of glory or a decision from the nation's past. It is a reason for a celebration.

To say U.S. Day, England Day or France Day, would tell us nothing except that people are more likely to be at the beach than at home. Should we not consider whether Canada Day, instead of being inevitable and obvious, is perhaps somewhat sterile, neutral and dull?

An hon. Member: And plastic.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Perhaps plastic. I wonder whether we have not finally satisfied the national mania for playing cute name games with the name of our country and threatening to kill our reverence for it by overuse. Things used to be described as they were. Now we sacrifice description in favour of making the obvious point that this is Canada. Obviously this is Canada.

We are no longer content to refer to the Department of Transport, the Bureau of Statistics or Dominion Day. It must be Transport Canada, Statistics Canada and Canada Day. I suspect somebody will bring in a proposal which will shock the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; they will call this place "Commons Canada". The hon. member for Mount Royal will be very fortunate if he does not become "Canada Prime". Perhaps the Secretary of State will become "Canada Sect State". I am glad he smiles. Let us seriously think for a moment whether we have not had enough of this cloying, homogenizing cuteness. Let us assume this year that we are Canadians and start describing things as they are.

It may be that the term "Dominion Day" leaves many Canadians unmoved or puzzled. We all know its origins in the Seventy-Second Psalm, as the Secretary of State said, and of Sir Leonard Tilley's imagination in choosing it as a replacement for the unacceptable word "kingdom", as part of a compromise at the beginning of the country in 1867. If we look at the meanings of "dominion" in the Oxford English Dictionary, we can see the problem. There are six different definitions, including one referring to its incorporation in key statutes here in Canada.

Mr. Evans: Read them.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I will. The first one is:

> The power or right of governing and controlling; sovereign authority; lordship, sovereignty; rule, sway; control, influence.

This is the word "dominion" about which I am talking.

Mr. Fox: What is it in French?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There is here a sense of someone controlling something. Since we do not wish to celebrate being controlled, obviously this definition is not the relevant one. The second one is:

> The lands or dominions of the feudal lord.

This is unsuitable unless we accept the Prime Minister as a feudal lord. Perhaps some hon. members opposite accept him as a feudal lord.

Mr. Epp: A funeral lord.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Some would wish that he would be accepted as a funeral lord. The other part of that definition reads:

> The territory owned by or subject to a king or ruler, or under a particular government or control.

This is obviously our sense of the word as Canadians. In fact the Canadian usage is the prime modern example given by the Oxford Dictionary for this meaning. This is how we use it, as Oxford defines it. The other meanings listed are: "ownership, property; right of possession" and "domination". I think they are also unsuitable.

Reading the usage of the word in the Oxford English Dictionary drives home a number of points. First, the word is no longer in common usage in most of its meanings. Second, most of the meanings refer to domination rather than freedom. Third, for its usage in the Canadian sense, Canada itself is listed as the example. It would not be surprising if many Canadians were unsure of the appropriation of the word as a description of a free and independent nation of the twentieth century. It ought not to surprise any of us.

Does it follow that our use of an unusual word should be ended? When Sir Leonard Tilley chose that word, he did what most of us do every day as politicians. He racked his brains and pulled out a word which allowed the Fathers of Confederation to reach a compromise. Perhaps it was the final compromise of three years of colonial diplomacy leading to confederation. It was a compromise which has not lost all of its validity, even if the word is more out of the ordinary now than it was then. It nicely describes our government as one grounded in the traditions of constitutional monarchy but separate and free. It recalls the Christian-Judean tradition which underlies the faith of our ancestors and much that is worth preserving in our present culture. Not least, its usage is identifiably Canadian. As a description of the legal and emotional basis of Canada, the word "dominion" has had meaning for Canadians for over a century.

The government would like us to believe that this is a simple housekeeping issue. Well, it is not. Hon. members opposite would have us believe that the name "Dominion Day" has no merit at all and that "Canada Day" is the natural replacement. I have tried to show why I believe the issue is not quite that simple. I wish it was, but it is not. Dominion Day may be confusing or outdated to some Canadians.

Mr. Evans: Obsolete.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Or obsolete to some Canadians, as my hon. friend says. But whether or not hon. members opposite like it, it is rooted in the history and traditions of Canada. Canada Day may appear patriotic and inevitable, but it does not tell us what it is about our country or its history that we are celebrating on that day. We are not celebrating the name; we are celebrating something much more profound. We are celebrating a concept.

A former member of the other place, Senator Eugene Forsey, said it best in a speech to the Men's and Women's Canadian Clubs of Edmonton on June 19, 1956. I think these comments are worth while for every Canadian to remember when they are talking about the concept of what is embodied in Dominion Day or Canada Day, indeed in the country. The question put was: What do we celebrate? He answered it this way:

> Dominion Day celebrates one of the greatest feats of modern history: the making of a new nation, and a new kind of nation, by a handful of people of differing origins, differing languages, differing creeds, differing histories and differing interests, and in the face of obstacles that might well have daunted the boldest and most resolute statesmen. Everything was against them. The country was huge; most of it was empty; the Americans were pressing in upon the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company, threatening to cut off the new Dominion from any expansion West or North. There was hardly any industry: manufactured goods came overwhelmingly from Britain, and to central Canada for five months of the year through American ports, so that at any moment the Americans could strangle the economic life of Ontario and Quebec.
> Central Canada and the Maritimes knew little of each other, and many Maritimers feared "Upper Canadian" domination. Communications were poor: there was no railway from the Maritimes to central Canada, and, what was worse, the main central Canadian railway, the Grand Trunk, came in from the United States and went out into the United States. If the Fathers of Confederation had followed their economic interests, there would have been no Confederation. They would not have gone to Charlottetown, and from Charlottetown to Quebec. They would have gone to Washington, and asked to be let into the American Union.

Then something happened which he describes as "A Supreme Act of Faith". He said:

> Confederation was a supreme act of faith, faith that defied geography, defied economics, defied the "manifest destiny" of the Americans to rule the whole continent from the Rio Grande to the North Pole.
> Faith in what? In something beyond economics, beyond the material; faith that the British North American colonies had a heritage worth preserving, worth developing, worth paying an economic price for; faith that on this rock our people could build a great nation, part of a great Commonwealth.
> We sometimes forget two of the basic things that mark Canada off from every other country in the Americas. First, she is the only American nation which has deliberately chosen not to break with its past, both French and British. The most important thing for Canadians about the American Revolution is that we refused to have anything to do with it. We deliberately chose to keep our roots and draw nourishment from them. Confederation reaffirmed that choice.

I believe in the spirit of those words. We owe it to the Canadians whom we represent to proceed thoughtfully. There is no need for sudden deadlines. Canada will be around, we all pray, for a long time.

This is not the first time the symbols of Canadian identity have been debated in this House. Perhaps we can learn a bit from the past debate. Even those of us who were not here at the time remember the anger and the acrimony of the flag debate. It all started reasonably sanely, with a committee examining several possibilities. At one time a flag was emerging. It had two blue bars and a red maple leaf. However, the emerging consensus was lost.

A second committee recommended the present flag and it was imposed by the government. It is not worth arguing as to whether our present flag is completely entrenched in our consciousness, but it is clear that in its early history a great deal of hostility had to be overcome, not just from those who preferred to salute the old flag, but from those who wanted the first new flag. Canadians have come to accept the maple leaf but not without a large commitment of funds for free flags, pins and advertising.

We have just finished almost all of the Constitution debate. Again a package has been imposed. Again many feel our best constitutional and legal traditions have been needlessly violated. Once again the public is being bombarded with advertising, to persuade it not only to embrace, but to demand, the new order. Even if the Supreme Court finds the package barely legal, lawyers will be fighting over the constitutional provisions for a generation.

Now Dominion Day is to become Canada Day, not by emergence or consensus, but by contentious legislation backed by clever advertising.

Next year, July 1, 1982, we could see the most absurd evidence of this wrongheaded approach to forging a national identity. On Canada Day, a name approved by this House over the objections of millions of Canadians, our national flag, created by this House over the objections of millions of Canadians, will be raised to salute our new Constitution—perhaps certified as barely legal after being guillotined through Parliament.

Is this creative nation-building? Is this the stuff of pride, partiotism and inspiration? Or is it the stuff of cynicism, manipulation and force?

Mr. Evans: It is the stuff of Parliament.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The hon. member opposite interrupts, but I will ignore him as usual. One paradox which may even strike the hon. member opposite if he is alert is that at next year's celebration the crowds will be singing our national anthem in two entirely different languages, with the English-language singers struggling to remember changes made in the wording of a song accepted in its old version for 50 years, and the other language group singing the version used for generations. But no one will be bitter; no one will feel frustrated and ignored.

Why? Because when we confirmed "O Canada" as our national anthem on June 27 last year and made some wording changes, we concluded a process which has been open and deliberate, a process which had been going on for a great many years involving this institution, and I think rightly so. That is why that bill passed last year in the way in which it did. That is why we had that marvellous ceremony on the Hill last July 1—because the evolutionary approach to national symbols had been utilized by the government. I pray it uses it with respect to all symbols.

We drew explicitly on the unanimous recommendations of a committee which reported on February 16, 1968, only three years after the destructive and acrimonious flag debate. Canadians had been heard. They agreed with the changes. There was little dissent and there is no bitterness. Every one of us who was here on that Friday afternoon rose and sang together, each in his own way, in his own language, but with the same feeling, the national anthem which had been proclaimed on that day. That is the model of co-operation we should look to. Our symbols of common nationhood should not be conceived in controversy and preserved to remind us of our quarrels. They should emerge from the spontaneous sentiment of Canadians and remind us of our common triumphs as a peaceful and productive people.

I suggest that this bill should not be passed—not right away, at least. We should send the subject matter to a committee, listen with respect to the views of Canadians, and then debate a new bill based on our conclusions. We may, after consideration, decide that we want "Canada Day". We may see the link to our history in "Dominion Day". We could opt for "Confederation Day" or "Dominion of Canada Day" or any other name evocative of a proud moment in our history.

I think it is important that we do this, and do it in the right way, having regard to the best traditions which we have established in this Parliament, the culmination of which took place prior to July 1, 1980.

I feel so strongly about the evolutionary approach to the development of national symbols that I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and by substituting the following therefor:

"Bill C-37 an act to amend the Holidays Act, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture."

It is important that we begin this process and carry this process the right way. I think this suggestion that I have made will satisfy most that the Parliament of Canada will not act precipitously, but, rather, will gather unto itself the views of Canadians so that we can have, at some day in the reasonably near future, the same kind of celebration and the same kind of proclamation with respect to the name which we would apply to July 1 in each year as we now use with respect to the National Anthem. This is the course of wisdom. I grant you, Mr. Speaker, it is not the course of speed, but it is the course of wisdom.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words today in support of changing Dominion Day to Canada Day. I do so by reflecting back a number of years ago and thinking of the words which were said in this House by the Conservative House leader, that we need an evolutionary approach toward changing national symbols. I happen to agree fully with the leader of the House for the Conservative party that we need an evolutionary approach. We need a national consensus. We need input from Canadians. We have to democratize this institution and other institutions of Canada so that ordinary people will have their voices heard.

I was speaking earlier this morning about that issue through the House leader of my party, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He reminded me that in the year I was born 1946, or perhaps 1947—

An hon. Member: You are not sure when you were born?

Mr. Nystrom: —an hon. member of this House, a Mr. Côté from the riding of Matapédia-Matane, introduced a private member's bill to the House of Commons requesting that we change Dominion Day to Canada Day. Does Your Honour know what happened with the private member's bill some 35 years ago? It was passed by the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles: All three readings.

Mr. Nystrom: All readings in the House were passed by the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles: All in one day!

Mr. Nystrom: As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says, they were passed all in one day. Not only was the bill passed, with a few members perhaps objecting verbally as it went through, but it was passed unanimously, with all members of the Conservative party, the Liberal party, the CCF party in those days, the Social Credit party, supporting unanimously the private member's resolution to change the name of Dominion Day to Canada Day.

Does Your Honour know what then happened? The democratic process ended in the Senate and the Senate said "no" to changing the name of our day from Dominion Day to Canada Day.

An hon. Member: Let us put Walter Baker in the Senate.

Mr. Nystrom: We had democracy thwarted in the Senate of Canada some 35 years ago.

I fully endorse the evolutionary approach to national symbols enunciated by the Tory opposition leader today. However, I think we have had that process. We went through all stages, except for the archaic Senate, in 1946 or 1947. I think that ever since then the overwhelming majority of Canadians I have met anywhere in the country have said to me, "Why do we not come into the modern era and change the name of our national day to Canada Day?" On behalf of our party, I want to plead strongly that cause with my friends in the Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I also want to say that I recognize that some people, a very distinct minority of people in this country, now feel very strongly about Dominion Day, because Dominion Day for many people in this country symbolizes a link to the British past and to the British Commonwealth. I can say, as half of my family background came from England back in the early part of this century, that for many people that link is very important. I think a link has to continue with Britain and with the British Commonwealth. However, I believe we can do that in many other ways. I believe that changing the name of the day would not sever that relationship which is so important to many Canadians. I think that what it would do instead would be to allow Canadians of British ancestry to feel proud of Canada, along with people of French Canadian ancestry and people who come from other countries of the world which have no historic ties with either Britain or France. I believe it is very important that all of us unite around this symbol, and this symbol is Canada Day.

I listened with interest as well to the House leader of the Conservative party when the spoke about "Why Canada Day?" In France, it is "Bastille Day", and not "France Day"; in Britain, it is "St. George's Day", and so on. I found his argument very interesting, except that I have searched my mind for an alternative but I do not really see any alternative. I fear that perhaps someone might want to call it "Constitution Day" at some time.

An hon. Member: "Trudeau Day".

Mr. Nystrom: "Confederation Day" was mentioned. One Liberal across the way mentioned "Trudeau Day". However, I think of all those alternatives. The only one in which there is a broad consensus across Canada is calling it Canada Day to symbolize the country from coast to coast.

Much has been said about the contribution which was made to this country by Terry Fox, his courage and vision. This was referred to as well both by the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) and the opposition House leader. I want to associate ourselves with that courage and vision which Terry Fox showed Canadians. I think he showed us a number of things; but one thing he showed us in his Marathon of Hope, the run from Newfoundland to British Columbia which, of course, he had to abandon about two-thirds of the way across the country, is that Canada is bound together by some pretty strong threads, and that we are all Canadians. Even though we are diverse and we have our disagreements, we are still all Canadians. I think that in honour of people like Terry Fox, the rest of us should stop arguing and bickering once we reach a major consensus, and at least agree very quickly on the bill which is before the House today.

The other thing I wanted to say, in conclusion, is that symbols are very important. The national flag of this country is very important and the National Anthem of Canada is very important. I think the name of Canada Day will be very important. However, even though these symbols are very important, it is crucial that we also try to define for ourselves what Canada really means. What kind of a country are we? What kind of a country do we want to become?

In the past our pioneers did very well in creating a country which was basically open, free and democratic. In doing this, they often sailed against the tide, they climbed many long hills, and many people fell by the wayside during those struggles. We have to pick up the torch of many of these pioneers and look back at what they practised. What they practised, when they spoke about Canada and dreamt about Canada, was a country which was built on co-operation, on sharing, on freedom and on democracy. What we should be doing in the future is instilling some of those principles in the Canada of tomorrow. Because I do not think we can build a Canada if we are going continuously to have confrontation after confrontation between various governments and regions. We have to recognize that this country is immensely diverse, that we can cherish that diversity, that we can have harmony in that diversity, that people are different one province from the other, and that in the modern world of today people are proud of their differences and their diversity.

In the modern world today people will be expecting to have more control over their own lives and to have a more democratic Canada—I mean that in the true sense of democracy—because I believe that in this country Parliament, or this government, and many other institutions are becoming less and less democratic. People are having less and less input over their lives. I think people are now demanding that they have more meaningful input over the direction of their country, that there be more localized democracy, that people's differences be allowed to flourish.

Are those differences we are developing a unique state called Canada? We are not the great melting pot the United States is to the south of us. We are not trying to create one Canadian from coast to coast who is similar and speaks the same language, who eats the same food, who goes to bed at the same time every night and who practises the same culture. We have to be proud of our differences, and we have many, many differences.

As well as being proud of our differences and diversities, when it comes to co-operation we have to learn more from the past and from our pioneers. Co-operation built this country in the early days. It was a dream of people working together. It did not matter whether they spoke the French language or the English language. Later on people from many lands, with diverse backgrounds co-operated in building a great state. We have to apply that principle to some of the complex problems that we are facing today, such as revenue sharing, energy and constitution building. These are the things that will cause us a great deal of strain in the next few years to which some of these principles should be applied.

Lastly I want to mention the principle of sharing. This country was also built on sharing. My own province of Saskatchewan in the 1930s and 1940s was almost bankrupt. Many of the things that were accomplished then were accomplished, in part, because of the sharing we had in this country. For example, we had an equalization plan, a Crowsnest Pass rate agreement which helped farmers to sell their grain at lower costs, and a Canadian price for oil so we could get a better price for the oil we produced. Some of these things helped to build my province and helped to build the west.

In the Canada of tomorrow, I think we will have to remember that we must continue to share so that we have equality of conditions in each and every province and each and every region. If we can do that, if we can recognize our diversity, allow it to flourish and to grow, then I think there will be less friction and fewer suspicions. If we can co-operate and work together, recognize that we are multicultural and a bilingual country, and combine that with a real sense of wanting to share things so that we can use some of the new found wealth in western Canada to help the Newfoundlanders and perhaps use some of the wealth that is still in Ontario to help people in the Atlantic provinces, then, in the long run, all of Canada will benefit.

Finally, we should be putting more emphasis and stress on making all of our institutions truly democratic so that Canadians from all walks of life have a real input into what Canada should be. If some of these things could be done, then perhaps some of the visions and the courage which Terry Fox had would, in the future, be rewarded with actual legislation in Canada.

Yesterday I happened to hear an open-line show which was discussing the impact Terry Fox had on this country. Many people said positive things about his courage, his determination, his spiritual and emotional strength. But one lady really summed it up by saying that this is all fine and well, but if we really want to do something for his memory, then legislators in this country should do something to solve some of the causes that he stood for.

I believe that in this House we can resolve some of the problems he stood for. We can do a lot more to bring Canada together and to unite this country. We could be putting more funds into things such as cancer research and aid to the disabled than we are. We could be building a Canada of hope for the future where everyone, regardless of one's background, would have a much fairer chance at an equal and happy life.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, may I also commence my remarks by adding my own word of distress at the news of the death of Terry Fox. If I can coin a phrase from my comrades in the legion, it is that "we shall not forget".

I am very proud to have the opportunity to speak today in support of Bill C-37, an act to amend the Holidays Act. This is a bill to officially entitle July 1 "Canada Day". Is it not strange that we should be debating such a bill 114 years after the original July 1 when our great country of Canada was born? I must admit that I always found it strange that July 1 could be called by any other name but Canada Day.

The House leader of the Official Opposition when speaking on this bill said there is no need for sudden deadlines. He said the bill should not be passed, not right away at least. He stated that we should not act precipitously. The Conservative party is, as usual, trying to have the best of both worlds. The Conservative party will not let the bill pass, but it will try to stay onside by suggesting that the subject matter be sent to a committee. In the nine years that I have been a member of this House, we have done just that, but to what avail? Let me put on the record today some of the events that have taken place.

As I said, I found it strange that we could designate July 1 by any other name but Canada Day. On October 15, 1974, I tabled Bill C-231 in this House for first reading. That bill came up for debate on March 14, 1975. At the end of the debate on March 14, 1975, the subject matter of the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. That bill was essentially the same bill as the one we are debating today, a bill to name July 1 Canada Day.

On October 14, 1975, the then secretary of state, the Hon. James Hugh Faulkner, said, as reported in Hansard at page 8158:

> The government feels that the majority of Canadians accept the terminology Canada Day/Fête du Canada.

The subject matter of Bill C-231, to which I have referred, came up for discussion in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs on Tuesday, February 24, 1976. Unfortunately, the opposition did not see fit to let a report come back to the House of Commons.

We tried again. On October 22, 1976, I introduced Bill C-373, an act to amend the Holidays Act, again in an attempt, if possible, to designate officially July 1 as Canada Day. That one did not go very far.

On December 21, 1976, the secretary of state introduced Bill C-30, with exactly the same intent. That bill was entitled "an act respecting certain holidays".

Still carrying on in the same effort to achieve one small step for Canada, we tried again on October 30, 1978, when we introduced Bill C-232, with exactly the same objective. The bill was entitled "an Act to amend the Holidays Act". This bill came up for debate on November 30, 1978. If I can quote one sentence from my remarks, as reported in Hansard at page 1669, I said:

> —what this bill seeks to do is regularize a situation which for all practical purposes is a fait accompli. In most parts of the country the July 1 holiday is at the present time designated Canada Day.

Bill C-232 arrived in the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration where it was debated on March 7, 1979. At the end of the debate it was finally reported back to the House. We now seemed to be making some progress. On March 13, 1979, one week later, in this House, I moved:

> —that Bill C-232, to amend the Holidays Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, be concurred in.

That motion was agreed to, whereupon I then moved "that the bill be read the third time and do pass". Debate followed and members of the Official Opposition talked out the motion so that it could not be brought to a vote. So much for our House rules.

● (1630)

We tried again on May 2, 1980, when we inroduced bill C-201, an act to amend the Holidays Act. I wrote a note to the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox). I quote:

> Attached is a copy of Bill C-201, an act to "legalize" the terminology "Canada Day". This Bill has been introduced in every Session in the last several years and has always been "talked out" by a half dozen Conservative MPs who are vehemently opposed to the change.
> It should be recognized that even a government Bill brought before the House to achieve the same objective, cannot expect to be passed without closure or lengthy debate.
> It is an example of the power of a very small minority that is able to block the passage of legislation that can obtain all-party support and would pass a House vote with an overwhelming majority.

It is appropriate today to recall some of the comments over the years in our nation's press. On June 29, 1963, a lead editorial in the Pembroke Observer was entitled "Wanted: A new name for Canadian birthday". A July 2, 1963, Kingston newspaper states: "There is nothing wrong with the term 'Canada Day' ". An article in the April 29, 1970, Globe and Mail was entitled "Canada Day title tops in poll". I quote from that article:

—president of Canada Jaycees told a press conference ... that Edmonton residents polled were 90 per cent in favour of Canada Day—

I quote from the October 6, 1969, Regina Leader-Post:

—the Saskatchewan Jaycees ... are trying to get the national holiday renamed Canada Day.

An article in the April 15, 1970 Toronto Telegram asked the question in the leader "Why not Canada Day?". I quote from that article:

We ... have our own flag, also a national anthem ... so why not a distinctive name for our birthday that no longer reflects filial piety for Britain?

On June 30, 1970—

—in Le Devoir under the title Next year, Canada Day.

Then I read:

A private bill introduced in the Commons proposes to call this day Canada Day. This year, as before, Canadians will take advantage of this day to play golf, or to take to the parks, the beach or the road.

[English]

A week later in the July 6, 1970 Montreal Gazette reference was made to the attempt in 1946, which was referred to by the previous speaker, to change the name. I quote from the article:

Since then, a number of MPs have tried their hands at a Canada Day bill ...

... this year—or next—things may be different.

I quote from the May 5, 1972, Montreal Gazette:

Canadians will probably celebrate the upcoming July 1 as "Canada Day" for the first time in the nation's history.

We can always live in hope. On May 5, 1972—

—in La Presse, July 1st would be Canada Day.

[English]

An article in the May 8, 1972, Ottawa Citizen was entitled "Make it Canada Day". In the July 15, 1972, Financial Post there is a reference in the lead to Canada Day celebrations. Not to forget the newspapers of my own constituency, the April 24, 1975, News & Chronicle, an English newspaper in my constituency, carried an article headlined "Pierrefonds plans Canada Day". So it is abundantly evident that the press has long since accepted the terminology Canada Day.

I would like in my brief remarks to make reference to a document entitled "Canada Day: A Conception, an Approach and a Proposal". This document was prepared for the Department of the Secretary of State by Betty Weinstein, Ruben Nelson and Paul-Emile Lamy. It is dated October 30, 1979. I wish to quote from it briefly.

We recommend ... as ... basic principles ... Canada Day belongs to Canadians ... not to ... governments ... Canada Day (should) be an occasion for Canadians to enjoy themselves and have fun by participating in recreational, popular, cultural and community activities ... Canada Day (would) be non-ideological ... non-partisan and non-political.

In the recommendations we read:

The Government of Canada should undertake to create a Canada Day organization—

Canadian TV stations should broadcast entirely Canadian programming on July 1.

Canadian radio stations should broadcast a larger percentage of Canadian music on July 1.

Radio Canada International should present special programming on Canada Day.

Popular events should be organized on the Hill and throughout the country.

Canadian embassies and consulates should give a simple reception for Canadian citizens on the morning of July 1.

The National Museums should hold an open house on July 1 and use the occasion to make the work of Canadian artists known.

Early in the last great war I came to Canada to train as a pilot. After the war I returned with my family to settle in Canada. I chose Quebec. Despite all the economic and social turmoil in Quebec today, I do not regret that original choice and would very happily make the same decision again today. I am very proud to call Quebec my province. I am especially proud of the very warm reception that I always receive in the constituency of Vaudreuil, the region of Canada which I represent in this House. However, being a proud Quebecer makes me no less proud to wear a flag of Canada pin, to wave our Canadian flag, to sing our national anthem "O Canada" and to speak out loudly of this country, Canada, that surely is the finest country in the world in which anyone can live.

It saddens me that members of the official opposition try to hang on to the past instead of building with pride for the future. Fortunately their attempts to continue our colonial status are already doomed to failure. Those who hang on to their antiquated memories can talk out this bill, but I in company with a huge majority of the 24 million persons who proudly call themselves Canadians will sing loudly and proudly their national anthem "O Canada" on Wednesday of this week, July 1, 1981, Canada Day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, in rising to comment on Bill C-37 I want to associate myself first of all with the comments by all speakers today regarding the courage of Terry Fox. I think one aspect of his life that has not been mentioned sufficiently in this House was the fact that not only was he a person of great courage and spirit, but he reflected very clearly in the last period of his life the deep faith he had which sustained him. I think it is also important in terms of the young people of Canada that this young person could express very clearly his faith in God and was able to express that faith to the whole world.

When one relates this bill to the situation in Canada today one might ask whether this is the right period of time to change the name from Dominion Day to Canada Day. On the one hand, with the constitutional debate that has been going on in the country over the last year or so one might argue that this is an auspicious time to do this, that it is a natural follow-up to the year's activities. On the other hand, one might ask whether it is the natural thing to do in view of the fact that the whole constitutional question is still in limbo, in doubt and before the Supreme Court.

One thing we can say is that Canadians, unhappily after this last year, are more divided in terms of the symbols of the country than when we started this year. There is no doubt about that. So I question whether at this stage it is auspicious for us to add more to the whole concept of change in terms of our national institutions, symbols and our Constitution.

Let me say to the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) that I found it rather interesting that he talked about the rules of this House and that it said so much for the rules of this House that a member of the opposition had talked out previous bills. I think if the hon. member looked at this record honestly he probably would find he is the record holder in this House for talking out private members' bills, and I question whether he was being very sincere when he said the bill had been talked out and derided the very rules he has used so adequately and so well in the past. Maybe he applies this only to his own bills and not to other private members' bills.

What is before us today is how we preserve from the past which is best, and how we also prepare plans and take steps to create in Canada the symbols needed for the future? Is there a happy middle ground for those two views? I am sure all members of this House would agree that our symbols are to be those that best reflect the Canada of today. In order to best reflect the Canada of today those symbols and words must also have a bearing on the past. In other words, a symbol cannot stand in isolation in an immediate time-frame; a symbol must also have its sustenance in, and have been built on, the foundation of the past.

What worries me about this bill is not necessarily what it purports to do but the manner in which it purports to do it. That is, if you are not for the bill somehow you might be against Canada, you are against change or you do not want national institutions changed. At least as I view the bill, that is not the question that is before us, but rather how do we best preserve that which has been and build for the future. That is the issue. It is for that reason I believe, with all respect to the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) that his motivation for the bill is wrong. I have no question about his sincerity in wanting to change Dominion Day to Canada Day.

An hon. Member: You don't understand the bill.

Mr. Epp: Just a minute. Let me finish and I will read it to you. If you have a few minutes I will tell you all about it.

The motivation of the Secretary of State is clearly spelled out in both his speech today and the press conference he has given as carried by the Canadian Press. The changes he wants are related to this statement: "We are no longer a colony of the British empire". That is the motivation. In other words, anything that might smack of the past, by natural extension, is colonial. Therefore everything we change in this House is valid, new and relevant. I reject that kind of thinking.

I do not believe that because something has been preserved over many years it is, first of all, obsolete. Second, I do not believe that people can look to the future without looking back as well. In Roman times there was a two-headed, two-faced figure.

An hon. Member: A Conservative.

Mr. Epp: He might have been a Conservative, and if he was I give him credit because he was successful. The point of the symbol was this. He both looked to the past and to the future, which indicates there can be no future without having looked to the past. That is the issue I want to relate to today.

When one looks at the Canada of 1864, and even before then—

An hon. Member: Get up-to-date.

Mr. Epp: If you want to speak and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the House leader give you time, you should rise on your feet. I am sure it would be a new experience for you.

Canada in that period of time had many small isolated communities clinging basically to the 49th parallel. In addition, it was a country made up of people who had vision for the future and wanted to create the country on the basis of the experience they had either in the old countries or in this country. That is the kind of people they were.

The word "dominion" in itself is not a word that should be denigrated in this House. It should not have any demeaning connotations put to it such as I have heard today. It should not be regarded as colonial. I do not understand why members would feel that word is negative. Most of us who obtained our education in this country were given a very special sense of pride. When we saw a map of Canada with the countries around it shown in various colours, the one colour Canada generally had was red and across it was printed "The Dominion of Canada".

An hon. Member: Liberal red.

Mr. Epp: It might have been Liberal red, if that makes you feel better. What made me feel good was that it was a Dominion of Canada that belonged to all of us. Having said that, I do not know why that attitude should necessarily be thrown in the ash can today.

The Canada of that period was a Canada under attack. In the United States the argument of manifest destiny was very strong. It was an attitude that saw the United States expand its territory to the Pacific, both through war and through land acquisition.

● (1650)

In 1858, twelve years before Manitoba, with a population of 11,000, became known as the postage stamp province, a resolution was passed in the Minnesota state legislature indicating a desire by the legislators of that period to annex Red River. There were other places in this country which went through that same type of turmoil during that period of time.

With respect to the name chosen for our country, if we read the journals of that period we find there was much debate on what the name should be. Should it just be "Canada"? Should it be the "Kingdom of Canada"? The resolution finally proposed the "Dominion of Canada".

It has already been stated here that Psalm 72:8 was the basis. I want to dwell on that for a minute because not only is it found in Psalm 72:8 but the ancient prophet Zechariah also spoke of the same words and uttered the same words. The name had a very religious meaning to the people of that period of time. It was felt that He, not the Prime Minister of Canada and not even the Monarch in the same sense, was to be supreme and sovereign. He should have dominion from sea to sea and from the river to the ends of the earth. No matter how much people want to denigrate that, that remains part of our history.

I for one do not believe we as people or as legislators do service to the present generation or future generations by hanging crepe over the word and saying it does not apply or that it is colonial and that therefore we must end its use. I do not think we serve ourselves or future generations by doing that.

The sovereignty which is inherent in those verses was important not only for religious reasons but also for political reasons. I want to deal with that for just a minute. I say openly that I am indebted to Senator Eugene Forsey for much of the material to which I am going to refer. My House leader also referred to it. I will not quote it, but I believe Senator Forsey—some 25 years ago, in fact—put forward some very cogent arguments as to why Dominion Day had meaning. First, I believe the words "Dominion Day" had a religious connotation; and if we are people who believe that faith does not change and principles do not change, then that principle still remains today and is still valid today. That is the first point.

Second, the material pointed out to everyone that the Fathers of Confederation felt that Canada had a manifest destiny. While we might have gone about it in a way different from that of our American friends to the south, we also had a manifest destiny, and that manifest destiny was also to create a dominion. From how far to how far? From sea to sea. We did it through means other than those used by our American friends. We allowed provinces in. My own province comes to mind. Because of its area and economic base one might have said it was not yet qualified to become a province in 1870. However it was allowed in. Why? Because the Fathers of Confederation knew that if the manifest of the Canadian people was to be realized, they would have to bring in these colonies and make them feel part of the dominion.

I say with a great amount of pride that I believe that the concept of dominion from sea to sea went even further in the time of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, not because he was a member of the party I support but because I think Canadians generally recognized that he developed that concept one step further. He developed it to the northern sea. We were a people who had our manifest destiny, and it was as valid as the manifest destiny of those to the south of us.

There was another reason why the word was chosen. The Fathers of Confederation wanted a constitutional form of government similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. Perhaps it is here that I have the greatest difficulty with the argument of the Secretary of State. The reason I have difficulty with his argument is not because of his sincere desire to want to change the word and because he feels that "Canada Day" better reflects Canada today. What it seems to be based on is that the principles we inherited from the United Kingdom somehow have not served us well. I say they have served us well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: If we believe this country is bilingual and therefore say that that is valid to preserve, and if we go further and say that this country is multicultural and therefore it is valid to preserve those cultures, then why is it suddenly not valid to preserve a basic culture which has been so influential not just in this country but right around the world? If one takes a look at a constitution which is to be similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom, where better can we reflect it than in this Parliament or in the parliamentary system? Surely all members of this House, regardless of what background they come from, will argue with every breath they have that this is the best system under which we can serve the people who elect us. Surely there are defenders of the parliamentary system in this House who will argue that this is the best system.

Oh, yes, there might be a need for change, and I have a few changes in mind myself.

Mr. Fox: You have to be kidding. There is no need for change on your side.

Mr. Epp: However, if someone wants to argue that this system and the principles on which it is founded are wrong, yes, he will have arguments from me and many others as well.

Mr. Fox: Come on, don't change anything.

Mr. Epp: There was another reason that the word "dominion" had importance for the Fathers of Confederation. Over this last year we have been arguing in the constitutional committee, in this House and across the country about the balance between the powers needed by a federal, national, central government and the powers of a province or the provinces. In the United States an argument developed for a long period of time over the so-called concept of states' rights, namely, that the individual states had exclusive powers and that they would simply devolve certain powers to the central government for the benefit of the entire nation.

The word "dominion" in Canada had another concept. The Fathers of Confederation wanted a strong national government. Residual powers would remain with the federal government, and I have always been a believer in that. The Fathers of Confederation understood and knew that if the federal government did not have certain powers, that string of colonies hugging the 49th parallel not only would be faced with threats from the south but also would not have the cohesion needed to develop a country stretching from sea to sea.

As I read the journals, in the minds of the Fathers of Confederation the concept of dominion was important because of the states' rights argument they were hearing and also so that a feeling could be developed within the consciousness of the people across 3,000 miles that there was a central government which had over-all power in those areas in which it had been granted by the British North America Act.

There is another reason I believe it was important. That is the matter of a constitutional monarchy. The word "dominion" also had effect regarding the monarchy. I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, when I hear members opposite say, both in private conversation, in the newspapers and confirming it in committees that I have sat on, that they would like to see the monarchy abolished in Canada. That might not be a view held by everyone, and I am sure it is not. However, I believe they would also agree—I will not mention names today —that there are members on that side—

Some hon. Members: Name them.

Mr. Epp: —who very clearly have said—

An hon. Member: That is a smear.

Mr. Epp: No, it is not a smear. They have said very clearly in the press that within two years of the passing of the Constitution that they would be able to—

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, we are discussing a bill which, in fact, could be summed up in two lines. The bill proposes to change the name of the July 1 holiday, as found in the Holidays Act, from Dominion Day to Canada Day. The hon. member, on the other hand, is talking about the abolition of the monarchy in Canada, which is certainly not the topic under discussion today. I would ask the Chair to call the hon. member to order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. As we have indicated on various occasions and as pointed out by hon. members, I was waiting to hear the remarks of the hon. member to see if they had any bearing on the bill before the House. Generally speaking, if I understand his arguments correctly, the hon. member is afraid that if this bill is passed, further steps could be taken in that direction. Those are the remarks I have heard, and that is why I should like to hear the hon. member further.

[English]

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether this is a question of privilege or a point of order, but clearly the remarks of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) contravene the House rules as laid out in Beauchesne's Citation 316. A few moments ago he imputed bad motives to members on this side to the effect that some on this side wanted to do away with the monarchy. I would remind you that according to Citation 316(g) it is also out of order for any member, while speaking, to——use the Sovereign's name for the purpose of influencing a debate;—

I think it is very shameful that the hon. member for Provencher is breaking the rules of this House by bringing in the Sovereign's name and imputing bad motives to members on this side as to their views on the constitutional monarchy.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, it is a very interesting citation because it says:

Besides the prohibitions contained in S.O. 35, it has been sanctioned by usage that a member, while speaking, must not:

(g) use the Sovereign's name for the purpose of influencing a debate;—

What the hon. gentleman was referring to, of course, was the institution of the monarchy. It is interesting, Mr. Speaker, as you know, that the same rule provides in paragraph (b) that he must not—

—refer to any debate in the Senate—

Early today I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the oracle of Delphi, refer to a private member's bill which had been debated and dealt with in a rather unceremonious way in the Senate. The Chair, quite rightly, did not call the hon. member to order because he wanted to continue the debate. This is hardly a point of order either, and I suggest, with respect, that the Chair might dispose of it in the same way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I think hon. members wanted to express their differences on the manner in which the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) expressed himself, but I cannot find a point of order on this matter.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I regret the members opposite do not know their members better, or their attitude and views.

An hon. Member: We know you better.

Mr. Epp: However, I am sure that if they were to ask the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel), he would be able to confirm the quotes that have been in the papers.

Mr. Collenette: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Provencher has mentioned the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel) directly, and I would like to reserve the right to have the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean raise a question of privilege at a later date. I will draw these remarks to his attention.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The parliamentary secretary's remarks are well taken.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I find it rather interesting that the members opposite feel that as long as one is referring to the word "dominion" they think we are not referring to the bill. Maybe they do not like the argument, and they can hold that position, but we are talking very specifically about what the word "dominion" itself means. I said that I feel the constitutional monarchy in this country is not only to preserve but to enhance. I believe also that, for many of us whose background is neither French nor English, it has been the constitutional monarchy which has enabled us—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. After hearing the previous arguments, I would ask the hon. member to convince me that he is referring to the bill before the House. I was listening to the hon. member with the thought that he was saying that if we do adopt this bill we would eventually be trying to abolish the monarchy. I think he is now debating it as if we had before us a bill to abolish the monarchy. That is not before the House, so I would invite him him to speak on this bill.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak on that issue. It is my intention to show why the word "dominion" itself, which I believe is part of this bill—in fact, if you want me to read through it you will find the word is not mentioned. It is headed "An Act to Amend the Holidays Act". What I am saying to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all members, is that the institution of a constitutional monarchy in this country has been a means of continuity and preservation of rights. That is the point I was trying to make and I would think, Mr. Speaker, you would agree that that is not only very much a central part of this bill, but a central part of the whole concept of the day we are sharing.

Mr. Fox: Nonsense.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, what they want to do and have been trying to do for some period of time is to change our Canadian institution and argue that anyone who is against the change they want to make is not truly Canadian.

An hon. Member: That is a pretty broad brush.

Mr. Epp: That is a broad brush, and I meant to use it because the fact remains that they feel their concept of the country is the valid one and all others are less than valid. When one takes a look at the change the government is proposing, they will argue, to some degree rightfully, that the majority of Canadians are in favour of the change. However, if you use that argument, the majority of Canadians are also not in favour of the process the government has used for constitutional change. However, that does not stop them.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Irwin) says they are in favour of a charter. So am I and so is my party, but there is still a valid process which Parliament demands. So, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the Secretary of State that I believe we and Canadians would be well served if this bill were to be taken to a committee for a specific period of time—

Mr. Fox: Let's adopt it. Second reading and let's go.

• (1710)

Mr. Epp: For instance, we could use one of the proposals and call it—

An hon. Member: Let's follow the route; let's give it second reading.

Mr. Epp: My House leader has very clearly said what the route will be; we can go that route.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, they can make as much fun as they want or feel that a majority is always right, but the Secretary of State and Canada would be well-served if we used some period of time in committee to look at whether or not the procedure is the best we can use and whether we would use an appellation for July 1 in such a way as to preserve the past. Let us not reject simply that which has been good in the past.

And hon. Member: Let us take it to committee.

Mr. Epp: I hear the hon. member saying that we should take it to committee. That is what my House leader said. This will happen, but obviously we have the right to put the views of our constituents on the floor of the House. This is what I have done. I ask the Secretary of State to consider the manner in which he is proceeding. I believe it is wrong and is not in our best interests.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain)—Employment—Summer works program—Request for extension of application date deadline; the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy)—Aviation industry—Manpower training—Negotiations between government and industry; the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie)—Veterans affairs—Appointment of full time minister—Decentralization of department.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

HOLIDAYS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fox that Bill C-37, to amend the Holidays Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton) (p. 11042).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Berger).

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I apologize to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Berger). I used the name of the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel); I attributed those remarks to the wrong person. I want to withdraw them and to apologize. The person who made those remarks was in fact the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre).

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, just to set the record straight, I take notice of the remarks of the hon. member and reserve the right of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) to raise a question of privilege.

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, in starting my comments I, too, should like to pay tribute to Terry Fox. Earlier today the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) expressed how all Canadians feel about his accomplishments and contribution to our country. The only fitting tribute, as was indicated in several newspaper editorials, that Canadians could render to him would be to double our efforts in an attempt to find a solution to the terrible disease which cost him his life.

The bill before us seeks to replace the name "Dominion Day" with the words "Canada Day".

[Translation]

In French, today's bill would substitute the words "fête du Canada" for "fête du Dominion".

[English]

It is with great pleasure that I take this opportunity to suggest why the proposed change in the name of our national holiday is not only fitting but also profoundly significant.

I should like to stress three points in my comments. First, the word "dominion" has an ambiguous meaning, both legally and even in dictionaries.

[Translation]

Second, since the word "dominion" has no French equivalent, the act overlooks or ignores one third of Canada's population.

[English]

Third, I stress the necessity to have symbols, holidays and institutions in Canada to which all Canadians can relate.

I should like to turn to the matter of the ambiguous meaning. The word "dominion" has a time-honoured place in our nation's history, dating from the birth of confederation. The hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) and other speakers referred to this today. The name was suggested, as we are told in the history books, by Sir Leonard Tilley as an alternative to "kingdom" and was taken from the Seventy-second Psalm:

> He shall have dominion also from sea to sea—

This line will always have special significance for Canadians. The phrase "from sea to sea" conveys perhaps better than any other the pride we feel in our vast land, yet the word "dominion" has an ambiguous meaning. In 1921, Prime Minister Lloyd George asked the British House of Commons:

> What does Dominion Status mean?

He was speaking on a motion that the House approve the articles of agreement for a treaty between Great Britain and Ireland signed on December 6, 1921, in the opening words of which the following was stated:

> Ireland shall have the same constitutional status in the Community of Nations known as the British Empire as the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, and the Union of South Africa.

Mr. Lloyd George said that it was difficult and dangerous to give a definition. Indeed, he explained that at an imperial conference held earlier in the year all the dominion delegates had been anxious to avoid a rigid definition.

I see the hon. House leader of the official opposition is returning to his seat. I hope he pays some attention to my remarks because I think some of my points have significance.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Lloyd George knew my father.

Mr. Berger: As I was saying, Lloyd George indicated in the British House of Commons in 1921 that it was difficult and dangerous to give a definition to the words "dominion status". Also he explained that at an imperial conference held earlier in the year all the dominion delegates had been anxious to avoid a rigid definition. They had felt that to define precisely was "not the way of the British Constitution". Mr. Lloyd George continued:

> Many of the Premiers delivered notable speeches in the course of that Conference, emphasizing the importance of not defining too precisely what the relations of the Dominions were with ourselves, what were their powers, and what was the limit of the power of the Crown. It is something that has never been defined by an Act of Parliament, even in this country, and yet it works perfectly.

I suggest to the House leader of the official opposition that this is fine for constitutional lawyers, but a country such as Canada needs something which is more precise and has more meaning for its national holiday.

These quotations were taken from a book by K. C. Wheare, "The Statute of Westminster and Dominion Status", published in 1942. I do not intend to get into a long discourse on the meaning of "dominion status". Suffice it to say it was the term used to describe the constitutional position of the territorial communities known as the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland. In his book Wheare attempts to define dominion status and the significance of the Statute of Westminster in that definition. However, in the final paragraph of his 303 page study he wrote:

It is doubtful whether the Statute has succeeded completely in the first of the tasks which, in the words of the King's Speech in 1931, it was intended to perform—"to make clear the powers of Dominion Parliaments".

That question is very much an unsettled one today.

The House leader of the opposition said that on July 1 we celebrate a concept. I take issue with that. Yes, dominion status is a concept. The extent to which the federal and provincial governments have powers in relation to the mother parliament is a concept. But Canadians need more than that when it comes to our national holiday. We need more than a concept; we need something about which we can all be proud. I suggest to the hon. member that it is hard for Canadians who are not so familiar with our constitutional past to feel pride in a concept, to get their teeth into it and to get their minds and souls into a concept.

Some references were made by the House leader of the opposition and by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) to remarks made by Senator Eugene Forsey. With all due respect, I suggest to those two hon. members that they are out of touch with reality. How many Canadians read Senator Forsey?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A great many, my dear friend.

Mr. Berger: The hon. member answers "A great many". I suggest to him that perhaps he has talked to many high school graduates in his constituency lately. I have talked to many high school graduates and many grade school students in my constituency. It is sad to say that many of them—most of them—are lacking in a knowledge of Canadian history.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It is not Senator Forsey's fault.

Mr. Berger: That is correct, it is not Senator Forsey's fault. However, that is something which was not provided for in the Canadian Constitution of 1867. There was no provision for any kind of basic instruction in Canadian history. There was no provision for the Government of Canada to have any input whatsoever into the curricula of our schools. However, the sad fact remains that many young Canadians are not steeped in Canadian constitutional history, nor are they steeped in the origins of Canada by any stretch of the imagination.

[Translation]

I also mentioned the fact that the word "dominion" has no equivalent in French. According to the Robert dictionary, "Dominion" means domination or power, and I quote:

Each one of the states, now independent, which makes up the British Union and whose foreign policy was inspired by the United Kingdom.

[English]

I suggest to members opposite that any young Canadian who looked into a dictionary and saw this definition, which is in the Le Dictionnaire Robert, which says that Canada does not have control over its external policies, would be gravely misled. Nevertheless, this is the definition in a Canadian dictionary which is in use and which is sold in many provinces today.

[Translation]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): That is a French dictionary.

[English]

Mr. Berger: The hon. member opposite says—

—a French dictionary, but the fact remains that that dictionary is used in most schools. Perhaps it will be found on the table before us today. It can be found in most bookstores in Quebec. Indeed, anyone looking up the word "Dominion" in one of those dictionaries to find out its meaning will have absolutely no idea whatsoever of its current meaning with respect to Canada.

[English]

That is the problem. The problem is that the word is fine to constitutional lawyers. The word is fine to parliamentarians who have time to reflect on the matter. However, it has no precise meaning for the vast majority of Canadians who do not have the leisure time to reflect upon great matters such as this.

The thrust of my remarks has been directed toward the necessity to have in Canada symbols, holidays and institutions to which all Canadians can relate. Not so long ago I felt that the Canadian lack of national pride was perhaps our greatest redeeming quality. The displays of emotion for flag and country as favoured by our neighbours to the south often seemed excessive to the more reserved Canadians. However, at the present time when our country is marked by division and lack of communication I feel that we need symbols to which all Canadians can relate. This is a point which I do not feel has been adequately considered by members opposite.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I think there is an urgent need to define our country, to provide common symbols, especially in my riding of Laurier, in Montreal East, which spans St. Lawrence Boulevard, where East meets West. The national issue is urgently felt there. We put up a hard fight during the referendum campaign. Maybe that is something members opposite are not aware of, but I can tell you that the Canadian flag played a major role in our referendum victory, as Prof. Gérard Laforest pointed out so well before the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution when he said, and I quote:

Where do you think we would be if during the referendum there had not been a distinctive Canadian flag? Would you have seen those who favoured staying in this country, in Quebec holding up the Red Ensign everywhere?

He also added, and I quote:

I think we very deeply need symbols in this country.

● (1730)

[English]

Again, Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that the hon. members of the official opposition realize the war that we are waging today, at this very minute, for the hearts and minds of Quebecers. I can refer to an article which appeared in Le Droit last October 28, 1980, in which the newspaper pointed out that Quebecers, more than other Canadians, realized that the first of July was Canada's birthday. However, the study also revealed that Quebecers participated less actively than other Canadians in the celebrations for Canada's birthday. This may perhaps be the result, or the natural result, of having another important holiday, la Fête Nationale du Québec, which precedes it by only one week. The fact is that la Fête Nationale du Québec was just celebrated in Quebec with a budget of over $3.5 million. This coming week, we will be celebrating Canada's birthday with a modest budget of several hundreds of thousands of dollars. I am talking about this on a provincial level. I do not think that hon. members opposite realize that particular point.

We parliamentarians here should look to the one-third of Canadians who are of neither British nor French origin. When I say one-third of Canadians, I feel that the figure is probably a lot greater than that. The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition suggested that the government should wait and that it must satisfy the House that the overwhelming number of Canadians would be satisfied with this change prior to embarking upon it. He suggested that the decision should emerge from Canadians by some sort of magic.

I would suggest that the hon. members opposite have no concept of leadership, that they have no understanding of the fact that the Parliament of our country should try to set some sort of pace for the nation and not get too far ahead of it, as I think it has been said, but perhaps take a lead to show the way. It is quite obvious that they have no conception whatsoever of the importance of leadership and the importance of showing the way to other Canadians in matters of our national government. They would have us wait until the matter emerged from Canadians by some sort of osmosis. They would wait until people right across the country got up and started walking up and down the streets crying out for such a matter. I would suggest that if governments waited that long to act in any matter, there would be very little activity conducted in the affairs of any nation.

As I said previously, I would suggest to hon. members opposite that they again look to immigrants for the answer. I would like to point out to them a couple of facts. First of all, an element which characterizes my riding, in addition to its dualistic nature, is the fact that every month I receive in my office, a list of at least 100 new citizens. I would like to read out the names of some of them on the most recent list: Mrs. Ourania Voudouris; Miss Sok Than Ang; Mr. Mbang Bousso Hadji Ngarmorio; Mr. Kailesh Hasmukhabhai Gopalbhai and Mrs. Leontina Maria Varao Macedo. I suppose I should apologize to the people whose names I have read out, because of my pronunciation. I do not know any of these people and it is likely that I did not do great justice to the pronunciation of their names. The point I wanted to stress is that every month in my constituency there are 100 people like the five people whose names I have just read out. Every month across Canada there are probably 10,000 Canadiens who become new citizens and who are looking for Canadian symbols to identify with, and who are unfortunately, not aware and have no way of being aware of the fractured history which has preceded their arrival. For these people, the word "Canada" was and is the magic word.

Canada for them is a magic word. As Naim Kattan so rightly said in "L'Arrivée":

Canada! That was the magic word that stirred in us feelings of expectation and hope as well as of worry and anguish.

[English]

I think that this House should recognize these facts and that it should recognize that the greatest thing we have in common amongst us as Canadians is Canada. It is an international word. It is a word which is recognized all over the world, in all countries and in all languages. I would suggest that it is a word which is entirely appropriate to our national day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Berger: This July 1 let us really celebrate Canada Day!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I too want to rise in my place today and speak both in favour of Canada and against Canada Day. We have had some interesting presentations here this afternoon. We have heard from the minister himself. I was disappointed to think that a minister of the Crown, the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) who is in charge of communications, could not give us a better research document than he did on the history of the words "Dominion Day" and on why we should attempt to change it. I thought that we could have had a better explanation from him. His colleague, the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) chose to give us a long litany of the bills which have been brought before the House and have been turned down for one reason or another. He then went on to give us a list of the newspaper headlines, going back many years, in which Canada Day was being proposed. Again, he made no attempt to look into the history of the words "Dominion Day" and why some of us feel the name worth preserving. I thought my colleague, the House leader of my party, took a very fair approach. He looked at this concept of changing the name from Dominion Day to Canada Day and decided that it deserved some discussion by parliamentarians, something we have not had a chance to discuss in that fashion before. The hon. member is proposing that we amend this motion before the House so that the subject matter will go before a committee, with which I certainly agree.

• (1740)

I thought the most telling speech that we have heard so far today was given by my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). He gave an incisive analysis of the origins and the meanings of Dominion Day going back to 1867 when our forefathers and those who had reason to do so chose a name for this country. The hon. member for Provencher explained in a very logical way why they chose the words they did. The proof of his logic was shown by the effect he had on government members who intervened as much as they could because they were embarrassed, I would suggest, by some of the arguments which the hon. member for Provencher used.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Berger). I think he made an attempt to go into some of the early meanings of the naming of July 1. He gave his view for the reasons for change.

A piece of paper was passed to me from one of my colleagues opposite a few moments ago. The hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Cyr) handed me a definition from a French language dictionary. In this dictionary the word "dominion" is described as being an English word. This just goes to show why we have some of the problems we do in our schools. It is obvious that we have a French dictionary which tells us that the word "dominion" is an English word, and yet I can show my hon. colleague that the word is actually a French word, preserved by the English language back in the time of the King James version of the Bible. Prior to that, "dominion" was a French word. However, I will get the appropriate quotation for my colleague. It is interesting to hear the different views one can get on issues like this.

As we all know, Dominion Day is the correct, legal and official designation of July 1, as three acts of Parliament have already determined in the past. Today, with Bill C-37 and the amendment before us, we are asked to formally change the name from Dominion Day to Canada Day. Yet it is worth noting that the government has for some years now been using the appellation Canada Day and not Dominion Day in its press releases and commercials in advertising our national holiday. In short, the government has deliberately been breaking the law of the land by unilaterally, and without debate, changing the name of Canada's birthday from Dominion Day to Canada Day. There is no moral or ethical excuse for the government breaking the law of the land.

The name of former senator Eugene Forsey has been mentioned several times today. I think it is appropriate that he has been mentioned because he is the one person who has given some serious thought to the meaning of the words "Dominion Day". As most of us know here, he was a former research director for the Canadian Labour Congress. He was also a former Liberal senator. He is one of the foremost authorities on Canadian constitutional law, in spite of what my colleague from Laurier has said. Former senator Forsey, said:

—parliamentary responsible government rests on the rule of law. The government must not break the law, anymore than the ordinary person,—or rules of Parliament, anymore than your ordinary member. Majorities are not enough: they must be majorities acting within the law, within the rules.

There is no denying that "Canada Day" has crept into popular usage in this country, and it is often used interchangeably with "Dominion Day", but what we are being asked to do with Bill C-37 is to make the formal change and discard a uniquely Canadian term Dominion Day forever and ever. I say this is a mistake and I have yet to see or hear a compelling or convincing argument for this change.

Bill C-37 is to erase Dominion Day from the books. In short, it attempts to turn our backs on our history, cast away our beginnings, our heritage, our tradition. Some would say that we are starting anew but, in my mind, you cannot have progress without continuity, nor continuity without progress.

A well known Canadian historian, Michael Bliss, has said:

Canadians are a people who remember their present and think it's their history.

Certainly, this is true of this government. On December 21, 1976, the then secretary of state introduced a bill into the House of Commons. It proposed, among other things, to change the name of Dominion Day to Canada Day, and Victoria Day to Queen's birthday. Victoria Day was not a holiday to celebrate any Queen's birthday; it was a holiday decreed to celebrate the birthday of a particular queen, one queen, Queen Victoria, and it is only meaningful to Canadians as Victoria Day. I bring this to the House's attention because there is and has been an assault by Liberal governments on tradition in Canada. But the moment that traditions are discarded and our heritage is ignored, the government does the society irreparable damage. I am one who believes that society is a partnership not only among those who are living but among those who are dead, and those who are to be born. Within society, there is a tremendous store of wisdom, a treasury to which it is the duty of each generation to make its characteristic contribution. By discarding traditions, one loses one's roots. Any change of the name of Dominion Day is not insignificant, since by changing a name which is rich in meaning one also changes the meaning of our national holiday. I would favour, perhaps, a "Canada Day" but not as a substitute for "Dominion Day". July 1 is celebrated because it is our birthday and only the term Dominion Day addresses this fact.

I believe in what Professor Kenneth McNaught said in the following words:

No person can be healthy if he does not know where he comes from and why he did what he did. Thus we should recall that Dominion Day was decreed to celebrate a very Canadian event and some fundamental Canadian decisions.

The minute we sever our links with the past, we lose the sense of ourselves, our country. We fall prey to building transitory and fragile sand castles which are washed away by the tides of fashion and arbitrary change, due of course to arbitrary reason. We would thus drift like tumbleweed blown to and fro, having lost our worth, or reason to be, our very life.

Why then would anyone wish a change? Well, I can think of two reasons. Either those advocates of a change are ashamed of our past and the use of the word "dominion" as it applies to our country since, of course, at its birth, our country was known as Dominion of Canada; or one may argue that the term Dominion Day no longer applies to our national holiday, July 1.

I would ask if anyone is ashamed of the appellation "dominion". I would hope not. If so, I would venture to say that it would be because those people betray a lack of knowledge about Canada's historic beginnings. For some reason, and I have read the arguments, some believe that the term Dominion of Canada and hence Dominion Day is outdated, that it is tainted with the brush of colonialism. However, I would submit that a true reading of our beginnings and an understanding of Canada at its inception might lead members to conclude otherwise.

What then did the title Dominion of Canada mean to Canadians on July 1, 1867, at confederation? I turn to the front page of The Globe and Mail of that date. It reads:

> We celebrate then today an event of much greater importance than the confederation merely of three or four provinces—the union of the maritime provinces with Canada. We celebrate the inauguration of a new nationality; to which are committed the interests of Christianity and civilization over a territory larger than that of the ancient Roman empire, larger, too, than the territory which is controlled by the great neighbouring republic, and with a population greater than that with which the United States began their career ninety years ago. In the duties, therefore, of the present, and in the hope and aspirations which gild our future, there is room and scope ample enough for the purest patriotism and the loftiest ambition. Let us hope that Canadians—using the word in its new and large acceptation—will worthily fulfil the duties which Providence has confided to them.

For the Fathers of Confederation and the people at the time of confederation, the term dominion did not suggest subservience, as it has been suggested a number of times by government members, nor was it British. It was distinctively Canadian, chosen by a father of confederation, Sir Leonard Tilley, from the seventy-second psalm, which reads:

> He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.

What more aptly describes Canada, which extends from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean, than does dominion? Or, as the motto on our coat of arms says, a mari usque ad mare—from sea to sea.

This word dominion declared the destiny of Canada to rule from sea to sea and from the St. Lawrence River to the north pole. It is a term as rich and as meaningful today as it was then. I would submit that it was an inspired choice.

Confederation was a positive decision to create a union, monarchical in principle, parliamentary in form and traditional in spirit, a union based on peace, order and good government, which was decidedly and deliberately different from the United States. It was a supreme act of faith, defying economics, American manifest destiny and, some would say, geography. We stamped our nationhood on the northern half of the continent, calling our country the dominion of Canada.

One need only read the writings of the period to be struck by the enthusiasm for this new country which fired the imagination. The term dominion connoted an expanse of territory matched only by the scope of opportunity in this new land. It was a time for gladness, celebration, in anticipation of a bright, noteworthy future. Laurier gave voice to this optimism later when he said, "The twentieth century belongs to Canada", speaking to the Canadian Club of Ottawa in 1904. I stress again that dominion was a made-in-Canada term and in no way did it suggest subservience or a lesser status for Canada. There is no need to be ashamed of the word dominion. Far from it.

There are others I have come across who assert that for French-speaking Canadians the word "dominion" is a verbal oddity which serves to inflame old colonial wounds, that somehow the word dominion offends Quebec. It was argued before the referendum that it was time to change Dominion Day to Canada Day and now we are told that perhaps with the coming of a new Constitution it is time now to make the change. Acknowledging that in 1867 there were basically two founding cultures, to which many others have since been added, we find that the word "dominion" is not an Anglo-Saxon word. It is actually an old French word, it had dropped out of use but was preserved in the English Bible and the English Book of Common Prayer.

The French translation of dominion is "puissance" meaning power, or "souveraineté", meaning sovereignty, which the new nation Canada would have. One just has to ask the question, how can a prime minister of French and English descent, who pretends to be worried about national unity, really be serious or be believed when he is prepared to forget or ignore the historic significance of the word "dominion" as applied to our national holiday on July 1?

The word dominion, coming from the Bible, emphasizes the religious basis of the new nation. As well, it asserts lordship, the primacy of the new nation over its parts wherein Canada was to be one dominion divided into four provinces. Moreover, dominion was intended to assert Canada's adherence to the monarchy. Indeed, the first choice of the fathers was to call the new country the kingdom of Canada.

Finally, I have heard murmurings that Dominion Day is offensive to new Canadians and thus perhaps, to make them feel more at home the name should be changed to Canada Day. The hon. member for Laurier stressed this point. It puzzles me when I try to understand why a person would want to emigrate to this country knowing that our national holiday is Dominion Day and then feel betrayed on arriving here to find that the name is not Canada Day. To use that kind of argument on behalf of new Canadians astonishes me, but we hear it fairly often.

The hon. member who spoke second for the government today is not a native-born Canadian. He is a native of the United Kingdom. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), who is my Ottawa member and who is interjecting the most, is not a Canadian by birth either. I would be the last to take away the right for them to speak that way, but to think that those two members feel that strongly about the name of the country surprises me.

Immigrants come to Canada, I am sure, because they like our country, what it stands for, and our way of life. In Canada, we encourage multiculturalism and unity within diversity. We see an excellent example of this fact in the annual Caravan Festival in Toronto. Most new Canadians retain their cultural links and roots and traditions and realize the value of these links. Surely this group of Canadians would be the last to encourage Canada to sever its links with the past, to turn its back on its heritage. I do not believe it. Moreover, as new Canadians, they knew of Canada's heritage and tradition and way of life before they chose to come here.

If there is no reason to be ashamed of the title "Dominion", why then make the change to Canada Day? Is it because dominion no longer applies? How can that be?

Why is July 1 the date of our national holiday? Quite simply, and I think we are all in agreement, it is because July 1 is Canada's birthday. We celebrate confederation on July 1 and surely it strains one's imagination to imply that Dominion Day is no longer apt. It remains historically and geographically meaningful.

Returning to the front page of the Globe on July 1, 1867, we read the following:

> Stamped with a familiar name, which in the past has borne a record sufficiently honourable to entitle it to be perpetuated with a more comprehensive import, the DOMINION OF CANADA, on this First day of July, in the year of grace, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, enters on a new career of national existence.

Confederation was a union of Canadas, that is, Ontario and Quebec, formerly Upper Canada and Canada West and Lower Canada and Canada East respectively, with New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The provinces joined to form, not Canada, but a new country, a larger Dominion of Canada. The Fathers of Confederation chose the term "dominion". They would not have agreed to calling July 1 Canada Day.

It is natural and only makes sense if we call July 1 Dominion Day if, of course, we refer to Canada's birthday. It is not possible to speak with accuracy of a 114th birthday without posing any question about ancestors who called themselves Canadians before confederation, whereas Dominion Day means only one thing: Canada's birthday, July 1.

Surely the point of having a national holiday at all is to celebrate our country, its history past and present. Canada Day would change the meaning of our national holiday. The term Canada Day is alien to confederation, a time when Canadians spoke of the grandiose Dominion of Canada. One of the great failings of Canadians is that many do not have a strong sense of our history and surely the purpose of a national holiday is to sit back and reflect and appreciate our history and where we have come from. Yet now we are asked to cast our history aside and to banish the name Dominion Day forever.

The proposal to change the formal appellation of Dominion Day to Canada Day unfortunately is not an isolated incident or issue but is becoming increasingly characteristic of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who places abstract reasoning above prescription and tradition, though we all know he has a well-developed concern for the judgment of history in relation to himself. We are witnessing arrogance. Nowhere is this more apparent than in the government stand on the Constitution, nor in the famous, or should I say infamous, interview on New Year's Eve with the Prime Minister when he said essentially that if the country were to break up because of what his government was trying to do—

Mr. Fox: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We are debating Bill C-37 which proposes to change the name Dominion Day to Canada Day. We are not talking about a whole series of unrelated events that the hon. member wishes to raise during the course of this debate because he has nothing to say.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order please. The remarks of the Secretary of State are well taken. The Chair is always lenient and listens to the argument from both sides. After listening attentively to the hon. member for Provencher, I invited him to address his remarks to the bill, which is to change the name of one day. I invite the hon. member for Oxford to do the same.

Mr. Taylor: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Surely in a debate you can use illustrations to prove the point you are making. The Secretary of State referred to the flag debate which had nothing to do with this debate. I suggest every time we touch on a vital point, members opposite raise a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock p.m. I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. When the House rose at six o'clock, the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) had the floor.

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, prior to our recessing at the supper hour I was making some comments about the fact that there are certain traditions in this country which I feel at times are being lost. I was discussing the use of the words "Dominion Day" to designate our national holiday as being one of those traditions. I was comparing it to some changes to the Constitution we have been faced with and suggested this was a parallel situation. The Secretary of State took exception to that on a point of order.

Be that as it may, I would like to proceed with the thought in mind that Canada Day itself as a term is not rooted in any kind of tradition. It is abstract and means very little to most Canadians. However, we could institute a new holiday, a new national holiday choosing to call it Canada Day rather than heritage day as has been proposed in the past. Dominion Day, on the other hand, is rich in meaning to many Canadians. It is correct and it is entirely appropriate as well.

The hon. member for Vaudreuil when speaking this afternoon made reference to the fact that it was passing strange to him that we were not in a position to call our national holiday Canada Day. I noticed in researching this presentation that back on May 6, 1980, as reported at page 764 of Hansard, he said almost exactly the same as he said today, namely:

> We want to celebrate our national holiday using the name of our country, as every other country would surely want to do.

The strange thing is that there are only three other countries in the world that do that now. It was mentioned earlier today that Australia and New Zealand do that, and the third country is Pakistan. It is not factual that most countries call their national holidays by the name of the country. Only three countries out of many have chosen to do that.

Let us look at what has been done in other countries in addition to the fact that only three call their national holidays by their country name. The United States does not call their national holiday, Independence Day, by its name. We have not heard an explanation as to why they would not want to do that. Nor does France call its national holiday, Bastille Day, France day. I do not know why they do not want to change Bastille Bay to France Day, but there is probably a good reason. Why does Quebec, for instance, not change St. Jean Baptiste Day to Quebec day if that sort of move has a lot of meaning to people?

In conclusion I should like to quote the following from the Ottawa Journal of June 30, 1979:

> Dominion Day has at least a ring of sorts to it. Whereas Canada Day does sound as though it were put together in a hurry when there wasn't time to think of anything better.

That is the way it has been done this time too, I would suggest. Parenthetically, one would think we had no economic problems that are more important for consideration today than this business of Canada Day. The article went on to read:

> Perhaps the greatest danger with Canada Day is that somehow it might get twisted into "Day Canada" along with those other horrors; Supply Canada, Manpower Canada, Environment Canada, etc.

I would conclude by saying: Canada week, yes, but Canada Day, never.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, there has been so much criticism of the government in the past, sometimes accurate and sometimes perceived, but mostly perceived by the opposition, that I was surprised today to witness a debate on whether we should call July 1 Canada Day. I expected to come into the House and see members of the opposition rise to their feet and cheer. Much to my surprise I came here and found the same type of leadership of members opposite that made them oppose the flag and the Constitution, and now makes them oppose Canada Day.

During the last several speeches there has been quite some reference to history. Let me quote Harry S. Truman, a former President of the United States, who said:

> Men make history and not the other way 'round. In periods where there is no leadership, society stands still. Progress occurs when courageous, skilful leaders seize the opportunity to change things for the better.

For some strange reason, the Tories are the captives of history: if it happened in the past it is good. The lesson that men make history but history does not make men is one that the Tories have not learned and will never learn. Perhaps this is a period of no leadership, as Harry S. Truman suggested, and things will look up in the future.

I witness opposition for the sake of opposition here. I think there has to be some proposing as well as opposing. I am surprised the opposition did not grasp this opportunity to present this matter as a private member's bill, to which the government would have responded in the affirmative.

The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) alluded to the fact that three previous speakers from the government side were not born in Canada. To ease his mind let me tell him that I was born in Canada, my mother was born in Canada and my father was born in Canada. However, my maternal grandfather was born in Ireland, a Protestant Irishman. My paternal grandparents were born in Italy. They did not come to Canada because July 1 was called Dominion Day; they came to Canada for jobs. My grandmother came here when she was 16 and lived to be 94. At least once a year she would say how lucky we were to be living in Canada. On July 1, if you had told her we were celebrating Dominion Day, she would not have known what you were talking about. However, if you had told her that on Canada Day we were celebrating the importance of living in Canada, she would have rejoiced.

Why is it so important in our country to have these symbols? I have travelled across this land and I know that our very strength is our greatest weakness. In Newfoundland they are still talking about 1949, and there is a strong Irish element. In Nova Scotia the strength of Cape Breton is in its Scottish ancestry. In Quebec they go back 300 years in French and Quebec culture. The Acadians do not even consider themselves Quebecois; they consider themselves maritimers. Ontario is multicultured. In the west there are Germans, Ukrainians and there is western separatism. Superimposed on all this are 20 or 30 additional cultures in our country.

We in the Liberal party have traditionally tried to tie this country to a core. In the heat of the declaration of war, Prime Minister W. L. Mackenzie King said the following in New York on June 17, 1941:

> Our declaration was signed by the King upon the recommendation of His Majesty's Canadian ministers. The King's Proclamation was in the name of Canada.

Traditionally the Liberals have built up our nation and our sense of nation. At the same time, as evidenced by our willingness to support the Commonwealth and other countries of the Commonwealth, we understand its historic significance.

I fully appreciate the richness of our English past and the meaning of "dominion". It is in our courts and in our parliaments. It is a product of that history. However, we need not only recall our history. Let us also remember the symbols of our nation, and the name Canada on Canada Day is that symbol.

The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) talked about the history of several bills proposing the name Canada Day. I was not only shocked but dismayed to find as a new member that we have been trying for so long to change the name to Canada Day. The hon. member talked about media support. He spoke about group support. He spoke about public support. If we were to place before any municipal council in this country the choice between Dominion Day and Canada Day for July 1, in at least 90 per cent of the cases these grassroots town councils would say, "We want Canada Day". The Tories oppose this.

The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) asks whether this is the right time. There is a story about the right time. When Abraham Lincoln was about to sign the emancipation proclamation, his hand was shaking. His clerk said to him, "Why is your hand shaking, Mr. President?" Mr. Lincoln said, "I want to rest. I have shaken at least a thousand hands this day, and I do not want my signature to be weak. I do not want history to say I hesitated". That is the history of the party opposite. Hon. members opposite are waiting for the right time. Was there a right time for the flag? Was there a right time for the Constitution? Is there a right time to call July 1 Canada Day?

Between six o'clock and eight o'clock today I asked a person standing in front of the chamber, "What do you call July 1?" He said, "Canada Day". The public knows this, the NDP knows this, the government knows this, the gallery knows this—but the Tories are waiting for the right time. The Tories are waiting for history to catch up with them.

The hon. member for Provencher says Canadians are divided, that this is not the right time and that the government has divided Canadians. How did we divide Canadians? We proposed a charter which gave Canadians a certain dignity which governments cannot take away. We suggested they are no longer colonials and that we should have our own Constitution. We suggested a formula to which everyone agreed in 1971. That is what is supposedly dividing Canada. I suggest to the opposition that what is dividing Canada is the fact that the opposition lost the last election, proved that it could not make inroads in the east and is living off western division. I have said this before and I will say it again: if there is division in this country, it is because the Tories have fostered that division.

Mr. Neil: It is because of Trudeau, nobody else.

Mr. Irwin: Not once in the Quebec referendum campaign did a Liberal say Quebec should separate from Canada, and not once have I seen an hon. member opposite go to western Canada saying, "Be part of this country". If there is division—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I have some difficulty in recognizing the connection between what the hon. member is saying and the proposal to change the name of July 1 from Dominion Day to Canada Day.

Mr. Irwin: Mr. Speaker, I could not go on without reminding hon. members in the opposition of what they said during the debate. They criticized the minister for saying we are no longer a colony of Britain. They should have congratulated that same minister. The hon. member for Provencher talked about a two-headed monster which looks both ways, into the past and into the future. The hon. member for Provencher says, "Go to committee," but the House leader says, "I am not sure; maybe we should send the subject matter". The two-headed monster of the past is now the two-posteriored Tory party of the present sitting on both sides of the fence.

My forefathers came to this country to build a Canada. On July 1 they are proud to be Canadians. To them it is a frame of mind, and to call that day, July 1, Canada Day in their minds means we are no longer an appendix or an annex of Great Britain.

I see that the logic of my argument drives an hon. member from the House.

Mr. Neil: There is no logic at all.

Mr. Irwin: I am not a British subject. I do not vote in Great Britain. I do not live there. I am a Canadian. I support the concept that July 1 be called Canada Day, and I am surprised that hon. members opposite do not stand up and do the same thing.

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I want to join the last speaker in saying that I too am in favour of the concept he espouses. For some years I have been espousing the concept of Canada Week in the Waterloo region. I have been giving leadership to activities in my area in that week and on July 1. I want to say to the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) that there is a number of us on this side of the House who do not have any fundamental objection to the concept, but in the political process hon. members opposite know the game they are playing, and we know the game they are playing. They also know that behind hon. members on this side there is a variety of political realities which they must take home and deal with.

I want to say that I am prepared, after we have had an opportunity for consultation, to vote for Canada Day if that comes out of a committee hearing. However, Mr. Speaker, once again the process is one which says, "we will move from the top down and we, big government, know what is good for the people of Canada".

I would like for a moment to share with the minister and hon. members another side of this nation which I happen to represent. I know the minister, and the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) with whom he speaks, know a little bit about my experience in this country on these issues and on representing Canada abroad. I am as proud a Canadian as anyone on that side, and to have people cast aspersions, such as the comment that there are people in this party, the party of Macdonald, as well as in your party of Laurier, who are not Canadians, for me is as offensive as you may find it to be on your side. Let me suggest to you that I have been prepared to serve Canada abroad, and to campaign for Canadian activities in the community I have served as an alderman. I want for a moment to try to interpret for you a little of the sensitivities of my riding, because in that riding there is the same uneasiness as similar to that in Quebec, as described by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) earlier.

Let me suggest to the minister that I was appreciative of his comment about the fact there were 22 private members' bills introduced previously. I was appreciative and tried to hear him as he spoke about the problem of French language and the interpretation of Canada Day, and I am sensitive to what he is saying. I am also sensitive to the issue that since Confederation there have been changes. I believe the laws of Canada must reflect these changes. The leader of this party and others took part in the referendum debate to show that we care about the future of Quebec within Canada. I think the innuendoes that somehow there was no sensitivity on this side are not well taken.

The minister says this is Canada's most important holiday and that somehow we on this side are trying to put a name on something that does not yet exist in his province or mine, and we have the cart before the horse. I would like the minister to give some thought to how we judge the importance of this holiday, how we make it just what he says it is now, which I believe it can be and which I would like to work with him to make it be. I know, from the times I have been in the province of Quebec, of the importance of the St. Jean Baptiste holiday, but I wonder whether in fact in Quebec, and in large portions of the rest of Canada, Canada Day is, as he would have it, scarcely noticed except by those who want to get to their cottages. Can we not begin to plan so that the reality in Ottawa now can be the reality across Canada?

Yesterday I made a phone call, Mr. Speaker, to invite someone from Ottawa to come to Waterloo for a holiday. This young woman said: I cannot leave Ottawa until after the July 1 celebration. There is a sense of celebration here in the capital, and I wish it were so across the country. I want to suggest to the government that before we change the name, we should involve the people who are going to help us celebrate. In my experience those people have been the new Canadians, people who are now part of the multicultural composition of Canada in which we take a great deal of pride.

The minister spoke of July 1 as being representative of the pride we have in Canada and of the hope we have in the future. I concur in those aspirations but I contend they are not yet a reality. The changing of the name without using the process of involving the people in the change is not helpful at this time. Therefore, I am prepared to support our House leader's amendment that we take the next year and invite representatives of the multicultural groups and others across Canada to share with us their recommendations for the name and whether it should be Confederation Day, Dominion of Canada Day, Canada Day, or whatever we agree on. I am prepared to vote for that because I think the importance of meaningful symbols, as we have spoken of them, cannot be underestimated.

Some years ago, Mr. Speaker, in this House the first Canadian governor general, the Right Hon. Vincent Massey, had these words about Canada:

> I believe in Canada, with pride in her past, belief in her present, and faith in her future.
> I believe in the quality of Canadian life, and in the character of Canadian institutions.
> I believe in the Commonwealth of Nations, within whose bounds we have found freedom, and outside which our national life would lose its independent being.
> I believe that Canada is one, and that if our minds dwell on those things which its parts have in common, we can find the unity of the whole.
> I believe that with sound work, the spirit of a team, and an awareness of ourselves, we can look forward to achievements beyond our imagining.

I believe what Vincent Massey was saying many decades ago about Canada is what the government and all members of this House wish for Canada: A team spirit, not a country divided. On this day, when there have been so many fitting comments made about the significance of Terry Fox for Canada, I think it is important to recognize that it was not the name Terry Fox that gave reality, it was the substance of what he did and what he stood for. He had a commitment to the betterment of this nation and to drawing Canadians together.

The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), in response to the minister, said that government advertising of Canada Day in a sense gets in the way of public acceptance. He went on to speak about what happens when government becomes the propagandist. He spoke about the symbols of national unity, how they should come from the people, and that we should be using here the evolutionary principle. He mentioned the experience of a number of countries in this area. I want to suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that in offering my observations to the government about timing and direction, I speak with some experience, having been involved in directing the Canadian centennial and mobilizing the spirit there. I speak with some experience as the executive director of the Manitoba centennial, drawing Canadians of that province, indeed all Canadians to celebrate with them. I speak with the experience of a consultant to the government of Prince Edward Island on their centennial. The success of our Canadian centennial and the provincial centennials was not in the fact we proclaimed a day of celebration or a day of special meaning. It was in the fact that there was some content which involved the people themselves. The Waterloo region from which I come has often been referred to as Canada in microcosm. While this phrase has often been used to describe the diversity of the economy of the area, from farming and livestock production to electronics and rubber manufacturing, it is even more fitting to think of the various ethnic backgrounds from which we in the Waterloo area have come as representative of the rich multicultural heritage of Canada.

On July 1, this national day, our area is as proud as are all Canadians to state that we stand on guard for Canada. When we hear so often lately that Canada is facing a struggle between its regions, we should remember that when our forefathers left their various homes it was to come to Canada. They did not come to one town. They did not come to one province. They left for Canada. In recent overseas consultation and during the five years I lived in West Africa, I have repeatedly sensed how desirable Canada is to people from around the world.

When they speak of Canada, they speak of freedom, of opportunity and of justice. Despite the rhetoric of hon. members opposite, I have yet to hear references to colonial status. This may be helpful in relation to the political problems in the province of Quebec, but let us be honest in relation to Canada's image in the world. This is a domestic political issue, not one which relates to Canada's image in the world.

Those who came to Canada came to a young country which offered opportunities to pursue goals, aspirations and freedom. This vision continues to attract people to Canada from many different lands. Canada is people. It is the multicultural character of our country that distinguishes us from our neighbours south of the border, to which the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) alluded this afternoon, and other Anglophone countries around the world. Interestingly enough, in the Kitchener-Waterloo area over 100 multicultural groups are listed. They have organized themselves to remind us of their unique contribution.

On Sunday the heritage of our region was extended by the welcoming of an additional 43 new Canadians from 19 countries at a special sitting of the court of Canadian citizenship. Sunday was also proclaimed in the region which I represent as multicultural day by the mayors of Waterloo, Kitchener and Cambridge. Also it marked the tenth anniversary of distrust of the Canadian government. The citizenship court was closed with a performance by a multicultural choir. That same choir had performed at the Waterloo city council meeting which I addressed last Monday. That meeting opened the Canada week celebrations.

The weekend before last saw the occasion of the tenth festival of the Kitchener-Waterloo Portuguese community. This was celebrated by an open-air mass, followed by dinner and dance. There are now some 3,000 members of the KW Portuguese Association. In light of the changing nature of Canada, there are some 12,000 Portuguese in Cambridge and 6,000 in Kitchener-Waterloo, or close to 18,000 Portuguese in the Waterloo region alone.

The contributions of people of different ethnic backgrounds go far beyond the entertainment novelty of song and dance. Our regional economy shows very clearly the benefits of new ways of manufacturing products, of growing things and of creating things with our hands; new ways of communicating, dressing and worshipping. We have benefited from new trade relations with other countries. These have resulted in more markets for our products and the communication of new technologies to better serve those expanded markets. This edge to our technological innovation has become part of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I wonder if I might ask the hon. member to try to direct his remarks to the bill to change the name of July 1 from Dominion Day to Canada Day.

Mr. McLean: The remarks of the minister very clearly suggested the importance of this change to the province of Quebec and its political developments.

I am suggesting that in the Waterloo region I represent there is a unique multicultural background which needs to be understood very clearly by the government. The process of consultation for which we on this side are calling is related directly to why the amendment ought to be supported.

Mr. Fox: Be serious.

Mr. McLean: I am very serious. If we are looking at human dynamics and acceptance, not another propaganda tool, we on this side of the House want to be able to vote on the amendment which was brought in to such an important issue as this.

Mr. Fox: At least the mayor of Waterloo had the guts to call it multicultural day. You do not even have the guts to call it Canada Day.

Mr. McLean: The hon. minister says that I do not have the guts—

Mr. Fox: That is right.

Mr. McLean: The hon. minister may indicate by what he does. I am prepared to let my own actions in relation to Canada and my service to the nation stand with his at any point.

As our young people enter the job market with more internationalized education as the result of this multicultural reality, the country as a whole is able to look forward to a stronger economy and a more understanding society. This is not the only reality or the only factor to be represented in my riding in relation to a change such as this. Approximately 32 per cent of the Waterloo riding is German-speaking. I am not one who comes out of a riding deeply concerned about the question of the imagery of the word dominion. I come out of a riding with a multicultural background. The people of my riding ought to be consulted about what are meaningful words to them. It was not this wording which brought them to Canada; it was the hope for a sense of freedom and a sense of justice. Just as other countries have used these words, it may well be that one of these words will be one which they feel will echo the day of celebration in Canada we all want to experience.

The government is bringing forward this piece of legislation and asking for it to be rushed through. It has now been a year since it was introduced, and on the eve of July 1 we are told that it must go through. I remind the government that there are people in the Mennonite culture in my riding who have a deep suspicion of government. Many of them will not even vote. Their tradition is far different, and they are very suspicious about government at the best of times. I want to indicate a little of that cultural background. As the government moves in this direction, let it be sensitive to the fact that these groups need to be heard. We are suggesting that within the next year, or until July 1 comes again, let us have these people and their input fully on board.

One Mennonite group which is part of the many divisions in the Waterloo riding is the Old Order Mennonites. They have been an object of growing interest in recent years because of their nineteenth century style of dress, their buggies and their stubborn refusal to accept the universal comforts of the twentieth century technology. We could talk a little about what they bring to Canada in terms of their sense of work and their concerns for values and family. As both religious and social non-conformists, an article recently by Gerald Levitch—

Mr. Fox: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We all know and appreciate and are all delighted by the great input which many people from various lands have made to this country. As the minister responsible for citizenship, I am well aware of this. But the hon. member for Waterloo knows that the subject under discussion this evening is whether or not Parliament should change the name Dominion Day to Canada Day. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we should stay with the subject in order that we can make some progress, the type of progress the hon. member indicates he so much desires.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have already indicated to the hon. member for Waterloo that the Chair is having some difficulty with the manner in which he is proceeding. However, the hon. member for Waterloo has proposed that consultation might be an important part of the name changing process. The Chair would be relieved and grateful if the hon. member for Waterloo could try to bring his remarks closer to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. McLean: Mr. Speaker, I make no apologies for my comments. What I am suggesting is that the intent of bringing Canada closer together is that the parts of Canada identify with the action which is being taken. With all due respect to the minister, the concerns with regard to the urgency for the province of Quebec that this change be made in the next 24 or 48 hours, in light of the massive Jean Baptiste Day celebrations, and in light of other matters which the government may have on its agenda, are not the burning concerns of the citizens of the riding of Waterloo, which I have the honour to represent.

What I am trying to suggest is that in my riding it is not any one group which I can singly represent but there is a multicultural reality. In my riding there are people of German background and there is a Mennonite group. All of the different groups in my riding have a varying degree of suspicion about government motivation.

As I have tried to suggest to the minister before, I am sympathetic. I have been working as a civil servant for the government on behalf of Canada in national celebrations. I understand something about community motivation. For the minister to suggest that somehow these topics are not related to the direction in which government is headed is, it seems to me, a disservice to the motivation which we want, that Canadians identify with it, not as a government initiative but as a Canadian initiative.

I believe that the amendment to the bill which has been put forward by the Official Opposition which suggests that those involved, the people of Canada, be consulted, is far from irresponsible. Again, what we have is an illustration that what is fit for the government is good for the nation. I believe that Parliament must provide an opportunity for other opinions to be heard and that the government must be sensitized about the type of initiatives which are taking place.

I also want to suggest that it is not by accident that The Globe and Mail is able today to publish a full-page supplement with a picture of Prince Charles on it. There is another sector in Canada which feels, rightly or wrongly, that in the government's initiative there is an effort to downplay the role of the monarchy. In my riding are towns such as New Dundee, and Ayr, and others which remind one of where those settlers came from.

Therefore, I am suggesting that in a riding with a diverse ethnic background, the amendment proposed by the Official Opposition is not irresponsible. It does not go against Canada. What we are saying is: What can we do in the next 24 or 36 hours by changing the name? By finding a name which is acceptable after consultation, we would make it a name which would not cause division but one which is agreed upon and which will be accepted by this House unanimously.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. At this point in time I doubt very much if there will be enough time for many of us to participate in this debate. Thus, having been involved in student activities with the hon. member opposite, would he allow me a very short question at this time concerning something which is of great concern to me, particularly when he talks about having a committee study the subject matter of this bill?

Mr. McLean: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Prud'homme: I thank the hon. member for his courtesy. Does the hon. member sincerely believe—and I know he is very sincere when he speaks in this House—that today we would have a Canadian flag if that issue had gone to committee requesting all of the multicultural groups in Canada to appear before it and explain their views about a Canadian flag? Does the hon. member believe that today, 17 years later, we would have a flag if some leadership had not been shown at that time? My view is that we would never have had a Canadian flag if that situation had existed. I listened to all the speeches in 1964-65 on the flag debate.

I want my question to be clear. Does the hon. member believe that we would have a flag today if Mr. Pearson had not shown some leadership in asking the House to decide that matter?

Mr. McLean: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Saint-Denis for his question. I believe it is a question which deserves addressing, since the argument has been put forward a number of times that what we are trying to do through our amendment is avoid the bitterness which came about as a result of the flag debate. I would like to tell the hon. member that there was a committee which dealt with the flag issue. That committee proposed recommendations regarding the subject. I will be the first to propose that we deal with this matter by next year. I am not saying that we should talk it out in perpetuity. I concur with the hon. member.

My intention is that we do not become divided over this issue and that we take human nature seriously. That is to say that if the government, which is now involved in a heavy advertising campaign, moves heavy-handedly with this legislation, without a committee which can hear the concerns of Canadians, then this will continue to divide Canadians. I happen to believe that many people in Canada may well concur with the government on this issue. As the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) was saying earlier today, some may say, "Let us give some honour to this matter in history". Some people may want to call the day Dominion of Canada Day, which may be shortened to Canada Day. Others may want to call it Confederation Day. I believe that we all want to be together on this issue, as we were on the issue of "O Canada". We want to be together in such a way that we may influence the future.

When I was an alderman in the city of Waterloo I served as chairman of community services. It was my responsibility to organize a special observance for Canada week. We drew together some 5,000 young people from kindergarten to grade eight in the Seagram's stadium. We were able to rehearse in song and in word the history of Canada. I would like to know that the educational leaders of our country are prepared to welcome this change, and not on 24 hours notice. I would like to know that the churches of the country are together on this issue. I would like to know that the multicultural groups have been consulted. The hon. member opposite is right when he says that there is no guarantee that we will reach a 100 per cent agreement. But, after all, Parliament is about process. This country operates on consensus. The matters which have come out of the constitutional discussion and the times when we are most deeply divided are the times when we stop listening to each other. I suggest that there are instruments across this country which can clothe the government's proposals with meaning. The proposal put forward by this party is not an obstructive one, nor is it un-Canadian. In fact, looking back a decade later in history, it may be seen that we can avoid the bitterness which was a part of the flag debate.

I want to thank Your Honour for your courtesy, and I want to thank hon. members of the House for their attention. I want to suggest that in supporting the concept of officially identifying July 1 as Canada Day or the Dominion of Canada Day or Confederation Day, or whatever we decide, that we hold to the evolutionary concept and principle and that we consult in a way which can draw us together as a nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): I thank your Honour for recognizing me and giving me a chance to speak in this debate. In answer to some of the points that the member of Parliament for Waterloo (Mr. McLean) raised I would point out that this is not exactly what one would call a precipitous debate to change the name of Dominion Day to Canada Day. I can recall that on November 30, 1978, a similar motion was raised by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) who also proposed that this matter be sent to committee. I would point out to the hon. member for Waterloo that his suggestion of sending this bill to a committee for study is exactly what we are trying to do. After all, we are on the second reading of this bill. If we bring this to a vote, if the opposition will permit it to come to a vote, I would suggest that we could very well send it to committee, and these studies he is talking about could very well take place.

As to the point that changing the name from Dominion Day to Canada Day is some kind of propaganda, how can we possibly think that the word "Canada" is propagandist? My God, it is the name of our country. Since when, if we give the name of our country to any day or any act, does that become propaganda? Are we not all, all of us, Canadians in this House? Are we not all Canadians first?

Some time ago I had occasion to represent in Japan the minister of fitness and amateur sport. I would simply point out that, notwithstanding the fact that our nation is made up of many cultures, when those athletes were outside the country they were Canadians, very simply, Canadians; no more, but surely no less.

The hon. member from Quebec made reference a little earlier to the flag, and he raised the question as to whether we would have the flag today, whether we would indeed be blessed with the flag we have now or would we have the flag that we had some time ago. I would suggest to all hon. members that however acrimonious and bitter the debate was at the time, surely the flag is one of the symbols which unites us today. Surely there is not a Canadian who travels anywhere within Canada or outside of Canada who does not have that feeling of pride when he sees his own flag, our very own. It took us 98 years to finally get that most elementary symbol to all sovereign countries.

I think sport does unite us. Because of this, when our athletes travel abroad, they are simply known as Canadians. It does not matter from which ethnic background they come. They perform for us, for a nation as a whole. I do not in any way downgrade or take away from any cultural group here in Canada; but by the same token, it should be said that all of these people, if they chose Canada first, if they came from another country, they chose us. They chose this blessed land. They want to be known first and foremost as Canadians. No one ever said that they would be deprived of their culture. No one ever said that they had to give up their particular language or customs. On the contrary, we believe that because of this diversity, we are stronger, and not only stronger but surely we are more colourful as a nation in the sense that we can share our differences with one another. In that sense, we are very much richer.

Perhaps the House would be interested to know that notwithstanding the great loss we have felt in the last few days, having lost, I would say, not only one of our foremost athletes, in the sense that he had the great heart of an athlete, but probably one of our foremost heroes since we have become a nation, there are other young people who are in the mold of Terry Fox. This noon hour I took part in a ceremony in honour of a young chap called Steve Maaslain, a cyclist. He left here to bicycle all across the North American continent. I know that when he went from place to place, what he took with him was the symbol of our country. Wherever he went, he was known as a Canadian. He came home to celebrate with us what most of us now call Canada Day and what we would like to call officially Canada Day.

We are in the process of going through these growing pains, but for how long? How long must we go through these growing pains before we can become what we really are? For those of us who have no other culture, as it were, who come from no other country, for people like myself, who were born and raised here in Canada, who went to school here, live here and, God willing, will die in this country, our country is Canada. This is the beginning and the end for us. This is ours. We do not come from England or France or Hungary or Italy. We come from here. The people who come over to this country take on, I guess, the blessings of the country which is here, which is ours, the country where we were born; yet, in spite of all this, cannot call July 1 Canada Day. We cannot bring a bill in this House of Commons so that we can call this celebration what it is. It is our birthday. It is the birthday of this country. It is the birthday of Canadians. I for one am anxiously awaiting the day when once more, or at last, we will have one more symbol to call our own.

Your Honour is aware, as you have heard other hon. members say, that it was not until 1946 that we established Canadian citizenship. We had to wait until 1946 for that, only then could we call ourselves Canadians, Canadians first. It was not until 1965 that we had that flag which stands beside Your Honour. In 1980, at long last, we could have a song to sing which was ours, not borrowed from someone else, not written some place else, but written by one of our own Canadians here in this country. Now, in 1981, will we be fortunate enough to at last have Canada Day proclaimed?

I do not in any way fault the opposition. I do not fault them for raising a different point of view; but from what I have heard from the hon. members who have spoken from the other side, it would seem to me that we are not at cross purposes. What they seem to want to do is to put off, for a little bit longer, calling the day, which is rightly our own, by its right name, Canada Day.

I do not in any way downgrade the fact many Canadians served in the armed forces and served their country, but I do take exception when the hon. member for Waterloo suggests that in his own way our Minister of State (Mr. Fox) does not contribute to the well-being of Canada.

Surely all of us here in this House who serve our country as best we can, and love our country, would one day like to have this feast, this birthday, celebrated for what it truly is, a day for Canadians, proclaimed by Canadians, and celebrated with open hearts and great joy by all of us who call ourselves Canadians first. Of course, I refer to Canada Day. I encourage all hon. members on all sides to support this bill, to give it second reading, to send it to committee, if necessary, and then on its return to pass it into law so that we can have what is rightfully ours.

• (2100)

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I will not take a great deal of time. I have been listening to the debate trying to make up my mind whether to support this bill or whether to support the opposition's viewpoint. After a great deal of thought I came to the conclusion that I should support the bill. I want to tell you why.

Yesterday I spent all afternoon at a multicultural gathering in Gage Park in the city of Hamilton. I took part in the opening ceremonies. I shared the platform with the mayor and with members of the legislature. I brought greetings from my colleagues, who asked me to do so, the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott) and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hudecki), and I brought greetings from other parts of the area. I toured the many exhibitions which were representative, I think, of every ethnic community in the city of Hamilton. I do not want to go through them all because undoubtedly I will miss some. However, I saw representatives of every conceivable group which had come to Canada to settle, to make a home here to contribute to the lifestyle and to the future of our country. I talked with them, I tasted their food, I watched their dancing and I listened to their music.

In each and every case people referred to the celebration of this coming Wednesday as a celebration of Canada Day. As I listened to the debate, I thought I had probably conducted my committee hearing, that I had probably already heard from the people I represent. The tens of thousands of those people who were in the park were there enjoying themselves and most of them, I suspect, were native born Canadians. Many of the ethnic representatives, the younger people who were the prince and the queen, or the two male and female representatives of the ethnic communities, almost without exception, I think were native born Canadian. All of them were dressed in the costume of the land of their forefathers, displaying here in Canada the culture of their land.

If all hon. members, at least those who have been in politics for a while, were to stop and think about the number of such occasions they have attended over the course of the last few years, they would reach the same conclusion I have, that calling our national holiday Canada Day does make a lot of sense.

There is nothing wrong with Dominion Day and I object to the inference that somehow or other we are casting off our ties with Great Britain as a result of this change. I do not think we are. Dominion Day, as has been well put by a number of speakers, is not a reflection of colonial ties at all. It never was intended to be. It cannot be and it must not be allowed to be portrayed as that. Therefore, to change from Dominion Day as in Dominion of Canada, to Canada Day the name of our holiday on the first day of July really is not to be considered by anyone as a betrayal of the historical significance of the choice of the name of the day some one hundred years ago.

I think we do a lot of people a disservice by trying to leave an impression on either side of the House—or on any side of the House if you consider this to be a separate side—that there is in anyone's mind the intention to cut off the long and traditional ties we have enjoyed.

It is important, when making decisions about the future, to learn from the past. The past is there from which we can all learn. One thing is very clear about the past. We have had a lot of difficulty in making decisions in favour of Canada. We have always had conflict whenever there was a decision to be made in terms of the future of the country. We have gone through a very difficult and divisive debate in the House of Commons over the Constitution. I say that only because I think it has served the country ill in the way the debate was carried out. I was distressed by it.

I have travelled across the country many times. I returned from Vancouver last Saturday and I say to my colleague from Vancouver that what interested me on my way home to Hamilton to take part in yesterday's ceremonies, was that the people in Vancouver were preparing for a similar celebration next Wednesday. I know from reading the newspapers that the very same celebration is being held in almost every major and minor centre all across the country, from coast to coast and from north to south.

What are we trying to do? We are trying to focus it a little more. We are trying to make sure that everyone understands what the holiday is all about. We are trying to make sure that every small child realizes, as he or she grows up, that on this day we are celebrating Canada's birthday. We are trying to make it easily understood and not confusing, so people do not have to dig into dictionaries to find our what Dominion Day means. Rather, they will be able to see at a glance that on July 1 we celebrate that together we are Canadians, all with a common purpose. Let me say to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is no time in Canada when the need is greater than at this time in our history to try to demonstrate that we have a common purpose, a common bond, that links us.

There is enough going on politically that is already dividing the country. Without going into detail, I want to tell you what has been of considerable concern to me in my year and four months, or whatever it is, since being elected to this House of Commons, as I have sat here and watched the degree of animosity and ongoing aggravation that exists within the House of Commons.

This celebration would be a good thing on which to join together. It would be a good thing for the three political parties in the House of Commons on which to reach an accord and for us to say to Canadians that although we may disagree on the price of oil or on certain aspects of the Constitution, we all agree on one thing, that on the day we have a holiday once a year to celebrate Canada's birthday, we will call it Canada Day and that the purpose of that day will be understood by each and everyone of us. It is to honour Canada. It is to honour what it has been, it is to honour what it is and it is to honour what it will become. It is to speak of the unity that exists and can exist within the country, although it is a country of great diversity. It is the one day when even those who come from parts of the world where there is even yet an armed conflict between the races, as well as each and every one of us, can go into the same park. We can all share together the happiness of being able to display our own particular and peculiar background and heritage. I must be careful how I say this lest I offend anyone, but I went to the dinner of this multicultural group I am speaking of about three weeks ago. On that evening they were choosing from among the male and female representatives six who would be the representatives of the multicultural organization.

As hon. members know, there has been considerable conflict in the Middle East. There, coming down the aisle was a young lady with her escort. An appropriate piece of music was being played as they came to the front to be introduced. Standing at the front was another young lady with her escort who came from another part of the same geographic area of the world. I can tell you now that the people in that part of the world are not getting along well at the moment. However, there they were standing and applauding the other young couple coming down the aisle. I turned to the people at the table with me and said to them, "there is hope for us yet; if we do not force them to fight, they will get along."

That is what that celebration was doing, pulling people together, people who had come to Canada from a variety of places. If they were living back in their home countries, they had in their souls the makings of conflict and discord, but they were living here. They consider themselves to be Canadians even though they represent their heritage. They were sharing in the happiness of that particular event without any sense of aggravation, hatred or distrust.

We in this House of Commons could learn something from that. Unfortunately, we were not all there. Obviously I do not have the time nor the ability to educate the entire Canadian population as to the real meaning of Dominion Day. My chances, and in fact the chances of all of us ever being able to do that are pretty slim. Since we are talking about the Dominion of Canada and since it is now well known that the first of July is the celebration of Canada's birthday, I cannot see any good reason, and I thought carefully about it, why we ought not to call it Canada Day.

It distresses me, and I say this more as an aside than as a main point, and I wonder at what point in the course of the next two or three years we will get around to dealing with some of the other important issues. This is very important, no doubt, in historical terms. The choice we will make over the next two or three days will be significant. However, I do not want anyone to get the wrong impression. This is not the matter that is uppermost in the minds of Canadians today. There are other things.

I received a letter from an elderly couple who were paying tribute to my good friend and colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and quite rightly so. Without him they would probably be living in even worse poverty than they are now forced to live in. They asked whether it would be possible for us to set aside an hour or two to talk about the problems of pensioners. When we think of Canada Day, we have to remember that without the effort of those people, there would not be a Canada for which to have a Canada Day.

I think we treat these people shamefully. It would serve us all well if we were to make a decision to get on with this, vote on it and do it. That is why we are sent here. We are not sent here to hold interminable committee meetings; we are sent here to make decisions. You win or lose on the strength of the decisions you have made.

If we could get on with voting on this, we might be able to devote a bit of time to some of the other very pressing, vexing and difficult problems. There will be little joy in the hearts of these individuals come Wednesday, no matter whether we call it Dominion Day or Canada Day, if they are forced to go through another year of existence on $5,851 between them. That is what aggravates me most about the House of Commons and worries me most about the debate. We can elevate anything to a matter of principle. We can create a conflict where no conflict need exist. We can artificially posture about the position we take for or against.

I happen to believe that we are all concerned about the future of Canada and that we are all equally dedicated to making it a better place. However, I worry when we get bogged down on issues that may in the long run not have any lasting benefit when we could have been dealing with matters which might just make life a little happier for a few people. As we found out over the weekend, life is not necessarily three score and ten. Life can end tomorrow morning for a lot of unsuspecting souls.

I have given a good deal of thought to the matter over the course of the debate. I listened to the arguments. I hope I have not defended the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday). Although I was not born in Canada, I think I have the right to at least make these representations. Some of what was said by certain members was very apropos. I think in particular that some of the comments by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Berger), the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean) and the hon. member for Oxford were very valuable as to the way in which this country has grown up. They talked of the tugs and pulls that exist within the various geographic segments of our country in addition to the difficulties faced by many who have had a long and involved stay in Canada, perhaps native people more than others, who have not been given a fair shake and maybe do not care whether it is Canada Day, Dominion Day, or anything else.

We have an opportunity to show some leadership. That leadership has to begin now. There can be no more procrastination, no more hiding behind idle rhetoric or posturing behind the traditional values that in fact never were values in the first place and are not traditional. I suggest to the parties, including my own, let us deal with this in a more common sense way. Let us take a real, serious look and let us make the change.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak briefly in this most symbolic debate—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Yes, gentlemen, it will be brief.

—this most symbolic debate as we approach Canada's 114th birthday, I want to congratulate speakers on all sides of this House on their very thoughtful interventions. I single out my friend for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) for his truly sincere remarks. My wife and I also treasure the "It's Your Day" celebrations in Gage Park. We will be there on July 1 to celebrate our 114th birthday. I will have something to say about that fascinating mosaic which makes Hamilton such a special place to represent.

I also want at the outset to associate myself wholeheartedly with the amendment posed by my colleague, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). The amendment to refer the subject matter of this bill to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture for detailed examination is not a mischievous, frivolous or delaying tactic.

An hon. Member: It is un-Canadian.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): It is not, as my friend from Waterloo said, un-Canadian. It is a direct and responsible attempt to allow the Parliament of Canada to hear the views of Canadians and to reflect them, and then take the best course of action for all Canadians now and in the future.

Dominion Day, Canada Day, The First of July, Confederation Day, who knows what Canadians feel about what to call the day after tomorrow? Does the government know? The government lives on and it swears by polls in everything else it does. What do the polls say about replacing such a cherished symbol as Dominion Day with Canada Day, or any other name? Does this government really know? I ask the minister to answer that.

I particularly wonder about the unconscionable short time the government is allowing us as representatives of the people to participate in steamrollering through something I believe is of profound importance to a great many people in this country. You do not ram through a change like this in two days, and in parliamentary terms that is five to seven hours.

I know what my Liberal friends who occasionally organize these sneaky exercises are thinking. I know because I asked a Liberal flat out: "Why are you organizing this sneaky exercise two days before our 114th birthday?" And the answer came back "Because we want to see if you guys are foolish enough to deny its passage". That was the answer I received. That may be Grit strategy, but it leaves a pretty gritty taste in the mouths of a lot of people when the government plays politics with people's emotions in a slap-dash way.

An hon. Member: On this particular issue.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Yes, on this particular issue.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) this afternoon suggested that we on this side seem to feel that people need to be marching in the streets before we are willing to recognize the need for a change. He further suggested something to the effect that we Canadians need not waste our time on old fashioned words from the past such as "dominion", and that these relics from the past might just as well be forgotten.

Let me turn to an authority on Canada who is known and greatly admired by all of us. Former Senator Eugene Forsey and I can and do disagree philosophically on many things, beginning with socialism and Pierre Elliott Trudeau. But there is one area in which Dr. Forsey's expertise is absolutely unparalleled, and that is his love for and knowledge of Canada.

Eugene Forsey is an unabashed supporter of Dominion Day as the designation for July 1, and it is on his very meaningful address delivered to the Men's and Women's Canadian Clubs of Edmonton in June, 1956, a quarter of a century ago this month, that I wish to base this portion of my remarks. Dr. Forsey was then director of research for the Canadian Labour Congress and he entitled his address "The Meaning of Dominion Day". It might interest some of Dr. Forsey's former soul mates to our left to know that he feels just as passionately this very day as he did then when he delivered his address 25 years ago. This is Dr. Forsey on Dominion Day:

> Dominion Day celebrates one of the greatest feats of modern history: the making of a new nation, and a new kind of nation, by a handful of people of differing origins, differing languages, differing creeds, differing histories and differing interests, and in the face of obstacles that might well have daunted the boldest and most resolute statesmen.

Those are the kind of people the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain and I have come to respect with their differing languages, differing creeds and differing histories. Dr. Forsey's address continues:

> Everything was against them. The country was huge; most of it was empty; the Americans were pressing in upon the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company, threatening to cut off the new Dominion from any expansion West or North. There was hardly any industry; manufactured goods came overwhelmingly from Britain, and to central Canada for five months of the year through American ports, so that at any moment the Americans could strangle the economic life of Ontario and Quebec.

Dr. Forsey called the Dominion of Canada "A Supreme Act of Faith". He said:

> Confederation was a supreme act of faith, faith that defied geography, defied economics, defied the "manifest destiny" of the Americans to rule the whole continent from the Rio Grande to the North Pole.
> Faith in what? In something beyond economics, beyond the material; faith that the British North American colonies had a heritage worth preserving, worth developing, worth paying an economic price for; faith that on this rock our people could build a great nation, part of a great Commonwealth.

He referred to the "Title of Our Country". He said:

> Both choices are enshrined in the word "Dominion" itself, the title which the Fathers gave our country, the title they wrote into the British North America Act, three times over. Where did that title come from, and what does it mean?
> The Fathers originally wanted to call the new nation "the Kingdom of Canada." But the Americans raised such a storm that the British government took fright, and insisted on something else. The Fathers for their part, insisted on something that would mark the new and higher status of the federation. Sir Leonard Tilley produced the solution, from the seventy-second psalm: "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth." His colleagues agreed; the Queen consented; and "Dominion" the new nation became.

That title was "a particularly happy choice" according to Dr. Forsey. He wrote:

> The title was a particularly happy one, for more reasons than one. First, and most obviously, it embodied the determination of the Fathers to bring into the Union all the British North American colonies from Newfoundland to British Columbia; "a mari usque ad mare," as our coat-of-arms says. It declared the "manifest destiny" of Canada to rule from the St. Lawrence to the North Pole.
> Second, and more important, it emphasized the religious basis of the new nation. Who was to have "dominion"? The King of Israel, the Lord's Anointed: the King, under God.
> Third, it proclaimed the basic fact of our two cultures. For "Dominion" is not Anglo-Saxon. It is an old French word which dropped out of use in French but was preserved in our English Bible and our English Book of Common Prayer.
> Fourth, it proclaimed, no less unmistakably, our new status. The French translation of "Dominion" is "Puissance," (Power): "Souveraineté," (Sovereignty); a far cry indeed from "province" or "colony," a foreshadowing of the independence to come. And it was so recognized at the time. It was meant, Lord Carnarvon told the Queen, just before the Act was passed, "to give greater dignity to the commencement of this great scheme." "Canada", said Edward Blake in 1876, "is not a colony or a province; she is a Dominion, under an Imperial charter which expressly recites that her Constitution is to be similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom."

I know that will upset some of my friends opposite, but that is the fact.

● (2130)

In terms of adherence to the monarchy, Dr. Forsey wrote:

> —"Dominion" as avowedly intended to assert Canada's adherence to something the Fathers considered no less important than national unity: the monarchy. "The North American delegates are anxious," Carnarvon told the Queen, "that the United Provinces should be designated as 'the Dominion of Canada.' It is a new title but intended on their part as a tribute to the Monarchical principle, which they earnestly desire to uphold."

Dr. Forsey also said:

> Finally, the title "Dominion" . . . does not stand alone: Canada is to be not just a "Dominion", nor even a Dominion under the British Crown, but a Dominion with "a Constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom." In other words, the title "Dominion" is the seal upon our priceless heritage of British parliamentary responsible government.

In terms of membership in the Commonwealth, which is a very important thing to this Parliament and certainly to the government which this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) leads, Dr. Forsey concludes as follows:

> What is the—

Other.

—thing that makes Canada unique among American nations? Our membership in the Commonwealth, that world-wide free association of free nations which we have done so much to create, which Sir John A. Macdonald foresaw and sketched as long ago as 1865, whose corner-stone he laid on the first Dominion Day, and towards whose completion he worked with unexampled skill, patience and courage. This also is part of the meaning of Dominion Day. This also we ought to celebrate, with full and thankful hearts.

The Fathers of Confederation laboured, and we have entered into their labours; not just the fruits of their labours: their labours.

Dr. Forsey concluded by quoting a former Canadian prime minister.

What they built, we must work to keep and enlarge. We can do it, but only if, in the words of that great master of our English speech, Arthur Meighen, we remain "conscious of our mighty heritage, proud of the Imperial fountain of our freedom and of the flag that floats above us, worthy of those ideals of British liberty and justice which have sent their light forth and their truth among all races of men."

The former senator, Dr. Eugene Forsey, is a man for whom I have great respect and to whom many Canadians look for advice and wisdom in terms of how this country should evolve. I should point out that former Senator Forsey was appointed, by the present Prime Minister, a senator on the government side.

Speaking personally, I have no real problem with changing the name from Dominion Day to Canada Day. While I do have a sense of history about my country, I also realize the need to update and to bring into the twentieth century phrases, customs and even designations of official holidays. Whatever significance the word Dominion held for Sir Leonard Tilley, I must confess I could never sell it to my nine-year old son. Indeed, just before rising to speak in this debate I called the youngest member of the Scott household and asked, "What do you and your friends call July 1?" Liam answered, "Well, most people call it 'Dominion Day'. I don't know why they call it 'Dominion Day', but I don't want to be an oddball, so I call it that too". Then he added, "I think 'Canada Day' would sound better. 'Dominion Day' sounds like a store". Sometimes you have to climb inside the mind of a nine-year old to gain a proper perspective on these great matters of state.

To many Canadians perhaps it is a typical attitude: who cares about changing the name? Maybe it makes sense. After all, everything official now is being done in the name of Canada. Why the fuss about forgetting about the word "dominion", which has gone out of usage anyway? Why is everyone getting upset about embarking on the Canada Day route which is becoming generally accepted?

A great many Canadians have long argued, and will continue to argue, a very eloquent case on behalf of the status quo. So what if the multitudes do not care one way or the other about changing the name of July 1? Why should this government automatically interpret a quiescent public opinion or a seeming non-caring public attitude as being in favour of change? Who has asked the people of Canada if they want to see an official name change for this day? Has this government done anything more than fill the airwaves with Canada Day propaganda, for which all Canadian taxpayers will have to pay regardless of their views about getting rid of the Dominion Day designation for July 1?

This brings me to my own deep suspicion about this government's motives in bringing this measure before Parliament a scant two days before Canada celebrates its 114th birthday on the famous first of July. I know it sounds slightly crazy to ask "What's the rush" after more than half a century of trying to break our colonial ties with the mother country, and that is a legitimate point of view which is held by some or, indeed, probably many members of this House, but why should this government feel that it should always fly in the face of public opinion or carry on regardless, and change things? Again I ask, what's the rush? Why the attempt to steamroller this change through in two days? It is my firm conviction that we should not change unless we have a rough idea of what we are doing and why we are doing it.

That brings me to what my great and good friend, Senator Forsey, calls "one of these fancy Grit tricks". He and I agree on one point: the reason the government wants to change Dominion Day to Canada Day is that it apparently has the idea it will go over big in Quebec. Dr. Forsey could not be more succinct or correct when he says, "It won't make two hoots of a difference in Quebec".

The fact of life all Canadians must face is that the word "dominion" formed part of a solemn commitment on the part of those men who formed Canada. In Atlantic Canada, for example, there were three colonies back in 1864. The idea of a dominion was part of a bargain to bring the original partners into this confederation. It was a fine concept. It was wonderful craftsmanship. But it was a firm bargain that made it possible for the colonies to give up their separate and distinct identities and become the nucleus of what we know today as Canada.

Has the federal government consulted the governments and the people of the original partners of confederation? Has this administration received any feedback from those Canadians whose forefathers were most intimately involved in the unique Dominion of Canada partnership we will celebrate the day after tomorrow? Has the government checked with those original partners, or is this government simply barging ahead in its customary fashion and not consulting the people or the people's representatives in the manner suggested by my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton? What could be wrong with hearing from concerned Canadians about the advisability of this change before an appropriate parliamentary committee? Is that not what Parliament is for? Is that not why we are here, to reflect the views of the people?

I promised the minister I would be brief. In closing, I ask the government in a spirit of reason: if you are going to make such a major change, in the view of so many Canadians who hold the history and tradition of this nation so dear to their hearts, why in the name of heaven must you spring this particular change on us in just a few short hours? Should Canadians not be given the chance to be heard on this issue, not through a snap vote here in the House of Commons but through us as their elected representatives in considered discussion in an appropriate committee?

I am asking that the government give us a few extra weeks or months and then, come our 115th birthday, a year and two days from now, we Canadians may very well have something to celebrate: The Dominion of Canada Day.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? In view of his concern that time be taken on this issue, can he tell us how long his party took to change its name from Conservative party to Progressive Conservative party?

• (2140)

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, you have been admonishing members of this House all evening about irrelevancies in terms of this bill. That is the most irrelevant question I can imagine. How long? As long as the Canadian people feel they need to register their impressions and viewpoints to the parliamentary committee we are asking this bill be sent to.

Mr. Knowles: Your party took two days in 1942.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, today is June 29 and the House is studying a bill. I was unable to be here for the debates this afternoon because I played host to 100 young Canadians of Greek origin in my Montreal riding, young girls and young boys who belong to the Canadian Guide and Scout associations. I was so convinced that there would be no debate that I was quite surprised at supper time, when I was coming back to the House, to learn from the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) that there is opposition to the bill. I could not believe it so I decided to go to the House even though I am not supposed to be here this evening. I want to try to explain a few points on this question which is very important to me, but does not seem to be to others. In fact, when the subject is Canada it is the motivation of all of my political life. That is why I came to the House of Commons in 1964, not to defend the past but to build a future for this country and try to play an active role.

[English]

As I was saying, this is my greatest motivation. That is why I came here in 1964, not to defend continuously what took place in the past, even though it was right at that time. I came here in the hope that together, the opposition and the government, the west and the east, those who speak French and those who speak English, we could, not defend national unity but build national unity. That is what I was doing this afternoon with these young students from my district, Boy Scouts and Girl Guides. I was telling them what Canada is all about, because they are new Canadians, the first generation born Canadians. Their parents were born somewhere else.

They said: What is Canada, what is Canada's part? So I explained that Canada is one of the most beautiful lands in the world. It has had evolution, not revolution. We started as a French colony, then we became a British colony, then we became a semi-colonial country. Then slowly, gradually, we became a country, proud of being independent. In 1933, I believe, we abolished appeals to the committee of the Privy Council on criminal matters. In 1949, at the same time Newfoundland joined Canada, we also abolished appeals on civil matters to the House of Lords. And then gradually we arrived at the issue of a Canadian flag. I have the honour, Mr. Speaker, of being a freshman member in 1964, and of course I dutifully, as I still do today, listened to every speech made about my Canadian flag.

I do not say we have a monopoly on Canadianization. You know where I stand; my friends know I have tried not to divide people on these emotional issues. However, the facts are there. The facts are that in 1964 everyone said it is too soon, let things evolve, let us wait. You are going to divide the people forever. I went to speak over and over again in western Canada and, contrary to those who said we would divide the country in two, I discovered those who adjusted the fastest to the Canadian flag were the westerners.

I see members and colleagues, friends of mine who are still in the House, who I think in their conscience thought they should oppose this. I do not disagree with that, it is something for debate. They opposed the Canadian flag because they thought it would divide the country. And yet a few years later I saw the same members—whom I could name, but we do not embarrass our colleagues—distributing with happiness these little flags the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) has not provided in sufficient numbers to members of Parliament. They were distributing these little Canadian pins to the young new Canadians. I would like my friend, the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott), my distinguished travelling companion, to listen to his son more than his own feelings because I know he wants Canada Day. At least that is what I gather from his speech. He should listen to his son who said: I would prefer Canada Day.

My good and distinguished colleague, and I always refer to him that way, the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday), told us there are only two or three countries that call their national day by their name. He is right. However, I may say to my friend that there are not many countries that have gained their independence the way we did in Canada in 1867. Most of them call it by the day that marked their revolution. If we in Canada had listened to everybody, we would never have had 1867. Why did Cartier and Macdonald go ahead in 1867? There were people at that time who said—read the record—it is too soon; Let us take time; We do not want it. However, they showed leadership, and we have Confederation. That served very well Canadians of that time and is still serving Canadians of this time.

I am a defender of confederation, but I know it is because of the multitude, thank God, of other Canadians who came to this land to help it grow and become more universal, that we have this Canada of today. Look at the evolution of Canada from 1867. Look at the significant events that took place since that date. You come to 1933, 1945, and 1949. Then we have the famous flag debate. After that you arrive at something that I participated in called the Special Joint Committee of the House and Senate on the National Anthem.

[Translation]

In 1965, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Mr. Pearson decided that we would have a national anthem. A committee was set up and we sat on that committee. I am one of the last survivors of that committee still in the House. I sat on that committee with my colleague, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). We agreed that "O Canada" should become our national anthem. Some people were saying: But not now! It is too early! It is premature! Do people know how much time it took us? It was proclaimed in 1980! Frankly, dear colleagues, I think we have been very patient.

Today we are presenting something new, according to certain members. But it is not new. Since 1968, 22 bills on that subject have been introduced by members who are anxious to acknowledge that this holiday, our anniversary, is the anniversary of all Canadians and to call it by its name—Canada Day. Since 1968!

[English]

I would probably side, as I do sometimes, with hon. members of the opposition if I thought we are rushing too fast or that it should not take place. I may vote in one way, but sometimes I reflect and say that perhaps we should think a little more. That is not the case in this regard. I would have gone to the Secretary of State and asked, "Why do you not accept the proposed delay?", if he had arrived tonight with a special surprise for the House of Commons to celebrate the 114 years of what we know Canada to be. He is not taking us by surprise. It has been going on and on since 1968. I repeat that we would have had time. We did not see any march or demonstrations in the street, thank God. People know that this matter is being discussed in the House; they could have talked about it. We have not had delegations of people who want to be heard. If we had done what was suggested, if we had had another committee looking at it, there would have never been a Canadian flag.

Is it not time to realize that when we talk about such subject matters, it is fine to be emotional. Canada is an emotional thing for me. It is fine, when we talk about Canada, to quote such people as my dear good friend, Senator Forsey, as was done by my hon. friend from Hamilton. But whom did he keep quoting? I want to be clear. That is why I am speaking more in English than in French tonight. I want to be clearly understood in what I have to say. It has nothing to do with being anti-English or anti-French or a fight between the two. It would be a denial of my entire life if hon. members thought otherwise. Whom did he quote? He quoted lord so-and-so and sir so-and-so. He quoted the Bible. I am a religious person and a believer, but I do not see the relevancy. Is it not anti-Bible to rise and quote the Bible when talking about Canada? Sure, it is in the Bible, but it does not say that because it is a quote from the Bible we cannot follow our inclinations for Canada, that is, to make it better known and accepted as such. They talked about the United Kingdom and what took place in 1867. They talked about the monarchy. They talked about the dominion. Again they talked about sir so-and-so.

Let us build Canada now for the people of tomorrow irrespective of the people of yesterday. We must respect them, but if we always go back and say, "Yesterday they said that, accordingly we should not move today", I do not know the kind of Canada we would have. If Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George Etienne Cartier would have had the same kind of attitude, I can tell my good colleagues from British Columbia and everywhere else that we would not be celebrating our one hundred and fourteenth anniversary. But they were people who said it was best for a group of people who lived on a piece of land, which is now called Canada, that we have confederation. Then Mr. Pearson knew that it was best for Canada, knowing that it was divisive and passionate, to have a national anthem. It was best for the future of young Canadians to have a Canadian flag, and soon they will have a Constitution. I agree that we in the country may disagree on the way it is being done. This is debatable, but one matter which is not debatable is the fact that we want a Constitution in Canada, done by Canadians and amended by Canadians. This is a step in the right direction. It is true Canadianization. There is nothing anti-British or anti-monarchy in that. It is just a cold Canadian fact of life.

I should like to call upon my dear colleague, the House leader of the Official Opposition. Perhaps he would like to withdraw his amendment—he knows I am sincere—and accept the fact that we should send the bill to committee. I hope the Secretary of State is listening in case I am making a mistake; I am almost making a proposal for him. I have a few minutes left; I do not want to speak last. Perhaps the hon. member should withdraw his amendment and not send the subject matter to committee after second reading, but send the bill itself. It will not be passed by July 1. Then the point of the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean) would be answered, as well as the point of the hon. member from Hamilton who said, "Let's have a committee; let's have this and that." At least we would have second reading tonight and it would be sent to committee.

I am sure the hon. Secretary of State would accept it, knowing that we will not get the bill by July 1. I am asking the Secretary of State to accept my proposal to the opposition. I hope we will stop being afraid for the future of the country. Of course we should respect the past, but we should build together and defend national unity. I ask hon. members to build national unity. I do not mean to suggest that they are anti-Canadian or non-Canadian; I never want to be quoted as saying such.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in the two or three minutes remaining in the debate I want to make it clear that while I appreciate, fully understand and accept the sincerity of the words of the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) who just sat down, I question this debate being brought on now on June 29, 1981, when the bill was introduced on June 19, 1980. We have had a whole year in which to consider this bill, but no, they must spring it on us.

The first time I heard about the bill was within the last couple of weeks. I heard that if the government could get a guarantee that it would pass through all stages with one speaker per side, then it would go through. Fine, it would be brought forward. If not, it would go on the back burner.

Mr. Collenette: That is not true.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): That is the way I heard the arrangements. This was the first part of the arrangements. Therefore, I am triply suspicious of the government's intentions. This is the third time in a fortnight when matters of this sort have been sprung upon us in a most extraordinary way.

The first occasion was approximately two weeks ago when out of the blue the government, for the second time in a decade, decided to have a debate on foreign affairs. We know what the government was doing. It was marking time because it was awaiting a ruling from the Supreme Court of Canada. The second time was when we dealt with CALURA. It was just a filler because the government was pulled up short on some of its estimates and realized it was in deep trouble. This time it is partly that and partly the fact the government is still floundering around, trying to make up its mind on how to deal with the $1.2 billion it was attempting to get illegally out of the House without anyone noticing it. Thank goodness someone noticed it. The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) managed to bring it forward.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Why is the hon. member talking about $1.2 billion when he is supposed to be talking about Dominion Day becoming Canada Day? That is the type of discussion Canadians expect us to have at this time, not to talk about the budget.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether I could direct a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council. Could he confirm the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Collenette: There will be at least three bills brought forward tomorrow. They are the ones which were introduced today. I believe their numbers are C-77, C-76 and C-75, in that order. At any rate, they are the three bills standing in the name of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, in the reverse order of the way they were presented this afternoon upon introduction.

If we make progress on those three bills, I am sure we could proceed with the other bills which were introduced today. They cover those items in the estimates which were deleted by Madam Speaker about ten days ago.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We are anxious to co-operate with the government with respect to this legislation. Will the parliamentary secretary be in a position tomorrow to give me the exact order of the legislation with which the government intends to proceed? I am sure we can expedite the passage of that legislation.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure of the exact order. I do not have the exact numbers assigned; but perhaps the Table officials can help us out with this matter. It will definitely be the three bills standing in the name of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, not in the order introduced today but in reverse order. I believe they have been assigned the numbers C-77, C-76 and C-75. We will deal with those three bills in that order. Then perhaps we will proceed to the bill standing in the name of the Minister of Agriculture. That has not been determined at this time. We will advise the parties tomorrow morning through the normal channels.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions with regard to this matter. I believe the order is C-77, C-75 and C-76.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EMPLOYMENT—SUMMER WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF APPLICATION DATE DEADLINE—DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Government of Canada can afford to spend tens of millions of dollars on the advertising of those aspects of government policy which it wishes to sell to the public, it seems incredible to me that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) would suggest to me on April 3 that I, or any other member of Parliament, should be responsible for advertising the student employment program of this government. Perhaps the Minister of Employment and Immigration is not on good terms with the minister for propaganda. In that case, I recommend that he seek reconciliation prior to any program for winter employment so that Canada as a whole might be properly informed.

In a rural constituency it is virtually impossible to have any knowledge of all the people who might wish to apply for projects under make-work programs. If moneys are to be spent for advertising the various departments, it is imperative that some of it be spent for the general information of the public in a program which can mean so much to the small towns, villages and rural communities of Canada. At this particular time it would be interesting to know what the program for the winter is to be. What will be its name? What class of project will be eligible, and will there be any circulation of the terms and conditions of the program that rural Canadians may have an opportunity to apply for?

There is another aspect of the make-work programs which should be given some consideration. The accumulation of the statistics for the allocation of moneys is not done office by office in the employment and immigration structure. There is an accumulation of information which may be influenced by any part of the region concerned and may reflect very improperly upon other areas. For instance, in the economy of Carleton-Charlotte, as I pointed out last week, fishing, farming and forestry have been adversely affected by catastrophic interest rates and by the increase in the value of the Canadian dollar in respect of some foreign countries. This has brought about a reduction in the return of both raw and finished products which are exported from this constituency. And this constituency depends upon exports. The consequence of such a decline upon income may amount to as much as 24 per cent and as little as 10 per cent in some markets. The consequence of such a decline in income from exports for such an area is obvious even to an amateur economist.

Unfortunately, the nature of employment in Carleton-Charlotte is seasonal. But the allocation of funds for make-work programs does not take this into consideration. Unless there is a very major turn-around in anticipated income, fishermen and fish processors will find themselves with a very low level of income this year and the unemployment figures along the coast of Carleton-Charlotte may reach an all-time high.

Can the minister advise me what particular consideration will be given when allocating winter works moneys for the unusual unemployment that will exist along the Bay of Fundy coast of Carleton-Charlotte? As an example, one processing plant in Campobello burned, and the economic climate is such that it will not be reconstructed in the near future. Will they get any special consideration for this?

In the rest of the fish processing industry, the indication is there will be less employment there as well. So will the Fundy coast get special consideration? Will the data accumulated from that area influence the moneys to be spent in that area? In the village of McAdam, the Georgia Pacific veneer plant has been closed, partly because of weakening of export markets and partly because there is virtually no housing program in Canada at all at this time. Furthermore, the CPR has withdrawn certain of its employment opportunities from McAdam and therefore there is a village of about 1500 people most of whom are unemployed.

Will this now be considered immediately in the accumulation of statistics for the allocation of make-works programs for this winter? I tried to get unemployment statistics which would be applicable to the constituency and I am told they are just not available. However, those statistics which are accumulated in the individual offices of St. Stephens, Woodstock, Florenceville, etc., are put into the pool, and there is not, in fact, a reflection of those who are unemployed, those whose unemployment has expired, and those who have given up in the pursuit of work because there is no work available. But these figures which are publicized would indicate that we are more in line with the city of Fredericton than the city of Saint John in the employment rate, and this is not the case.

While I am quite prepared to acknowledge that there is a higher rate of employment in Carleton-Charlotte than there is in Gloucester or Westmorland-Kent, there is not that much difference that $3 million should have been allocated last winter for Gloucester, $3 million should have been allocated for Westmorland-Kent, and only $178,000 for Carleton-Charlotte, $100,000 for Fundy-Royal and $129,000 for York-Sunbury. Yes, there is a difference, but not that much.

Would the minister consider meeting with members who have problems such as the one I have outlined, to determine a fashion in which allocation might be more rational, as they relate to the unemployment of the individual constituencies, rather than of a region, or of a half of New Brunswick, or whatever way this is put together? It would appear that Carleton-Charlotte will be little better off than Westmorland-Kent, for instance, in the coming winter, as far as employment is concerned.

I appeal to the minister through you, Your Honour, on behalf of the constituents of Carleton-Charlotte and other rural type constituencies which have been short-changed by virtue of a system which does not lend itself to the realities of employment opportunity any more than it would in rural P.E.I., rural Saskatchewan, or any other part of the country. There is no systematic accumulation of statistics which actually apply to any rural constituency in Canada. They are influenced by the cities we place around it.

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) announced the Summer Canada: Student Employment Program on January 22, 1981. A program advertising campaign was held from February 24 to March 6, 1981, and consisted of advertisements in all major newspapers and weeklies throughout the country. In addition, brochures outlining the program were made available to the public in mid-February. This formal advertising campaign was further supplemented by information on the program sent to national organizations and to past sponsors. As well, media coverage in local papers and on radio was arranged through our employment development branch offices.

Mr. McCain: A point of order, please. In my statement, there was no adversiting of anything for Carleton-Charlotte.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. In the adjournment debate, no points of order or questions of privilege are considered.

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, as a result of this advertising campaign, I am pleased to say that we received a high number of applications from the Maritime provinces to the extent, in fact, that the total of the funds requested in these applications exceeds the allocations by a margin of 4.4 to one. In New Brunswick, the funds requested amounted to $8,423,709 while the allocation is $2,085,000, which is a ratio of 4 to one.

The figures show clearly that there has been no apparent problem of lack of awareness of the program and that our publicity has been very successful.

• (2210)

For this reason, and in view of the fact that we already have many more applications than we can fund, there does not appear to be any good reason for extending the deadline and thus delaying both consideration of the projects so far submitted and setting back the date for the start of the selected projects.

MANPOWER—ONTARIO WOMEN'S OUTREACH GROUPS—REQUEST FOR MEETING WITH MINISTER

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, on June 16. I questioned the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) concerning the very serious matters respecting the women's Outreach programs for projects in Ontario. The minister has refused eight times to meet with them. I understand that he still has not met with them personally.

I also raised the question of the very stringent regulations which have been implemented for member Outreach projects and the assimilation policy which is trying to centralize the very projects which were created to meet needs that could not be met in central offices; the frequent reviews that are imposed on these projects and the very-short term, three-month extensions which really in effect are killing Outreach projects across Canada.

I asked the minister about programs which are meeting permanent needs. In particular I mentioned the one with ethnic workers in Vancouver's Chinatown. These kind of permanent Outreach services should be funded in a permanent way as regular services and not simply as short-term projects.

The minister's answer was unsatisfactory. He gave no reply in response to the question about women's Outreach projects. I have checked Hansard and found that at least on four other occasions he has avoided this question in the House. He mentioned eight counselling units for women which have been established in manpower offices. While they may be valid services, they will not meet the kinds of special needs which Outreach projects are designed to meet. He talked about computerized job-finding services. This is a good idea and would be complementary to the Outreach service, but it would not replace Outreach in any way. He rationalized what appeared to be cutbacks that he would not admit by saying:

We are reallocating resources and targeting real needs.

The real needs are for Outreach services funded in a permanent way. The values of Manpower Outreach programs for women and for other target groups have been demonstrated repeatedly. Successes are undisputed. In all evaluations, there is considerable documentation about how effective and how economical these services are.

There are 19 Outreach projects for women across Canada. These programs are all facing cutbacks and possible discontinuation. These projects have placed women in jobs. They have increased the number of opportunities for women who have traditionally been out of the labour force. They have provided employment counselling in store front kind of operations in neigbourhood communities. They have helped women who have been out of the labour force and who have little work experience to develop confidence and, new skills in seeking employment, and to keep jobs once they find them. They create support services and help women to have mutual support group sessions. They help them to find the needed child care. They help them to create training programs which are appropriate as well as to get into vocational services in the community.

There are many services provided in an Outreach way which cannot meet the needs of these women in the central offices of the manpower service. Perhaps those services are useful to meet the needs of the more motivated, confident and better educated women who are used to going into big bureaucracies and who know their way around the system. I cannot see them as being appropriate in the same way for older women who have been out of the work force and who lack confidence, or for immigrant women who do not know how to speak English well and do not know what the job market is in Canada, or for teenagers without experience or low-income women who have few skills and little education. These women need Outreach services.

I mentioned the Strathcona Manpower Outreach program which is another example of an essential service which should be funded permanently. It is located in downtown Chinatown in Vancouver. There are three workers who speak Cantonese. It attracts immigrants who do not speak English, immigrant workers who do not know their way around. They need a specific kind of help in their own language. These people know little about Canadian customs and the provisions under the labour code of Canada. They need counselling in their own language about the job situation, information and advice about Canadian customs and how to apply for jobs.

These people have the help of interpreters in filling out forms and getting around the city. As well, they have a very practical training program. For example, at Britannia Centre, a community school, they have set up a very practical program in the garment industry. The immigrants learn how to use Canadian machinery. They may not speak English, but they learn the technical English that is essential for their trade. They also have group sessions. Counsellors go into the English language classes and talk to them about resources. They also have a referral program operating.

This service has found jobs at a considerably higher rate per worker than the employment and immigration centres. They have found jobs in the garment industry, the hotel and restaurant industry, small businesses such as electronic firms and in fish canneries in Vancouver East. It has been a very worthwhile service, one that is very economical. Very little money has been spent on the bureaucracy. Most of it goes into direct service for clients.

Another Outreach service is the native Outreach program called NEED, Native Employment and Education Development. This is another downtown service in Gastown for native Indians, many of whom come from reserves to the city. They are quite lost when they do not have native people they know in a setting in which they feel comfortable. They go to the drop-in centre where they make friends and have native counsellors to tell them what is being offered.

All the services of the employment centre are decentralized and offered in their own setting. In this way they get access to programs. They get confidence building from Outreach and support services through that centre. It makes them feel confident when looking for jobs and in developing their potential. This service is needed.

I cannot see why the minister, with Treasury Board backing him, would not give high priority to continuing Outreach services. They are economically sound, effective in finding jobs, and help the employers in a much more practical way than central bureaucratic offices. They develop the potential of workers who have special needs and who cannot use the traditional Manpower offices. They create many supportive resources in the community.

Outreach services cost less and produce better results. The needs cannot be met through an assimilation project at the head office. Therefore I appeal to the minister and to Treasury Board: If funds must be cut, cut them from the central bureaucracies and keep the essential Outreach services that I have mentioned.

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, there are two separate issues which would appear to have been unfortunately combined in the present public discussions on the Outreach program. One is the policy review presently under way, and the other is the limited size of the program's budget and efforts that are being made to have it supplemented.

Perhaps I should deal with the budget first. The increase in the 1981-82 Outreach budget, as compared with the previous year, does not reflect the present rate of inflation. At the same time, the minister has been anxious to approve as many new projects as possible, particularly projects serving women. This has resulted in rather severe funding pressures on the program and more particularly on the budget of the Ontario region. As soon as this became apparent, efforts were initiated to indentify any funds which might be available for transfer from other programs to Outreach. A decision from Treasury Board on this issue is expected shortly.

In the face of the severe funding limitations, however, the Ontario region was faced with only two alternatives: entering into 12-month contracts with projects for amounts of money which would reflect a decrease in activity compared with 1980-81; or entering into shorter term contracts for levels of activity which generally were consistent with previous activity levels, and relying on the success of the aforementioned efforts to find new money to enable the extension of the contracts at appropriate funding levels. This policy has not been limited to women's projects.

With respect to the second issue, that of future policy directions for Outreach, as with any government program, Outreach has been the subject of a review to determine how it might be improved and what, if any, new policy directions might be contemplated. The desirability for such a review results from a number of factors.

Once the minister has received the recommendations of his deputy minister as to the future role of Outreach, he will determine the nature of any consultations in which he may wish to be personally involved. He has instructed, however, that the analysis of all options reflect the results of the consultations now taking place.

As a final comment I would say that, contrary to some suggestions made in this House, the minister has not moved and is not moving to terminate either the Outreach program itself or Women's Outreach projects specifically. In fact, although final year-end expenditures for 1980-81 are not yet available, approximately $1,346,974, or 13.4 per cent of total Outreach program funds, went to projects serving women exclusively.

This represents an increase of 94.5 per cent over that expended in 1979-80, which was actually $692,567. I should also point out that over 40 per cent of the clients of all Outreach projects serving all target groups are women. Further, the minister is actively seeking methods of supplementing the Outreach budget and, should additional funds become available, women's projects will continue to receive the highest priority.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at two o'clock.

At 10.22 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

CALL FOR NEW POLICY TO FIGHT INFLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter which is both pressing and urgent. Given that Canada's inflation rate has increased by 5½ per cent in one year, and given that the government's high interest rate policy, which was supposed to slow down inflation, is obviously not working, but is instead causing untold hardship to small businesses, farmers, and those on fixed incomes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance devise a fair and practical policy to halt the growth of inflation, and abandon their love affair with the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RAILWAYS

REPORTED CANCELLATION OF VIA RAIL PASSENGER ROUTES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, it has been brought to my attention that VIA Rail is considering cancelling as many as 16 commuter routes in Canada. One of these routes is the passenger service between Havelock, Peterborough and Toronto. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Vankoughnet):

That none of these routes be terminated in light of the recent Ontario task force report on provincial rail policy, and that serious consideration be given by VIA Rail to extending commuter service, not reducing it, at a time when energy conservation should be the number one priority.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

CREDIT FOR SENIOR CITIZENS' HOME UNDER CONSTRUCTION IN MIDLAND, ONT.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Housing starts in Canada have reached an all-time low under the present government. Credit should therefore be given for every possible start in order to alleviate this embarrassment. Since the senior citizens' home at 551 Hugel Avenue in Midland, Ontario, is being constructed under a building permit issued November 6, 1980, with CMHC funds, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That the federal government's construction sign outside the building be updated to delete the designation of the hon. member for Papineau as the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, a post he has not occupied since March 20, 1979, and insert the name of the hon. member for York-Scarborough who has been responsible for CMHC since March 3, 1980.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

CALL FOR LEGISLATIVE AMENDMENT TO PROTECT CANADIAN JOBS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that in Burnaby, British Columbia, Nabob Foods Limited has substantially reduced its work force, eliminating over 150 jobs and cutting product lines since FIRA approved their takeover by a Swiss multinational Jacobs AG in 1976, and in view of the fact that in recent months union members at the Burnaby plant had to endure a union busting unfair labour practice in an attempt to prevent Jacobs from clawing back gains made under earlier contracts, and in view of the fact that the Foreign Investment Review Agency is a toothless wonder not mandated to protect the job security of Canadian workers employed at plants affected by foreign takeovers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce take immediate action to insist that foreign companies make long-term commitments to jobs in Canada by amending the Foreign Investment Review Agency Act, and take steps to put an end to the massive loss of jobs at the Burnaby Nabob plant.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

REJECTION OF COLONIAL STATUS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Irwin (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) stated in his speech yesterday that he rejects the kind of thinking behind the statement, and I quote, "We are no longer a colony of the British empire". I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chénier):

That the House encourage the member for Provencher to continue his trips to former British colonies such as South Africa so that he may enjoy British colonial status, for in Canada he will find, if he chooses to consult with his constituents, that the vast majority do not wish to be considered colonials of the British empire.

DEVELOPMENT OF NORTHERN POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, whereas on November 24, 1980, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) promised that a northern energy policy would be developed by March 1981, and whereas on March 24, 1981, under questioning, he put it off until May 1981, and whereas on May 12, 1981, he put it off again and this time promised that it would be ready in June, and whereas today is the last day of June and no northern energy policy has yet materialized, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development be censured by this House for his refusal to keep his word, and that he be replaced by someone with at least a modicum of good faith and credibility.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

RESOLUTION URGING UNITED STATES PRESIDENT TO ACT ON ACID RAIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Representatives of the P.C. Youth Federation from across Canada have just returned from observing the national convention in Chicago of the university youth wing of the U.S. Republican Party. Largely because of the persuasive arguments of the P.C. Youth, the college Republicans passed a resolution calling on President Reagan to honour the Canada-U.S. memorandum of intent on acid rain signed between the two countries in August of last year, and further to strengthen U.S. clean air laws rather than weaken them as the U.S. administration appears bent on doing. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley):

That this House joins the PC Youth in expressing the hope that President Reagan will act on the resolution passed by the college Republicans this past weekend.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE BENEFITS TO WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House calls on the government to make an immediate commitment to introduce this fall a bill to provide women who work in the home with pensions equivalent to those available under the Canada Pension Plan, such pensions to be available not just to those who could afford to pay a high premium but to all women who work in the home, and this House also calls for the said bill to provide pensions forthwith for women between the ages of 55 and 65 who are alone and who are not in the labour market, it being the view of this House that the needs of such women should be met without further delay.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN PERSONAL EXEMPTION FOR RETURNING CITIZENS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on an important matter. In view of the fact that Canadians travelling abroad, on returning home after prolonged vacations are permitted $150 worth of duty-free purchases per person if a person has been out of the country for seven days, and in view of the fact that this amount has been badly eroded by inflation over the last decade and barely covers vacation expenses in most instances, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz):

That the government give serious consideration to increasing the duty-free purchasing abroad to $250 per person if a person has been away for seven days or longer.

ACTION REQUIRED TO END POSTAL STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Today on the eve of Canada's national 114th birthday we have litle to celebrate. Canadians again have to endure the disruptive effects of a nationwide postal strike, a strike, I might add, which causes extreme hardship for many, and daily aggravation for all. In light of the fact the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was denied his constitutional package as his Dominion Day birthday gift, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the President of the Treasury Board provide the Prime Minister with a gift of greater value and take immediate steps to end the postal strike today. If he did this, Canadians would have reason to join in the singalong at noon tomorrow.

Madam Speaker: Apart from the fact that the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) is not in the House, is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

ACTION TO END POSTAL STRIKE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board, the minister responsible for disruptions of services in the Public Service of Canada. After a long period in which Radio-Canada and CBC have been on strike we now have a situation in which some 23,000 postal clerks and mail handlers are out on strike today. When we take account of the fact that last fall some 48,000 clerks were out, that means that in the last eight months alone nearly one quarter of the public servants under the direct authority of the President of the Treasury Board have been out on strike. That indicates a terrible record of labour relations by this government.

Now that that record has deprived Canadians of the right to receive their mail, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board what action he plans to take now to bring an end to this postal strike before it can cause real and deep damage to Canadians in all walks of life?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am frankly hurt by the comments of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition with respect to my record in negotiating settlements. I might refer him to an article in the Toronto Star—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: This is a quotation from William Doherty, who is the first vice-president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada. He says:

—"dozens and dozens" of disagreements between the government and its workers are settled peacefully under the collective bargaining system.

The public's attention isn't drawn to these because "the only time the media pays any attention is when things get down to the wire and there's a major strike threatened."

For example, there was practically no media interest recently when . . . an agreement between the government and 19,000 of its blue collar workers across the country—

Was reached.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: I think the government is in fact to be congratulated for the record it has in the settling of disputes in the public sector.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, this government is unbelievable. The minister stands up in this House and says he is hurt. The people who are hurt by his actions are elderly Canadians, small businesses and others who count upon their mail service, a service which has been denied them by the incompetence of this government.

Any minister who could stand and be proud of having one quarter of the people who work under his authority out on strike in eight months is a minister who deserves to resign immediately.

The minister knows that the difference between the government's offer last Friday and the cost of the conciliation board report is less than 2 per cent, and yet the government maintained that the board's recommendation could not even form the basis of negotiations. The minister also knows that his best chance of a settlement at less than that extra 2 per cent was to negotiate to a settlement before a strike, and that the longer the strike goes on the higher the cost will be to Canadians.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, will the President of the Treasury Board explain to this House of Commons why he deliberately provoked a strike which is going to wreak such havoc on so many Canadians when he knows that a settlement was available and that a settlement later will cost the government and the people much more than a settlement would have this past weekend?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is not inhibited by facts. I will give him a few facts, in the event Your Honour offers him an opportunity of asking another supplementary question.

In fact the position of the union has been that it will not return to the bargaining table unless every element of the recommendations of the chairman of the conciliation board is accepted. That would produce an increase in the over-all rate, as indicated by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition—an increase, incidentally, which would take us into a very high range of settlements across the country, which would be a very serious matter indeed. However, going beyond that, I have with me a letter from the president of the union, who says that having accepted that and then returning to the table, we will begin to negotiate the questions raised in the union minority report of Mr. Desmarais.

That report embraces such things as wages, for example, where Mr. Desmarais recommended that there be an untriggered COLA, which automatically gives us a rate of something in the neighbourhood of 13 per cent because it is compounded on a quarterly basis as the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition knows, plus the settlement itself which was requested, that would bring the over-all rate to 22.58 per cent. I am surprised that the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, concerned as he pretends to be about restraint and the deficit, would even suggest that we should negotiate a settlement on that basis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, it is no wonder that we have no postal service in the country starting today, when we have the minister responsible for negotiating the government side who has twice in the House misrepresented publicly the position of the union. Perhaps it is because he knows it is not the most popular union in the country and he is looking for a scapegoat upon whom he can blame the inefficiency of his government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: The minister has not yet explained what he intends to do to ensure that Canadians have the benefit of their postal service.

● (1420)

ROLE OF POSTMASTER GENERAL

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. He will remember that when post office strikes were averted, either last year by this Postmaster General or the year before by the hon. member for Vancouver South, they were avoided by the direct involvement of the Postmaster General. Will the Postmaster General tell the House why he has not taken a direct role in trying to avoid this strike, as he did last year?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I want to say to the Leader of the Official Opposition that so far the Treasury Board has conducted the negotiations in impeccable fashion, and I find it altogether deplorable that the Canadian Union of Postal Workers has refused to pursue the negotiations and is now in a position to strike. Keeping in mind the generous offers made by the Treasury Board on behalf of the government, I suggest that the attitude of the leaders of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers is inexplicable. Rather than launching into this war of words which reflects a blatant lack of responsibility on the part of the Leader of the Opposition, members opposite would be much better advised to urge the postal workers to return to the negotiation table with a view to ending the current postal strike through a negotiated settlement.

[English]

EXCLUSION OF POSTMASTER GENERAL FROM NEGOTIATIONS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, for the third time today a minister has refused to answer a question. The minister knows that when governments wanted a postal settlement in the past and not a strike, they sent in the Postmaster General to negotiate. That was not done this time. Why, when it was done successfully on the last two occasions, was it not done this time?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, periodically we have reached settlements with several unions of the Post Office Department without strike action on their part. Quite recently the Treasury Board reached a settlement with postal carriers through the normal negotiation process without the need for a strike. I have no reason to claim at this time that there are not enough elements on the negotiation table to enable us to arrive at a negotiated settlement, to the extent where the leaders of the Canadian union of Postal Workers are prepared to discuss conscientiously and responsibly with the negotiating unit of the Canadian government. Madam Speaker, I would suggest to the Leader of the Official Opposition that, instead of trying to score political points and acting as a petty demagogue, he ought to recommend to the postal leaders that they resume negotiations.

CONTENTS OF GOVERNMENT'S OFFER TO UNION

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board who has made some allegations about the existing position of the negotiations. Yesterday in the House the minister indicated that the government was presenting a final offer yesterday, "a full package on all outstanding issues." The minister maintains that the reason we do not have negotiations is because the union will not negotiate. Why did the government's offer yesterday contain for the first time matters which had not been recommended by its nominee or by itself? In other words, why was the offer made yesterday worse than any previous offer made to the union?

I refer specifically to the fact that the offer contained roll-back provisions, taking away rights granted in previous contracts, roll-back provisions which had not been previously demanded by the government or by its nominee in this round of bargaining. Since the minister says he believes in bargaining in good faith, why was bargaining in such bad faith entered into yesterday? Why should the people of Canada believe that the offer was made with any other intent than to create a strike?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am sure the people of Canada will accept our view and our word; we had no intention of creating a strike.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: Moreover, I point out to the hon. member the reason the package was delivered was that we had no other way of communicating with the union. The union left the negotiating room on Friday and we invited them back to the negotiating table. I have already answered why they did not come back—because they said there was a pre-condition. The only way we could convey the position we had on these various elements was to put them into a package and send it to them, hoping that those elements would form the basis of negotiation. The normal course would be to sit down then at the table with their position, as I have explained it to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, and negotiate a satisfactory settlement. The union has categorically refused to do that to date.

I share the wish of my colleague, the Postmaster General, that the union will reconsider its position, particularly in view of the major movement which we made in terms of paid marternity leave, and return to the table and negotiate a satisfactory settlement immediately.

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, the minister knows full well that the offer which was made yesterday is worse than the offer which was made last week. That is never the basis for entering into good faith bargaining at this late stage, as he will find out if he checks with the Minister of Labour.

COST OF STRIKE TO PUBLIC

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, given that the minister has refused to enter into negotiations in good faith, and given that the spread between the two parties in real dollar terms is about 2 per cent—and those are Treasury Board figures—can the minister tell us whether the Treasury Board has costed the effect of this strike to Canadians in all walks of life? Will the minister tell the House how many hours, or even minutes, it will take before the strike costs the people of Canada more than it would have cost the government to settle this past weekend?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, let me assure the House that members opposite have no monopoly on concern for the people of Canada and the difficulties they will have in enduring this strike. The only monopoly most members opposite seem to have is one on complete and utter fiscal irresponsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRADE

UPGRADING OF RAW MATERIALS AND RESOURCES BEFORE EXPORTATION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Trade. As the minister is no doubt aware, Canada's share of world trade dropped by some 33 per cent during the decade of the 1970s, particularly in manufacturing finished products. Is it the intention of the government to bring in a new trade policy which would require greater upgrading of raw materials and resources before they leave this country, thus providing jobs in Canada instead of elsewhere in the world?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (Trade)): Madam Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the hon. member on his new responsibility with respect to trade. I look forward to working with him in the coming days in this regard.

It has been a policy of the Government of Canada to put greater emphasis on the further processing of our raw materials, and in particular on the sale of end products to other countries. Once the hon. member has a detailed look at our trade figures he will find that although our end products decreased last year, partially manufactured products increased substantially. This also has a substantial labour component. Last year was the first time in the last nine years that there was a surplus in the combination of Canadian end products and partially manufactured products.

RESTRICTIONS ON CANADIAN SUBSIDIARIES OF FOREIGN MANUFACTURERS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Despite what the minister has said, Madam Speaker, last year in this country, in terms of finished products, we had a deficit of some $18 billion. I am sure the minster is also aware that many Canadian subsidiaries of foreign manufacturers are prohibited by their head offices from entering into world markets. What effort is being made to free them from this restriction, on behalf of Canada?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (Trade)): Madam Speaker, I ask the hon. member to look in further detail, as I responded in my first reply, at partially manufactured products. He is right with respect to the deficit in end products, but in partially manufactured products which, for example, include lumber from western Canada for houses in Japan, and is not classified as an end product because we do not ship the houses, and newsprint which is classified as a partially manufactured product yet we do not ship newspapers, if he looks at the whole broad spectrum of partially manufactured products rather than end products, he will see that we had a surplus rather than a deficit.

With regard to the second part of the hon. member's question concerning branch plants of foreign multinationals, my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, is putting a great deal of emphasis on World product mandating. We have several excellent examples in Canada of branch plants of foreign based multinationals doing an excellent job in the export of products manufactured in Canada.

RAILWAYS

REPORTED PHASING-OUT OF VIA RAIL PASSENGER ROUTES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. It deals with the apparent announcement yesterday that certain VIA passenger services are to be abandoned or phased out, including the Barrie-Toronto run, Stouffville-Toronto run, and the Havelock-Peterborough-Toronto run. Is it true that the phasing out of those three lines is under consideration and that it is anticipated that the lines will be turned over to the Ontario government to run as part of their GO train service? If that is the intention of the federal government, has it notified the Ontario government that such an action is planned?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the decision of cabinet has not been made on this subject. As we are reviewing everything that concerns VIA, hon. members should understand that what the hon. member mentions may be part of the review now taking place. I would like the House to understand immediately that the purpose of this minister and cabinet is to save VIA, to break the vicious circle which now exists under which we have constantly escalating operational deficits for VIA. Because of a number of restraints we are not capable of improving the capital budget of VIA so that this vicious circle can be broken and VIA can begin to be a much more modern and able passenger transportation company than it has been up until now.

SUBSIDIZATION OF COMMUTER SERVICES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, I hope the Minister of Transport will tell the House why he seems to have such a double standard. It was only on June 26 that he agreed to a $40 million special federal subsidy to re-equip commuter train services in the Montreal area. Yet he tells us in the name of restraint he intends to cut back on VIA and intends presumably to put more costs on the Ontario government, a government that he has already reneged on paying $30 million which was pledged by his predecessor in that portfolio. Why does the minister have this double standard whereby in some cases cabinet decisions have been arrived at to give a $40 million subsidy to help the commuter to and from work in Montreal, but there is no such subsidy for those in the Toronto area?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it has been the policy of the government since 1975, and even before that, that commuter services, because of the nature of their operations, are a municipal-provincial responsibility, not a federal one. This was confirmed by decisions of the CTC in a number of instances. What has happened in Montreal is a recognition of that fact. Because these lines in the city of Montreal have been neglected for a number of years, the Government of Canada decided to make a contribution, as it did in Toronto in 1967.

I would also point out that $30 million of that $80 million that is going to urban transportation in Montreal is given under the UTAP program, which is a decision that the Quebec government has made, allocating that amount of money to this particular purpose. Any province can do that. However, Ontario has not decided to do that.

MEASURES TO AID MOVEMENT OF INCREASED EXPORTS OF GRAIN

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Considering the prospect of rail rationing in western Canada, and given the fact that Canada's grain carrying fleet will be reduced by some 50 per cent by 1985 due to the retirement of some 7,000 boxcars because of age, what program or steps is the federal government taking to ensure that adequate rolling stock will be available to move the anticipated export shipments of 30 million tonnes by 1985? Specifically, why has the minister's department not yet accepted the proposal of the grain transport authority, endorsed by the advisory committee of the Canadian Wheat, Board, to acquire 1,300 new units of rolling stock on an annual basis for the next five years?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it is the view of the government based on a number of studies, some of them by the grain transport co-ordinator, that there is no need for more hopper cars this year. The lead time for ordering hopper cars is, I understand, six months. The government will have plenty of time to order needed hopper cars for the next year, if that assessment is made.

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON USE OF RAILWAY SERVICES

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): There seems to be some inconsistency, Madam Speaker. A spokesman for the government suggested there will be rationing in western Canada of the utilization of the rail system. I will direct this question to the Prime Minister. Was the government leader in the other place expressing government policy when he said this past weekend that the federal government plans to ration western Canadian rail space with a system of allotments for exports from the west? That was stated by the Hon. Senator Ray Perrault. He indicated that by 1985 it will be necessary to ration rail space in western Canada. Will the Prime Minister advise if that is an expression of government policy? If so, it is a classic cop out.

How will the government have sufficient capacity to move the anticipated 70 per cent increase in rail tonnage over the next five years and meet the anticipated export target of 30 million tonnes of grain by the year 1985?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the leader of the government in the Senate was simply expressing the view that unless something is done in due time, this is the situation that will exist in 1985. That is what he said. There would be a possibility of rationing of the main line. He was projecting to the future what will happen if decisions are not made, but those decisions will of course be made.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

STATUS OF ROBERTSHAW STUDY OF CHILD FATALITIES CAUSED BY PARENTAL NEGLECT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On April 21 in this House the minister assured the people of Canada that the Robertshaw study on child abuse, which was looking into problems which lead to the deaths of up to 200 children per year, was completed. The minister further stated that:

> I am happy to say that I shall publish her report on child abuse.

Since there appears to be some discrepancy as to the status of this report and seeing as no report has yet been published, could the minister inform the House whether it is the study of the issue that has been completed, or the final written report, including recommendations, or had Mrs. Robertshaw been taken off the project before she had completed the real work she set out to do?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the study conducted by Mrs. Corinne Robertshaw is of a judicial nature and deals with child welfare legislation especially the provisions to protect children against violent abuse. We could obviously continue our investigation. However we considered this study could serve as a good working paper. As I said several weeks ago, we would publish whatever we could with the approval of our contacts. I should have a report within a few hours on the extent of what can be made public, but I know that to protect the children, several of our contacts would not allow us to publish the entire report. The work was completed in a satisfactory way a few days ago so that it will now be up to the parties concerned, in particular the provinces, to decide what they will do next.

[English]

RESPONSIBILITY CENTRE FOR CHILDREN

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, the reason the minister has had difficulty getting some of this material released for publication is that people do not want to do anything which would preclude the completion of the final written report. It is the written report which the minister promised us on April 21. Therefore I repeat my questions to the minister. Has Corinne Robertshaw written a final report? If not, why not? If so, where is it? What is the mandate of the responsibility centre for children which the minister also mentioned on April 21 about which there has been no press release nor any details? When will the minister make good on her commitment to publish the written report and tell us something more about this responsibility centre for children that she was so rhetorical about two months ago?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is confusing several issues here. The Robertshaw study was conducted under the auspices of my department by this researcher with the assistance of another department. The study was supposed to last a couple of months but it finally stretched into twice that, if not three times. I think it has progressed to the point where we could publish the recommendations. As I just said to the hon. member, I should be advised within a couple of hours on the substance of the matter because I think some informers did not want their testimonies to be published. We will publish what we can. There is no need for the hon. member to cause a scandal or a controversy over something which is not that.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

F-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES FOR QUEBEC

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services about the situation regarding the F-18 fighter aircraft. According to press reports over the past few days and especially yesterday, the F-18 fighters would be by-passing Quebec, and three quarters of the economic fall-outs which had been promised to Quebec would practically disappear. Could the minister indicate what actually are the figures involved in these economic fall-outs from the F-18 contract, and whether to date the terms of the agreement have been fully met by McDonnell Douglas? Also, in case of non-compliance with these terms by the corporation, are penalties provided for under this contract?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I dare hope McDonnell Douglas will comply with all the terms of this contract. I should like to point out to the hon. member that when the contract was signed, McDonnell Douglas indicated that some $1,570 million in economic fall-outs would go to the province of Quebec. I must add that my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, and I were both in Bromont yesterday for the official opening of a new vane and blade manufacturing plant which should generate some $600 million in economic activities. The original agreement called for only $60 million in respect to this plant, and the corporation has already promised to invest $97 million; moreover, nearly $500 million in economic activities will be generated between now and 1995. While there, we also announced a contract between McDonnell Douglas and Canadair which should yield nearly $92 million in economic fall-out. There is also a new digital rolling mill which has been promised, so that the benefits to date exceed the expectations of the original contract with the corporation.

MARINE TRANSPORT

MINISTER'S POSITION RESPECTING CAST SHIPPING GROUP

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport concerning the involvement of the Canadian National Railway Company in marine transportation. The minister has been warned that CNR's involvement in the Cast shipping group would create problems in Canadian ports. The minister knows that the U.S. Congress is considering a law to control marine carriers which transport U.S. cargo through Canadian ports, and he has caused diplomatic representations to be made to the U.S. Congress.

The minister must know that this law was motivated by Cast's predatory pricing policies, by its support from the Government of Canada, and by the CNR through financial assistance, through sweetheart deals in the port of Montreal, and in other ways. How will the minister explain his position to the U.S. Congress, and how will he explain this government's position to this House?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think my hon. friend is exaggerating unnecessarily. This attempt by the Congress in the United States to pass a bill affecting transportation of U.S. goods into Canada is one that comes forward at regular intervals in the United States. The Department of External Affairs is aware of the situation, and it has sent a note through the embassy to the Congress on this subject. Congressmen, who are quite intelligent as are members of Parliament, will sooner or later understand that this is not a good line to take, because on the west coast the situation is exactly the opposite. On the west coast Canadian shippers make greater use of U.S. ports than vice versa. Therefore, we have a balancing act, and I am quite sure that reason will prevail in the House of Representatives.

REQUEST FOR GENERAL INQUIRY INTO EAST COAST SHIPPING

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to know that the minister thinks I am exaggerating, because Mr. Richard Lidinsky, in testifying before a committee of the U.S. Congress, referred to the Cast shipping group as a James Bond-type of operation and he asked Congress to pass this law. Does the minister not think, in view of the allegations that have been made in the United States, in view of the fact that the Dart shipping group moved from the port of Halifax to the port of Montreal because of the Cast-CN connection, that it is time to call, under the provisions of the National Transportation Act, a general inquiry into shipping traffic through east coast ports so that all of those concerned in the shipping industry in Canada will have an opportunity to present their views? This time Mr. Bandine may be willing to testify, because he was not willing to testify in the hearing held in Halifax by the CTC concerning Dart and the CPR.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am sorry but I do not have before me the curriculum vitae of the gentleman whom the hon. member mentioned a moment ago. But the information I have is that he is working for one of the ports on the east coast, which makes him somewhat of a party in the debate.

On the subject of the relationship between Halifax and Montreal and other ports on the east coast, I thought there was a good airing of the subject in Halifax a few days ago, and I am quite sure there will be other opportunities.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

CONSIDERATION OF ALL-INCLUSIVE SPORTS BETTING PROGRAM

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport. It deals with my question to the minister of last Friday, which reads in part, as reported in Hansard at page 10983:

> Is the minister telling us that neither his department nor any other department of government has been considering sports betting?

The minister responded, in part, as follows:

> We do not contemplate any such scheme as the hon. member has mentioned.

I would suggest that the minister was either ignorant of matters relating to his jurisdiction or he was misleading this House, because I have here a sample of a betting ticket produced by the federal government which would bet on 15 hockey games, called Sports Select. This is not Loto Select nor the computerized games. Therefore I ask the minister to set aside his sarcasm of last Friday and try to give an honest and intelligent answer on this matter.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member will review what he asked last week, he asked if we were considering a plan of all sports betting, and he went on at some length about people being able to wager on various individual games. Perhaps he would like to review what he said in that regard.

If he wants to he could also review my answer to his supplementary question, in which he asked if I was prepared to say that we were not going to have anything to do with any sort of lottery type games or any sort of wagering. I indicated to him that I was certainly not prepared to do that because we are examining the possibility of getting back into lotteries, and we are examining other schemes of a similar nature, but no decision has been made in one direction. I would be happy to have any representations that the hon. member wants to make. It may be that he can convince the hon. member for Edmonton North that his party made a terrible error in giving away the lotteries.

GOVERNMENT PLANS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I knew that the Prime Minister does not always tell the truth, but now the disease is spreading to the minister as well.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: Madam Speaker, on Friday the minister categorically denied—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary he can ask it right now.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Jelinek: If the penguins across the way would give me an opportunity, I will. On Friday the minister categorically denied the government was even considering sports betting, and I quoted "sports betting". Now there is a sample ticket which the government has produced for hockey sports betting.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: If the government is not considering this type of sports betting, which on Friday the minister categorically denied, what is the minister considering? What is the program for future gambling operations of the government when the Liberal government prior to this one assured this House that it would not go beyond the Montreal Olympic betting operation?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the hon. member may remember that last week I told him he was skating on thin ice. It has just broken, and he is in deep water now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: What the hon. member says is totally incorrect.

Mr. Clark: Is it a lie?

Mr. Regan: The Leader of the Opposition seems to be having trouble, or a fit, or something. Perhaps he can let me answer the question for the hon. member. The hon. member says that the government said it would never go beyond paying off the Olympics in Montreal. It never said any such thing. Furthermore—

Mr. Jelinek: You were not here.

Mr. Regan: Furthermore, Madam Speaker, long after that the government was still in Loto Canada. The party opposite was involved in Loto Canada when it formed the government, so it would have been in breach as well. This government is looking at various options. I have not even had the privilege to see the form that the hon. member is looking at, but I will be happy to examine it if he would like to send it over.

RAILWAYS

INSTALLATION OF HOT BOX DETECTORS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, let us go back to the Minister of Transport and some more gambling with safety and lives.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Benjamin: Since the railroads and the chemical and dangerous goods manufacturers are weeping and wailing and pleading high costs before the Canadian Transport Commission on the implementation of the Grange report, and since the bible of the Liberal party, the Toronto Star, says that the required changes in rail safety regulations should be made regardless of the cost, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if he will call upon the CTC to order the railroads to speed up substantially their installation of hot box detectors on all the main and secondary freight and passenger rail lines in Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the CTC has already done that. While the hearings are going on, and I understand that they are coming to a conclusion now, the CTC has issued an order telling CP to implement in the next year the plan that they had for 1985, if my memory serves me well.

The Grange Commission made a number of recommendations. I have already reported to the House on that subject. Nine of them are presently being implemented, and six are before the CTC.

I received a letter recently from a distinguished minister of the government of Saskatchewan, telling me that there must be a happy medium between preoccupation with safety, which obviously is important, and the economic health of the country. I suggest that this would be good reading for the hon. member for Regina West.

CONVERSION TO ROLLER-BEARING EQUIPMENT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, the distinguished minister in Saskatchewan knows how slowly this Minister of Transport, and previous ones, and the CTC have moved, and that this could affect the movement of commodities out of western Canada very seriously.

Since the incident at Sundridge, Ontario, occurred on a CNR line from Toronto to North Bay, which has no hot box detectors on it, I hope the minister will see to it that the CTC looks into that matter.

Would the minister also request the CTC to order the railroads to increase substantially the conversion of their rolling stock to roller-bearing equipment rather than brass journals, so that the time-frame for this work to be done can be substantially reduced and thus, in turn, reduce the number of accidents we are getting?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the purpose is obviously to reduce the number of accidents we are getting, as the hon. member says. But I was looking yesterday at another accident in White River, Ontario, where the train was equipped with roller bearings. This proves that, with or without roller bearings, there will be accidents. My old friend is right, however, that an effort should be made to reduce the number of accidents. This was the purpose of the Grange report, and it is the purpose of the hearing before the CTC now.

EMPLOYMENT

APPOINTMENT OF DIRECTOR OF ROYAL BOTANICAL GARDENS IN HAMILTON, ONT.

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister should know that Canadians are now the world leaders in ornamental horticulture, and Canadian gardens located in several parts of Canada, including Montreal, Victoria and Niagara, are viewed by travellers as superior to most in the world. Will the minister tell the House why a work permit was approved for the Royal Botanical Gardens in Hamilton to allow it to appoint a person other than a Canadian to the post of director?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon member for the information about the importance of ornamental gardening. That particular case was reviewed very carefully by officials of the department. We sent forward very specific requirements for a major job search to be done throughout Canada. That was done and a number of applications were received and reviewed. We never try to intervene in the actual selection procedure. We do insist, however, that Canadians be given an opportunity to make application for the job. Those requirements were fulfilled in this case by the Royal Botanical Gardens.

ISSUANCE OF WORK PERMIT TO NON-CANADIAN

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, the minister took the position in the Stratford Festival instance that he had to be shown that a proper and extensive search was made to make certain that Canadians would have first opportunity to take that kind of job. How can the minister approve such a work permit when the Royal Botanical Gardens did not follow the usual procedures in seeking a qualified person to fill that position, and when only about 1 per cent of qualified Canadians even knew that such a job vacancy existed?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to receive the information from the hon. member because it does not conform to the facts presented to me which are that a very expensive advertising campaign was undertaken in a wide variety of trade journals and magazines. A good number of applications were received but the job requirements called for very specific qualifications which, in this case, could not be met by Canadians.

As the hon. member knows, we apply very strict requirements for a "Canadians first" policy which works in most cases. We cannot and do not want totally and completely to exclude skilled people from coming into the country when they have the qualifications that we need.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION OF MARIAN STASTNY TO CANADA

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. According to Austrian authorities there are 10,000 refugees from eastern Europe in Vienna, many of whom want to come to Canada, have applied for permission, and have to wait for long periods of time before their applications are even considered. Given those facts, I should like to ask the minister how it is possible and by whom it was arranged that Marian Stastny could go to Vienna and within a few hours of visiting the Canadian Embassy, be on a plane coming to Canada?

Hon. Loyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we have a special category of immigration for those who come from Eastern Europe. We call it the self-exiled class. They are given very minimal requirements to meet, basically health and security checks. We have substantially increased the levels we set for that class this year, up to 4,000, which is an increase of 1,000 over the previous year. In this case the application by Marian Stastny was under that classification. He was given no privileges different from anybody else, with one exception. It was the judgment of our officials in Vienna that he was under real threat and his security could not be protected. Under those circumstances we afforded him the same kind of protection we afford anybody in those circumstances; if we cannot guarantee security in Austria they are given the chance to come here and then go through landing procedures here in Canada.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. MAZANKOWSKI—ALLEGED REFUSAL OF THE PRIME MINISTER TO ANSWER QUESTION IN THE HOUSE

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising out of the Prime Minister's refusal to answer my question. I know the Prime Minister

(Mr. Trudeau) or any other minister under the rules of the House is not obligated to give an answer to any specific question. However, when a member of his cabinet makes a definitive statement about government policy or the government's intention, surely we as members of this House have the right to know whether that statement is an accurate reflection of government policy. If the Prime Minister is not prepared to answer these kinds of questions, perhaps the least he might do is to consider putting a muzzle on some of his ministers to avoid the unnecessary confusion.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, that is not at all a point of order. The question was given a perfectly honest and straightforward answer by the minister.

An hon. Member: How do you know? You didn't even listen.

Mr. Trudeau: Of course I listened to the question and I listened to the answer. What I did not hear was Senator Perrault's speech, but I am assured by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), as he told the House, that Senator Perrault's speech was quite clear, that as certain things were not done—The hon. member shakes his head. I would like to know what authority he has for shaking his head and denying what the minister has said.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member had not been so prone to defying when I talked about double-tracking, he would know that we are, indeed, interested in solving this problem, in spite of the guffaws of the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: This, of course, is not really a point of order. Hon. members will have me shaking my head before members who continue to debate once the question period is over.

MR. PINARD—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, with respect, I would like to refer you to the order passed by the House last week which specifies that at precisely three o'clock the questions relating to the business of supply must be put. I therefore respectfully suggest, Madam Speaker, that you call the vote on the appropriate questions before calling other items of business.

Madam Speaker: I am willing to proceed immediately. We often consider that three o'clock means following routine proceedings, but if the House so wishes, I can dispose immediately of the votes which should be held now.

It being 3:05 p.m., pursuant to the order made Thursday, June 25, 1981, the House will now proceed to the vote on the questions necessary to dispose of the business of supply.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN MAIN ESTIMATES, 1981-82

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That the Supplementary Estimates (A), 1981-82, laid upon the Table, Wednesday, June 3, 1981, be concurred in.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That the Supplementary Estimates (B), 1981-82, laid upon the Table, Wednesday, June 17, 1981, be concurred in.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, at this particular point I should like to explain to the House the reasons for having posted the items under supplementary estimates (B), as I have done, which appear on the order paper. Now that the government has tabled bills to cover all those particular items, it is not my intention to press with that notice. However, I wish to raise a point of procedure which I think requires clarification.

Under the rules, hon. members have always been given the right to post a particular item for an expression of opinion by the House. I recall, as a member of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization at the time, that hon. members would be allowed to post any particular part of the spending program for approval by the House.

What has happened is that somehow or other a form of notice of opposition was taken by the table. That requires 24 hours of notice prior to the deadline of consideration, but automatically, even though the government has not acted on it, a motion in positive terms is put on the order paper.

That motion oftentimes includes a much greater sum than the one of the hon. member wishes to oppose. For instance, in the Senate it could be broken down, yet the total amount is put forward. This puts the House in a dilemma in that while one might be in favour of certain items, that on which one wants an expression of opinion is swallowed by the whole. I fail to see why this should be allowed in so far as an expression of opinion by hon. members is concerned.

I put forward the proposition that those items in supplementary estimates (B) should not be concurred in. That is the motion which, I suggest to the Chair, should be taken by the Table and put to the membership; rather than the Table itself converting it into an affirmative motion and saying that these items should be concurred in.

This is the point I wish to raise. I would wish a clarification on it in due course, but I now formally withdraw all the postings of the estimates in supplementary estimates (B) which appear in my name.

Madam Speaker: I can give clarification to the hon. member. The procedure is to allow a member to raise an objection about certain items in the estimates which have been dealt with item by item in committee. When the estimates come again before the House, the member is allowed to raise an objection to one or several of the items in the estimates. This is what the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has done. He raised a number of objections to several items in the estimates which the Table transformed into a positive motion precisely to allow the House to express an opinion on the particular objections of the hon. member.

If I am correct—and I stand to be corrected—these objections were about different items, but they were not lumped into one motion. In the end there will be an all encompassing motion to accept the estimates. If the procedure is followed, the House will have had a chance to express an opinion on each and every objection raised by the hon. member.

This is the clarification I offer to the hon. member. I hope it satisfies him. I take note of his desire to withdraw these objections which he posted with the Table.

MARITIME EMPLOYERS ASSOCIATION—LOANS OUTSTANDING

Question No. 2,494—Mr. Crosby:

1. Does the government have loans outstanding to the Maritime Employers Association and, if so (a) in what amount (b) at what rate of interest (c) what are the terms of repayment?

2. Was the interest rate charged less or more than the current prime rate of interest and how was it established?

3. Is the association now in a position to repay the loan and, if so, for what reason has it not been repaid?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes.

(a) Principal outstanding as of December 31, 1980, $4,435,142.

(b) 10.375 per cent.

(c) Two equalized payments annually to end on December 31, 1985.

2. At the time of the contract negotiation, the loan was to bear interest at a rate of 2½ per cent above the rate established by the Minister of Finance in respect of loans to Crown corporations for the period of the loan.

3. Yes, the association has maintained the repayment schedule in accord with the original contract in a fully satisfactory manner.

COAST GUARD AUXILIARY

Question No. 2,544—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

With reference to the answers to questions Nos. 2,127 and 2,126 concerning the Coast Guard auxiliary and the Coast Guard Vessel 122 (a) what is the exact meaning of the term "attended" (b) for what reason is there a difference between the average cost per rescue as indicated in the answers to question No. 2,127, Part 4(a) and question No. 2,126, Part 3(a) (c) for what reason is there a large difference between the average cost per rescue when only auxiliary personnel were involved as indicated in the answers to question No. 2,127, Part 5 and question No. 2,126, Part 3(c)?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): (a) The term "attended" is used when a Coast Guard resource arrives at or is dispatched to the scene of a marine incident and undertakes:

(1) to render direct assistance;

(2) to advise and co-ordinate assistance already in progress;

(3) to relay communications on behalf of RCC and/or other vessels involved;

(4) to standby when pollutants may be discharged during the course of an incident.

(b) The first figure of $900 is based on the average cost per incident of CG 122 during its first six months of operation. The second figure of $1,273.59 is the average cost per incident of all Coast Guard Search and Rescue resources on the west coast, including seasonal inshore rescue boats (IRB's).

(c) In the North Saanich/Gulf Islands area, incidents are generally close to shore and seldom involve more than one auxiliary vessel. The average time spent on an incident in this area is about one hour. The figure of $20 is based on the reimbursement fee for out-of-pocket expenses by volunteers and does not include insurance charges which the Coast Guard pays.

In other areas along the B.C. coast, the average time to resolve a marine SAR incident is much longer and normally requires the participation of more than one auxiliary craft. In addition, auxiliary vessels outside the Gulf Islands/Greater Vancouver area are generally larger and more expensive to operate. The figure of $247.94 given in response to question 2,126 (3(c)), 17/02/81, includes the cost of insurance premiums paid by the government for each auxiliary incident.

Question No. 2,545—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

With reference to the answer to question No. 2,125 which stated $158,000 was allocated in the estimates to the organization and operation of the Coast Guard auxiliary in the western region for the calendar year 1980 and, of that, $119,837 was allocated to equipment, administration, re-imbursement to members, travel expenses and insurance coverage, for what reason is there a difference in the two totals of $38,163 and how were those funds spent?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Training costs for members of the CMRA(W) were not included in the figure of $119,837, nor were secretarial and printing services, all of which are shared in a common pool with the Coast Guard Boating Safety Detachment and Coast Guard Inshore Rescue Boat Operations. Costs on a shared basis for these services amounted to approximately $10,000.

The figure of $158,000 allocated in the estimates was for fiscal year 1980-81, not for calendar year 1980 as indicated in the question.

Underutilized funds of $30,000 from the 1980/81 allocation were applied to other CCG SAR resource requirements in the western region.

Order Paper Questions

Question No. 2,546—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 2,125, were funds distributed for the 1980 calendar year to the organization and operation of the Coast Guard auxiliary in the western region for re-imbursement to members of the auxiliary, travel expenses to attend meetings for members of the auxiliary and insurance coverage for boats of auxiliary personnel in the amount of $67,837 and, if so, how can one account for the difference between that amount and the $158,000 appearing in the budget for 1980-81?

2. Did the financial statement of the Canadian Marine Rescue Auxiliary (Western) Inc. state that the auxiliary received $49,121.06 from the government during the period ended March 31, 1981 and, if so, for what reason is there a difference between the amount indicated in Part 1 and the sum of $49,121.06?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The budgeted cost predictions for the administration and operation of the CMRA(W) in 1980 had to be based on estimates rather than historical data which did not exist.

Of the total allocation of $158,000, a sub-total of approximately $48,000 was spent on administration, including travel; a sub-total of approximately $68,000 was spent on reimbursement to auxiliarists for out-of-pocket expenses and insurance premiums and an additional sub-total of approximately $10,000 was spent on auxiliary training and secretarial and printing services.

Underutilized funds of approximately $30,000 were applied to other SAR resource requirements in the western region.

2. The financial statement of the Coast Guard Auxiliary ending 31/03/81 was prepared in early April and did not include quarterly insurance premiums (31/12/80—31/03/81) and outstanding SAR travel and incidental expenses, which were submitted in April/May 1981 but charged to 1980/81 funds. Invoices for the 1980/81 fiscal year are not yet all received but will now be paid from 1981/82 funds.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

[English]

Mr. Deans: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I wonder if I might inquire of the parliamentary secretary as to what became of the answer to my question No. 1483 which can be found on page 164 of the order paper for June 29, 1981. I am told by FIRA that the answer to the question, which was placed on the order paper on July 17, 1980, was given to the Prime Minister's Office within a matter of weeks of the question having been placed on the order paper. To this date there has been no reply. I would like to know whether or not the parliamentary secretary might inquire into the matter and report back to the House in order that I can come to grips with what has been a very difficult problem for a number of people.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I assume that since there is no answer printed in Hansard, it has not yet been given in the House. I shall look into the matter and see where that answer is.

• (1550)

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I am rising on what I think is—although the parliamentary secretary will probably have better track of this than I—probably the eighth time with regard to question No. 1852 which I placed on the order paper on December 9. This question is the responsibility of the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) who is responsible for the freedom of information legislation. I think we see an indication of the government's willingness to comply with this spirit of freedom of information legislation by their dealings with the answer to this question. It is clear that they do not deal with this whole matter seriously.

Before the parliamentary secretary gives his response, in case he comes up with the old saw about how complicated the question is, I would point out to him that the information for the answer to this question was supplied by the chairman of the CFDC to the minister several months ago so the answer could be given in less than two typed paragraphs. There is no excuse for the question not being answered.

I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could indicate whether this is simply a matter of the minister responsible for freedom of information having refused to give him the information.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, what may appear to be a simple answer expected by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) may, indeed, be complex from the point of view of the government. We undertake to make sure that hon. members are satisfied in every possible way. It may very well be that the question is much more complex than the hon. member thought when he put it on the order paper. I have looked into the matter and we are endeavouring to get the answer. I can only refer him to my previous answers to the same question.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

OIL SUBSTITUTION AND CONSERVATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C-77, respecting oil conservation and the substitution for oil of other energy sources be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Knowles: Let us hear from the minister.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for his invitation to address the House for a few minutes on this bill entitled an act respecting oil conservation and the substitution for oil of other energy sources. Bill C-77 provides for the implementation of the Canada oil substitution program which is a very important element for our National Energy Program.

The National Energy Program pointed out that Canada's problem is not really a shortage of energy but that, as a matter of fact, Canada is a net exporter of energy to the tune of roughly $3 billion every year.

We have a problem in connection with oil supply and particularly, we must deal with our pattern of energy consumption which relies on oil and is producing, in effect, a growing dependence on oil imports. Obviously we should do everything we can to increase oil supply in this country by new discoveries all over Canada. The fact is, however, that all experts agree that it will take a few years before an increase in supply can be relied upon. In fact, it was forecast, before the National Energy Program, that we would see our imports increase substantially until at least 1985-86 until new sources of supply from the tar sands plants and new discoveries in Canada lands, would become available.

The Government of Canada decided that in those circumstances it was essential that steps be taken to dramatically shift energy sources for Canadians away from oil and toward those forms of energy that we have in abundance, such as gas, electricity, renewable energy generally, and coal.

Related to this, obviously, we also have, in the National Energy Program, a very dynamic conservation program encouraging Canadians to save energy. Later this afternoon one of my colleagues will address the question of conservation, particularly through the CHIP and HIP programs for home insulation in this country that have been effective for a few years.

When talking about the Canada oil substitution program, we refer to our off-oil conversion program for residential and industrial heating. This program represents our most important single lever for rapid adjustment and it constitutes the cornerstone of our drive toward independence from the world oil market within this decade.

The goal of the Canadian Oil Substitution Program is to reduce the use of oil in the non-transportation sector, that is in the residential, commercial and industrial sectors, to 10 per cent of energy use by 1990. I am happy to report to the House that this is a goal that is universally accepted. The provinces and industry agree that it can be done with the co-operation and careful management of all parties concerned. But there is a long way to go. Oil now accounts for 37 per cent of the energy for heating homes in Canada.

[Translation]

For example, in my native province, Quebec, the percentage is even higher than 37 per cent which is the national average. If I remember well, some 61 per cent of Quebec homes are oil heated. Therefore, we are aiming high since we are striving to reduce that percentage in Quebec, for example, from 61 to 10 per cent during the coming decade.

[English]

For the whole of Canada, getting to 10 per cent means we need more than two million conversions of heating systems in this country over the next decade. As a matter of fact, our goal is to achieve this objective early in the decade rather than late in the decade. This will mean a large investment in all parts of Canada. It will mean the creation of new firms, new jobs for thousands of Canadians, and I am happy to see that many firms, organizations and individuals are arranging their affairs to take advantage of this development in the energy sector in Canada.

Clearly, however, this objective will not be reached without an assistance program because the capital cost of conversion will otherwise discourage many Canadians from making the shift. We have therefore set up a grant program that will make this feasible and will quickly pay back the investment for both sides through a reduced compensation payment on imported oil by the national government and through lower heating bills for individual Canadians.

[Translation]

In fact, COSP which we are asking the House to approve formally this afternoon under Bill C-77 meets various needs throughout Canada, since it will help Canadians through substantial grants to change their type of energy consumption and to convert from heating oil to other forms of energy, either gas, electricity, coal, wood or any other form of renewable energy. In addition, the government has defined the allowable costs in a very general way to make sure that the heating systems will be efficient and safe when Canadians will be converting their system to a form of energy other than oil.

The grant provided under this act and COSP will cover half of the conversion costs up to $800, and the eligible conversions will include the conversion of an oil fired heating unit to another type of fuel, converting it for instance into a gas burning unit. Also, the program will cover the costs of replacing an oil fired heating unit with a gas or electricity heating unit. Finally, the program will allow the addition of a back-up system, such as a wood stove or an electric heat pump, which would reduce the level of oil consumption in the current heating unit by at least 50 per cent.

We have put together a very flexible scheme which offers consumers a freedom of choice and, for all practical purposes, makes it possible for them to transform fully and completely their heating units if they want to, or to transform their units gradually, on condition that their converted systems uses at least 50 per cent less heating oil.

● (1600)

In effect this $800 grant is designed primarily to assist the home owner in meeting the up-front costs of converting. It will also be helpful to smaller commercial establishments. As far as centrally heated apartment buildings are concerned, a formula applies which will provide conversion grants of up to $5,500 per building, depending on the number of units.

Finally, for larger commercial and industrial buildings, we have come to the conclusion that the major incentive to convert will be the growing difference between the prices of oil and gas provided under the National Energy Program. As a matter of fact, we have foreseen that the wedge, or the spread, between the price of oil and gas, will increase appreciably over the coming decade. Already that spread is substantial indeed. In fact, in the past without grants or subsidies, we have seen that the price wedge has already led to hundreds of major conversions wherever natural gas service is available. Because of the nature of the country, the nature of the services that are available in Canada and the types of energy that are available here, we have had to develop a flexible program in order to respond to the availability of non-oil energy sources across the country. For the main part, I would say that the renewable portion of COSP applies across the country and that there are no differences to speak of while the gas and electrical components are tailored to regional availability and to provincial preferences.

We have had extensive discussions with the provinces during the last few months about this particular program. We have made every effort to tailor the program to answer the concerns of the various provincial governments. We have been led to introduce certain restrictions at the request of some provincial governments, taking into account their particular situations with regard to energy supply.

If we go across the country, I would say first that Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and the Territories where electricity is generated from oil and where natural gas service is many years away, COSP takes the form of a conversion program to the various renewable energy sources and, second, it takes the form of assistance to upgrade insulation and improve heating efficiency. What we have in those provinces is a program derived from COSP that we call super CHIP, which is the $800 available in the other provinces for conversion to natural gas, wood or electricity. In those provinces it becomes a program to convert to renewable resources. Also it can be used to add on to the existing CHIP program so that people can at least be assured they will have a very generous scheme for home insulation. Thereby we will be in a position to encourage conservation much more significantly in those provinces compared to any other strategy. In effect, in Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and the Territories we already have energy experts in the field who will recommend in detail improvements that home owners can make to reduce fuel consumption.

In the Maritime provinces, the National Energy Program provides for a fund of up to $500 million to assist with the construction of the natural gas pipeline to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Also if I can jump to the other side of the country, it will provide, if necessary, support for the construction of a gas pipeline to Vancouver Island so that COSP can provide broad assistance as rapidly as possible in those regions, so that people can switch away from oil as quickly as possible.

[Translation]

In Quebec, the program has already been announced. It is already being implemented with respect to the substitution for oil of all sources of renewable energy as well as natural gas. The public is aware of the nature of this program. It provides any single family with grants of up to $800, but such grants may come as high as $5,500 in the case of multiple-unit housing. The problem which remains outstanding has to do with the conversion to electricity. I was surprised to learn from a number of my colleagues in the House that people calling Hydro-Quebec are told that the government of Canada alone is responsible for the fact that grants for conversion to electricity are still not available and that they must contact their federal member of Parliament to settle that problem. I want to say very clearly to the people of Quebec that if they are given that type of information over the telephone by people from Hydro-Quebec, it is definitely unfounded. In fact, in the past few weeks I have had a number of conversations with my colleague the Quebec energy minister, and I was expecting an answer from the Quebec cabinet on June 3 last.

For all sorts of reasons the Quebec government have found it impossible to reach a conclusion on that issue until these past few days. I am scheduled to meet very soon with my Quebec counterpart, Mr. Duhaime, with a view to settling that question as soon as possible. I certainly regret the very protracted delays we had to experience in Quebec as a result of that situation, and I hope that as a result of my forthcoming meeting with Mr. Duhaime we will be in a position to announce to the people of Quebec that without any further delay they will become eligible for the $800 grant to convert to electricity. Be that as it may, I must point out that since the program was first made public, the government of Canada has been ready and willing to make those conversions to electricity eligible for the grant and that we are waiting for the Quebec government to give us the green light to launch the program efficiently for all Quebec residents who are anxious to change their heating system to electricity.

I entertain every hope that we will reach agreement very rapidly and, in that case, the people of Quebec will be able to benefit fully and without any restrictions from all aspects of the Canadian Oil Substitution Program.

I would now like to deal with the other provinces west of Quebec—

● (1610)

[English]

First, in Ontario and Manitoba where virtually all alternatives to oil are widely available, COSP will apply fully. It will have the enthusiastic co-operation of the gas utilities and, we anticipate of electric utilities including the several hundred independent public utility companies in Ontario which are being invited to participate in the program delivery.

We have had many meetings and discussions with those utilities and we have had discussions with the provincial governments concerned. I am happy to report that we have received the full co-operation of everyone. In those two provinces, this program is already fully effective. I invite the public to make full use of that program.

I have already talked about Manitoba. In the other prairie provinces, Saskatchewan and Alberta, it is a fact that they are largely off oil. Alberta is very much the model province for COSP. Alberta has already reduced its residential use of oil to below 10 per cent. That is an achievement which is indeed remarkable, when we think of the oil that the province has and also the gas. I am happy to pay tribute to the foresight of consecutive administrations in that province which have pushed actively for the consumption of natural gas. In that province, by a very large margin, oil consumption for residential, commercial and industrial purposes is very much below that in other provinces.

The program of conversion to gas and electricity is not operating at this time in Saskatchewan, I regret, in view of the provincial government's preference for an alternative more appropriate to the province's circumstances. At the present time there are discussions between the two governments. I hope we will be able to reach an early agreement so that the people of Saskatchewan can have the full benefit of this program like people in most other provinces in Canada.

COSP will apply in Alberta for conversions to gas and renewables. There remains a considerable potential for rural conversions to gas in the northern part of Alberta.

In British Columbia the COSP program will help extend the use of natural gas on the mainland and eventually on Vancouver Island in line with provincial government priorities. That provincial government has resisted the extension of the program to conversion to electricity. Therefore, the program will essentially be applicable to conversions to natural gas.

A separate component of COSP is being developed in discussions with each province to provide funds over the 1980s toward the expansion of distribution systems for gas, electricity and renewable energy resources. This, too, will be a flexible instrument directly tailored to provincial and regional needs and priorities. However, this program will not become effective during the current fiscal year. It will not begin until the 1982-83 fiscal year at the earliest.

After having said a few words about the extent of the program and how it covers the country, I would like to say something about the delivery agents for this program. The gas and electric utilities play a very important role in the delivery of the gas and electric part of COSP. They are the channel for application forms and program material and a source of information on program rules and the conversion alternatives available. Once home owners have converted, they return completed application forms to the utilities concerned, either hydro or the gas utilities. These forms can then be verified and forward to the federal government which will issue the grants directly to those who have converted to gas or electricity.

With regard to the renewable and conservation portions of the COSP program, that will be delivered on behalf of my department by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. This will be done following the two-stage application process adapted by the Canadian Home Insulation Program, CHIP. When there is a request for an application form, the form is sent out, completed and processed on the basis of the application form. This allows for much better control of the grant process. There will first be the COSP application request card and then a personalized application information package. This will ensure that we will be able to reduce to a minimum the possibility of a misuse of funds provided under this program.

The delivery agents, whether the utilities or CMHC, will establish that conversions have in fact taken place, that they are eligible under the rules and that invoices support the work actually done and the equipment actually installed. These are important tasks which help prevent abuse and ensure efficiency in the operation of COSP. The delivery agents are reimbursed for performing these steps. We have reached agreements with the various utilities whereby we pay them a certain amount for each application form that is processed. Therefore, the utilities, whether hydro or gas utilities, will not lose money as a result of processing these forms.

Furthermore, there will be an important link between the gas and electric components of the program on the one hand, and the delivery system for the renewables component of COSP on the other. There will be an automatic computer check of applications against gas and electric applications to ensure that duplicate grants are not paid at any address unless permitted by COSP rules.

To prevent abuse of public funds and to ensure that individuals make informed decisions about converting, the distribution of application forms is handled exclusively by utilities for gas and electricity and by CMHC for renewables. This can be explained further in the context of the various steps being taken to provide good advice to applicants.

Before concluding, I would like to say a few words about the question of advice to applicants.

[Translation]

I indicated quite clearly that our program would give Canadians wishing to convert their oil heating system the widest possible choice. Of course this flexibility is somewhat limited in some provinces because of decisions taken by the provinces themselves or because some sources of energy, like natural gas, are simply not available. But it is up to the applicant to decide when conversion will take place and what source of energy he will convert to, as well as what type of equipment he would purchase. I want to make it positively clear that the decision is up to the individual.

Naturally, there are various factors that come into play, for instance the individual's personal preferences but the government will do nothing to influence the individual in choosing one solution rather than another. However, under this program the government wants to encourage Canadians to consider carefully all the alternatives and to ask the relevant questions. In fact, there is a whole range of services available to individuals considering conversion. First there are the brochures on the Canada Oil Substitution Program, which recommend that homes be better insulated, that overly large heating systems be avoided and that several estimates on the work to be done be obtained; other pamphlets have been prepared on each alternative energy source eligible under the oil substitution program; and, finally, various publications of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources of Canada deal with heating efficiency and energy savings. In addition, the advisory service of EnerSave provides free inspection by mail to determine insulation needs and a free telephone information service is also placed at the disposal of Canadians. Finally, my department has opened regional offices in each province and both territories to provide information about the program; in every case, the telephone numbers may be dialed toll free.

I just about forgot to mention that my department has Enercentre stands in shopping centres and other public places throughout the country to provide information on energy programs, including the Canada Oil Substitution Program. Finally, public utilities, that is both the hydro companies and the natural gas companies, for instance, are other major sources of information on the criteria of the program and conversions to gas or electricity.

• (1620)

The objective of this whole set of sources of material and information is to allow citizens to proceed to the transformation of their heating systems away from oil and to allow them to make their decisions concerning their applications for grants with adequate information at hand. Vast experience suggests that if application forms for the grant program proliferate, the risk of fraud and uninformed decision-making increases.

In conclusion, COSP is a major, essential part of the National Energy Program. It goes directly to the problem of oil imports with a solution that is based on the use of cheaper and more abundant domestic alternatives. The program will have a raid pay-off in terms of lower heating bills. COSP will also benefit the suppliers of the alternative fuels. It will benefit manufacturers of gas and electrical equipment, wood burning systems and solar systems. It will benefit retailers of oil equipment and systems. It will benefit thousands of private contractors who will make these installations all over the country. It will spur the development of technology and the introduction of more efficient heating equipment. COSP will have a payoff for the country in reduced dependence on expensive oil imports and in growing energy securities. COSP in that sense is a global and team effort of people all over the country, and I urge the House to give this program its enthusiastic support.

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, we on this side are pleased to be able to look at Bill C-77 which encompasses COSP. I just want to draw to your attention that this bill was not available to anyone on this side, at least not to myself, until two o'clock.

The minister in his opening remarks on the Canadian oil substitution program talked about the need to become energy self-sufficient, or self-sufficient in oil, and to remove the people of Canada from the use of oil as an energy product without affecting the use of oil in transportation.

At the outset I would like to say that we on this side have some questions, and we will get to those I am sure when we are in Committee of the Whole on this bill. The one thing I should like to point out to the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, is that devising a program encompassing all of Canada is not like devising a program that encompasses a smaller country. Our nation, with its different climatic changes, different energy supplies, different natural resources in each region, is a very vast country, and it is almost impossible to apply a universal program, as, I am sure the minister and his officials have found out. I am sure the minister and his officials have worked hard to try to make the program apply universally with the same effect on every citizen in our country. This has nothing to do really with provincial governments or the lack of co-operation. This relates to the nature of our country.

We feel there is one area in which the minister could find an additional 120,000 barrels of oil every day in Canada, if he would put his mind to it. He could do so by coming to an agreement with the province of Alberta regarding oil cutbacks in Canada. He would then find an additional 120,000 barrels of oil in Canada he does not have to import from overseas suppliers.

When we look at the problems different provinces have had with the application of the universal program of COSP, we should briefly touch upon situation which exists in the two western provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

We in Saskatchewan are being denied 50 per cent of this program. At the request of the provincial government, and I am sure this is not the fault of the federal government, natural gas and electrical power should not be included in this grant program. Therefore, all we have available in Saskatchewan is renewable grants or grants in respect of wood. I find that very strange because in my province we rely on electricity for a considerable amount of our heating. I guess this is because in my province a lot of natural gas is imported from our neighbouring province of Alberta and used to generate electricity. That to me is a very ridiculous program, particularly when we consider the vast hydro resources that exist in northern Saskatchewan. I will later be asking the minister several questions that I am sure he posed to the provincial government of Saskatchewan, and I hope he will be able to supply some answers.

The need for energy self-sufficiency within Canada is not something new that the Liberal party which forms this government has come upon recently. On December 6, 1973 the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a statement to the effect that the main priority of his government at that time was to reach energy self-sufficiency by 1980. I believe he said the end of the decade, and I presume that meant 1980. I would doubt that the statement we have heard that we will become energy self-sufficient by 1990 has any more credibility than the previous statement made in 1973.

I would like to put forward a supposition, and later ask the minister to comment. As regards the methodology used to reach energy self-sufficiency by 1990, I presume officials built a supply curve. I assume the minister's department theorized, added a few tar sands plants and a few renewable resources and built a theoretical supply curve. Then, I presume, the people in the minister's department said: we know in the year 1990 we have to cross this curve because the government's policy is self-sufficiency by that time. By building a mythical supply curve and taking the year 1990 as the crossover point, I assume the government arrived at the decision that Canada would have energy self-sufficiency by 1990.

I hope the methodology of that supply curve will be made available to hon. members on this side of the House at a later date or, hopefully, in the Committee of the Whole. There have been some problems with government involvement and with CHIP in the recent past. One of those problems has been in relation to the amount of time people eligible for those grants have had to wait for them. I hope the minister will act to reduce this burden because interest costs are now running at 21 per cent or 22 per cent. These people deserve to receive their grants quickly. Perhaps rather than sending grants from a central location, several offices could be established across Canada. This would enable people to receive their grants much sooner.

Offices have been established by the minister's department in Edmonton and Calgary to handle the Canadian oil substitution program. In both cities I doubt very much if there are 500 people who are presently using oil. The off-oil program in those two cities does not keep the offices very busy. If the minister checks with the people staffing those offices, he will find that they are having a very relaxing time because there is just not much demand in those two cities.

As the minister stated, there is a vast rural natural gas program in Alberta. We in Saskatchewan do not have that. However, there are reserves of natural gas in Saskatchewan which could enable us to have natural gas available throughout rural Saskatchewan comparable to the situation in the province of Alberta, if only the federal-provincial atmosphere were a little more favourable. In this instance I think I can point particularly to the provincial government.

Six months ago the premiers of the prairie provinces briefly discussed an electric power grid. It was proposed that a joint network of power grids be run from Manitoba through Saskatchewan and into Alberta. In this case I find it strange that the provincial governments appear to be waiting for funding from the federal government in 1982 or sometime in 1983. I find that not to be much to my liking. As much as I feel sometimes that the minister is responsible for some things, I think in this case the minister is not to blame. The premiers in this case do not have the ability to get together and run a power grid which would serve all the people of the prairie provinces.

While hon. members on this side welcome the Canadian oil substitution program, we do not find it to be a program which will be applied equally to the people of Canada. We find that regrettable. It is another example of trying to establish a universal program for a country as diverse as ours. We look forward to some of the answers we will receive from the minister when we go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want first of all to indicate to the minister that I think it is obvious to everyone that the direction of the program makes good sense. I do not think anyone looking at the problems of Canada and the problems of the world today in terms of the availability of oil could quarrel with a series of programs which ultimately will reduce our dependence on the petroleum companies of this nation and of the world.

On balance I think the program is supportable. However, I want to raise a few concerns. No one really believes we can continue forever to depend on oil. I once said in the House—and I believe it as strongly today as I did the day I said it—that I hate to think of the value of the last drop of oil when we finally find it. I am always concerned that we are putting, even yet, too much of our time and effort into the seeking of that elusive last drop of oil rather than spending more time, effort and money on the development of those alternatives which are renewable and will last through a number of generations.

I am never happy with the predictions of the oil companies. I can recall not so many years ago when we were told quite clearly by the oil companies that we had sufficient oil to meet our demand needs for the foreseeable future, whatever that was—for a great time into the future, at least. It only became apparent when the price of oil started to rise in the world markets that the oil companies were either hoodwinking us, unable to tell accurately what the supply situation really was, or taking advantage of a situation which had arisen.

I think the future rests almost entirely on conservation. The off-oil policy is a good policy. In the short run, we have to utilize the existing alternatives, but I think the long-term future lies almost entirely in energy sources which to this point in time are probably little used and may even be quite costly.

It is toward cost that I want to address my remarks because, frankly, I am concerned. I have a nagging worry about the future. We are encouraging people to move from oil to electricity, natural gas and other energy sources, and quite rightly so. However, as people move to other energy sources, we have to keep in mind that the ownership of the energy source to which people are moving remains very much within the ambit of responsibility of the very same people who currently own the oil. I am worried about the fact that we may well be moving people to those alternatives and that the end result may be price gouging.

I raise that because if anyone were to ask me today where he should put his money, if he has any, I would advise him to put it into banking or other related institutions because they seem to be making a buck or two these days. I would advise him to put it into energy, and particularly oil.

A statement is written up in today's newspapers indicating Imperial Oil is not prepared to go ahead with the Cold Lake project unless it is guaranteed a 20 per cent return on its investment. As we look at the rest of the economy, we must ask ourselves what kind of people are these people who insist on 20 per cent profit when any number of small businesses is going out of business today and when all other sectors, with the exception of banking and related concerns, are facing very serious profit crunches. What kind of people are they who, because they happen to have a product which is essential to the well-being of Canadians, will hold Canadians to ransom and demand from Canadians a guaranteed profit level in this wonderful free enterprise system in which they live? It made me stop and think when I read about it because I realized, as I looked at Imperial Oil with all its diversification, that it is entirely possible we are asking people to move from using oil to alternative sources of energy at a considerable cost to themselves and the public purse, and they will still end up buying from Imperial Oil. Imperial Oil will still be extracting this usurious amount of profit from these unsuspecting souls ten years from now.

Therefore, I want to suggest to the minister that while it is important, which I cannot deny, that we move away from dependence on oil, if only because it is a finite resource, and we encourage conservation and the utilization of renewable resources, we must at the same time put in place mechanisms to monitor both the availability, price and the profit flow from this absolutely essential commodity. I do not want to see us have another combines investigation of the new companies which are going to be set up to meet the energy requirements ten or 15 years from now and then discover, when that investigation is complete, that during this period of concern over availability of energy, these selfsame companies who ripped us off—I think a lot of people would admit that has happened over the last ten or 15 years to the tune of many billions of dollars—are simply able to rip us off even more by virtue of investing most of that money in alternative resources which are not monitored or controlled.

I do not want to see people put in the position of converting from one source to another only to find the cost of providing for their energy needs is no longer controlled or monitored, and they are going to find themselves paying exorbitant amounts of money to these companies which operate today in what they see is a very lucrative area. They will demand from those consumers that same 20 per cent profit level they are demanding in today's newspaper.

Who is going to bear the cost of what we are doing today? The taxpayer will at every level. It does not matter whether it is directly through their taxes or the price of energy, they are going to carry that cost. We have the direct costs, the cost of replacement of heating units, in some cases the cooking units. That is a direct cost, and the government through this program has made available sums of money to compensate for it, but of course that is money raised through taxes of one kind or another. Then there are the indirect costs the consumer will have to bear. Those are costs the major companies in the field are able to write off against taxes they should be paying. It is the cost of subsidies, write-offs and tax concessions. These companies demand on the one hand a 20 per cent return on investment, and on the other hand they write off against their taxes costs of exploration for research and development into alternative energy sources. So in every single instance, all the way down the line, the cost is going to be borne by the consumer.

Now I say to the minister in all fairness, I really do worry about the fact we do not yet have a handle on the way the major energy corporations are able to reach into the consumers' pockets. We do not have a way of monitoring fairly and accurately the degree to which they are able, year after year, to take from the unsuspecting and, in many cases, unprotected consumer. Of course, they would argue that, having taken for years when there was a sufficient supply of energy, as the supply begins to dwindle they need to get even more because, after all, it is in short supply. It then becomes a commodity with a much greater value because there is not nearly as much of it.

So I want to suggest to the minister that while I support the thrust of what he is doing and while I recognize that in both the long and short term it is preferable we move from the heavy reliance we have on oil to reliance on renewable resources, I want to be sure the government is going to put in place mechanisms to monitor the price to the consumer in order to guarantee there cannot be the kind of obvious rip-off that Imperial Oil is attempting to perpetrate on the Canadian public by their demand for ever higher prices in order to get a 20 per cent return.

I realize the government may not be prepared to admit to Imperial Oil that they can have a 20 per cent return. I can appreciate it may well be the government does not support Imperial Oil in that demand, but what worries me is that this company, the largest of the large, with untold reserves of capital, which for many years has had a privileged position in Canadian society and has been able to recover all of its costs by way of tax write-offs and concessions, and which has had to spend little in the way of after-tax dollars in the development of its enterprise, seems to think that a 20 per cent level is a fair return. They seem to think because they are in the field of energy it is all right to expect 20 per cent, given of course that the Canadian taxpayers have already put $40 million into the Cold Lake project.

An hon. Member: Good investment.

Mr. Deans: It could be a good investment, nobody is going to deny that, provided it does not permit Imperial Oil to then demand a pound of flesh from the consumers.

I want therefore to suggest to the minister that concurrent with this legislation, with these expenditures and initiatives, a way to guarantee protection for the Canadian consumer must be put quickly in place. As we encourage people to move from the use of oil to other resources, we must recognize those resources will in most instances be in the private sector and we must put in place a means of assuring that the kind of unwarranted, unacceptable and unjustifiable rip-off which has taken place over many years by the multinational oil companies is put to an end. Also we should ensure that no measure can be taken by any of the producers of the new energy sources which will allow them to do to us in Canada what the oil companies have been able to do over the course of the last 15 or 20 years.

● (1650)

I do not want to see old age pensioners putting most if not all of their expendable life savings into making this change-over. I do not want them to suddenly discover that they are paying two or three times what they were paying previously, simply because the persons who are producing the new energy source think they have a captive market. We must be very cautious about that. I have seen it happen too many times; once they have consumers in a vice-like grip, where they have already made the investment and can no longer afford to reinvest, the price begins to escalate. Of course the end result is that people are forced to cut back in many other areas.

There are large numbers of families across the country who can ill-afford to make any further cuts in their standard of living in order to satisfy the greed of energy producers in this country or in any other country. I am not talking so much about gas because I realize there is the National Energy Board before which hearings will be conducted and prices established. Also I realize that, in the area of electricity, there are procedures, at least in Ontario and, I suspect, in other provinces where hearings are to be held, to determine the price structure and price level. I am talking about the newer more innovative methods, the renewable resources we are hoping will become a major part of the Canadian energy scene. Sometime between now and next year we should quickly put in place a method to guarantee that what Imperial Esso is attempting to do cannot be done by anyone else entering the energy field in Canada in the future.

I want the minister to say to Imperial Esso that the 20 per cent is too damned much, that this is not a game we are in. No one can expect to get a 20 per cent profit margin guaranteed by the public of Canada. Imperial Esso cannot expect this, nor can anyone else. If Esso wants to continue to have access to our oil resource, the oil of the public of Canada, then it better act in a responsible way and recognize that every penny of the cost will ultimately be borne by the consumer and the taxpayer.

No matter how Esso juggles its figures, it cannot possibly justify what it is requesting in economically hard times such as the ones we are experiencing now. It is a situation which, I suspect, we will be in for some time to come. The minister should put in place some way to ensure that we will never again be left at the mercy of greed. This is what it is. I would have thought by now that companies operating in the country would have realized that greed cannot be tolerated, that there is no place for it. We cannot afford them if that is what they expect us to do. We would much rather do it ourselves than have it done for us and done to us at the same time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Before putting the question it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski)—Railways—Measures to aid movement of increased grain exports—Government policy on use of railway services; the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight)—Agriculture—Increase in number of eligible townships;—the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper)—Indian Affairs—Department's treatment of Manitoba Indian bands.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

OIL SUBSTITUTION AND CONSERVATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-77, an Act respecting oil conservation and the substitution for oil of other energy sources, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Ethier in the chair.

[English]

On Clause 2—Definitions

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, at the outset I should like to say how much I appreciate the minister's outline of the bill. Rarely in recent years have we had from him this type of comprehensive yet objective account of his legislation. I think this should be pointed out.

I do not think there is any question that the House in general understands and supports the purpose of the oil substitution program, but I would like to raise a series of small points, if I may, in the hope that in the performance of the bill under the minister's administration we can improve it somewhat.

My first point has already been covered by the minister, namely, that we require a separate type of program with each province. I am conscious of the fact that he dealt very lightly with the province of Saskatchewan which did not have much reason for barring those people of Saskatchewan from the federal program who had converted to electricity or natural gas. I will say no more about that. It is up to the people of Saskatchewan to skin their own shunks. I suppose they will do it within the next year or so.

My second point concerns the philosophy of the program, and I want to end my remarks with a question. It is a good philosophy to get as many people in the low technology systems as possible to move away from the consumption of oil. It is particularly good, if the alternative is cheaper not only than the present price of oil but the future price as well.

I am somewhat concerned about the fact that there is so much pressure to convert to natural gas or to electricity. I do not believe they will meet the test of low-cost energy for the people of Canada. When I look at the interest rates and the capital intensity of the structure of moving with electricity and the production of electricity, I know that these interest rates will show up in high prices for electricity for many years to come. Be that as it may, certain things can be done that were not specifically mentioned by the minister in his remarks today which I believe come under this bill.

The bill tries to provide encouragement through incentives in the form of a grant to get people to convert from oil to any type of energy which is generally available and, hopefully, cheaper. Will the minister tell the committee whether a heat pump will be acceptable under this grant system?

• (1700)

Before the minister rises, I want to point out the fact that all across Canada, but particularly in rural areas, almost every farmer has a well, a dug-out or some form of water nearby with which he can heat his house. Many people have lawns in front of their houses and gardens at the back on which there is enough heat stored in the form of solar heat which will heat a house during the winter. This has been done for 50 or 60 years; but the heat must be converted into a form which can be used by interposing a heat pump. A heat pump is not a new device. It has been used by the housewives of our country for some 60 years in the form of refrigerators which take the heat out of food and pump it onto the floor. That same type of apparatus can take heat out of air, out of the ground and out of water and put it into the house. At the present time this method is much cheaper than the heat obtained from oil or natural gas. I would like to ask the minister whether a heat pump will come under the $800 provision in this bill.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, first, I would like to thank the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain for his kind words. I would like to take this opportunity to stress his well-known interest in this field for many years.

I would like to answer the hon. member very quickly. Heat pumps will be eligible for conversion grants. Obviously, this depends on the agreements we have with the various provinces. We do not yet have an agreement with Saskatchewan, and in Nova Scotia this matter is still being negotiated. However, in all the other provinces heat pumps are eligible for the grant. I hope that since discussions have started again with the government of Saskatchewan, this will become the case in that province. Although heat pumps represent a large investment it is our view that they also imply very substantial savings in terms of energy consumption and particularly of converting from oil.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I would like to put this thought forward to the minister, Mr. Chairman. I hope that when he is negotiating with the province of Saskatchewan, which above all other provinces needs this type of item in the arsenal for fighting home heating costs, he will consider what I have to say. With the research that has been done in the last two years I feel I can say fairly accurately—and the minister can verify this through the National Research Council—that if you are heating your home out of air, the co-efficient of performance is about 1.6 to one. I know that is the Canadian Standards Association level for Ontario, but it also applies in Saskatchewan. If you are heating your home with water or from the ground, as long as you put your heat exchanger below the frost line or below the ice in the water source—in the case of wells that is always open—you can obtain a co-efficient of performance of close to four to one. Translated into dollars and cents, that means if you tried to heat your home out of the air around your home over the year, a dollar spent for electricity to run the electric motor, which runs the compressor in the heat pump, will give you $1.60 worth of heat. This, it is a good deal. But if you heat your home with a heat pump where your heat is obtained from a constant source, such as the water in a river under the ice of the water in a dug-out or a well underneath the ice, and if you have built a storage thank, you obtain a co-efficient of performance of approximately four to one. At present prices, that means $1.00 of electricity gives you $4 worth of heat. That is a tremendous saving. Of course, that saving increases if oil prices rise.

Something to remember about a heat pump—that is where the difficulty might arise for the minister—is that in those provinces if you put a heat pump into your home, you are required to have a back-up furnace, either an electric one or an oil or gas furnace. If you put the heat pump beside the existing furnace and use the same fans and electrical system to operate it, your installation ban be at a minimum cost. I hope the minister will suggest to his officials and to the provinces when he is dealing with them that when they deal with applications for heat pumps, it will not be a requirement to remove your old furnace when putting in a heat pump. If the heat pump will provide you with over 50 per cent of the heat supply for your house, you should not be required to remove your old furnace. I would like to ask the minister whether this is looked after in the regulations.

Mr. Lalonde: The comments made by the hon. member are confirmed—it would be quite a challenge to match the hon. member's own expertise in this field. I would like to tell the hon. member that there is no requirement under the federal rules for the existing system to be removed if one wishes to instal a heat pump. As a matter of fact, we quite understand that an existing system can very well be maintained. The only requirement is that the new system which is to be installed must replace at least 50 per cent of the oil consumption which occurred before installation. As the hon. member has explained, that would be achieved by the installation of a heat pump.

I understand that some utility companies in certain provinces insist on the previous system being kept. For instance, the government of Quebec is considering an arrangement whereby it would allow conversion to electricity only in so far as the previous system would still be maintained as a back-up with the possibility of converting to oil or gas later on. I do not expect there would be great difficulty in this regard. It is a matter in which the provinces could have an influence in terms of their powers over provincial utilities. As far as we are concerned, we certainly do not intend to make any such requirement, that is, we see no problem with keeping the back-up system in operation.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I appreciate very much what the minister has just said. It has been my experience that no matter how well intentioned your programs are, they can sometimes be messed up, to use a polite word, in the translations, and through the regulations in the various types of programs.

I have several other questions. I do not want to take up too much time but I would like to offer some suggestions to the minister. I do not think my suggestions can be covered at the present time under this bill. They might very well be covered in the next version of the bill. I am talking about the fact that one of the ways we can save money and the use of oil is by utilizing in our heating systems passive solar energy. For instance, I would like to use one example. The province of Saskatchewan has developed a very convenient and simple technique for storing heat from passive solar energy through the use of sodium sulphate mixed with peat. Without going into all the fancy details, a person can build a storage facility for a small home which would cost only $1,000. That facility can store the surplus heat provided by solar energy through ordinary windows. That is why it is called "passive". You can store the heat from days when the sun is shining and bring that heat back into your home during the night.

The research work in this field which has been done by the province of Saskatchewan shows that the technique is long-lasting. Incidentally, the first place where this apparatus is being sold is in Ottawa. It is very simple for a person to handle this apparatus. It is just like the ice pack that you take along on a trip in the summer to keep things cold. You can buy any number of bags. They can be set along your windows to collect enough heat to heat a house, according to the experimental work which has been carried out. All the time that the sun is shining and the room is hotter than 70 degrees in the sunshine hours, heat is being collected into these bags. The minute the room temperature drops below 70 degrees, the bags begin to pass out the heat they have collected. This is a simple type of technology. If one were to spend money on that and to add to one's passive heat it would be a substitution for oil. I know it is not possible the way the bill reads now. I wish the minister would keep in mind that if anyone can offer a proven technique to reduce the use of oil, it should be included in the bill, just as a stove is. I just thought I would throw it to the minister and hope he will keep it in mind.

I want to move on to some more realistic ideas, Mr. Chairman. We waste a tremendous amount of heat in our homes through the gray water that goes out into the sewers. By gray water I mean water from washing machines, the baths and sinks, water which is dirty and so is called gray water. Usually it goes out still containing heat. Some research has been done by the University of Saskatchewan which shows that by spending about $100 for a heat transfer system, the heat could be extracted from the water and transferred to a water heater. This is only legal in Saskatchewan, however. The minister could approach the other provinces with a view to having them change their health regulations to allow individual householders to direct the gray water to a tank where the heat could be extracted and then transferred to the hot water tank. This would save 50 per cent of the cost of heating water in the household, which at present is roughly $200 per year. This is a type of proposal that I think we could sneak into the bill as a way of getting individuals to adopt methods which would save a substantial amount of oil.

There is one thing that I hope the minister will take up with the Minister of Finance, Mr. Chairman. The bill provides for an $800 incentive taxable grant. In the propane legislation it is $400. Other legislation gives a two-year accelerated write-off to anyone who uses renewable energy hardware. I have already written to the Minister of Finance with a suggestion. I wonder if the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources could support me in saying that in order to be fair in applying this to all Canadians, this proposal, which only applies to those income taxpayers who have capital cost allowances under their form of income tax, should be extended to individuals who live in towns and country homes, who do not qualify for the capital cost allowances that farmers and businessmen qualify for.

If those millions of people who live in town or city homes had access to the same type of tax incentive as the farmer or businessman who has the advantage of the capital cost allowance provision, it would be a break for them. Officials in the Department of Finance are familiar with the tax credit concept. If this could be applied, it would be a tremendous incentive to the people who have to go into the more extensive, expensive types of conversion. A heat pump for a small home will cost about $2,000 or $2,500 and close to $3,000 including installation. The incentive to the taxpayer, if he could get the same deal as the person who was claiming a capital cost allowance, would be tremendous.

It is estimated in the United States that in the next ten years there will be a heat pump in almost every home, and certainly in every building. Billions of dollars worth of business will be generated in providing these heat pumps for heating and cooling. There is roughly $15 billion worth of business for Canada in the next 15 years as well. I think the individual who puts up money for the conversions in order to save oil, natural gas and electricity, is probably doing more for his country than can be done in any other way and without great expense to the government. What the government can do to get people to convert from oil to other energy is nothing compared to what 24 million Canadians could do who are willing to convert, first of all, because it is cheaper, second, because it is cleaner, and third, because it is renewable. We can push this concept of conversion from oil to natural gas and electricity by using the knowledge which is available to us.

I am not going to ask a question, Mr. Chairman. I want to conclude by congratulating the minister again for bringing this legislation forward and allowing us to ask him some questions. I hope he will consider the suggestion that I have made to improve the legislation and make it available to all Canadians. If so, we could achieve this conversion from oil to other energies more rapidly than this bill can by itself.

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Chairman, before asking one or two specific questions, I want to make some brief remarks and indicate that although I agree with the direction of this bill, I have some misgivings. First of all, I want to touch briefly on the universality of the program, second, on the incentives for conversion and third, on incentives for the supply and distribution of a specific form of energy.

I was involved in the rural natural gas program in Alberta which gave monetary incentives for supply and distribution rather than for conversion. The provincial government made sure that gas was available, through co-operatives, that it could be tapped by users and that it paid, to a large degree, the supply-cost to the user. In some cases the subsidy amounted to $2,900 per user and in other cases it was less.

It effectively guaranteed that the price of the energy supplied would not exceed the price of other energy forms. Before anyone connected to a natural gas system, he had some guarantee that the price of his energy would be lower than other forms of energy in the foreseeable future.

I shall ask the minister whether in the negotiations on energy pricing in Canada, he is going to guarantee to all persons who hook up to natural gas, that the price will be 65 per cent or 75 per cent of the price of oil. He might tuck that in the back of his mind so that he can answer it later.

The incentive for moving in this direction is a saving on the consumption of oil, but it is also really a saving on the federal government's subsidy for imported oil. That is the real incentive. When I look at the chart showing the growth of oil consumption and natural gas consumption in Canada, they show that over the period 1962-1976, the consumption of natural gas increased three and a half times while the consumption of oil increased twice. I do not think the figures have changed too much since 1976 when the residential area was using 265,000 barrels of oil a day, the commercial sector was using 100,000 barrels of oil a day and the industrial sector was using 220,000 barrels of oil a day. From what the minister has said, I gather he is looking for a saving of something in the order of 100,000 barrels to 150,000 barrels of oil usage in Canada. Therefore, there is a saving in federal government subsidies for imported oil because the government is subsidizing the imported oil going to the Atlantic and eastern provinces.

I do not think there are many of us who do not realize that the energy utilization in Canada will shift to gaseous fuels and electricity, or to solar energy and heat pumps, as the former speaker indicated, but primarily for a period in the future it will be gaseous fuels and electricity. Gaseous fuels are natural ones. They can be transported through pipelines with a very high Btu content. This includes natural gas and synthetic gas from coal and biomass, as well as hydrogen produced basically from electricity, as was indicated in the report of the committee.

But if one is going to move to provide incentives for conversion to the natural gas area or to the gaseous fuel area and electricity, surely one must look at the cost of supply of these systems. One must look at the cost of the availability as well as the distribution of that fuel for residential use. I suggest that if you reduce the cost of supply and distribution greatly, because the end user's costs are always three or four times the cost of the fuel itself, by the time you factor in the cost of supply and distribution, particularly with the interest rates we have now of more than 20 per cent, the real incentives to the users are not necessarily the end cost of the fuel itself but massive subsidization of the supply and distribution system.

It bothers me that there is no crash program in existence in Canada today, I mean a crash program to distribute the enormous quantities of gaseous fuels that we have available in Canada to all areas of our country. We must not only supply it to an area but distribute it to the people, and the costs of distribution are high. I would have thought that the federal government, besides coming forward with a conversion program, because conversion is done automatically when the supply is there and the costs are right, would undertake, on an emergency basis, a program of supply of gaseous fuels literally to most of the nation. Second, I would have thought the federal government would provide the necessary subsidization of the distribution system so the costs of supplying it can be brought to the users at reasonable rates.

I have two questions for the minister. Does he have under consideration any grants or subsidization whatever in relation to the cost of supply and the cost of distribution of gaseous fuels as well as electricity?

I was involved in the western grid system and the availability of hydro power. The distribution of electricity throughout the west, was enormous costly. Does the minister have a subsequent program of supply and distribution for gaseous fuels as well as for electricity for residential conversion from oil to gas? Second, can the minister guarantee a price structure to the people who convert from oil to natural gas so that the cost of natural gas will be consistently lower than the equivalent cost of oil on a Btu basis?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, on the first question asked by the hon. member, I indicated in my earlier remarks that we have already set aside a fund of $500 million to help construct a gas pipeline to the maritimes. Part of that money may also be available to help the completion of a gas pipeline to Vancouver Island so that all regions in this country will be provided with a gas trunk line system.

As to the second element on the help to expand the distribution systems, we have also provided funds that will become available next year at the earliest for the expansion of distribution systems in areas where it is uneconomical to do so at this time. We would not seek general subsidization for the expansion of gas lines or electricity lines anywhere in any province. It would be in places only where expansion would imply massive substitution away from oil in those areas where it is marginally uneconomical at the present time. A fund of this type would be available for this purpose.

As far as the second question raised by the hon. member is concerned, I am having discussions with the producing provinces on a new oil and gas agreement at the moment. I can tell him that all the producing provinces agree that there should be a significant differential in favour of gas compared to oil. This is very much a basic element of our own policy. I can say that as far as the national government is concerned and as far as the governments of the producing provinces are concerned, we are all in agreement that we should maintain an appreciable differential in favour of natural gas versus oil for the foreseeable future.

We are talking about an agreement lasting several years. I have no doubt that such an agreement, if it were arrived at, would ensure that any investment citizens would make in favour of natural gas at the expense of oil would be a very good one for those who convert. Obviously I cannot guarantee the kind of provincial taxes which would be imposed on the various forms of energy in the future. But again, all my conversations with the various provincial governments indicate they recognize that preference should be given to natural gas as opposed to oil for residential, commercial and industrial purposes.

I think citizens of Canada can, with a great deal of confidence, proceed to investment in natural gas, knowing that over the years the advantages of natural gas compared to oil will be substantial.

In the National Energy Program we have a proposal which will take the differential down as low as 65 per cent, I think perhaps even lower than that, but I do not know what it will be once our negotiations are concluded in particular with the government of Alberta but I can assure the hon. member that all governments agree that this is the direction in which we should proceed.

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the minister's answer. He has answered as forthrightly as he could at this time. However, he spoke rather glowingly about conversion from oil to natural gas. Have any studies been made by his departmental officials to suggest strongly that conversion to electricity may have the same benefits as conversion to natural gas in the future? I think the minister has indicated that with appropriate subsidy for supply and distribution of natural gas and some guarantees on pricing, he would not be fooling people in terms of conversion, that they will in fact have an advantage in years to come. I again ask what guarantees, analyses and studies has the department done to supply some sort of assurance to people converting to electricity from oil as against conversion to natural gas?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, some studies have been done, but the situation varies considerably from province to province. We do not have a complete study that would constitute a report on the national situation in this regard. This type of work has traditionally been done at the provincial level by the provincial departments of energy in so far as they control the gas utilities and hydro. We have not been able to get price forecasts for electricity for years to come from some provinces. That information is not readily available with regard to all the provinces. However, I will be happy to inquire from my officials which provinces can give us that type of forecast.

Canadians all over the country can assume that when electricity originates from sources other than oil, it will be cheaper to switch to electricity than use oil. That is a kind of general statement. As to whether it would be advantageous to switch to natural gas rather than electricity, that matter will have to be examined in every province. I suggest that individuals check with the gas utility, if there is one in the area, and hydro, compare the cost estimates and arrive at their own conclusions. As we know, individuals make decisions not only on pure cost factors but on other features as well. If the two services are available, I suggest that individuals obtain quotations and proposals from both utilities and then make their choice.

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Chairman, I want to raise another question; the minister did allude to it. Canadian citizens should be cautioned to some degree about conversion to electricity for residential heating. I hope that the literature to be put out does not put the major emphasis on conversion to electricity because it may appear acceptable and appropriate in the short term. In the longer term, for example a period of five to ten years, it may not be as attractive as is being suggested at this time by some of the officials in government.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Chairman, I have a question with regard to Clause 5, development assistance. I will put a hypothetical situation so that I can get this cleared up quickly. Am I to understand that if one of the existing oil companies, which has already put into its price structure the requirement for the possibility of investment in other than oil, decides to acquire an existing company or go into discovery, development, production, transportation or storage of other than oil, natural gas or electricity, it would be eligible for grants, loans, or financial assistance guarantees from the government?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, Clause 5 is permissive. It provides for administrative discretion in the approval of grants. It is a matter the minister will have to determine on the basis of each application, taking into consideration the validity of the project, the cost benefit, the discovery that could be made and the ability of the company concerned to carry the cost on its own. Obviously we would have to treat differently an individual who has a bright idea, would like to develop it and only has a few dollars and an application from Imperial Oil. This is something the minister and the administration will have to take into account when the various proposals come forward. This is done all the time with the various grants or schemes in operation in the different departments of government.

Mr. Deans: May I just pursue this a little further. The bill refers to "discover, develop or produce". To produce is a little more difficult. The ones that worry me are acquire, transport, store or make available for use. If a person wanted to acquire an existing alternative energy source other than oil, electricity and natural gas, or wanted to acquire the transportation system, for example the trucks to move it, or wanted to set up a storage facility for future use—make available for use is ambiguous but that is beside the point—is it possible to come to the government under those circumstances for a grant, loan or guarantee to enable him to do this?

What sort of criteria will be established to enable people to understand whether it is even worth their while to make application? I can imagine any number of people looking around the world for a variety of different enterprises they could acquire, taking on a transportation system and using government funds to get the trucks or setting up two or three metal sheds for storage purposes at public expense. Is that what the minister is talking about?

Mr. Lalonde: Obviously one can think of the most ridiculous situations and say it would be terrible if grants were made in such cases. One can go through the various pieces of legislation and imagine a rather silly administration doing silly things. Clause 5 is of a general nature. It refers to grants to persons, governments or institutions. The legal draftsmen tried to ensure that there were not too many restrictions with regard to the applications for grants.

It may be that a municipality wishes to acquire a certain heating source or discovery from abroad and requires a grant either to acquire or transport it. It may represent a possible breakthrough. The municipality might need some help in order to achieve that purpose. The government would have to examine whether that heating source represented something new, whether the cost benefit was appreciable and whether the institution applying for the grant was in need of it. I repeat, these are very general provisions. We will have to look at them on the basis of the various applications.

Mr. Deans: I know the minister will forgive me for my dubious and doubting ways. However, the whole thing is so ambiguous as to allow people to drive trucks through it. I really do not understand it. All it does is say that the government will be able to give away public funds in whatever way it sees fit to anyone it wants to at any time as long as the people are not in the business of providing oil, natural gas or electricity and can claim to be in a business related in one way or another to the provision of other than those three energy sources. That whole clause is permissive, and "permissive" does not describe it.

The record of the government in terms of its handouts is part of the reason that Parliament and the public of Canada seriously question the fiscal responsiveness of governments here and everywhere else. Will there be regulations? I do not see any indication that there will be. I have certainly looked at the clauses here. There is no reference in Clause 5 to regulations, although Clause 3 specifically makes reference to them. Can the minister help me on that?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I may be able to speed this up and help my friend on this subject. If he reads the beginning of Clause 5 he will see it says "Subject to any regulations made under this Act and in accordance with such terms and conditions, if any, as the Treasury Board may specify". You end up having both regulations and specific conditions the Treasury Board puts out before approving a request for funds for this particular purpose. These are all public conditions and regulations that the applicants would know. There are considerable restrictions there. In addition the funds voted for this would be controlled by Parliament through the estimates. There would be considerable control over the spending both by the government and by Parliament.

As far as the general comments of the hon. member are concerned, this clause provides the necessary discretion to provide grants for development assistance in new forms of energy. Unless my hon. friend wants the minister to come before Parliament every time and have a vote on every grant, I am afraid he has to be reconciled with living with administrative discretion.

Mr. Deans: My final point is that Clause 5 says: "Subject to any regulations" which are made. That does not require that there be any. It says: "Subject . . . to such terms and conditions, if any, as the Treasury Board may specify". That does not mean there will be any. I just want to suggest that it has been my experience, limited here though extensive elsewhere, that the legislative process is certainly no guarantee there will be fiscal responsibility. The minister knows as well as I that we are forever approving expenditures long after they have been made.

[Translation]

Mr. Demers: Mr. Chairman, first I would like to commend the minister for introducing a bill which will make it possible for many Canadian families to save energy. However, I wonder if any study has been made. Already in our metropolitan area and in many other areas of Canada there is a very heavy demand for contractors to convert systems from oil to gas and it would seem that those contractors are charging over and above normal prices. I am therefore wondering whether your department has studied the possibility of training additional contractors so that there will be a more realistic balance between supply and demand.

Mr. Lalonde: I think the hon. member is raising a very important and most interesting point. The Department of Manpower and Immigration is responsible for training manpower and the required staff in Canada. I think that my department as such does not have to assume that responsibility. However, inasmuch as citizens are involved, I would advise and encourage them not to decide on the strength of a single offer but so seek tenders from two or three different contractors; they will find out that quite often there are significant differences between tenders. One would be well advised to call tenders and not rely on only one bid.

Mr. Demers: Mr. Chairman, I have a second question. I wonder whether the minister is now having discussions with his Quebec counterpart since Quebec does not have an 8 per cent tax on heating oil, which it must import from foreign countries. On the other hand, local energy sources such as electricity and natural gas are taxed at 8 per cent. This seems to me very illogical because the consumer will thus lose a good part, or 8 per cent, of what he will save by converting his heating system. I therefore wonder whether the minister has had discussions with provincial officials in this regard.

Mr. Lalonde: Once again, I recognize that the hon. member for Duvernay is raising an extremely important question related to the Quebec tax policy. What he said is quite right, and it is unfortunate that there should be this additional tax of 8 per cent on natural gas, for instance, in Quebec.

Before the recent elections in Quebec, Mr. Bérubé, the former Minister of Energy, had stated that the Quebec government planned on doing away with this tax when gas is more widely used in Quebec. I have already raised this question and I intend to raise it again with the new Quebec Energy Minister, Mr. Duhaime, and I hope that he will succeed in convincing the Quebec Finance Minister to do away with this tax, which is really counterproductive as concerns the total energy policy that we are trying to implement. It is indeed somewhat ridiculous to impose a tax on electricity and gas when it is the demand for oil that we want to reduce, especially in Quebec. I am glad that the hon. member has raised this point, and I thank him for his support in this regard and I can assure him that I shall raise the issue once again with the Quebec government.

[English]

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Chairman, in fairness to the minister I think I should ask him the question I said I would in my reply to his opening remarks. The province of Saskatchewan has accepted less than 50 per cent of this COSP program. We in Saskatchewan are well aware that we have a Crown corporation which distributes natural gas and electricity to the people of Saskatchewan and which made, in my opinion, an unconscionable profit last year. Would the minister explain to the House why the government of Saskatchewan asked that the people of that province be deprived of over 50 per cent of the benefits of this program, which is, indeed, a national program?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I should first of all like to thank the hon. member for his comments on the bill at first reading stage. I want to tell him that I was somewhat surprised to hear from the government of Saskatchewan that the reason it was not favourable to the extension of the COSP program to the additional 50 per cent was that in the case of electricity the cost of extending electrical service would be too high as far as it was concerned. That government felt it did not want to incur the additional cost that bringing additional electrical service to the citizens of the province would entail.

As far as natural gas is concerned, the government felt there was already a reasonably large coverage of gas consumption in Saskatchewan and it did not feel the need for an additional subsidy. I understand now that the government is reviewing its decision. I would not like to misrepresent that situation. There are discussions taking place at the present time, again between officials of the Government of Canada and the government of Saskatchewan, and I do hope, indeed, that the people of Saskatchewan will have the same global access to the program as the people of other provinces.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I apologize to hon. members, but there were discussions among the House leaders along the lines that we would have one speaker at second reading for each of the eight bills dealing with the estimates which were introduced yesterday. I am talking about Bill C-70 through Bill C-77. I regret that we did not make that a House order. Unfortunately, some hon. members are of the view that we can have extended debate in Committee of the Whole, but I understand hon. members are prepared at this time to have a House order to the effect that, in dealing with Bill C-70 through Bill C-77 inclusive, the speeches be limited to one per party lasting no more than 30 minutes each at the second reading stage, followed by Committee of the Whole with no debate and then third reading with no debate.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think that is the essence of the discussion which took place among House leaders. I think, however, when we saw the extent of the first bill we dealt with—and I must say I commend the government for bringing that bill forward; it is a very extensive and admirable bill—there was a great deal of interest. There was a very healthy discussion.

However, in dealing with the bills my friend has recited we would be prepared to agree to that House order. At the outset these items appeared as dollar items but were ruled out of order by Madam Speaker. Although the programs were agreeable, the process was wrong. The government having agreed to a correct process to accord with the ruling of Madam Speaker, we agreed that the matters could go through in a way which would process them quickly. Therefore, with respect to the statement made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, we are prepared to agree.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, it is correct that we had planned these debates with the three half-hour speeches at second reading. We just assumed that the time in Committee of the Whole would be very limited. I am a little reluctant to cut the Committee of the Whole debate out altogether. I would even go for 20-minute speeches at second reading if we could have 10 or 15 minutes in Committee of the Whole. Perhaps we could just leave it to common sense. If in Committee of the Whole there are some obvious points of order or questions which should be raised, we could govern ourselves accordingly. However, on the basis that we are not ruling out common sense, we agree.

Mr. Collenette: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I sent the hon. member a note a few moments ago, and I assumed he would be in agreement with the suggestion I just made. Perhaps we should go back to the drawing board. However, in terms of reconsidering the proposal I have just made, there is some urgency, specifically respecting the bill involving the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The Senate will be sitting tonight specifically to consider these bills. We will be sending them over immediately so that they can be dealt with tonight. That is the reason I wanted to preclude discussion at the Committee of the Whole stage. As hon. members know, the nature of debate at Committee of the Whole stage is such that one question leads to another. That is the normal course of events, and we recognize that; but there is some urgency specifically in relation to the other two bills dealing with energy matters.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be difficult, and I do not want us to get into a lengthy discussion in Committee of the Whole, but my friend who will be speaking on the next bill, for example, says she has one or two questions she would probably like to put, and she would like to get answers. Maybe the minister could answer in closing the debate at second reading.

Mr. Collenette: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, we will keep speeches within the half hour, and if each person speaking from this side asks questions, he or she would be entitled to a reply from the minister while we are still at second reading.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is a wrinkle which will lead to agreement. Therefore, if that is a firm proposal and if that is acceptable to the government, it is certainly acceptable to me.

Mr. Collenette: I certainly thank hon. members for their co-operation and agreement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There seems to be general agreement to the suggestion made by the parliamentary secretary. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN HOME INSULATION PROGRAM ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C-75, respecting a home insulation program for certain provinces in Canada, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might call it six o'clock so that we can resume this discussion at eight o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 5.57 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I have the honour to inform the House that communication has been received as follows:

Government House
Ottawa

June 30, 1981

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable W. R. McIntyre, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 30th day of June, at 9.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I have the honour to inform the House that messages have been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed the following bills without amendment. Bill C-65, an act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Supplementrary Retirement Benefits Act in respect of the early retirement of air traffic controllers.

[Translation]

Bill C-66, an act to amend the Canada and British Insurance Companies Act. Bill C-13, an act respecting the relocation of government agencies. Bill C-68, an act to amend the Currency and Exchange Act.

[English]

I have the pleasure to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing the House that the Senate has passed Bill C-80, an act to grant Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service for the financial year ending March 31, 1982.

When the House rose at six o'clock the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources had been given the floor.

CANADIAN HOME INSULATION PROGRAM ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-75, respecting a home insulation program for certain provinces in Canada, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, before we took our dinner recess there was some discussion about the merits of brevity. I shall accordingly attempt to be brief in my comments on Bill C-75.

This bill is intended to give further impetus to the energy conservation activities of the government. It also draws attention to that part of the National Energy Program which I regret has not received as much attention as the supply side; that is the need to conserve energy in Canada. We have had in place for some time a program intended to reduce the consumption of all forms of energy in the industrial sector. Earlier today the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources made reference to the co-operative arrangements that have been worked out between industry and government to give substance to our commitment to reduce the use of energy in the manufacturing industry in particular.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that Canada is one of the world's heaviest users of energy, but that of course is understandable given our vast territory, small population and an often hostile climate. Nevertheless, those factors should not be seen as an excuse for extravagance in our use of energy. Therefore, the conservation efforts embodied in the NEP, indeed in this bill, take on a special importance.

In addition to the industrial initiatives I mentioned, the NEP also envisages new rules regarding residential units which will be implemented as of tomorrow. Hon. members may have seen in the newspapers in the last few days the requirement that no new residential unit will receive federal assistance or guarantees if it is heated by oil, unless no other reasonable energy alternative exists.

● (2010)

In addition to the building requirements, we have embarked upon a program four years ago to promote better insulation in residences. CHIP is familiar to hon. members of the House; I need not dwell on it. It is the principal method of providing funds to encourage greater energy efficiency in our homes. Currently the residential sector accounts for approximately 15 per cent of primary oil use in Canada. We believe that through CHIP which was initiated in 1977 the federal government will be able to encourage a reduction in the consumption of oil and thereby contribute to our total goal of self-sufficiency by the end of this decade.

We have set some substantial targets for a reduction in home heating oil consumption. Home owners are clearly responding to the incentives we are providing through CHIP grants. In 1977 only 15,000 grants were made, whereas the estimate for 1980-81 is for a total of 500,000. This is clearly a substantial increase. Our present goal is to reduce by one-third the oil used for space heating in reinsulating residences.

The bill before us this evening draws attention to the benefits of the insulation program. It will also bring to mind, in the case of some hon. members and in the case of the public, the need to ensure that high standards are maintained in the insulation industry. The government has moved to ensure that certification becomes a basic feature of the total program. We have worked with the Canadian General Standards Board to develop a certification program for home insulation which will be in place on November 1 of this year. Indeed, after that date it will be mandatory for all contractors performing work under CHIP to be certified if they wish to continue in the industry. Equally, we have embarked upon a major program review to determine the extent to which CHIP has met its initial targets and to explore any modifications which may be needed in light of experience.

In our view, the program has proven to be a major success. It is an important feature of the total National Energy Program and indeed of the energy future of Canada. In terms of reducing Canada's demand for imported oil, the program has already reduced our needs by something over $2 billion.

I could continue with some more details about the program, but I hope my necessarily brief introduction is sufficient for a bill which I trust will win the immediate support of all hon. members of the House.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, if I had not been in place tonight to listen to the introduction of the program more commonly known throughout Canada as CHIP in a somewhat cursory manner as a matter-of-fact program, I would not have believed it. I cannot believe that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren) is so ill-informed that he is not prepared to address what is the major problem in Canada today.

Bill C-75 is a so-called act respecting the home insulation program for certain provinces. Surely the parliamentary secretary has experienced some degree of doubt in his riding about the workmanship and the legislation which have gone into the planning stages of CHIP. I do not think there is an area in my riding of Peterborough which has not corresponded with me on a weekly basis concerning the horrendous nightmare stories connected with the bureaucratic administration of this system of supplying moneys to people to insulate their homes. It is not being administered by the private sector. It is not being administered by the people who are best able to evolve a program which will work for the people, namely, the different regional areas across Canada.

Let me give some specific examples of where the program has created major problems not only in the riding of the parliamentary secretary but in many others. I have a letter from an insulator in Peterborough, George W. Scott, in which he refers to the total disregard and arrogance of the CHIP program. That is the subject. He had three cases where people received government cheques, cashed them and then claimed they did not receive them. When he requested photocopies of the cheques, CHIP barefacedly refused, as was stated by an employee in the office in Montreal. This is the office one phones, the office with the magic 800 number. I defy hon. members of the House even to get a ring; usually the line is busy. He continues:

"It is against the law", and five minutes later as stated by Mrs. J. Barrette, "It is not a contractor program, and we do not have to help you".

He said that if this is the case it is time the idiotic government should find out from the business community what a serious mistake it is making in trying to administer what could best be administered at the provincial level.

I do not suppose there are very many people in the Ottawa bureaucracy who understand the heating and energy problems in the provinces of the nation, and the same could be said for the provincial governments and in some cases the regional governments. Why does the government feel that it can administer, by instituting an 800 number, a program which will bring economical heat savings to the people of the nation?

Having said all that about the problems of the bureaucracy in administering the insulation program, the parliamentary secretary said tonight that we have a high consumption of energy in Canada because we have a hostile climate. I suggest to him that we have a hostile climate in Canada today because of the national energy policy and bills such as Bill C-75 which the government has endeavoured to bring into play through questionable means. This has already been evident to the House by the rulings of the Speaker.

Also the parliamentary secretary said that the government promotes better insulation. I challenge him to give evidence of that statement. I wonder whether the tens of thousands of people across Canada who used UFFI to insulate their homes feel that the government has given Canada better insulation and promoted better use of commodities in the conservation of energy. I will touch upon that a little later.

The parliamentary secretary said that we are moving toward self-sufficiency in energy by 1990. That statement follows on the heels of a statement made in the House tonight which suggests that we are high consumers of energy, by virtue of fact. What facts can the parliamentary secretary give us which would indicate that we have been moving toward self-sufficiency in the last year and a half to two years? What facts can he give us which indicate that we are not importing more oil from abroad, that we are not becoming more and more dependent on offshore sources for our energy needs than we were the year before? The importation of offshore oil is the principal cause of our national $14 billion deficit which this government is forecasting for the current fiscal year.

I question whether granting $500 per home owner for the current fiscal year will afford us, in the net result, greater independence from offshore oil supplies. This $500 per home owner totals in excess of $250 million, to use the hon. member's figures, if it were paid to some 500,000 home owners. In reality, if we did not have a hostile climate in Canada, if we had not created a national energy policy which caused major divisions in our nation, we would be less dependent on offshore oil.

In discussing Bill C-75 I would like to read into the record some of the concerns expressed by some of the standing committees of this House of Commons with regard to the legality of the process. Clause 7 of the bill before the House tonight reads:

The Canadian Home Insulation Regulations made by order in council PC 1981-1435 of May 28, 1981, shall be deemed for all purposes to have the same force and effect from July 1, 1981, as if they were made under the authority of this act.

In The Canada Gazette of June 10, 1981, under SOR/81-437 these regulations so appear under the Privy Council date of May 28, 1981. However, in a letter dated June 16, 1981, just six days after these regulations were published, from Mr. R. E. Fowler, senior counsel of the legal division of CMHC to Mr. G. C. Eglington, who is counsel for the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, there appears the following:

With regard to the need to expressly refer to paragraph 11(2)(a) of the National Housing Act as the corporation's authority to prescribe standards, it is our belief that the needed change was not made. In this connection, I must say that notwithstanding a written request that we be shown a copy of the regulations well in advance of their submission for approval, the corporation was not shown a draft thereof. Our first opportunity to see the regulations occurred following submission of the regulations to Treasury Board, shortly before their approval by council. Our legal division was, as a result of a hasty review, able to secure a vitally needed change to the proposed regulations to rectify a problem affecting the ability of the corporation to carry out its functions under the program.

The failure to give effect to the standing joint committee's request is regretted. I believe that an opportunity will soon arise to amend the regulations at which time the question of clarifying the reference to "standards" can be dealt with.

Notwithstanding the remarks of the senior legal counsel for CMHC that the failure to give effect to the standing joint committee's request is regretted, and that he was referring the letter from the standing committee to the director general of energy, mines and resources with the request that the department implement the committee's suggestion at the next opportunity, the irregularities which have lately been attached to this bill underline the inappropriate nature of the government's approach to legislation and regulatory reform.

As the preamble to the regulations, as published in The Canada Gazette for June 10, states, these amended regulations are made "pursuant to Department of Energy, Mines and Resources Vote 35, Main Estimates 1981-1982, as authorized by Appropriation Act No. 1, 1981-82." As my friend from Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) has pointed out, this vote is one of several which is not acceptable to the House as spending authority. Therefore, in so far as Bill C-75 accepts these regulations, through clause 7, which do not include changes recommended by the Standing Join Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, and endorsed by senior legal counsel for CMHC, I submit that clause 7 might not be sufficient authority to secure our satisfaction. It was not reintroduced into the House in a manner which reflects the 1980 recommendations of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Having said all that, I would like to read into the record some examples which should not go unreported. One example which has already come to light regarding the rushed introduction of CHIP is the ill-considered means by which UFFI was approved. Another possible problem, as yet not addressed publicly, is the improper installation of conventional insulation. To quote from a Public Works Canada publication concerned with thermography, the use of special photographic techniques to assess the thermal efficiency of buildings:

> Poor technical performance in buildings is common, . . . Recent investigations undertaken by Public Works Canada across Canada have revealed that defects in insulation placement, air tightness, and vapor control are common. They are often severe and cause high operating and maintenance costs. These inadequacies result in moisture accumulation on the inside surfaces of wall and roof construction. This reduces thermal effectiveness and in certain instances eventually causes material degradation.

Has the government considered performing a survey of houses insulated under CHIP with conventional insulation to determine whether the insulation methods endanger the structure of the house through moisture accumulation? If not, why not? Will the government be kind enough to table all correspondence and other forms of communication between the CDC, Lorcon or Rapco Foam and any of the departments concerned with home insulation, that is, CMHC, NRC, Public Works Canada and EMR? I have been led to believe that UFFI was given approval due to pressure brought by the CDC, which seems to control Rapco through Lorcon.

The government through the Department of Supply and Services, in the last few days has signed a contract with the consultants regarding a possible overhaul of CHIP. What problems are there with the program at present? How many different investigations or charges are under way by the RCMP? I would like to call for these papers to be supplied to members of the House of Commons.

When CHIP was originally announced in 1977, the government set a target of 70 per cent of all houses. Thus far the penetration rate in pre-1961 housing is markedly below the 70 per cent target. This raises doubts in my mind whether the 70 per cent can ever be reached.

A study by the Department of mines and energy in Nova Scotia showed that the average savings in houses insulated under HIP, which is now virtually the same as CHIP in the rest of Canada, was between 7 per cent and 11 per cent. What is the government going to do about this apparent failure? Does it even know what the saving rate is under CHIP?

We know that the program has been inefficient, Mr. Speaker. It has saved less energy than was anticipated by the government. We also recognize that a number of fly-by-night contractors got into the act. Workers have been poorly trained and in some cases standards of performance were low. UFFI is now installed in 125,000 homes in Canada and the government is now going to conduct a study on 2,000 of those homes. What about the other 123,000? In Ontario the provincial government has decided to study 30,000 homes.

How many dangers to the health of Canadians are the result of inadequate testing? How many homes affected are there? I am sure the government is reluctant to assume any responsibility even though it knew in 1977, through a report made to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, that there was a possible health hazard. Another study was conducted in 1979 and now there is another "expert" study. The government has decided to study the study that studied the study in 1977! This is inexcusable, Mr. Speaker.

The government knows that the home owner's matching contribution will still not be enough to insulate a home properly. It is still far short of the dollars required, on a matching basis, to insulate properly most homes in Canada. The government budgeted $265 million for a year. The bill speaks of $195 million for nine months. I would advise the people of Canada right now that if they are going to insulate homes up to and including December 1977—not 1961 but 1977 as the bill says—there is not enough money in the bill for that.

The homes in Canada that need to be insulated will not be unless everyone starts in July and continues to insulate at maximum capacity. The installers tell me that it is physically impossible to do it. As I say, there is not enough money provided by the bill, but that is typical of the government. Perhaps when the time comes that more money is needed, it will just wind up the presses.

The loose regulations that affect the control of material that goes into the insulation of a home have resulted in only 20 per cent cut in home heating fuel consumption rather than the 30 per cent that was projected. Where is the other 10 per cent? I have not seen a report that explains why the government has fallen 33 per cent short of its objective. Canada is still the highest per capita fuel oil user in the world. If the government thinks that it is moving toward self-sufficiency by creating a National Energy Program that is causing the taps to be turned off, and if it is satisfied with paying $16-odd a barrel to the west and $40-odd to Mexico, Venezuela, Kuwait and Argentina, then I wish it would explain the economics of that decision. Would it not be better to spend that money in Canada to create energy and investment dollars and help us achieve self-sufficiency by 1990?

Shunning the Canadian Standards Association, the government barged ahead in 1980 by formulating its own peculiar brand of restrictions and standards for insulating contractors. I wonder how many members of the government talked to insulating contractors. The contractors will have to be college graduates if they want to pass the test set for them by the Canadian General Standards Board. A number of competent installers of insulation in my area tell me that they find it very difficult, even with the expertise they have gained through years of work, to get a pass mark on the examination set by the government. The CGSB does not have a good track record, in view of the UFFI disaster. If the government is building its hopes on an insulation program based on the record of the CGSB, it should keep in mind the disaster of UFFI which is evident in cities all across the country. The CGSB has a poor track record, Mr. Speaker.

Canadian Home Insulation Program

Canadians are off to a slow start in home renovation. The government owes it to the people to provide reliable information on its fast-spreading and obviously non-productive practices in insulating homes. Only 32 per cent of Canadian homes were built before 1950 and only 8 per cent were built before 1900. This means that 60 per cent of homes have been built since 1950. The problems that the government has with CHIP and its "ugly sister", UFFI, are really inexcusable. People who thought they were saving energy and increasing the value of their homes now find that they have potentially serious health hazards in the air of their homes and they have watched the value of their homes plummet.

I can tell the House of cases in Peterborough, Mr. Speaker, where people have sold their homes because of this government program. They had their homes well insulated with UFFI, sold their homes and established closing dates, moved out of their homes into temporary quarters or, in one case, permanent quarters, only to find that the buyers refused to close the deal because of urea formaldehyde foam insulation.

The government has been batting this around for several months—or several years—knowing full well that there would possibly be a health problem with foam insulation. Its reaction to this possible health problem was to continue studying it. The study committees are now called "expert" committees on UFFI or foam insulation. Is this telling us that in 1977 the doctor who reported to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that there was a possible health problem with foam insulation was not an expert? Is the government telling us that in 1979, when the tests were carried out on UFFI which indicated a problem, they were somewhat inadequate? I suggest that we look closely at Bill C-75 and its possible inadequacies.

In reality, the government has fallen down on four points. It takes three to four times the amount of the grant established to insulate properly a three or four-bedroom home.

It has given conflicting advice on what the best insulation is. Probably 125,000 people in Canada today thought at one time that UFFI was the best form of insulation to instal. There are innumerable stories from consumers about rip-offs by fraudulent insulation contractors.

● (2040)

If the government is going to enter the marketplace and suddenly become expert in giving advice to the provinces and the regions of this country on what is the best insulation to put into their homes, it should be creating the legislation and the climate in which the free enterprise system can function. The government should rely more closely on the business community to do a job that is satisfactory in the insulation business. Price will take care of itself.

Subsidization of programs by government creating a lesser cost is not always the answer to conservation. I do not think General Motors was convinced to stop building large cars with air conditioners because the government of this country decided to tax that corporation if it put in air conditioners. I think what caused people to buy smaller cars in Canada and forced Canadian manufacturers to build smaller cars is the price of energy. If energy is priced realistically and if the charge for it is what it is worth, then the marketplace will take care of these things in a much better fashion than the bureaucrats in Ottawa.

When the government gets into such programs as CHIP the paper burden increases. A large portion of the money that is spent on the saving of energy across Canada is used by this government to feed the octopus, with its insatiable appetite for tax dollars to keep the flow of paperwork going. What happens to the business community is that every time the government passes these regulations and every time the government puts more pressure on the business community to live within the guidelines set by government, more paperwork is created. As a result, we have higher costs, higher inflation and less employment.

Nothing but confusion surrounds this government's maze of acrimonious acronyms. Only one thing comes to the public's mind when the government's energy conservation programs are announced, and that is confusion. Instead, it should be conservation. Obviously, in the absence of a coherent program for fair and stabilized Canadian oil prices, energy conservation should be the number one priority in this country.

Canadians must be helped, not hindered. Government should create the atmosphere and the climate in which the business community can function. The government should not become part of the business community. I thought the government would have learned that in 1978 with the Enersave program. At that time the government thought it could hire unemployed people to supervise and instal insulation in homes Canada, only to find out that it cost twice as much as if the government had allowed the free enterprise system to do it living within the framework of a truly competitive market.

First of all, the CHIP grant should not be a taxable benefit. Second, a $500 grant is hardly a realistic sum today to insulate properly a home in Canada. Third, there are obviously positive benefits to the business, both at the contractor level and at the wholesaler level—I know it bothers some of the socialists to hear this—and as a result of spin-offs, of an increased rate of insulation under CHIP.

CMHC, one of the major Crown corporations of this government which used to run this program, reported that at meetings held in 1977 with representatives of the major insulation manufacturing companies, federal officials were informed that a substantial increase in production could take place for all types of insulation products. Isn't that nice?

Fourth, there is such an evident lack of cohesion in the government's conservation policies that the people of this country could be forgiven for insulating their ears against the government's continued platitudes—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to an order made earlier today, I must interrupt the hon. member because his time has expired. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) has the floor.

[English]

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to represent the New Democratic Party in speaking to Bill C-75. I must say first that I certainly agree with the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) about many of the things he said, except his last reference to socialists, of course. But I do question the very oversimplistic and astounding statements that were made in the introductory remarks on behalf of the government. This is an act dealing with CHIP for certain provinces in Canada and asks for, I believe, another estimated $65 million for this part of the program. Later we will have a bill for other provinces.

Let us take a look at CHIP, which is the federal government's effort to encourage conservation in Canadian homes. We agree it would be desirable to have a conservation program. We agree with the theoretical goals as they are stated. But the practical experience with CHIP surely falls far, far short of what the intent was.

I will deal with the information part of the program. If we look at the cost of administering this program through CMHC, a considerable amount is required just to put out basic information. The basic information is not practical. It does not get to most Canadians. It is up to Canadians to try and locate these fancy pamphlets. The information does not really advise people in a sound way on the best and safest ways to insulate homes. Seminars are not provided, for example, which would be a sound way for CMHC to give this information. In fact, misinformation has been given. Letters were sent out to consumers begging them to insulate their homes. Many of them insulated with UFFI. People were then sent letters of congratulation by CMHC and government officials for using UFFI. But all the time they were poisoning their environment.

I will deal now with the economic incentives. We have heard that up to approximately $500 is available per household. Homes built before 1977 will now be eligible. The parliamentary secretary did not elaborate on this point at all. We hear that 10 per cent of home owners have received CHIP grants. I am very glad that I am not one of the householders which has a CHIP form of insulation in my home because I think in many cases anxiety has been created by having used it. The goal is to actually upgrade some 70 per cent of Canadian homes by 1987.

I agree with my colleague who spoke earlier that Canadians must have a much sounder guarantee that they will have decent service from people who instal insulation in their homes and that certification will come from the government that the insulation is sound and reliable.

We have heard also about the many fly by night contractors. Hardly a day goes by in my area of Vancouver without phone calls from contractors who ask: "Have you got your free insulation yet? We will put it in for you for $50". We know they are taking advantage of this program. There is no real guarantee that they are reliable. In many cases they have proven to be anything but reliable. The grant itself of $500 would barely cover the cost of insulating a ceiling. Most of the home owners to whom I have spoken are most concerned because they have urea formaldehyde insulation. Because they cared very much for their homes they worked very hard to insulate them carefully. They spent about $2,000 for insulation in the walls of their homes. Most of that sum was their own money, but they found out they were paying for extreme problems.

We can conclude that because $500 does not nearly cover the cost of adequate insulation in a home, most pensioners and lower income people have not used this program. For once they are on the right side of things. For once the poor people have an advantage. At least they have not been poisoned by having urea formaldehyde in their homes.

This brings me to the whole question on which I want to spend most of my time. I want to have in the record the whole history relating to government responsibility for the UFFI type of insulation.

I was astounded that the parliamentary secretary when talking about the marvellous values of CHIP did not mention the health hazards of this foam. There is considerable documentation on it, and I will get to that in a minute. There is not only the threat to humans but the economic problem.

In my constituency there are many people who have worked all their lives to be able to buy a home. The savings they have been able to accumulate have gone into insulation. Now they cannot live in those homes because of the effects of urea formaldehyde foam insulation. They are faced with economic problems, health hazards, stress and anxiety. Many thousands of people across this country are angry because they have been victimized as a result of this insulation program.

Responsibility for the UFFI problem falls directly on the shoulders of the federal government which approved UFFI despite the warnings. It pushed this type of insulation through its CHIP program and praised those who used it. The health hazard was acknowledged in the ban instigated by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) in 1981.

I am sorry the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) is not here this evening. He has acknowledged the serious problems. I wish to quote some of what he said on June 1. He stated that the federal government may offer home owners financial aid to replace the potentially hazardous insulation urea formaldehyde as a result of a random telephone survey of 800 homes. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) certainly has not supported this position. He was quoted as saying, "I would never have it in my home". Perhaps the minister showed some good judgment in that instance.

The energy minister stated that if the survey indicated there was concrete evidence the insulation was causing harmful side effects to residents, the government may consider financial aid to replace the insulation. He said that the government would take what steps are necessary. It is time those steps were considered and the budget was allocated for removing this poisonous type of foam insulation. That is the only solution for many of these home owners.

I wish to place on record a chronological review of the problems and the different steps the government has taken in relation to UFFI. This material was first used in Canada in 1969. It was removed a year later because of shrinkage and instability problems. In 1976 the National Research Council issued warnings to the effect that the standards for UFFI were not adequate. In 1977 doctors warned of health problems. It was also in 1977 that the Canadian government approved the use of UFFI. Consumer demand was immediate as the insulation was accepted for use under the government's Canadian home insulation program. In fact, the government was pushing UFFI.

American studies and reports in the 1970s identified instances of medical problems and structural deterioration of buildings after installation of UFFI. A temporary ban was announced by the Department of National Health and Welfare last December and a permanent ban on April 23. I wish I had time to quote from the report of the special committee established by health and welfare.

There are many items in the April, 1981, final report of the Department of National Health and Welfare expert advisory committee on urea formaldehyde foam insulation. There are many points in the report which substantiate the danger to both health and the environment. It is very interesting since the government talks a lot about testing. That is the way of getting itself off the hook. I quote from page 8 of the report:

> The committee has reservations over the usefulness of single ambient formaldehyde measurements. There can be both variations in the day, as well as from day to day variations. Changes in temperature and humidity can affect the readings. Therefore, the significance of a single reading can be misleading—
> The committee is therefore not prepared to recommend any level of formaldehyde exposure as inherently safe.

That statement by an expert committee of the government emphasizes that testing one week may show a result quite different from testing the next week, not to mention six months later. Therefore, it does not solve the problem. The health hazard increases as the foam gets older. As it disintegrates, there is more likelihood of the gas affecting the residents of the home.

It is estimated that between 80,000 and 100,000 homes have UFFI. Experts agree that health problems depend on the duration of exposure and the concentration of formaldehyde. It varies as the foam gets older and according to the condition of those living in the house.

Resembling hardened shaving cream, UFFI can break down soon after installation, releasing formaldehyde gas. Symptoms include eye, nose and throat irritation, nosebleeds, headaches, coughing, nausea, asthma-like reactions, vomiting and dizziness. UFFI has been related to cancer in laboratory animals.

Elderly home owners who have visited my office have told me about having to sleep in their cars for several weeks because of the condition of their homes. They have beautiful homes but cannot live in them because of the gas concentrations caused by UFFI. Another example is two elderly people having to live in their basement. The woman has severe health problems. These people are desperate. They do not know what to do. They cannot get any satisfaction from the government. Their anxieties and health problems are complicating the situation.

The federal government continues to stress that only a few homes will require complete removal of the foam. We do not know that. In most cases they say a few less complicated measures will reduce the exposure to the formaldehyde to near normal levels. There is no proof of that. In fact, the report from which I just quoted indicates the reverse.

Residents in my constituency and throughout the Vancouver area as well as in other cities across Canada are organizing. They are angry. These people are well informed about this issue. They have done their homework. They have the research.

Federal officials have continually said that people are unnecessarily alarmed about this. If we lived in a home with UFFI we would be alarmed as well. We would insist on more than just information which, incidentally, is not yet available.

I have already mentioned that in adverse conditions, where many factors come into play, UFFI can cause very serious problems; high temperatures and high humidity which are of great concern in my area, along with poor ventilation and sloppy installation, usually result in the foam having to be removed. We know how inefficient many of the installers have been under the CHIP program. I think it is pretty safe to assume that the installation was faulty in many cases.

The federal government initially telephoned some 800 homes but we have not heard the results of that phone survey. Many of us have asked questions in the House as to why the government was doing this, but presumably it was to determine the extent of the problem.

Federal officials have repeatedly dismissed any legal responsibility but have admitted some moral responsibility. I am not a lawyer but I cannot see why there would not be a legal responsibility since the government itself endorsed and promoted this poisonous type of insulation.

Finally, we find that on June 11 the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs announced he was going to spend $5 million to establish an information line, a co-ordinating centre with a phone that was put into service today, I believe. There was to be a national testing of 4,000 homes. That testing is not really going to prove anything valid. There is to be a board of review set up on June 29 primarily to hear complaints from the industry which is trying to defend its position, just as is the government.

Home owners and, I am sure, landlords who have this problem in their buildings are up in arms. I have received countless letters about this and I have many clippings that I do not have time to read into the record, all of which indicate how really appalled and angry are home owners across the country. What they need is that $5 million and money from the CHIP program put into sound programs to remove this poisonous foam from the walls of their homes, getting rid of this risk forever.

For that reason I have spent this time talking about UFFI in relation to the CHIP program. I cannot really understand in conscience how we can endorse more money in these estimates for expenditure on a foam insulation program which has not worked and for which the government has assumed no responsibility, a program that has not provided any protection to the consumer and which has been a major health problem for consumers.

We have raised these questions in the House, as have members of the Conservative party. We have made a number of recommendations. First and foremost is the importance of allocating funds for the removal of this foam from these poisoned homes. We agree it is long overdue that installers must be certified. Sometimes I think many of the CMHC and government officials should be certified as well. How the parliamentary secretary could be so innocuous in his remarks tonight by assuming this has been a sound program is beyond me.

We also question the cost of administering this program, and I will come back to this point later in relation to the CHIP program in the maritimes. A very high percentage of the allocation of funds has gone to the cost of administration by CMHC, yet when people phone CMHC about problems with contractors or UFFI they get no help at all.

A few weeks ago I directed a question to the minister responsible for CMHC and appealed to him to have CMHC through its local offices attempt to be helpful to these consumers. Surely that is reasonable since CMHC sponsored the CHIP program initially, as a result of which this foam was put into houses. It seems to me not too much to expect that people with serious health problems who cannot live in their homes until something is done about the situation, like the couple I mentioned, or those who cannot afford to live anywhere else and cannot put their homes on the market because there is no value, should be provided with some kind of alternate accommodation on an emergency basis through CMHC.

As I said earlier, we feel the government must concentrate not so much on testing but on getting this foam out of homes. There is enough proof that it is dangerous and that the hazard worsens as time goes on. Anyone with foam in their homes should be worried about it. Any real estate person would certainly be reluctant to sell a house which was, in effect, poisoned by this foam. We feel there should be tax deductions for people who take the initiative of removing the foam themselves. There should be tax credits in the case of lower income people who take this action.

Most of all I urge the minister, who is not here tonight but who said he would take note of our representations, to consider that his department should do. He is promoting this program through the bill we are discussing tonight. The federal government has continued to push home insulation programs. There are no guarantees at all that any other programs in the future will provide protection for consumers or that they will be sound insulation programs. There is no accurate information being given out to people and, in short, consumers are really quite disillusioned with the whole service of the federal government.

Perhaps there will be five minutes for the parliamentary secretary to respond. I urge the government through the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to make some financial commitment for the removal of the foam already installed through the CHIP program, and I urge the government not to proceed with further insulation until that is done or funds to be used for that are made available as a first priority.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, in an attempt to facilitate our work this evening I was brief in my introductory comments. Clearly I set a standard which could not be achieved by others in that there was a certain amount of indulgence in statements which hardly accord with the facts of the CHIP program. I note that the hon. member for Peterborough, (Mr. Domm) who indulged himself in such a cacophony of contradiction and calumny and confusion, and who has in fact left the House, evidently did not wish to hear the facts of the case with regard to the CHIP program. He made his little statements, his allegations, his half-truths and confused remarks, and then left the House. Be that as it may, I shall respond to a few of his comments in the hope that he might actually take the trouble on some occasion to seek out the facts rather than to indulge himself in the way he did.

I regret in particular that the hon. member evidently feels conservation is not a laudatory goal for a government to pursue, and if it happens at all it somehow should be left to the private sector. That point of view seems to me to avoid entirely the question of what the consumer in Canada is to do when faced with higher oil prices. People, especially in lower income groups require, need and benefit from the off-oil program which the minister described this afternoon, and from the CHIP program we have been discussing this evening. Quite obviously, conservation is the quickest, most enduring, most effective and cheapest way of reducing the consumption of energy in Canada, and to hear the hon. member attack that program strikes me as a form of reprehensible irresponsibility.

I suggest that when the member opposite, the hon. member for Peterborough, speaks about the lack of any evidence of the benefits of the program, he overlooks entirely the situation in Canada today. In fact, during the first quarter of 1981 the consumption of oil in eastern Canada dropped by 7 per cent, an extraordinary reduction in a very short time. Here is ample evidence not only of the benefits of the industrial conservation program, on which I touched earlier this evening, but also of the success of CHIP, which has substantially reduced the consumption of home heating oil across Canada, and particularly in eastern Canada.

Not only does the hon. member opposite overlook the reductions in demand which I have mentioned, but he also has paid no heed at all to the savings which have resulted from this program. I noted earlier that over $2 billion in imported oil costs have been saved as a result of CHIP. These are substantial savings, which will only increase in the future as the program expands. Those are macro numbers and, impressive though they are, they overlook the benefit to the average householder. Good insulation can cut heating costs by at least 30 per cent. Effective insulation can reduce projected home heating costs in 1981 by $230 for oil, $250 for electricity and $180 for natural gas. Quite obviously those savings are of substantial benefit to the consumer across our country, and especially to those, as I mentioned earlier, in the lower income categories. We are providing the opportunity for them to receive benefits and to receive incentive from the government, and we are doing it in a very effective way.

That is not to say, as seems to be the case in the minds of some members of the opposition, that CHIP is intended to meet the full costs of insulation. Not at all; it was never intended to do so, and it does not do so. What the program does is to provide assistance, incentive and impetus for householders across Canada to undertake further insulation and to provide the base cost to assist in such initiative.

Some mention was made about the fact that at the moment under the program only houses built prior to 1961 are eligible. That is true, but it has equally been noted and should be stressed that it is the intention of the government to move that date forward to 1977 at a time when we are satisfied that houses built prior to 1961 are insulated to a more substantial degree than they are at the moment.

With regard to the review of CHIP, a number of aspects of the program are under review. The study which has been referred to is to evaluate the impact of the program on the householder and on the insulation industry and to study how the delivery system might be streamlined. There will be a review of eligible items under CHIP, for example, the impact on rented units and generally the effectiveness of the program as it now stands in meeting its objectives.

I will be very brief in discussing abuse of the program. I refer the hon. member for Peterborough to a statement I made in the House some month or six weeks ago, at which time I reviewed the efforts which have been made to ensure that there is no abuse and, where such abuse has been identified, to bring those abusing the system to the courts.

A number of the comments made tonight should be dealt with. I hope there will be another occasion when we can go into this subject in some greater detail. However, I am conscious that time is passing and that we need to proceed also with our examination of the third bill before us this evening.

With regard to UFFI, upon which the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) spent a great deal of time and made some rather broad statements, I only emphasize to the hon. member that the government has acted to establish a UFFI centre which is now operational. Members of the public can register their complaints or solicit information there. I think the hon. member said there was no toll-free line available. In fact there is.

Mrs. Mitchell: What does it do? How does it help?

Mr. MacLaren: Those who have taken the trouble to look at the advertisements in the newspapers will see that that service is now available. A national testing survey is under way. It will ensure that the facts of the case are better understood. A board of review has been put in place to hear submissions from the industry.

Finally, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) has stated quite clearly that the government will decide on any further action once the results of the national testing survey, the recommendations of the board of review and the findings of the co-ordination centre are available.

With those few comments I hope I have answered some of the questions which were raised during the course of our discussion this evening.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. We have had more discussion, and I must say everyone is showing a great amount of co-operation this evening. In order for Bill C-75, Bill C-76 and Bill C-77 to receive royal assent this evening we have agreed among the parties that the House will sit beyond 10 p.m. to consider Bill C-76 in all its stages and we will not commence proceedings under Standing Order 40 until after Black Rod knocks and royal assent has taken place.

Essentially this means, Mr. Speaker, that we are going to ask members to stay for about an extra 15 or 20 minutes at the very most. The Senate is in session right now on those bills; a Supreme Court judge is here this evening even though they are recessed for their vacation. In view of the urgency of passing these bills, as acknowledged by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, we have undertaken to agree to this House order.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is quite correct. I would not want to see these proceedings shortened or the pith and substance of debate lost in any way, but I know the shortening of speeches would be warmly welcomed by all members on these matters, perhaps even retroactively.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there have been these discussions. We are always interested in the definition of "co-operation" that we get from the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council. If he makes a request and we bow or agree to it, we are being co-operative. Sometimes co-operation should work the other way.

At any rate, we do agree and if we sit a little late and that makes it necessary for their Honours to stay up a little late over in the other place, I do not think it will hurt them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill C-77, an Act respecting oil conservation and the substitution for oil of other energy sources, without amendment.

HOME INSULATION (N.S. AND P.E.I.) PROGRAM ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Hon. John Roberts (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C-76, respecting a home insulation program for certain maritime provinces in Canada, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief but I promise the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) to preserve the pith and substance all the same.

The hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) was asking earlier for some substantiation as to whether the programs were working and I am very happy to offer him some facts and figures from the Atlantic provinces. It is important to note that, as of June 1, 1981, over 70 per cent of eligible units in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia have participated in the program, with the resulting expenditure of almost $7 million.

A recent evaluation of the home insulation program in Nova Scotia indicated 60 per cent of participants experienced an average 9 per cent decrease in fuel consumption. This decrease varied significantly with the kind of work done. Insulating walls, for example, results in a 20 per cent decrease, whereas those installing storm doors or windows resulted in about a 20 per cent decrease. The government of Prince Edward Island has calculated that the use of heating oil there has declined by 25 per cent since 1976, primarily due to the use of the home insulation program as well as an increase in the use of wood energy and the installation of temperature setback devices.

The home insulation program was initially to end as of December 31, 1981. In view of the high participation rate it will proceed as planned. We are, however, examining the feasibility of extending CHIP after December 31 to those residents of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia who would be eligible and who have not participated in the home insulation program.

In 1977 it was stated the home insulation program could save a maximum of 2,500,000 barrels of oil annually. At the current international price of $44 a barrel, this amounts to a saving of $110 million.

The total cost of the home insulation program during 1981 and 1982 is estimated at $4,300,000, of which $1,075,000 is requested in the supplementary estimate. These facts and figures prove the program is indeed working. I trust all hon. members will recognize both the past success and the future necessity of this program and appropriate the required funds. On this side of the House we are fully committed to achieving energy security for Canadians. The home insulation program is one part of a much larger picture which is Canada's energy future.

In Atlantic Canada significant progress is under way on a wide variety of fronts. In fact, I would like to read from the most recent list of approved programs in Atlantic Canada, the kind of thing being done by the federal government. In Dartmouth, space heating with a wood waste Parrsboro-made furnace is a new program just approved. The Metro Transit Commission in Dartmouth has a grant to heat with solar heat in the new transit facility. Dafron Industries Ltd. in Lunenburg is now launching a sawdust waste-burning furnace for space heating. Riverport Electric in Kingsburg-Lunenburg has received a grant to monitor the wind profile at Hirtle's Beach.

We are creating a heat sink source for the new dental school at Dalhousie university in Halifax. Interprovincial Engineering in Halifax is studying the feasibility of hydro power from municipal watersheds. And in Mabou there is a new project to evaluate a small hydro site. In all, there have been some 36 projects launched just recently in the Atlantic provinces by the federal government to make the Atlantic provinces energy secure.

I urge the House to support this bill.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, we on this side certainly support this bill and its quick passage. However, I must say the government spokesmen make it awfully difficult to be reasonable and pass things by their use of misinformation in rationalizing these programs. The program stands on its merits. It encourages the use of insulation and other fuels. However, the numbers used to describe the success of the program are absolutely absurd. The house I live in Ottawa has not been changed. It is relatively new and if I were offered CHIP I would not know what to insulate. However, we have reduced our energy consumption by about 10 per cent over the last three years because energy is darned expensive and I turned the thermostat down.

Now, I suppose my savings are going to show up in some bureaucrat's statistics so they can say "Look, CHIP is working marvellously, HIP is working marvellously, we have saved 10 per cent." Nonsense! They have not saved a darned thing as a result of the program. The saving is a result of the decision I made and similar decisions are being made by millions of Canadians. So my plea to the government is: For crying out loud, be honest; let the programs stand on their merits. Do not cook up these numbers because it makes it awfully difficult not to respond in kind and escalate into a battle over something we should not be battling about.

I have to say, Mr. Speaker, that the whole energy programs smells of that kind of misuse of data and information, such as the revenue sharing of 45-45-10, which is a bunch of hooey. It is absolutely indefensible. We have the totally fabricated demand curves in the NEP. They showed supply and demand had to cross in 1990 because the minister said they would. So somebody drew a line, today to 1990, and that is a demand curve. It is an abuse of integrity or fairness. That kind of dishonesty in approach does nothing to contribute to the understanding of government programs on the part of the public. It does nothing for the credibility of government. It does not help one iota in terms of developing the policies and programs we need.

Yes, we support HIP; yes, we support CHIP. But please do not abuse us any more by referring to fictitious numbers and claiming that these programs are responsible for all the savings. It is just not so. The programs help. They are part of a parcel of things which help. But please do not abuse us with numbers manufactured by the same people who wrote the atrocious document of last October 28.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I have several questions relating to housing in the maritimes and their home insulation programs. I do not believe the minister clarified why the programs are different in the maritimes. I understand they are largely administered through the provincial governments and subsidized by the federal government. Perhaps I am wrong, but I would be interested in hearing the minister's remarks.

Also I believe that the dates which are being applied to the programs are different in the maritimes. They will receive funding to insulate homes built up to 1981, if I am not mistaken. Why is this aspect different from other parts of Canada?

Also I would be interested in knowing what other conservation methods are being promoted. What other sources of alternate energy are being promoted, such as solar heat and so on?

I believe an article appeared in The Globe and Mail today which indicated that CMHC is adopting rules on oil-heated homes which will take effect tomorrow. Particularly it was indicated that homes heated by oil will remain eligible for mortgage insurance in the four Atlantic provinces and in the two territories where the alternatives of natural gas and electricity are not available at reasonable cost. In the other provinces new oil-heated homes will not be eligible for mortgage insurance through CMHC. This seems quite reasonable. It is a good incentive, with the exceptions where they should be, in the Atlantic region.

Having visited the Atlantic provinces on a housing tour, I noted some of the housing characteristics of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and the other Atlantic provinces. There is a very high degree of home ownership. Many people do not have mortgages. Many of the homes were self-built.

Why is nothing being done to change the application of CHIP so that people can put their own labour into it? Why must they always go through contractors in whom they really do not have much confidence? Why cannot this program be adapted so that people can do it themselves? Perhaps there could be seminars or some assistance for these people to do it themselves. Then they could make sure the money is spent the way it should be. It would make sense, particularly in the maritimes where there is a tradition of building co-operatives and putting their own labour into their homes.

Also I noted that things are changing rapidly in the maritimes. This gets back to housing costs. I saw white-painting in city centres which put up the cost of housing. I think the conversion of older homes and the rehabilitation of them would certainly increase demand for home insulation. Also I noted zero vacancy rates in the larger cities. Saint John is very similar to Vancouver. I gather Halifax now has the highest percentage increase in house prices. Surely this will have an impact on the program as well.

I received a number of letters from people complaining that there was not a fair allocation of money for co-op housing in the maritimes, particularly in Nova Scotia. I would be interested to know whether there are any facts concerning the number of maritimers in these two provinces who have used UFFI. I understand there were considerable complaints in the past about problems with another type of insulation known as a cellulose fibre material. It was installed in 40 per cent of the maritime homes which used CHIP grants. This insulation can rot in Atlantic weather and affect the structural stability of houses. Pressure from insulation installers to lower test standards to allow more insulation material on the market has produced a situation similar to the UFFI problem. The problem is the same, so I will not repeat my questions.

I must say that I did not receive any serious answers from the previous government speakers. I would be interested in knowing what guarantees there will be for consumers in the extension of this program to make it available for modern houses. What compensation will there be for those people who are victims of poor insulation programs, particularly UFFI? Has the government received complaints about this from the Atlantic region?

In closing, I should like to register my concern in regard to some of the figures and estimates for these programs. Going back to the budget for this fiscal year, I note that $3,200,000 was allocated for contribution payments to individuals for the home insulation program in the two Atlantic provinces. Also I noted that the contribution payments to CMHC for administrative costs were $1,100,000. This is 35 per cent of the total allocation for those two provinces. I think there should be some explanation why that amount of federal money is going to CMHC administration, not to the people who need home insulation.

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Speaker, as to the first question, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia were originally selected for the insulation and energy conservation program because they required a means of offsetting the substantial increase in the cost of electrical generation resulting from their high reliance upon imported oil-fired thermal generation. This was the real reason and the urgency for the program in that area.

It was determined that the resulting expenditure burden on consumers would be greatly reduced by a policy aimed at greater efficiency in consumer use of petroleum energy in general and specifically by a program which would result in greater efficiency in space heating.

The home insulation program was first introduced in PEI. Based on the experience in that province, CMHC anticipated a good response from householders in Nova Scotia, so a decision was made to go ahead with the expanded program.

As to the second question concerning eligibility, the home insulation program applies to units built and occupied prior to January 1, 1977 in Nova Scotia and in Prince Edward Island. The eligible units include principal residences, either rented or owned; houses or apartment buildings three storeys or less; mobile homes and hostels are also eligible. A grant is provided for either the cost of materials in the amount of $350 or one-third of the total costs of labour and insulation materials to a maximum of $500. The home owner can instal it himself; there is an either/or provision. I hope I have made that clear.

A further indication of federal assistance to these particular areas of Canada, PEI and Nova Scotia, is the fact that this grant is non-taxable. There are other items included in the program, such as insulation materials, weather stripping, caulking, and the installation of storm windows and doors. Applicants go through a pre-application process to obtain approval for the proposed work prior to having the work undertaken.

I hope these are the answers the hon. member requested. At to co-operative housing, I would ask the hon. member to direct those questions to the minister responsible for CMHC.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

• (2140)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Collenette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in view of the great progress we are making we will now proceed to Bill C-70, standing in the name of the Minister of Agriculture, as agreed to by all parties. Unfortunately, the Minister of Agriculture is not here this evening and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain has very magnanimously agreed to speak ahead of the minister. He will speak until the Black Rod intervenes, pursuant to the order made earlier.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that there is agreement with what the parliamentary secretary has said. It should also be noted that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain was one of the most distinguished ministers of agriculture this country has ever had.

Mr. Knowles: Once again, Mr. Speaker, we are being co-operative. We are agreeing to what is requested of us. I would like to be sure that the absence of the Minister of Agriculture does not mean that he has gone to the Senate!

ANIMAL DISEASE AND PROTECTION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING COMPENSATION PAYMENTS

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-70, to amend the Animal Disease and Protection Act, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the circumstances under which I rise are quite unusual, I do take great pleasure and some honour in making these few remarks about Bill C-70.

What I wish to do is put before the House, as a proper preliminary to these amendments which we are now discussing, something of the history of this very important legislation which has been on the books for over 60 years. This bill is called "an Act to amend the Animal Disease and Protection Act."

As the House knows, the movement of any form of livestock or any form of plant material across borders is one of the most sensitive things in the world today. The one act that protects the producers and consumers of animals is this act which we have before us.

My first memory of this act goes back 30 years to the unfortunate outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Saskatchewan in 1951. At that time we had an act in place which allowed for a very small compensation for animals which were destroyed. The circumstance at that time involved a person who had been travelling in Europe, who came to work on a farm near McLean, Saskatchewan and who had apparently carried on his clothing some of the virus of this disease which we are now discussing under one of the sections of this bill. This virus caused the spread of foot-and-mouth disease, which is a very serious disease in Europe. Any mention of it in North America causes great panic in the market squares of Canada.

Foot-and-mouth disease affects all forms of animals with cloven hooves; but it also has another effect, too, and that is that it debilitates the animal. But the animal can recover. The fact remains that the spread of this virus terrifies those of us who have dealt with it.

Parliament may not know, but one of the proudest sections of the Department of Agriculture is the health of animals branch, which is made up of a group of underpaid veterinarians who have done more to build up the cattle industry in Canada than any other group, outside of the breeding section, I suspect. These men worked to a standstill, at great physical discomfort, to clear this country of tuberculosis.

That program went on from the early 1920s, all during the twenties, the thirties, the forties and the fifties. I had the privilege of doing the last inoculation of some 15 million animals which had been inoculated over that long period of time. Today, Canada remains free of bovine tuberculosis because of the magnificent veterinarians from all across Canada who serve in the health of animals branch. Tonight we are carrying this bill forward trying to meet with current conditions.

I introduced my remarks by talking about foot-and-mouth disease, since it strikes terror into all producers of beef, pork, etc. We have never had to endure in North America what has been endured in Europe. We are very fortunate that when this disease did break out in Canada in 1951 we had a very competent health of animals branch which moved into the battle. The battle was not that terrible because the few animals which had the infection recovered. The fact is that the virus has moved down that one creek, the Waskana Creek, through Regina and northwesterly from Regina, and got into some of the purebred herds. What made it difficult for the health of animals branch to fight the spread of that virus was the fact that the compensation in the bill at that time was so low, based on a previous period when prices of cattle were much lower, that no farmers with purebred dairy or purebred beef wanted to report any signs in their herd which would indicate the presence of that disease. They were afraid to do this because they knew the procedure was to quarantine the whole herd and, if necessary, destroy the whole herd, even if it were healthy. But because the animals had been exposed, under the rules of the game, and to win confidence in the world that we were fighting this battle, all herds were destroyed.

I do not see the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) in the House, but he would know about this because the main part of the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in 1951 occurred in his area. Many of us remember these beautiful herds of dairy and beef cattle being brought in. They were some of the most beautifully bred animals I have ever seen and it was tragic to see them being lined up and shot, then dumped into pits with chemicals thrown over them. It was a cruel sight to see, knowing that the farmer concerned had his basic herd destroyed when he knew that all the animals were healthy. It was done for a psychological reason—to prove to the Americans, who were our main market, that we would do everything possible to eliminate that disease entirely. We won the confidence of the American market and got it back in the next year or so.

Next I want to describe the very dramatic debate that took place in this House in the summer or early fall of 1951. The minister of agriculture at that time was the Right Hon. James Garfield Gardiner. He put up a sturdy battle to protect the act as it existed at that time. He had no choice but to do that. The compensation offered was too low to induce farmers to volunteer information. The member on this side of the House who led the debate was the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. For four or five days the two men fought out the issue of expanding compensation to include farmers on voluntary report, so that there would be no question of anyone losing his whole livelihood because he made this contribution to the industry. The Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent settled the issue and ruled that what the then member for Lake Centre proposed should be accepted and the compensation rated to a level that the farmers would feel was equitable.

I was present during that debate and, of course, coming from the affected area, I had an intimate knowledge of all the people concerned. The experiences of that terrible summer of 1951, when foot-and-mouth disease almost threatened to destroy the beef industry of western Canada, have never left my mind.

Tonight our purpose is to amend the act, and the key issue is compensation. The provisions of the bill make all the animals listed available for compensation at market price. Two groups of diseases are exempt; one is tuberculosis, which, to my knowledge, was wiped out 20 years ago in Canada; the other is brucellosis. The reason for this is that both those diseases have direct effects on humans; in other words, the disease is transmittable from animals to humans. I suspect that is the reason that the health of animals branch always paid special attention to them.

It is regrettable that even though the level of compensation is increased in the bill to the market price for all animals, a different technique is used for animals suffering from tuberculosis and brucellosis. It is commendable to raise the amount over what it has been for the last five or six years, but it still does not meet the experience of the last 50 years.

In the last four or five years brucellosis came from Manitoba into my riding so I have some experience in this area. I have seen herds of 700 cattle slaughtered when I doubt if any more than two or three of the cattle had ever been infected. I saw a family forced to feed their animals in a closed area under quarantine. They could not put them out to pasture where there would be contact across the fence with other animals or other grass, because the virus spreads by contact with grass, grain, mud and so on. After the winter feed was gone, the farmer had to haul grain and water. Eventually he had to borrow thousands of dollars every week in order to bring in feed and water for his animals. He was not allowed to sell them. The family almost went into bankruptcy.

Thanks to help from the health of animals branch, I was able to get through to the government the fact that this farmer should be helped. If the health of animals branch wanted to keep that herd under quarantine, then I thought it was its responsibility to feed and water them and to keep the farmer and his family from going broke. The branch finally accepted this argument and on the instructions of the chief in Ottawa gave the order to slaughter the whole herd even though they knew that, if they waited long enough and no more cases of infection occurred, the herd would have been cleared and left intact.

There are not many animals on that farm today and a lot of the barns have been burned down; but the farmer hopes it can be rehabilitated and again become one of the major cattle producing farms of Saskatchewan.

This bill makes the mistake that has been made every time this situation has occurred in the last 50 years. A fixed amount has been set for compensation for brucellosis and tuberculosis. A fixed amount is dangerous, Mr. Speaker. If the price of cattle is above that set by legislation when brucellosis occurs, the farmer will have a feeling of being discriminated against, as was the case with outbreaks of foot and mouth disease and when we were fighting the outbreak of brucellosis which came from Manitoba to Saskatchewan. It is not possible for legislation to establish the value of our cattle at the moment they are to be killed.

I know nothing can be done at this late date, but Treasury Board must learn that it is necessary to include a flexible formula based on the market price for an average period of quarantine so that the farmer will not be subject to the whims of the only buyer who is allowed to buy. He will not get a fair market price when there is only one buyer. The packing plant that will take the animal is appointed by the health of animals branch. The minute the animals go through the gate, they are subject to the packers' price.

Even though the amount of compensation is fixed, if, as I expect to happen in the next two or three years, cattle prices increase from the 70 cents to 80 cents per 100 pounds live weight at present to over $2, that would make a 1,000 pound animal worth $2,000 or $2,220. It would be a blow to the farmer to have to accept $1,200 each for several hundred animals that have to be slaughtered. Often they would represent a lifetime of work.

I should have liked to see the bill include a formula which stated that the market value would apply to cases of brucellosis and tuberculosis, based on the number of days the farm was in quarantine and giving the average price for that period. If that price were flexible and moved up and down with the market, it would encourage every farmer who had a suspicion of something wrong with his herd to report it. If he saw a cow abort he would report it immediately because of the possibility of brucellosis. If he does report it and finds that it is brucellosis, the whole herd is condemned as well as all the other herds who have been in contact through fences, neighbouring pastures or sharing a common pasture. The loss effect, economically and otherwise, is tremendous.

I think it would be wise for us to remember the next time we amend this bill that Parliament should have a little more time to get amendments through. I know that the health of animals branch wants a flexible formula, but I also know that Treasury Board works on very fixed principles protecting the public purse. I know the reasons for the arguments on both sides. We are not doing credit to the whole purpose of this bill by putting in the section with maximums in it. Whatever the maximum is, it is generous now for the average type of animal, but it does not allow for exotics and above all it does not allow for the rise and fall of the price structure. That is the essential weakness in the bill which has been there ever since the beginning, even though we are generous in raising the amounts at various times in the life of this bill; but the fact is it should be flexible to make sure there is no sense of loss, inequality or injustice whatever. It is imperative to those who are trying to build up the cattle industry, indeed to the survival of the human race, that there be no hesitation on the part of a farmer in reporting anything unusual.

These diseases can be damaging and devastating, affecting whole continents and the lives of thousands of people. I would think in introducing this bill on behalf of the minister that the minister should be as straightforward as I have tried to be in saying that this bill has good points but also this one fatal weakness.

I know the health of animals branch has for three years had before Treasury Board the proposal respecting a flexible formula. I am sorry they did not get it. I am sometimes tempted to suggest very strong action by ministers when they run into this type of situation. We all agree, regardless of party affiliation, on what should be done, but we run into this hurdle every time because the legalistic-minded people who draft these bills do not think about what the health of animals branch has to face in dealing with these terribly contagious diseases which can do so much harm in a short space of time.

I will not horrify the House with examples of what I have seen in this field. I simply say that I am glad that we have been able to get this bill into this House, even if it has been two or three years in the making. We are glad to put it through but with the warning of what is going to happen as sure as we are all sitting here.

I hope any other person who wants to discuss this bill will bring forward the other aspects that I know are lacking in the bill. I can think of a few but others may want to speak to them.

I was supposed to speak until Black Rod knocked on the door. May I continue, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Royal Assent

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I think what I have said so far has been relevant to the bill, but what I will say now will be wider in scope.

I shall now talk about the cattle industry in Canada and the United States. The cattle industry has been one of the great growth industries of our country in the last century. There is no question but that it has added more income on a stabilized basis to the farm income of Canada than any other source. It does not have the ups and downs that grains have. It does have its ups and downs in the breeding cycle and in the supply and demand cycle, but generally speaking it has been the most productive—

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed the following bills: Bill C-75, An Act respecting a home insulation program for certain provinces in Canada, and Bill C-76, An Act respecting a home insulation program for certain Maritime provinces in Canada.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[Translation]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

• (2210)

And being returned:

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act respecting a home insulation program for certain provinces in Canada—Chapter No. 57

An act respecting a home insulation program for certain Maritime provinces in Canada—Chapter No. 58

An act respecting oil conservation and the substitution for oil of other energy sources—Chapter No. 59

An act to amend the Department of Labour Act—Chapter No. 60

An act to provide for the prohibition of certain international air services—Chapter 61

An act to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act—Chapter No. 62

An act to amend the Currency and Exchange Act—Chapter No. 63

An act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act in respect of the early retirement of air traffic controllers—Chapter No. 64

An act respecting the relocation of government agencies—Chapter No. 65

An act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1982—Chapter No. 66

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

RAILWAYS—MEASURES TO AID MOVEMENT OF INCREASED GRAIN EXPORTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY ON USE OF RAILWAY SERVICES

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising this evening is to register my total dissatisfaction with the answers I received to two very important questions earlier today during the question period. One deals with the matter of grain transportation and the matter of rolling stock, and the other with the railway capacity problem, particularly as it relates to western Canada. Both of these issues, to me, are issues in which the government is failing very dramatically.

I should like to deal first with the matter of the grain carrying fleet. What is happening is that the boxcar fleet dedicated to the movement of grain is decreasing very rapidly. In 1980 there were some 28,400 pieces of rolling stock composed of 14,400 boxcars and 14,000 hopper cars. That boxcar fleet is declining at the rate of about 1,000 cars per year with respect to the CNR and 800 cars per year with respect to the CPR. This means that at the end of this year, 1981, there will be 3,600 fewer cars in the grain carrying fleet than in 1980.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) in his answer today said there is no need for more hopper cars. I should point out that in the 1979-80 crop year we were able to move some 23 tonnes with roughly 28,000 pieces of rolling stock. What is happening is that the movement of grain both for export position and for commercial position in Canada is now declining. We are now faced with an uneviable record of moving less grain in this country than we did last year at the same time. I should like to put these figures on the record.

The total commercial disappearance of Canadian grain from August 1 to June 10, 1981 is recorded at 23.674 million tonnes. For 1980 over the same period, August 1 to June 11, that figure was recorded at 23.882 million tonnes. I should point out that while we are about 100,000 tonnes ahead in export disappearance we are about 285,000 tonnes behind in commercial disappearance. So we are falling behind now and we are going to continue to fall behind further still unless our rolling stock is replenished.

The hon. senator in the other place said, and I quote from page 2636 of Senate Hansard:

—the ordering of hopper cars and the number of hopper cars needed are now under active consideration.

Yet at the same time the Minister of Transport said in the House today that it is the view of the government, based on a number of studies, that there is no need for more hopper cars this year. Whom are we to believe? This is another clear example of total inconsistency on the part of this government.

● (2225)

Let me point out that the grain transportation authority recommends that we should be putting at least 1,300 new hopper cars into the system on an annual basis. That is supported and endorsed by the advisory committee. As a matter of fact, that committee passed a resolution just recently, which I will quote:

That the Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board urge the Government of Canada through the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board that orders be placed immediately for additional hopper cars in accordance with the requirements recommended by the Grain Transportation Authority.

Mr. McKnight: That means now.

Mr. Mazankowski: That means now, as my colleague, the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) suggests. The Booz Allen report commissioned by this government recommends that we should be bringing at least 1,900 new hopper cars into the system every year now through 1985. Someone here is dramatically out of touch. I think the Minister of Transport is pathetically out of touch on this whole issue.

I come now to the question of rationing. The government House leader in the other place says that the federal government plans to ration western Canadian rail space soon with a system of allotments for exports. He went on to say:

It's an absolutely urgent priority... It's the most important priority we're facing.

Today in the House the Minister of Transport pooh-poohed the idea. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said we should not have laughed at double tracking. I have read the Senate debates for June 29 at page 2638 in relation to double tracking, a matter raised in the other place. This is what the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board had to say about double tracking:

Many people felt that this statement was rather foolish and farfetched.

The commitment of the Prime Minister was to double track the line from Winnipeg to Vancouver using the existing sidings. I have to agree with the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board on that.

I want to know what the government is going to do. Will it stand idly by and do nothing about the capacity problem, recognizing that there is to be a 70 per cent increase in traffic demand in western Canada? Will it do nothing about finding adequate revenues for the railways for the movement of grain? Will it allow our reputation as a reliable supplier of grain and other export commodities once again to deteriorate? In short, is it the policy of the government simply to stand idly by and allow this policy of rationing, which has been talked about by the railways, to take place, or is it going to do something about it? If it is, would it please tell this House what plans it has? It owes that explanation to the House.

It owes it to this House, the people of Canada and particularly the producers and those people who rely upon the movement of export commodities to port position for movement to other countries. It owes it to everyone to lay its plans before this House and the country so that we can get on with the job of building, providing jobs and strengthening the Canadian economy.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised several issues related to the adequacy of western rail capacity to meet the anticipated demand, especially from bulk commodities, in the coming years. In a sense some of these issues are peripheral to the main issue. For example, it is obvious that the government will have to look at the need for additional grain hopper cars in the near future, but the general view in the grain industry is that an order does not have to be placed immediately.

The hon. member seemed to object to a press report in which Senator Perrault was quoted. Without knowing exactly what the Senate leader said, it is clear, even from the press report, that he was talking about possible rationing by the railways, not Ottawa, and that this could occur in 1985 if decisions are not made soon. These distinctions, however, are not very comforting for the producer of coal, potash or grain who will be faced with congestion and bottlenecks. The main issue here is that bottlenecks will occur, and rationing is unavoidable unless railways obtain sufficient revenue to invest soon in increased rail capacity.

The hon. member has correctly identified this as the critical problem. Others, including the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) in his speech last fall in Edmonton, have also done so. What they have recognized is that the debate, which started as a discussion on what to do with the Crow rate, has now evolved and broadened to a global concern for western economic development. As everyone knows, the western economy depends heavily on the export of raw materials. If the transportation system does not have the capacity to move them, the economy of the west, indeed of the country, will suffer.

Some months ago, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in the House that he was not willing to consider changes to the Crow rate unless there was a consensus in the west that changes had to be made. In my view, Mr. Speaker, more and more westerners are now realizing that this is not just an agricultural issue but one that affects western economic development in general, and they are speaking out. As a responsible westerner, I am sure the hon. member does his best each weekend to build the consensus that the government is seeking. I hope he encourages his colleagues to do the same.

AGRICULTURE—INCREASE IN NUMBER OF ELIGIBLE TOWNSHIPS

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, on April 1, I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) if he could confirm to me and my colleagues whether an additional 400 plus townships have been added to the herd maintenance assistance program. He confirmed that and very kindly sent me a list of the additional townships. However, I would like to know why I was denied the original list. When my office asked we were told it could not be made public and no reason was given. I am sure the minister's office was just as confused as I was at that answer, but I would ask the minister now to release the original list of townships that were eligible under this program. Since the additional list was released I am sure there could be no objection to releasing the other list.

I brought up another anomaly that I would like to have clarified. There are some 3,000 farmers waiting to have their applications reviewed by cabinet and I would like to know how long they have to wait. I am not sure who is reviewing them and I hope I can be informed of that tonight. These farmers and cattlemen are waiting for their applications to be reviewed because of the precipitation data criteria established by the government. Some of these people have been waiting since last fall. They have already had a calf out of the cow they were paid to maintain but have not yet received any money.

In addition, I asked the minister why some 1,100 applications reviewed by the appeal board are now sealed and cannot be opened by the PFRA people for review. I should say these 1,100 odd files have to do with crop yield. I do not know why the PFRA cannot not be made aware of the decision and the methodology the appeal board used in turning down these 1,100 applications. I would like to repeat, there are 1,100 applications which cannot be reviewed by any cabinet decision unless hopefully tonight the minister or his parliamentary secretary will explain to me that they are going to be reviewed. This would be very much appreciated by the producers. I hope they would review both sets of applications and do it now.

The review by cabinet that I spoke of will take place I hope next weekend in Winnipeg, when the senator responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board and the Minister of Agriculture meet there. That meeting will be looked forward to with anticipation by producers in all parts of Canada.

The other thing I would like to ask about to this. The Minister of Agriculture, in announcing the grain embargo compensation payments, made the statement that they were able to use $100 million they had set aside for drought relief in the year 1981. If it rained in western Canada there was no need for drought relief and we were going to take the $81 million from that fund, leaving approximately $19 million.

I am also told that approximately $40 million has been spent from the $60 million allotted for herd maintenance drought relief in the year 1980. That leaves approximately $40 million. When we take the 3,000 farmers who have their appeal reviewed by cabinet decision because of rainfall, and the approximate 1,100 who have not had the ability to appeal because of crop yield, that is $40 million for 4,000 farmers. I do not think the government can plead that it does not have the cash flow to meet this demand. People who in good faith applied and kept their cattle herds at the request of this government are still writing to their members of Parliament.

The area of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) was one of the areas left out and had to be included later. I converse quite often with the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields). We are now receiving telephone calls from people saying they have not heard whether they have been rejected or accepted, or they have been accepted but have not received a cheque. I am sure the parliamentary secretary understands that when the government makes a commitment, the people of Canada expect it to honour that commitment, and not in 12 months but as soon as possible.

I see that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. MacLellan) is here. I am sure he will give me a responsible answer. He will agree that the payment of compensation for herd maintenance and drought relief is long overdue.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to deal with many of the points the hon. member made in his presentation. I will deal basically with his original question and say that, as part of the review process under the herd maintenance assistance program, an individual review of each township outside the severe drought area was undertaken.

In the first instance, this review was undertaken by the program staff as townships were identified during the initial process. A report and recommendation were prepared for each township and forwarded to the review board when it commenced operations in January, 1981. These reviews were based on all available precipitation data for each township under consideration.

During the board's initial review of some of these township files, it became apparent that the board did not concur in many of the program's staff recommendations to reject townships on the basis of precipitation levels greater than 60 per cent of normal. To resolve these disagreements it was agreed that professional hydrologists employed by PFRA would carry out rigorous regional storm analyses on all townships outside the drought area. These analyses are based on the premise that if any point within the township received less than 60 per cent of normal precipitation, the township met the program precipitation criterion. The analyses considered only basic regional storms and ignored peak storm values and localized precipitation. Based on the regional storm analyses of April 14, 1981 the review board and program staff have concurred in the inclusion in the drought area of approximately 450 townships out of the total of 1,300 townships originally identified as outside the drought area.

In addition, the hon. member made reference to the cases presently under consideration. It is believed that these decisions will be made and identified very shortly. With respect to the 1,100 that he mentioned are sealed in Regina and will not be forthcoming for cabinet appeal, he is correct in his statement. These 1,100 have been looked at by the review board, contrary to what was mentioned earlier, and they are determined not to qualify. Every consideration was given to these people and it is possible to bring everyone who requested assistance under this program within the criteria. The review board recommendations were then reviewed in turn by the PFRA officials and it was on the basis of both these reviews that it was determined they just did not qualify. They are not, "sealed in Regina"; they are merely filed away under the normal business practice.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—DEPARTMENT'S TREATMENT OF MANITOBA INDIAN BANDS

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, I am here tonight to draw attention to a question which I asked some time ago of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro). In fact, I asked the question on March 16 of this year.

Basically, what I asked the minister at that time was for an assurance that his department and he would do everything possible to meet the needs of the Indian people in Manitoba. He responded by saying that some of the matters I raised at that time had already been dealt with in meetings with Indians in Manitoba. In response to a supplementary question he said that I was becoming repetitious. If the question is becoming repetitious it is only because it has not been answered. What is the government doing to meet the needs of Indian people In Manitoba? I will continue to raise this question until it is answered in a real way.

All it takes for any citizen, including the minister or any of his representatives, is to look at the conditions of the Indian people in Manitoba, as they are common across this country. They have only to look at the social conditions, the economic conditions and the financial status of Indian people to see that the question has not been answered.

One might ask oneself whether this is really an important question, since it is not a new question and the conditions are almost perennial. As a Canadian I say that it is very important since it remains a blot on our social landscape. It is a matter of shame that in the history of our country we have allowed the disparities which exist between the Indian people and the general population to become so broad. I say that the government is wrong in not acting to reduce these disparities. I feel the people of this country are willing to pay the price necessary to allocate financial resources to reduce those disparities, and to reduce them in a significant way.

Today, in preparation for tonight, I spoke to the Indian leaders in Manitoba to obtain an update on their meetings with the minister and with regard to whether or not the minister had turned around and started to take some real action. Unfortunately, what I found is that the Indian leaders in Manitoba still have a plethora of unmet priorities to which the minister has been unable to respond.

Even though this may sound unkind, I must say that while the minister has often met with the Indian people he does not seem to possess the capacity to deliver. He makes commitments, comes back and meets with his officials but does not seem to know how to deliver the goods. This is something which bothers the Indian people of Manitoba and the Indian people across this country. I know, because it is brought to my attention quite often.

When I spoke to the Indian leaders today they indicated to me a whole list of priorities which remain unmet. I only have time to mention a few. For example, there are 61 Indian reserves in Manitoba which have been promised 20 new schools between now and 1990. The other 41 reserves will have to wait for the promise of a school until after 1990.

The same situation prevails with regard to child welfare. The province has the jurisdictional responsibility but will only act in life and death situations. The federal government, through the Department of Indian Affairs, does not have any services to provide for child welfare. Indian people have been developing proposals to present so that they can deliver these services themselves, but there has not been sufficient response from the government.

It goes on, into water rights, migratory birds and economic development. For example, I know that the department recently made a proposal to give billions of dollars for economic development on Indian reserves. It was turned down. Then it went scrambling for a shopping list of projects for Manitoba that could come within the limited budget being offered by cabinet. Of course, the shopping list was developed without the involvement of the Indian leadership in Manitoba. This is another example of how needs are not being met. They cannot be met unless the people concerned are involved.

I am rushing along, Mr. Speaker, because of the shortage of time but I want to say that a big, splash announcement was made recently in Winnipeg about an increase of 33 per cent for band core funding across the country. That amounted to $3.8 million and is the only increase since 1972. When inflation is taken into account it is in a fact a decrease. This is another example of funds not meeting the needs.

The Winnipeg Indian council has as its priority the core funding for its organization. I understand that the minister has promised action on this and we are giving him until July 14 to deliver on that promise. I hope in this instance he can demonstrate the capacity to deliver the goods once he has made a commitment.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the concern of the hon. member on this question. It has tremendous ramifications and covers a broad spectrum of the concerns of native peoples.

While the government recognizes its responsibility to Indian people and its commitment to provide financial support in response to their needs, it must also recognize that this must be done within the confines of available resources.

The House should recognize the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's strong commitment to looking for new ways to deal with increased budgetary restraints and higher costs of providing this support. The department is coming up with solutions to problems identified at the band level, such as the housing subsidy which the department was responsible for increasing last year.

Although the government recognizes its responsibility for Indian residents in Canada, those Indian people living off the reserve must also be recognized as citizens of the provinces in which they are residing. Therefore, the federal government is continuing to attempt to work out solutions with the provincial governments whereby they recognize their responsibility as well for these Canadian residents. Jurisdiction for status Indians, in particular, living off the reserve is a question which will take much negotiation and time on both sides to work out.

With particular reference to the Manitoba situation and the request made by the chiefs for the resignation of our senior managers there, I wish to reiterate that we have every confidence in those members of the departmental staff of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Public servants must take critical decisions every day, and will continue to be subject to this kind of publicity in light of those decisions.

Consultation with the bands continues, and I am fully confident that the proper consultation processes are being implemented. Other groups are welcome to participate in these discussions and their concerns may be addressed in that forum, if they wish to make those concerns known to our regional management team for their consideration.

The hon. member mentioned that the recent 33 per cent increase in funding for Indian bands to cover the expenses of chief and counsellor was another example of the department's failure to keep its commitment. I would say that the $3,800,-000 goes a lot further in keeping a commitment than was the case before the money was granted. I think the department, and the minister in particular, is making a very honest attempt to meet the concerns of the hon. member and native problems, and he will continue to do so.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

USE OF POSTAL FRANK BY MR. TESSIER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise in regard to the apparent flagrant misuse of parliamentary members' franking privileges by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue, namely, the hon. member for Mégantic-Compton-Stanstead (Mr. Tessier) in regard to a letter, a copy of which I have here, sent out by Jomac Canada Incorporated of Beebe, Quebec, in which that company has used the parliamentary frank of the member for Mégantic-Compton-Stanstead for purposes of advocating its opinions on problems facing the Canadian glove industry, such letters as this one being mailed free of charge by use of the frank through the House of Commons post office. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That a complete investigation be made of the abuse of parliamentary free mailing privileges through the House of Commons post office by Jomac Canada Incorporated of Beebe, Quebec, and specifically by the hon. member for Mégantic-Compton-Stanstead, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue, and that such investigation be made by the Speaker and by the Management and Members' Services Committee of the House of Commons with a view to taking whatever action is deemed necessary.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REFUSAL OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY TO ALLOW ACCESS TO CBC REPORTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of press reports this morning indicating that CBC reporters have been refused admission to the New Democratic Party national policy convention being held in Vancouver; and while recognizing the rights of individual members of the NDP to refuse to talk to CBC reporters, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That this House affirms the democratic principle of freedom of the press, denounces any interference with such a basic freedom, and expresses the hope that the New Democratic Party will reconsider its decision and permit access by CBC reporters to its convention in order that this basic freedom so vital to the survival of a democratic society will continue uninhibited.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TERRY FOX MARATHON OF HOPE

POSTAL STRIKE EFFECT ON DONATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter that is not partisan but is of urgent and pressing necessity.

Canadians are today paying their final respects to Terry Fox, an exceptional young man whose courage and determination inspired the nation. At this time many people are proud to honour his memory by pledging donations to the Terry Fox Marathon of Hope. In view of the current postal strike, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis):

That the government do everything possible to make arrangements with the chartered banks and trust companies for the receipt and disbursement of donations made to the Marathon of Hope in memory of Terry Fox.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ACTION NECESSARY TO SETTLE LABOUR DISPUTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn), I move:

That this House calls on the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications to recognize that the people of Canada do not want the CBC to be destroyed by a long and unnecessary strike, that they want the early return of normal radio and television programming, and therefore the minister is urged to advise the CBC that NABET's position, in the view of this House, is a reasonable one and that a settlement of the current dispute should be achieved without further delay, certainly in advance of the convening of the Ottawa Summit Conference.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on an urgent matter. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has shown us that he still has some concern when he announced the inclusion of unincorporated small businesses and farms for small business development bond qualification. However, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) says "No, they must incorporate first." The Minister of Finance is again showing us his great grasp of understanding for small business and agriculture, some of which we obviously gained by not attending the O.F.A. meeting in Toronto. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

● (1410)

That the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism and the Minister of Agriculture take the Minister of Finance away for a weekend of fishing and clue him in to the problems facing small business and agriculture in order to gain acceptance for the announcement of the Minister of Agriculture.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REUNIFICATION OF KOREA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, the President of the Republic of Korea, His Excellency Chun Doo Hwan, has requested a meeting with the President of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, President Kim Il Sung, in order to initiate dialogue between the two leaders for the reunification of Korea. President Kim has refused all overtures on the part of President Chun. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the House supports President Chun in his efforts to negotiate a peaceful reunification of his country.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PETRO-CANADA

PRICE OF GASOLINE IN CALGARY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Last Saturday in Calgary the Petro-Canada service station on the McLeod Trail was advertising regular gasoline for 27.8 cents per litre while the Gulf station on Centre Street was selling the same product for 27.4 cents per litre. The government's window on the oil industry has apparently become muddied because of the arrogance of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), because the purchase of Petrofina is costing all car owners four cents extra on every litre of gasoline they buy, etc. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That the government wash its window by cleaning up its act in western Canada prior to taking full operational responsibility for Petrofina in eastern Canada and thus set an example for the industry and give all Canadian consumers the best and lowest possible price.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROTECTION FOR PURCHASERS OF 1977 MODEL YEAR OLDSMOBILE AUTOMOBILES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs review the recent court decision in the United States involving General Motors and 14,000 purchasers of 1977 Oldsmobiles equipped with Chevrolet engines to determine why Canadian owners received only $200 from General Motors while U.S. owners received $550, and take whatever action is necessary to give protection to Canadian consumers similar to the protection being received by U.S. consumers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL STRIKE—POSITION OF UNION MEMBERS REMAINING ON JOB—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of some urgency under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It is my understanding that during this postal strike, as in those previous, there is a number of members of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers across the country who have remained on the job, particularly in rural areas. Those who chose this course of action in the past were disciplined, lost their union privileges, and were denied a vote on whether to strike this time. With all due respect to the union, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt):

That the Postmaster General use his good office to ensure that those members of CUPW who have chosen to remain on the job will not be discriminated against by senior officials of that union.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the refusal of CUPW to negotiate its current dispute with the Treasury Board and the irreparable harm done throughout Canada by the withdrawal of the services of inside postal workers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this House directs the government to prepare and introduce legislation forthwith obliging striking postal employees to return to work immediately pending the settlement of outstanding labour disputes.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

EXPLANATIONS FOR BANK RATE

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister, and it centres on the bank rate today which has been announced as being relatively static compared with last week, which means that Canada has the highest bank rate of any of the seven large industrial nations which will be meeting in Ottawa later this month. Would the Prime Minister indicate how he intends to explain to the other six leaders at the conference why Canada should have the highest interest rate structure in the free western world at a time when many of those leaders have indicated they would like to see a lower interest rate structure rather than the consistently high rate such as that in which Canada has been the leader?

● (1415)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member is concerned about explanations given to himself, I would point out the Minister of Finance has given them several times. However, he phrases his question in terms of how I would explain this to the other leaders. I can assure him they understand this. They themselves are complaining about the effects on their economies of the very high interest rates in the United States.

Mr. Stevens: But you are higher.

Mr. Trudeau: They understand, apparently better than the hon. member does, that in Canada, being in such close proximity and so interlinked to the United States, our money markets are much more influenced than others not so closely interlinked. They understand this perfectly well. I think the hon. member should read what is being said and the opinions being voiced in those countries and he will know I will not have to explain that. He should have somebody explain that to him, perhaps a professor of economics in A-1.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, obviously the Prime Minister has lost touch with what is happening in North America. His interest rates are substantially above those in the United States. If he wants to follow the American rates, why did he not follow them down?

PRESSURE ON CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): My supplementary is for the Minister of Finance. As it is generally accepted among economists that the dollar is the key reason why the minister has been maintaining such a high interest rate structure, we note that only last week it was announced that the line of credit the government arranged to sustain the dollar has been increased from $2.5 billion to $3.5 billion. Would the Minister of Finance indicate if that extra billion is in anticipation of continuing pressure on the dollar over the coming months and years, and, if so, would he confirm that will mean not only will we have a dollar under pressure but that the high interest rate structure we now have will likely have to be maintained if some basic changes are not made?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the answer is clearly no, that is not the intention of increasing the stand-by credit. The credit has been in existence for some considerable time. It was increased in the normal way and does not reflect an expectation that there will be any particular pressure on the Canadian dollar.

The Canadian dollar in recent days and weeks has been above 83 cents. Some people in the country are urging that it be permitted to decline below 83 cents. Because of the state of the Canadian dollar at well above 83 cents, I can assure the hon. member any fears he may have in his mind should be removed.

BANKRUPTCY AND FORECLOSURE STATISTICS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, again I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Bearing in mind we now have a rising personal and corporate bankruptcy rate, and a rising number of foreclosures, would the minister indicate whether he is aware of the fact that he has now allowed real interest rates in this country to be at the highest level since the beginning of the great depression, a real rate of over 5 per cent after inflation is eliminated, compared to the 1979 period when the real rate was 1.2 per cent during the Clark government? If he is aware of that real rate being charged to Canadian consumers, farmers and businessmen, would he indicate when he is going to start showing a little compassion in what he is doing to the average Canadian with his ridiculous policy?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1420)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have a number of points to make. It would be impossible to deal with all the preamble the hon. member has put into his question because of time limitation, but he talked about rising personal bankruptcies and rising foreclosures. It so happens that last Thursday, I believe it was, I had a meeting with representatives of the mortgage companies in which we explored the mortgage situation, the interest rate situation and the rate of foreclosures. They informed me, based on the statistics they had before them, that the rate of foreclosures on home mortgages this year was lower than last year. So much for rising foreclosures!

Mr. Stevens: How about powers of sale?

Mr. MacEachen: When the hon. member talks about real interest rates and relates his question to the former question about Europe, does he know, for example, that the real interest rate in Germany at the present time is the highest ever experienced by that economy? He ought to put that in his pipe.

Mr. Stevens: I know ours is the highest. Do you agree?

Mr. MacEachen: I do not agree with anything the hon. member puts forward unless I have examined it with binoculars and microscopes, because most of the time it is inaccurate.

Mr. Stevens: The minister knows more about Germany than Canada.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member forgets that a very substantial part of the pressure on interest rates in Canada arises from the strength of the Canadian economy. The great demand for bank loans is still a very substantial pressure on interest rates. If the hon. member wants interest rates to go down a bit, he will ask inflation to come down; that is what will bring it about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSING

RENEWAL OF ASSISTED HOME OWNERSHIP PROGRAM MORTGAGES

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Approximately a year ago the minister said, as reported at page 2176 of Hansard, that the government "would not attempt to solve the economic problems of the country or the fiscal requirements of the government on the backs of the low-income people of this country".

My question concerns the 41,000 Canadians who are by the government's own definition low-income Canadians. They are owners of homes under the Assisted Home Ownership Program. Their mortgages are now up for renewal. The five-year roll-over is due now. Their mortgages were taken out at anywhere from 6 per cent to 8 per cent, and they will be renewed at anywhere from 18 per cent to 19 per cent. In my opinion this represents a tragedy of national dimensions because of the shattered dreams and hopes of people who have to walk away from their homes and write off their investment. The minister has some control over this situation. What action does he propose to take to assist these 41,000 Canadians who must renew mortgages at usurious rates and run the risk of losing their homes and investment?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, in response to the question, the hon. member is about 12 months behind the times. It was at this time last year that the government moved in response to those people who would experience the problems he has indicated. We said to those people who would have to pay a disproportionate amount of their incomes to meet new interest rates, or whatever new charges, those people who would have to pay more than 30 per cent of their income toward shelter costs, that we would continue the subsidies. That program was reintroduced this year for a further 12 months. We have responded to the people who are most in need. We have shown a response to those people. We have used an equitable standard to address that problem.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ASSIST AHOP HOME OWNERS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, the minister is the one who is a year behind because there are 500,000 mortgages up for renewal this year. Included in that 500,000 are these 41,000 AHOP mortgages. I doubt there is a member in the House who has not had the experience of an AHOP owner who cannot afford to meet the new mortgage payments.

Because the minister can control the situation, does he intend to take any action whatsoever to change the financing arrangements for these AHOP owners so that they can continue to occupy and to own their homes, rather than walk away from them and hand the keys over to the minister? He knows what is happening, and he can do something about it.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I indicated that last year the government, in response to the first year of that program, moved to assist those people whose mortgages were rolling over after the end of the first five-year period by using the 30 per cent rule, which I think everyone in the industry accepts as an equitable standard for payment toward shelter needs. After we introduced that, there were relatively few people with the roll-over problem who took advantage of that 30 per cent rule. Further, the number of people in difficulty under that program has reduced this year compared to last year. With respect, Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman is really 12 months behind the times.

POSTAL STRIKE—NECESSITY FOR NEGOTIATIONS

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, with that kind of an ovation I should be asking the Prime Minister a question. However, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Given that anyone who understands collective bargaining realizes that a settlement cannot be achieved unless you are at the negotiating table; and given that the open-line radio programs have already started their poison, as they do every time there is a dispute in the public service, undermining the credibility of the entire operation, what is it that the government requires? What conditions has the government set for a return to the negotiating table forthwith?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased the hon. member has raised that question. The negotiating table is there and we are prepared to sit down this afternoon. I wish the hon. member would encourage the postal union to behave the same way. We have been trying to get the postal union to the negotiating table since last Friday. We stipulated no conditional precedents to negotiations.

ITEMS CONTAINED IN JASMIN REPORT

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, can the minister then explain to me what it is that is contained in the Jasmin report which the government does not feel it could implement immediately?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I have answered that question in this House concerning the Jasmin report with respect to the government's position on a variety of issues which have been raised in the report. I have also indicated our willingness to discuss certain areas of that report. I would very much appreciate it if the hon. gentleman would encourage his friends in CUPW to return to the negotiating table so that we can explore fully their respective demands and our own.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON JASMIN REPORT

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, am I then to understand that every matter contained in the Jasmin report would be acceptable to the government under certain conditions? If that is the case can I then assume that all of the matters that were on the bargaining table prior to the breakdown in negotiations are subject to further negotiation, and that the government is prepared to sit down this afternoon in an attempt to find a resolution to this dispute?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I have indicated in the past that the government cannot return to the bargaining table under an ultimatum that it will only return if it accepts everything in the Jasmin report. That has been made clear on numerous occasions. It is not the responsibility of members of this House to negotiate a collective agreement here on the floor of this House. I have also made that point, Madam Speaker. However, I would encourage the hon. member to use his good offices and get CUPW back to the negotiating table this afternoon.

GOVERNMENT PLANS TO RESOLVE DISPUTE

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Reviewing reports in the press today, the postal workers have regrettably not accepted the call for mediation nor the appointment of a mediator. The proposal is unacceptable to them and the two sides remain deadlocked. There appears, at least on the face of things, that there will not be an early end to this dispute. I ask the minister what plans does the government have to bring this matter to a head so that there can be a return to normal postal service in Canada?

• (1430)

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the employees, members of CUPW, are exercising their legal right to strike. I hope this matter will be brought to an end at the negotiation table. That is the natural process. That is the process contemplated by the law. They have the right to strike, and they are exercising it.

POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Another question follows from that answer, Madam Speaker. Is it the policy of this government that it is going to wait for a settlement at the bargaining table, or is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation? If so, how long would one have to wait for that legislation? I ask that question as the minister knows and as I know that Parliament will be adjourning by July 10. I think it is a fair question to put to the President of the Treasury Board now, and I would appreciate an answer with respect to the timing of the government's consideration.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I would like to say on behalf of the government that there is not an intention to introduce back to work legislation at this time.

FINANCE

CONTRIBUTIONS TO CANADIAN CANCER SOCIETY—POSSIBLE MEANS OF OFFSETTING EFFECTS OF POSTAL STRIKE

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister will be well aware, as we all are, of the millions of Canadians who have paid and wish to pay further tribute to the memory of Terry Fox. Many of these, as the minister will know, wish to express their very deep feeling by way of contributions to the Canadian Cancer Society. Tragically and unhappily the Canadian postal service situation has deterred many of these Canadians from expressing their feelings in terms of contributions to the society.

I wonder if the minister would consider asking the Canadian chartered banks and other federally incorporated lending institutions to accept donations on behalf of the society, and to permit them to issue temporary receipts until the postal situation permits the Canadian Cancer Society to issue the regular tax receipts.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has made a very worth-while suggestion. I will be happy to follow it up to see whether his objective can be realized, or maybe it has already been realized.

Mr. Jarvis: I thank the hon. minister, because steps have been taken in that direction; but I think it needs a push from the minister to satisfy the requirements of the society.

USE OF GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING FUNDS TO PROMOTE TERRY FOX CANCER FIGHTING CAMPAIGN

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, who is responsible for government advertising. He will be aware that several millions of dollars were allocated for a government advertising program for the Constitution, which program now, for obvious reasons, has been postponed. Will the minister consider using a very small portion of these allocated funds to inform Canadians that they may make their contributions to honour Terry Fox to Canadian financial institutions? I hope the minister would agree that he would be hard-pressed to find a more worth-while advertising program for the government and, frankly, hard-pressed to find one which is more in the interests of national unity.

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, I would be delighted to bring that request to the attention of the Minister of Justice. As the minister responsible for advertising I do not have any direct control over expenditures by particular departments. That is determined by individual ministers in conjunction with ongoing Treasury Board rules. I just have my own budget in multiculturalism, for instance. However, I will bring that to the attention of the Minister of Justice.

ENERGY

NEGOTIATION OF PRICING AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCE OF ALBERTA

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday we had Canada's birthday, and the only present Canadians received was another increase—

Some hon. Members: Dominion!

Mr. Wilson: —another increase in the price of oil by a dollar a barrel. Negotiations which have been going on for some 16 months now, between the Minister and the minister of energy in Alberta appeared to reach a more negative conclusion on Monday than had been the case with the previous meeting. Therefore I say that the minister's well known negotiating talents have again met failure in these negotiations with Alberta.

Since so much is hanging in the balance through not achieving a resolution of this deadlock, can the minister tell the House when he expects there will be some resolution achieved in the negotiations? To put it simply, has he set himself a deadline by which time he must reach an agreement with the province of Alberta?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am happy that the hon. member has associated himself with the other Canadians who celebrated Canada Day yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the increase of $1 per barrel of oil is concerned, he knows this increase, of course, was announced in the budget last year. It will be effective at the pump in early September. It is the amount of $1 which the opposition has found inadequate and has been asking us to put at a higher level.

The negotiations are taking place. I met with my colleague last week. We have not set each other a deadline, but we are working and striving to reach an agreement soon, but how soon I cannot tell the hon. member.

Miss MacDonald: Sixteen months.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT AGREEMENT WILL BE REACHED

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, what we on this side of the House have been pressing the government for is some resolution in the deadlock which is causing so many things to be stalled in this country, such as the megaprojects. We have seen huge increases in the cost of imported oil in this country. Something must be done to solve this matter. It is the minister's failure to negotiate which has caused this deadlock for 16 months.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson: Last week when a group of the Conservative members were in Alberta discussing the problems that this deadlock has caused, we were told by members of the oil service and oil drilling industry that a full 40 per cent of the drilling rigs in this country will have left by the end of the summer if no progress is shown in the negotiations over and above what has happened to date. Is the minister in any position today to give this industry, or the sponsors of the megaprojects, any assurances that progress will be made to reach an agreement by the end of this summer so that the rigs will not leave the country and so that we will get the megaprojects on track, and will solve the self-sufficiency problem in this country which will be such an important problem as we move into the eighties?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, may I suggest to the opposition that they come clean with their statement when they say they favour a resolution? They should add that they know one of the problems in achieving a resolution of this issue is that the government of Alberta wants a higher price. The opposition should come out, quite clearly, and say that they want higher prices, and not just express the pious hope that they want a resolution.

As far as the issue raised by the hon. member is concerned, Mr. Leitch and I are working at arriving at a resolution of the present difficulties. We have made progress in our first meeting, we have made progress in our second meeting, and in our third meeting, too, which was the meeting last week. There are still very difficult issues to resolve. I cannot give any particular timetable to my hon. friend, but it is interesting to note that the people behind the megaprojects seem to have shown more optimism than he has shown with regard to the resolution of the current dispute.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ACTION NECESSARY TO SETTLE LABOUR DISPUTE

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications. In view of the fact that the people of Canada feel that the CBC belongs to them, in view of the fact that if the CBC is damaged or destroyed by long and unnecessary strike it is the people of Canada who will be the losers, and in view of NABET's reasonable position on jurisdiction, will the minister not meet again with the CBC and urge CBC management to settle this dispute without further delay?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I had the opportunity of meeting with CBC management following the meeting with NABET last Friday. Since that time my colleague, the Minister of Labour, has appointed two mediators to meet with the parties. Having met with both parties, I believe that the issues at stake are, indeed, issues which must be settled at the negotiating table.

• (1440)

TELEVISION COVERAGE OF SUMMIT CONFERENCE

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. May I urge that the broadcasting to the world of the Ottawa Summit conference be included in these discussions? In view of the fact that CTV has bowed out, so that the job has been tossed back to the CBC, will that be used as a particular lever for getting a settlement before that conference convenes?

Mr. Nielsen: And what about the NDP convention?

Mr. Knowles: We refuse to cross NABET's picketline.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, it is in the interests of the country as a whole to see the broadcasting of the Summit take place. The CBC has endeavoured to obtain assurances from NABET that the televising could take place. I know that members of NABET are most interested in participating in this very important event. In hope that negotiations can proceed and that the mediators will be successful in bringing the parties together and ironing out a settlement which is acceptable to both sides.

IMMIGRATION

ACTION TO ASSIST EASTERN EUROPEAN REFUGEES

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Madam Speaker, today and for the past few days we have been honoured in Canada with the presence of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, Mr. Hartling, a former Prime Minister of Denmark.

I should like to put my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Last night again both national networks highlighted the problems being faced by people leaving Poland because they are concerned about what is happening there, or what might very well happen there. Is the minister in a position to tell us what action might be taken by his department to help people in this particular area to be classed as designated people, given the fact that our quota in that area has almost run out?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, when he raised a similar question last week the Deputy Prime Minister indicated that additional resources would be established in Austria to deal with the substantially increased flow of refugees coming out of eastern European countries. At the present moment we are also looking at the possibility of raising the level of intake to this country by drawing upon our contingency reserves established under the immigration blueprint of last fall. I hope to meet with Mr. Hartling this afternoon to determine a better assessment from him of the exact nature of conditions. After making that assessment we will make an announcement to the House about whether we will increase the level or not.

REPRESENTATIONS TO EXCLUDE RIGHT TO STRIKE PROVISION

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General who will recall that at the time of the committee's consideration of the Provisions of the Canada Post Corporation Act he expressed the great expectation that, with the passage of the act, there would be a greater chance for labour peace in the postal service in Canada. Royal assent was given to the act on April 23 and now, a little over two months later, we have our first strike.

Will the Postmaster General now recognize that some of the representations made to him at committee with respect to the inclusion in that act of provisions that would preclude the right to strike in the postal service have considerable merit and should be considered?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I should like to correct the words of the hon. member. The act has not yet been proclaimed. It is true that the act was passed by Parliament but it is not yet proclaimed and therefore the corporation has not yet been established. It is too early to see how the union will behave under a Crown corporation because it is not yet under a Crown corporation. It is hoped that will come soon and that labour relations will then be better.

As to the question of whether the union should have the right to strike, I would remind the hon. member, as I did at the time, that there are more illegal strikes in Canada than legal strikes. Just to take away the right to strike of employees does not necessarily avoid strikes. Those who believe very strongly in certain points will not hesitate to use the means at their disposal to register their point, and that could probably be by illegal strikes.

POSSIBLE DURATION OF STRIKE

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, I am aware that the act has not been proclaimed. I indicated that it had received Royal Assent on April 23. In any event, what the Postmaster General has indicated is that he has no general faith in a provision in the act itself precluding the right to strike. His colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, has indicated that the government has no intention now of introducing special legislation which would oblige members of the postal service to return to work. How long is the country to wait for the necessary service provided by the Post Office, before the government takes it upon itself to discharge its responsibility to Canada?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): As long as the two parties take to reach a settlement, Madam Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EXCHANGE OF MILITARY INFORMATION WITH FRENCH GOVERNMENT

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. France now has four cabinet ministers from the communist party. Presumably the French minister of defence will feel obliged to confide in his cabinet colleagues. Could the minister tell us what policy the Canadian government is following concerning exchanges of military information with the French government?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I understand that the matter of secret information or information regarding NATO will be discussed at the next meeting of NATO ministers, in order to determine how to deal with that problem. Nevertheless, the recent statements made by the French minister of defence concerning NATO were reassuring, in my view. Indeed he publicly stated he was one hundred per cent behind NATO and would co-operate in the best possible way.

[English]

PARTICIPATION OF FRENCH PARLIAMENTARIANS IN TOUR OF DEFENCE INSTALLATIONS

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I am rather curious. In all these statements the minister has not said whether France is considering coming back to a full role in NATO which it left some 16 years ago. There is a North Atlantic Assembly Parliamentarians Association group coming to Canada to tour our defence installations in August. Could the minister tell the House if the Government of Canada is ready to welcome communist members of the French National Assembly on this tour through our defence installations in August?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, Canada being an eminently free society open to all ideas, I believe that the French delegates will be welcome as all other democratically elected ministers or members of parliament in that country. It is not up to us to tell the French whom they should be sending to represent NATO. I think their judgment should be trusted.

AVIATION SAFETY

CURTAILMENT OF AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL SERVICES AT CALGARY INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport which arises out of the serious cutbacks in air traffic control services at the Calgary International Airport, scheduled to go into effect on July 4. After that time air traffic control services between the hours of midnight and 6 a.m. will not be in effect. This will seriously curtail the movement of traffic, will impair safety, and could very well violate the ICAO standards.

In view of the fact that there appears to be a manpower shortage, would the minister be prepared to defer such curtailment of services until he has had a chance to discuss fully all the implications with the Calgary Transportation Authority and perhaps seek a solution in a consultative way?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend's information is quite exact, so I will not repeat it. The inconvenience may not be as great as he seems to imply. I understand that there are only two or three movements per hour during the night.

On the subject of consultation, particularly with the Calgary Transportation Authority, I am informed that extensive consultations have taken place in the past. There has already been a delay in the implementation of these restrictions. My department feels that if we go on as we have been going, then we might cause a danger which would be greater than the one that could be caused by the restrictive measures taken now. In other words the controllers might have to work extra hours under stress and then danger might be greater. The general problem of training controllers is one with which my hon. friend is familiar. I can only say that progress is being made.

SHORTAGE OF AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, on checking, the minister might realize that close to 20 traffic movements take place on a daily basis during that period, and that is only commercial flights. The minister has failed to address the real critical problem of the chronic shortage of air traffic controllers. There is a severe and critical shortage in Toronto, there is a severe and critical shortage in Vancouver, and as a matter of fact controllers are working far beyond what is considered normal overtime. There is now this critical shortage in Calgary. Surely it is the obligation and responsibility of the government to see to it that adequate human and financial resources are provided to ensure that the air traffic control system remains intact. What specific action is the minister taking now, as a result of this serious problem which is cropping up all over, to bring on more air traffic controllers so that we can ensure that air traffic control systems will be safe and effective?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I could not agree more with the description given. I am sure when my hon. friend was minister of transport that he worked quite hard on the matter. In any event, the present training system produces 50 to 60 controllers per year. A number of changes have been made which would be too long to describe in detail. It is expected that, beginning in September, the training system will produce between 120 and 150 a year, which will be a substantial improvement over the present situation.

COAST GUARD

FACILITIES SERVING NORTH SHORE OF LAKE ERIE

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. The minister should be aware that the Canadian Coast Guard apparently is planning to convert the manned Port Burwell radio station on the north shore of Lake Erie to an unmanned repeater station connected to Sarnia. I am sure he is also aware of the tremendous increase of surface travel in that area of the lake, with commercial fishermen, sport fishermen, pleasure craft, lake drilling rigs and support vessels, as well as shipping in and out of the new Stelco complex and Ontario Hydro at Nanticoke. Will the minister ensure the safety of the sea on the north shore of Lake Erie and instruct his department to scrub any such plans of consolidation of Coast Guard radio station services in the Port Burwell area?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): As you know, Madam Speaker, I do not lie easily. No, indeed, I am not aware. I will get on to it immediately. I assure my hon. friend that his objective will be met.

REQUEST FOR HOLDING OF PUBLIC HEARING

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): While I have the minister in an agreeable mood I want to point out to him that the loss of safety features to boaters in the area will definitely be greater than any economic savings. Although I am not against economic cuts I would sooner see them in other places than where lives are at stake. Will the minister consider holding a hearing in the Port Burwell-Port Dover area with the concerned fishermen and boaters before any further action is taken on the site?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I was afraid the hon. member was also going to be extremely truthful and suggest that he does not mind cuts as long as they take place in constituencies other than his own, which would have been the moment of truth in the House this afternoon. I will pursue the matter as the hon. member has requested.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CONSTRUCTION OF THERMO GENERATING STATION AT HAT CREEK, B.C.—QUERY RESPECTING ACID RAIN POLLUTION

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the plans to build a huge thermogenerating station in Hat Creek, British Columbia, which will result in a tremendous increase in acid precipitation, will the minister promise this House that he will make sure that B.C. Hydro guarantees to the federal government that there will be no acid rain precipitation as a result of that very huge megawatt thermogenerating project?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I cannot give the member such a guarantee because basically the decision is in the hands of the British Columbia government. The federal government recently issued guidelines in relation to emissions from such plants as Hat Creek. It is my very earnest hope that the British Columbia government will make sure that the proposal does fall within those acceptable guidelines.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

DECISION WITH RESPECT TO LAYING OF CHARGES IN CONNECTION WITH MARKETING OF URANIUM

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. It has to do with the uranium cartel and the report that is in the minister's possession from the combines investigation branch, and the independent legal opinion which the government sought because it was afraid that since it was the government itself that was being investigated there might be a conflict of interest in relying simply upon the government. The Minister of Justice has had these reports for some time. Can he tell us when he expects a decision will be taken as to whether charges will be laid? More particularly, will he tell us whether that decision will be announced before the House recesses, or does the government intend to wait until Parliament is gone before it announces its decision on charges that might arise in relation to the uranium cartel?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I have not finished the work on that. I have some outside lawyers looking into the file. I will wait for their report and then make my decision. If I receive the report quickly and the House is in session, I will be delighted to make the announcement. However, I do not have all the facts in my possession at this time and therefore cannot state when I will be able to make a decision.

SOURCE OF LEGAL ADVICE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, there has already been one group of outside lawyers brought into this matter. The minister has a report from one group of outside lawyers. He has a report from the director of combines which he has so far refused to make public. Is the minister telling us that the government is now consulting a second group of outside lawyers on the question as to whether charges will be laid, perhaps against ministers of the government or a number of people associated with the government? Is this a new group of lawyers? If so, why is the government following this extraordinary procedure in the uranium cartel case, or is there some other reason for delay?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, we are indeed consulting the same lawyers retained by Mr. Bertrand and have not yet received their report, which we will have to consider if legal proceedings are to be taken.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

GRANT TO CANADIAN OLYMPIC ASSOCIATION

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour in charge of fitness and amateur sport. Two or three weeks ago the minister approved $1.2 million for the Canadian Olympic Association, the COA. Will the minister please advise the House exactly what the Canadian Olympic Association is going to do with that money?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I would be happy to take notice of the question and get a detailed indication from the Canadian Olympic Association of any plans that they have. The $1.2 million was calculated to compensate the COA for funds they lost as a consequence of the boycott of the 1980 Olympics in Moscow. As we calculate, it puts them in the position they would have been in had they been allowed or had they chosen to participate in the Moscow Olympics.

ASSOCIATION'S PROGRAMS AND LOCATION OF OFFICE

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): The COA was to have two or three different programs. One was the Young Olympians and the other was the Junior Olympics. They have not done this in the last two or three years. Will the minister see that they carry out their jurisdiction over these two programs which are very important as far as preparing for the next Olympic Games? If they really want to take an active part in Canada, if they would move their office from Montreal to Ottawa they might be able to know what is going on in the world of sports.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is certainly open to make representations to the COA as to where he feels they should have their office. I do not think it is appropriate for government to interfere with the autonomy of amateur sport by attempting to dictate to them.

Mr. Paproski: You are doing that when you give them $1.2 million.

Mr. Regan: I recognize that the hon. member has never been as enthusiastic a supporter of the COA as myself. I will be happy to make inquiries along the line he has indicated to see what information I can obtain for him with reference to their plans for the programs that he mentioned.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

RESPONSIBILITY FOR TRANS-BOUNDARY AIR POLLUTION

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I have a short supplementary for the Minister of the Environment. In his answer to me he brought to light the most important aspect of controlling acid rain in Canada. The federal government presently does not have jurisdiction over transboundary air pollution. When can we expect legislation in this House which will give jurisdictional control over transboundary air pollution to the federal government? At the present time under provincial control it is totally inadequate.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I welcome the hon. member's representation. I hope he is speaking as the spokesman of his party in expressing that view. I will take very seriously the recommendations he has made.

Madam Speaker: Accordingly, I have addressed my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I apologize, Madam Speaker. The announcement you just made caused me to stand up rather slowly. I will not make any further comment.

● (1500)

I would like to direct a question to the government House leader. Could he inform the House of the business for the balance of today and tomorrow and into next week. I think we would all be interested in knowing what the intention is.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, today we will be dealing with Bills C-70, C-71 and C-74. Tomorrow we will go on with C-73 and C-72. Those are the bills relating to the estimates and your ruling, Madam Speaker. We have an agreement, as you well know, to have one speaker from each party for all stages with speeches to be limited to 30 minutes. Those five bills should require all the time today and tomorrow.

In so far as Monday is concerned, we will resume debate at the second reading stage of the following bills: C-58, S-6 and C-12.

[Translation]

This evening, there will be a memorial service on Parliament Hill at 7.30 for Terry Fox. Under these circumstances, Madam Speaker, I have consulted my colleagues of both opposition parties and we have agreed that there will not be any private members' hour today and that the House will adjourn at seven o'clock this evening. Therefore, I have a motion which will receive unanimous consent and that I shall read in a few moments. But first, regarding the business of the House for next week, apart from the three bills I have just mentioned, namely Bills C-58, S-6 and C-12, which will be considered on Monday, I have submitted a list of bills to my colleagues and we shall be in a position Monday to choose from this list a series of bills with which we can proceed in the next few days and which can probably go through all stages before we adjourn next week or the following week, depending on the circumstances.

[English]

Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre:

That the private members' hour this afternoon be suspended; that the House continue to sit today until 7 p.m. on Government Orders, and that it adjourn at 7 p.m. today until 11 tomorrow morning.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I want to thank the hon. gentleman for consulting with respect to this matter. I am very proud to second the motion and my party will be very proud to support it.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, we too feel that this is an appropriate order and we are very happy to agree to it.

I have a question I should like to put, but perhaps you would like to put that motion first.

Madam Speaker: Does the House then agree to the motion presented by the President of the Privy Council?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Agreed to and so ordered.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, last Thursday for the umpteenth time I asked the minister about a bill to correct an oversight in last summer's Bill C-40 having to do with widows of disabled veterans. His answer to me last Thursday was in these very precise words:

—I want to assure him the cabinet is studying the question very seriously and at the end of next week at the latest, I hope to be in a position to give notice of our intention to introduce such a bill in the House before the summer recess.

The deadline he set for himself is either today or tomorrow. Is he now in a position to tell us when a bill to amend Bill C-40 will be introduced?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, as usual I told the truth to the hon. member. The weekend begins tomorrow at five in so far as the House of Commons is concerned, and I think the hon. member will have good news before five o'clock tomorrow; if not, it might be some time next week.

VACANCY

ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF JOLIETTE—INQUIRY WHEN BYELECTION WILL BE HELD

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. We have just had the announcement of a byelection to fill a seat which has become vacant by the elevation of its incumbent to the Senate.

There was no announcement of a byelection date for the seat of Joliette. Certainly we, on this side of the House, are very anxious to allow the electors of Joliette to be represented in this House as quickly as possible. I wonder if the government House leader could indicate to us why a priority was given to moving forward with the Spadina byelection while the electors of Joliette are left without the opportunity of being represented? Will there be an announcement very soon on a byelection date for the constituency of Joliette?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, no priority has been given to any constituency. All that has been announced by the Speaker of the House is that the seat is now vacant. No election date for the constituency of Spadina has been set as far as I know. I therefore believe that the objection raised by the Leader of the Opposition is unfounded. No date has been set for an election in Spadina, and I wonder how he can say that we would rather have an election in Spadina than in Joliette. No decision has been made and there has been no announcement as to the date of the election in Joliette or Spadina. As for the suggestions made by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, we shall take note of them and give them all the consideration they deserve.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I missed part of the statements made by the President of the Privy Council, but I would like to know whether a date can be announced for the byelections in the constituencies of Joliette and Spadina as soon as possible. In the case of Joliette, the people have been without a representative for quite some time. I believe it is essential that elections be called as soon as possible, and I hope that this will be done before the summer recess.

[English]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, if my good friend Roch La Salle had resigned earlier maybe we would have known the date earlier. In any case, as I just told my hon. colleague, we will take his suggestion into very serious consideration. In so far as the dates of the byelections are concerned, the date for Spadina was not announced and therefore Spadina is not privileged as compared with Joliette.

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

MOTION RESPECTING TRAVEL EXPENSES FOR SUB-COMMITTEE ON IMPORT POLICY

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Madam Speaker, there have been consultations with all parties in the House and I believe you will find that there is unanimous consent for me to move the following motion without the usual notice:

That the sub-committee on import policy of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs and members of the sub-committee, accompanied by the necessary staff, be empowered to adjourn from place to place or to travel inside and outside Canada during the period when the House stands adjourned, provided that the estimated expenses for such travel and the locations to be visited are defined in advance.

If the House should adopt this motion I would request that the motion standing in my name for concurrence in the tenth report of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs be withdrawn.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to waive the usual notice?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There have been consultations and we are in agreement.

Mr. Knowles: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House then agrees to the two motions; one to waive notice, the second to allow the committee to travel, and the request to withdraw the motion for concurrence?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CONCURRENCE IN TENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

On the order: Motions:

June 19, 1981—Mr. Cullen (Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs).

That the Tenth Report of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, presented to the House on Friday, June 19, 1981, be concurred in.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Madam Speaker, I would ask that this notice of motion be withdrawn.

Madam Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Notice of motion withdrawn.

PETITIONS

MOTION RESPECTING REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE OF CERTAIN PETITIONS AND REPORTS OF CLERK OF PETITIONS

Hon. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Madam Speaker, there have been consultations on all sides of the House and I should like to move the following motion, with the unanimous consent of the House, seconded by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster):

● (1510)

That, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 99, the petitions to revive Ontario News Company Limited, G. A. Barber and Sons Limited and Eastern Diversified Company Ltd., filed after the time limit specified under Standing Order 90, be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders, together with the fifty-fourth, fifty-fifth and fifty-sixth reports of the Clerk of Petitions thereon, presented to the House on Friday, June 26, 1981, for any recommendations the committee deems advisable.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FIRA—ADAMS INVESTMENT COMPANY

Question No. 2,357—Mr. Deans:

1. Did the Foreign Investment Review Agency conduct a yearly review to determine the fulfilment of all short-term and long-term commitments made by Adams Investment Company at the time of approval by FIRA?

2. For each year since the approval, did the Company live up to all public commitments and, if not, what (a) commitments were not lived up to (b) action was taken by FIRA to insist that the original commitments be fulfilled by the company?

3. Were new commitments agreed to by FIRA and, if so, what were they and were they kept?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Foreign Investment Review Agency is concerned: 1. The investment proposal was allowed on April 29, 1980; the annual review of undertakings commences on or about April 29, 1981, and is not yet completed.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

FIRA—BBC BROWN BOVERI CANADA INC.

Question No. 2,358—Mr. Deans:

1. Did the Foreign Investment Review Agency conduct a yearly review to determine the fulfilment of all short-term and long-term commitments made by BBC Brown Boveri Canada Inc. at the time of approval by FIRA?

2. For each year since the approval, did the company live up to all public commitments and, if not, what (a) commitments were not lived up to (b) action was taken by FIRA to insist that the original commitments be fulfilled by the company?

3. Were new commitments agreed to by FIRA and, if so, what were they and were they kept?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Foreign Investment Review Agency is concerned: 1. The investment proposal was allowed on May 9, 1980; the annual review of undertakings commences on or about May 8, 1981, and is not yet completed.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

REMUNERATION—PUBLIC SECTOR/PRIVATE SECTOR

Question No. 2,401—Mr. Herbert:

1. Is the government aware of a working paper prepared by the Centre for Industrial Relations of the University of Toronto which states that public sector remuneration is six to eight per cent higher than in the private sector?

2. (a) Have the wages of public sector employees, in recent years, exceeded those of their private sector counterparts by five to fifteen per cent (b) has the wage advantage been larger for females than for males (c) do high-level occupations in the public sector not pay the competitive wage and, if there is an acknowledged differential, does the President of the Treasury Board intend to bring Public Service salaries into line with the private sector?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): 1. The hon. member probably refers to the work of Mr. Morley Gunderson who published a number of papers and articles in professional journals on the subject of public sector compensation.

2. Generally, Mr. Gunderson's studies do not differentiate between employees at the federal, provincial and municipal levels and some of the major conclusions are based on 1971 census data. However, in the discussion of the results, Mr. Gunderson mentions that "the largest wage advantage is at the provincial and local levels, with little or no advantage at the federal level" (Industrial Relations Vol. 19, Number 3, Fall 1980, p. 268) or "Federal wage increases appear to have been the most 'orderly' and 'in line' with private sector wages." He also concludes that the fact the public sector advantage for females is greater than that for males "presumably reflects the lower degree of sex discrimination in the public sector." In addition, he mentions that it "may be a result of a more egalitarian wage policy that is also responsible for the greater wage advantage in low-wage occupations in the public sector" (Industrial Relations, Vol. 19, Number 3, Fall 1980, p. 269).

In concluding that the public sector results do not apply to the federal government, Mr. Gunderson's analysis is consistent with the findings of a recent study by the Conference Board in Canada which, based on more up to date data, indicated that "There is no substantive evidence that suggests rates of pay in the Federal government consistently exceed the rates of pay for comparable jobs in the private sector as of mid-1978" (M. J. Daniel and W. E. A. Robinson, "Compensation in Canada: A Study of the Public and Private Sectors", the Conference Board in Canada, Ottawa, April 1980).

The policy followed by the government as employer in compensating federal employees is comparability with the private sector up to and including the first level of the executive officer category. Above this level, salaries for increased responsibilities are not based on market comparability. They adhere to a system of differentials in recognition of job accountability.

Order Paper Questions

HIGHWAY EXPENDITURES IN QUEBEC

Question No. 2,437—Mr. Corbett:

What amount did the government spend in the province of Quebec on the development of highways between 1970 and 1980?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as Public Works Canada is concerned: $13,608,103.27 was spent on the development of the Trans-Canada Highway in the province of Quebec in 1970/71. This amount does not include costs of maintenance and construction of interprovincial bridges.

In so far as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is concerned:

URBAN TRANSPORTATION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 2,438—Mr. Mazankowski:

Since the inception of the Urban Transportation Assistance Program (UTAP) (a) what amount of money (b) what per cent of the total approved cost was applied to (i) projects under the Railway Grade Crossing Fund (ii) transportation projects to assist the handicapped and disabled (iii) all other urban transportation projects?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport):

	(i) *RRCA Projects	(ii) Handicapped Transport Projects	(iii) Other Urban Projects	Total
(a) Funds approved to date	$97,556,000	$201,000	$47,181,000	$144,938,000
(b) Percentage of total funds approved to date	67.31	0.14	32.55	100

* Contributions are calculated in accordance with the provisions of the "Railway Relocation and Crossing Act" (RRCA) and are paid for out of the Urban Transportation Assistance Program (UTAP) rather than from the Railway Grade Crossing Fund, which is administered by the Canadian Transport Commission and is now only used to pay for protective devices at level crossings.

DALE CORPORATION CONVENTION CENTRE

Question No. 2,478—Mr. Herbert:

Did the government contribute $3.8 million to the Dale Corporation Convention Centre in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island and, if so (a) what will be the total cost of the project (b) who is to finance the balance of the cost, if any (c) what were the conditions under which the funds were provided?

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: yes, under the Federal Assistance to the Construction of Convention Centre Program.

1. (a) The total cost of the project is estimated at $16 million.

(b) The federal government will contribute $3.8 million, the provincial government $3.8 million and the remainder will be provided by the Dale Corporation.

(c) Terms and Conditions:

(1) Federal assistance to be limited to the capital costs, including land, of trade and convention centres, and in no case will the federal assistance be used to cover the operating costs of the centres;

(2) the federal contribution under this program for any one centre not to exceed 25 per cent of the total estimated capital cost, including land, or the contribution of the provincial government concerned, whichever is less;

(3) in any one year, total federal assistance under this program limited to a maximum of $15 million, including land;

(4) this federal government initiative not to cover any cost overruns; and

(5) federal support limited to those centres which have been shown to be economically viable. Selection of qualifying trade and convention centres will reflect the priorities of regional requirements and opportunities.

SOVIET EMBASSY—MOTOR VEHICLES

Question No. 2,483—Mr. Cossitt:

Did the government of Ontario provide the Department of External Affairs with a complete list of all motor vehicles licenced in 1979 to the Embassy of the U.S.S.R. or to employees thereof and, if so, in each case (a) who was the owner (b) what was the licence plate, colour, make of the vehicle and the vehicle year?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes. However, the information requested by the hon. member cannot be provided since its public disclosure could jeopardize the personal security of members of the Soviet Embassy who continue to use the same vehicles which were registered to the Soviet Embassy in 1979. In the view of the department such disclosure would be inconsistent with Canada's obligations under the Vienna Convention to take all appropriate steps to prevent any disturbance to the peace of a diplomatic mission or the impairment of its dignity.

Question No. 2,484—Mr. Cossitt:

Did the government of Ontario provide the Department of External Affairs with a complete list of all motor vehicles licenced in 1980 to the Embassy of the U.S.S.R. or to employees thereof and, if so, in each case (a) who was the owner (b) what was the licence plate, colour, make of the vehicle and the vehicle year?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes. See question No. 2,483 answered today.

Question No. 2,485—Mr. Cossitt:

Did the government of Ontario provide the Department of External Affairs with a complete list of all motor vehicles licenced in 1981 to the Embassy of the U.S.S.R. or to employees thereof and, if so, in each case (a) who is the owner (b) what is the licence plate, colour, make of the vehicle and the vehicle year?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes. See question No. 2,483 answered today.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER DREDGING COSTS

Question No. 2,493—Mr. Crosby:

1. What was the cost to the government of dredging the St. Lawrence River and other waterways which can be attributed to maintaining shipping service to the Golden Eagle Refinery at St. Romuald, Quebec, in each year since the refinery was constructed?

2. Does the government intend to recover any of the costs of dredging through user charges and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The cost of dredging the St. Lawrence River attributable to maintaining shipping service to the Golden Eagle Refinery at St. Romuald, Quebec, cannot be segregated from the total cost of dredging from which other shipping, such as grain traffic, also benefits. This total dredging cost in the North Traverse Reach of the St. Lawrence River in each year since the refinery was constructed was:

1971-74 (during construction of the refinery)	$19.2 million
1975-76	Nil
1977	1.1 million
1978	1.6 million
1979	1.4 million
1980	1.5 million

2. The administrative and economic feasibility of recovering the costs of channel dredging in Canada is under active consideration by Transport Canada.

DOT—CONTRACT TO ALBERY, PULLERITS, DICKSON AND ASSOCIATES

Question No. 2,595—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Department of Transport commission Albery, Pullerits, Dickson and Associates, Don Mills, to prepare a $137,000 feasibility study on converting natural gas into methanol or gasoline in the Arctic and transporting the fuel to eastern Canada and, if so, what were the findings or recommendations of the study?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The Department of Supply and Services awarded a contract on behalf of Transport Canada for $137,000 to Albery, Pullerits, Dickson and Associates to study the feasibility of converting natural gas into methanol or gasoline in the Arctic and transporting the fuel to eastern Canada. As the contract requires the contractor to deliver the final report on November 16, 1981, its findings or recommendations cannot be provided at this time.

DRUG AND ALCOHOL ABUSE

Question No. 2,276—Mr. Greenaway:

1. (a) From 1979 to date, by year and by province, what amount was spent by the government and/or its agencies on programs to educate Canadians on the dangers of (i) drug (ii) alcohol abuse (b) for each year, what was the total expenditure per capita?

2. (a) For the same period, by year and by province, what amount was spent by the government and/or its agencies on medical and other research into the causes and effects of (i) drug (ii) alcohol abuse (b) for each year, what was the total expenditure per capita?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to ask about two questions, question No. 30 and question No. 136. Question No. 30 has now been on the order paper for five years and 22 days. Over those five years, I have raised this matter at least six or seven times or more, and every time I have raised it either the present parliamentary secretary or his predecessors has said he would look into the matter and the question would be answered soon. That has gone on now for five years and 22 days, which I think is a pretty ridiculous situation.

The question merely asks for the names of the members of the Canadian Transport Commission who have Air Canada passes or any of its employees who have Air Canada passes, and if any of the wives of members of the Canadian Transport Commission have Air Canada passes. This is a very simple matter, and yet for five years and 22 days the government has failed to answer. This can only lead to the obvious conclusion that there are people who have passes and that they do not want to let the public know about it.

I think that is shameful. Something should be done by this government to get off its behind. Perhaps hon. members opposite should borrow a bunch of hearing aids so that they can hear what is being raised by the opposition in this House by way of points of order and they can do something about them.

Question No. 136 is the other question. It has been on the order paper for about two years. It concerns the fact that the Liberal Party of Canada chartered a DC-8 from Air Canada in the 1979 election campaign and never paid the bill. By the time of the election a year later the bill had still not been paid, yet Air Canada gave the Liberal party another aircraft. I would like to know what is going on.

I am told that eventually the bill was paid. How much was paid? The Liberal party argued it was being overcharged, whereas the Conservative party paid its bills as they were rendered without disputing them. It is obvious there is a charge. If there is an indebtedness, it should be paid. It is taxpayers' money. Hon. members opposite have never answered that, and I do not understand why they want to hide this matter. An official of Air Canada told my office six months ago that the answer to this question was prepared and in the hands of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin).

Why are the answers to question No. 30 and question No. 136 being held back to the extent of five years and 22 days and two years?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville has asked this question a number of times, and I have pointed out on many occasions that his questions are frequently answered in the House. Three of the 12 answered today are questions by the hon. member.

Mr. Cossitt: Get to the point.

Mr. Collenette: The hon. member referred to two specific questions. He talked about sources he has within Air Canada or some other government agency. I can assure Your Honour that it is not my duty or job to hold any questions back. As I have said before, the government has never refused to answer any question. It may very well be that the question to which the hon. member is referring is much more complex to answer than the hon. member thinks. I ask him to be patient.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I rise on a further point of order. Would the parliamentary secretary undertake to contact personally the Minister of Transport who is, I presume, responsible for the production in the House of the answers to both these questions, and to ask him why something has been in his office for six months and not forwarded on to the Privy Council Office? Will the parliamentary secretary ask the minister why for five years and 22 days information requested about the Canadian Transport Commission should be refused?

I think it is the duty of the parliamentary secretary, if things are stalled like this, not to tell the House it is not his problem, other than to produce answers when furnished to him. I think it is his duty to go after those who do not furnish answers and to ask them what is going on. The parliamentary secretary should indicate that he is being asked about certain questions in the House and should say, "Give me the answer." Giving statistics about the fact that the government answered three of my questions today or that it will answer four tomorrow, or other questions coming up, is no answer at all. Facts, figures and percentages are what we have been getting from the parliamentary secretary and the Privy Council Office for months and months. Could we have some production and not words?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, it is very thoughtful of the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville to remind me of my responsibilities. I should inform him that I do regularly talk to ministers and departments to obtain answers to questions, especially when they are raised—as the hon. member has done—in the House not just once but on a number of occasions. Without accepting the assertion by the hon. member that the answer he seeks is in the hands of the Minister of Transport, I shall certainly talk to the minister personally.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ANIMAL DISEASE AND PROTECTION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING COMPENSATION PAYMENTS

The House resumed, from Tuesday, June 30, 1981, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove (for the Minister of Agriculture) that Bill C-70, to amend the Animal Disease and Protection Act, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a few minutes. I know the minister will be following me. There was an agreement last Tuesday that I speak before him.

I made some remarks dealing with the future price of cattle, and as I read the speech this morning, I found that the arithmetic does not work out very well. I think the minister will understand that I was referring to the fact that with the number of young farmers getting out of producing beef because of the price of grain, we will be faced with a very high price for beef in the next year or two. If I used the figure of $1.25 or $1.50, I should have said it will be over $2 a pound.

I hope that when the minister makes his speech he will have read my speech, and that he will deal with that subject.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the legislation we are dealing with today is a small but quite important amendment to the Animal Disease and Protection Act.

To state it simply, this amendment means that owners of livestock will be compensated when animals, which would have been ordered destroyed under the act, die before that order can be carried out. It also provides compensation for the owner of an animal injured while being tested under the act and therefore has to be destroyed. These changes are long overdue.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) raised some interesting arguments about compensation for livestock, but I should first point out that the bill we are dealing with does not deal with rates of compensation. It merely closes two loopholes so that farmers, operating under the provisions of the act and complying with its intent, do not lose out when animals die before the process is completed. I am sure the hon. member will agree with the justice in that amendment.

There is a very good reason also for providing a different type of compensation for brucellosis and tuberculosis than for the other diseases named in the act. Brucellosis and tuberculosis are endemic diseases in Canada, and the livestock industry has a certain responsibility to see that its herds are not infected. They are both under eradication programs which, I should point out, have the full support of the livestock producers of this country.

● (1520)

Back in the early 1970s we amended the bill so that farmers would not be locked into statutory compensation rates that require legislation to change. They are now subject to regulation. Those regulations are under constant review by my department and are amended as livestock values change. When animal prices rise to the levels the hon. member suggests, the levels of compensation can be amended. Full market value is paid when the animal is destroyed by an exotic disease because that can in no way be controlled by the producer. By setting a maximum level for animals destroyed under the eradication programs, we place some responsibility on the producer to manage his or her herd in such a way as to keep it free from disease. Animals sold at auctions must show proof of freedom from diseases, so a producer need not introduce diseased animals into the herd.

The program has been successful. Less than 90 herds are now quarantined for brucellosis. That is down from 1,500 herds in 1977. Tuberculosis probably exists in about 10 herds and we expect it will be totally eradicated in the next two or three years.

When producers have high priced animals, Mr. Speaker, we feel they have a responsibility to insure them and such insurance is available. We do not think the taxpayer should have to bear that burden. There is insurance and they should take it, as practically all good breeders do. A good farmer knows that disease is costly. If he allows disease to exist in his herd, he is losing far more money than he will lose by having the diseased animals destroyed and using the compensation to replace them.

We have worked hard to keep our programs up with the times. The hon. member talks about situations as they were in the past. They are very different now, including the pay for veterinarians. Vets in the government service recently negotiated a new two-year contract and I think you will find they have a level of income that relates very well to the income of vets in private practice. That is long overdue and the new contract, in most instances, brings them up to a comparable level. I totally agree with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain on this. For the education they have, the number of years it takes to be properly trained, many are underpaid because they happen to be a veterinarian working for the Department of Agriculture, whereas someone in another department with less education is paid more because they are working for a department that is considered probably more sophisticated than agriculture. We hope to bring them all in line, whether they be veterinarians, technicians or whatever. There has been a philosophy in the past that says that if you work with food you should take a lesser income. For too long it has been thought that people who work with food are peasants or associates of peasants.

Canada enjoys a very high standard of animal health and this pays dividends not just to the livestock producer but to all Canadians through strong export sales of Canadians animals. Exports of live animals and poultry brought in more than $230 million last year. That is only possible because the Canadian livestock industry has developed a high level of animal hygiene. Our animals are sought out by foreign buyers because they know they are getting healthy, disease-free stock. We claim to have the most disease-free stock in the world and we want to improve on that. It did not come about just by chance, Mr. Speaker. It came about through close co-operation among the federal and provincial agriculture departments, the veterinarians, the livestock producers and the animal and poultry breeding associations all across the country.

In the eradication of disease, it often becomes necessary to destroy livestock. The Animal Disease and Protection Act gives us the authority to do that. But if you are to destroy a farmer's livestock, you have to compensate him for the loss. The levels of compensation paid for animals ordered destroyed in disease-control programs has been increased from time to time to reflect rising livestock prices, the latest being last December when maximums for purebred dairy and beef cattle were raised to $1,800 and $1,500 respectively. Last year my department paid out a little more than $5 million in compensation to livestock producers.

When we talk about the importance of livestock producers to the over-all economy, we would do well to remind ourselves just how important it is. Farm cash income from cattle and calves last year was $3.8 billion or about 25 per cent of total farm cash income. Income from hog production was $1.4 billion, or 9 per cent of farm cash receipts. Add in poultry and dairy products and it comes to $8.3 billion or 54 per cent of farm income. In our society we hear so often that grain is the largest source of farm income. Mr. Speaker, it is not. The livestock and poultry industry are, as I said, 54 per cent of total farm income. Then you have the horticultural crops, the fruits and vegetables, which are quite large and ever expanding. So we see a change in livestock production but I do not think we should ever underestimate the value of that industry to our society.

We also know how much it means to the feed industry. Canadian feed manufacturers' figures show they sell approximately $1.8 billion worth of feed to the livestock producers in Canada. They are huge users of feed grains in Canada.

As I said before, the bill before the House today, Mr. Speaker, brings into the act two situations under which owners may lose out on compensation payments even though coverage of these losses falls within the intent of the act. As the act is now written, if an animal is inspected by a veterinarian and found infected, but dies before it can be destroyed, then the owner is not eligible for compensation. Similarly, an owner loses out if his animal is injured while being tested for an infectious or contagious disease and must be destroyed. This may sound strange to some people but some animals not in close contact with humans are under tremendous stress when they are put in pens, etc., and some become frightened and die. Under the old act there was no way properly to compensate the farmers for that. We think that is unfair. It rarely happens but it is a tremendous loss when it does. Surely those owners are entitled to the compensation they would have received if their animals had completed the testing process and been destroyed under the act.

The amendments the House is being asked to approve today, Mr. Speaker, will legalize the payments of compensation to those owners. It is not a big item in terms of the money required. The compensation for animals destroyed under these situations represents less than 2 per cent of the value of compensation currently being paid. Some people say I have been right and I have been wrong: I have been right in making these payments but I was wrong because I did not have the proper legislation to do it. I have said one can never get into difficulty when they are right in making a payment, no matter what it complies with.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that all hon. members will be quick to approve these short, but important changes in an act that has been such a benefit to all Canadians.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I must confess I do not now have any farmers in my constituency, although I have had in years gone by, so it is very difficult to speak on behalf of the people I represent. However, I do want to say a word or two about the bill.

My understanding of it is now quite clear, having listened to the minister. I appreciate the fact that he spoke ahead of me because I did not want to misinterpret him. At one stage, while reading the bill I frankly misinterpreted one of the sections. As I understand it, this bill is more or less a response to a series of situations which have arisen over the last few years as to whether or not compensation could or could not be paid under the act. The act as it existed did not take into account very grey, fringe areas where animals died prior to action being taken by Department of Agriculture officials to determine the health of the animal. I was particularly interested in the speech of the hon. member the night before last. He talked about the problems of price maintenance in a number of different areas.

Recently I had occasion to tour the farming community in my area. A discussion took place concerning a young man who had undertaken some two years ago to establish a hog farming operation. I raise this matter only as an aside; it is related indirectly. The young man went to the bank and borrowed funds in order to get his hog farm under way. He had a fairly substantial and well-run operation. He is a dedicated young farmer whose background is in farming. Now he is in considerable debt. If he were less dedicated, I wonder what care and maintenance his animals would receive. The rate of return on his farming endeavour is not sufficient at this point to cover his outlay. This situation could quite easily lead a less dedicated individual to care in a much more cursory manner for the health of his animals.

Also my colleague in the Conservative party referred to a matter which closely ties in with the health of animals. If farmers are unable to receive a reasonable return for the sale of animals—in this case pigs and hogs—they must become more part time and less full time farmers; they spend more and more of their time working at other things. I am referring to a fairly small operation. Then the level of care and the investment of time are dramatically reduced. If I read the situation correctly, the end result could lead to animal diseases not being detected early. Therefore this could add to the problem of the need to dispose of more diseased animals than would otherwise be necessary. I realize this is somewhat a branch-off in terms of the present discussion, but we must look at this as part of a total package.

If farmers, particularly animal farmers, are to be primarily responsible for early identification of diseased animals, we cannot continue to allow an erosion of the price structure to the point at which farmers cannot devote full time to their farms. This is in support of much of what the minister has said concerning price maintenance. Farmers should be able to receive a return for their time, effort, financial commitment, investment and bank borrowing charges. These items are rolled into one large investment. Farmers should receive an amount which is sufficient to pay back their loans, to recover their operating costs and to maintain a level of income. If not, they are forced to become part time farmers. Then they will not be present on the premises all the time to care for their animals, particularly the ones which are penned as opposed to those which are roaming, grazing, etc. The minister indicated the millions of dollars he has paid out in the last year. If we consider the last number of years, it may well rise in relationship to the decrease in the amount of care farmers are able to give. I see the minister shaking his head, but let me tell him that I visited two or three farms. I had represented the area for the better part of 13 years.

Mr. Whelan: Provincially?

Mr. Deans: Yes, provincially. In my tour I noticed with interest that as farmers are less able to recover sufficiently from their involvement and as they are forced to do other than farm for a living, the level of care of animals definitely decreases. There is no doubt in my mind that this is happening. The minister should take a quick tour of some of the smaller operations. I am not talking about large farms with hired help; I am talking about the smallers ones in which this problem arises primarily. There is a definite decrease in the level of care of animals in that farmers are not present and working full time at their operations.

As we look at the legislation before us, we must take into account the problems which have arisen over the last while. I suggest that between now and five years from now, if we allow the price structure to continue below a fair rate of return, more and more farmers will be put in the position of not being able to maintain their operations at the level to which they are committed. Therefore more and more animals will receive less care than they otherwise would have received. The end result of this situation could well be a requirement on the part of the government through this legislation to expend considerably larger sums of money than are currently being expended in order to deal with the problem of diseased animals.

I am trying to extrapolate what I have seen in a very small area into a much larger concern. I would not rule it out because it is not an exact comparison. If one looked at the effect of abandoned orchards on the orchards which are still operating, one would quickly recognize that the problem of diseased trees had a very serious effect upon neighbouring orchards. The farmers in the Niagara Peninsula—and I suspect those in Essex County—found it virtually impossible to continue their orchard operations given the prices they received for the product they produced. The end result was that they backed away from their fruit farms. They did not walk away one day; they gradually harvested less and less. As they gradually produced less and less, they received fewer and fewer dollars and put less into pesticides and other treatments necessary to maintain the health of the trees. Little by little the erosion took place. I am not a farmer, but I have some experience in that area. I am concerned that if smaller farmers are not able to recover sufficient income from their products, they will similarly be unable to maintain their business operations. They will not be able to put the time, the effort or, for that matter, the concern into farming. Although we will not have to amend this act any more because the payment is no longer statutory, I suspect that over the course of time we will find considerably larger and larger sums of money allocated for the eradication of disease which was brought on simply by an inadequate price structure in the first place.

I support the minister in some of what he has said in the past, but we have to find a way to do one of two things, or perhaps a combination of two things. We have to find a way to make it possible for the smaller family farm wanting to maintain its operation and take its produce to market to do so. First, we have to find a way to guarantee that there will be a reasonable price paid to farmers for the time and the effort they spend on their operation. Second, we have to find a way to reduce the numbers of dollars farmers must hand out to banks and the like, if I may say, for the money they must ultimately borrow to maintain their operations in a way that will be satisfactory both to them and to the marketplace.

I readily admit that the bill deals quite specifically with one change in a series of different sections. I can see that unless we go much further, unless we do something about the economics of farming, not only will we be dealing with diseased livestock eradication problems, but I suspect we will be dealing, at least in some parts of this country, with diseased grain and other problems since farmers will not be able to put the time, the money or the effort into the protection necessary to safeguard their very livelihood. Knowing the minister's interest in this, I thought I might tie the two together so that he can get back to his colleagues and argue for a better system.

If I may return to the young man I spoke about earlier, here was a young fellow who went to the bank on his own. He went through agricultural college and graduated. He then decided that he would go into hog farming in a reasonable way. He got himself a barn, cleaned it up and put in new pens. He borrowed $20,000. That may not seem like a lot of money to the minister, I do not know, but it seems a lot to me. The young man began carefully, single-handedly, nurturing and building his herd. The problem is the young man has no place for his herd now because he cannot get his money back in the marketplace. I must stress that it is his personal dedication only that keeps him on the land and keeps him trying to make his undertaking a viable one.

I think it would be useful if the House of Commons would spend a little more time, as I have said on a number of other issues, in dealing with that problem. The problem does not confront the larger farms. In many instances large farms are able to self-finance because of their size. But it certainly confronts the young, eager farmers who are trying to make a go of it and maintain our food supplies. Maybe we could find a way to accommodate their concerns. In the long run money would be saved under this legislation in the marketplace.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ISSUANCE OF DEMAND NOTES

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C-71, to amend the International Development Association Act, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to the Committee of the Whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present to the House a proposed amendment to the International Development Association Act to authorize a payment of $164,600,000 to the International Development Association. As hon. members know, the acronym IDA is commonly used to refer to that association. The payment of that amount will be made as a partial settlement of Canada's commitment in respect of the sixth replenishment of the resources of the association. Support for the International Development Association is one of the main channels through which Canada promotes the development of Third World countries.

As an agency of the World Bank responsible for granting preferential loans, the association has made a name for itself as being one of the most efficient international development multilateral instruments. Indeed, since its creation in 1960, this organization has put up over $20 billion in American funds to carry out various projects, be they related to technical studies or medical research. Seeing how successful the association has been in marshalling resources from the four corners of the world, and especially in profitably investing those resources in the world's least advanced countries, Canada ranked it high in its over-all development assistance program.

All the other major donor countries followed in Canada's footsteps and it is imperative that Canada and the other countries continue to support the International Development Association if we want to maintain the economic growth of underprivileged nations. Although 121 countries belong to the association, the main beneficiaries of the loans made by the association are the least developed and very poor countries, namely the few countries where the per capita income is below $625 in 1978 American dollars. The International Development Association is in a position to contribute effectively to the growth of those countries for two reasons. First, it does benefit from the wide experience of the World Bank staff. Second, thanks to its considerable resources, it can develop and implement projects of a scope that no other preferential loan organization could match. The resources of the International Development Association come mostly from the member countries of the OECD, which have provided approximately 95 per cent of its total funds for many years. The loans granted by the World Bank to support these funds for the implementation of projects are usually interest free. Repayment is over 50 years and can start only 10 years after the loan is granted.

Since the Bank exhausts the resources of the IDA by granting such loans, it must regularly replenish the funds of the International Development Association. The total amount needed to replenish these funds as well as the proportional contribution of each country are determined by international negotiations. Afterwards, the respective governments of the member countries are asked to approve the amounts negotiated. This is the sixth current replenishment of the resources since the creation of the International Development Association. In the last few years, the funds of the IDA have been replenished every three years; the sixth replenishment was negotiated in 1979, it will occur in phases from the middle of 1980 until the middle of 1983 and the total amount for that replenishment has been set at $12 billion in U.S. funds.

During the negotiations, Canada decided to set its share at 4.3 per cent of the total replenishment or $601.8 million Canadian. For all previous reconstitutions, Canada's share was just over $1 billion U.S., or 5.3 per cent of the total resources of the International Development Association. The amendment to the International Development Association Act now being considered in this House aims at authorizing the second payment to be made as a partial settlement of Canada's commitment in respect of the sixth replenishment of the resources I have been referring to. Last year, Canada made a first payment of $177.1 million to the Association.

I would like to note, Mr. Speaker, that these payments are made in the form of non-interest bearing demand notes which the International Development Association usually cashes over a period of 10 years as it actually implements its projects. The International Development Association does not need the contribution of Canada immediately, but it asks that we make the unconditional commitment to pay these funds by issuing non-interest bearing demand notes to be able to make loan agreements with the receiving countries.

The payment by Canada would normally become due on July 1. However, the United States has been late in ratifying the sixth replenishment. To enable the IDA to continue its loan program, Canada and many other donor countries have made their first payment in respect of the sixth replenishment last year, as provided by the negotiated resolution and as I have just indicated. This year, donor countries have decided to wait for the United States to duly approve their share of the sixth replenishment before making their second payment. The American administration expects Congress to approve its contribution this fall, at which time other donor countries should make their second payment. Until such time as the United States has obtained legislative approval of its commitment to the Association, Canada will be under no obligation to make its second payment, for which authority is now being asked, to the House of Commons. I wish to thank hon. members and the House leaders of the opposition parties for having agreed to limit their speaking time in order to pass this bill, and I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your patience in listening to me.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to have the opportunity to reply briefly on behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition with respect to this bill. Before I begin my short remarks on the subject, I would like to say that it would be beneficial for us to read at some point the report on the House of Commons by the Auditor General for the fiscal period ending March 31, 1979. In it he wrote rather emphatically and eloquently about the necessity for Parliament having some control over the expenditures of government. We should remind ourselves that the reason we are involved in this series of bills under the arrangements which have been made is not that there is any disagreement in the House of Commons with the kinds of programs which are covered in these bills, as extensive and wide-ranging as they are, but that there was another great disagreement in the House.

It is a credit to the everlasting good name of the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) that the government has been brought to the point where it can no longer use dollar items in the estimates. I know the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) will remember what I am saying. The government can no longer use dollar items in the estimates, or authorize expenditure of money, virtually without parliamentary approval. We are engaged in this practice, with respect to this bill to amend the International Development Association Act, because of the necessity to generally observe the requirements of the Auditor General. We want to ensure that Parliament has some control and that the process is right—not just that the ends are justified, but that the means to get to those ends are justified. It is in that spirit that I am very pleased to clearly indicate our support for the bill itself.

Your Honour and I had an opportunity during a parliamentary recess to speak with the minister of education for Somalia at a luncheon. The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael) was there as well. The minister told us of the great difficulties which some countries were facing, and particularly his country, with the influx of people across their borders in a horde, which is hard for us to imagine. I gathered these refugees were from Ethiopia. The economy of his country was supporting, according to the figures and the proportions, the equivalent of an influx into Canada of about eight million people within one year.

I have never forgotten that statistic nor that luncheon. That had a profound effect upon me with respect to the importance of Canada's place in the world and Canada's responsibility as a world nation and as a part of the brotherhood of man. That luncheon and those statistics have been emblazoned on my mind. We were looking into the face of a minister of a small country who was telling us of the enormity of the problem. Could we imagine what would happen in Canada if we had that burden to bear, just financially, with an economy as strong as ours in comparative terms? It is no wonder that Somalia and other countries are the beneficiaries of what I think is a first-rate offshoot of the World Bank, which is a gathering of nations of the world to help each other.

The International Development Association is a new affiliate of the bank. It was established to meet the situation of a growing number of less-developed nations, those countries in which need for and ability to make use of outside capital is greater than their ability to service conventional loans.

Consequently, the terms of the IDA's development methods are designed so that they will impose less burden on the balance of payments of borrowing countries and of conventional lenders. If we do not have this kind of thing, then loans would be meaningless to some of the countries to which they are addressed.

The association has been described somewhere as a "soft-loan window" used by the World Bank group to lend funds to the poorest developing countries for development purposes at highly concessional rates—a three-quarters of 1 per cent carrying charge, with a 50-year term and ten years of grace, is quite an advantage. It is an advantage which I am sure is absorbed and offset by the state of the donor countries. By June 30, 1980, Canada had advanced a total of U.S. $1,027,351,000 to IDA. That represents 5.27 per cent of total donor advances. This bill will allow that to continue.

When preparing for this short debate, Mr. Speaker, I did some reading about something which arose out of a process which is relatively new. I am proud to say that it was initiated in Parliament when the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was Prime Minister. I refer to the select committees which the government has now chosen to call parliamentary task forces.

In the third report of the parliamentary task force on North-South relations, stress was laid on the need for a fresh approach to development. It is interesting that the parliamentarians involved, members of the Liberal Party of Canada, members of the Progressive Conservative Party and members of the New Democratic Party, attacked the conundrums facing the nations of the world in an intellectual way as they involve the North-South dialogue.

In that third report, the mixture of members of this House made some recommendations which were unanimous and which other members of this House ought to consider very carefully. They asked for a new approach to development. They asked the House and the country to consider that the image of a world divided between a powerful north and weak and dependent south is outdated and that the country reconsider its position. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has come to this rather late in his public life but it is to be noted that Parliament supported those recommendations.

Some of the key recommendations ought to be remembered and the report ought not to lie fallow in the desks, in the filing drawers and on the shelves of some department of government. The problem with the select committee provisions, when this party was the government, and with the parliamentary task force provisions now, is that there is no way that members of the committee and Parliament can ask the government to respond to the reports adopted by the House within a short period of time. That failure cannot be laid to the Minister of State for Finance; it is the fault of the system.

When we consider parliamentary reform, then, as well as giving Parliament a greater right to hold government financially accountable, I think we ought to give Parliament an opportunity to hold government accountable in the sense that it should respond to and comment upon, in a public way, reports presented to the House. This applies particularly to special reports commissioned as the result of a reference from the government.

The first key recommendation was that Canada should raise its ODA target to .7 per cent of GNP by 1990 and achieve the level of .57 per cent by 1985. It now stands at .46 per cent. If the report were approved and adopted it would increase the current aid budget of $1.2 billion to about $3 billion by 1985. That is a tremendous adjustment but it is an indication of the magnitude of the problem that a committee of Parliament found. It would mean the expenditure of $350 million more than the government envisages at the present time.

The report made a second and very important recommendation, that Canada should concentrate its aid on the poorest countries, giving its highest priority to basic education and improving women's skills. This is something which is needed in every country but particularly in the poorest countries. It is the message that the minister of education of Somalia left with us, aside from the basic needs message that he brought. We now support 89 countries. The thrust of the report is that we should concentrate on fewer countries.

There is also a recommendation that more of the ODA should go to non-governmental organization activities, notably to smaller rural projects operated by NGOs on CIDA's behalf.

It recommended that CIDA should decide where to buy goods and services favouring Canadian sources, but free of any percentage rule such as is in place at the moment. It proposed that short-term commercial objectives should not be permitted to undermine the developmental objectives of aid. There is a sense of humanity running through all that, the thrust of it being that there would be a long-term benefit to Canada.

Food aid should only be used to fill the gap between a country's food needs and its food production. Canada should buy food for needy nations from neighbouring poor countries having surplus food.

The report went on to say that there should be a major public inquiry to pin-point industries unable to withstand competition from cheap imports from the Third World. Canada's declining industries ought to be replaced by new, promising enterprises, thereby strengthening Canada's economy and allowing easier entry of developing nations' products. Whether we like it or not, Mr. Speaker, that is something that we are going to have to consider. When I hear members of the government say that we are going to consider an industrial strategy, I wonder what the thrust of it is going to be and how the government will come to terms with that very significant recommendation, which is a difficult one for this country at this time.

The report gave some credence to the importance of the price of energy and the supply of energy. It recommended that we should support the creation of a new energy-related lending agency as proposed by the World Bank. I think that is important in view of the cost of energy and its effect on the economies of developing countries.

The unanimous report pointed out that we are on the threshold of a new world. Since the report was unanimous, I think it cannot be ignored when considering our external affairs policies, external aid policies, the direction of CIDA, our energy policy. If it means anything at all, then the report must be taken into account by government.

When considering an industrial "policy" and an industrial "strategy"—which I think are two of the most overworked words in Canadian public life—I think it is important to know that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) is examining that recommendation. If it were adopted, the impact on Canadian manufacturing and industry would be imperative, difficult and swift. I do not know to what extent that will happen, but since Parliament has spoken on the matter, it is important that someone respond. We should know what the position of the government is in the short term and in the long term.

The bill is worthy of support, Mr. Speaker. Except for the process, it was worthy of support even when it was a dollar item, but the process got in its way. As a result, we have agreed with respect to this series of legislation to put these bills through quickly. This is one of them. The impact that the plight of some underdeveloped countries can have on anyone, even the most hardshelled, is difficult to express. This bill and the program is designed to permit Canada to do its reasonable share as a citizen of the world.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his explanation. He certainly made it very clear. I say to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) that it was a very interesting series of observations which he made and certainly well worth supporting.

In thinking back over the last few years, we have come a long way in Canada in raising the level of public awareness of the value of aid. Thinking back 15 years, I remember the numerous times that I received communications from irate citizens who wanted to know why we were taxing them so heavily and then handing out the money. Over the course of the last few years we have been able to more easily get the message through to people about the tremendous amount of value that we receive from the few dollars we actually ever send outside of the country.

A number of things have happened. Even yet there is still a level of misunderstanding with which we must deal. We really ought to spend more time with the public making them aware of the kinds of conditions that exist in those countries of the world which qualify for aid under this program and a number of others.

I do not think people are aware of the economic conditions and personal hardships faced by so many of their fellow mortals in other parts of the world. The more recent opportunities for travel have tended to broaden the knowledge of Canadians and to soften the hardened attitudes that were evident some years ago. Nevertheless, we still have a lot to do.

In spite of the fact that our economic conditions are not all they might be, I do not think the people of Canada fully understand the very serious economic deprivation which exists in many other parts of the world. When we think of economic hardship, we tend to talk about it in the context of the Canadian experience. We tend to think of economic hardship along the lines of the hardship we might come into contact with on a day-to-day basis. It is only when you go outside the country and travel in other parts of the world that you begin to fully understand the personal problems that exist and what little we do—and it is little compared to what we could do—to try and assist in ameliorating these conditions in other parts of the world. It is money well spent.

If there was a way for the House of Commons to actually pass judgment on the individual expenditures that are put before us, I do not doubt for a moment that there would be a move by a lot of Canadians, and I think the majority, to increase Canada's involvement in areas such as are affected by the IDA fund.

There are some things we have to try to understand. We have to try to get Canadians to appreciate that in giving assistance, we must not attempt to infringe on the distinctiveness of the people's culture, the way in which they develop. We must not attempt to make them like us. It is not a process of trying to make everyone the same, but of trying to assist in the most basic, human way, trying to provide the wherewithal for self-sufficiency in the most basic areas. It is trying to assist in the level of skilled development, trying to improve, as my colleague said, the educational process for people in many other parts of the world so that they can develop a self-sufficiency.

It is not a matter of turning them into Canadians in a different part of the world. It is matter of allowing them to be what they are, assisting them to develop that process so that they will be self-sufficient. Surely it is an attempt to assist them in reducing the amount of health hazard and the problems which continue to exist in their countries, possibly because of bad water supplies or inadequate or immediate access to emergency health care.

I hope Canadians will support this attempt when they see it in the proper context to ensure that those things that we take and have taken for granted for years are available to people in other parts of the world.

We have to guard against the tendency of allowing the assistance we give to be used for exploitation. That tendency is there. No matter how carefully we might speak against allowing that to happen, I have seen evidence of it. I am sure other members of this House of Commons have seen evidence of it as they travelled throughout the world.

Recently I made a visit to an area that might qualify under this aid program. Actually it is not an aid program but could be an aid program. It is subject to repayment. It may take a while, but it is subject to repayment over the long haul.

I was in St. Lucia about eight months ago where I had occasion to meet with the minister there. He took us around the island to show us some of the devastation that had occurred as the result of a hurricane. Living in Canada where hurricanes are an infrequent occurrence, it is hard to imagine how an area can be devastated and how much can be done with a small amount of money.

I recall seeing homes that by Canadian standards were certainly not the most substantial, not the type seen here. Nevertheless they were the homes of the people. These homes had been blown off the face of the earth by this hurricane. I saw banana plantations where considerable sums of money had been spent over the last few years so that the export of bananas could be developed as their main source of income. One fell swoop and away went their income source for at least a year, and probably for two or three years to come.

As I spoke with the prime minister there and the members of his government, I thought of how much we could have done to help relieve the terrible burden those people will have to carry. Instead of devoting quite as much money to advertising in order to praise ourselves for our great efforts, it would be nice if some was spent in bringing to the attention of Canadians those conditions we are attempting to help resolve with what, on balance, are very small sums of money being contributed by each and every Canadian.

I think if we could do that we would find that Canadians would, rather than asking that we reconsider because they are afraid we are spending too much, ask us to reconsider because we are spending too little. I think if they had the facts firmly before them that might be the case.

I want to add a cautionary note. If for no other reason than that it is in our own self-interest to attempt to raise the economic levels of those people, because that will have a spin-off beneficial effect to Canada in years to come if they become "have" rather than "have-not" parts of the world and their consumer purchasing power is increased—if that were the only reason why we were doing it, and I would hope, God, that that is not the only reason, but even for the most mercenary reasons when individuals are looking at the expenditure of some hundreds of millions of dollars over the next period of time, it would be worthwhile.

I want to say to the minister that we are, of course, happy to support this bill. We think that come next year, with no constitutional debate, no oil policy problems, no interest rate problems—I assume all of these things will be behind us—

An hon. Member: That is utopia!

Mr. Deans: The hon. member laughs. Thank God I can make somebody laugh! My constituents are crying. Maybe by next year we will have those things behind us and we will be able to spend a little more time talking about the level of Canadian involvement in the Third World, the level of Canadian involvement not in the North-South dialogue, because dialogue really means nothing, but the process of the North helping to develop the South in a way that will be sustaining. Then maybe come the fall or next spring this minister, together with his colleagues, will be able to spend a bit of time in this House so we can devote a day or two to a real discussion about Canada's role, about what we can afford to do and what the benefits will be both to the receiving nations and also to Canada. I am sure if we could do that you would find, Mr. Minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian public would be most eager to see us raise the level involved.

An hon. Member: What about an east-west dialogue?

Mr. Deans: My colleague from Edmonton says an east-west dialogue might be good. That may be true too, but I would like to think that on this matter the east and west are one, at least in Canada; that there is no argument between east and west as to whether we should be involved in North-South development programs. I do not think we would get any argument here or, if this debate were to take place in western Canada, that there would be any difference of opinion. I think we would all be prepared to commit more to try to create a better place for the people who frankly, right now, if one were to look at the situation, have very little in the way of joy in their lives.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT (FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS) ASSISTANCE ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that Bill C-74, to authorize financial assistance to be provided to certain international financial institutions, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a bill entitled "An act to authorize financial assistance to be provided to certain international financial institutions", authorizing various payments to international development institutions often known as international financial institutions or, in some cases, regional development banks. The ruling brought down by Madam Speaker on June 12 following a point of order concerning the procedural acceptability of certain items contained in the Main Estimates for 1981-82 obliges us to table this bill. Madam Speaker did indeed rule Items L45 and L60 for External Affairs contrary to our rules and regulations.

[English]

Section 2 of the act would provide authority to make two types of payments out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. First, payments in cash of an amount not exceeding $4 million. In fact, the intention is to make only one such payment in fiscal year 1981-82 to the United Nations Common Fund for Commodities. This tranche of $4 million would be the first of three equal payments for the period 1981-82 to 1983-84. The purpose is to support the common fund's second window which will finance measures other than stocking in the field of commodities. The vast majority of benefits from the operations of the fund's second window will flow to the developing countries.

The second type of payment to be authorized under this act involves the issuance, in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the governor in council, of non-interest bearing, non-negotiable demand notes to international financial institutions. The form of these demand notes would be determined by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in line with the Financial Administration Act. It is a long-standing practice to make payments to the regional development banks by way of demand notes since they do not require all of the cash at the time of payment. Rather, the cash is needed over a period of up to ten years as the banks make project commitments and actual expenditures are incurred in developing countries. It is with this in mind that encashment schedules for these notes are drawn up and agreed between the international financial institutions and Canada.

As the House will note, clause 2 of this legislation envisages in fiscal year 1981-82 the issuance of non-negotiable demand notes not exceeding in the aggregate $121.2 million. This consists of the following components: first, an amount of $3.5 million for the Caribbean Development Bank's special development fund. This is the last of three tranches to fulfil a Canadian commitment of $10.5 million for the period 1979-80 to 1981-82. Second, a payment of $30 million to the African Development Fund. This is the third and last instalment totalling $85 million over the period 1979-80 to 1981-82. Third, a payment of $56.7 million to the Asian Development Fund. This is the third of four instalments which total $193.4 million for 1979-80 to 1982-83. Fourth, a payment of $17 million to the fund for special operations of the Inter-American Development Bank. This is the third of four payments toward a commitment of $58.1 million in U.S. funds over the years 1979-80 to 1982-83. Fifth, an amount of $14 million for the International Fund for Agricultural Development as the first of three instalments totalling $42 million.

The third clause of this bill deals with the matter of the previously issued non-interest bearing, non-negotiable demand notes referred to earlier. The issuance of these notes in previous years would be ratified and confirmed by this bill. The encashment schedules for the various international financial institutions indicate that an amount of some $19.3 million would be drawn down in the course of fiscal year 1981-82.

[Translation]

Clause 4 of the bill would authorize Canada to make an initial subscription for shares of the African Development Bank. Though we have been financing, for some years already, the African Development Fund, its preferential aid mechanism, the Bank decided recently that the considerable development needs of the continent would require a far greater contribution in resources. Accordingly, the African Development Bank will accept in its ranks not only the countries of the area but also countries such as Canada and other donors of the OECD. In view of our active role with both anglophone and francophone countries in Africa, I shall be particularly happy to see Canada sit as a member of the African Development Bank.

[English]

Our share in the African Development Bank will be 3.2 per cent of the expanded capital stock. This legislation provides for the purchase of 4,200 paid-in shares over five years as well as 12,600 callable shares. These shares are valued in aggregate at 168 million units of account, for approximately $240 million Canadian. Of this amount only 25 per cent will be paid in; that is approximately $60 million over five years. We will be utilizing the usual method for payments to the African Development Bank.

The fifth and last clause of this legislation conveys authority to issue to the bank this year non-negotiable demand notes equivalent in aggregate to 8.4 million units of account, which equals approximately $12 million Canadian.

In conclusion, for the information of hon. members I would like to add that in fiscal year 1981-82 the sum of $31.3 million will be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund for the encashment of notes previously issued. Authority exists under section 45 of the Financial Administration Act for these payments.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words about Bill C-74, to authorize financial assistance to be provided to certain international financial institutions, but in doing so I wish to point out one of the incongruities which exists as far as this bill is concerned and as far as the previous bill, Bill C-71, which we were debating, is concerned. That bill, which was to amend the International Development Association Act, and this one, which authorizes financial assistance to certain international financial institutions, both deal with the funding available from Canadian public funds to international financial institutions.

This certainly was an issue I tried to tackle during the time I held the office of Secretary of State for External Affairs, and it is one which I hope the present minister is trying to regularize in trying to bring these two advances through international financial institutions under the aegis of the Department of External Affairs where they both belong. Then the amount of foreign aid and foreign developmental assistance—it goes beyond aid to include developmental assistance as well—will be channelled through one agency or department and not fractionalized between two departments, so that a true and concise picture of our over-all program is given in what we are doing in the field of financial assistance through international institutions to countries of the Third World.

I see the minister is nodding. I hope he is carrying on that effort to try to bring the International Development Association Act, IDAA, under the jurisdiction of his department. In fact, when we get into Committee of the Whole on this bill, I would like to put that question to the minister, and I will welcome any comment he has to make about it. I am reminded by my House leader that the minister also has the opportunity to comment on this when he closes the debate.

This bill has been placed before us, not primarily because of the initiative the government has taken in this regard, but because it came about through my party's prompting through the efforts of the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) and the ruling of the Chair on June 12. If neither of those two actions had been taken, these items in Bill C-74 might have slipped by the House under the guise of votes L45 and L60 of the Department of External Affairs.

The thought that that might very well have happened if Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition had not been on its toes has very serious implications for the parliamentary system, for it touches on what Michael Valpy of The Globe and Mail last week called, and I quote: "the heart of parliamentary democracy, the central issue of how much scrutiny Parliament should have over what government does".

It is not by chance that there are procedural differences between approving estimates on the one hand and enacting legislation on the other. The first action funds the status quo, while the second action changes it. The difference is a very fundamental one. To confuse the difference by bypassing one process through using another, quicker method surely only serves to undermine parliamentary responsibility.

• (1640)

This is what we are returning to by debating these bills today. We are giving authority to enact changes in legislation, which is Parliament's responsibility, and I am glad to see this being carried out. To bring in what should be statutory change by the process set up for fund appropriation allows government to step into programs and enter new areas without the proper debate such government initiatives warrant.

Two such initiatives were votes L-45 and L-60 of the external affairs estimates. These are now transferred to Bill C-74. In Madam Speaker's words found on page 10546 of Hansard, what those votes sought to achieve was:

> —to finance international development by the use of issuing demand notes to the credit of the various named banks or institutions upon which they may draw in the Bank of Canada, or to purchase shares in the listed banks.

Those votes did not seek merely the simple appropriation of funds, but sought the legislative authority to incur Crown debts without parliamentary approval. The process we are now involved in corrects that major oversight.

Having said this, I want to indicate my party's support for the measure before us. Bill C-74 initially represents $137 million in Canadian investments and advances to financial institutions for international development. It means that the Caribbean Development Bank, the Inter-American Development Bank, the African Development Bank, the Asian Development Bank, and the International Fund for Agricultural Development can now draw on Canadian government funds for additional contributions totalling some $121 million.

All these contributions are in the nature of advances and are thus repayable after a specified period of time. All items involve non-interest bearing, non-negotiable demand notes to be encashed at a later date. It is appropriate that Canadian contributions should be made through the regional development banks of the areas concerned. I want to re-emphasize that point, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian contributions should be made through the regional development banks of the areas concerned. The regional development bank is an institution which has been developing in the last number of years and has been carrying out a tremendous amount of good work, empowered as it is by funds from the wealthier countries of the world. That, sir, is as it should be.

However, in addition to the $121 million to be put into these regional development banks, some $12 million will go to buying shares in the African Development Bank. This is quite a new procedure. The African Development Bank, like the other regional development banks, is a significant force in the development activities of Africa. It was set up in 1964 by the United Nations Commission for Africa. Since it first began its operations in 1966 it has had significant success, and those who have followed its development will see what it has meant to countries throughout Africa, particularly the poorest parts. With an authorized capital of $1,052 million U.S., subscribed capital of $930 million, and paid-up capital of $295 million, it has been able to assist needy African countries with readily obtainable loans for development projects.

Until 1978 capital stock in that bank could only be held by African countries. This policy is being changed and the $12 million requested in Bill C-74 is in anticipation of that change being completed this year. Non-African countries will then be able to buy into the capital stock of the bank. This is the reason why one cannot find this expenditure in last year's estimates and why this item has been considered by the Speaker as governmental action and not simple fund appropriation. The government is authorizing the investment of money where it has never invested before. It is moving into an area where it has never taken action before.

If this item had gone through under the estimates then it would have set a precedent, in that all future investments in the African Development Bank would be votable items. Parliamentary authority would clearly have been circumvented in that case.

Bill C-74 represents $137 million in advances and investments by the Canadian government towards international development. That, sir, is 89 per cent of total CIDA contributions to international financial institutions for 1981-82. That is not 89 per cent of total CIDA contributions, but 89 per cent of the contributions which CIDA makes through international financial institutions.

Now, Sir, this is the kind of massive commitment that deserves the attention of the House, not necessarily to find fault with it because this specific financial disbursement indeed has merit. Rather, the House needs to consider this kind of massive investment and commitment so that Parliament and Canada can have a clearer idea of the direction the government is taking in international development.

We are now without an aid strategy. The 1975-1980 strategy paper has had no successor. It expired last year and there has been nothing to take its place. How are we supposed to determine what the long-term and comprehensive implication of the government's aid initiatives are if we cannot debate and scrutinize such issues, if they are not brought before the House as they should be through legislation?

Bill C-74, as the minister has explained and as I have mentioned, deals with financial commitments to certain international development banks and funds. As such it affects the division between multilateral and bilateral assistance. This is a very important aspect of our overall aid program: What weight will be given to multilateral programs and what weight will be given to bilateral programs? This determination should not be made in an ad hoc fashion. Rather, it should be part of a concrete, long-term program, one that is comprehensive, well thought out and will place our aid where it is most needed. In other words, where it will do the most good.

Such a comprehensive program was offered by the North-South task force report, the broad thrust of which the government has accepted. However, broad approval is not enough and I have brought that to the minister's attention in the House. What we need is a detailed strategy similar to the 1975-1980 strategy for international development. We could then at least measure the government's progress in this critical field.

Such a strategy should be based upon the recommendations of the North-South task force report and I think should rely on two fundamental beliefs. The first is the need for continuing and direct assistance to the very poorest countries in the world through Canadian developmental funds to countries which are becoming progressively poorer because of escalating oil costs and world-wide inflation. This should be the initial basis upon which we base our oil strategy.

● (1650)

The second basis on which to plan our development assistance to other nations is the need to enter into modern trading and financial relationships with the newly industrialized countries of the Third World so that they can consolidate the hard-won gains they have already achieved.

The bill before us today provides for certain borrowing by regional development banks of Canadian funds. I have said that my party approves of this measure, but I say to the minister how much more we would welcome the presentation by the government of a comprehensive developmental aid strategy for the decade of the 1980s.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) has pointed out, Bill C-74 is in effect a companion piece to Bill C-71. Just as we supported Bill C-71 we shall also support Bill C-74.

I should like to refer again to a remark made by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands by saying that we also agree that these developmental programs, in which Canada, we hope, will become more increasingly involved, ought to be within the confines of one department instead of fractionalized as they are at the present time. I realize that what happened is that some time ago the International Development Association Act was enacted. Therefore, any money that is sought under that legislation has to come by way of amendment to that act. But when it comes to international development assistance, since we do not already have an act of that description it is possible for the government to bring in a new one and to put it where it belongs, under the aegis of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan). Things that are under the aegis of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) have a tougher time than they do when they are under the responsibility of a minister interested in the subject itself.

I should also like to comment, as others have, on the reason we are dealing with these bills, which goes back to the ruling made by Madam Speaker regarding certain items in the estimates. If the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands will forgive me, I should like to make a slight correction in the way they described these matters. They both referred to them as dollar items which the Speaker ruled out. In some cases they are dollar items, but in some cases they are items of quite substantial sums. In fact, one of the items before us right now is for $4 million. That is a lot more than a dollar. In other words, Madam Speaker in her ruling, in response to the points raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), said that it is not only improper to try to legislate by dollar items, but that it was also improper to try to arrange for the spending of large sums of money on conditions set out in an item in the estimates, which is, in effect, an attempt to use the estimates for the legislative process. I pay my respects to the hon. member for Calgary Centre for having raised these issues two or three times and having obtained the decision of Madam Speaker in this session.

I trust the concerned department will not make it necessary for us to go through this again in another session. I hope they will realize by amendments to existing acts or by the bringing in of new acts. We welcome the fact that we are doing it properly now, and just as the Official Opposition has said, we take the same position, that it is not our desire to drag out the discussion on these matters. We are glad to have the opportunity to deal with them in the right way. Mind you, it is easier for us to say that when it is something we really support.

That is the position in which we find ourselves with respect to both Bill C-71 and Bill C-74. We are strongly and wholly in favour of Canada enlarging her role in aid to the other parts of the world, but it is more than that, in playing our part in helping to bring about a better world right around the globe.

We have all been told thousands of times about the remark of Sir Wilfrid Laurier to the effect that the twentieth century would belong to Canada. I think the time has come for us to realize that the twenty-first century had better belong to humanity as a whole, or else there might not be a twenty-second century.

We can no longer go on with a world in which a quarter or a third of its people go to bed hungry every night. These are facts we have come to realize, and there has been some tremendous rhetoric about this right here in the House of Commons in this session. There was no better speech on the need for our being concerned in the North about the South, or in the better-off parts of the world for the other parts, than the speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a few weeks ago. But the point we are trying to make from this side of the House this afternoon is that rhetoric is not enough.

We are happy to support the proposals in Bill C-71 and Bill C-74. We think that Canada's financial contribution, whether it is through developmental loans or outright aid and outright gifts, should be increased. But we think we must go a great deal further than that. In other words, we think we have to start planning our industrial strategy—another pair of words that gets thrown around a fair deal. We have to start planning our economy, not just with the thought of what it does for ourselves, for housing, health, education and so on in our country, but the part that it plays in bringing about improved living conditions around the world.

I have already indulged in quoting a few of the stock quotations there are around, but there is another one which comes to my mind, namely, that if you find a hungry man and you give him a fish, you provide a meal for him; but if you teach him how to fish, you provide meals down the road. Our industrial strategy, our economy, our trade, all our arrangements, at some point have to be made with the whole world in mind. We must start thinking in those terms.

Of course, we are quite interested in the Ottawa Summit Conference which will take place here in this city in a couple of weeks. We applaud the efforts of the Prime Minister to get some of the other heads of government who will be at that conference to show some real interest in North-South problems. We urge that he put everything he can into that effort. These conferences always end up with communiques of some sort. They sound good or make it appear as though they did something, but it really is something which has gone beyond the stage of speech-making or rhetoric. If we are to have a world that enjoys the twenty-first century, we must start thinking in terms of industrial strategy, trade, finance, economics and the rest of it, with a view to bringing about a really better world.

I notice it is five o'clock here in Ottawa and that means it is two o'clock in British Columbia. Out there this afternoon a funeral service is taking place about which Canadians right across this land are thinking. I was pleased when I noticed that the heading put on the tributes paid the other day to Terry Fox read "Tributes to a Magnificent Canadian". I suggest one of the reasons that Canadians are so anxious to pay the deepest respect and the deepest tribute they can to the memory of Terry Fox is that it tells us our young people really have got something. Terry Fox showed us that.

But I remind the House there are others. I think of the countless numbers of young Canadians who respond to the call of CUSO and who have gone out to other parts of the world to try to help bring about better conditions in Southeast Asia, Africa, South America and in various other countries. I think of other kinds of organizations under church auspices and under the auspices of non-governmental organizations, and so on. These attract our young people, who are sometimes described as belonging to the "me" generation. They have got pretty good stuff in them.

I think we should recognize that there is no longer any need to say that charity has to begin at home or to ask why do we tax people to help those abroad? I believe the young people today who will be taking charge of things in Canada not many years hence want to play their part in building that better world. In my younger days that was expressed by joining the various missionary movements and in going to different parts of the world. For a time it was to go as propagandists for a particular faith. That soon grew into the provision of teachers and agricultural experts, engineers and doctors, most of whom two or three generations ago went out to other parts of the world under religious auspices; but the feeling we are our brother's keeper was there in those days and it is there now.

I am satisfied that just as we are honouring the memory of a magnificent Canadian out in Port Coquitlam this afternoon so too can we count on our young people today wanting us to play our part in changing the whole world from a place where millions go to bed hungry every night to a place where there are opportunities for development and a decent life in terms of jobs, education, health and security. We can do it. That is what we are talking about this afternoon.

That is why we are prepared to support these two bills. But we call upon the government in the not too distant future to come back before us with something much more expansive and imaginative. For indeed, just as the twentieth century did provide a lot for us in Canada, so the twenty-first must bring about a better world for all our people, and we Canadians want to play a real and effective part in that role.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, to conclude, I might say a few words in response to those said by speakers for the other parties, both of whom I thank for supporting this bill.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) spoke at the beginning of her remarks about the question of jurisdiction over international financial institutions. I might say that the sentiments she expressed are very similar to my own, and I think I can say that I am meeting equal success within the government in implementing them.

I think I should add that it is not essential by any means for the success of our international aid program that it all be centralized through one agency. For instance, Petro-Canada International agency, which is being set up, will be jointly under the sponsorship of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and myself. I anticipate no difficulty in arranging the details of that with him. I think there is a lot to be said for involving more people, not only more of our fellow citizens but even more ministers, in the administration of these programs.

Both speakers opposite have raised questions about our development strategy for the 1980s which in part has been revealed. There is more to come and we hope to have it available in a few months.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

ATLANTIC REGION FREIGHT ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ASSISTANCE TO TRUCKERS

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-73, to amend the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have some rather good notes and I will try to put them on the record for whoever in Canada is interested in this matter and for students of freight rates in particular.

Mr. Knowles: Aren't you interested?

Mr. Pepin: Yes, I am deeply interested.

• (1710)

The Maritime Freight Rates Act, referred to from now on as the MFRA, and the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act, to which I will refer as the ARFAA, together provide for a program of transportation subsidies in the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé peninsula. Total expenditures under this program amounted to about $62.6 million in 1980-81. The MFRA has been in existence since 1927 and applies only to rail traffic. The ARFAA was passed in 1969 and extends the subsidy program to truckers.

To complicate matters a little bit, the ARFAA also contains features which link the two acts and are designed to control those features and the level of subsidy expenditures. For one, the rail subsidy on certain commodities can be reduced or eliminated. As a matter of fact, it has been reduced, for example, from 20 per cent to 15 per cent. There can be a reduction of the rate of subsidy. That is one feature. Another one is that the amount of subsidy paid annually to truckers cannot exceed the amount saved by reducing or eliminating the rail subsidy. The ceiling is established under section 6(2) of the act. That ceiling is the subject for today.

However, after the ARFAA came into effect, I repeat in 1969, the rail subsidy was not reduced as much as planned. Things did not turn out exactly as they were meant to turn out. The number of truckers eligible for subsidy under the ARFAA grew dramatically. Just to give Your Honour an illustration, in 1969 there were 450 truckers in the area. In 1980, we had 3,800. Obviously, because of the highway strengthening programs and other factors, the number of shippers using trucks in the area multiplied extraordinarily. The result was that, if the ceiling were applied, truckers would get proportionately less than the railways, creating an inequity between two modes, which the ARFAA was designed, in principle, to redress.

I might add that somewhere in the meantime, in 1967, we had the National Transportation Act, which specifically says that there should not be discrimination between different modes of transportation.

In some ways, that ceiling on trucking subsidies, related to the subsidy reduction on railways, was discrimination against the truckers in favour of the railways. I am saying all that to try somehow to justify why the practice to ignore the ceiling was established. It therefore became the practice from 1971-72 to include an item in the estimates which, in fact, removed that ceiling. It is included in the old estimates in the following words:

—and to provide that subsection 6(2) of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act shall not apply in the case of the payment of assistance in the current fiscal year to truckers pursuant to subsection 6(1) of that Act.

These were the words tagged at the end of that estimate which had the effect of removing the ceiling for practical purposes.

It is estimated that in 1981-82 the savings from the reduction in the rail subsidy will be about $14 million. This is the saving which establishes a relationship between the truckers and the railways. I repeat that it will be about $14 million. The amount which would be paid to truckers without the ceiling is about $43 million. So there is a potential $29 million shortfall in the amount of subsidies paid if the ceiling is enforced. In other words, it costs $29 million not to enforce the ceiling.

As I have already indicated, it was the practice to remove the statutory ceiling through the estimates, and that practice was ruled out by the Speaker recently. Bill C-73, which is in front of us now, has the effect of removing the ceiling by proper statutory means so that the trucking subsidy can continue to be paid in full. Recipients who have invested on the basis of a continued subsidy could reasonably argue that its abrupt termination without advance notice of a change in policy would be unduly harsh.

This bill notwithstanding, the program as a whole is under review. I am quite sure the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) also looked at it. Some people wonder if there would not be savings to be made there without damaging the economy of the region covered by these two acts. Officials are now carefully studying the possibility of further selective reductions in order to reduce expenditures without detracting, as I said, from the purpose of the program, which is to assist the transportation of goods in the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé peninsula. At present, the program as a whole is believed to be beneficial to the area, and any substantial change would, of course, be preceded by full consultation.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, at the outset, I would like to thank the hon. minister for giving us an explanation of the details of this bill I suppose that that is certainly one positive element to this process, getting an explanation and some historic background to the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act and the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

We on this side have no fundamental objection to this piece of legislation. However, what we do object to is the procedure which has become the practice of this government in terms of dealing with a matter which should be properly dealt with in legislation in the first place.

As the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) indicated, the purpose of this bill and the purpose of vote 110 was to remove the ceiling which would allow the truckers to get sufficient subsidy to provide equality in treatment to the two competing modes of transportation. I know that there are people in this House who would object to a provision which would provide for unfair treatment between two respective modes of transport; and they are competing modes.

However, it brings me to the over-all thrust of the debate on these pieces of legislation, the series of bills with which we are dealing as a result of the work and the scrutiny of the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre). It is really a classic demonstration of how this government continues, in a very blatant way, to erode the rights, the privileges and the powers of Parliament. This is not the first time that this government has been caught using methods which are less than legitimate. It has really become almost a chronic rule-breaker when it comes to avoiding and circumventing the parliamentary process.

I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will allude to this in more detail than I; but the rights and privileges of members of Parliament have been eroded. Indeed, the institution of Parliament has been undermined over the years in its ability to control public expenditures. By the way in which we handle our estimates, it seems to have become nothing more than a rubber stamp. At this time it is necessary to build confidence and trust in our Canadian institutions, particularly our political and parliamentary institutions. It certainly bothers me to see a government move continuously and incessantly along the road toward that undermining process. I think that it is fundamentally repugnant to the principle of parliamentary democracy. Once again, I think that we, as members of this House, and certainly as members of the Canadian electorate who support the continued strength of the parliamentary process, owe a great deal of debt and gratitude to the hon. member for Calgary Centre.

• (1720)

Not too long ago a former auditor general stated in one of his annual reports that Parliament had lost or was close to losing control of the public purse. In view of these backhanded strategies, it is little wonder that he made that remark. Indeed, it is little wonder that Canadians, by and large, are suspicious of the way we deal with taxpayers' money. We are really trustees of their money. We are the guardians of the public purse.

I welcome this piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker, and I welcome the fact that equality of treatment is maintained. We are not opposed to the expenditure but, I repeat, we are fundamentally opposed to the process. It is the duty of Parliament to pass laws; Parliament is responsible for the authorization of expenditure and for the collection of moneys.

We see in Madam Speaker's ruling that vote 110 sought an amendment to existing legislation, which was clearly out of order. We have other examples of that when we look at what is going on with respect to the establishment of VIA Rail. That is a question that must come up for debate in due course in this House.

I am very interested in the exchange that has been going on between the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and the co-chairmen of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments.

I hope that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is listening because, as he pointed out quite correctly, what we are dealing with here are not dollar items but items that were included in the Main Estimates. VIA Rail, which has become the instrument for the operation and maintenance and supply of rail passenger service in this country, was established through the process of a one-dollar vote in the House of Commons. In the Votes and Proceedings for June 15, 1981 this is dealt with at page 2464.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that I am deviating somewhat from the thrust of the bill but we are dealing with the fundamental parliamentary principle that this House should consider legislation, expenditures and the collection of revenue in a proper and just manner.

The committee had four objections to the way in which VIA Rail was established. The committee reported, at page 2464, of Votes and Proceedings, as follows:

> VIA Rail Canada Inc. has been established and set up in business—and in consequence almost all the railway passenger services of the country have been brought into government ownership, control and funding—pursuant to an involved use of subordinate powers, a dollar vote in an Appropriation Act and the three slim regulations under report. At no time has Parliament had the opportunity to debate and to settle what are very significant matters.

I am directing this criticism to the government, Mr. Speaker, and not to the Minister of Transport because he was not a member of cabinet at that time. Knowing the integrity and honour of the minister, I am sure that if he had been minister at that time he would not have circumvented the parliamentary process. At page 2465 of Votes and Proceedings there appears the following:

> The whole authority for public funding of the VIA Rail operation and its takeover of railway passenger services provided by railway companies rests in the dollar vote, vote 52d, Department of Transport, Appropriation Act No. 1, 1977, which reads as follows:

Then it basically describes the manner in which the company is to be set up under the provision of a one dollar vote. Then there appears the following passage:

> Upon this foundation hangs now all the law and the administration of almost all railway passenger services in Canada.

What a devious way to create a Crown corporation which is all-encompassing! The committee report goes on at page 2467 as follows:

> In your committee's judgment, the settling of the legal regime to govern the now publicly owned, controlled and funded railway passenger service is too important a matter to be left to the corporate policy, and virtually unlimited corporate powers, of VIA Rail Canada Inc., a corporation wholly owned by the Crown, and to skeletal regulations made under a dollar vote which in the nature of procedure in the House of Commons cannot have been subjected to significant debate. Parliament should have been, and still should be, given the opportunity to debate the future and structure of railway passenger services in Canada and the manner of their management and control; and your committee is inclined to believe that this should include the maintenance of the jurisdiction of the Canadian Transport Commission over VIA Rail Canada. As things stand now, even if a bill to regulate railway passenger services and VIA Rail Canada Inc. were to be introduced, many important matters have been effectively foreclosed from Parliament's debate and disposition by the extensive and pre-emptive executive action that has already been taken. It is objectionable in principle that relationships between the new public railway passenger authority and the railway commpanies, and the take-over of services, should have been settled without parliamentary involvement.

Those are very profound words, Mr. Speaker. It is interesting to note that the minister, who is now attempting to reduce the level of subsidy, is really choosing the course to which this committee takes very serious objection. The government is now attempting to circumvent the regulatory party, the CTC, by deciding, through cabinet deliberations, which lines will provide service and which will be abandoned. That is fundamentally repugnant to the principle of parliamentary democracy.

The committee then quoted from the proceedings of an earlier committee, reported at page 2467 as follows:

> "In the review of statutory instruments the Committee has been struck by the number of instances of the use of Votes in Appropriation Acts as vehicles for the conferring of subordinate law-making powers, usually upon the governor in council. From 1st January 1972 to 30th June 1976 at least one hundred and four items of delegated legislation have to the knowledge of the Committee, been made pursuant to Votes. (The task of adding up the number is not easy since spent regulations are removed from the Index to Part II of The Canada Gazette at the end of each calendar year in which their effect became spent.) The committee fears that many, many more examples exist which have not been classed by the Crown's legal advisers as statutory instruments and of the existence of which the committee has neither knowledge nor the means of knowledge."

There follows a very damning indictment of the process that has been used by this government to circumvent parliamentary control.

Now I come to the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. There has been a continuing exchange of correspondence between the co-chairmen of the committee and the minister, beginning in June, 1980. The co-chairmen asked the minister to bring in a bill to provide for the incorporation of VIA Rail. In August, 1980 the minister responded that he anticipated a cabinet decision on the issue would be available by the end of September, 1980. In November, 1980 a letter was addressed to the minister asking what progress had been made. I quote in part from the letter, which appears at page 2470 as follows:

> We were instructed to ask whether the Cabinet decision to which you referred has been taken and when you will respond to the committee's position on the need for the introduction of a VIA Rail Canada bill.

On January 12, 1981, the minister replied in part, as follows:

> I expect the matter to be discussed early in the new year. Once a decision has been reached, I will advise your Committee on the requirement for a VIA Rail Canada bill.

● (1730)

It was dated January 12, 1981. Then we have further correspondence. The final letter reported here indicates that a decision is not available and furthermore it is considered that the VIA Rail act is not needed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The Chair has no objection to the hon. member's reference to the process of dollar items and so on and so forth. However, there is difficulty for any occupant of the Chair in judging whether the subject matter becomes the process or the subject matter, which in this case is the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act. I think it is reasonable to ask the hon. member, having said he is perfectly entitled to pursue the matter of process, and estimates and so forth, to consider the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act.

Mr. Mazankowski: I appreciate your suggestion, Mr. Speaker. The issue I am dealing with is fundamental from the parliamentary point of view. The crux of this matter has been brought about by the government's decision to circumvent the proper parliamentary process. I simply want to point out there are other examples.

As I said at the outset, we on this side have no objection to the contents of this bill. We appreciate the fact that we have had an opportunity to have a short debate and a review of the subject matter of the bill. However, I must warn the minister. I am pleased that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) is here. I am sure that he too will want to take cognizance of the contents of the report of the Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. I believe he wants to see the business of this House proceed in a proper, orderly and legal fashion.

I could go on to cite the other example, the anticipated abandonment of certain rail lines, which appears to be proceeding in the same manner as the process to which we are taking exception here. At a time when our parliamentary institutions are under attack, it is incumbent upon the government to ensure that it proceeds in a proper parliamentary fashion.

With regard to the matter of expenditure of funds, whether it is for legitimate and good purpose or provokes some questions in debate, it is important that the adjudication of those issues be left to members of Parliament. The power should be transferred back to the elected representatives, the members of Parliament, so that they can properly debate the issues.

The debate this afternoon has provided information. It gives members an opportunity to review and assess the effectiveness of a given program. If we have done nothing further, we have had the opportunity to assess and analyse one program that has been in effect since 1927 and another since 1969. Had the minister realized he was going to have to bring in legislation to deal with that issue, he may have seen fit to broaden the legislation so that we could have had a debate on the pros and cons and determined ways and means by which the program may be instituted more effectively, in other words transforming the impact of that program to meet the needs and challenges of the 1980s rather than the 1920s.

I appreciate your tolerance, Mr. Speaker. I realize I have transcended the rules of relevance to some extent. Nevertheless, I feel very strongly about this issue. It is very fundamental and important. If nothing else, I hope that the series of debates that have been created as a result of the deliberations on these very important bills will give us the opportunity to look at some reform in the legislative process and the whole process of dealing with legislation. We could do it in such a way that the programs that are in effect can be applied to modern day realities and perhaps be more relevant and effective. In the process, the role and the power of the elected representatives will be strengthened.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: How could I get by without him? I have the whole caucus in front of me.

I will be very brief. I join with the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) in saying how important the debates have been this afternoon from an educational point of view. If more members had been here, they would perhaps better understand what some of us have been complaining about over the course of the last few months in terms of the process that we go through from time to time. For example, one evening not quite a month ago when dealing with another piece of legislation, I raised the matter of the lack of control which the House of Commons now has over the expenditures of government. The process has so changed since the day Parliament was established that it is now virtually impossible for the average member outside of cabinet to have any real input into the determination of government expenditure.

For that reason alone what we have been doing this afternoon is of considerable value. Maybe for the first time in some years the government, as it is made up of cabinet members, understands there is an additional responsibility to come before the House of Commons and adequately explain the reasons for and the methods to be used in distributing taxpayers' dollars which are often raised over the anguish and sometimes the screams of the taxpayers.

I thank the minister for his explanation of the bill. The purpose of the bill is to do properly what we have been doing quite improperly for some years. It is to put in proper form what was being done without proper legislative authority having been passed by the House of Commons. If we were to sit down at some point in time with the Chair and others and look at the procedures we follow in the House of Commons, that is what we would find.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I indicated earlier to the hon. member for Vegreville that the Chair had a great deal of sympathy for the proposition that the process of legislation, whether it be in terms of the estimates or the normal process of legislation, seems to be in order. I respect the fact that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain appears to want to continue the discussion on the process. I have to say to him the same as I said to the hon. member for Vegreville. It is a legitimate consideration procedurally for the hon. member to consider that subject, but he does need, under the terms of the requirement of relevance, to tie it to the act to amend the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act. If I may, I should like to ask him to consider that.

• (1740)

Mr. Deans: Thank you very much. I appreciate that intervention, mainly because I was just about to end in any event. I was going to end up by saying that I think, having gone through this process, having had the explanation from the minister and having obtained a much clearer understanding of the purpose of the section within the estimates that authorize, at least in the mind of the government, these expenditures in excess of what was approved, many of us will want to take a much closer look in future at the exact wording of what is placed before us. It may well be, I say in closing, that someday we will have the opportunity to take a look at the way in which legislation is put before the House of Commons; this kind of legislation as well as other legislation. Perhaps we will take a look at the processes and procedures to be used and we might even be able to modernize them. We have done a lot of work this afternoon because there has been a great deal of co-operation. It may well be that with a little more openness and understanding, we can get this co-operation more frequently and do a lot more work here.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INCREASE IN ADVANCE PAYMENTS LIMIT

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works) moved that Bill C-72, to amend the National Housing Act, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there are two clauses to the bill. They are very brief and touch upon two operations of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and also implement two very important programs of the National Housing Act. I might say, they are well received in Canada from coast to coast.

The two sections of the National Housing Act involved are Section 34.14(2) which concerns the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, referred to as RRAP, and Section 40(5) which has to do with the production of low rental housing and the acquisition and development of land for housing purposes under federal-provincial agreements. Those are in essence the two clauses: clause 1 dealing with the RRAP program and clause 2 dealing with assisted rental.

Dealing with the first clause, the legislation now provides that the total amount of loans made by the corporation for the purposes of RRAP may not exceed $100 million unless authorized by Parliament. As rehabilitation costs and loan limits have increased over the years, and greater numbers of people have participated, the corporation has had to increase its borrowing in order to continue to finance the program on the government's behalf.

The borrowing limit has been increased over the years by a vote under this estimates. Increases authorized in this way have raised the limit from $100 million to $170 million. Vote L70 in the 1981-82 estimates would have increased the limit by another $59.8 million to a total of $230.5 million, which is the figure in clause 1 of Bill C-72 before us.

In generally describing the program and the increase, I should like to say that scarcely does a day go by that I do not have a request from a member of this House, whether from the government side or from parties opposite. The program is popular and obviously serves a need in the community, as witnessed by the demand. It addresses an aspect of housing which, I think, will take on more significance in the future, that is the repair, maintenance and upkeep of existing stock rather than the direction of new starts in housing which we have witnessed at quite a remarkable strength through the last 20 or 30 years.

The situation regarding Section 40(5), and that relates to the second clause, is similar. The National Housing Act imposes a limit of $150 million on advances obtained by the corporation for meeting its share of the capital cost of federal-provincial housing projects. Over the years, by means of a vote under estimates, this limit has been increased from $150 million to almost $1.4 billion. I think that figure illustrates the need met by such a program under agreements, in co-operation and in conjunction with provincial governments.

I think I should suggest to those people who complain that this government does not have a commitment to assist Canadians with housing that they should well consider that this program is one of the most worth-while programs, although, needless to say, it is very expensive at the rate of $1.4 billion. Although the public housing program is no longer active in all provinces, the section of the act is applied to supporting rural and native housing programs and servicing of lands held by the federal-provincial partnership prior to their sale. Mainly for these reasons the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation sought in the 1981-82 estimates to increase the limits on its borrowings by a further $112.5 million to a total of just over $1.5 billion. Clause 2(a) of Bill C-72 before us specifies the amount of $1,504,500,000.

In conclusion I would like to say, as I began, that these are two very important programs of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. They illustrate and demonstrate the commitment of the government to continued responsibility in housing, and I know that the programs are supported by all members in this House. Otherwise we would not be asking for the increases I have referred to. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

• (1750)

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and address a few remarks to the bill. I will endeavour to make my remarks relevant. I am sure Your Honour will appreciate that in supporting the bill and in making reference to the increase asked for, some of my remarks and suggestions may tend to be a little irrelevant.

However, I want to explain to the House why we are supporting the bill.

The bill is divided into two main parts. The first deals with the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program and the second with public housing.

I listened with great interest to the remarks of the minister. He made reference to requests from all sides of the House for assistance to the public with respect to housing. I appreciate that the requests from his side of the House must be as numerous and worthwhile as those from this side, and I appreciate that the government is paying lip service, in any event, by raising ceilings to a commitment to public housing. However, I would like to say to the minister that the raising of a ceiling does not indicate commitment. What matters is what is done, within the limits this House approves—with the programs the government will bring forward in addition to the current very worth-while programs, to substantiate the spending of money. It is not exactly raising the ceiling but what is supporting the ceiling that hon. members on this side of the House are interested in.

I and others in this House have been very critical of the government with respect to the chaos in the housing sector today. In terms of housing starts, which are technically up but literally down, in April the pre-sales contractors across Canada had translated the housing starts into a boom—on paper—but we know they will flatten out in the latter months of the summer because builders are just not building "spec" houses any more. As a result, emphasis on residential rehabilitation is very important, and for that reason our party is pleased to support this bill.

We also have problems, which the Liberal interest rate policy is causing throughout the country, with respect to mortgage interest rates. The rate is now at a record Liberal high of 18.5 per cent. People are just not buying new homes any more. They are forced to stay where they are, and the maintenance of rental housing is becoming all important to Canada. I point out that we are talking about rehabilitating housing and about vacancy rates; this government has created a real crisis with respect to apartment vacancy rates.

In April, 1979 the vacancy rate in Canada was 3.6 per cent. The acceptable average across Canada is 3 per cent. In April, 1981, by dint of indifference and by a real and determined effort at nothing at all, this government has brought the vacancy rate down to 1.8 per cent. In areas such as metro Toronto, which the minister represents, it is 0.4 per cent. People across Canada are having a difficult time finding places to live. It is no longer a question of adequate and decent shelter; it is a question of finding a place to live. For that reason we are certainly prepared to support this program.

We know that older housing requires extensive renovation. We have reviewed the very excellent report prepared for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation entitled "An evaluation of RRAP," which is the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program. I have looked with interest at some of the recommendations in the report. I note, for example, that the eligibility under RRAP has changed. It is interesting to me as the spokesman for housing on this side of the House that the number one recommendation on page 121 has been adopted by the government, and I commend the government for that. It is also interesting to note that the income limit for family homes has been increased from $6,000 to $9,000. It is very unfortunate that AHOP owners who were led down the garden path in 1976 have found that this very same government—there has been a 50 per cent increase—has decided, instead of using 25 per cent of family income as the upper limit for AHOP eligibility, to raise that limit to 30 per cent. On behalf of the thousands of Canadian home owners who are renewing their mortgages under AHOP I suggest to the government that it would do very well to go back to the standard of 25 per cent on the basis of which these people were inveigled into buying homes and to go back to its original principles and take a hard look at the funding which is provided within this ceiling.

The minister referred to co-operation between federal and provincial levels. We do not want to see the same thing happen to this program that happened to the community services contribution program, under which muncipalities across Canada entered into three-phase programs with the understanding that the Government of Canada would stand behind its commitment to the cities, towns and villages of Canada to provide services. The government pulled out of the program and left municipalities across Canada high and dry looking for funding for two and three-phase programs in which they had become involved at the exhortation of the government. Many municipalities involved in this program have gone to a considerable amount of effort to set up their procedures, and I suggest that the government consider seriously the termination of these programs, if they are terminated, on a very orderly basis.

As far as the public housing part of the bill is concerned, we are supportive of anything this government does to help Canadians find decent, affordable housing in sound community environments. We on this side know that the shelter allowance has been the favourite trial balloon of this government. Shelter allowances have been created and hiked prior to national housing conferences only to have the balloon deflated two weeks later when the conferences were over and all the delegates had gone home. I hope this government under this increased ceiling will take a hard look at shelter allowances, their impact on the municipalities of Canada, just what sort of public funding they have put into place and what sort of co-operation will be required on the part of provincial governments.

We think there is a lot of merit in a shelter allowance program. We want to see the details which will be brought forward, and I hope when we are approving an increase in funding from $150 million to $1,504,500,000 this money will be spent wisely. I can assure the government we will be very interested not only in the ceiling but also in the supports holding up the ceiling in the future. I thank the House for allowing me to address it on this matter.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak briefly about this matter and to address its two main elements. One thing which always concerns me about rehabilitation programs is the way they are apportioned. In the main, given current economic conditions, I think the future will be even more difficult for people.

Let me go back a minute. Generally speaking, rehabilitation programs are undertaken after the sale of a house. Someone purchases a house and decides to modernize it or do some work in it before moving into it. Unless there is a dramatic downturn in interest rates and a new and more innovative way of providing mortgage funds, and unless people are able to assume mortgages at or about 25 per cent of their income, I suspect we will find that a large number of people moving into homes which could qualify under this rehabilitation program will not be able to afford them. I suspect what will happen then is that this will become another program for those ever so slightly more affluent than the average, although I hope that is not so. For those people in the city core because it is the only place they can live, for those in older homes because it is the best they can afford, given the current economic conditions in housing even a program such as this does not provide them with an opportunity for access.

• (1800)

As I said in another debate, I think at some point it might be useful to do a further evaluation of the socio-economic group which is able to take advantage of this rehabilitation program funding to determine whether people on a limited income but who want to own a home of their own can gain access to a program such as this for the purpose of upgrading, improving and thereby stabilizing some of the core areas of our larger cities. I am sure my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hudecki) can think of such areas in his own riding, as I can in mine, where rehabilitation programs would be very worthwhile. We would want to encourage people to undertake the kind of rehabilitation that will keep the houses in a good state of repair so that they are an asset to the owner and the community. The unfortunate part, as I am sure my colleague will agree with me, is that for a large number of people living in those areas the thought of assuming yet another financial burden is impossible. They just cannot do it.

So while we support the program and understand that additional funding is a necessity given the changing times, I say to the minister we think a serious look should be taken at who is able to take advantage of it and at the ways it can be better utilized, and then perhaps we should consider setting down some additional guidelines for that portion of this expenditure and for public housing in general.

I want to talk about that for a moment because I think it is a vital area of concern. Given the economic conditions I have just spoken about, I suspect that unless we see some very dramatic changes in house prices and mortgage interest rates, there will be an overwhelming growth in the need for public housing. Large numbers of people who have never considered public housing will be put in a position of having to make that choice. I do not think that is necessarily a bad choice, but they will have to do it despite their own preference. I say to the minister that this $1.5 billion, though it is a substantial sum, will pale into insignificance over the course of the next decade when measured against the dollars needed to provide the public housing units required to meet the rapidly increasing demand which will result from the other more general government policies directly affecting housing.

I think housing, like health, education and food, has to be given priority by the government. It cannot be dealt with in a frivolous or thoughtless way. It cannot just be allowed to happen by some mystic means. We cannot leave it up to the private sector to grapple with the ever-increasing costs of providing housing. We know full well we are not keeping pace with what the demand is undoubtedly going to be. I think every member of this House believes, Mr. Speaker, that owning a home is part of the Canadian heritage, if you will. Those people who were able to move from public housing into their own home will not be able to do that in the future. Therefore, there is no doubt in my mind that the future will require that we look seriously at new and innovative ways of developing a housing bank, if you will, which will provide an opportunity for people to buy a home at a price they can afford and in an area where they would like to live.

I can see the changes taking place now, as I am sure every member of this House can, changes in the metropolitan areas owing to the fact there is a money crunch and there are fewer and fewer rental accommodations being built and fewer and fewer people able to enter the housing market because of the problem of trying to meet their commitments in the face of the tremendous costs being levied against home ownership.

I hope we will have from the minister in the near future some exciting new and innovative housing policies. I say to him that MURBs do not really count in this. That program does not even begin to address the problems because the people I speak about will just not be able to move into even that kind of housing. While this change appears to be very significant on the surface, when you look at it in comparison to the expenditures of last year and the year before, it is not as dramatic a change as you might think. I suspect it will do little more than enable the housing corporation to keep pace with inflation and do something marginal in terms of meeting the ever-increasing demand.

We must rethink our entire policy as it relates to housing for people. What we have before us met the needs of another era. It met the needs of an era when 25 per cent of an individual's income was enough to purchase a home. Nowadays 25 per cent of a single income would hardly get one into an apartment, let alone allow one to buy a home. Since we are part of the problem, we have an obligation to make an effort to become part of the solution.

The over-all economic conditions may well ameliorate over time. Perhaps things will improve, but I suspect the improvement will be gradual and that it will not enable a large number of people to attain for themselves what we would all like to see for every Canadian family, that is, not that they necessarily purchase homes for themselves but at least that they have the opportunity to do so.

This program will be under serious pressure. The minister should devote a great deal of his time between now and next fall to preparing for the onslaught. I am certain there will be a major debate in the House next fall. At least there will be a debate among the public of Canada who cannot find places to stay at prices they can afford. There will be major debate on why the government has allowed housing to become a luxury rather than a necessity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I will recognize the hon. Minister of Public Works if the House gives its unanimous consent, because under the House order there is no opportunity for the minister to speak.

Mr. Knowles: It was agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Shall the minister be granted the opportunity to speak?

Mr. Knowles: It was part of the order.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I take it there is consent.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Speaker, I thank you and hon. members opposite who have spoken on this housing bill. In particular I thank them for their support for the increase identified under the two programs respecting residential rehabilitation and public housing. I believe both speakers who preceded me identified the demand and the need. There has been recognition that the cumulative costs from year to year represent a significant undertaking by the government.

Generally I should like to speak to an issue which was raised by both speakers, that is, the role of the provinces. Recently in Ottawa I had an opportunity to meet with my counterparts, the provincial ministers responsible for housing. I drew to their attention the fact that the government had made some moves by increasing budgets and taking new steps in response to difficult times. I asked where was the provincial response, for example, to the MURB or to the government moving toward increasing its commitment under AHOP and ARP. Admittedly it is not sufficient by the calculation of some hon. members, but nonetheless it is an increase by the government. I made an observation concerning the provincial response to the difficult time we are experiencing in housing. If all provinces responded in the same way to the situation, if the unevenness in the provincial response were eliminated, they would be addressing regional pressures brought about by the movement of people from one province to another.

As I have indicated, rehabilitation offers a very important potential for the future housing industry. It is for that reason that CMHC reports monthly on statistics showing starts and activities in new housing. They will be reporting this month for the first time, and quarterly thereafter, on the experience across the country regarding residential rehabilitation.

I should like to offer some comfort to the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans). Although he is fearful that people at all income levels are not taking advantage of the residential rehabilitation potential, if he compared the first quarter of this year with the first quarter of last year he would find that there has been threefold increase in activity nationally. In conclusion, I know there has been criticism about the MURB provision reintroduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in his budget, that it did not encompass people with modest incomes. It was not designed to cover that group. For example, the move to increase the number of housing starts under section 56(1) was a tailor-made response of the government to that area. I thank the House for its indulgence.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As the House knows, the government House leader moved an order with respect to House business, which was seconded by myself and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, to accommodate hon. members who wished to attend the interdenominational service for the late Terry Fox. We have made amazing progress today. As a matter of fact we have considered two of the matters we expected to deal with tomorrow. Would it not now be appropriate for the House to adjourn so that members could prepare for the event later this evening?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I should like to support that suggestion. In fact, it occurs to me that since we have done two days of work in one, we might even adjourn until Monday so that the two or three of us who are present could attend the NDP convention in Vancouver. In any case, perhaps the minister could respond by either agreeing or telling us what we will do tomorrow.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I intended to give notice of a very important bill for consideration tomorrow related to the widows of veterans.

Mr. Knowles: We shall stay, we shall stay!

• (1820)

Mr. Pinard: But under the circumstances I will agree to the suggestion made by my hon. colleague from Nepean-Carleton. For the time being, let us call it seven o'clock, and I will take into serious consideration the offer just made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. We might be in a position to make a decision on that later on tonight or tomorrow morning.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the event we are back tomorrow, I do not know how one will communicate a decision, but in any event I anticipate the business will be Bill C-58, Bill S-12 and Bill C-12, in that order. Is my anticipation correct?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: We cannot hide anything from my hon. colleague.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair understands that pursuant to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the House will adjourn until Monday. That is subject to correction. It may be the Chair is instructed to see the clock as seven o'clock. Is that more accurate?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being seven o'clock, I do now leave the chair until tomorrow morning at 11 a.m.

At 6.22 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

PARLIAMENT

NOMINATION OF SENATORS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise concerning the disgraceful, Machiavellian manoeuvring of politics and Parliament crassly committed yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) through the elevation of the Senate of his canoeing pal from Spadina in an attempt to prepare a path to this House for Toronto's little cherub, James Coutts, first of the flunkies to precede the Prime Minister's own delayed departure. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House condemns the shameless playing with power for political purposes by the Prime Minister, his abusive actions of snickering at the Senate while filling it with friends, flunkies and worn-out sacred cows of the Liberal party and making a mockery of our political system for his own autocratic ends and, finally, requests the Prime Minister to advise us immediately when the next exodus is to be made by Michael Pitfield to the position of Undersecretary of State for External Affairs.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

ACTION NECESSARY TO END STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of importance under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Due to the fact that the nation-wide postal strike, now in its fourth day, is already causing major problems, financial in particular, for thousands of Canadian businessmen and private citizens, and because the Canadian Union of Postal Workers' authority to call a strike was apparently voted on by less than half the union membership, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the government accept its responsibility to the people of Canada and put an end to the strike, either by appropriate action at the bargaining table or through back to work legislation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

EXTENSION OF MURB PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Apartment vacancy rates in Canada have shown a steady decline over the last two years. The government has stated that the re-introduction of the MURB program for one year would alleviate the problem. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley):

That the government extend the MURB provisions to at least December 31, 1982, so that builders can properly plan development projects which will ease the vacancy rate problem in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

CONCILIATION BOARD REPORT AS BASIS FOR STRIKE SETTLEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House requests both parties in the current Post Office dispute to accept the conciliation board report as a basis for settlement and return to the bargaining table in an effort to reach an agreement on all other contentious matters.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DELAY IN PROCESSING PENSION APPLICATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that it is now 13 months since figures were released by the War Amputations of Canada indicating that almost 50 veterans a year are dying before their pension applications are processed, and in view of the fact that the government has done nothing to speed up the processing of pension applications, which now on average takes three years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Haldimand-Norfolk (Mr. Bradley):

That this House instruct the Prime Minister to name a full-time Minister of Veterans Affairs now, and that the newly appointed minister be instructed to retain the Canadian Pension Commission in Ottawa.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

EFFECT OF STRIKE ON SMALL BUSINESSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of great concern to many Canadians. Considering that the purpose of government policies and agencies is theoretically to assist and not impair Canadians in pursuit of legitimate goals; considering that many small business enterprises, already imperilled by this government's high interest rate policy, are further threatened by the unhappy situation in the government-operated Post Office; and considering that many small business enterprises such as Beaven's Custom Cannery in Summerland, British Columbia, are seasonal enterprises and that any disruption in normal mail communication with customers at this time threatens the entire annual production and profitability, without which the business must fail; I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That immediate steps be taken to get the mails moving again, if necessary through back to work legislation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AVIATION SAFETY

CURTAILMENT OF AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL SERVICES AT CALGARY INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given that the responsibility to provide adequate financial and human resources to maintain the integrity of Canada's air traffic control system lies with the federal government, and since air traffic control services at the Calgary International Airport will be curtailed between the hours of 12 midnight and 6 a.m. effective July 4 because of insufficient numbers of air traffic controllers, thereby seriously impairing the ability to provide positive separation between aircraft and aircraft and surface vehicles, as well as raising serious questions of legal liability, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington):

● (1110)

That the minister take immediate steps to maintain full 24-hour air traffic control services at Calgary International and that emergency steps be taken to fill the 22 vacant ATC positions in Vancouver, 12 in Calgary, 15 in Edmonton, 58 in Toronto, 50 in Montreal, and 20 in Gander, plus an additional 75 controllers in other points in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

FAILURE TO ANNOUNCE PRICE FOR WHEAT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The failure of the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, Senator Hazen Argue, to announce a new price for wheat leaves the grain farmer in a very uncertain position in regard to delivery. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House call on the minister to fulfil his responsibilities to the farmers and announce a new price immediately so as to give farmers adequate time to make a business-like decision on deliveries of grain.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TREATMENT OF RETIRED EMPLOYEES—CALL FOR AUTOMATIC INDEXING OF PENSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and seconded by my loyal colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), I move:

That this House calls on the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Labour to inform Canadian National Railways that their treatment of their retired employees and their survivors is unfair and unsatisfactory, that it is not good enough just to make an occasional adjustment for selected groups of pensioners, but that the CNR should institute immediately the automatic and guaranteed escalation, equivalent at least to the rise in the cost of living, of all pensions paid to former employees or to their survivors.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

LAPSING OF NEW BRUNSWICK PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas DREE subsidiary programs with New Brunswick in tourism, highways and industry have lapsed without renewal, and whereas the peak of the short season in outdoor construction and tourism is rapidly approaching I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the Minister of DREE and the President of the Treasury Board be directed to renew these programs immediately for one more year during which a thorough evaluation and negotiated renewal or substitution can be effected.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF FUEL REBATE PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on an important issue. Great Lakes fishermen over the past number of years have seen a decline and in fact near extinction of whitefish, herring and blue pickerel. This year the perch catch has not been spectacular. That, combined with increased costs in equipment, nets, workers and fuel, has put an unacceptable burden on this group of providers. Fuel increases over the past year just cannot be offset by increases in fish prices. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That the House direct the government to implement immediately a fuel rebate program for the fishing industry, in order to save this valuable source of food.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

LEVEL OF FOREIGN RESERVES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance and touches, of course, on the news this morning that our foreign reserves have fallen to the lowest level in ten years. Would the minister indicate to the House why that has occurred and is it in fact government policy to run with such slim reserves backing our dollar? In short, what level do ministers intend to maintain? They are down to almost $3 billion now; is that the level they hope to maintain, or are they content to see reserves slip away to the $2 billion, or $1 billion level, or even less?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I must say I am surprised at the hon. member suggesting the reserves might be at a low level. I regard them as being in a very healthy condition, particularly when one looks at the gold holdings in the amount of $842 million at book value. If they were shown at market value it would increase the reserves to an extraordinary high level.

● (1115)

EFFECT OF ENERGY PRICING DISPUTE

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, as I indicated, the reserves are at an historically low level, certainly over the last ten years. In relation to our trade they are at a very, very low percentage of our total activity.

Let me put my second question touching on this matter to the Minister of Finance. Bill Jarvis, an economist with Informetrica, stated that investor uncertainty over Canadian policies, especially in energy, is continuing to put our dollar under pressure and that a solution to the energy dispute between Ottawa and Alberta would go a long way toward strengthening the dollar and the reserves. If the government could settle the energy question, is it not true that it would relieve the outgo of Canadian dollars considerably, an outgo on petroleum products alone which was up 36 per cent in May of this year compared with May, 1980, due largely to the almost ludicrous position taken by the federal government of being willing to buy from a foreigner but not from our provinces such as British Columbia or Alberta?

Hon Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not want to be contentious with the hon. member about foreign exchange reserves, but I would suggest that when he compares the reserves of ten years ago he might look at the comparative prices for gold and translate into current market value the reserves of gold which we hold at the present time. But that is by way of suggesting that the hon. member reconsider his point.

With respect to the energy settlement, it is as clear to me, as it is to others, that there would be a number of benefits flowing from an energy settlement including, we would hope, the end of production cutbacks which are putting additional strain on our balance of payments. That in itself would improve the situation.

Furthermore, an energy settlement would remove an uncertainty which presently exists, and that would be helpful. It is for these reasons that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his counterpart in Alberta have been working very constructively in their last meetings in order to reach an energy settlement.

RATE OF INFLATION IN GERMANY

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, again my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. You will recall that in answer to a question yesterday dealing with high interest rates in this country, higher than any of the other six main industrialized nations, the minister came back with the odd comment that he had found in Germany that interest rates on a real basis were also at the highest level they had ever been in Germany. We must be encouraged that the minister has started to take a look at the economy of Germany. Has he also noticed that since 1973 Germany has run with an inflation level approximately half our inflation level, and an unemployment level approximately half the unemployment level of this country? Does he feel he could perhaps learn from what the Germans have been doing in running their economy, and run a better economy here with lower interest rates and certainly lower inflation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has again drawn attention to his conclusion that Canada is running the highest interest rates of any country in the world. If he looked today at the prime rate between Canada and the United States, or compared both rates, he would find that they are about the same. If he looked at the short-term rates, commercial paper in the United States, he would find that in the last week its rates have increased to some extent and that our comparable rates have dropped.

If the hon. member put some stock in comparing performances among industrialized countries, he ought to be impressed by the fact that job creation in Canada on a year-to-year basis has been the highest of any industrialized country in the world, including Germany. That, to me, is a rather important fact which he is overlooking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSING

ACTION TO STIMULATE CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for housing who will know that last year Canada had the lowest number of housing starts in years. He will also know that high mortgage interest rates have severely affected the number of housing starts this year. Builders are reluctant to enter into building programs which would alleviate the low vacancy rates in multiple unit dwellings. Last year at this time the mortgage interest rate was 13 per cent. It is now running at 18.5 per cent. What new action is the government taking to stimulate housing starts in the forthcoming months?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, what the hon. member omitted to tell us in the introduction to his question was that although last year housing starts were at an exceptionally low level, seasonally-adjusted, for example, for the month of June at 125,000, a 15-year low, in the first quarter of this year there was an equally remarkable turn-around resulting in the seasonally adjusted rate for the month of March being somewhere over 242,000 which is a five-year record high for building starts in this country.

I know that most members who watch the industry know that the ups and downs are not really desirable. They certainly do not bring stability to the industry. It is our hope that the strength of the industry which has been demonstrated is one which will continue. It is our observation that the action taken by the Minister of Finance through the reintroduction of MURBs, a provision which was thought unnecessary and was dropped by the government of the hon. member's party when it was in office, is part of the bounce-back of the industry.

FORECAST OF DECLINE IN HOUSING STARTS

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The minister made reference to the seasonally adjusted starts in the first quarter of this year. Mr. Frank Clayton, a recognized expert in the housing field, has said it is hard to believe responsible government spokespersons have actually taken this position in public. Would the minister not agree that the housing starts which took place in April and May of this year were pre-sales which were made when interest rates were much lower than they are today, and that builders arranged those mortgages when rates were much lower than they are today? Would the minister also not agree with Mr. Clayton's statement that a sharp deterioration in housing starts is unavoidable in the coming months if interest rates continue in the 18.5 per cent bracket?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I would not join in the hon. member's pessimism about the industry. I certainly do not share the pessimistic view he takes from his selective editing of Mr. Clayton's statements. If he goes on and reads Mr. Clayton's statements he will see that he projects starts at somewhere around 180,000 for this year. That number is in line with what CMHC has projected for this year and, in my view, it is a response to the strength and the need demonstrated in the market. I really see no reason for pessimism when the need and the response to it are parallel.

SOCIAL SECURITY

MINISTER'S COMMITMENTS TO IMPROVE PENSIONS FOR WOMEN

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that it is now a year since Parliament passed the bill which added $35 a month to the guaranteed income supplement, and in view of the fact that three months have gone by since the holding of the National Pension Conference, does the minister not agree that it is time she obtained the government's support for some of her commitments to our older people, particularly by bringing in pension improvements and adjustments for women between the ages of 60 and 65, or 55 and 65, especially those who are alone and who, as the minister knows, are in greatest need?

• (1125)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I know, Madam Speaker, that women in particular, and unemployed people between age 50 or 55 to the age of retirement, do face an unwritten discrimination in employment, and do have the greatest difficulties, often having to go from unemployment insurance benefits to welfare. I realize that. However, my commitment which I have given to Canadians is and has always been the same.

I have recognized that were it not for constitutional matters we would not be capable of entering that field in the future in which I will live. That is what I have always acknowledged. I have always asked Canadians to accept that the first target group and the first priority, which is the policy of this government, should be the people over 65 who still lack money in order to be, once and for all, above the poverty line. I have always added that we cannot do that in the immediate future. It will be as soon as the economy picks up. That is the commitment I have given to Canadians.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER PRESS FOR ACTION BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder if the Minister of National Health and Welfare has paid attention to the statements the Minister of Finance makes day after day about the economy being strong. If there are the billions of dollars of money in this country, should the Minister of National Health and Welfare not make sure that the burden of any financial difficulty the government has is not borne by older people? Does she not believe in some redistribution and some sharing? Should she not be pressing for action now instead of claiming that we cannot improve pensions in a time of restraint?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is a great casuist. I am the victim of that casuistry right now. However, he knows and we on this side all know that as soon as the economy picks up, and I see the colour of the hundreds of millions of dollars that we need, he can be sure that I will be back at the door of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MacEachen: Hear, hear!

MINISTER'S ROLE IN ADVOCATING INCOME TAX REFORMS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, not only has the Minister of National Health and Welfare made the commitments to older people to which she has referred today, but she has been a very strong advocate of serious reform of our income tax laws, bearing in mind that at the present time the government hands out all kinds of subsidies to people who do not need them. What progress is she making in persuading the Minister of Finance to bring in the kind of income tax reforms in which she believes?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): May I answer that I wish I knew the exact answer to that, in the sense that the hon. member knows very well that the preparation of the budget and the decision-making process regarding budgetary measures, and, of course, income tax changes, belong to the Minister of Finance under our British parliamentary system. I think it is obvious that on this side of the House most people, if not all, have recommended that certain income tax changes could be made which would be more progressive for social justice and equity. However, we all know, and I cannot hide it from Canadians in my answer, that other families who are well off will have to suffer for that in terms of redistribution to those in the lower-income brackets. That is the price to pay. I, personally, like many others on this side, recommend it strongly.

Mr. Knowles: The time is now.

Oral Questions

POST OFFICE

INTRODUCTION OF BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and relates to statements made this morning in the Montreal Gazette and on "Canada A.M.", quoting unnamed Liberal MPs and a Liberal cabinet minister to the effect that back to work legislation would be introduced to settle the postal strike before Parliament rises for the summer. In light of statements made in the House yesterday by the President of the Treasury Board that such legislation was not contemplated at this time, and the much stronger statement by the Postmaster General that the government was prepared to wait until a settlement of the strike was reached at the bargaining table, through you, Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the government has a common policy with respect to back to work legislation. If so, what is it specifically? Do we have one policy being followed by the minister responsible for bargaining, another policy being followed by the minister responsible for the Post Office, and still another being promised and followed by certain other members of cabinet and the Liberal caucus?

● (1130)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have that quote from the Montreal Gazette that the hon. member refers to, and I see no indication here, but perhaps I have not read it all, that any members of cabinet have taken a contrary view to that of—

Mr. Nielsen: On "Canada A.M." this morning.

Mr. Trudeau: I have to listen to that too.

Mr. Nielsen: Believe Richard Gwynn.

Mr. Stevens: You never know what they are doing to you.

Mr. Trudeau: I will tell you, Madam Speaker, that both ministers were speaking on behalf of the government yesterday and I am prepared to repeat that position which is clearly the government's position. I do not know if backbenchers have or have not expressed contrary views, and to what party they belong.

I do know that cabinet has taken the position that the President of the Treasury Board and his officials have made a very fair offer. It is an offer which would give the letter sorters something like $25,000 per year. We think that is a fair offer and we think it should be discussed. We are sorry and regretful that the union negotiators have refused to come to the table to even discuss this. We have taken the clear position that there is no intention to settle this strike by legislation. It will, and should be settled by the bargaining process.

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, I suppose we should recognize that the Prime Minister has sent his newspaper reader to Spadina and now he is going to have to learn to read newspapers himself.

QUERY RESPECTING DURATION OF STRIKE

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Postmaster General. In the last 24 hours, through no fault of theirs, he has had to lay off letter carriers and truck drivers, but he took almost no action last weekend or before the strike to avert it. May I ask him how long this unfortunate strike must go on before he will assume his responsibility to ensure that his employees can get back to work and that the people of Canada can have the return of their mail service?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the letter carriers are off duty status for the present time. That is quite understandable because there is a lack of work. In answering the question of the hon. member, I will repeat what I said yesterday, that this will end as soon as the two parties get back to the table and negotiate a settlement. We hope that will be soon.

DOMINION CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT

DATE OF HEARING RESPECTING SPADINA ELECTION RESULT

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the announcement yesterday of the appointment to the other place of Peter Stollery, will the Prime Minister indicate to the House whether he was aware that a trial date had been set for next September 14 for the hearing of a petition under the Controverted Elections Act, the result of which might well void the election of Mr. Stollery of February 18, 1980, and was the Prime Minister aware that the trial date of September 14 next for the hearing of that petition was set, notwithstanding that the first judgment in this matter, which the government lost, was dated May 7 of last year, over a year ago?

What is the explanation for the timing of the Prime Minister's announcement? Why is he following this course within two months of the hearing of that petition? Is it to nullify the court action or to deny the petitioner his day in court? What is the explanation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I was not aware of that particular date. I was aware of the case which had been taken under the Controverted Elections Act. The House will remember that the basis of the action was because the then Clark government called an election and the electoral officer, under the direction of the order in council, set a specific date for an election. These are actions for which the party opposite was responsible. It is astonishing to me that, having lost not only the general election but the particular election in Spadina, they should be faulting a process of which they were the initiators.

Regardless of that, the object of the action before the courts is to declare the election void, and to create a new election, a byelection. I am saving the hon. members' lawyers money, and the country time, by calling the byelection that they want to obtain. What more could they ask for?

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister should get a prize for that one!

TIMING OF BYELECTION

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam speaker, the Prime Minister has used the correct terminology; it was a petition to declare the election void with all of the consequences that would retroactively flow from that kind of decision if it occurred next September 14. That would include the right of the particular hon. member to draw a parliamentary salary since February 18, 1980, and his right to cast votes in the House of Commons. Those matters have still to be decided on September 14 and will flow naturally from a result in favour of the petitioner. The Prime Minister cannot explain his timing by that red herring.

He still has not answered the question which I will put to him again, Madam Speaker. Will be explain his timing? Why did he not wait until after the trial of that petition before calling this byelection? Why did he not wait until afterwards? Has he the same plans for the other two ridings, where at least in one of them, Guelph, there is a Liberal member? Is it his plan to follow a similar course there and in Scarborough Centre, both of which ridings have petitions before the court of a similar nature to that in Spadina? Who will be running in those byelections—Michael Pitfield and what other minion?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member seems to be answering his own questions. There are two other court cases, from what he says, and surely the courts should be left free to come to their final decisions which might—

Mr. Nielsen: Why not this one?

Mr. Trudeau: It might take months and years, I suppose, before the appeal takes place. Once again, it is really strange that the hon. member is complaining about this particular byelection when we know that the object of their action is to cause a byelection to be held.

Mr. Nielsen: That is up to the Speaker.

Mr. Trudeau: If the courts in the other cases decide that, in a sense, the election was illegally held, I would hope that the hon. member opposite and his party would indemnify the country for the mischief they caused by calling the election in this illegal way.

In so far as the timing of this particular one in Spadina is concerned, Madam Speaker, it is well known that I am planning to leave public life and I am hastening to put a good man like Jim Coutts into Parliament. I hope the electors will see it this way.

Oral Questions

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

PRIMARY HIGHWAY PROGRAM IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Has he yet taken a decision, which I hope will be a favourable one, on moving forward with phase two of the primary highway strengthening and improvement program in the Atlantic provinces? If he has not taken that decision, can he indicate when one might be made?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the decision to extend or not to extend the highway strengthening program has not been made. To be frank, however, I think I should add that I doubt that when it is made it will be a positive one. In other words, I do not think the program will be extended.

Instead of that, we are developing now with Newfoundland and with the maritime provinces, all encompassing transportation programs covering all modes of transportation. Progress is being made to that effect, and if that goes through, as it appears it will, some savings will be made from the $500 million a year that the federal government spends in the Atlantic provinces on transportation at the moment. If savings can be made, I have good reason to believe that the cabinet would accept that a certain amount of new money should be allocated for a strengthening of highways program.

● (1140)

Mr. Howie: Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. Undoubtedly savings will be made, but fewer facilities will be in place.

GOVERNMENT DECISION ON UNIVERSITY OF NEW BRUNSWICK FORESTRY RESEARCH COMPLEX

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of the Environment. Has the government taken a decision to support the concept of promoting research and development in forestry through a forestry complex at the University of New Brunswick in conjunction with the province, the university, and the private sector? Is it the intention of the government to erect a building in the complex to house federal forestry research facilities? If so, can the minister tell me when?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, this is a matter that we have under very active consideration. I can tell the hon. member that no definitive decision has yet been taken.

Mr. Howie: When? We have been waiting over a year.

Oral Questions

TRANSPORT

PILOT RAPID TRANSIT PROJECT IN HAMILTON, ONT.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. At the moment a decision is pending on the building of a pilot rapid transit project in the City of Hamilton under the auspices, primarily, of the provincial government, but supported financially by the federal government. Will the minister undertake a review of the project personally, or at least have it done in his ministry and reported to him, to determine exactly what traffic problems this pilot project is intended to solve and what the cost will be to the citizens of Hamilton to maintain it in years to come when the federal and provincial grant structure no longer provides money for it?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, this is a project on which we are working co-operatively with other federal departments. With respect to federal participation, there has been no final decision on that as yet. I will certainly be happy to have the issues looked into which my hon. friend has raised. They are important considerations which should be taken into account in connection with any ultimate federal decision.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, how come the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce answered? I was trying to stay away from him.

CITY'S EAST-WEST TRAFFIC CONGESTION

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, in addition to looking at what traffic problems it might resolve, would the minister consider the problems of east-west traffic congestion, which is much worse in the city of Hamilton than the congestion which this may well be intended to resolve? Rather than funding this project, at whatever level the funding might be available, could the minister determine whether the federal government might fund the purchase and the development of a much better local transit system than that which exists now in an effort to solve some of the congestion that confronts us every day?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, this matter can certainly be looked into in the course of deciding whether or not there should be federal participation. I might add that we perceive the federal role as being to enhance the over all trade development, both domestic and overseas, of our urban transit technology, and also enhancing our capacity to develop a strong industry in that field rather than simply subsidizing urban transit. In that context I will certainly have my hon. friend's question examined.

NATIONAL REVENUE

RETURN OF INCOME TAX REFUNDS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. It arises out of the answer given by the Prime Minister with respect to the intentions of the government concerning the mail strike. It now appears to be the intention of the government to allow the matter to go to the bargaining table. Frankly, I think there is very little hope of that and that some day we will have to legislate these people back to work. But there is a problem, and it is a specific one.

There have been several calls to members of Parliament concerning refunds due to individual Canadians for personal income tax paid. Inquiries have been made in an attempt to receive those cheques through the offices of the Minister of National Revenue. People have been told they will not receive those cheques until the mail strike has ended. Others are being told that the emergency plan of the department is so complicated that the problem can really not be dealt with. Would the minister assure the House that he will look into this problem immediately? If there is a plan to provide those refund cheques to Canadians, will the minister assure us he will implement the plan immediately and advise the House what his intentions are with respect to that matter, because I can tell him that it is a problem in his department?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. We have already addressed that problem. I have consulted with my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services. Our cheques are normally sent to his divisional offices across the country. We are presently working on a scheme whereby they can be made available to people who deserve and need them. I might say that right now emergency services are in place should a person need a cheque for emergency purposes. In addition to that we are exploring the possibility of delivering the refund cheques all across the country.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his answer. It appears that the refund cheques are now being considered socioeconomic payments, at least in so far as the process that is being devised for distribution of the cheques is concerned.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENT CHEQUES DURING POSTAL STRIKE

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. Many of us are receiving calls with respect to delivery of cheques. I know there are some difficulties in giving a detailed answer during question period, but could the minister advise us, to the extent he can within the confines of question period, of the programs that are in place for the distribution of the various federal governments cheques? If that is not possible, would the minister be prepared to table a document in the House of Commons perhaps today or, if not, in the early part of next week, so that all members will be able to advise their constituents by telephone rather than by mail?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his question. I might indicate to him that the government will ensure that all socioeconomic cheques, including family allowance, old age security, general income supplements, as well as all the pension cheques including war veterans allowances, will be made available to recipients.

All the cheques that were due during the month of June have been delivered. They have all been received. As for the cheques due in July, there is a plan in place that will be implemented.

Negotiations are now going on between the Postmaster General and the letter carriers' union to ascertain whether once the cheques have been sorted they will be delivered. If the outcome of that is not successful, we have a fall-back position which is already identified and will be put in place. I have directed a letter to all members of the House advising them of the measures we are contemplating so that members can advise their constituents. That letter was mailed yesterday—

Miss Bégin: Mailed?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: It was not mailed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: It was distributed throughout the House of Commons yesterday. I might also advise the hon. gentleman that we have an advertising campaign to tell people generally how cheques are to be distributed.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, in fact, the system is already set up to deliver throughout Canada all the federal government social benefit cheques, namely, family allowance cheques, old age security cheques and Canada pension cheques. Furthermore my officials are in consultation with their provincial counterparts to provide assistance if need be for the delivery of provincial cheques to the recipients.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—BAN ON LANDING OF LIGHT AIRCRAFT

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Two weeks ago today I asked the minister a question about the NOTAM issued prohibiting aircraft under 7,000 pounds from landing at the Toronto International Airport for a period of eight hours in daylight. I am afraid at that time the minister was not aware of what I was talking about.

I am sure by now he has been made aware of the meeting which took place at Toronto International Airport attended by many businessmen. I am sure that he is aware of the flood of letters he has received as well as the flood of letters I have received regarding the shutdown of this airport for eight hours during the day from now until November. Can the minister tell me whether he has had a change of heart and whether any changes will be made to that statement?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member should indicate why these measures are being taken. They are being taken because a runway and a taxiway are being constructed. It is not antagonism to general aviation on the part of the department or of the minister. We try to limit inconvenience to the greatest extent possible.

At the moment there are exceptions to that. Last night, however, I signed many pieces of authorization paper and inasmuch as it is possible permission will be given to use the runway, notwithstanding the restrictions now in existence.

● (1150)

EFFECT OF RESTRICTION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I understand there is some construction going on this year. The NOTAM specifically states it is to be closed next year as well. I know of no plan for construction for next year. A company that has three aircraft, two of which fall into that category, would normally used them to fly into Toronto International, but it is now forced to fly its larger aircraft at much greater expense in energy and cost to that airport, simply to pick up parts because of this particular NOTAM. Surely there must be some other way of doing this than just categorically stopping all aircraft under 7,000 pounds.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the reality of this is that when you change a runway, construct a runway, repair it or a taxi-way, you have to take measures restricting general aviation. One confrere of my hon. friend said in the House the other day—some months ago—it was his feeling that the major airports should not be used by general aviation when there are problems with regard to runway capacity, as there is in the Toronto area. Other people accept the limitations on general freedom of aviation at airports as busy as Toronto is, he said. We are trying to minimize these difficulties. There is the problem with the reconstruction of the runway and taxi-way now.

The exceptions I was referring to were exactly related to the situation described by my hon. friend, that is, when there are urgent cases, hardship cases, exceptions can be made. The law says that the minister has to sign the exception forms and I spent half an hour the other day signing these papers so that urgent or emergency cases could be attended to in a proper way.

Oral Questions

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

FUNDING FOR NATIONAL SCIENCES AND ENGINEERING RESEARCH COUNCIL

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology, and it concerns the belated additional funding for the National Sciences and Engineering Research Council. When I asked the minister about this funding in February he said he expected to make an announcement in March. When I asked him about it in March he said April, and when I asked him about it in April he said May. It is now July and there has still been no announcement. Is the minister in a position to give us a definite commitment as to when the additional funding to NSERC will be made?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Yes, Madam Speaker. Next week.

AVIATION SAFETY

SHORTAGE OF AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question for the Minister of Transport arises from the critical shortage of air traffic controllers in Canada. Yesterday, in response to a question he indicated that a new training system will produce between 120 and 150 air traffic controllers per year. That will not satisfy the immediate requirement of 250 air traffic controllers in Vancouver, Calgary, Toronto, Montreal and Gander. In view of the fact there is a very major urgency to acquire additional controllers at the present time and, further, that some 1,036 air traffic controllers will be required by the year 1985-86, and under the minister's formula or training program only about half the required controllers will be produced, is the minister reconsidering his plan of action?

In view of the fact that we are now faced with shutdowns at the Calgary International Airport, and perhaps others in the future, is the minister reconsidering his program of action and, if so, when will he be in a position to bring such a program before the House?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I thought I answered the question rather well yesterday. I recognized that there was a problem. The problem is not of the magnitude my hon. friend says it is. I observe that he has bought the CATCA figures as to the number of air controllers that are needed. These figures are not accepted by the department. Apparently they are quite exaggerated. This problem existed when my hon. friend was Minister of Transport. It is not a new problem.

What I indicated yesterday was that a number of measures had been taken in terms of methods of recruitment of candidates, in terms of adequacy of personnel and facilities to train them, and in terms, for example, of developing with the provinces better ways of preparing young people for the job. All kinds of things have been developed to the point that we are now in the position to say that by next year, instead of graduating 50 air controllers a year, the number will be raised to 120 new air traffic controllers.

An hon. Member: And that is bilingual.

Mr. Pepin: Yes, indeed, special efforts are being given to the bilingual aspect of the operation.

While recognizing that there is a problem I think I have indicated sufficiently well that measures were being taken to remedy it in the fastest possible way. Apparently it takes a number of years to train a controller. We cannot mass produce them with some pill that could be distributed around.

CURTAILMENT OF SERVICES AT CALGARY INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, the minister does not have to accept the version of CATCA, but the fact of the matter is that their statements have in fact become reality today and that is why we are faced with the curtailment of services at places like the Calgary International, and we may face them at the Vancouver International Airport. With respect to Calgary, does the minister accept or reject the allegation by the air traffic controllers that the curtailment of air traffic services in Calgary during the period from 12 a.m. to 6 a.m. will prevent the adequate separation of aircraft, and will not provide adequate facilities to ensure that there is adequate separation between aircraft and vehicles on the ground? Furthermore, would he accept the fact that CATCA suggests that the curtailment of those services could very well create a question of legal liability for the individual supervisor involved in the Department of Transport in the event of an incident or an accident?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am sure it is not without consideration for all these potential difficulties that the department took the position it took. My hon. friend asked me yesterday to make sure that conversations or discussions would take place with the Calgary Transportation Authority. These have taken place. Following a conversation the members and I had yesterday I am going to insist that they should continue. Efforts are being made to find trainees to take into the system at the Calgary airport.

My hon. friend corrected me yesterday because I had said that the damage to traffic would not be as great as he had said. I said that it involved the movement of two or three planes an hour during the night. He corrected me by saying it was 20 planes over the whole period. If you multiply six hours by two or three planes an hour it gives you exactly the same number. All this is to say that we recognize there is a problem there, and I am going to follow up on the questions my hon. friend is raising in order to try to alleviate inconveniences to the traffic in Calgary.

CRIMINAL CODE

IMPAIRED DRIVING TESTS

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In light of the proposed changes being considered in the Narcotic Control Act, is the minister considering amendments to the Criminal Code that would establish laboratory tests for the assessment of the impaired operation of a vehicle as a result of drugs or chemicals other than alcohol, or will the assessment be made on a subjective basis?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I have taken note of the suggestion of the hon. member and I shall certainly be very happy to consider it. However, I do not know whether it is possible to establish tests of this type, but I shall certainly check into it.

DOMINION CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT

HEARING OF PETITIONS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Prime Minister and it is supplementary to that posed by the hon. member for Yukon having to do with the possible controversion of the elections in Spadina, Scarborough Centre and Guelph. The Prime Minister indicated he did not know if a specific date had been set for the trial under the Controverted Elections Act in the Spadina case. Will he tell the House whether he knew that a hearing had been scheduled of the specially constituted elections court to hear the Spadina petition, which hearing may well have the consequence of voiding that seat?

While he is on his feet I wonder if he might also tell us, since he knows the Spadina case was a test case and, by agreement, the cases in both Guelph and Scarborough Centre had been set aside pending the result of the Spadina case, and since Mr. Hamel is a party to the agreement and is represented, I would assume, by government lawyers, as a matter of policy will the government now agree to join with the other parties in the Scarborough Centre and the Guelph cases to have the speediest possible hearing of the petitions to declare the elections void in both Guelph and Scarborough Centre.

● (1200)

The Prime Minister indicated he was trying to help the courts out by acting before the courts could decide in the case of Spadina. Presumably he would have the same interest in having speedy action in Scarborough Centre and Guelph. I wonder if the Prime Minister would indicate whether as a matter of policy his government would agree to moving speedily with the hearing of petitions which might void the election of Liberal members in Scarborough Centre and in Guelph.

Point of Order—Mr. Tessier

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will certainly consider that suggestion. I have not been following this matter. I did not know of any specific date, as I indicated earlier. I believe if any minister of this government is involved in that matter, it might be the Minister of Justice or the President of the Privy Council. I will discuss the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition with them.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

GRANT TO CANADIAN OLYMPIC ASSOCIATION

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point has to do with an answer the minister of sport gave yesterday, as recorded at page 11135 of Hansard. I just want to clarify one thing. I hold no animosity toward the COA, which is a 95 per cent Liberal indoctrinated organization. Whether it has its office in Montreal or Ottawa makes no difference, but I think the minister should not mislead this House by saying, "I recognize that the hon. member has never been an enthusiastic supporter of the COA".

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member is debating the question. He can do that at another time.

[Translation]

POINT OF ORDER

MR. TESSIER—USE OF POSTAL FRANK

Mr. Claude Tessier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, my point of order follows upon a motion under Standing Order 43 moved by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) yesterday, on July 2, and recorded on page 11125 of Hansard.

I want to raise this point of order because I consider this motion an obvious abuse of Standing Order 43, and worse yet it is an ill-founded accusation and creates a doubt that I cannot tolerate. The hon. member will have to accept that I only did my duty in complete accordance with my responsibilities and privileges, and that moreover, I agreed to inform my colleagues of problems of which everyone should be aware. For the information of the hon. member, I shall simply say that I received by Purolator courier, envelopes which could be addressed to any member of the House. These envelopes and letters were sent to me by the manager of Jomac Canada—

Madam Speaker: Order, please! I must say to the hon. member that there has been no abuse of Standing Order 43. Under this procedure, the hon. member introduced a motion in the House which, for reasons unknown to me and about which I cannot speculate, did not receive the consent of the House.

The motion was then disposed of in the prescribed manner. While I understand that this motion may have offended the hon. member, I cannot allow him to continue to debate this issue.

Mr. Tessier: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please! No, no more discussion can be allowed. There has been no abuse of Standing Order 43. The House has disposed of the hon. member's motion. There can be no more discussion about it. The hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) on a point of order.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I do not intend to question your decision or comment on it, but there are two aspects to the question. The one you disposed of is behind us. You found that the motion under SO 43 was in order. It was turned down and that is good! But there is another more general aspect I would like to point out, the one the hon. member for Megantic-Compton-Stanstead (Mr. Tessier) had in mind, namely, that often, motions under SO 43 are used to make innuendoes and harm the honour and integrity of hon. members. This has nothing to do with the motion under SO 43 being agreed to or not. It is another aspect that deserves to be considered, and I respectfully submit that what the hon. member for Megantic-Compton-Stanstead had in mind was to deal with that aspect involving his honour and integrity, and he was going to make his point. Therefore, it is my respectful submission, Madam Speaker, that you did not have all the information to determine whether that second aspect deserves to be heard or not.

Madam Speaker: No, not at all. That motion could have been debated with unanimous consent. The substance could have been debated in this House. For reasons that are beyond my interpretation, the House decided to refuse consent to debate the motion. Perhaps it found the motion totally irrelevant or it might have been for another reason, but all I can do is to apply the rules.

A motion for which unanimous consent is required cannot be debated unless it is unanimously agreed to. What the hon. member is now doing is debating such a motion. I appreciate his desire to do so, but cannot allow him to proceed at this point.

[English]

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My question of privilege arises from a remark which perhaps should not have been made but nevertheless was permitted until such time as the Chair stopped the hon. member from speaking. In effect, the hon. member cast reflections on my integrity as a member of this House, which is a very distinct question of privilege.

An hon. Member: What did you do?

Mr. Cossitt: If you cast reflections on one's integrity, you are going to have to put up with the consequences. Who do you think you are, God, like Trudeau does?

Madam Speaker: Order. I can say quite firmly that I did not see that there was any intention of casting any reflection on the hon. member's reputation. The hon. member was trying to make a point about a motion under Standing Order 43 moved by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt). The question is closed. There is no question of privilege, and the point of order raised by the hon. member for Mégantic-Compton-Stanstead (Mr. Tessier) cannot be taken at this point.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 2,419, 2,442, 2,517, 2,589 and 2,597.

[Text]

CORPORATION TAXES—ADDITIONAL ASSESSMENTS

Question No. 2,419—Mr. Herbert:

1. In each of the past five years, what amount was received by the Department of National Revenue as assessed corporation taxes over and above the amount declared by companies in their original year end tax reports?

2. In each year, which industry was assessed the most in additional corporation taxes?

Mr. Claude Tessier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): 1. Total amount received in corporation reassessing increases

Year	Tax Increase (000)
1980	449,314
1979	289,443
1978	202,508
1977	207,143
1976	157,604

Notes:

(a) Year represents fiscal year April 1 to March 31.

(b) Figures show tax changes made during the fiscal year and contain tax dollars for up to five tax years.

2.

Year	Industry assessed most in additional tax dollars
1980	Construction
1979	Manufacturing
1978	Manufacturing
1977	No data available
1976	No data available

INCOME TAX PROCESSING—SURREY, B.C. CENTRE

Question No. 2,442—Mr. Clarke:

1. What is the average length of time for an income tax reassessment to be processed from receipt of application to issuance of a refund cheque or other final disposition at the Department of National Revenue Taxation Centre in Surrey, British Columbia?

2. What is the average length of time taken for the procedures at all other centres?

3. Do the lengths of time in parts 1 and 2 differ and, if so, for what reason?

4. Were measures undertaken or are they planned to improve the service at the Surrey Taxation Centre and, if so, what are the measures?

Mr. Claude Tessier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): 1. The average length of time for an income tax return to be reassessed from the receipt of the taxpayer's request to the issuance of a refund cheque is nine weeks. This is under normal conditions but is dependent on a number of factors. For example, at the year end, computer processing is delayed due to the computer being down to prepare for next year's program. When inventories are high during the filing season, the processing cycles can take longer. When additional information is required from the taxpayer, this can cause a delay until the matter is settled.

2. The average length of time taken for the procedures is essentially the same at all centres.

3. See answer to part 2.

4. A number of small changes in procedures and techniques have been made to speed the flow of work. The most significant has been a new system of control over correspondence to identify and expedite adjustments that appear to be exceeding the normal time for completion.

CMHC—MR. K. B. GANONG

Question No. 2,517—Mr. Oberle:

Is Mr. K. B. (King) Ganong employed by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and, if so (a) in which position (b) on what date was he appointed (c) what was his salary (i) at the time of appointment (ii) as of April 1, 1981 (d) how many employees does he supervise?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: Yes, since June 7, 1949.

(a) and (b) Mr. K. B. Ganong was appointed assistant to the president for the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories on August 28, 1978.

(c) (i) The salary range at the time of appointment was $32,786—$47,112.

(ii) As at April 1, 1981, the salary range is $41,210—$51,506.

(d) Mr. Ganong has 30 employees under his supervision.

Order Paper Questions

CIDA/ENV.—CONTRACT WITH INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER LTD.

Question No. 2,589—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Canadian International Development Agency and the Department of the Environment purchase a dump truck valued at $214,696 from International Harvester Ltd. and, if so (a) for what purpose and at what location will the truck be used (b) what were the specifications for the truck (c) were public tenders called (d) what was the name of the bidder and the amount of any other bid submitted?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): DSS awarded two contracts to International Harvester Ltd., on behalf of the Canadian International Development Agency and Environment Canada, for the purchase of four dump trucks and spare parts.

(a) (i) Three dump trucks are to be used for the Tanzania Canada Wheat program.

(ii) One dump truck to be used in Fourillon National Park, Gaspé, Quebec.

(b) (i) CIDA supplied the following specification: "(MMD) No. V1292 for Diesel Powered 6 & 4 Dump Truck GVW 46,000 lbs."

(ii) Parks Canada specification: "Truck 4 & 2 Diesel 12,747 kg (27,500 lbs) GVWR c/w dump body."

(c) (i) Requests for proposals for the CIDA requirement were sent to six firms and two replied as follows:

White Motor Trucks	$203,101.
International Harvester Ltd.	$182,101.

(ii) Request for proposals for Environment Canada requirement were sent to eight firms and two replied as follows:

White Motor Trucks	$41,508.
International Harvester Ltd.	$32,595.

The lower bid was accepted and the total value of the two contracts was $214,696.

GROSS AND NET PUBLIC DEBT

Question No. 2,597—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the government make revisions retroactive to the fiscal year 1926-27 or earlier to the extent of the (a) gross (b) net public debt and, if not, for what reason does data contained in the table "Gross and Net Public Debt: Historical Trends", provided to Members of Parliament in the Department of Finance document "Background Information on an Act to Provide Supplementary Borrowing Authority for Fiscal Year 1980/81", differ from data published in the Public Accounts?

2. For each year since Confederation, what was the (a) gross (b) net public debt of the government?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): 1. The government has made revisions retroactive to the fiscal year 1926-27 with respect to: (a) the gross public debt and (b) the net public debt. These revisions place the series on a basis consistent with the 1979-80 Public Accounts. As recording of gross and net public debt in the 1979-80 Public Accounts is different from Public Accounts recording of earlier years, the government's revised figures differ from those published in the Public Accounts of 1978-79 and earlier years.

2. The list below shows: (a) the gross public debt and (b) the net public debt of the government since Confederation.

[a] Figures for 1980-81 are not yet final. However, estimates for 1980-81 consistent with 1979-80 figures and the October 28, 1980 budget would place 1980-81 gross public debt at $122,006 million and the 1980-81 net public debt at $82,745 million.

Note:

Figures for 1971-72 to 1979-80 are in line with the accounting changes incorporated in the 1979-80 Public Accounts. For the years 1867-68 to 1970-71 inclusive, the figures are consistent with each other but are not strictly comparable with 1971-72 and subsequent years.

An indication of the non-comparability of the two series is as follows: If 1971-72 had been calculated on the same basis as for 1867-68 to 1970-71, then the 1971-72 gross public debt would have been $41,391 million instead of $41,329 million, and the 1971-72 net public debt would have been $17,296 million instead of $18,811 million.

The figures in the above table incorporate revisions to those included in the Department of Finance document "Background Information Concerning Borrowing Authority for Fiscal Year 1981-82", provided to members of Parliament.

For 1905-06 and earlier years, figures are as at June 30, e.g., for 1905-06, the figures for gross and net debt relate to June 30, 1906. For the years 1906-07 to 1980-81, gross and net debt are as at March 31, e.g., for 1906-07, the figures relate to March 31, 1907.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO SHORTEN PERIOD REQUIRED TO HOLD ELECTIONS

The House resumed, from Thursday, June 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières that Bill C-58, to amend the Canada Elections Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to have this opportunity to address Bill C-58 which, if passed by this House, will have the effect of reducing the period within which one may campaign for a federal election from approximately 60 days to 47. The bill, while significant in terms of the number of paragraphs, has little consequential effect upon the conduct of elections, save and except for the changes which are necessitated as a consequence of the reduction in the over-all time for the conduct of an election campaign. There are some exceptions, and to those I shall direct my attention later.

I suppose that the initial reaction of most persons involved in an election campaign, certainly from the standpoint of a candidate, would be to be inclined to approve of the principles involved in the reduction in the period during which an election campaign may be conducted. People in this House very clearly would be most delighted with the general prospect of reducing the time when one is confronted with what may be regarded by some as a somewhat rigorous period in their political careers. This rigorous period, depending on the success of the individual member of this House, repeats itself time and time again.

Upon reflection, however, I think one would also find the general public may become somewhat weary of elections and prefer a shorter period than the one we now have. We have witnessed in the United Kingdom, and in provincial elections, certainly in my own province, an extremely short election term. Parliament is terminated, the election is called and then the legislators are sitting again with a substantial rapidity. All of those considerations tend to induce one, looking objectively at this bill's provisions, to believe that it would be appropriate indeed to pass same. On balance, having regard not to individual ridings but to the nation as a whole, one would be inclined to favour that principle.

There are in mind, Mr. Speaker, two categories of electoral districts that will be substantially affected by the provisions of this bill if passed. One of them is the category my riding finds itself in. The riding of York North is the seventh largest riding in Canada in terms of registered voters. At the time of the last general election there were 80,379 persons entitled to vote. Compare that with the largest riding in Canada, York-Scarborough, with a total of 108,619 voters. However, between York-Scarborough and York North there were a number of ridings in which the total number of voters did not greatly exceed that of York North. The significance is not so much the numerical superiority over the great majority of ridings in Canada, but the degree of change within my riding compared with the number at the time of the 1979 general election.

In the short nine month period between roughly May of 1979 and February of 1980 there was a population change of 10,000 people in the riding. Yet there had not been the full gap of one year between elections. There were 2,500 people who left the riding, and 7,500 newcomers. The total growth in population was only 5,000, but the total change was 10,000. Given the nature of the riding and its particular circumstances today, I suspect that with the results of last month's census we will find York North's population has grown with a corresponding increase in the number of electors so that it has now in all probability moved up from the seventh position it had in 1980. The effect of these changes, Mr. Speaker, is that it takes a good deal of time to cause the machinery to be put in place which will result in the dispatch of enumerators, the accumulation of information for the preliminary lists and the addition of those who were missed on the preliminary voters' list.

York North covers a geographical area about 25 miles wide and about 12 miles in depth. It consists of three complete towns, Markham, Richmond Hill and Vaughan, each of which is a large geographical area with a centre or group of centres allocated to commercial activities and large surrounding residential areas. By way of illustration, Mr. Speaker, in the town of Vaughan there are housing starts and applications for building permits to a total of 20,000 homes. The effect of this growth on Vaughan will be staggering. Growth in Markham and Richmond Hill is proceeding apace as well. Large industrial corporations have decided to locate there because they have found, as a result of astute municipal administration, the rates of tax there are substantially less than in metropolitan Toronto immediately to the south. This astute municipal planning and prudent tax administration has inevitably led to the location of housing to accommodate the growing commercial and industrial complexes which have established themselves and continue to expand within the region.

It is this growth which will have a substantial effect upon the accumulation of information necessary to prepare the voters' lists properly for the next general election. One can very easily recognize, Mr. Speaker, that there are some ridings, not including mine, that are large in geographical area. We need only examine the riding of the Yukon and the two ridings in the Northwest Territories, indeed the northern regions in all our provinces, to realize the travelling time will be extensive in those areas if indeed members and candidates for Parliament are to be given an opportunity to contact as many of their constituents or intended constituents as they can.

My problem, the problem of ridings which experience large increases in population, is not too dissimilar. While it may take me a shorter period of time to travel from one part of the riding to another, there are more constituents between those two points than there would be in the ridings of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. The problem is the same: time to meet people.

Those sitting in the House, Mr. Speaker, have been blessed by the confidence of electors in one part or another of Canada. I do not know whether it is appropriate for anyone here to believe that he or she is here indefinitely. The democratic process through which we pass contemplates that each of us and those who replace us, since most assuredly we will be replaced at some time, will confront our constituents. Either we will impress upon them our willingness to serve and our genuine desire to benefit the nation or, in the case of an unsuccessful candidate, I suppose he does not meet the general requirements of his constituents.

The process is one of time. We well recognize that, despite the fact we sit here and say that the public knows we serve, there are others wishing to take our place who never become involved in the political process until the date the writ is issued. It is unfortunate but nevertheless a fact of political life.

Is it appropriate, accordingly, for us to take upon ourselves an advantage? Is it appropriate to suggest that the gap in time should be lessened within which we must face our political opponents on the campaign trail, within which we must curtail the number of all-candidates' meetings held throughout our ridings to provide those opponents an opportunity to display to voters their debating skills and knowledge of the subject matter which should concern them in determining how to cast their votes? I should think not. I believe the will of the public is best expressed at the time of an election. Members of the public can best express that will if they are well informed and have an opportunity to see and hear those who wish to represent them in the House of Commons.

We know what happened in the 1980 election. The election was called near the end of December; I recall the House was dissolved on December 14. It was not until after New Years that people began to establish dates for all-candidates' meetings and to begin effectively to engage in an election campaign. We may say that that gap in time would really bring us roughly within the period of time which this bill now contemplates. In the event that we should be confronted with another election at a similar time, we will have lopped off another two weeks within which the public will have an opportunity to view us and our opponents in an election campaign. Is that appropriate? I suggest it is not.

As members of the House we have substantial advantages which are well known to all of us but spoken of rarely. I am speaking of the opportunity we all have to speak in the House, to have our remarks recorded, and to have our speeches in part played back on television. We have an opportunity to dispatch to our constituents householder mailings, to communicate freely with our constituents using our frank. It is an opportunity which our opponents do not have. I am not suggesting for a moment that we be deprived of those advantages, but none of us is here forever. Passage of time, change of political mood, and even the desire among some of us to retire and be replaced by someone in our own party will result in others coming to this place.

It is my submission that it is appropriate to grant to the public the longest reasonable opportunity within which to make an intelligent choice. As I indicated, I have the additional problem within my own riding of knowing that with the massive influx of new voters it will be more difficult than ever to put all those new voters on the preliminary lists and subsequently entitle them all to cast their ballots on election day. From the experience we have personally had in North York, we know there are always complaints after a general election that a number of people have been missed. It occurs as a consequence of the shortness of the time in some cases. It occurs because someone was not home and did not in fact transmit the appropriate information. As a matter of fact, whole streets in North York were missed at the time of the enumeration for the 1979 election. The reduction in the time within which all of this shall take place is, therefore, a matter which concerns me and leads me to conclude that accordingly it is inappropriate to deal with this bill in the fashion which one might at first blush appear to favour.

Let me deal, if I may, with the effects of the reduction in time upon the expense limit with which all of us are familiar. We know that as a consequence of the application of Clauses 4 and 5 which are found on page 3 of the bill, the number of days within which one may prepare the preliminary list and accordingly obtain the necessary information to transmit to candidates for Parliament so that they may prepare their budgets has been reduced from 19 days to 11 days.

The effect on all of us in breaching the expense provisions of the Canada Elections Act can be calamitous. It is well recognized by all hon. members of the House that to exceed those spending limits will result in the loss of a seat properly won, but lost for the failure to comply with the maximum amount of money which may be spent during the course of an election campaign. We also know that those limits vary from riding to riding depending upon the number of electors. It is my considered opinion that what we have in the course of that reduction in time is a risk that we shall hastily prepare budgets which are unrealistic, exceed those budgets, and accordingly find ourselves in a situation where we may have breached the terms of the act itself and placed a successful election in jeopardy.

Clause 5(2) makes provision for the furnishing of copies of preliminary lists to all electors, copies of the pages on which their names appear to identify individual electors with their right to cast ballots. We know that the former practice or the practice which is currently in existence would be eliminated should this bill be passed. It makes provision for the dispatch of a list not only naming the individual elector, but all those electors in his poll. Also the practice of posting preliminary lists in convenient places within the poll region will be eliminated. But the interesting fact is that clause 5(2) makes reference to the furnishing to each person of their name on a preliminary list. One wonders how that furnishing is to be undertaken in the event that we are confronted with a strike of the kind we have now.

I know the practice in the past has been that legislation has been passed precluding the occurrence of a strike in the postal service during the time of an election campaign. Indeed, that might well be the answer. But right now during the course of an election campaign one may go out and examine the list of electors which is posted on telephone poles, where we are accustomed to finding them, to determine whether or not your name has been included. That process would be eliminated if this legislation which is before us were passed.

I say that elimination constitutes a general loss in terms of what the public has come to expect; the loss of finding one's name on the list may result in the ultimate loss of the right to vote at all. The public has become accustomed to a particular way of dealing with elections. They know they can follow a course of conduct which will result in a determination as to whether or not they are on the list when the lists are posted.

I have heard some of the arguments which have been made when this bill was earlier discussed to the effect that the posting of these lists constitutes a danger to people in the community since, in the event that one were criminally inclined, one would be able to identify people who seem to be living alone and therefore set upon them at some time and perpetrate an offence. I do not know that there ever has been any evidence that this is the way in which criminals gain information about who lives where. To my knowledge there is no evidence of there having been a criminal wave during the course of an election campaign, unless we speak of the crimes perpetrated on the public through speeches made by politicians promising things which are never delivered or promises which are changed in the event that the candidate happens to be successful. It is alarmist to view the posting of these lists as constituting some threat to the community.

I would like to direct the attention of the House to Clause 6 of the bill, which deals with the shortening of the time for the entire election. This would shorten the period of time within which enumerators can be appointed. We are all familiar with the process which occurs after an election is called. A campaign team or a political party swings into action. One of the essential ingredients of a successful campaign is the appointment of enumerators who may, in company with persons from the opposing political party, prepare the list of electors. There is always a great clamouring for extra time so that the lists of enumerators may be prepared.

Over a period of years each political party within a riding accumulates a list of people who can undertake the enumerating tasks. These lists are rather jealously guarded since they consist of the names of people who have proven competent in the past. In the case of my particular riding, and with the growth to which I have made reference and the consequential growth in the number of places or polls where votes may be taken, it has become necessary to continue to update and add to these lists. But the lists are not always perfect and must be checked.

Should an election be called right now, Mr. Speaker, both myself, as one of the persons referred to in the act as having a right to be communicated with by the Chief Electoral Officer in the riding, and the candidate running against me, who at the time of the last election had the next highest number in the vote in terms of his party affiliation, have an equal opportunity to appoint enumerators. At the present time the gap is six days, which will be reduced to five. Members opposite ask what difference a single day can make. I can tell hon. members that it was awkward to put together the lists in six days and now we shall only have five to perform the same task. It is not an easy matter to put together the names of people who are to perform this task without the assistance of the political parties. I know there is a stop-gap arrangement which entitles the Chief Electoral officer in the riding to make those appointments. In my riding, and I suspect in a great many others, the political parties which in the past have supplied this information are generally looked to to provide it again. If I were making any recommendations with respect to an amendment to the Canada Elections Act, I would suggest that this period of time be extended and not, in fact, restricted.

There is a consequential effect of a somewhat similar nature arising out of Clause 11 which would reduce the number of days for the granting of a poll. In a riding which has a somewhat static population it is understood that the polls originally established will not subsequently change in number. In a riding such as North York, which is constantly expanding in terms of the number of electors, one will find the constant need for additional polls. Accordingly, it is of some substantial benefit to us if we know well in advance the number of additional polls which are to be established since with the polls come the lists and with the lists come an opportunity to consult directly with the constituents whose names appear on those lists.

I have dealt with what I consider to be some of the essential ingredients of the bill. My major concern is with the effect the reduction of time will have upon those who have an opportunity to judge the ability and character of those people who are offering themselves for political office. Anything that this House does to reduce that period of necessary exposure would, in my opinion, have a somewhat detrimental effect upon the process with which we are all familiar.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to speak on Bill C-58, to amend the Canada Elections Act. Quite frankly, I rise to speak on this bill because in its earlier forms it was a bill which never particularly concerned me. I must admit that perhaps I had not fully considered the consequence of lowering the number of days which will elapse between the issuance of a writ for an election and the actual polling day itself. But I rise now because I am concerned about many matters with respect to this bill.

I think that we who sit in this House would tend to share the view that we are drifting into something approaching an electoral dictatorship in this country and it is not healthy. It is not healthy for good government that this should be developing. It is certainly not healthy as far as democracy is concerned, because it may well be that that sense of growing indifference of the public to the whole electoral process will heighten. I suggest it will heighten to the degree that we start to minimize the actual election campaign periods themselves.

Let me share a few views with Your Honour and other hon. members of the House. I guess Canada is the largest country in the world geographically which has a democracy. I acknowledge that India has the largest population; but from a geographic standpoint Canada is the largest democratically run country in the world. Surely that should first flag the fact that we perhaps need a longer time-frame than most other countries would feel is necessary for an election, considering the geographical problems we have in this country.

Think of what happened in the last campaign, a campaign which was triggered in mid-December, with a vote on February 18. Think of what happens in such areas as the northern Arctic, Northwest Territories and the Yukon. First, let us not presume that Canada can get by on a comparatively short campaign period. Let us remember the geographic distances in this country.

However, I suggest that a more serious matter is that we are evolving—and this is not unique in Canada—to the point where politics is becoming more and more a media extravaganza. I suggest it is becoming particularly oriented to the 30-second or 60-second clip on TV. Sadly, it is not a question of Parliament itself being exposed so much as the question of the exposure of the leaders of the governing party, the official opposition, and whatever rump groups happen to be in existence at any particular time, such as the NDP at the present time.

What I am saying is that more and more a system seems to be evolving which is not a presidential system such as that found in France and certain other countries, and, in particular the United States of America, but a system which is still the old parliamentary representative government system, one which is treated like a presidential system. The significant item on the national news at night, be it on CTV, Global or the CBC, is not so much what transpired in Parliament, but what glib statement the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made that day, or the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) or the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) as leader of the NDP or as vice-president of Socialist International. In short, more and more people are being asked to focus on the simple question as to whether or not they liked what the Prime Minister said, or what the Leader of the Opposition or the leader of the NDP said. I suggest to Your Honour that that will kill the whole parliamentary system—

Mr. Deans: This is going to kill it.

Mr. Stevens: —if it is allowed to develop to the point where it is simply a question of imageries—

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Trudeau was very quiet in the last election.

Mr. Stevens: —when the people come to choose the government they would like to see run this country.

The reason I am dwelling on this point is that I feel that we, the 282 members of this House, must always be cognizant of the fact that we have the best working democratic system in the world.

Mr. Deans: This?

Mr. Stevens: But it is essentially founded on the concept of this House being supreme, that the government of the day is entirely responsible to this House and must keep the confidence of this House or go to the electorate. I say that because, to the degree that we, as members of this House, inadvertently start to downplay the attention which the public pays to this House, presumably shifting their attention more to the leader imagery question, I think the more we will find that this House becomes absolutely irrelevant.

The thing that alarms me, and one of the reasons I am speaking today, is that there have been so many indications from this present government as to the utter contempt in which it holds this House that I am therefore hesitant to say; "Well, fine. Let us shorten the electoral period so that if the government wishes to call an election in the future it will have still fewer days left open to debate the issues of the day and hopefully get a proper verdict on election day as to who it wants to see sit as the 282 hon. members of the House".

I will come back to speak about the areas in which I feel this government is being particularly contemptuous of Parliament; but let me develop what I am saying a little further.

If it is true that, as far as the public is concerned, a greater fixation with leaders is developing as opposed to the governing process, what has happened in other countries? Surely, it is strange that we should be standing in this House saying that we should shorten our electoral period from roughly 60 days down to something like 47 days, when our main democratic neighbour, the United States, spends almost a year contemplating prior to the choice of its new leader, the President, every four years. Why do the Americans feel it is necessary to go through their very complicated electoral process of having preliminary skirmishes, of eventually having leaders run to gain the nomination of their respective parties, the republican or democratic party, and then go into the contest itself?

Mr. Deans: Do you think they have any better government?

Mr. Stevens: Surely, the answer is that in that democracy it is felt that that type of time is needed to give the electorate of the United States, literally state by state, an opportunity to review who the potential candidates are for the presidency, to give their electoral votes, state by state, and to support whatever candidate they feel is desirable. Eventually, that the system evolves to the point where certain candidates are finally put before the country. Even then there is a campaign of several months before the November voting day and a new President is chosen.

Geographically, Canada is a bigger country to govern than the United States. This should cause us to hesitate and ask why we could do something in 47 days that the United States thinks its needs up to a year to do as far as its process is concerned.

I notice my friend, the hon. member from Hamilton-Wentworth—

Mr. Knowles: Hamilton Mountain.

Mr. Stevens: The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) has been asking, "Yes, but do the Americans get better government?" I suggest to him that at the present time yes, the Americans are getting better government. It is certainly better government than the Trudeau government is giving to this country.

Mr. Pepin: Traitor, traitor!

Mr. Stevens: There are other examples.

Mr. Pepin: Selling his country!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): No, just selling his government.

Mr. Stevens: Just within the week I saw the outcome of the election in Israel. In Israel there is a minimum time of five months for electoral campaigns. Can anyone in this House say that the electoral result in Israel, which was virtually a dead-heat, would have been the same five months ago? I suggest that the answer is obvious. We found that in Israel, during the five-month or, I guess, almost six-month campaign, a tremendous swing in public attitudes started to take place between the governing party and the labour party which sought to take over. To me, that is democracy at work. People were given an opportunity to review the positions of the rival parties, to decide during that period which candidate they wished to choose. There was no suggestion of a 47-day guillotine which would have arbitrarily meant they had to vote on what I suggest is largely a question of the leadership charisma aspect that people like to talk about at the present time and which is largely the result of TV handling of politics in this country and others today.

● (1250)

I could take hon. members through many more democratic processes. France has just had an election which had a much longer time-frame than we are contemplating here. France goes through the process of double voting. The first vote simply finds out who the main contenders are and the two then have a run-off vote. I suggest that all these questions should be asked by members of this House before they accept the 47-day provision.

Let me touch now on the question of how arrogant and contentious the government is. This is what makes me so fearful of giving the government another advantage in the mind-bending that it seems to glory in. Just think of the money the government is spending on advertising to try and convince the average Canadian what a good job it is doing. Almost $70 million of taxpayers' money is being spent to condition the Canadian electorate to the notion that the federal government is big brother and is always looking after them. At the bottom line the inference is: "Re-elect us and you will get more of these goodies".

Surely that should cause people to ask if it is wholesome. I suggest that it is not a wholesome thing to have the federal government the number one spender in the country, in terms of dollars, in order to convince people, whose money they have lifted out of their pockets, that they are benefiting from its policies.

If that is put in the context of always getting a little narrower and shorter time frame for an election campaign, then we can see the problem ahead of us. Coming up to the 47-day period, I can just see the advertising dollars flying around and the goodies being described. As long as the government can keep the confidence of the House, it can decide when to trigger an election. Just think of the disadvantage to everyone else. We had an example of that yesterday. With absolutely no notice to this House, we were told that one of our members has been invited—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): "Summoned."

Mr. Stevens: "Summoned" is the technical term—to the Senate.

Mr. Knowles: "Kicked upstairs."

Mr. Stevens: This creates a vacancy and means that an election will now be held on August 17. The government has an advantage in that election. The Prime Minister's former aide had warning of what was coming. He had his resignation in. He had his airline ticket booked to Toronto in order to hold a press conference last night to say, "I am off and running, subject to getting the nomination of my party." Meanwhile, any party interested in running a candidate in the Spadina riding has first of all to select that candidate, get organized, campaign and try to win the seat by August 17. I suggest that this is a mini-federal election in the Spadina riding.

All this should indicate to any thoughtful member how wrong it is to leave a government—especially a government that is handled by the emperor in the way he handles government in this country—the option that at any time after spending million of dollars on advertising to condition the Canadian public, it simply declares an election and within 47 days has a vote which the emperor thinks will restore him to power. Not only has the emperor been ruling the country the way he has, but judging from his answer to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) today, it would appear that he is making room for his heir apparent, Mr. Jim Coutts. He is the new "Prince of Wales" in Canada.

Mr. Gauthier: Are you jealous?

Mr. Stevens: I think some of you fellows should be jealous. Just think how convenient it will be for the emperor if we hand him the added advantage of only having to campaign for 47 days, after he thinks conditions are right, to renew his mandate.

I mention these things because I think it is easy for us to bumble into this type of amendment. Some people may ask what the difference is, saying that 60 days is a long time to campaign. Let there be no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the difference is that a short campaign helps the incumbent and works to the disadvantage of those fighting to get into power. I do not think that is healthy for democracy.

Mr. Deans: From now until August 17 is less than 47 days.

Mr. Stevens: My socialist friend the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain comes to my assistance again and points out that August 17 is even less than 47 days away. That shows how far the government will go in shortening campaign periods.

It is approaching one o'clock, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to touch on one other thing that we should give some thought to when considering the Canada Elections Act. I refer to holding public opinion polls during an election campaign. As most hon. members know, I have a bill, C-555, before the House. I should like to put clause 1 on the record, which reads as follows:

1. The Canada Elections Act is amended by inserting, immediately after section 104 thereof, the following:

"PUBLIC OPINION POLLS

105. (1) No person, company or corporation shall, between the twenty-eighth day prior to polling day and until the polls are closed, publish by radio or television broadcast, by newspaper, news-sheet, poster, billboard, handbill, or in any other manner, in any electoral district in which an election or referendum is being held, the result or purported result of a poll of the political opinions of electors in relation to the election or referendum.

(2) Any person, company or corporation that contravenes the provisions of this section and, in the case of a company or corporation, any person responsible for the contravention thereof, is guilty of an illegal practice and of an offence against this act."

I believe it is necessary to amend the Canada Elections Act—and if the bill gets to committee I shall propose such an amendment—because if an independent analysis were conducted of the manœuvring that took place with respect to public opinion polls during the 1980 election campaign, it would be seen that they had a devastating effect on the outcome of the polls on election day. Surely it is unforgivable to have a Gallup poll which indicates the Liberals leading by 20 per cent compared to the Conservative party a few days before the election, and then to find that the estimates of how the electorate felt were 100 per cent too high.

Perhaps I may continue at two o'clock, Mr. Speaker. May I call it one o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I have won over one member on the government side. At least he applauds when I stand!

Before lunch we were discussing the general proposition of supporting or not supporting Bill C-58, to amend the Canada Elections Act. I believe I pointed out first that I felt we should be hesitant to endorse this type of bill which shortens the length of the campaign period from about 60 days to 46 days. I say that because geographically speaking we are the largest democracy in the world. We have an extremely severe climate, one that is extremely hot in summer and extremely cold in winter. To suggest that we should shorten the campaign period, which at the time of confederation was deemed to be proper at 60 days, to 47 days is something we should not endorse without a full debate.

• (1410)

If we look at other democracies in the world, such as Israel and France, we will find that in all cases the campaign periods are very long. The only places that have a comparatively short campaign are places with unitary-type governments with a very small geographically concentrated area.

I felt it was important while debating Bill C-58 to point out that I do have a bill on the order paper, C-555, dealing with the publication of the results of opinion polls, in which I have asked that the House consider that opinion polls immediately prior to an election, say for 28 days leading up to the election, should not be allowed in the sense that they are made public, because they in themselves become very unfortunate factors in the election.

I remember in 1980 when I had an opportunity to visit various areas of Canada during that election campaign, and it was very disconcerting when speaking at a gathering at Winnipeg, Calgary, Vancouver or Halifax to find that the main thing the people you were speaking to were concerned about was not necessarily an issue, but whether it was true that the emperor was going to win the 1980 election and get back into power.

My point is that we have to be hesitant in proposing a shorter campaign period so we do not inadvertently give the present government, or any other government in power at the time, an unfair advantage in being re-elected. We all agree that in most instances the timing of an election is up to the government. Very rarely does a government allow its total term to run out before calling an election. As long as the government, through its majority in the House, can keep the confidence of the House it is the government's option as to when it calls an election. To then say we only have 47 days before the actual polling gives members of opposition parties—if they are in the House that is one thing, but most importantly those candiates who are not in the House—a terrible problem getting organized, campaigning and making their views known to the point they obtain the necessary votes to get elected on election day.

I could make various comments on why I feel public opinion polls should be restricted prior to an election. Most of us have witnessed the errors which occur in these polls. It is true to say, I think, that not only are the polls often in error and very misleading, but they concentrate unduly on what I was referring to earlier as the personality cult that seems to be taking over in the political world today. What I was referring to is the fact that it is the leaders that the media seem to concentrate on. For example, in the riding of Sarnia-Lambton, if I may use that as an example, instead of the media concentrating on the candidates running in that riding we often find that the thing the media talks about is who are the leaders of the political parties that happen to have fielded candidates in that riding.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). I did allow him before one o'clock to refer to his Bill C-555 as a courtesy to him, in view of the fact he has that bill to put forward; but in the sense of courtesy to other members whom I have had to correct on other occasions when talking on this bill, I must ask the hon. member to realize that the requirements of relevance are in play and that the issue before the hon. member is the matter of 60 days versus 47 days. I ask the hon. member to bring his remarks closer to that subject.

Mr. Stevens: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your intervention, but you will recall that I did refer to the bill which is on the order paper in the context that I wanted hon. members to know I would be making that type of amendment to this bill should it ever get to committee. I felt, in saying that, that I was perhaps justified in making a few comments on why I think this question of public opinion polls being banned immediately prior to an election is very relevant to this debate dealing with the Canada Elections Act.

My comment just before your intervention was on this question of the concentration on leadership that is starting to take hold as opposed to what we really do during an election, and that is elect 282 representatives to this Parliament. My fear is that to the degree that we shorten the term from 60 to 47 days we are going to increase the likelihood that in truth an election becomes a leadership race as opposed to a race by over 1,000 candidates each trying to be elected as one of the 282 members of Parliament. I felt that was a lessening of the workings of Parliament and a lessening of our whole representative government.

When I say that, I believe it cannot be overlooked that the only people in this country who can vote for the person who is now our Prime Minister are those who live in Mount Royal. They are the only ones who really in essence should be concerned about whether they like Mr. Trudeau or one of the other two candidates, or however many there are, running against him. The only persons who can vote for the leader of our party are those in the riding of Yellowknife. That is the point I am trying to make. In short, we have to weigh whether it is prudent to shorten the term to 47 days, increasing the leadership cult type of imagery that is becoming so prevalent in politics as the order of the day.

I initially made the remark that, while I was perhaps initially indifferent to this type of legislation, the more I thought about it the more I became concerned. Because we have in power today a government which shows such utter contempt, not just for Parliament but for the courts of our country. It is time we stopped giving the government the advantage of being able to put this House in still greater contempt through an unduly short campaign period during federal elections.

Let me give one or two examples of where I feel there has been a certain contempt on the part of the government. This was discussed earlier during the question period, but during the last election campaign in 1980 the present Chief Electoral Officer, Jean-Marc Hamel, felt he could not hold an election earlier than February 18, say on February 11, because of the time required to carry out a completely new enumeration. He suggested to the leaders, the present Prime Minister, the Leader of the Official Opposition and the Leader of the NDP that it might be all right to use the voters' list of 1979, update it and save that amount of time. In that spirit that list was used. As we know, in three ridings, particularly the riding of Spadina, that action was contested. A defeated candidate filed as a petition a notice stating he felt the provisions of the Canada Elections Act had in fact been breached. He asked that the election declaring Peter Stollery the member of Parliament for that riding be declared void.

• (1420)

Mr. Deans: You mean Senator Stollery.

Mr. Stevens: Now Senator, that is true. The hon. member for Hamilton Moutain is constantly coming to my assistance and making these points abundantly clear for all hon. members.

The government was faced with a petition which was before the High Court of Justice in Ontario. The first response of the government was to cause the Department of Justice to move on behalf of the respondents—the present Senator Stollery; Mr. Lesley Singer, the returning officer; and Jean-Marc Hamel, the Chief Electoral Officer. The first response of the government was to move to quash the entire petition. The government wanted there to be no question about illegality or irregularity in the election of its favourite son in Spadina, the present Senator Stollery. In that context the government went before Mr. Justice Hughes and, in a 23-page judgment, he found that on all counts the respondents were wrong and dismissed their application to have the petition quashed.

The net effect of that was that a new court had to be constituted—called an elections court—which would consider whether the election in Spadina riding should be declared void. It was structured from an act which was passed many years ago to permit Parliament to deal with this type of issue in an impartial way because, as we know, soon after confederation one case after another was brought into this House. Elections were being disputed for various reasons. At that time it was up to the House of Commons to decide if those who were purporting to sit as members could carry on sitting as members. It was decided that a new act should be passed to allow a court to be properly constituted to decide that type of issue outside the House. That is the process which was in place.

However, by every delaying tactic conceivable the government frustrated the court hearing this matter. Constantly the petitioner said he wanted his day in court. He believed the former member for Spadina was not sitting as a result of a valid election and that his election should have been declared void, but he could not get before the court.

Finally, in May a date was set for the special court to hear the case in Spadina. That date was September 14, 1981. What happened? The Prime Minister—the emperor, as most call him—said he would have no part of that, that he would appoint his favourite son to the Senate, which under the House of Commons Act automatically means that the seat is declared vacant, and that then he would have his assistant, Mr. Coutts, contest the nomination and hopefully win it, and go on to hopefully win the byelection. He showed absolute contempt for the court which has been constituted to hear this matter on September 14 and contempt for this House, which is supposed to have responded to the decision of that court when it arrived at its verdict.

There are two other cases, one in Scarborough Centre and one in Guelph. Exactly the same scenario is in place. At the request of the government in each instance the Department of Justice asked that these cases not be proceeded with until the trial case in Spadina was heard and decided. The government has succeeded to date in frustrating three petitions which were supposed to go forward in order to decide whether three members in this House were properly elected. We find now that when a date is finally set to decide whether Spandina was a proper election the government has frustrated the matter once again by having that seat declared vacant so that the trial can be avoided. I feel that that type of thing is contemptible.

If can see why the government is so concerned. If it permitted a court to adjudicate in the case of Spadina and it it was found that in fact the election was void, that would mean every member in this House, including the Prime Minister and every member who sits in the cabinet, is sitting here on a mere technicality. The technicality is that nobody in the respective ridings filed petitions within the time limit to seek court decisions declaring their elections void.

Mr. Chénier: Why don't you resign?

Mr. Stevens: The government obtained power through one of the most deceitful elections in Canadian history. It is retaining power by frustrating any court in this country examining the election process and deciding if the elections were illegal in the first place.

Mr. Chénier: Be a model and resign yourself, Sinc. Show us.

Mr. Stevens: Old foghorn over there—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Groucho Marx.

Mr. Stevens: Groucho Marx had a little humour about him, but not old foghorn. He says, "Resign". Let him resign.

Mr. Chénier: You are the one talking.

Mr. Stevens: It is his colleague's seat which is being contested.

I am only trying to heighten the awareness of how far this government will go to cling to power once it has secured power. To go the next step and to allow this government a 47-day campaign in the hope that it can retain power would be to the detriment of all Canadians. It is something we in this House have to stand and resist or we will find that it will not just be the emperor who will continue to cling, as he indicated today, but that the "Prince of Wales" is already in motion to take over the throne should the emperor decide to step down at some future time.

I can well understand the anxiety of all hon. members opposite who hope one day they themselves will get into the Senate, only to see that they have been outmanoeuvred by the person they all love so much, Mr. Coutts of the Prime Minister's Office, who has done so much over the years for each and every one of them.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Poor Charlie Caccia.

Mr. Stevens: Poor Charlie from Davenport. In any event, we will look after Spadina as best we can. What I am saying is, let us not make it any easier for the emperor to rule this country in his autocratic way. The fact is that every Canadian is suffering as a result of the last election, and the quicker we can remove him from office, the better.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

TWO-PRICE WHEAT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Monday, July 7, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pepin that Bill S-6, to amend the Two-Price Wheat Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Mazankowski: I will allow the minister to speak first.

Mr. Pepin: I am grateful to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): With the consent of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), I recognize the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin).

● (1430)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as happened yesterday, the hon. member for Vegreville will prepare his notes as I develop my reasoning.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Who prepared yours?

Mr. Pepin: Somebody else, but I made them my own last night. I have a short version and a long one. Which would you gentlemen prefer?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The long one. I love to hear you speak.

Mr. Pepin: All right, and I will give a chance to the hon. member to go and establish contact.

This is the fourth time, Mr. Speaker, that Bill S-6 has come before this House. The previous occasions were June 6, June 27, and July 7, 1980.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It is truly a wonderful bill.

Mr. Pepin: Yes. Hon. members opposite used those occasions to discuss a wide range of grain questions, such as the international wheat agreement, the weather conditions at any particular time, the supply of hopper cars and the development of the Prince Rupert grain terminal. I might mention that these and other issues, such as compensation for the partial embargo on sales to the U.S.S.R. and other grain matters, are at this time well in hand. So today, Mr. Speaker, I hope my friends across the floor are willing to deal with the bill itself.

Bill S-6 was passed in the other place on June 3, 1980. I would also underline for the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) that this bill is identical to one introduced by the previous government as C-7 on October 18, 1979. So presumably the opposition members will have no objection to their own work.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It was a much better government, though.

Mr. Pepin: Bill S-6 is a simple, straightforward bill designed to repeal the Two-Price Wheat Act of 1974 which is no longer necessary as it has been superseded by other programs and domestic arrangements for the pricing of wheat for food. The purpose of the bill is to remove any obligations on the government to make subsidy payments in accordance with the provisions of the Two-Price Wheat Act in light of changes made in the domestic pricing system in December, 1978.

I must underline that since that time the wheat producer has been receiving the equivalent return from the marketplace. So he is not being deprived; the payments are now collected from the marketplace instead of from the government. The new domestic pricing scheme was introduced in 1978 by establishing, through regulations under the Canadian Wheat Board Act, the minimum and maximum price for wheat sold for human consumption in Canada.

To conclude the chronology of events, in May, 1980 Senator Hazen Argue, Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, announced the range would be a minimum of $5 and a maximum of $7 a bushel for wheat sold for human consumption, with no upper limit for durum wheat. Accordingly, I repeat, wheat producers have not been disadvantaged by the new arrangements and have been receiving prices in line with the international market in view of the higher range announced just over a year ago.

This is where the short version might end, Mr. Speaker, but I see the hon. member for Vegreville has not returned so I will continue to put information on the record for historians of the future who might want to use these notes for learned essays leading to MA and Ph.D degrees.

Let me continue to explain the relationship of the government's domestic wheat pricing program to other grain policies and programs. Canada has for some time had a policy of setting domestic prices for wheat for human consumption in order to provide some stability in prices to both consumers and producers. This is going to be my theme, that these policies protect both producer and consumer. Producers have a right to a fair return for their efforts, while consumers should not have to face rapidly rising costs over a short period of time for a staple food such as bread. These are difficult objectives, the combination of the interests of producer and consumer, to meet when the product you are dealing with is wheat which has experienced volatile pricing movements in recent years due to large changes in supply from year to year in many parts of the world.

I believe we have developed in Canada an enviable package of programs to assist both producers and consumers. This group of programs and policies put in place by the federal government demonstrate a commitment to provide producers with a fair return for their product.

I think I will dispense with the following page or two of my notes because they describe in some detail the existing systems for the protection of wheat producers, namely initial payments, the western grain stabilization program, crop insurance and so on. These programs also assist consumers by helping ensure adequate grain production and, combined with the two-price wheat program, provide important protection to consumers. My notes then go into the usefulness of a maximum and minimum price in looking at the situation as it exists today, and asking the question: Will such protection continue to be necessary?

World demand for grain is expected to be particularly strong during the 1980s. World population and incomes will continue to rise as will the use of grain for food and livestock. The world demand experienced in the last three years exceeded production even though production was at record levels. As we all know, stocks have been reduced. This year the prospects for crops are favourable, both in Canada and elsewhere.

While increased production will undoubtedly occur, it is unlikely that it will increase at the desired rate in all countries or regions of the world, and swings in markets can be expected. My notes make the point that stability will never be completely reached, that present circumstances will lead again to market swings, particularly in prices. In such a market, prices can be expected to fall when production exceeds consumption and stocks build up. Prices could decline to such an extent that producers receive less than a fair price for their product. Although it is difficult to ensure stable prices for grain that is exported—and the Western Grain Stabilization Act helps offset these variations—a fair return can be set by the federal government for sales to the domestic market. A minimum price has been established since 1967 in Canada for wheat sold for domestic human consumption.

On the other hand, when consumption exceeds production stocks are drawn down and prices rise. Recent experience has shown that such price increases can be rapid and rise to relatively high levels. In this situation, consumers are faced with rapidly rising costs. Consequently, it is desirable that the extremes of potential price increases be limited for consumers. Such is currently the case in Canada where a maximum price has existed since the early 1970s for wheat sold for human consumption. The original concept of a two-price system for wheat was implemented in the late 1960s and embodied in legislation for a period of seven years beginning in 1973. On May 26, 1980, Senator Argue announced the policy would be continued for at least another two years.

As was promised during the last election campaign, the federal government is maintaining a minimum-maximum range of prices for Canadian bread and pastry wheats to protect both producers and consumers from wide price fluctuations. Originally, in 1973 the federal government combined the floor price for producers with a consumer subsidy payable when export wheat prices were above $3.25 a bushel. My parliamentary secretary fully explained the details of this program to the House one year ago when Bill S-6 was introduced for second reading. Authority for payments under this program was provided by the Two-Price Wheat Act enacted in July, 1974. A maximum subsidy of $1.75 per bushel was established, which in turn sets the minimum domestic price of $5 a bushel for producers of bread wheat.

In the case of durum wheat, the domestic price was allowed to vary between $3.25 per bushel and $5.75 per bushel. The subsidy was payable between $5.75 and $7.50 per bushel.

Under these subsidy arrangements, the government made payments to the benefit of consumers totalling $396 million between 1973 and 1978. During the period that this policy has been in effect since 1967, the government has made payments to producers of approximately $76 million. There have been periods when consumers were assisting producers, from August 1, 1969 through to 1972, to the extent of some $40 million. The producers have been assisting consumers in various periods from 1973 to date in the amount of approximately $108 million. There is always a discussion on who gets most, the producers or the consumers. I thought it would be useful to put down these figures. Presumably their interpretation can be challenged.

Therefore, it can be seen that the program has provided assistance to consumers and to producers. The total producer benefit up to the end of the last crop year was about $116 million, according to the grain group, and the total cost was about $108 million, with taxpayers being responsible for the majority of the assistance being provided to consumers.

In the fall of 1978, as one of a number of measures designed to restrain expenditures, the government decided to terminate subsidy payments made under the Two-Price Wheat Act of 1974. At the same time, a new domestic pricing scheme was introduced by establishing through regulations under the Canadian Wheat Board Act a minimum price of $4 per bushel and a maximum price of $5 per bushel for wheat sold for human consumption. The minimum price for durum was also raised to $4 per bushel, but the maximum was left at $7.50 per bushel. This action continued to provide a minimum price for the benefit of producers and to protect consumers against wheat prices rising above $5 per bushel or durum prices rising above $7.50 per bushel.

Just over one year ago the government decided to raise these levels to improve returns to wheat producers. As I said before, in May 1980 Senator Argue announced that these ranges would be amended to a maximum of $5 per bushel for wheat for human consumption and a maximum of $7 per bushel with no upper limit for durum wheat. These levels continue in effect today and apart from short periods the market has remained within this band. It is currently at about the middle of the range.

All of this is to say that the purpose of Bill S-6 is to remove any obligation for the government to pay the subsidy in light of changes made in the domestic pricing system in December, 1978. For the benefit of students of wheat policies I have put on the record the period before 1974 and the period since 1978.

The repeal of the 1974 bill will not adversely affect producers who have been receiving their returns from the market. Both consumers and producers are receiving protection under the new pricing arrangements. Passage of the bill will formalize the arrangements which have been in effect for some time. I urge hon. members to support the bill.

There is a technicality of which Mr. Speaker must be made aware in order to deal with it later. When we decide to go into Committee of the Whole I have an amendment to present. Bill S-6 which is before us proposes that the 1974 act be repealed on the earlier of a day to be fixed by proclamation and July 31, 1980. We have a problem. In view of the delay in dealing with the bill, I wish to propose an amendment to clause 2 as follows:

That Bill S-6 be amended by striking out lines 10 to 20 on page 1 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

"The said Act is repealed on a day to be fixed by proclamation".

I just wanted to indicate that hopefully we will pass this amendment because of the delay in passing the bill itself.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Perhaps something should be done to regularize the speech we just heard from the Minister of Transport. I was puzzled when Your Honour called on him, but it took a moment or two to check the record. Bill S-6 was originally moved in his name, the debate has gone on, and for the minister to speak later normally would mean the closing of the debate. However, Your Honour did not use the words required in Standing Order 37(3), which read:

In all cases Mr. Speaker shall inform the House that the reply of the mover of the original motion closes the debate.

Since there are other hon. members who wish to speak, I suggest that the House agree retroactively that there was unanimous consent for the minister to have made this speech.

While I am on my feet on a point of order, I might also point out that this motion has been before us for some time. It calls for the bill to be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture. I believe that is the desire of those interested, so the minister's reference to a possible amendment is something to be looked at in that committee.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is a problem because I did not speak on the bill when it was first introduced. I am a first-time participant.

Mr. Knowles: But the minister knows the rules, and if he reads the rules, moving a motion or tipping one's hat is the same as if one made a speech.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the process suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to alleviate this problem is obviously agreeable to the minister and certainly agreeable to us. We would commend it to the Chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as well as the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton for raising the point. I might indicate, lest in the future what I say now might be considered by other occupants of the chair, that there is some doubt in my mind as to whether or not this matter is clear. Certainly in Beauchesne's fifth edition it is not perfectly clear that the minister is to be considered to have been answering in reply and that accordingly the debate is closed. I think it is better for the Chair to accept the suggestion of both hon. members and to seek the unanimous consent of the House to the effect that the minister's speech did not close debate on the bill. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Carried. Before recognizing the hon. member for Vegreville, I might mention that if the minister wishes to proceed in the manner he suggested, I would have to seek the unanimous consent of the House for the purposes of moving to Committee of the Whole. I think the perfectly good answer was given to him by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in that he could proceed to effect his amendment at committee stage. That is my understanding of where we are at currently.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is correct.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, just to set the record straight, I was not under the impression that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) would be closing the debate. As a matter of fact, I think we were all looking forward to his participation in the debate. It was clearly within that understanding. However cognizant we should be of the observation of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I simply yielded the floor to hear the minister because some of the things I have to say could very well have a direct bearing upon some of the things he has or has not done.

At the outset the minister made two points with which I agree. First, he indicated that the bill has the effect of relieving the government of approximately $200 million worth of liability without the amendment, which really advances the termination date of the two-price system and the obligations provided by the government to July 31, 1980 from November 30, 1978. If this bill were not passed the government would be obligated to pay the difference between $3.25 a bushel and $5 a bushel, which would amount to $1.75, on wheat which was used for domestic human consumption during the period December 1, 1978 to July 31, 1980.

The Minister also made another observation with which I agree. I think it should be repeated and re-echoed in this chamber and, indeed, throughout the country. The fact of the matter is that in the over-all scheme of things the two-price wheat system has been a subsidy to the consumer at the expense of the producer, on balance. That should not be forgotten. I am not sure whether that was the real intention of the two-price wheat legislation. I believe there was a disposition at that time on the part of the government to provide for a realistic price range for the production of wheat for domestic human consumption to reflect somewhat a price which would be commensurate with the cost of production. While there was no specific legislative mechanism to provide for a regular adjustment or indexation to reflect increases in the cost of production, I think there was a moral commitment on the part of the then minister, in effect a moral obligation, to adjust that price range on an annual basis which would bear some relationship to the cost of production.

There are several reasons why this bill should not be allowed to pass and I would like to enunciate at least four of them. This bill should not be passed until we receive a clearer commitment from the government, or some direction, on a number of urgent and important policy areas. These are policy areas which require attention now. We in this House are somewhat deprived of an opportunity to deal with questions related to the Canadian Wheat Board and to agriculture.

I know the minister is in a somewhat awkward position, having to answer in the House for the senator in the other place. There is no way he can always be cognizant of what that minister is doing since he is a senator. He does not have the pressures and responsibilities which other ministers have. He travels a great deal and does a lot of spouting off at the mouth. We hear a constant litany of statements which he makes, yet we do not have the opportunity to question him. Thus, we must question the Minister of Transport, who does quite well, by and large. At least he attempts to clarify the questions.

Nevertheless, the fact that this bill has been kicking around the House of Commons since June 6, 1980—and possibly even earlier than that—is an indication that matters with respect to the Canadian Wheat Board and to western agriculture are not much of a priority with this government. As a result, we members who represent ridings in the Canadian Wheat Board area will seize upon the opportunity to raise a number of important issues not only directly related to this bill but also to other agricultural issues.

I wish to place on record four or five major concerns I have with the lack of direction which this government is taking on a number of issues. First of all, there is the two-price wheat system itself. As I said earlier, in my view the government has broken faith with the producers of Canada. I believe it has really violated the intended spirit of the Two-Price Wheat Act.

As the minister confirmed today, it has, in effect, been a subsidy to the consumers at the expense of the producers. There has been a maximum price level locked in under this system for a period of seven years. How many union agents bargaining on behalf of their union would want to lock in a maximum wage over a period of seven years? It would just not be done. Yet, in effect, that is what was done when the Two-Price Wheat Act came into effect. The maximum level had not been adjusted until the announcement made by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board on May 26, 1980 which took effect on August 1, 1980.

There has been no effective mechanism to provide for an annual increase, both in the minimum and/or maximum levels, to reflect the cost of production, as I mentioned earlier. That is certainly something which should have been included in this legislation. While it was not included there was, indeed, a moral commitment, a suggestion made by the minister at that time, that there would be regular consultation and that those figures would be adjusted on an annual basis to reflect increases in the cost of production.

I would like to turn to the debate which took place on October 29, 1974 as reported at page 865 of Hansard. At that time it was brought out by a certain individual, the hon. member for Vegreville, that:

> —we are dealing with a legislative measure which is supposed to give some protection and some stability to the wheat producers of the country, certainly now is the opportune time to build into the legislative mechanism some protective features which would offset the spiralling costs which face the western wheat producers.
> We know, for example, that the two-price system which has been in effect for some time now has already cost the producers something in the order of $15 million.

The producers have always been behind in relation to what should be considered a fair return.

If we go back and look at the first four months of the crop year 1979-80 and if we look at the price level on the international markets and the maximum level which was provided under this bill, we will find that producers have provided a subsidy to the extent of about $22 million to $25 million, roughly a million dollars a week. This was done because the maximum price was locked in at the $5 level while international prices were substantially higher. This was really a most unfair situation.

I do not believe that when we accepted the principle of the two-price wheat system we expected a built-in producer subsidy to the consumer for a period of seven years. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I regret very much the government did not make a retroactive adjustment to reflect the substantial gap which existed between the price level on the international market and the price level being commanded for domestic wheat for human consumption at that time.

When our party was in government we made plans to put in place an adjustment mechanism which would have raised the minimum price to $6 per bushel. That would have had the effect of putting an additional $25 million into the hands of the producers. This government failed to recognize that inequity. Rather, it sat on the situation, did nothing, and in May it made an announcement that it would modify the price range establishing a minimum of $5 and a maximum of $7 per bushel.

Since the New Democratic Party and the Liberals combined forces to defeat our government back in December it has cost the wheat producers of Canada approximately $50 million. The maximum price of $5 which was established in 1973 was never adjusted, notwithstanding the fact that international prices were as much as $2 per bushel more on many occasions. The producers have really been taken to the cleaners. We now have another maximum established at $7 with no provision for a regular adjustment.

It is rather interesting to note that in the case of durum, there is no maximum. The sky is the limit. In the case of wheat for domestic human consumption, the red spring wheat, there is a maximum. I suggest to Your Honour that the minister should seriously consider removing that maximum figure, that maximum limit. The minimum price is now set at $5 per bushel. I believe that it should be at least $6. Of course, most of my thoughts on this particular bill go back to a year ago because that is when I first wrote some notes. At that time, I thought that $6 would have been a fair and realistic minimum price because it could be substantiated by the fact that there have been increases in the cost of production which could back up that kind of adjustment. For example, if one looks at the increases in the major components for the production of grain from 1973 to last year, it becomes clear, I suggest, that prices would be much higher now. Fertilizer prices were increased by about 115 per cent or 120 per cent. Chemicals increased 168 per cent. In both cases over the past year, I would say there has been another additional increase of perhaps 20 per cent to 25 per cent.

Considering fuel prices, for example, thanks to this government, diesel fuel prices have doubled since this government has taken over office. There has been a doubling of fuel prices. That, too, is a component which must be reflected as a component in the cost of production. If one were to look at $6 as a minimum, one would be looking at increasing that minimum by about 85 per cent over the period since 1974 when it was established at $3.25 per bushel. Therefore, an 85 per cent increase over that period of time is certainly not exorbitant. As a matter of fact, if one looks at the crop production index over the period of 1974 to 1980, one finds it was about 105 per cent. That was the increase in the cost of production for cereal crops. I suggest to Your Honour that there has probably been an additional 20 per cent or 25 per cent increase in that figure over the last year.

We do not have a realistic price range. In my view, we should not have a maximum limit. Of course, we do not have a mechanism for adjusting the price levels to reflect the cost of production. Hence, we are going to continue a situation wherein the producer will be continually subsidizing the consumer. That is really why we find this two-price system unsatisfactory.

The Senator in the other place makes quite a bit of noise about the fact that the Canadian wheat producers have received significantly less than if there had been no price ceiling. This amounts to a consumer subsidy at the expense of the farmer, Mr. Argue stated. Well, the Senator in the other place is supposed to be acting in the best interests of the producer. I mean, that is his job. We have people here who are ministers of consumer affairs whose responsibility it is to look after the interest of the consumer. However, the basic responsibility of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board is to ensure that the producers of Canada get a fair and equitable return for the production of their grain and for—

Mr. Pepin: He works the whole of Canada.

Mr. Mazankowski: —and for the production of the grain for their efforts. There should be no question about that. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) shakes his head in the negative. I cannot imagine what—

Mr. Pepin: Every minister works for the whole of Canada.

Mr. Mazankowski: Well, that is very good. The minister works for the whole of Canada.

Mr. Pepin: Producers and consumers.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am sure the minister devotes more attention to working for the interests of transport than for the interests of, say—

Mr. Blais: Supply and services.

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes, supply and services. Thank you, Mr. Minister. If he does not, then he should be looking for another job.

Mr. Blais: I work harder for him than anyone else.

Mr. Pepin: That is the point.

Mr. Mazankowski: The Canadian Wheat Board is an institution which acts as a custodian for the producers. I mean that the job of the Canadian Wheat Board is to get the best price possible for the farmers and to ensure that there is a regularized delivery system, a good delivery system, to ensure that the markets are always pursued, that we have an ever-expanding and increasing flow of grain to both domestic and international markets, and to get the best price for the producer. That is the minister's responsibility. If it is not, then, by golly, we have the wrong man in that slot.

I have talked here about the fact that the wheat producers have been denied a fair price for their wheat for domestic human consumption. It is really interesting to note that there are only two commodities which come to my mind that are produced in this country and that command less than the world price. They are both products of western Canada. I am speaking of oil and wheat. Textiles, shoes, and other products on the domestic market command a higher price than in the international market. The same is true with manufactured goods. Why do we have this continual discrimination? The oil subsidy which has been provided by the people of Alberta in terms of selling oil at far below the world price, at 41 per cent of the world price, has amounted to billions and billions of dollars. It is over $40 billion.

An hon. Member: If you want to—

Mr. Mazankowski: I am sorry. I did not hear what the hon. member said. However, I am sure that it was intelligent. If it was intelligent, I am sure that he will engage in the debate so that we can hear precisely what he has to say.

The same thing is true with the initial payments. This minister has seen fit to break with tradition and not announce the initial payment level, as has been done previously under a former Liberal minister. As a result, producers were at a loss to know what to plant this spring. They needed some direction. Surely, because the minister is in constant touch with members of the Canadian Wheat Board, he is in a better position to advise what sort of price range will be in effect. But now we do not have a price range established. We can only surmise, from what we read in the press, that the initial prices for wheat and other grain products will be reduced.

Mr. Argue is quoted in the Saskatoon Star Phoenix as saying that for top red spring wheat, the price will range between $4.25 and $5.35 a bushel. That is something which is potentially in the order of $1 per bushel less; yet at the same time the Senator is calling upon the producers of Canada to grow more, at least 10 per cent more, to meet the contractual commitments. At least, if he had given them some idea as to what kinds of grains would be in demand, the producers would have had a better idea as to what to produce for the market demands.

The second reason I believe we should not pass this bill until we get a satisfactory answer is the failure of this government to come up with a clear-cut program to provide for adequate rolling stock. I touched on this yesterday or earlier this week. The fact of the matter is that our grain-carrying fleet is again on the decline. In 1980 we had some 28,400 pieces of rolling stock composed of 14,400 boxcars and 14,000 hopper cars. That fleet is being reduced at the rate of 3,600 units per year. It is primarily a reduction of boxcars owing to their deterioration from long use. The fact is that on the basis of the information which has been provided by both the CNR and the CPR, we note that by 1985 the boxcars will be reduced by about 50 per cent. Instead of having 14,400 boxcars, we will have closer to 7,000.

Clearly, something has to be done. We have to have a clearcut statement of policy about the provision and the replenishment of hopper cars. Everyone who has any knowledge in the grain trade knows that we must have a program of replenishment of the rolling stock. The minister nods his head in the positive. The other day, in response to a question which I posed, he indicated that his studies and his experience suggests that we do not have to order any additional rolling stock at the present time.

Mr. Pepin: Before the fall.

Mr. Mazankowski: The Grain Transportation Authority states that we need 1,300 every year. The Canadian Wheat Board advisory group suggests that we need at least 1,300 every year, and it recommended that the minister act very quickly and, as a matter of fact, pass the resolution. It reads as follows:

> That the Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board urge the Government of Canada through the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board that orders be placed immediately for additional hopper cars in accordance with the requirements recommended by the Grain Transportation Authority.

● (1510)

The authority has recommended the purchase of 1,300 cars each year for the next four years to 1985, and approximately 900 cars per year thereafter to 1990.

There can be no doubt about that. I think they are in a position to know. The Booz-Allen report which was commissioned by the former minister, recommended that at least 1,900 cars be brought into the system annually. That was to include a factor of 15 per cent improved turn-around time. It is clear that the 1,300 cars per year is not unrealistic.

I do not believe that we will export 23 million metric tons of grain this year. At the present time we are running roughly 100,000 metric tons above last year's figure. The latest figures that I have were issued on June 10, 1981 and show our total export of grain at 18,467,000 metric tons, whereas in 1980 the figure was 18,389,000 metric tons. This year 285,000 metric tons of grain less have been moved domestically this year than last year. The total disappearance for last year was 23,882,000 metric tons, while this year it was 23,674,000 metric tons. The figure will not exceed last year's because the fleet is diminishing. Yet we are asking the producers for sufficient quantities of grain to allow us to export 30 million metric tons. It simply will not be done, Mr. Speaker.

The producers will be asked once again to build storage facilities and buy more granaries to store their grain rather than market it. We are slipping behind, and when that happens, farmers lose the incentive to produce.

If our grain transportation system becomes ineffective once again, then our ability to sell abroad will be impaired and our reputation as a reliable supplier will be impaired. This does not augur well for the total grains industry.

A lot of improvement has taken place over the last couple of years and I hope the momentum continues. It is clear that the Canadian Wheat Board can market the grain and it is clear that we can produce the grain, provided there are adequate incentives and assurances that the grain will be moved to domestic and export positions.

The third reason we should not allow the bill to pass, Mr. Speaker, is the continuing and constant threat by the railways that they will ration services in the next two or three years, particularly in the western regions. Yesterday I spoke to officials of the Canadian Wheat Board who suggested that rationing is occurring at the moment. I do not know whether the minister has another opportunity to speak, but if he has, he may want to say something about that. If such is not the case, it would certainly please me very much if he were to set the records straight.

We all know that this is a bargaining ploy used by the railways in an attempt to get a better rate for the movement of grain. But to hear the minister, the government House leader in the other place and other ministers of the Crown acquiesce and join in the chorus that we are going to have rationing strikes me as being irresponsible. I think that anything that adds to the speculation about rationing is not good for Canadian industry and it is certainly not good from the standpoint of potential customers abroad. To allow that sort of nonsense to be perpetrated, just brings our reputation abroad under question.

I call upon the minister to sit down with the railways in an attempt to work out some kind of proposal to get us off this kick about rationing. We know what the traffic demands are in western Canada. We know that they call for about a 70 per cent increase in the use of rail services in western Canada. We know as well that it will require huge amounts of capital—$14 billion to $15 billion over the next ten years. We know that the capacity is limited at the moment and we also know—the minister will perk up when he hears this—that the railways need more revenue from the movement of grain. It is irresponsible, however, to go out across the country and beat the drums or fan the flames on the subject of rail rationing in the western system. I urge the minister to try to bring the railroads together and to bring the provinces together in some way. This problem will not be solved by one government or one railroad but will require the co-operation and joint support of all components in the grain industry and the industrial face of western Canada.

These are the components of the problem, Mr. Speaker. What we need from the government is a plan of action. This is a national problem and it is urgent. We need answers, not more threats.

I ask the minister and his colleagues to seriously consider the question and tell the House how they are going to deal with it. We need the answers now, not six months or six years hence. If the government is going to allow the railways to continue their campaign of threats unchallenged, then I say it is going to cause a prairie fire which may be very difficult to put out. The railways have a clear responsibility.

The government also has a clear responsibility. It is in charge of putting together a national transportation program and the railways are clearly under its responsibility. It must show leadership and outline how it intends to deal with the problem.

The other day, in his usual flippant manner, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) suggested that if we had not laughed at his concept of double-tracking, everything would be all right. We do not need that sort of double talk of double-tracking from the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. It is interesting to note that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board in the other place described the Prime Minister's concept of double-tracking using existing siding, as rather foolish and farfetched.

There is a fourth reason why we should not allow this bill to be passed, Mr. Speaker. I may be transcending the rules of relevance but this is connected to the whole matter of western agriculture and western grain production. I refer to the horrendous mess made of the administration of the herd maintenance assistance program.

I can only say that the manner in which the program was administered reflects the gross incompetence of the people involved. There were several cases where severe drought conditions prevailed and producers kept their herds in good faith. Many spent huge amounts of money on feed. In some cases people qualified, yet their neighbours did not. Certain areas were designated after the original drought area was defined, but upon the designation, the producers found that they could apply for the assistance. Some applications have never been acknowledged and people could not get through to the officials on the telephone. Appeals have not been dealt with and some applications have vanished. There has been no response to petitions, letters and appeals. Three ministers are dealing with the problem, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), the minister in charge of the Wheat Board—not the Minister of Transport—and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané). It has been a shuffle all around. In Alberta we can only conclude that it is another example of discrimination against the producers in one province. It seems to follow a pattern.

I hope that in his wisdom, the Minister of Transport in his effective way, will ask his colleagues to clean up the mess and get it over with. Some lapsed funds remain and if there is any doubt, the benefits should go to the producer. The government has discretionary powers and I hope that the minister will prevail upon his cabinet colleagues to review the matter and make a decison.

I conclude with one other bone of contention. It is somewhat related to the whole question of western agriculture, namely the payment of compensation arising out of support for the embargo on grain sales to Russia. Here again, the rapeseed producers have been grossly discriminated against because feed grain prices were affected.

The Minister of Agriculture has suggested he will run through the process which was followed in determining how the levels were established and why rapeseed was excluded. But the bulk of the rapeseed producers are in the province of Alberta. I say that if a case can be made for the payment of compensation to corn producers, so too can payments be made to the producers of rapeseed. There is a substitution factor. There is an interrelationship between feed grains and rapeseed meal. There can be no question about that. Prices of rapeseed declined dramatically during that period. Rapeseed producers are suffering. I would hope that as the Minister of Agriculture had a change of heart with respect to payments under the hog subsidy program, he will reconsider and add the rapeseed producers to the list of those eligible for payments of compensation under the embargo program. Then if the minister can convince his colleagues to take action on a number of these fronts that I have talked about this afternoon, we will be glad to pass this bill.

Mr. Deniger: Would the former minister of transport entertain a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deniger: Mr. Speaker, would the former minister of transport elaborate on his third point? He objected to the bill and indicated that he felt the railways would need more revenue for the movement of grain. How would he provide that revenue?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member has asked that question. I think there is a very clear case to be made for the federal government's responsibility and obligation to provide for payment of a subsidy on the basis of the differential between the statutory rate and the fair rate that would be determined, compensatory or near compensatory. I think the question is how best to distribute that. Should it be paid directly to the railways, to the producers, or should it be put into some form of bond? That is a matter for debate. But I think the government has a clear responsibility. It entered into an agreement with the CPR to provide those lower rates under statute. The statute rates should remain enshrined for the producers, but the railways obviously need sufficient revenues to move that grain. There may be some debate as to the capping of future inflationary increases. Those things are for debate. I think the government could accelerate this debate immensely if it came clean with a commitment saying that we are prepared to meet that gap. The debate could continue and probably we could reach a consensus sooner than we think.

Mr. Deniger: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted another question? If the railways were given more money, is it the hon. member's contention that the purchase of rolling stock and all other related equipment should be the responsibility of the railways?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I think this could be worked out in two ways. Because a sufficient amount of the rolling stock is either owned by the Canadian Wheat Board, farmers or provinces, you could establish a rate on the basis of the rolling stock owned by the producers and or other people. That should result in a different rate. If the rate were to be established on the basis of the railroads providing the rolling stock and the locomotive power, then of course, it would command a higher rate and it would have to ensure that adequate plant and equipment is maintained and provided. Also, if the railways are to be paid a fair rate for the movement of grain, there have to be compensating guarantees to ensure that the service is provided. You can go either way, and there is some flexibility on this.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, concerning the bill we are debating this afternoon, may I say at the beginning of my remarks that whenever I notice the date of proclamation shall be retroactive at the end of a bill, as I explained last week in the House, I get very suspicious. In the last clause of this bill, we read:

> This Act shall be deemed to have come into force on December 1, 1978.

When there are three years of retroactivity, there is only one answer, someone has boobed. In effect, we are repealing Section 3. This is a classic example of a serious mistake. I think the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) has indicated in his remarks why the government wants the bill to be retroactive, that is, to get out of its obligations with respect to this mistake which the government made in passing the bill in the House seven years ago.

The major part of my remarks today will not be directed to the current Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin); they will be directed to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board under whose jurisdiction this particular legislation comes. He is not present in this House, nor can he be, but I know he has a very intelligent staff who will be reading these comments and will pass them on to him.

What we are witnessing today in this request for amendment is a part of a whole series of mistaken and fraudulent legislation put before this House in the last ten or twelve years. I am not accusing the government of the day or the governments of the last ten or twelve years of being deliberately fraudulent. They have simply made the mistake of listening to advisers who were wrong in 1968, who were wrong in 1945 and who were wrong in 1939. They have been wrong ever since. This fraudulent legislation, by more than a clear coincidence, seems to be funnelled to the farmers of western Canada.

The present Minister of Transport has visited western Canada in connection with a royal commission as well as on other matters. I am positive he is aware that the alienation in western Canada is not just on isolated subjects such as bilingualism, energy policy, the Constitution, and other such issues. The alienation is caused by a long series of the wrong type of help for the western farmer which has only succeeded in cutting his throat systematically and steadily. This legislation is just one small bite at the farmer's backside. That is how he looks on it.

The two-price system for wheat has been talked about for over 50 years. Every political party has talked about it, but not one has brought in a two-price system and presented it to the farmers. Every single party in this House is guilty of luring farmers into believing that they could solve a lot of their problems by giving them equality with people in the rest of the country by giving them an extra price on the small amount of wheat they sold to domestic consumers for human consumption. That fraud has been going on for 50 years. Here we are discussing amendments to free the government from financial responsibility or liability for mistakes it made seven years ago.

The hon. member for Vegreville has dealt with a series of subjects that outline some of the problems related to this bill and related to agriculture in general. I do not agree entirely with his approach to some of these problems. The differences we have are differences that are long standing and sincere in the sense we both know we can be wrong. I do not intend at this time to go into that type of debate. What I want to do is put on the record, as the minister suggested in his opening remarks today, something for the people who read this debate, the historians who are tracking down wheat policy in the west. We must have some form of coherent discussion on the record so they know how this legislation we are dealing with today fits in.

I put the blame on the fact that our government in Canada, as well as governments of other western countries, have been the victims of wrong conclusions by top advisers. This goes back to the fact that after the Hitler war the economic advisers to the government and to large companies, such as grain companies, had a philosophy that there was no future for grain farmers. They pointed to the declining consumption of bread in western Europe, the traditional market for western world grain. They pointed to the deliberate increase in productivity in grain in western Europe and in Russia. They pointed out the growing productivity of the four grain producers of export grain, Australia, Argentina the United States and Canada. On the basis of their study of all the figures they had from the beginning of trade they concluded there would be a downward movement in world trade in grains.

That was the type of advice going to ministers of all western governments. That is the philosophy that still hangs on around this capital city of Canada in the deep, dark corners of economic units of the various departments. The facts over the last 50 years have proved them wrong. Even the politicians in the last three or four years have been saying they are wrong. We still get this philosophy which comes out from the Department of Transport. Civil servants in transport give secret briefings to the research members of all parties of this House on economics, and they are absolutely wrong.

This philosophy comes out in other forms. We hear grain companies making certain statements about how we should do things, for instance in respect of railways. The assumption made by the hon. member for Vegreville that we have to pay the railways a compensatory payment was not the approach suggested by the Hall commission which studied this intensively. The Hall commission recommended the obvious. Since all the indications are that the flood of goods coming out of western Canada in the coming decade and decades to follow will be tremendous. The job is not to cut railways out of existence but to reconsider where the railways should be and what they should carry. In grain alone they have now accepted, not the target of 20 million tonnes a year, but 30 million tonnes a year. In spite of the pessimism of the hon. member for Vegreville, they will attain this target because the railways make money when they are hauling a lot of stuff. The railways make money when they haul a lot of wheat. They make money when they realize that the volume of traffic on a fixed cost industry is what makes the bottom line increase. The railways are still following the advice of economists who believe there is no future for traffic in the west except on the main lines.

Therefore, I suggest to the Minister of Transport that he consider the Hall commission report, chapter 9, where it talks about getting at the problem in an economic way; not loading the taxpayers with costs that are unnecessary. Get the railways off their seats, get them out and get them making money by hauling more than just the few bushels of grain they are pushed to haul under the Railway Act.

When I look at the potash that is badly needed in Europe and the coal that is badly needed in Europe in the next 30 years, I realize it can only come from Alberta and Saskatchewan because we have the Churchill route. I know the United States and Canada have both agreed formally to help Europe out of its problems with regard to coal. The only place they are going to get that coal is from North Dakota, Saskatchewan and Alberta through the use of the Hudson Bay route. The tremendous tonnages of potash and coal required will make the railway lines pay and they will forget all about raising this question about Crow rates.

On this one point of what we are paying as a result of listening to this wrong type of economics, let me say in the first place that this debate was fought out after the Hitler war in the high levels of the department of agriculture in the United States and the reasonably high levels of the Department of Agriculture here in Ottawa. There was pressure put on in both countries, on the secretary of state for agriculture as well as the secretary of the treasury in the United States and in Canada, to realize that farming was a declining industry in western Canada, and that a policy should be followed to reduce production and get farmers off the farms.

This was not mentioned publicly; it was just the type of thing going on between advisers to the government and ministers. The ministers tried their level best to keep that suppressed but, as you probably know, the United States opted for controlling of agriculture. The United States spent huge sums of public money withdrawing good agricultural land, putting it into land banks and grasslands. It ran into tens of millions of acres. The United States paid their farmers for doing this. Our country resisted that. We went the other course of finding new markets for grain. This gave a lift to western agriculture which still exists. That change of direction quieted these experts down for awhile.

The government I am talking about was defeated in 1963 and a new government came in. It was taken over by this economic pressure. As a result, in 1969 and 1970 we had four bills introduced into this legislature aimed at getting rid of farmers all across Canada, not just in the west. They were aimed at getting rid of two out of every three farmers in the west and reducing the land to half, so that the one-third of the farmers left on half of the land that was left in use would make a reasonable living. All that was in the form of legislation brought into this House in 1969-70.

The worst and most notorious of this legislation was the LIFT program. It meant lower inventory for tomorrow; get the farmers out of production, in other words. In this Parliament, to its everlasting shame, that bill was put through. That bill that told farmers "if you do not do what your are told, you will lose your right to sell your product" meant that for the first time in our history a government organization without legal authority directed farmers to get out of producing the only product they knew how to produce, or they would lose the right to sell. That LIFT program was taken up by 87 per cent of the farmers. They went along with it and went out of production. The other 13 per cent who had enough reserves to get through without selling anything that year went ahead and produced. You guessed it; in 1972 the price went up to $5 a bushel, and all these farmers were sitting there with no grain in their granaries because they had been told to get out of production by the same government which sits here now. In all fairness I think every Liberal can understand the feeling of satisfaction the farmers have, because of the type of program they were getting, that a former minister, Otto Lang, is no longer with us. There is tremendous antagonism to a government which would come into a program with force like a socialist state saying, "We have decided we want less production, and out you go".

Then there was a program to get farmers to leave their farms and go into the cities. Government ministers and parliamentary secretaries went up and down the Ottawa Valley telling farmers there was no place for them on farms in the Ottawa Valley. They said that their young daughters and young sons could go to the cities and get jobs. These farmers in the Ottawa Valley are not that stupid. They know what happens to their daughters and sons when they go to evil cities like Ottawa. That meant that the Liberal member for that particular constituency had to leave town. He went off to a safe seat down in Niagara. Knowing all these things, one would think that the Liberal rank and file would begin to put pressure on their front benches and say, "Why are you doing these things to us?"

Time rolls on. As the price went up, as I said, in 1972 to $5 and the farmers got off this low price stuff and began to grow wheat again, sure enough we dropped our long-term agreements with Russia, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Hungary, Yugoslavia and, I believe, Albania and Roumania. We dropped all those long-term agreements for our wheat because, in the reasoning of the government, since there was no market in the future, why get our farmers trying to supply the market? So surpluses built up, and then there was the period of the price wars.

Going back a step, to 1968, the government of the day in Canada agreed with the United States to abandon the international wheat agreement, which was an international cartel composed of both consumers and producers. They decided every three years what the maximum and the ceiling price would be, and they competed between those two prices.

That period of stability for which the farmers had fought so hard ended in 1968, and since that time we have got into situations where price wars have occurred. It was not very pleasant for western farmers to see their Canadian Wheat Board on two separate occasions deliberately drop the price below the U.S. price in the hope of beating out the Americans. It did not result in that. It did not pay off because there was so much market development and, so much demand developing all over the world that the economists had not even read about it, and all this so-called surplus was soaked up. After the price dipped, it gradually came back again. That is what fooled them on this legislation. They thought that because there was no market for grain in the world because too many farmers were producing, they had to bring in legislation. They would give them a little bit, but not allow them to get anything higher than a certain amount. That is why we heard the minister quote those figures today. The way this act is worked out, up until 1978, if I heard him correctly, there was a subsidy to farmers of about $76 million, but the subsidy to consumers—that is when the farmer was losing out—was $396 million. So what we have is five or six times more subsidy going to consumers, whom the act was not supposed to benefit particularly. The act was supposed to help the farmers and provide that long talked about dream that they would have the same treatment as the manufacturers get here in eastern Canada. They get a higher than world price for domestic consumption, and the farmers thought they were going to get a little bit extra for their wheat. Instead of that, there was a subsidy to the farmers of $76 million, but most of it went to the consumers, or $396 million of it. That is why I call it fraud. To come along here today and say we want to get rid of this legislation and make this act come into effect in 1978 so we will not have to pay any obligations to these producers I think is part of a whole system of fraud.

I am not going to mention the oil fact. I think the hon. member for Vegreville was quite correct when he said that it seems very strange to westerners that even to the extent of breaking the Constitution because of pressure in Ottawa the government has to ask westerners in the oil provinces to take a price less than half the world price. The governments of the west have been fairly generous; they have offered to let us have it for 75 per cent of the world price. But all we can get out of the government here is 40 per cent. This will all change in September. The businessmen of the east have now realize that they are paying a price for not having jobs for their people. As a result, I think we will see a change come this September.

On this question of a two-price system, I think we should call this effort what it really is, namely, a mistaken effort to try to help producers which resulted primarily in a consumer subsidy. Now that it has certain obligations, the government wants to get out of them and add one more black mark to those the government has been collecting over the last 12 years.

I had a list here of all the things which have been done with the legislation over the years, but the minister covered those fairly well. I would like to go on to the principles which I think will be of some use to the government if it decides to continue this type of legislation. At the present time I think the most decent thing it could do would be to drop the legislation, say it made a mistake, pay its obligations and get out of it. However, there is some argument for us to try to keep on and see if we cannot put up some form of two-price wheat legislation which does provide rough equity for the farmer who has to sell nearly all his wheat on the export market so that at least he gets the same smount of protection when he sells in the home market, and I refer to the same amount of protection given to the people in the protected industries here in Ontario and Quebec. I think that would be a worth-while motive, but this legislation in its present form should not be dropped until the situation has been cleared away and the government has made its intentions clear. It certainly should not drop it until it has paid its obligations.

Getting on to other subjects about which I wanted to speak, I would like to say just a word about the wider question of western alienation in reference to this bill. I do not hold this against the present Minister of Transport at all. I am aiming my remarks, quite frankly, at the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board in the hope that he will carry out what he has stated his intentions to be, and that is to inform the present cabinet and caucus of the Liberal party about some of the real causes of western alienation and at the same time to put forward positive, constructive proposals.

One of these proposals is to make certain the railways are aware of the recommendations of the Hall commission report. It is very clear to me that the railways are going to pay no attention to those recommendations. They have gone out of their way to try to subvert members of Parliament and the public to the view that they must have an adjustment above the Crowsnest rates for the hauling of grain. The Hall commission report refused to accept that proposal. The railways have to learn to accept it as well. They are not going to get a change in the Crow rates. Furthermore, they should look at the positive proposal in that report, namely to increase their marketing efforts and increase their volume. With a large proportion, 40 per cent, of fixed costs, every time you increase the volume you decrease the unit cost. I would think in a decade they can put those railways into running order, making money, and there will be no more talk about the Crow rates.

This has all happened before. We had a lot of pressure years ago on the Crow rate which culminated in the MacPherson report of 1958 to 1962, I believe. That report took the same position: We will pay your losses, but get out and make money. The push to get rid of the Crow rates suddenly stopped in 1966, because in the period from 1962 to 1965 there was such an increase in tonnage that the railways began to make money. When that happened in 1966, the then minister of transport, Mr. Pickersgill, got up and said never again will the Crow rates come up in this House because the figures show they are making money out of hauling grain. They had doubled their traffic in a short space of time before their costs caught up and they were ahead. I make that point because that is going to happen again. When we start moving our potash and coal out of the west, not to mention lumber, pulp and paper, gravel and other products, the railways will begin to make money, and there is no need for the public Treasury to help profitable companies such as the big railways.

I think that is the first point I would like passed on to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. He has to play his part by making certain that under the Canadian Wheat Board Act the railways do co-ordinate with the grain companies and the Wheat Board. He has to know that the railways can make more money out of hauling potash and coal, and he also has to remind them that they have obligations to haul grain under the Railway Act. If you get all those things working and the railways know you are determined to see that they do it, then they will do it. However, they are tough bargainers and this has to be remembered.

My next point is with reference to the Wheat Board. I do not think the Wheat Board can continue unprotected as it is now for much longer. When it was set up in 1935, it was a two-way board. Private marketing was allowed as well as marketing through the Wheat Board. Then in 1939 four pieces of legislation were prepared and introduced in this House to get rid of the Wheat Board. However, they were saved by the fact there was a war on and the civil service here recognized that we have an agency in place to control the price of a major commodity, namely, grain. So the board was saved as a price control mechanism during the war. After the war it was carried on as a price control mechanism until we got rid of the rules and regulations dealing with the special powers during the war.

So the Wheat Board started off as a price control mechanism, but if you read the act, it does not have the powers to control. These powers, which I will not go into in detail, do not exist but the Wheat Board has been allowed to carry on reasonably independently all during these years. There was interference with the Wheat Board by C.D. Howe. When certain grain companies were not selling, he called them in, read them the riot act, and then they would sell a little more. The only other interference until 1963 was by myself, and I explained that to the House, when I asked the Wheat Board to do certain things they were not required to do under the act, and they did that. The Wheat Board was very glad that I did interfere and got them to do things that, in their judgment, they should not have done. It turned out to be very profitable for the farmers and for the reputation of the Wheat Board.

Starting in 1968 we had another kind of interference with the Wheat Board, not reported back to this House, and it slowly lost its independence. The biggest example of that was the LIFT program. No self-respecting head of the board would carry out that program. They knew it was against the law, they had no power to do it, and so the man there resigned and went to a higher place. A new man was put in and the board had to carry out that LIFT program knowing they were doing something wrong and that they had been interfered with. Then as these price wars started, they would receive letters from the minister instructing them to be competitive. They knew what that meant: drop their price, start a price war. We thought we could remedy these sorry occasions of interference by putting in an elected advisory board to replace the old appointed advisory board. All parties in this House supported that initiative. They were supposed to be there to advise the Wheat Board on policy and sales, to put forward ideas to help the marketing of grain.

Now, I want the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board to stand up for these people and give them a chance to offer input and ideas. However, on this particular legislation they were never asked for advice. It is a case of completely ignoring the very people that you set up to advise the Wheat Board. I am not an authority on the legal aspects of this, but I hear that this bill as originally passed by Parliament was changed in 1978 by order in council and the Wheat Board took over the setting of prices. I am not too sure that was a perfectly correct way of doing it. However, I would like to see the advisory group deal with these problems so they can have some input into the Wheat Board. Instead of that, I suspect the Wheat Board is putting a lot of pressure on the advisory board as to how they should think and act.

I could go on for some time on this subject, Mr. Speaker. It used to be that it was talked about in this House a great deal. However, I see it is close to four o'clock, so may I call it four o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I wonder if the government House leader could indicate his intentions with respect to the legislative program we will be dealing with on Monday and Tuesday, if he can.

Mr. Pinard: My hon. colleague knows well that it is difficult for me to specify the business for Tuesday since we have agreed among the House leaders to meet at 1.30 p.m. on Monday to deal with a reasonable package for the rest of the week. In so far as Monday is concerned, I announced yesterday that we were to go on with Bill S-6 and Bill C-12 but there is a slight change. The intention is to go on with second reading of Bill S-6 and if we complete that on Monday, we will follow with Bill C-67 and then Bill C-53.

So that is the order of business for Monday. This is subject to change if, following our meeting on Monday, we all agree on something different. However, we will definitely meet on Monday to talk about the business for the rest of the week.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister whether he will look at Bill C-60, to which there is a Senate amendment, to see whether that might be dealt with some day next week?

• (1600)

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I will look at that. I suspect the hon. member will put it on his list for the meeting on Monday.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[Translation]

Items Nos. 18 and 22 allowed to stand by unanimous consent.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There is agreement that we will consider Bill C-225.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PROFIT-SHARING BY EMPLOYEES IN BUSINESS

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General) moved:

That Bill C-225, to promote profit-sharing by the employees in business, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

She said: Mr. Speaker, it is a great honour for me to launch the debate in second reading of Bill C-225, to promote profit-sharing by employees in business. The principle of this bill is very simple. Employees can contribute usefully to the management of corporations and when they do so, we shall all benefit from the ensuing increase in productivity. To this end, the bill promotes participation in management.

For the information of hon. members, I shall give an outline of the main provisions of Bill C-225, which will amend the Canada Business Corporations Act. First it provides, in the case of a corporation with over 100 employees, for a class of shares to be held exclusively by the employees of the corporation. This will make these employees directly interested in the performance of their corporation. A thriving corporation, Mr. Speaker, brings benefits to its employees and to the economy of the country as a whole. Certain members may wonder why this bill covers only corporations with over 100 employees. The reason for this, Mr. Speaker, is that the others already offer some kind of incentive with ownership participation. Indeed, such companies are sometimes established by a group of promoters who each hold a share in the company. However, the attraction of this provision resides mostly in the fact that successful corporations will expand, thrive and eventually have over 100 employees.

I am thinking for instance about Performance Sailcraft Ltd., a company from my own town. Its beginnings were very modest. At first, some encouragement was provided for the employees in the form of profit-sharing agreements. Today, Performance Sailcraft Ltd. enjoys an excellent reputation for its magnificent craft, the Laser, and has several plants and hundreds of employees. This shows the success of this program. Other members may wonder why this bill provides for a special class of shares for these employees. There are many reasons for this, Mr. Speaker, the first being to provide more stability in the value of these shares, which would be held only by employees and could not be bought or sold for short term speculation. From the point of view of the corporation, this also ensures a stable source of investment capital which would not be subject to the fluctuations of the stock market. The second reason is that these would be preferential or ordinary shares, depending on the formula chosen, with the employees being entitled to receive dividends before they are paid to other shareholders.

That provision gives priority to the employee over the simple shareholder. The employees are the lifeblood of the business and this provision confirms it. Finally, that special class of shares would allow the corporation to pay dividends to its employees by issuing new shares instead of paying out cash. As you can see, Mr. Speaker, the burden of dividend payments becomes that much lighter and the number of shares held by employees that much greater. In these days of high rates of interest, that type of corporate financing which allows the company to retain its profits through the issue of new shares to its employees is by far preferable to any other form of financing, such as the issue of new shares on the general market or borrowing on the money market at extremely high rates of interest.

May I give an example of such a plan, that of The Shawinigan Engineering Co. Ltd. of Montreal. For a long time its employees have held shares as part of their fringe benefits, which is an excellent incentive since their salaries depend on the company's balance sheet. The performance of the business and what the employee makes are one and the same thing.

Experiments along those lines in the United States and elsewhere reflect the advantages of such agreements. A number of companies have noticed that this measure has cut down the rate of absenteeism. Fewer employees leave their employer which reduces the very costly rate of turnover and the need to find replacements. Waste goes down and the quality of production improves. Better still, new channels of communications are opened because the employees make suggestions on ways to improve working methods. For the Canadian branches of multinational corporations this procedure can also prove to be one way of regaining control over our economy since the employees are the new shareholders of the company.

The second significant feature of Bill C-225, Mr. Speaker, is that it provides for the presence of two employees on the board of directors of the company. That is a new element which derives from the success of Mitbestimmung—that is co-management—in West Germany. Co-management is another way of acknowledging that the employees can do a lot to ensure the efficient operation of the business, confirming their dual role of shareholders and employees, and enabling them to have their say in decisions which affect them. Besides, having those two employees sit on the board of directors might be a temporary expedient until such time as the employees hold enough shares to elect their own representatives to the board in the same way as the other shareholders. Those managers-employees take some of the mystery out of the corporate operations. It is one way for the employees to keep abreast of its productivity and share in the decision-making process. That is all the more important since the Canadian employees are left out in the cold when decisions are taken thousands of miles away in the international board rooms of some of our major companies. The bill will correct that situation and, I hope, improve the quality of decisions. When someone mentions the presence of employees on the board of directors, we are immediately reminded of the Chrysler Corporation which last year called upon United Auto Workers President, Doug Fraser, to join its board. That was an excellent move which will no doubt benefit this financially troubled car maker. I do regret, however, that the corporation waited until it was in financial straits before making such a good move.

As far as this bill is concerned, I did not specify how the two employee-directors would be appointed nor how the change would take place. I think it is best to leave that up to each individual corporation and its employees. However, corporations could comply with this provision by extending the membership of their board of directors. One of the objectives of this measure is to widen the decision-making base and to this end there is no doubt that an expanded board would be an asset. The choice of employee-directors is also left up to employees and corporations. Periodic elections would, however, ensure their integrity. The only provision dealing with the selection of employee-directors contained in Bill C-225 would allow the board to fill a vacancy by way of an appointment so that its work would not be disturbed by an unexpected vacancy. Some members may also wonder about the unions' role in all this. The first time the Federal Republic of Germany passed legislation on co-management, some observers were concerned that unions would find themselves in conflict of interest situations. These fears were of course unwarranted, as experience has shown. Unions continued to elect their own representatives who are responsible for negotiating salaries and working conditions. Employees elected to the board of directors other representatives responsible for the over-all management of the corporation. Even a thorough search would likely not reveal any conflict of interest.

The bill will have a positive effect on labour-management relations in that it will lessen the negative aspects of labour relations. Too often, nowadays, unions and corporations find themselves involved in long and bitter strikes, such as the one at United Aircraft in Longueuil, or plant shutdowns. These disputes are costly and leave scars that can take years to heal. Some in fact never heal and the company has to close down leaving its employees out of work. In such cases, everyone loses, the company, the employees and the people in general. This bill will therefore reduce that type of conflicts by promoting team spirit and improving relations with employees.

Why do we need such a bill? Allow me to say a few words about the legislation now in effect and its application to profit-sharing by employees and to point out why it is no longer adequate. Reference is made to profit-sharing plans in sections 144 and 147 of the Income Tax Act. Those sections set forth the various types of plans, but such particulars are unimportant in this short statement. Briefly, employers are authorized to pay part of their profits in profit-sharing plans, their contributions being deductible for income tax purposes. However, Mr. Speaker, this provision applies especially to pension or superannuation funds and is not meant to improve productivity. It is deficient in several respects, Mr. Speaker, and I think the bill I introduced will promote better understanding between employer, and employees rather than encourage savings.

At the present time, profit-sharing schemes do not make it possible for corporations to invest in their own shares. Although theoretically they are allowed to do so, few of them do and as a result investments in a great many profit-sharing schemes are made in other securities. In the case of small businesses, most profit-sharing schemes are substitutes to pension plans. Their main purpose being to provide employees with an income after retirement rather than to increase their profit-sharing. I suggest, therefore, that the time has come for us to re-examine those tax provisions dealing with profit-sharing. I hope other hon. members will introduce amendments to favour a greater share in profit by employees and make it possible for them to acquire shares.

Mr. Speaker, we could put forward many other arguments in favour of this bill, but as we are pressed for time, I should like to hear what other members have to say about this. In conclusion, I should like to add that I have collected much material on profit-sharing schemes in several other countries, which I will gladly share with hon. members when this bill comes before our Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for a more detailed study.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette). I am in support of the principle of this bill and I would like to say a few words with respect to it. I do so on the grounds that the parliamentary secretary asked for the opinions of her colleagues on this matter. I assume she meant her colleagues on all sides of the House. I note that the New Democratic Party is represented in considerable numbers today.

Mr. Knowles: Twice as many as you have.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I am sure they will have something to say about this bill as well, since the purpose of it is important. It is to promote greater participation by corporate employees in the profits and management of corporations. In the participative model which is presented in this bill, and there could be a variety of models, the employees of a corporation with over 100 employees are enabled to acquire shares on the one hand and, on the other, adequate representation for employees on the board of directors would be ensured so that they would have some part in corporate decision-making.

What this bill really says, and what it is saying quite clearly, is that not only do shareholders, the investors in a company, the proprietors so-called, have a share in the prosperity of the company and the work which it might do, but the person who works on the line, in the shop or in the office has exactly the same interest in the maintenance of that company. That does not just include the appropriate membership in a union which may represent the workers at that particular shop, but goes far beyond that. There is a necessity, indeed a requirement, for those people, if they are to realize the full ambit of their work in that organization, to have some say in the direction in which the company may be headed. The workers have a stake in the future of the business and that stake goes beyond just having a job. In effect it means taking part in the decisions which will affect how the job is being done and what effect it will have on the company.

I will not comment on the detail of the bill. That is something which a committee might deal with, if the subject matter ever reaches a committee. If the hon. member's colleagues do not follow their usual practice of talking out their own members' bills—and I hope they will not do that in this case, in fact, I pray they will not—then this matter can go to committee for further study.

As to the special categories of shares, those are matters which can be worked out in the committee. The principle of this bill is clear. If it is passed, then we will have advanced the case against the two solitudes which seem to exist in Canada with respect to the relationship between employers and employees. The parliamentary secretary mentioned a number of unfortunate work stoppages. Over the years it seems we have adopted a confrontational approach which perhaps grew out of necessity—indeed, it did grow out of necessity and neglect on the part of many employers. Both employers and workers have a stake in the future of business. All of them together, and all of us together, have a stake in the future of the country. If we are to advance ourselves in competition with trading nations, then I think we must adopt, or at least look into, some of the commitments which those major factors in Canadian commercial life have heretofore dealt with in solitude. I regret that the Canadian Labour Congress withdrew from the triumvirate arrangements. It may have had reason to but it is still a matter of regret.

If we are to advance in labour, management and ownership, the workers and the government must realize in some way that an element of partnership must exist. This means that one partner must not tread on the other. It is a good thing that we look at this bill. I think we should also look at tax incentives. I happened to have the privilege of being minister of national revenue and I wish to tell the parliamentary secretary that within that department there is the expertise to come up with programs and plans to provide for tax incentives, incentives which would move business in this direction. I think that there is a feeling among Canadian workers that their stake in their jobs is greater than it ever was before. If there is ever an indication of the importance of the worker in corporate decision-making, it is in the presence of the union leader on the board of directors of the company, as the hon. member has said, that company which is having difficulty, and all of us hope that it will survive in the end, but a company which is having difficulty because the industry is having difficulty. I think this is something we should support.

Finally, I would like to say something about a labour-management matter which exists right now involving the Government of Canada and the postal workers. Right now we are moving into a new era. This House and the Senate passed the Post Office Corporation Act. We have moved the postal service of this country from the point of being a service provided by a government department in the traditional sense to becoming a business corporation. It is hiring a manager at a tremendous salary. I think his responsibilities will be in accordance with his salary. At least they ought to be, and if they are not, he ought not to keep his job. If it is to be a corporation, then it ought to run like every other corporation and provide a service. If it is reasonable to ask, as the hon. member has asked, that a firm with 100 or more employees allow the creation of a kind of sharing arrangement in the ownership, and thereby in the fruits of the ownership, then I hope that this debate will not be lost on the government. If we are to have the corporate set-up, if we are to have all the benefits of the labour relations code, I think it is perhaps time that we also have the opportunity to give it to those employees so they can share in the profits of that association. The government, the employees and the people will have some incentive to see that operation work, differently, apparently, than has the department, because that is the reason we are moving. It is to move out of one area which has not proven itself successful, I guess, into something else.

I think that perhaps my friend, the hon. member for London-Middlesex (Mr. Bloomfield), who is sitting on the backbench smiling at me right now and nodding his head in agreement, should perhaps take the message to the people in the front benches that they ought to consider a plan for that new corporation where the employees would have a stake in the continued operation of that corporation and, therefore, in the service of the country. I do not know how Your Honour translates it, but I think there are a great number of people in this country who would not mind that kind of sharing arrangement if they could see, as a result, the service continue.

As the hon. member pointed out, that is not to say that this would involve in any way a conflict between the employer on the one hand and the employees' union on the other. There is a great deal to unionism which goes beyond strikes. From time to time unions get a bad name because of strikes. However, there is a great deal which goes beyond strikes. These include conditions of work, hours of work, safety, and a whole host of other things outside the whole question which we always hear about, that management-union relations and strikes are part of the unions' responsibility. The fact that there have been great advances for working men and women in Canada since Confederation, I think, is something that can be laid at the feet of militant unionism.

I came from a small town where they produced—all hon. members have heard of it—Mazola, Crown brand corn starch. It was a plant which operated for years, the Canada Starch Company, under a benevolent owner. People decided to organize that plant. At the time it was organized, they said that would be the end of the plant, they could never make a profit, they would have to close down, they would have to do this, and they would have to do that. They went through all those early traumatic beginnings. Then, United Food Processors came to that plant. As a result, wages increased. Of course they increased, as they would have increased under the benevolent owner, although perhaps not as much. They have had a relatively peaceful history of labour negotiations.

However, from the point of view of the working man and woman in that plant, not only has his or her pay package increased, but working conditions have been better. They never thought they should have showers in a place which was dusty and dirty. Now they have showers. They never thought that there was any safety problem in the machine shops and in the moving parts of the factory. It was brought to attention by the safety people in the union, and a benevolent management recognized that as an oversight and dealt with it. As a result of the marketing stance of that company, the town is prosperous and the business is expanding. It provides employment and excellent working conditions for the people who likely would not have achieved the same conditions but for the existence of the union and the confrontation which took place. They are at this stage now.

I think that one could say of that company, although it is a large one, that perhaps the time has come when a company like that might consider sharing its profit and its management decisions with people who have the greatest stake in the company, the investors themselves. That is the purpose of the bill. I think if it can eliminate the two solitudes or the three solitudes, business, government and labour in this country, then I think the principle is one worth promoting.

In fact, I may say to the hon. member that she is likely on the cutting edge of a change of attitude in Canada with respect to this matter. I commend her for bringing forward the bill. If no one on her side had seconded it, I would have seconded it. I hope that somehow or other her friends will not talk the bill out and that somehow or other at least the subject matter of the bill would get to a committee. As a matter of fact, if I had a motion in my hand, I would propose it myself. If there is an hon. member who would propose that, then I would be prepared to support the reference of the subject matter to a committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to commend the hon. member for having moved the bill. It is not a novel concept by any means if one looks at world events; but the time has come for this idea in Canada. While I can hardly imagine that by itself it will resolve all the labour problems which creep into society from time to time, I am sure that it will go a long way toward making people feel as if their efforts in the workplace were of some value. All too often, the attitude is that there is management on the one hand and labour on the other, that somehow or other each has a peculiar thing that they can offer and that there is no way that one or the other can infringe on the opposition's area of expertise. I think that is wrong.

I want to say to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette) that I think it is important that we take a look at this matter. I do not want to leave the wrong impression. I do not think that this will be an easy task, by any means. I do not think that moving from the current labour relations attitudes, from the current management prerogatives attitude, to an over-all situation which will embrace the involvement of the so-called workers in the management decisions will come with ease.

I am positive that just as it took a great deal of time and effort to build the labour relations structure which is presently in place—even with all of its faults, it works very well in the main; it works very well in most instances—just as it took a long time to develop the trust and to get people to accept it, it will take a long time for us to get the whole idea of the democratization of the workplace to reach a level of similar acceptance. That should not in any way inhibit us from trying. That should not stop us, as the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has just said, from having the matter studied further and having recommendations come back to the House of Commons to be dealt with in far more detail.

It is a very complex topic. To support the principle is not necessarily to support all of the detail. The detail does not necessarily always work in the way in which it is conjured up for the purposes of the creation of one bill. But I think that if the government really believes that this is a worthwhile move and that the way to improve the labour relations situation is to involve Canadians in Canadian enterprise, to encourage the commitment of Canadian workers to the companies for which they work and also to Canada as a whole, then the government might look at its own obligation in this regard, and rather than show the way, lead the way.

There is within the civil service, whether it be in the Post Office to which I intend to make reference or in the many Crown corporations which are tied to the government, ample opportunity to enable workers to become involved in management decisions and thus show to private enterprise and the public that this kind of democratization of the workplace can yield substantial results.

Reference was made earlier to the experience in Germany of co-determination which has worked reasonably well. Not too long ago I was in Germany and indeed I spent quite a bit of time there some years ago discussing that very matter. I saw how workers can be encouraged and can be elected to management boards.

People on the floor of the shop take part in the decision-making. Who knows better about the way the assembly line works than the man or woman whose place is there? Who knows better whether it is being used to its full capacity or if there are ways of improving productivity, of improving safety, of encouraging the worker to share the expertise which can only be gained by pushing the buttons, measuring the stock, taking the finished material and checking it over? Surely that expertise ought to be available to those who may never have worked in the shop but who may have received their education in a university or community college. They are hired to manage but do not know how things really work in the shop from personal knowledge.

I have always felt that if we were to tap the brains of the individuals who make the product and allow them to take part in making decisions about the allocation of resources, the way the line works, hours of work and the assignment of responsibility, then the work place would be more productive and happier. That would make for a better society in general.

It is a shame about a place like Johns-Manville, which comes to mind, where it was well known that working conditions were contributing to the development of lung cancer in workers. The workers knew this but the managers who sat in their air-conditioned offices some distance away from the shop, continued to resist year after year the call to clean the place up and make it safer. In the final analysis, government had to pass a law to protect the workers.

Had the workers been able to participate in management, that need not have had happened. They could have made representations about the benefit that would flow to the corporation if their recommendations were implemented. They would have been more productive and their health and safety would have been protected.

I can think of many, many other examples, where the process proposed by the hon. member for Mercier could be helpful.

For years there has been talk about profit sharing. Perhaps Dominion Foundaries and Steel Limited is the largest profit sharing company in the country. There is no question that the people who work for that company in Hamilton, many of whom are my neighbours, have a great deal of loyalty to it. They may argue from time to time about working conditions, they may feel aggravated or think that they deserve better—that is human nature and I suppose from time to time they are right—but I know from speaking to them that as a result of profit sharing there is far more loyalty to that corporation than there is to others manufacturing similar products.

When the workers see production levels and profit margins increase, they feel that it is worthwhile to put more effort into their work. At the end of the year they can see the company-matched profit sharing plan grow by leaps and bounds and know that is is available for them in the future. Such a plan must be implemented willingly, but when it is, the benefit flows not only to the workers in the plant, but to the company and, perhaps more important, to the nation.

I think that key elements of the industrial strategy about which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) has been speaking, must be the degree to which we are prepared to allow the people of Canada to participate in decisions about the manufacturing process, and the way in which we harness the resources of this country in the interest of this and future generations.

We are delighted to support this bill and see it sent to committee for study, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the sponsor if she would consider saying, when presenting it to cabinet, that if the government were to alter its attitude toward its own employees, involve them in the decision-making processes and show by example that it has faith in its own employees to the extent that it is prepared to invite them to become part of management and if it can show that this results in increased productivity and a better atmosphere in the work place as well as reduced costs, then there might be less difficulty in selling her bill to the private sector.

Someone mentioned the Post Office. What can one say about that, Mr. Speaker? It is hard to believe that a better attitude could not have been developed within the Post Office, and I think the hon. member would agree with that. I cannot imagine that profit sharing would work there, but I think the hon. member could appreciate that if workers had been involved in the management of the postal service and the operation of the Post Office, we might not have a strike today.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): What about efficiency bonuses?

Mr. Deans: I do not know how that would be managed; perhaps from the sale of stamps! Efficiency is very much a function of the way in which the management system operates.

● (1640)

An hon. Member: Are you for or against the bill?

Mr. Deans: I think you heard me say that I am for it. Sorry, you were not here, but before you came in to the chamber, I said I was for it.

At any rate, in the case of the Post Office, if you were to look at the way in which it has operated, it was bad management decisions which put in those extremely large sorting houses which have mail move from one municipality to another and back simply for that purpose. The people who work for the Post Office, at least those to whom I spoke, said that the system would not work, that it would be less efficient and that it should not be implemented. When they were saying that to me, they were also saying it to their own managers. They were saying that the system was not a good idea, that it would not work, that the sorting machines, and the way in which this procedure had been separated out from the normal process that used to be there and worked very well, should not be implemented. If this kind of participation had been encouraged by government, and if management had been encouraged to listen to the workers, and if the workers had had their ideas incorporated, I say to the hon. member who smiles that we would not have the mess we have today. Because I happen to believe that is true, I feel it is worthwhile supporting the bill.

It is strange that any time workers are asked to participate in a company, at least in historical terms, it is when a company is in terrible shape. Companies never come forward and ask for participation when things are going reasonably well. They only come forward and ask when things are the pits, when a company is on the downslide and near the bottom. Then companies are eager to have everybody's participation, workers and government alike.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is what we have to make sure does not happen.

Mr. Deans: I think we have to be cautious. I did not say always, I said almost without exception, and I always leave a little leeway for those unusual circumstances, which the hon. member can no doubt recall, given his vast memory.

That has always happened, in my experience. Doug Fraser was not asked to sit on the board of Chrysler when Chrysler was doing well. In fact, when it was suggested they might be prepared to participate in the days when Chrysler was doing well, they were told to mind their own business. I think we have to try to break that syndrome. That is what this bill does, and that is why it is worthy of support.

In any event, speaking on behalf of most of my colleagues—

Mr. Knowles: All of us.

Mr. Deans: —here and absent they would be prepared to see the matter discussed further.

I have one last point. It always seems strange to me how companies respond to this kind of thing. When profits are up, companies do not want to share because they need the profit for the future. They say that, after all, they invested their money and are, therefore, entitled to their return. But when profits are down, companies simply lay off workers. It is a strange system under which we operated. In my opinion, a lot of education is required before we will be able to change the minds of the corporate sector. I hope that, with the Liberal and Conservative parties representing primarily the corporate sector, given that they have offered their support to the bill, they will be able to lobby their friends in the corporate boardrooms and encourage them to accept this very enlightened view. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we will have no difficulty with the very enlightened leaders of the trade unions in getting them to accept that this kind of move is necessary and worthwhile. We will do our job. I wish you well in yours.

Profit-sharing by Employees

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has asked me to speak very briefly, and I will. I just want to reiterate what he has said and what the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) has said.

We are debating what I believe to be a most important issue for the country. My colleague, the hon. member for Montreal-Mercier (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette) has drawn attention to one of the most pressing problems facing Canada today. It is her hope, and for that matter the hope of every responsible member of this House, that we might find some way, some mechanism, for continuing industrial peace in this country.

My colleague has gone further than that. She has stated that the objective of the bill before us now is not only harmonious relations between labour and management across Canada but continued and even increased productivity and profitibility of Canadian corporations from coast to coast.

As is stated in the bill before us, which I will paraphrase, it is recommended that businesses incorporated under the Canada Business Corporations Act create a special class of shares to be held by its employees, that holders of those shares have a prior right to dividend payments, and that employees be represented by two of their number on the board of directors of the corporation. These amendments would apply to all federally incorporated businesses with over 100 employees. I do not think it can be argued that my hon. colleague had anything other than the best interests of the nation in mind when she proposed the amendments to the current legislation. Considering the problems facing us and facing others in the western industrialized world, I believe this kind of innovative thinking and fresh approach is needed now and will be needed even more in the future.

If I may, I wish to speak to the two major provisions of my colleague's proposal. Looking first at the question of profit sharing, I agree with my colleague that employee ownership of shares in their own company provides a strong psychological and financial commitment to a particular corporation. I wonder, however, if the British, Scandinavian and French employee profit sharing incentives will, as Professor Ziegal points out, prove to be an exercise in discount buying and short-term profit taking. Studies in those countries have shown an overwhelming tendency on the part of employees to sell their company shares approximately eight months after purchase.

On the other hand, there is significant experience in this country among major corporations in this area. A fairly large number of Canadian-based corporations offer discount share options to their employees and, from all reports, employees are taking advantage of such an investment opportunity. While I am in full agreement with my colleague from Montreal-Mercier, there is nothing in the current Canada Business Corporations Act, to prevent employees from investing in their own corporation.

Second, considering the current economic difficulties shared by all western industrialized nations, it could be argued that the proposed amendment to the Canada Business Corporations Act carries with it an implication of compulsion that might prove detrimental to corporate activity and expansion. I want to make it clear that I believe the passage of the profit sharing provisions of the proposed amendment involve not a difference of opinion between myself and my colleague, but rather a difference in the consideration of appropriate timing.

On the whole, I cannot but commend my hon. colleague for her foresight in bringing to the consideration of this chamber such a progressive proposal. I cannot characterize the bill as radical because its inherent logic and inevitability are evident. However, because of the questions I have raised and certain other questions in the minds of some of us, I believe it would be short-changing business and labour in Canada if we as Parliament adopted any measure of this potential magnitude without a complete and fair investigation and debate.

In that connection, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) that the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:

Bill C-225, an Act to promote profit-sharing by employees in business be not now read a second time but that the Order be discharged, the Bill withdrawn and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

● (1650)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those in favour please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

I declare the amendment carried.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall the motion, as amended, carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Accordingly, the order is discharged, the bill is withdrawn and the subject matter thereof is referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having now expired, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 4.51 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

SINKING OF "ARCTIC EXPLORER" OFF NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Some time on the morning of July 3 the Canadian motor vessel Arctic Explorer sank off the northern tip of Newfoundland with the loss of 13 lives. From the time the vessel was reported missing it took over five hours to get search aircraft in the area. This could have been a critical factor. The commanding officer of the search and rescue co-ordinating centre in Halifax said in an interview last December 26:

The Canadian armed forces rescue co-ordination centre here is so short of manpower and aircraft it could not respond to a mid-ocean tragedy.

He went on to say:

—we need fixed wing support out of Gander, Newfoundland.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House directs the Minister of National Defence to take immediate steps to have fixed wing aircraft stationed in Newfoundland in order to reduce the critical time factor in getting search operations under way off the coast of Newfoundland and in the northwest Atlantic.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLITICAL PARTIES

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY CONVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas reports out of Vancouver indicate that the gaggle of NDP members visiting that city last weekend are in intellectual and political disarray; and whereas 37 per cent of that flock of honourable socialist birds denounced their leader's unfortunate tendency to honk in unison with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That this House console the dissident members of the little red rump by granting their leader leave to spend the rest of his term in Cuba, El Salvador or wherever—without pay.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

SEARCH AND RESCUE

NEED FOR ADDITIONAL RESOURCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, like my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), my motion deals with the country's lack of funding, manpower and equipment for rescue co-ordination which is outlined again in the tragic circumstances of the loss of the Canadian survey ship Arctic Explorer off Newfoundland last Friday. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That the government immediately allocate more resources for better search and rescue capability on both coasts, particularly at night, and cease the delay and procrastination in following the advice of men such as Captain Powick who warned many months ago, and I quote, "We need fixed wing support out of Gander, Newfoundland; we have requested it but perhaps someone will wait until we have a tragedy and then suggest it."

Now is the time to do something before we have another tragedy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PARLIAMENT

CALL FOR ABOLITION OF SENATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett), I move:

That this House notes that in addition to its being an undemocratic, non-responsible and virtually useless although very expensive institution, the Senate has now been humiliated by a Prime Minister who treats it as a joke, a toy to be played with to suit his own purposes, and this House, as a humanitarian gesture, calls for the immediate abolition of the Senate, so that Their Honours in that other place can be put out of their misery.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY CONVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that the NDP have just concluded a convention which they began by barring a segment of the press, then proceeded to advocate withdrawal from NATO, a ban on the mining and export of uranium, and a constitutional position repugnant to their only elected provincial government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski):

That the Leader of the NDP explain to the House why the insult to western opinion was not made complete by a resolution condemning wheat farmers for not selling their grain at a loss.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

SERVICE STATION LEASING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas some large oil companies are increasing the rents to lessees of service stations at exorbitant figures, making it next to impossible for the lessees to make a reasonable standard of living, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson):

That this House urges the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to carry out an investigation to ascertain if these increases are in accordance with fair practices for small business and/or if this is a left-handed way of getting rid of lessees, and thereby tightening monopolistic control.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

MECHANISM TO REDRESS HIGH OPERATING COSTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the federal Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has had meetings with representatives of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association and the Ontario Federation of Agriculture which have certainly identified the financial disaster faced by the red meat industry, particularly in Ontario; and whereas the federal Minister of Agriculture continues to befuddle the farmers, the public at large, financial experts, and even his own cabinet colleagues by his comments on agriculture and the economy; and since the Minister of Agriculture has not yet responded to the needs of the agricultural sector or been capable of influencing the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to address the specific problem in the red meat industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the Minister of Agriculture immediately establish a financing mechanism through farm credit or regular government banking institutions to redress high operating costs in agriculture.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

FUNDING FOR NORTHERN GAMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the federal government has repeatedly confirmed its commitment to amateur sport, and in view of the fact that the department of fitness and amateur sport has abdicated its responsibility for sport in the north to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer):

That this House express its outrage that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development would spent $35,000 on a film promoting the Northern Games while refusing to spend less than half that sum to insure that this year's Games will take place.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ATTENDANCE OF MR. FRIESEN AT NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY CONVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) attended the entire proceedings of the New Democratic Party convention in Vancouver, thereby learning how a political party should work and how, as was stated by Michael Valpy in his article this morning, the public issues of the day should be debated, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House congratulates the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta for his willingness to undertake this lesson in democratic politics, and regrets that no member of the Liberal party was willing to experience a similar uplifting experience.

POST OFFICE

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the disastrous effects on Canada's economy, particularly on the small business sector, and on those who rely on their fixed income pension cheques at the end of each month, caused by the strike of CUPW employees and the failure of the mails to move, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House require the government to bring in legislation now to get the mails moving again and to get the two sides back to the negotiating table.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

POLITICAL PARTIES

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY CONVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. During the past weekend in very solemn conclave, 62 per cent of the NDP voted to remain in bed with their leader and the Liberals, while over one third opted for the Tory position on the Constitution. During the same weekend they voted to withdraw from NATO to keep from associating with the United States, but to remain in NORAD where the United States is the only partner. The weekend has somewhat muddified their various positions. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the NDP issue a supplementary manifesto clarifying its position. It could be added to the Regina Manifesto so that the Saskatchewan NDP would have something to show for their very, very long weekend.

THE ECONOMY

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF EMERGENCY BUDGET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the rate of bankruptcies of all kinds continues to climb in Canada, whereas approximately 300 farming families, 10,000 small and large businesses and 30,000 individuals will succumb to bankruptcy by the end of 1981, and whereas the government's high interest rate policy is directly linked to his astonishing rate of business and personal failures, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer):

That this House condemn the Minister of Finance for his unnecessary punishment of Canadian businessmen, farmers and home owners, and call on him to table immediately an emergency budget which deals with the bankruptcy problem so that enterprising Canadians are not destined to defeat before they even begin to finance their businesses, farms and homes.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

POST OFFICE

TIMING OF PARLIAMENTARY SUMMER RECESS—EFFECT ON POSTAL STRIKE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It deals with the stand-off in the negotiations in the postal strike. On Friday the Prime Minister indicated the government's position on the strike when he said:

We have taken the clear position that there is no intention to settle this strike by legislation. It will, and should be settled by the bargaining process.

In view of what appears to be the present state of the negotiations, or the lack of negotiations, and that the government House leader indicated that the House may well rise on July 10 for a recess until the Wednesday following Thanksgiving, does the Prime Minister think it is wise to adjourn the House before this particular dispute has been resolved and settled? Will he in fact allow the House to recess over the summer months before the strike is resolved?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, my understanding is that our House leader has never indicated any precise date. I think the date of July 10 was mentioned by the Conservative House leader. We will adjourn as soon as the business before the House is completed in an acceptable fashion. I repeat that part of that business is not to legislate a return of the CUPW.

• (1415)

It seems to me that the union leaders have put themselves in a difficult position for us to satisfy them. Mr. Parrot has made it clear that, if legislated back to work, he would disobey the order. He seems to be making it clear by his actions that he does not want to return to the bargaining table. Therefore, I am at a loss to know what would advance negotiations or a settlement in this area. Certainly we do not want to legislate a union back for many reasons, but at this particular time when the union leader himself says that he would rather go to jail than obey the law I do not know why the hon. member would suggest legislation right now, under those circumstances.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, the proposition which the Prime Minister puts forward is a rather novel one. He says that he is afraid to legislate if there is some concern that the full force of law would not be brought to bear against those who do not obey it.

EFFECT OF STRIKE ON SMALL BUSINESS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the President of the Treasury Board. On June 30 the minister said:

—that members opposite have no monopoly on concern for the people of Canada and the difficulties they will have in enduring this strike.

I would like to ask the minister about his concern for the businessman, particularly the small businessmen of this country. As we all know, many businesses are staggering under the burden of the government's unprecedented interest rates. Bankruptcies are soaring. It is estimated by the Canadian Organization of Small Business that there will be between 1,000 and 1,500 bankruptcies per week as a result of the postal strike. Can the minister explain to the small business community how his concern will help them to remain solvent? I know that the minister's paycheck is delivered by messenger, but what about the rest of the people of Canada? What does he propose to do to help them?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I remain in contact with the small business community. I had a discussion with Mr. Bulloch this morning in order to get a feeling of what the circumstances are. He is monitoring the problems and the costs. I hope the banks are responsive to representations being made that where it is clear that accounts are mounting because of the postal strike, per se, consideration will be given to businessmen in those circumstances.

ROLE OF POSTMASTER GENERAL

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my final supplementary question is for the hidden cabinet minister in this whole business, that is, the Postmaster General, who I am sure has a passing interest in this matter. I am sure after what he did last year he has been kept out of the negotiations this year.

The Canada Post Corporation is scheduled to be brought into effect on September 1 of this year. I know that the Postmaster General will not want this new corporation to start up under the pall of having its employees on strike. Is it the minister's intention to proceed with the order in council which would bring the Crown corporation into effect on September 1 and to transfer the negotiations in this matter to the Crown corporation and away from the Treasury Board, or will he just sit by and let matters drift, allowing this strike to carry on for the duration of the summer and until Parliament reconvenes?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the date of September 1 is an objective we have in mind. Of course several events may occur between now and September 1 which will make it difficult to proclaim the act at that time. I simply want to remind the hon. member that nowhere is there a firm and written guarantee that the Act to establish the Canada Post Corporation will be proclaimed on September 1. It is a date we have set as an objective and the Post Office officials who are busy drafting the regulations and setting in motion the provisional mechanisms to change the department into a Crown Corporation will be ready around September 1. It is, unfortunately, too early for me to be in a position to say whether or not the proclamation will take place on that date.

DELIVERY OF SOCIAL SECURITY CHEQUES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, pensions, family allowances, veterans' allowances and unemployment insurance cheques are very important elements in many families for meeting their expenses these days. I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services in view of a response that he gave in the House on Friday. He said that at that time talks were under way with the letter carriers' union to see whether they would assist in the distribution of this type of cheque during the course of the postal strike. At that time he said that he was not sure what the status would be. I would ask the minister now if he could provide information to the House as to what the position will be regarding the delivery of these cheques in the future.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, if I understood the hon. gentleman's question properly, I can tell him that the negotiations, or at least the discussions with the LCUC have not as yet been completed. They are being conducted by officials within the administration of the Post Office. I might say to the hon. gentleman that while the indications are positive that the LCUC would carry through and would deliver the cheques, I insisted that that undertaking be given to me in writing. As I indicated on Friday, in the event that we are unable to obtain such an undertaking in writing, we will have a series of distribution centres throughout the country which will be responsible for the distribution of the socioeconomic cheques that the hon. gentleman has identified.

[Translation]

And those cheques, Madam Speaker, include, as I indicated on Friday, pension cheques, family allowances, old age security, the supplements and all pensions distributed throughout Canada, including the Canada Pension Plan benefits.

[English]

DELIVERY OF JUNE CHEQUES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. On Friday the minister did state that all the cheques which were due in the month of June had been delivered. I would point out that the information he had received is wrong. There are many of us on this side of the House who have received phone calls from individuals who expected those cheques. They have not been received.

I would first like to ask the minister what action he is proposing to ensure that those cheques are delivered. Second, in the establishment of the emergency distribution centres, would the minister take account of the problems which many individuals have in reaching these centres? As an example it is very awkward to get unemployment insurance cheques today in rural communities and in centres like Metropolitan Toronto. In Toronto the distribution centre is at Broadview and Queen. It is not convenient at all to the normal rapid transit services. In addition to that, the people who are expecting cheques do not know whether their cheques are in before they arrive down there, so they may take a long trip and find out that there are no cheques available. Would the minister ensure that there are more convenient means available to citizens to pick up these cheques when he is establishing this emergency distribution process?

Hon. J.-J Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I might indicate, first of all, with reference to the first part of the hon. gentleman's question, that I would appreciate it if all members of this House would advise me in the event that there are any cheques due in June which have not been received, and I will ensure that those cheques are forwarded as soon as practicable. If there are a number of them, that number has not been communicated to me.

I see that the hon. member for Yukon is identifying himself as one recipient who has not received his cheque.

Mr. Nielsen: No, no!

Mr. Blais: I would be pleased to receive further particulars relating to that particular failing.

In terms of the distribution centres, I might advise the hon. gentleman that we are attempting, in all instances, to have storefront operations for areas which are readily accessible to the total population. I would appreciate any co-operation that all hon. members of the House might be able to provide me in order to ensure that those individuals who are entitled to cheques are made aware of the circumstances of the distribution. As I also indicated on Friday, we have an advertising program which is being put in place in order to advise people within areas of where the distribution centres will be located and how the payments are to be effected.

GOVERNMENT STEPS TO RE-ESTABLISH NEGOTIATING PROCESS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, may I address a further question on the postal situation to the Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's clear statement on Friday, and again today, that the government does not intend to bring this dispute to a conclusion by introducing back to work legislation, a position with which he knows we agree, but in view of the seriousness of the situation, and the suffering that is being endured, what positive steps is the government prepared to take to try to re-establish the process of negotiating? To what extent is the government prepared to move in the hope that the other side might also move to a certain extent, so that the two parties can be got back to the bargaining table? Since the Prime Minister says that is the way it must be done, will the government do its part in getting back to the bargaining process?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as far as the first part of the question is concerned, which asks what the government is doing to try to have negotiations resume, I have a letter from the President of the Treasury Board, of which I am sure he would send a copy to the hon. member, indicating the times when we have attempted to get CUPW back to the negotiating table from which it withdrew the Friday before the strike. There were direct and indirect attempts to get them to come to the bargaining table, including, I believe, one at ten o'clock on Monday evening. The union leaders have consistently refused to come to the table.

In so far as the hon. member's suggestion is concerned, that I might indicate what we are prepared to do in order to incite them back, I would think that the hon. member is too experienced in matters of labour relations to think it would be appropriate for me to indicate any particular area where bargaining can and should take place. The process of bargaining should take place between union leaders and government representatives, not between the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, eminent as he is, and myself, as uneminent as I am.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON ITEMS IN JASMIN REPORT

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, first may I make it clear that I used the word "encourage", not the word "incite". May I say to the Prime Minister that we are prepared to admit that there have been faults on both sides in the past. The question is what can now be done? In particular, if the government is not prepared to agree in advance to all of the conditions set out in the Jasmin report, is the government prepared to indicate which of those conditions it will accept, which of those conditions it will discuss, in the hope that this might encourage the other side at least to resume the negotiating process?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am absolutely certain that once the parties sit down at the bargaining table the President of the Treasury Board, through his officials and negotiators, will indicate some areas where we are prepared to reject and perhaps some we are prepared to accept. Once again that is a matter for the negotiating process, not for an informal exchange of views between the hon. member and myself.

In so far as his correction about encouragement rather than incitement is concerned, I should have thought it would be encouragement enough for the workers to know that they would be able to resume the service that the people of Canada want and desire, they would be able to see their fellow workers return to work, they would be able to see small businessmen taken out of the difficult straits that have been described in this House and, perhaps, even most important, that they would be looking forward to the prospect of some $25,000 per year payment for the average letter sorter. That does not seem like a bad enticement, Madam Speaker, to come to the table.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER SEEK ADVICE

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, again I say that we appreciate the fact that there have been faults on both sides in the past. We are not now discussing the past; we are now discussing the impasse. I have been trying to get from the Prime Minister some willingness to do something that would get the two sides together. If he does not have any ideas along this line, may I remind him that the Minister for Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the hon. member for Lincoln on previous occasions, in the midst of all night sessions, were able to settle some of these disputes. Would he seek some advice from them in the hope that we might get action soon?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I take that, Madam Speaker, apart from the fact that it rests with some members on this side, as a suggestion. I will consider the suggestion.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

CIRCUMSTANCES SURROUNDING SINKING OF "ARCTIC EXPLORER" OFF NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport who is responsible for the Canadian Coast Guard. The minister will know that some time on the morning of July 3 the Canadian vessel Arctic Explorer sank shortly after leaving St. Anthony, five miles off the coast, with the tragic loss of 13 lives, including most of the members of the crew. Is the minister in a position to tell the House the circumstances surrounding this latest marine tragedy off the Atlantic coast?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am not. The causes of the tragedy are unknown.

May I pause for a moment and on behalf of all members of the House, express our sympathy to the families of the crewmen who died in this accident.

The hon. member was mentioning a moment ago that he thought the reaction process of search and rescue was not sufficiently rapid. I might underline the fact that there was no message from the ship itself as to its situation. It was only a day after that the search and rescue authorities were advised that the ship was late in reporting. It took only 15 minutes to get the search and rescue on its way. This included the sending of three coast guard ships, two Buffalo aircraft, one long-range Aurora, two helicopters, etc.

Mr. Nielsen: When did they get there?

Mr. Pepin: I do not think that one should indicate now that the rescue reaction was slow in coming.

POSITIONING OF SEARCH AND RESCUE AIRCRAFT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question was not intended to be critical of the coast guard but the search and rescue capability as it exists at the present time. But the minister will be aware that reaction time could be a critical factor, and only an inquiry will determine that. No doubt the minister is aware also that on December 26 of last year the Commanding Officer of the Canadian Armed Forces Rescue Co-Ordination Centre in Halifax said:

> The Canadian Armed Forces Rescue Co-Ordination Centre here is so short of manpower and aircraft it could not respond to a mid-ocean tragedy.

He referred to the task as trying to cover an amputation with a band-aid. He went on to emphasize the desperate need for the stationing of fixed wing aircraft in Newfoundland.

There was a reaction time in this case. It took almost five hours to get the fixed wing aircraft into the search area. During that period men were in the water. This reaction time could have been cut to less than half that taken if these aircraft had been operating out of Newfoundland. The minister knows that helicopters can only effect a rescue. It takes fixed wing aircraft to effect a search.

Why did the government not respond to this recommendation of the commanding officer of the Rescue Co-Ordination Centre and I might also add the recommendation of his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue? The Minister of National Revenue expressed his concern last August over the lack of a search and rescue capability, referring to the fact that marine disaster calls had risen by 62 per cent in the area. That is a serious situation. I do not want to make capital out of it, but how many more people have to die before these people are listened to?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I could give my hon. friend a report on the addition to expenditures on search and rescue in the last year or two. It is considerable. At the earliest opportunity I will provide these figures. It is almost inevitable that we do not have sufficient equipment because of the type of coast Canada has. It would take huge sums of money to provide all the equipment that is needed at all times for all kinds of accidents in all places. There is a limitation, obviously, as to what can be spent. Be that as it may, a preliminary investigation has already been ordered by the Minister of Transport. Two investigators are already at the site and hopefully we will get to know more about the real causes of the tragedy.

POSSIBLE DEPLOYMENT OF FIXED WING AIRCRAFT IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, why are some fixed wing aircraft not deployed from bases in the maritimes to Newfoundland? If that were done up to 1,000 miles would be added to their operating capability and it would cut response time to literally next to nothing. For example, if fixed wing aircraft had been in Gander they could have been in the search area in less than one hour.

Mr. Nielsen: It would take only two or three aircraft.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, this is a responsibility which is shared by the Minister of Transport and the Minister of National Defence. I try to provide as many ships as money will allow. He tries to provide the air equipment. I think I will leave it to the Minister of National Defence to answer tomorrow on the specific point raised by the hon. member.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

CONSTRUCTION OF VOLKSWAGEN PARTS PLANT IN ONTARIO

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the minister is aware, Volkswagen desires to construct a parts plant in Ontario, either in Cambridge or in Barrie, which will employ some 500 people. Last Thursday Ontario's minister of industry and tourism stated:

> Volkswagen needs to have a decision in the next two weeks. The federal government, I understand, is holding up a decision while they try to encourage Volkswagen to look at other locations which Volkswagen rejected a long time ago. My message is, let's not hold up a decision on duty remission in order to persuade Volkswagen to go to an uneconomic site and risk losing the entire 500-job investment in this province.

Will the minister confirm to this House that he is holding up the decision with respect to this project, and will he acknowledge that he is doing it for the most crass political purpose, that of wanting it either in Windsor or in Quebec?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, Volkswagen is seeking from the federal government a very substantial duty remission program which would involve a contribution of millions of dollars from taxpayers from all over Ontario, and in fact from all over Canada. I believe the federal government has an obligation to these taxpayers to ensure that all suitable sites are looked at, including those that are designated under programs such as Regional Economic Expansion and industry and labour adjustments, where there are areas of slow growth or high unemployment. I certainly do not think that the company should be pushed to go into any uneconomic areas. But in the circumstances, for cabinet to agree with this proposal, it will have to be satisfied that all suitable sites have been looked at and that the best interests of the entire Canadian population are being served in this transaction.

DECISION ON TARIFF REMISSION

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, as the minister knows, if a decision is not made in the next two weeks we will find that Volkswagen will be going to the United States. Can the minister tell us when he will make a decision with respect to remission of tariff.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the decision in question has to be made by cabinet as a whole. It is a matter of particular interest not only to myself but to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue. It is our intention to move expeditiously on the matter, but cabinet as a whole will have to be satisfied as to the benefits in relation to the costs of this project for the Canadian people as a whole.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Gray: I am surprised that the hon. gentleman is not more sensitive to these concerns in view of the potential cost to taxpayers not only all over Ontario but all over Canada.

POST OFFICE

POSSIBILITY OF ISSUING STAMP TO COMMEMORATE HEADS OF STATE SUMMIT MEETING AT MONTEBELLO

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil-Papineau): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Post Office.

With a view to highlighting very specially one of the historic events of this country, particularly of the Petite Nation region and more precisely of Montebello, can the minister tell the House whether his department has any plans to issue a stamp to commemorate the meeting of the seven heads of state which will take place in Montebello on the 19, 20 and 21 of this month?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, that is a very interesting suggestion which I will be pleased to convey to the committee members who advise the Post Office Department on the selection of Canadian stamps.

INTERNATIONAL WHALING COMMISSION

WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN MEMBERSHIP—CONSULTATIONS WITH DEPARTMENT OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment my question is directed to the Acting Minister of the Environment. Was the Department of the Environment consulted by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans before the government decided to pull Canada out of the International Whaling Commission? Does the Department of the Environment support the position of the government to pull Canada out of the International Whaling Commission? If so, what possible environmental grounds are there for such a decision?

• (1440)

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. Of course the Minister of the Environment was consulted on this matter. We support the decision that was made.

REASON FOR WITHDRAWAL

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Did the government pull out of the International Whaling Commission because it feared that Canada's support for a ban on commercial whaling would alienate the country's major trading partners engaged in commercial whaling, in particular the U.S.S.R. and Japan? Did the government fear it was going to alienate the U.S.S.R. and Japan? Was that the cowardly reason for its stupid decision on this important matter?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): That was not the reason, Madam Speaker.

EMPLOYMENT

FUNDING FOR WOMEN'S OUTREACH PROGRAM

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration, a non-hero to millions of Canadian women, particularly those women associated with the Outreach program. Hon. members will have heard of that. On Monday last the proxy for the minister in the House during the adjournment debate said in connection with the transferring of funds from other programs to Outreach that a decision from Treasury Board was expected shortly. Can the minister tell us if this has come and what it is?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): As the hon. member knows, Madam Speaker, we increased the budget for Outreach this year. We have also substantially increased the number of projects that are allocated to women's employment services this year. Contrary to the hon. member's suggestion that nothing has been done, a number of very important steps have been taken. We are reviewing a way by which we can broaden and amplify the Outreach program to reach an even broader range of people in the community. We are taking a number of measures both in representing our interests to the Treasury Board and in other ways to allocate funds to provide additional support for this very important program.

TIMING OF DECISION ON TRANSFER OF FUNDS

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, perhaps the minister did not hear me. I asked whether he would follow up on the adjournment debate in which his proxy, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, said that a decision from Treasury Board on the matter of transferring funds to Outreach would be made shortly. Has that decision been made? If not, when is it expected to be made since, as he knows, the deadline is September and these people are waiting to know what is going to happen to their Outreach programs?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is asking a question related to increased funding. I stated that we have an application before Treasury Board. In addition, we are looking at other ways by which we can add resources to that very important program. When the decisions are taken we will announce them in the House. The hon. member will be one of the first to know, and I am sure she will be very glad to carry the news back to all those people who seem to be pressing her for an answer.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

F-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—STANDARDS SPECIFICATIONS

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. A recent report from the United States indicates that in order to get approval for production of the F-18 fighter aircraft, standards had to be met. They were. They were lowered. The most notable changes were the reductions in acceleration and range. Steps are also being taken to economize on the aircraft with cutbacks in cost of production of the aircraft of some $500,000 to $1 million per aircraft. Do we have an updated arrival schedule for the F-18s for Canada? Will they be the economized version? If so, will the saving be passed on to Canada?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I am pleased with the hon. member's question and his interest in the CF-18 program. I might advise him that, at the time of the signing of the contract, a number of specifications had been identified relating to the performance of that aircraft. We are satisfied that the specifications so identified will be met and that the aircraft we receive will be the aircraft for which we have contracted. There is no change in the delivery schedule. We expect the first aircraft to be delivered by October, 1982. All indications to date are that that schedule will be satisfied.

Mr. Bradley: I am afraid the minister has more faith than I have.

REQUEST FOR REVIEW

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): The minister will be aware that it is the fighter version of the F-18A that has been approved for production. The attack version, the aircraft that Canada is purchasing, has not been approved. The radar for it is not even developed yet. A review, not approval for production of this aircraft, is not due until the fall of 1982, the same date we are to receive finished aircraft in Canada. Obviously we will not be receiving them on that date. With reduced standards for acceleration and range, and the possibility of a problem in radar development, three major factors required for surveillance and defence in the north of Canada, does the minister not think we should sit down and take a long second look at this aircraft?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, it is evident from the hon. member's question that he is in need of better information. I would be pleased to have him completely briefed on the CF-18 program as the hon. member for Victoria was briefed. We expect no reduction in the standards. There is no delay in the delivery. We feel that the contract is a good contract and that the aircraft will meet all specifications. I might point out that one of the strong points of the aircraft is the superiority of the radar which is at the leading edge of technology. We are satisfied that the radar will be exactly that which is our requirement, in fact will supersede the radar presently installed in all fighter aircraft and will be at the leading edge for some time to come.

DOMINION CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT

TRIAL OF PETITION RESPECTING SPADINA RIDING

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It arises out of the transformation of a former member of this House to a million dollar man in the other place. Last Friday, in answering questions dealing with the controverted elections act, the Prime Minister said he had taken the step he had to "save the hon. members' lawyers money". Will the Prime Minister indicate why he informed the House that he was saving money with respect to the petition under the controverted elections act in view of section 88 of the act which reads:

—the trial of an election petition under this Act shall be proceeded with, notwithstanding the acceptance by the respondent of an office of profit under the Crown, or the resignation of his seat—

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, there are two facts I would like to put to the hon. member. First, the government is not a party to these litigations. The litigations are between an individual and the chief electoral officer and his representative. Second, there is a general principle of law to the effect that, when an object of a litigation has been met, it is frequently the practice to discontinue the litigation. I was merely suggesting in this House that since the object of the litigation was to cause the election to be void and to create a byelection situation, the litigants should be thankful that I anticipated their most cherished desire and caused a byelection to be held. It is on that basis that I said that as far as the objective of the litigation was concerned, mainly to cause a byelection, it was no longer necessary. However, if the parties want to continue to litigate on the basis of the section that the hon. member quotes, obviously we are not in a position to prevent them from doing so. It is for the parties to make up their minds.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I am only informing the Prime Minister as to what is the law of the land. It says, "The action shall be proceeded with."

EFFECT ON WESTMINSTER CONSTITUTIONAL DELIBERATIONS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): My supplementary question deals with another matter touching on this controverted elections petition in the riding of Spadina. Is the Prime Minister aware that those who brought the action fully informed Prime Minister Thatcher and her cabinet in Westminster that they were contesting not only Spadina riding but they felt that the implication was that the entire Parliament was under a cloud? If the Prime Minister is aware of this, would he confirm to the House that this matter has been raised in discussions between his officials and officials at Westminster concerning the early passage of the constitutional resolution, should it ever get to that side of the Atlantic?

• (1450)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am not sure I understand the question correctly, but if I do it seems to me the kind of question the hon. member usually asks which is founded on nothing at all, no nothing at all, no reality and no facts, but just for the purpose of starting malicious rumour.

TRANSPORT

FUTURE OF NORDAIR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. When will the minister remove the uncertainty which exists concerning the future of the Nordair Company and especially that of its employees?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I mentioned earlier that I had become engaged to Regionair. This was the word used by the press. In fact, we are trying to arrange a marriage of convenience and they usually take somewhat longer than love matches.

[English]

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, this has to be the longest courtship in Canadian history.

POSSIBLE OPTIONS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Since it has taken so much time—like about two and a half years—to work out an agreeable formula between Nordair and Quebecair, is the Minister of Transport considering as one possible option leaving Nordair with Air Canada, or could another option be to allow Nordair to be under the control of its employees? In any case will the minister please give us some sort of time-frame or some definite date when Nordair's employees' frustrations will end?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have said from the beginning—and I have not changed my mind on that subject—that I was trying to effect a merger between Regionair and Nordair. That has been a firm position from the beginning.

THE ECONOMY

HOLDING OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of State for Finance. I would like to ask the Minister of State if he would kindly tell the House what efforts are being made—and whether they will be successful—to hold a federal-provincial conference in the fall on the economy. Is this going to be held and, if there is a prospect of this, what will the agenda include?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, as all hon. members know, the Prime Minister has had discussions with some of the provincial premiers. Moreover, the Minister of Finance is now visiting the various provincial finance ministers to get their opinion about the present state of the economy, and he also intends to have a much more official meeting with them in the fall. Naturally, the general subject of the state of the economy will be on the agenda of this meeting, as well as other issues, such as negotiations for the fiscal arrangements with the provinces.

POST OFFICE

SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF CANADIAN SCOUTING—REQUEST THAT COMMEMORATIVE STAMP BE ISSUED

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. This question may be somewhat academic, unless the minister's colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, backs off from some of his positions and allows the Postmaster General to enter into negotiations.

I want to ask the minister if he is aware that this is the 75th anniversary of the scouting movement in Canada and if he has had any requests for a special stamp to honour this occasion, or if he will be issuing a special stamp when the appropriate time comes to mark the 75 years of character building by the scouting movement in Canada.

Miss Jewett: What about the Girl Guides?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Yes, Madam Speaker. We are aware of the anniversary not only of the Boy Scouts, but also of the Girl Guides, and the Post Office Department will be happy to commemorate in due time both the Boy Scouts and the Girl Guides of Canada.

HOUSING

LOCATION OF SUBDIVISION IN HAMILTON, ONTARIO

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Housing. In Hamilton there is a government-sponsored subdivision across the street from a closed—but currently monitored—dump site. The interest rates for the mortgages have increased from 11.75 per cent to 19 per cent this year. The people there cannot sell because of the high cost of acquiring homes and because of the dump site proximity. Does the minister have any suggestions on what might be done to alleviate this problem for these people who are there primarily because the government decided to put the housing subdivision there?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I did not have previous notice of this question or of the specifics of the location the hon. member has brought to my attention. I would be happy if he would specify the location and the problem so that I can take a look at it.

I might indicate that the federal government alone is not responsible for all matters concerning housing. The location and subdivision approval process is carried on by the local government. It is approved by the provincial government.

However, having said that, if I have notice and if I am given the location of the property, I would be happy to take a look at the matter to see if I can offer any suggestions.

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO HOME OWNERS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, it may be true that the minister of housing has no knowledge. The Prime Minister is aware of it. The Minister of the Environment is aware of it. Given the very unusual circumstances surrounding this particular subdivision will the minister of housing look at it separate and apart from the normal course of policy decisions, and try to determine whether the government can, in those exceptional circumstances, provide some additional assistance for those individuals, given that they are locked in?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I cannot do anything more than I have undertaken to do thus far, and that is to inform myself of the situation, get the information from the other ministers who, the hon. member says, are already informed, and respond to the hon. member when I have that information.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

EXTENSION OF NORTHLANDS II AGREEMENT WITH MANITOBA

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, but he has left the House, so I will direct it to the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

On June 29 I asked the minister when the federal government would be signing the Northlands II agreement with the province of Manitoba. At that time the minister indicated to me that there would be a one-year extension.

The minister has returned. I will direct my question to him. The minister indicated there would be a one-year extension of the Northlands II agreement. Why did he make that statement, in view of the fact that he has not returned telephone calls or answered letters or telex messages asking for negotiation? At no time was there a discussion or agreement on a one-year extension.

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, that type of representation does not take into consideration the daily contacts we have with the hon. member's colleagues in the provincial government. I remind the hon. member that just in the last few months I have met several times with ministers of the Manitoba government and the premier himself. The Prime Minister was in Winnipeg a few weeks ago to announce the most important program of my department in Canada, which will be in Winnipeg.

On the question of Northlands, if there is one government which is sensitive to the plight of the people living in that region, it is the federal government through its various agencies. As I told the hon. member the other day, we have extended that agreement. We are looking at new ways of reducing the disparities of that region.

If the provincial government would like from now on to put its representations to me through the hon. member, fine. I will not dispute that way of doing things, but I will take note of that way of operating.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, the minister can say what he likes; the fact of the matter is that he has not had agreement on that one year extension, and he has not signed the Northlands II agreement. There has been absolutely no agreement on a one year extension.

LEVEL OF FUNDING PROVIDED UNDER AGREEMENT

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, with respect to that one-year extension, the minister has not been returning telephone messages and telexes. Will that one-year extension at least be based on the past level of funding, namely, $18 million, or will it be based on the reduced amount the minister's officials put on the table, which would reduce even further the building of roads and schools in northern Manitoba, to which the minister says his government is committed?

● (1500)

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I really feel uncomfortable in answering such questions, but let me assure my hon. colleague that he is completely misinformed. One of the most costly projects I have been working on for several months in all of Canada is precisely northern Manitoba, and I am doing it in very close co-operation with the government of Manitoba. To the hon. member I say, I do not mind if they brief you, but please ask them to put you in their confidence and give you the whole story.

Nat Cole, Geoffrey Molyneux, William Gold, Andrew Snaddon, Ivor Williams, Dona Harvey, Joan Fraser, Doug Harkness, Claude Bourque, Don Wilson, Bill Callaghan, Ian MacNeil.

(b) In each instance the invitation was issued by the Prime Minister's Press Office.

(c) There were no fees or expenses paid or met.

In so far as the Minister of the Environment is concerned:

(a) and (d) While the minister met frequently with Canadian journalists to discuss constitutional and other questions, in only two cases were the meetings a result of ministerial initiative.* The two journalists were: Mr. W. Fox and Mr. A. Szende.

(b) Members of the minister's staff.

(c) There were no fees or expenses paid or met.

* On several occasions. (d)

The Minister of Justice, the Minister of State (Multiculturalism), the Secretary of State of External Affairs and the Solicitor General: No.

CBC—MR. JOHN YOUNG

Question No. 2,324—Mr. Bosley:

1. Was Mr. John Young, a lawyer who resides and practices law in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, appointed as a director of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and, if so (a) on what date (b) what was the (i) amount of the stipend (ii) amount for expenses, including transportation, hotel accommodations and meals paid to him since his appointment?

2. Were legal matters handled by the firm Boyne, Jones, Murrant & Young, of 33 Queen Street, Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, for the corporation since Mr. Young's appointment and, if so (a) how many (b) how many were handled by the individual partners, Thomas Boyne, Robert Murrant and John Young?

3. Were legal matters handled by this firm's associates, Maynard Brown and Gordon Proudfoot, for the corporation since Mr. Young's appointment and, if so, how many?

4. What amount was paid to the firm and individuals named in parts 2 and 3 by the corporation since Mr. Young's appointment?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council):

I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1. Yes.

(a) December 9, 1976.

(b) (i) $250 a day when the board of directors is meeting. The stipend was raised from $150 a day as recently as February, 1981.

(ii) When the board of directors is meeting each director is entitled to a subsistence allowance, government-approved hotel rates, plus an allowance for daily meals and incidental expenses, as provided for under CBC by-laws. He or she may also claim any transportation costs actually incurred in connection with any meeting of the board or committee thereof, or while engaged in the business of the corporation. Mr. Young's expenses have been paid in accordance with these allowances.

2. Some legal matters have been handled by the firm on behalf of the CBC since September, 1978.

(a) Three lawsuits and two consultations.

(b) Thomas Boyne—one consultation.

Robert Murrant—three lawsuits, one consultation.

John Young—none.

3. Of the five instances noted, one lawsuit was handled by Robert Murrant and Maynard Brown, another lawsuit by Robert Murrant and Gordon Proudfoot. Robert Murrant and Gordon Proudfoot were also involved in one of the consultations.

4. It has not been customary to require the CBC to provide such details of its internal management and administration as its financial arrangements with private firms. The background to this custom is explained in the reply to question No. 2,530 answered November 6, 1975.

DUTY-FREE SHOPS AT BORDER CROSSINGS

Question No. 2,349—Mr. Crosby:

1. Did the Minister of National Revenue establish an advisory committee to make recommendations on the approach to licensing of duty-free shops at border crossings and, if so (a) under what authority (b) what are the names and qualifications of the persons appointed members of the committee?

2. Does Mr. Ralph Ferguson, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism), serve on the committee and, if so, does this conflict with his duties as a member of Parliament or as a parliamentary secretary?

3. Does Mr. Claude Tessier, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue, serve on the committee and, if so, does this conflict with his duties as a member of parliament or as a parliamentary secretary?

4. Do either Mr. Ferguson or Mr. Tessier receive an emolument or compensation of any kind including travel or related expenses?

5. Will the committee, whether or not it includes Mr. Ferguson or Mr. Tessier, have an opportunity to recommend applicants for licenses and, if so, will the political affiliation of the applicants be considered?

Mr. Claude Tessier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue):

1. Yes

(a) The Duty Free Shop Advisory Committee was authorized by a Cabinet decision.

(b) The individuals on the Committee were selected by the various associations, agencies and departments taking part in the program. Membership for the Advisory Committee was drawn from the following:

The Canadian Export Association

The Tourism Industry Association of Canada

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business

The Department of National Revenue, Customs and Excise

The Department of Transport

Order Paper Questions

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Through the Canadian Government Office of Tourism and the Small Business Secretariat

The Canadian Crafts Council

The Association of Canadian Distillers

The Canadian Tobacco Manufacturers Council

The Canadian Wine Institute

2, 3 and 4.—Please refer to the Parliamentary Secretaries Act.

5. The committee will not be recommending applicants for licences as the mandate of this advisory committee is specifically limited to the following functions:

The criteria for licensee selection;

The procedures for licensee selection;

The criteria governing standards of operation;

The principle upon which a fee structure is to be established to generate revenue to the federal government apart from the direct departmental costs which are to be recovered from each operator;

The pilot test site(s).

CERCLE UNIVERSITAIRE D'OTTAWA

Question No. 2,431—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to question No. 1,591 in the case of the heads of Crown corporations, etc. who are mentioned as belonging to Le Cercle Universitaire d'Ottawa with fees paid for by the government, in each case, what was the benefit to the taxpayer from such membership?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board):

(a) I am informed by the Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd. as follows: the president of AECL holds a membership on behalf of the corporation in Le Cercle Universitaire d'Ottawa. This membership provides him with appropriate facilities to pursue the work of the corporation and to meet AECL domestic and foreign clients and associates in a more informal setting. Benefits to the taxpayer result from AECL's successful pursuit of commercial opportunities.

(b) I am informed by the National Research Council as follows: the benefit of a membership in Le Cercle Universitaire d'Ottawa is being able to extend authorized hospitality and meeting accommodation to visiting scientists and dignitaries from Canada and abroad, on occasions consistent with the role of the NRC as the federal government's principal research agency. Also, the NRC has no other such facility directly available to them.

(c) I am informed by the Science Council of Canada as follows: although the council's reply to question 1,591 showed that membership fees are paid to Le Cercle Universitaire d'Ottawa for Dr. Claude Fortier by the corporation, these fees are reimbursed.

(d) I am informed by the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and the Royal Canadian Mint as follows: the memberships are considered to be a legitimate business expense in the interest of the corporation's activities.

BRUCELLOSIS COMPENSATION

Question No. 2,486—Mr. Herbert:

Since the inception of the program to eradicate brucellosis, by province and by year, what was the amount paid and number of cattle involved?

INTERNATIONAL PROGRAM FOR THE DEVELOPMENT OF COMMUNICATIONS

Question No. 2,522—Mr. Fretz:

Does the government intend to contribute to the launching and implementation of the International Program for the Development of Communications and, if so (a) what amount of money and manpower (b) what are the names of the Canadians involved (c) which international agencies will receive assistance (d) which countries have been selected for assistance?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council):

In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the reply to the above question is as follows: as a member of the 35-state Intergovernmental Council of the International Program for the Development of Communication (IPDC) Canada will participate in the first meeting of the council in mid-June; at that time Canada and the other member states will contribute their views on the organization of the work programme and the direction it should take.

(a) and (b) Canadian contributions to the IPDC cannot be determined until such organizational and functional decisions have been made. It is not expected that actual project selection will be decided upon during the first meeting of the council.

Following the meeting consultations will continue with appropriate Canadian government departments and non-governmental organizations to determine the nature and substance of Canadian participation in the program.

(c) and (d) It is the Canadian view that close co-operation is necessary between the IPDC and international agencies involved in communications, but it is premature at this stage to specify the exact role of these agencies vis-à-vis the IPDC, or the countries which will receive assistance through the program.

CCA—CONTRACT WITH MICHAEL MILLS PRODUCTIONS LTD.

Question No. 2,616—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs contract with Michael Mills Productions Ltd., Westmount, for $10,000 for the provision of special artwork services and, if so (a) what services were performed (b) for what purpose?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services):

DSS awarded a contract to Michael Mills Productions Ltd., Westmount, on behalf of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The value of the contract was $10,000.00.

(a) The services provided were for the artwork and production of a "children's teaching aid" in comic book style in both official languages.

(b) For the education of children regarding hazardous symbols such as poisons, explosives, inflammables etc.

Order Paper Questions

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I rise today for the ninth time with regard to question No. 1,852 which I put on the order paper December 9. You will remember when I rose in the House for the eighth time last Tuesday that the parliamentary secretary, in giving his excuse as to why he has been unable to get the minister responsible for freedom of information to give an answer to the House, indicated that the answer appeared to be more complicated than it seemed at first. I wonder if I can just put on the record for you the wording of that question so you can see that it can be answered in less than one paragraph. The question is this:

1. Is the chairman of the Canadian Film Development Corporation included in the corporation's conflict of interest guidelines?

2. Does the chairman maintain an interest in a private law practice and, if so (a) with which firms and in what capacity (b) does the firm conduct any business on behalf of clients in the film industry?

Again, that question could be answered if the government chose to do so. If the minister responsible was not stonewalling this House it could be answered today. The information was given by the chairman of the CFDC to the minister some months ago. The term of office of the chairman has run out since that time and the minister still has not supplied the parliamentary secretary with the information.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has, as he indicated, risen for the ninth time on this particular question. He seems to believe that repetition of his question will hasten the answer.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Well, something should.

Mr. Collenette: I have told him quite sincerely on a number of occasions that what to him may require a simple answer or may appear to be a simple answer may very well require a complex answer, because the government wishes to answer questions in their totality, if I may borrow that phrase. Therefore, we want to make sure when answers are tabled in the House that they satisfy every aspect of the hon. member's concern.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, my question No. 1,483, submitted July 17, 1980, with regard to FIRA approval of conditions relating to Houdaille Industries in Oshawa, has not yet been answered. Given that FIRA has indicated they provided the answer almost a year ago, I wonder if before the House rises for the summer the minister could find out what became of it. It may well have been mislaid, but the answer apparently has been given some many months ago to the appropriate minister.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, again without accepting the premise that the answer has already reached the minister, I will certainly look into the matter.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

TWO-PRICE WHEAT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Friday, July 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pepin that Bill S-6, to amend the Two-Price Wheat Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Madam Speaker, when I was speaking on Friday last about this bill I was emphasizing the fact that unfortunately it has turned out to be an act of fraud on western farmers. I say that for these reasons. In 1974 the government was supposed to be putting forward a subsidy for farmers producing wheat for human consumption in Canada. This has turned out to be a subsidy for consumers and a large proportion of it was paid for by producers. The second point was that, in effect, it was a seven-year price control mechanism which no other sector of the community had to endure. The third point is that this particular bill is retroactive for nearly three years to avoid a $200 million liability.

Therefore I suggest, for those three reasons, that something should be done to this bill; either take it out and bring it in again, or postpone it for a while and change it so that we do not have this continuing act of fraud laid on our shoulders.

The final point is that in the view of western Canadians, due to the acts of this Parliament, we have had to suffer a series of hammer blows over the last 35 years: the British wheat agreement of 1946-50; the dropping of the international wheat agreement in 1968; the price cutting periods we have experienced in the last 15 years; the LIFT program which deliberately took farmers out of production of a product desperately needed by the world's hungry. More recently we have had the Russion embargo fiasco, the messed up fodder program, the messed up herd maintenance program, and over the last 15 years we have had the railways and grain companies deliberately trying to get out of the grain business. More recently again we have had this renewed fight over the Crowsnest Pass rates, the fight over the last year on energy pricing and the Constitution. These are all part of what western Canadians feel is a direct attack on them as westerners. Unfortunately, if you look at the figures, this is not for the good of Canada.

So I would like to suggest that the House recommend to the government that it drop this bill, draft a new one which proposes a genuine two-price system for farmers so that Canadian farmers, whether they be in the east or the west, who produce wheat for human consumption in Canada can get the same protection for their product as other sectors of the economy.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, Bill S-6 is an attempt to legalize what the government has been doing for some time. The fact that what it has been doing has been going on since 1978 is a pretty fair indication of the commitment and interest the government has shown in agriculture over those years. It is also a pretty fair indication of the kind of speedy action we are going to get on agricultural problems from this government. If it has taken them three years to repeal a portion of an act, we will wait a long time for more substantial legislation. Why is it that the government always requires farmers to pay for what happens? We must take a look at this particular bill and at the whole range of agricultural legislation.

• (1510)

During the war Canada did its patriotic duty by selling wheat to the allies, particularly to Great Britain, at several dollars under the world price. The compensation to farmers was never paid. Farmers received several hundreds of millions of dollars less for their wheat during that period of time than they would have if it was sold on the world market. This was probably a valuable and necessary contribution to the war effort, but it was not spread over the entire nation. It fell to farmers to contribute to the war effort.

After the war an agreement was made between the Canadian government and the British government to supply wheat to Britain at fixed prices. At that time it seemed to be a fairly likely and acceptable agreement. However, because of the fluctuation in prices neither Canada nor Britain honoured the agreement. But this agreement spawned the Two-Price Wheat Act we are discussing today.

It takes so long between the time an idea comes to the government and an act is passed that things change greatly. The agreement was supposed to guarantee farmers the cost of production of grain on the export market as well as on the domestic market, but it did neither of those things. The Two-Price Wheat Act only guaranteed a floor price and a ceiling price for wheat sold to the domestic market.

Sometimes floor and ceiling prices work well. They worked well when the price of grain was within those two areas, but when the world price exceeded the ceiling price farmers ended up subsidizing consumers. Until the price levels were changed last year, that subsidy again cost farmers a substantial amount. I noticed that last Friday, as reported in Hansard, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) referred to an amount of approximately $1 million per week as the subsidy by farmers to consumers of bread in Canada. Again farmers paid.

Just lately there was an embargo on the sale of grain to Russia. Again farmers had to pay. In the process of paying compensation because of the embargo hopefully we have established one fact for all time, and that is that when a group of people such as farmers do something which is the responsibility of all Canada, they will not have to pay for it themselves as the farmers did during the Second World War. At least we established the fact that when one acts for all Canada one should be compensated in some way. However, the farmers paid again. This time they were paid the meagre compensation the government decided to pay after 17 months of doing nothing or very little. The amount was probably less than half the actual losses of the farmers during that period of time.

The Canadian Wheat Board has a mandate from Parliament to obtain the best possible price for farmers' grain. This is done with farmers' money. No taxpayers' money goes to the Wheat Board to provide this service, either domestically or internationally. The Two-Price Wheat Act does not allow the Wheat Board to fulfil its mandate. Legislation such as this confines its ability to obtain the best possible return for farmers.

At present Canadian farmers are being attacked in many areas. They cannot afford to pay a subsidy for the actions of government, for the benefit of consumers, or for the war effort. They could not afford to pay in the past, they cannot afford to pay now, and the way things are going they will not be able to pay in the future. There is an attack on the basic farming or agricultural industry which is affecting the incomes of farmers.

A great effort is being made on the part of many organizations, some of which are very closely attached to the grain industry, to do something about the Crow rate. Most people feel that the rate should be increased to a compensatory rate, which would again make the farmers pay. The situation is such that the industry is barely making enough profit to survive. This is happening in the grain industry as well as in the pork and beef industries. These factors make a considerable difference in the incomes of farmers and can put them out of business.

Also there was a great attack on the marketing boards which were established in the agricultural industry, many of them by this particular government. This attack suggests that the agricultural industry should return to the free marketing system in all areas. Nowhere else in the country is any industry on a free market basis. The idea of supply and demand went out many years ago. No industry with a union goes out and asks how much one will work for. The unions establish the amount paid for a particular job through negotiation. No manufacturer of automobiles would establish its price by producing a million automobiles, putting them on the market and asking buyers: "How much will you pay for this automobile?", regardless of how much it cost the manufacturer.

If we eliminate marketing boards, what we are asking the farmer to do is to produce his grain, produce his meat or whatever product he has, put it on the market and say, "Regardless of what it costs, give me what you think you can afford, or what you want to afford." We have had a very broad attack on marketing boards. We have also had an attack on farmers' income in the form of closing down of rail lines across the west. Many farmers could expect to deliver their grain to a centre which was only six or eight miles from their farms. By the process of closing down the rail lines, a process which is sanctioned by this government, farmers must now haul that grain 25 or 30 miles with increased fuel and mechanical costs.

Therefore, in all of these areas, the farmer, the grain producer, is in a situation which is increasing his costs of production, with no guarantee that he will be paid for those increases. Then we ask him to subsidize the consumer as well. I have nothing against subsidizing the consumer, particularly the person at the lower end of the income bracket who is unable to buy bread at a high cost. However, we should not ask the farmer to do this as part of his contribution to Canada. He must at least expect to recover the cost of production.

Hence, although I recognize that this bill, which should have been brought forward and passed three years ago, is probably a necessity, it should only be dealt with in the light of the real problems in grain production across the nation; not only the problems in the west for farmers operating under the Canadian Wheat Board, but also the problems of farmers who are producing grain all across the country.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, when I read Bill S-6, by which the government wants to repeal the 1974 act, a saying which was quite common in the west a few years ago and is still common came to mind. There were four professional people, a minister, a lawyer, a doctor and a farmer, who were making brief statements as to what they did for the people. The lawyer said in his brief statement, "I plead for all"; and the crowd clapped. The doctor said, "I prescribe for all"; and the crowd clapped. The minister said, "I pray for all"; and the crowd clapped a little more enthusiastically. Then the farmer's turn came, and his simple statement was, "I pay for all". There was not any clapping.

This bill illustrates, in a very definite way, how the farmer is always at—excuse the expression—the dirty end of the stick. The farmer is the backbone of this country. Without the farmer we would have no food. Yet, as has been pointed out by a number of hon. members, including my colleague who just sat down, there is no other industry which pays full price for everything it buys but which has no say in regard to the price of the produce that it sells.

It is really amazing why agriculture has continued to grow. It is not surprising that many smaller farmers, particularly those starting operation, are going into bankruptcy because of this very tight squeeze. This bill is another example of a western resource being sold at less than world price. At no time has the farmer in western Canada paid less than full price for his combines, for his tractors, for his trucks or for his cars. At no time has the farmer in western Canada paid less than full price for fish or manufactured goods from the east. As a matter of fact, he paid more than his full price on many occasions because of subsidization and tariffs which make it necessary for the western farmer to pay far more for his shoes and clothes than he would normally have to, were there no high tariffs protecting the clothing and the shoe industry.

But the farmer never seems to have any protection. When we are working out tariffs in Geneva, what do we give? We invariably give something which is of value to the farmer to get something else which is of value to all the people. During the hard times in Britain at the beginning of the Second World War, the Canadian government had the brilliant idea of sending the people of Britain a million bushels of wheat, I believe. The people of Canada were excited about the imaginative project of sending this food to people in Britain, who were almost singlehandedly at that time fighting against totalitarianism, communism and fascism and having a very tough time. But to make a long story short, that food was not a gift from Canada; it was a gift from the wheat farmers of Canada. They were never reimbursed for that wheat. The people of Britain thanked Canada, but they should have thanked the farmers of Canada because it was the farmers who gave that gift to those people.

Never have the farmers paid less for freight. As a matter of fact, we pay more than our fair share. At one time the price of freight was so ridiculous that we would ship things from Toronto to Vancouver and back to Calgary because we could do it cheaper than shipping it straight from Toronto to Calgary. If anyone from grade one up can see any logic in that, I would like to see him stand up in shame. However, that is what happened. Gradually we got to the point where that situation was eliminated. However, the farmer still pays full price to send his wool to the east and full price to buy the garments back afterwards on the freight. The farmer is not a cry baby; but these matters are lurking at the very heart of our agricultural industry. We are always waiting for solutions, but the solution never seems to come.

This bill was passed in the Senate on June 3, 1980. It has taken an awfully long time to get into the House of Commons. I wonder if that is—

Mr. Pepin: It has been here three times already.

Mr. Taylor: Is that because of a priority of the government?

Mr. Pepin: It has been here three times. Third time now.

Mr. Taylor: But it has never been passed.

Mr. Pepin: Well, because you are speaking.

Mr. Taylor: Well, the government sets out the legislation. If the government would leave it before the House long enough for debate, it could be passed.

An hon. Member: Quit talking and let us go.

Mr. Taylor: Well, yes. That is the whole trouble with hon. members. They do not want anyone to talk. They just want to pass this stuff. They do not want to know what it will do. I am not in favour of the bill passing, frankly. I think it is an insult to the western farmers. The Liberals can holler all they like, but I still have the right to free speech. That is one right we have not yet lost in this country.

• (1530)

Mr. Pepin: It was presented by your own party in 1979.

Mr. Taylor: This bill would repeal the two-price wheat system. Perhaps the reason the Liberals are becoming so excited is that this legislation would eliminate the obligation of the government to make subsidy payments in accordance with the Two-Price Wheat Act. This was stopped in 1978 yet the bill has still not been passed. We ask our people outside to obey the law. It is almost time for the government to start obeying the law. Until this legislation is passed, the present act is still law. The government knows that.

In 1978 the Canadian Wheat Board regulations established a minimum and a maximum price for wheat for human domestic consumption. The senator in charge of the Wheat Board announced a minimum price of $5 and a maximum price of $7 per bushel of wheat for human consumption. There was no maximum for durum wheat. I would like to know why there is a maximum for any kind of wheat. Why is the government deciding that $7 will be the maximum price for wheat? I do not see any maximum price for electricity which goes from eastern Canada to the United States. I do not see any maximum or minimum payments for coal which we import from the United States while leaving our Canadian mines idle. Why are we setting a maximum and a minimum price for wheat, particularly a maximum price? The previous minimum was $3.25 per bushel, yet the world price during that time went up to $6 or $7, and perhaps even higher. Who took the loss? The western wheat growers took the loss.

The people of Canada are being subsidized by the benevolent government which uses the money which should go into the pockets of the farmers. That is exactly what happened. We are now setting a maximum price at $7 a bushel. Why should there be a maximum price at all? If the world price goes up to $10, why should our farmers not receive that? You do not see anyone outside our country putting down their prices for the commodities we buy. Oil on the world market sells for between $40 and $50 per barrel while the price we pay to western Canada is $18 per barrel. What is fair about that? Now we are trying to do the same thing to our farmers. It does not matter what the wheat price goes to in the world market, our farmers will not receive more than $7 unless they are growing durum wheat. Surely any hon. member would agree that is not fair. If a maximum price is to be established, surely the cost of production plus a reasonable profit should be taken into consideration.

If that were the case then the situation would have to be flexible since costs of production change every year. This year costs are rising. They are rising due to actions of governments, including this one, which placed an excise tax on natural gas and raised the price of fertilizer, which in turn causes the cost of production to rise. Many people pleaded with the government to remove that excise tax because it affected production. The government said that it would stick with it, and stick with it it did.

If there is to be a maximum and minimum price for wheat, then it should not be confined to the farmers of Canada. Why is the government not trying to work out a definite arrangement with the Americans since Canada and the U.S. ship about 65 per cent or 70 per cent of their wheat to the markets of the world? There is no use trying to undercut each other. A few years ago Premier Lougheed made a trip to Russia and found out that we were playing second fiddle to the United States with regard to wheat sales. We only sold wheat when we beat the Americans at the bargaining table and the Premier of Alberta, who represented a number of farmers, did not like that. Later on I went to the Wheat Board and discussed this matter with the people there. They did not like the idea of Premier Lougheed going to Russia and talking about the price of wheat. I told them that I thought they should be happy about that and that every premier in Canada sould take an interest in the price their producers are receiving and try to get them a better one.

If the American and Canadian governments got together and established a price under which we will not sell—

Mr. Pepin: Remember uranium?

Mr. Taylor: We do not want a cartel. We want something which will give the producer his cost of production plus a reasonable profit. That is all we want. The minister's government is prepared to accept oil from a cartel, a real cartel which places no emphasis whatsoever on the costs of production. It does not cost $50 a barrel to produce oil or anything like that. An artificial price is set at what the market will bear. The government is prepared to use that oil instead of our own at 75 per cent of the price. We are not asking for a cartel. We are asking that the price take into consideration the cost of production plus a reasonable profit. I say to the minister that there is no other industry in Canada which would not expect the same thing. But every industry, if it is to stay in business, must obtain its cost of production and a reasonable profit.

Mr. Pepin: You should know that it has been tried for a full decade now.

Mr. Taylor: We are not trying hard enough. The minister may be trying, but is the senator in charge of the Wheat Board trying? He is spending a great deal of time on prosecuting the farmers instead of trying to get something for them, as I will show in a minute. Instead of trying to get something for the farmers he is prosecuting them with their own money.

If we must establish a price, then let us not establish it just for Canadians. Let us establish a price which is reasonable and sensible, one which will be flexible so that the costs of production can be included as they change. I would wager that 90 per cent of the farmers, if not 100 per cent, would jump for joy if the government would do just that. It is amazing that the farmers have been able to stay in business up until now. They only do so because of the family farm. The wife goes out and looks after the hens, the kids gather the eggs and the grandparents go out and pick berries. That is how farmers survive. Do not think that they are rich people. They not only work eight hours a day, but 12 or 14, and sometimes right around the clock during harvest and seeding time. They work hard for what they receive and all they are asking for is a reasonable price—the cost of production plus a reasonable profit.

I believe it was the last member who spoke who said something about the producers providing a subsidy of some $20 million to the consumers since the price was locked in at $5 per bushel. Many farmers are becoming very disgruntled about this situation. They are tired of waiting. I would say 99 per cent of them want to stay in Canada but they want to receive a fair deal too. But they are becoming frustrated and no one seems to listen. When we talk about a fair price for crops, members on the government benches begin to heckle. I do not know why they should be so against the farmer. A lot of these farmers came from Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes. They worked hard for what they built up. They built a heritage and they want to stay in Canada. I think this country should take definite steps to give them a decent standard of living. They should be paid their cost of production plus a reasonable profit.

• (1540)

Some people may ask what a reasonable profit is. It is said that a reasonable profit for the banks is now 19 per cent or 20 per cent. I would be amazed if the farmers want that much, but why should they not? When the banks get 20 per cent profit on loans of money, why should the farmers not get 20 per cent for producing food for the people of this country and the world? That could be negotiated and the farmers would be prepared to negotiate. The bill is still in the House, Mr. Speaker, and I think some payment should be made to the farmers up until it is repealed. We simply should not say, "We started this in 1978, so we are not going to pay anything after 1978."

I should like to come to another point, Mr. Speaker. I want to emphasize that the cost of production should be flexible. The $5 and the $3.25 prices have been in effect for seven years. During that period other prices have gone up but not the price of wheat. The farmers still cannot get more than $5 per bushel. They are not asking for a rip-off but for a price that will cover the cost of production plus a reasonable profit. They want it to be flexible and they want it to take into account the items that contribute to the cost of production.

According to information which comes from the Canadian Wheat Board, farmers do not know whether to grow wheat or barley or rye or flax because they do not know what the price of these crops will be until well into the crop year. They are not told two months ahead of time so that they can make plans. I can tell hon. members that no one knows better than the farmer what he should grow on his land. There may be brains at the Wheat Board in Winnipeg and in Ottawa, but it is the farmer who knows what his land should produce. If he knew before the beginning of the crop year what the price of the various crops would be, he could make his decision on whether to grow barley or wheat, say.

I want to deal now with something that I consider to be a national disgrace. I believe the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has left the House and will likely be back shortly. I would urge him to use his influence in connection with the problems with wheat storage. We had bumper crops in 1978 throughout the west, particularly in the Stavely area. As a result, there was a shortage of storage and the farmers would have had to pile their wheat and barley on the ground, which would have resulted in a 10 per cent loss of wheat.

It happened that the Alberta Wheat Pool elevator in Stavely had room for all the quotas and then had room to spare, so the agent took the grain in for storage. He did not have a quota but was simply going to store it so that the farmers would not have to pile it in the fields. He had enough space for all the quotas and made a monthly rental charge for storage in accordance with the rules of the Wheat Board. I think any reasonable man would say that was a sensible thing to do, but the bureaucrats in the Canadian Wheat Board had some regulations to enforce. They considered this to be an illegal act, on the grounds that any grain in an elevator over and above the quota is an average and is illegal, even if storage tickets have been issued and charges levied and paid.

As a result, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Wheat Board, a farmer-owned organization, charged 53 farmers because they dared arrange for storage in an Alberta Wheat Pool farmer-owned elevator to protect their grain. The Canadian Wheat Board then seized all the permit books and commenced legal proceedings. The local wheat pool supervisor told the agent that he was at liberty to issue cheques for the grain but the people who stored 70,000 bushels of barley were not paid for several months. Each farmer was summoned to appear in court, as was the elevator agent. This was a case where a farmer body, established to aid in the equitable sale of grain, rode roughshod over the producer to whom they were responsible. It did not bother the Canadian Wheat Board that adequate storage was available; it did not bother the Canadian Wheat Board that the elevator was accepting payment or that storage tickets had been issued.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Again, the Chair would have to be convinced that the storage facilities to which the hon. member is referring have reference to the bill. I invite the hon. member to indicate to the Chair how that matter can relate to the bill.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I will tie it in with this bill because it involves the price of wheat and the gain or otherwise of producers.

The case was heard by a magistrate who dismissed the charges. The Canadian Wheat Board was still not satisfied, however, and appealed. The appeal court, following the Court of Queen's Bench, found that there should be a new trial—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I still invite the hon. member to convince me that what he is referring to now has anything to do with either the first, second or third clause of this bill, which is very short indeed. I invite the hon. member to address his remarks to the bill.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, the bill takes away from the farmers a large sum of money to which they are now entitled.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Ouellet: You do not understand.

Mr. Taylor: It does. Certainly it does. It is denying the farmers what the government would otherwise have to pay.

Mr. Ouellet: What a stupidity!

Mr. Taylor: The same thing is going on through the court cases—

Mr. Ouellet: You have been wasting our time for half an hour.

Mr. Taylor: —in which the Wheat Board is using the farmers' money to prosecute the farmers—

Mr. Ouellet: You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Taylor: —and forcing the farmers—

An hon. Member: Shame on you!

Mr. Taylor: You can holler all you like. If it was your pocketbook that was affected, it would be a little different.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Again, the Chair is waiting for an indication that the hon. member is referring to the bill.

Mr. Ouellet: Talk about the bill.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I am indicating that this is tied just as closely to the bill as a number of other items which have been discussed already. The transportation of grain was discussed in reference to the bill. The construction of hopper cars was discussed in regard to the bill, and this point is just as closely tied to the bill as those items are. They are all connected to the price of wheat. I do not say the other matters should not have been discussed, but if Your Honour is going to allow some he should not disallow others.

The legislation which was enacted by Parliament to establish the Canadian Wheat Board stated that the board was incorporated with the object of marketing in an orderly manner. Mr. Speaker, marketing in an orderly manner is tied in with this bill. When farmers tried to protect their wheat by putting it in an elevator that was partly empty, they were taken to court and the case was lost, and lost again. Now the Wheat Board wants to start proceedings all over again. Is that orderly marketing or is it persecution—not prosecution but persecution—of the farmers?

In my view, the minister should insist that the Wheat Board desist from this type of prosecution. It is not in accordance with the idea of orderly marketing and is not in the interest of the production of food in this country.

Let us look at the matter of wheat transportation for a moment or two. Farmers are expecting improved transportation facilities. Transportation is at the very root of the wheat problem in western Canada. Construction of the elevator at Prince Rupert is of vital importance, as is the provision of additional hopper cars. These things have already been discussed. Surely we are not going to have two rules in this House. Hopper cars and transportation have been discussed every time we debate this bill now before this House. Is the Chair now suddenly going to clamp down and say we cannot discuss these topics any more? If we are going to set rules, let us put them in at the beginning and make them applicable to everyone.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I do not think the Chair needs direction as to how to govern this House. We have our rules and procedures. All I do is to invite hon. members to respect their own rules and procedures. That is precisely what I am suggesting to the hon. member for Bow River. Perhaps previously hon. members have not done this. I said it before and I say it again, the Chair has been very lenient. I invite the hon. member once more to address his remarks to this bill.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, we will leave the Stavely farmers out. They have been left out so many times now, I guess they will not mind being left out of the debate. But this is just another instance of how the farmers of western Canada are being treated.

This bill is telling farmers that they cannot get the best price in the world today. It is telling them that the government is going to set a maximum price, and that is what the farmers will get.

Mr. Evans: What happens when the price falls?

Mr. Taylor: Hon. members over there are harping again. I wish some of them would visit a few farmers and see what they are going through. You shout enough about your own pay cheques. Give the farmers a chance to get a little of something from what they produce. This bill is not doing that. The maximum price farmers can get is $7, even if the world price rises to $8, $9 or $10. The maximum farmers can get is $7. Do you call that fair?

Mr. Evans: What is the minimum?

Mr. Taylor: I would like to see hon. members in their industries, in their jobs, accept that kind of a situation. Keep mumbling over there; you do not bother me a bit. You just show your ignorance about what is going on.

Farmers are getting fed up with this kind of treatment. Surely a labourer is worthy of his hire. Surely farmers should get a proper price for what they produce. We make sure farmers pay the full price for the cars, the trucks, the combines, the tractors, the plows, the manure spreaders and everything else that goes into making up a farm. They pay full price for lumber. They pay full price for the food they buy. Now this bill is establishing a set price above which farmers cannot go for the produce they sell. This is just a continuation of what farmers have been going through for years. Some day the axe will fall and the farmers will get fed up with this kind of treatment.

Two-Price Wheat Act

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I was not intending to intervene in the debate, but I am doing so this afternoon in response to the irresponsible remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor). I am absolutely appalled at the conduct and the arguments of the hon. member. He opposes and speaks against this bill and is trying to convince farmers in western Canada that this is a bill against their interests.

I just want to put the record straight. Probably the hon. member does not know, but he should know, that the exact bill, word for word, was tabled in Parliament by his colleague and friend, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) who was then minister of transport in the Clark government.

Mr. Taylor: Tell the whole story.

Mr. Ouellet: That was Bill C-7. It was introduced by the then minister of transport on behalf of the Clark government. That bill is exactly the same as the one we are discussing today.

Mr. Taylor: Tell the whole story.

Mr. Ouellet: I am asking the hon. member, what is the difference between Bill C-7 and today's bill presented by the current Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin)?

Mr. Taylor: The administration. That is the difference.

Mr. Ouellet: The hon. member for Bow River pretends that his colleague—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I contend that the minister is not rising on a point of order, he is rising in debate.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I am making a speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I did not recognize the hon. minister on a point of order; I recognized the hon. minister in the debate.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, it is surprising that when the Conservatives get the truth they are all upside down, just like the hon. member.

I am intervening in this debate to clarify the situation and to stop this nonsense put forward by the hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. Taylor: The farmers don't think so.

Mr. Ouellet: It is no wonder that some farmers in western Canada are misinformed when they are represented by the kind of member of Parliament who twists reality and tries to convey to members of Parliament that this legislation is legislation against interests of farmers in western Canada.

Mr. Taylor: It is.

Mr. Ouellet: When the Conservatives were in power some months ago, the then minister of transport presented exactly the same bill, word for word.

Mr. Taylor: Tell them about the administration of it.

An hon. Member: This one is better.

Mr. Ouellet: Surely the hon. member for Bow River is not going to convey to the public that his friend and colleague from Vegreville was acting against the interests of western farmers?

Mr. Taylor: Did you hear the hon. member the other day? You should listen to him.

Mr. Ouellet: I want to say that the type of conduct demonstrated by some members of the opposition who constantly filibuster legislation makes Parliament unworkable. At some point we will have to take our responsibility and find ways to speed up passage of legislation that is wanted and is important for the good conduct of the economy.

Mr. Taylor: Bring in closure. You are used to doing that. If you don't like it, shut them up. Why don't you close off debate? Don't let them say anything; that is freedom of speech! In fact, that is Liberal freedom of speech.

Mr. Ouellet: That is the respect for democracy in action!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. This is becoming a shouting match. I heard the hon. member for Bow River previously. Now it is the turn of the hon. minister. I invite the hon. minister also to address his remarks to the bill.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I think my point has been made. I want to urge our colleagues on both sides of the House to pass this legislation, which is important, urgent and absolutely essential for good administration of the government. I hope we will have common sense in this place and speeches that are to the point, and that very soon this legislation will be approved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: Tell us where the bill is going. You have not said one word about this bill.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the Two-Price Wheat Act, I can state firsthand that the farmers of western Canada are not happy with pricing and the way the government is handling the two-price wheat system. It is interesting to note that there are a couple of commodities which come under the two-price system, one being wheat, which we are dealing with in Bill S-6, and the other oil. Both of these commodities come from a certain area of the country. At very great expense, both benefit the part of the country from which the minister who just spoke comes. Therefore, he can well get up in this House and defend his actions with vigour.

However, if he would speak to the farmers in western Canada about the two-price system and the fact that down through the years it has taken millions of dollars out of their pockets while they have had to pay full price for every commodity they bought from industrial Canada, and often at many more times the price, he would find the attitude is quite different from what he perceived it to be today, particularly as it relates to wheat and the cost of production, as related by my colleague from Alberta.

We in western Canada are very serious about this situation. If the federal government is going to put in place a productive system which will bring about increased production of wheat for the benefit of Canadians and others throughout the world, it had better start bringing in positive legislation, not this kind. I see the minister has left the chamber.

It is important that the government know what is happening. Should the western Canadian farmer be called upon to subsidize other consumers in Canada? They are willing to do that to a point, but they believe that all Canadians should accept that responsibility, not only the farmers of western Canada.

The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) stated in the debate last Friday that this is costing the farmers in western Canada up to a million dollars a week. This is unacceptable and should be changed. The same is happening with regard to oil. Western Canadians receive $18.75 a barrel with the $1 increase on July 1. However, there are some good terms. There is the "blended price", the "compensation price", and the $43 a barrel price that is paid to Mexico and to OPEC. There is a two-price system, one for western Canada and one for offshore oil coming into this country.

The same is happening in the wheat industry. It is very relevant how western Canadians perceive fairness as a result of the federal government's actions. How long can this go on? Western farmers are productive. At one time the farmers made up 97 per cent of the population of North America. Today they make up less than 5 per cent of the population. They produce enough to feed all of North America and a good part of the rest of the world.

If this government continues to bring in this kind of legislation as it relates to wheat, there will be the same production situation that we now have in the oil industry in western Canada. That is what will happen if the government is not careful. It is time the government did something positive for the grain farmers.

What has the cost been to the farmer? We all know the cost of production. I read in the Toronto Star today about a farmer who is going broke because the interest payments on his farm are $8,000 more than his gross income. This is a situation that must be looked at very seriously. What is happening when farmers must purchase tractors, machinery, equipment and so on? The farmer must pay full price and often a protected price for the commodity. He could bring in a small John Deere tractor from West Germany at quite a saving. This is because the government protects the industrial area of Canada.

When it comes to selling wheat, who does the government protect? It protects the same people at the expense of the farmer. The farmer must pay when he buys and pay again when he sells. Are the farmers satisfied with this situation? No.

I should not be political about this, but there was a good example on the weekend. The NDP had a little meeting in Vancouver. It came through loud and clear that a segment of the NDP are not satisfied with what is going on in this House and with the centralist control which dominates oil, wheat and the lives of Canadians. The convention in Vancouver should give the message to those in government that there are some pretty clear thinking people in western Canada. They have very strong views on such issues as the Canada Wheat Act and the amendments with regard to the two-price system.

The western farmer is asking how long can this go on? How long can he continue to pay the high prices plus a subsidy to industry on everything he buys? When he sells, it is at a low price. How can he pay his bills and stay in business? Bankruptcies are up. I mentioned earlier the high interest rates. This is related to the cost of production for the farmer. Pressures on the farmer have never been greater. They are closing in. Bankruptcies are higher than ever before.

If this situation continues, by next spring many more young farmers will be faced with bankruptcies. They will not be able to maintain a fluid financial position. I ask the government to take a good look at this situation. The laxity in bringing forward this bill is a good indication of the type of direction the government has taken in relation to important agricultural issues.

How important is agriculture to Canada and the world? It is interesting to note that for one hundred years or better the economic power structure of the world has been controlled by the manufacturing sector which operates in Toronto, Montreal, eastern Canada and also places like London, England, Paris, Tokyo and so forth. This sector has controlled the economy of the world. Along came OPEC. I see someone frowning and wondering how relevant this is. It is very relevant because it affects the existence of the farmer. What happened? Along came OPEC, and the economic control of the world switched to the production of energy in certain parts of the world. In Canada that part happens to be western Canada, and central Canada does not like that at all.

The next thing which will happen in the world is that there will be some emphasis put on the production of food—wheat—which is what we are talking about here. If we in this House or the government take the attitude toward the production of wheat that has been taken in this House in the past year—in the short time I have been in the House—and toward agriculture and farmers generally, it will be a sorry day for Canada and a sorry day for the world.

We must allow the farmer in western Canada to make his contribution to this great country. This is a great country. We have many things. We have energy. We have manufacturing here in eastern Canada. We in the west need eastern cars, steel and rubber, and we can work together. We in western Canada are good Canadians. All we are asking is that we be given a fair chance. We are not asking for two oil prices, one domestic and one for the international marketplace. We do not want a domestic price for wheat and another price for the export market which is $2 or $3 higher. We want a fair price. Let us not put a limit of $7 on wheat when the price could go to $10. Let us be fair. The western farmer will produce wheat and the industrial area of Canada will produce cars and steel. The energy sector of Canada will start producing oil again, as it has not been doing for a year and a half because of the policies of this government. We can build the strongest country in all the world, and that country is Canada.

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson) if he would consider answering a question.

Mr. Gustafson: Yes.

Mr. Bockstael: Is the hon. member for Assiniboia aware that the Two-Price Wheat Act we are addressing in Bill S-6 came to its termination on July 31, 1980? This is a clean-up bill. When the minister of transport in the preceding government, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), introduced Bill C-7, he was doing the same thing we are. We introduced Bill S-6 in the Senate. It was passed. In April, 1980 it was brought to this House and should have been read the third time in June of 1980, but it was not. We are bringing it forward to do away with a bookkeeping requirement.

The Two-Price Wheat Act was instituted in 1973 for seven years, automatically to expire in 1980. Is the hon. member aware of that, and does he concur?

Mr. Gustafson: Mr. Speaker, I think the whole country is aware that the books around here are in some difficulty. We are aghast that this kind of action has not come before the House sooner than it has. The general principle is what I am referring to here, a principle to which I am opposed.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in this amendment to the original Two-Price Wheat Act. Last Friday the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) in his opening remarks indicated that this is the fourth time Bill S-6 has come before this House in its present state. He reminded us of that and that the last debate took place almost exactly one year ago. I think it would be a year ago tomorrow. The most obvious and succinct comment which now seems appropriate is that the bill itself is now 15 months out of date since its first reading, which actually took place on April 16, 1980.

At the time of those earlier debates there was general agreement that wheat producers were locked into what has been termed by others a frozen seven-year contract under the original terms of the act and, further, that the two-price wheat system has been a subsidy to consumers at the expense of producers. I think that is now widely accepted by all concerned. That subsidy favours the consumer because of the rapid increase in farm production costs associated with our record rate of inflation and I suggest there has been a disproportionate increase in farm capital and operating costs as compared with other sectors in our society with respect to how inflation affects them.

I do not think there is any doubt that farmers are taking the brunt of inflation more so than other sectors, although the whole economy is certainly involved. This situation has increased the imbalance of this subsidy in favour of consumers at the expense of the wheat producers.

Here are just a few examples of how this is reacting today. Fuel costs at the farm level have now more than doubled. Commercial fertilizer costs have increased in direct ratio to those for the oil and natural gas which are used to produce most commercial fertilizers. In some instances insufficient amounts of fertilizer were used this spring simply because of the inability of well-established farmers to finance those very high costs for fertilizer. The very high land and machinery costs with 20 per cent and sometimes higher interest rates, with no sign of let-up, are perhaps the most critical and crucial cost factors which are today precipitating bank foreclosures and bankruptcies at alarming rates. Wheat producers must get a more equitable share of this subsidy.

I would like now to make a comment about the general conditions of grain production, crop prospects and, even more than that, general growth, including grass and hay in western Canada, because I think this is very important as we head into the hot weather part of the summer, rapid growth, the heading out of our crops, haying and so on. I am sure hon. members in this House will recall my personal concerns early last spring and again a year ago last spring, in 1980, when I was genuinely concerned about what to me was the potential for very serious drought throughout western Canada, especially on the western prairies. I spoke in this House, in the Standing Committee on Agriculture and in the Standing Committee on Regional Development about the PFRA and about these concerns. They were very real indeed because there was a potential for drought following two successive winter droughts where the whole of the western prairies had a very low snowfall. As a consequence there was a very poor to nil snow run-off. In the spring of 1980 and the spring of 1981, over a vast area, there was no run-off to supply soil moisture not only for growth but also for livestock watering purposes, and hundreds, perhaps thousands, of small flood schemes used to produce feed for livestock.

• (1620)

I would say that today all the earlier concern and pessimism, certainly on my part, is gone thanks to generous rains over the last six weeks in most of the prairie provinces. In just six weeks the situation has corrected itself to where we now have a rather fantastic turnaround in total growth across the prairies and the possibility of still further growth in production is there.

Last Saturday I drove the 160 miles from where I live at Walsh, on the Saskatchewan border, to west of Warner, which is in southwestern Alberta. In fact, I drove pretty well across the southern part of Alberta, ending up in the vicinity of what is known as the Milk River ridge. This is beautiful country with a high ridge which is noted for the quality and high production of grass and hay. As a result we have the wonderful cattle and horse ranches which have their headquarters there. I would say without hesitation that the present growth of prairie grass over the whole area, indeed over a much wider area, is the best I have seen since 1953. At that time we had a wonderful rain which coincided with the coronation of the present Queen. It lasted for several days and is still known as the coronation rain. Well, the growth conditions we now have equal or exceed those conditions back in 1953.

I would say many varieties of native grasses are two feet tall and already setting seed. They are high enough to completely hide young calves walking through it. Hay supplies, in spite of the lack of spring run-off, will be adequate. Cereal grain production possibilities are equally good with many fields now fully headed out, and that is spring seeding. The potential for cereal grain production as well as the grasses I mentioned is enormous. Naturally, it is a long way from being in the bin but there is a potential for an enormous grain crop throughout the western prairies. There is one area I am told still on the dry side. That is around Lloydminster, along the Saskatchewan-Alberta border. There may also be an area from Moose Jaw south to the Montana border that is equally dry. However, it is my understanding that those areas are now getting rain.

For those of us in Alberta who are becoming accustomed to the change, it is interesting to speculate that the production of barley in Alberta may be at an all time high. That, of course, will lead to the potential for feeding more livestock, notably cattle and hogs, in our various feed lots, and to the export of more barley.

That brings up the whole question of what the initial prices will be when the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board gets together with his advisers and makes the initial announcement. That will have a tremendous amount to do with whether or not barley production in Alberta, combined with a good price, will allow the feed industry to end almost a full year of losses. The supply of barley will be there; it remains to be seen whether the price will be high enough to make it worthwhile for the farmers and the feed industry.

I mention these western grain details to indicate the importance of the initial price, which I think should have been announced long before now. I hope the minister will see fit to bring it forward. Those initial prices for all grains will have to be significantly higher to counter the increased costs I have already commented on.

I want now to come to another aspect, Mr. Speaker. I think all western farmers, no matter what they produce, are concerned that this amendment is simply a device for the government to get out of that $200 million contract, if you like, which was promised in the original seven-year proposal that the former minister, the Hon. Otto Lang, brought in. I think there is a distrust among the prairie farmers as to whether the government will live up to its commitments. We had a good example of that over the winter, in fact early this spring, some of which is still with us, over the manner in which the government administered the drought program. I am thinking particularly about the herd maintenance program. While the concept was noble and most appropriate, the manner in which it was administered left much to be desired.

I want to have on the record what the situation is today. I suggest that the review board, created late in the day, if you like, to try and iron out some of these administrative inequities, is hopefully going to do just that by its decisions. My understanding is that the review board, just before being disbanded as being no longer required by the responsible ministers, had indicated some 3,600 unsatisfied claims for herd maintenance payments which they split into four categories. Categories one and two were the most extreme and covered cattle producers most severely hit. Categories three and four were those with a smaller percentage of cattle in their operations and a larger percentage of grain. It is my understanding there were as many as 3,000 producers in categories one and two.

Now, when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) set up this review board, he gave a commitment on behalf of the government that individuals who felt they were not being fairly dealt with would be able to have their cases brought before the review board. Failing that, the minister would respond personally to them. I suggest that there is at least 2,500 to 3,000 cases where the government has made a commitment to stand behind its promise in the drought program. There is no question that there is a carryover of money available to do this, but no action has yet been taken.

• (1630)

Primarily I want to zero in on a small area on the Alberta side. Generally it is the area on the south side of the Cypress Hills. It is right on the Alberta-Saskatchewan boundary. It is approximately five or six ranges wide and about eight or nine townships running north from the Montana border to almost the top of the Cypress Hills. This area was every bit as seriously hit by the drought last summer and last winter, as well as the previous summer and winter, as any area in the west but it was not recognized under the program.

I must say quite candidly that it now appears the reason the area was not recognized was that perhaps it had the misfortune under the program to be on the Alberta side. It is the only reason I can see that the area was not recognized under the program. It is a tragedy in the way a program can be administered.

The Minister of Agriculture is aware of this. I hope there is still time to do something about it. The people in the area are widely scattered—there are not too many—but they have been required to finance enormous bills in order to purchase feed to get them through the last two winters. Indeed they are worthy of some consideration, in light of the firm commitment of the Government of Canada to do something about the emergency drought situation.

Before concluding my remarks I want to make one more point. I have enlarged upon the total potential for a great quantity of grain in the west. It will pinpoint more than ever before the need for the federal government and various feed grain and agricultural groups in western Canada to make a genuine effort to get together and try to reach a compromise solution of the Crow freight rate dilemma. There is no doubt that there is widespread support for some changes across the western prairies. There seems to be stronger support in the provinces of Alberta and Manitoba, but even in the province of Saskatchewan—I live very close to that province and I winter a lot of my cattle there, so I keep in touch—there is the beginning of a consensus as to how to resolve who receives the Crow benefit, that is, the difference between the actual amount of the Crow freight rates and the compensatory rates, or the necessary rates for the railways to move the grain and make a reasonable profit. There is widespread agreement that the railways must be much better compensated, but there is no agreement as to what system should be used, how much, or how it is to be paid out.

The western agricultural conference group proposed that the Crow benefit be paid directly to the railways. The commodity coalition group, the users of mostly feed grains in cattle or hog production and the processors of rapeseed, made a proposal that the difference between the two levels of compensation to the railways should be paid directly to farmers or producers on an acreage basis. It would remove the need to identify grain, multiplying it by a per bushel price.

There is evidence that those two groups are getting closer to reaching compromise. The federal government might very well encourage that compromise. They should get together in order to resolve this situation. There will be record grain volumes to move. We think we are making headway with new hopper cars, but they will not begin to move the expected increase in grain production in the prairies. If the commodity groups do not have a sense of satisfaction that their case in the Crow rate issue is understood, we will lose an opportunity all over western Canada to come up with the best market possible for the barley which is being grown out there right now. Of course, the best market is on the farm next door to where it is produced or on the same farm; there is no doubt about that.

Throughout this year barley was fed to hogs and cattle, and cattlemen ended up losing $100 per head for every fat steer. This did not happen throughout the entire year but it did occur. Hog producers are only now beginning to do a little better. If the secondary industry which creates much of the labour in spin-off industries such as the packing plants does not feel it is worth its while, the grain transportation authority will have to move the extra barley, or a substantial part of it, into the export market. If it is looked upon in that light, it is only common sense and good business to come to a compromise on the Crow issue. I am sure a compromise can be reached by those two major western groups.

I know Mr. Speaker may feel that I have wandered slightly from the subject of the Two-Price Wheat Act, but it was appropriate to make comments about the crop prospects in western Canada since they have turned around so dramatically and to relate that to the entire question of the Crow rate dilemma which is of major concern to us all.

While we appear to have resolved the grain car situation through the construction of hopper cars which are paid for either by the grain producers, through the Canadian Wheat Board, or by the taxpayers of Canada, there is a disturbing situation on the railways with respect to special livestock cars which are rapidly becoming obsolete. It seems that both railways have a mathematical formula whereby after so many years stock cars officially become obsolete. They are not being replaced at this time. The railways indicate quite bluntly that it is not worth their while. This is not because of the Crow rate subsidy. The owners of all livestock carried by rail pay the full shot. There is no subsidized freight rate for livestock, but the railways feel it is not worth their while to continue to pay for new cars to replace the obsolete ones. The livestock industry is very concerned about this situation. It is part and parcel of the uneasiness in western Canadian agriculture which some positive action by the federal government could do much to alleviate.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy)—Aviation Industry—Manpower training—Negotiations between governments and industry; the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields)—Energy—Negotiations to conclude energy agreement with provinces; the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hudecki)—Hazardous substances—Dangers of use of marijuana.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

TWO-PRICE WHEAT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pepin that Bill S-6, to amend the Two-Price Wheat Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that happens in the House of Commons from time to time is that a person is moved to make an address on the basis of an intervention made by another member. I must say that while I thought of speaking on this particular bill since it is a matter of some considerable interest and importance to the people in my riding, and to people generally, in the designated Wheat Board area in western Canada in particular, I cannot help but start my remarks by making reference to the wholly unexplained and inexplicable intervention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet). Here is a man who, as far as I know, has never spoken on an agricultural bill before, yet he felt inclined to stand up and make an intervention. I can understand why he would feel this way and the sense of frustration he must feel.

Mr. Knowles: He has nothing else to do.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is right, he has nothing else to do. He has been left completely out of the postal strike negotiations and deliberations. He is being shunned by his cabinet colleagues with respect to this very serious problem which faces our country today. The man is frustrated. He had to get up and make an outburst against those of us from western Canada who are attempting to bring to the attention of the House some of the serious concerns that agricultural area has about the lack of policy and direction which this government has unfortunately undertaken with respect to that very important part of our country. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if the Postmaster General has frustrations about the fact that he is ineffectual within his own cabinet and with respect to his own responsibilities, then he should not take it out on the western Canadian farmer. Nor should he attempt to criticize anyone who stands up and speaks on behalf of western farmers, which we in this party intend to do without any help from the Postmaster General, thank you very much.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It is probably appropriate that the minister made the remark which he did. Again, it reminds me of the contents of the Speech from the Throne. Many members will have forgotten that we did have a Speech from the Throne. It has been well over a year, almost a year and a half, I believe, since it was delivered at the beginning of the session.

Mr. Bussières: Deal with the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) will understand the clear logic of what I am about to say, if he would listen for just a moment.

Mr. Evans: Nothing you say has any logic.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), who is known as a twin for a constituency adjacent to mine, should listen if he wants to do anything for the rest of Canada in his capacity as the twin member for Saskatoon East. Perhaps he can think about people in western Canada and some of their concerns.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, it is hard to speak when members opposite are barracking and shouting and I am trying to make a serious speech on behalf of the people I represent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, members opposite will not even allow me to refer to that ancient document, the Speech from the Throne, which has been before us for 18 months. What did that Speech from the Throne point out? Among other things, at the very end of it there was a passing reference to some of the problems which face the government with respect to its representation in western Canada. In that document there was a request made to members of the opposition that at every opportunity we should bring to the government's attention the concerns, grievances, hopes and aspirations of the people of western Canada. The bill before us allows us the opportunity to point out in very vivid and specific terms some of the problems which face the western farmer at a time of unprecedented inflation and at a time when interest rates are punishing the western farmer as he has never been punished before.

In effect, we are talking about the western farmer subsidizing the consumers of Canada with respect to the price of wheat which is grown in western Canada, which is where this bill will have its greatest impact. The price of grain is a matter of ongoing concern to western Canadians and to farmers. This bill shows the kind of disinterest which this government has toward western Canada. When that is combined with the lack of action of this government and with other unconscionable delays which have taken place in terms of payments to which western farmers are entitled, there can be no doubt of this government's disinterest. We had to wait until the last few days for a statement from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) with respect to payment of the Soviet grain embargo compensation. By the time the government found it within its priorities to make that announcement, the amount of back payment had been substantially depreciated by the ravages of inflation and the loss of interest to the farmer on this money. Quite frankly, western farmers looked at that payment with the utmost skepticism.

Simply put, this bill is also an indication of the kind of treatment that western farmers receive at the hands of this government. There are a number of opportunities which members from western Canada have to bring to the attention of the government certain improvements which could take place in terms of its legislation. We intend to take advantage of those opportunities and to meet that challenge. The point is, not only do we have that responsibility, which we will carry out, but we have been called upon by the government in its Speech from the Throne to articulate the points of view of western Canadians.

Hopefully, the government will take some of these suggestions into consideration. There have been a number of agriculture programs introduced by the Liberal government regarding which we have made suggestions. The western grain stabilization program is one, which was brought in by the then minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, Mr. Otto Lang. We suggested a number of ways in which that particular program might be improved so that there would be, in effect, some benefit derived by western farmers. Those suggestions were rejected out of hand by the Liberal government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The Chair regrets to interrupt the hon. member, but I have been listening quite attentively to the hon. member and he referred to an invitation given by the Prime Minister for western representatives to make contributions to certain legislation. The Chair has a responsibility, as do all hon. members, to address their remarks precisely to the bill which is before us, that is, Bill S-6. I would invite the hon. member to do just that and not to address himself to the invitation of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I am glad you have made that point. Your Honour will understand that in terms of this particular legislation the relevancy rule is being followed more strictly here than in most debates we have had. The reason I wish to make this point is that it must be looked at in the context of this government's agricultural policies. We cannot isolate this one bill and say that it has absolutely no relevance to anything else which happens in this House. This bill is part of a parcel, the way in which this government views the problems of western Canada. I want to point out why this bill is unacceptable in its present form.

By way of introduction, I would like to deal with the provisions of the bill and my suggestions to improve its working and operation.

Mr. Bockstael: It is the same bill which was introduced under the Conservative government.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I find it hard to believe that the Liberal party will not allow a member from western Canada to speak without heckling and barracking him. The Liberal party may not have any interest in western Canadian problems, but I will tell Your Honour one thing. I am not going to be heckled down by that group across the way.

● (1650)

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Good for you.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The fact of the matter is that the relevance here is 100 per cent. We made some suggestions about how western grain stabilization could be improved. For example, the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton) suggested that the payments to the western farmers should be made on an individual basis, that there should be individual plans rather than having it apply to the designated Wheat Board area in western Canada. At the very minimum, we suggested this improvement to the bill. We suggested that we have smaller and more coherent districts so that there would be a triggering of the payments to western farmers; but the government refused to listen. As a result, what happened? Western Canadian farmers have been deprived of any payments under that legislation, because unless there is a complete crop failure across the whole of western Canada, the plan does not go into effect.

This particular legislation is another example of the way in which the western farmer is again asked to reduce his income; because he has been asked, by the provisions of this bill, to subsidize the consumer in Canada with respect to the price of wheat consumed domestically.

My colleague the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) brought forward some of the concerns we had about the herd maintenance program. I will not get into that; Your Honour listened to the hon. member for Medicine Hat make a very excellent presentation indeed about that particular program. However, things are so bad now with the Liberal government respecting this particular program which, as my colleague pointed out, has a minimum of some 3,600 unsatisfied claims before the review board, that now when I write to the Minister of Agriculture, who is holding himself out as some kind of spokesman in the House of Commons for western Canadian farmers, he is now saying that he has nothing further to do with the western herd maintenance program, and would I please send my objections, my concerns, my complaints and my constituents' complaints to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané). That is what I call backing off from one's responsibilities as a minister of agriculture. That is the attitude the government is taking. It knows that the western farmer is unhappy with the policies of this government.

Now I want to deal with the provisions of the legislation. I want to deal with some specific concerns and complaints that I have about it. Your Honour will remember that the bill which we have before us repeals the Two-Price Wheat Act of 1974. The two-price wheat system has, in fact, established a system intended to run for seven years. At the time the original bill was introduced, our party took a firm stand against the length of that particular provision. I will deal with that particular matter a little later. The parliamentary secretary, who is one of the two western Canadian hon. members, should be interested in finding out how this bill could be improved.

As a matter of fact, at the time, our party moved an amendment to this original legislation to reduce the time and the application of this particular provision from seven years, which is an unconscionably long period of time. At that time it was pointed out that no labour organization or union would agree to commit themselves for a period of seven years. Nowadays the unions will go six months to a year in terms of any contract they may enter into. Yet the western farmer, by virtue of the policy of the Liberal government, is committed to a seven-year term with respect to this whole program.

I should point out that that particular amendment on behalf of our party was brought forward by the Hon. Jack Horner, who is known to the government benchers. The fact is that at that time his thinking in terms of policy was clear, before he moved across the way. I compliment the Hon. Jack Horner for a motion that he made on the amendment to this bill. The only answer that I have seen thus far with respect to trying to deal with western problems and concerns, is apparently the candidacy now announced of Jim Coutts, who, of course, was instrumental in bringing Jack Horner across to the Liberal party. We now have someone in the Liberal party with sex appeal. Jim Coutts is now going to speak on behalf of the western farmer. I am very impressed, and I ask Your Honour whether that is the only answer the government has with respect to this bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: However, as hon. members will recall, the act provided a $3.25 per bushel floor price and a $5 per bushel ceiling. I hope I am not offending the sensibilities of the Liberal members now if I deal with these particular figures.

Mr. Evans: You read them before in cabinet when you were a minister.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: There was a $5 per bushel ceiling for red spring wheat. As far as durum was concerned, it was $5.75 a bushel and $7.50 a bushel on the lower and higher ends. Millers and consumers of grain for human and domestic purposes purchased the wheat at the floor price. Of course, the intention of the original legislation was that the government pay to the Wheat Board the difference between the floor and the world price, up to a maximum of $1.75 per bushel. In other words, $3.25 was the minimum price, and adding $1.75 made $5. I mention that only because when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) was in Vancouver, he paid a bill for $120, added a $20 tip, and totalled that up to $130. I just want to make sure that the Liberals, who are in charge of our financial affairs, understand simple addition. Apparently this was not the case with former ministers of finance.

In the fall of 1978, the government decided to terminate payments under the act. At the same time, a new scheme—that is, $4 minimum and $5 maximum—was introduced through regulations made under the Canadian Wheat Board.

I am pleased to see that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is here because I think it is important for him to participate and be in the House at all times when bills relating to Wheat Board problems and questions are debated on the floor of the House. One of the difficulties we have, of course, as the minister knows, is that the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board is not a member of this chamber. It makes it very difficult when the minister involved is not here to participate in the debate and answer questions and to have input from western Canadian members.

We have an assistant minister who has other responsibilities. I am glad that he is here to participate, and I welcome him to the chamber. I appreciate the fact that he is here, because I am going to make some suggestions to him and make observations with respect to this legislation. I know that he will, in fact, being a reasonable man, listen to and take heed of all of these suggestions.

In any event, the bill in question has the effect of retroactively extinguishing the government's obligations to make payments under the Two-Price Wheat Act after 1978. I know that Your Honour will be glad to hear this as well, because you are following this debate with some attention. However, I want to say at this point in the debate that the history and mechanics of the two-price system have certainly been well canvassed by my colleagues, and I do not suppose there is any purpose in reviewing them again.

Suffice it to say that Bill S-6 would change the termination date of the two-price system, as established by the 1974 act, from July 31, 1980 to December 31, 1978. This bill would have the effect of relieving the government of some $200 million in subsidy payments. It consists of only one page in both official languages. It is certainly a short bill, but it opens the door to some very important and interesting issues.

The first issue I want to raise today is to consider this government's practices in dealing with the two-price system. The government practice has been that followed in the two-price program. The way in which it has approached this program has been the ultimate in arrogance and disdain for Parliament. The statutory terms of the 1974 Two-Price Wheat Act were unilaterally sabotaged by the government in 1978. The government did not come to Parliament but proceeded to act illegally and on its own initiative.

Mr. Pepin: And you introduced the same bill.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That, alone, is reason enough to oppose the bill. Hon. members keep repeating the fact that we, in government, had to come in and try to remedy the abuse of Parliament on the part of the predecessor government. We tried to do that in a short period of time. I must tell the minister that we were eminently successful in terms of our responsibility to the western farmer, and I am very proud of our record in that regard. It might be evidenced by the fact that we did not do too badly electorally from that part of Canada. There was an appreciation of the fact that we were serious about western Canada. We intend to serve our constituents in that area.

The second point I think should be made with respect to this bill is that there are deficiencies in the two-price system. The key problem with our two-price system is that, in the final analysis, the way it has operated over the course of the last seven years is such that it has become a burden on the producer. Because of its locked-in maximum price, the two-price system has been a de facto subsidization of the consumer by the producer. I do not think that even members of the government would deny that. It is one of the great deficiencies in the plan introduced by the Liberal government in 1974.

Mr. Pepin: You have not read what I said.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That act was introduced over the objections of members of the Progressive Conservative party. One of our fundamental complaints was that it established this regime for seven years. It has been pointed out on a number of occasions that agreements of the length are almost, by definition, unworkable. The minister would understand that. It is a very long time for any agreement, whether it be a labour relations agreement or one respecting western farmers.

Mr. Pepin: It kept changing all through the seven years.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I want to tell the minister that no labour union would ever accept a seven-year non-adjustable agreement.

Mr. Pepin: It was adjusted four times.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The minister keeps talking about adjustment. What we are talking about now is legislation that would legalize something that was done illegally in 1978 by the Liberal government. By what kind of logic would the minister suggest that adjustments have been made when the bill provided no opportunity for such adjustments? There was no provision in the legislation for an adjustment over and above the price which was subsequently changed because of enormous pressure put on the Liberal government in 1978 as the result of the world price for grain. The Liberal government acted then without consulting Parliament. It acted illegally and that is the whole thrust of my argument. This is a critical problem in the present environment.

From 1973 to 1979, including the second quarter, the index of crop production expenses rose by 105.5 per cent; the cost of agricultural chemicals increased by 168 per cent; and the cost of fertilizer rose by roughly 120 per cent. You look surprised and horrified at these figures, Mr. Speaker, but this is the case. A system which fails to recognize such changes in production costs is clearly deficient. A lack of responsiveness to changing conditions creates subsidy effects that are unintended and undesirable.

For example, during the first four months of the 1979-80 crop year, the grain price in the international market was above the maximum level provided by the two-price system. The result was that grain growers, in western Canada primarily, provided a subsidy of about $1 million per week. This is unfair and is totally unacceptable. It is a system that would not be tolerated in any other context, but the government does not seem inclined to take it seriously or to remedy it, except through periodic and understandable outbursts from the Postmaster General. For the first time in his career he had spoken on an agricultural bill, even though it was under the guise of a point of order.

Even though the world price has often been as much as $2 per bushel higher than the $5 maximum established in 1973, the government did nothing for years. The record is clear on that. Only recently has it seen fit to announce a modified price range based on a $5 per bushel minimum and a $7 per bushel maximum for spring wheat.

This adjustment does not address the basic problem about which I have been speaking. There must be a provision for regular adjustments in price, otherwise production costs and fluctuating world prices will create, and it is likely to be sooner than later, the same type of distortions and problems that arose under the pricing regime that endured from 1973 until just recently.

Since the beginning of this government's mandate it has sat inert and watched wheat producers lose $50 million. We have talked about compensation for losses sustained by grain farmers, but the compensation announced by the minister in the other place responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board amounted to some $68 million. This is roughly the same amount that farmers lost in subsidies before the government made any move. Are the western farmers now supposed to stand up and cheer because they get this $68 million after a year and a half and after inflation has substantially depreciated the amount? They are not going to cheer, Mr. Speaker; they are going to ask what the government is doing on their behalf.

There is no assurance that this same government complacency will not create similar problems as prices shift in the future. There is absolutely no assurance from the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board that the government has any plan to deal with such price fluctuations in the future. There is every likelihood that producers will continue to subsidize consumers. This very day we are looking at prices which are just a few cents below the new ceiling.

The new pricing regime is interesting because it provides no ceiling price for durum wheat. The rationale for the difference between the price-setting policy for hard wheat and durum escapes me. Why should the sky be the limit for one grain and a $7 ceiling be imposed on the other? The same principle should apply to both. There is much to recommend the system that is in place for durum. The lack of a ceiling means, obviously, that rising world prices will not bump through the ceiling while the government is asleep.

That is something that should be considered because there is no plan now for the government to make further adjustments. The western farmer simply has to wait on the pleasure of the government to increase the maximum price and enhance the subsidy on domestically consumed wheat. On the basis of past experience we have no reason to believe that the government will move quickly. Economic conditions and concern about the government's deficit position do not bring the western farmer much hope of priority treatment with respect to this payment. It will be easy for the government not to make an adjustment until some time in the future.

People in Saskatchewan may say that Senator Argue did this and did that, but they also say, "We did not elect Senator Argue. How can he be the one to represent our political interest in a democratic society?" Senator Argue may do this and may do that, but we want to see some action by elected representatives and not have to refer to someone in the other place who cannot answer in this House, who does not participate in our debates and who has been rejected electorally by the people of Saskatchewan. Mr. Speaker, they want to hear elected members of cabinet defend their actions and tell them what is happening.

It is difficult to speak over the hubbub on the other side, Mr. Speaker. I have tried to be non-partisan and rational in my presentation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: This is a very serious problem but members on the other side treat it lightly, and why should they not? It is a problem that affects the hinterlands of western Canada. I suppose at vacation time some may hitch up a trailer and drive as quickly as they can through the wheat growing area of western Canada to the mountains. I hope they will listen and try to gain some understanding of what I hope is a very serious presentation.

I have made the point, Mr. Speaker, that the major subsidies that we have seen going from the producer to the consumer in the last several years would not occur if my suggestion were adopted and there was a uniform application of the rule with respect to all types of wheat. The maximum price should be removed. This, then, becomes a legitimate subsidy to protect the consumer. The situation which has occurred in the past and which is going to occur again in the future as surely as I stand here, where the producer subsidizes the consumer, will be prevented.

We need a viable agricultural industry in our society. That is absolutely essential. Anything that tends to depreciate from that fundamental position I absolutely oppose. I do not believe the two-price system should include a feature that has the effect of forcing producers to subsidize consumers directly. If we as a country decide that grain prices should be subsidized, then the general public should bear the burden of the subsidy. It should not be shouldered only by the producers in one part of the country.

A ceiling price which has no provision for regular adjustment will create such subsidy effects. The government has demonstrated that it cannot react quickly enough to prevent this from happening. Therefore, I submit in all seriousness that there is much to recommend the notion of a no ceiling price. A ceiling price could only be defended if it was linked to a floor price that reflected real costs of production. This is important, and it is one of the reasons the government had to move with respect to a floor price.

Even now, in terms of the costs involved in agricultural production, how can anyone in this House talk about the floor price now in existence as being sufficient to cover the costs of production as far as western farmers are concerned? In that situation I think producers could expect help when prices fell below reasonable levels. And, in return, they would expect to see the top taken off their grain prices in times of high prices. There would be a stabilizing effect whereby both consumers and producers would benefit from time to time.

Under the present system we do not have a floor price that reflects costs of production. Our government had plans to establish a $6 per bushel minimum price.

Mr. Pepin: Why didn't you?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Liberal party, of which the minister is a member, in conjunction with the NDP, in their hurry to work in unison, together as a team, as they have, voted us out of office. I cannot help that and I am sorry that it happened. But we had an opportunity and we would have taken advantage of it by implementing a reasonable increase in the floor price. I think it is a reasonable increase relative to production cost changes of 85 per cent over the 1974 price of $3.75 a bushel.

The present low floor price means that the sword only cuts one way. Producers lose as prices break through the ceiling level, but they never win. The wheat farmer never wins because the floor price is simply too low.

I think I have made some sensible suggestions and recommendations with respect to this legislation. I make a non-partisan appeal to the government to become serious with respect to some of the situations facing western Canadians, western farmers in particular and farmers generally.

Mr. Deans: What are you doing?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I guess I am giving some free advice to the government party about what might be done in terms of increasing support for the government party in areas in which they are not now represented. I think that if we can move the government one inch on the road to being more sensitive to western—

Mr. Deans: Why are you saying that?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: There is a difference. If I were a member of the Liberal caucus, I would speak like you do. But the way it is now, I am in opposition. I am trying to be non-partisan and I am trying to give some advice.

Many suggestions have been made by the New Democratic Party concerning proportional representation, that this is going to be the solution in western Canada, that this somehow will bring a few more Liberal members into the fold, allowing them to articulate western grievances. This was supported by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), I am sure, but unfortunately it was rejected by the membership of his party. However, his leader is a proponent of proportional representation. This is his solution to regional disparity and regional representation.

All I am saying to the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain and to members of the government party is that they will not be judged by window dressing kinds of proposals, such as proportional representation or any such scheme. The Minister of Transport in his report was very keen on this particular proposal. I respect him, but I take serious issue with him and I have some serious questions about that plan. Every once in a while I think I could quote one of the members of the Liberal party from western Canada who had some advice for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) after the last election. That advice applies to this legislation.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) took a highly publicized tour of western Canada. He toured all the villages, the burghs, the farms and the cities of western Canada and came back with a kind of manifesto for the Prime Minister on how to win the west. I thought his conclusion was appropriate and correct, that no amount of high-jinks and jiggery-pokery or some kind of window-dressing proposal for proportional representation would work. The way the government could increase its support and representation would be to demonstrate by its policies that it understands western Canadians' concerns—

An hon. Member: It is the same bill.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Unfortunately, the hon. member, whom I respect, has come in late. He is armed by Liberal research and their one heckling line, that it is the same bill as the bill we brought in. That is the Liberal heckling line. I will repeat my earlier response, which was devastating the last time and it will probably cause this hon. member to leave the chamber in embarrassment and humiliation. My response was that we had to take the step to legalize an illegal act of the previous government. We had to take action to correct something that was done illegally and in contempt of Parliament. We had to take action to bring it before Parliament because we in this party believe in Parliament. We do not believe in doing things by order in council or behind the scenes. We try to be up front with the Canadian people.

As I mentioned in my remarks, we intended bringing in an increase in the floor price. I would like to hear a member of the government party tell us that the government will bring in a $6 minimum payment as a beginning. I would also like to hear the Minister of Transport, the parliamentary secretary or whomever the government cares to designate, stand up and tell us about what the government is going to do with respect to the ceiling price, and whether the government will give consideration to the removal of it.

I have spoken briefly on this bill because I feel very strongly about it. The bill is a matter of some interest in my area. It is also typical of the kind of oversight that has occurred in terms of government reaction to some problems that are considered serious in western Canada.

One of the battle cries in western Canada is dissatisfaction with the place of western Canada in confederation. It seems that everything we sell to the rest of Canada is at a price lower than world price. That policy applies not only to wheat but also to oil, as we all know. However, western Canadians pay world price for everything that comes to western Canada. That is the cry that goes up. The feeling of dissatisfaction is felt quite substantially across the west. I say to the government that it should be careful with this legislation, that it should listen to some of the judgments that have been made here.

I do appreciate the opportunity I have been given to speak on this bill. I wanted to tell the government how strongly I felt about what it is trying to do here.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to address a few remarks to Bill S-6. This is the third time this bill has been introduced. It was introduced first by the previous Liberal administration as Bill C-24, secondly by the PC government as Bill C-7, and thirdly now in the form we see today.

It is interesting to note that the combined Liberal-NDP coalition was in a hurry to bring down the PC government, giving absolutely no thought to the Two-Price Wheat Act at that time. I might say they did not give it even passing interest. That was the coalition of the Liberals and the NDP.

Now the Liberals want to bring this act before us for debate and get it through before the recess. Why is this? Is it because of the magnanimous concern of the Liberal government for the prairie wheat farmer? Is it because of concern for the consumers of Canada? Not quite. It is so that the government can save its own skin. The government will be in trouble if this bill is not passed and the act repealed. The Liberal government would have to pay the producers of western Canada $200 million.

When the Hon. Otto Lang introduced the bill in this House in 1974, he proclaimed, and I quote from page 864 of Hansard for October 29, 1974:

> This is a bill whose specific purpose is to enshrine for a period of years, in this case for seven years, a procedure whereby the treasury supplements payments made for wheat designed for human consumption in Canada . . . It is in its present form without any doubt and, I should think without any argument, in the nature of a consumer subsidy, an amount paid by the treasury, on behalf of the people of Canada as taxpayers, to lighten the burden on the consumer of the cost of wheat products in Canada.

On the passage of that bill the producers in western Canada were locked into a seven-year contract. It was violently opposed by the then Conservative opposition. On May 6, 1975, at page 5538 of Hansard the Hon. Jack Horner said:

> This bill locks the wheat producer into a seven-year agreement. I cannot overemphasize that. Everyone in this House has witnessed several labour negotiations. I can recite the railway negotiations, the longshoremen on the west coast, grain handlers and longshoremen on the St. Lawrence, and so on. None of them relate to a seven year contract . . . What has this parliament got against wheat producers? Why lock them into a fixed price for their commodity?

I do not hear any comments from the little red rump to my left.

Mr. Deans: That's because nobody is listening to you.

Mr. Shields: They should listen. The liberal government did not stick to its commitment of seven years. On November 30, 1978 it decided to terminate the subsidy payment. Instead of the fixed domestic price and subsidy payments, the Canadian Wheat Board regulations were amended to provide that wheat for domestic use would be priced between $4 and $5 a bushel, and durum for domestic use would be priced between $4 and $7.50 a bushel. The bill before us advances the termination date to November 30, 1978, rather than July 1980, which should be the case. The government is obligated to pay the producers that money. The government says that since December 1, 1978, that money has been received directly from the market place. The government owes the western producers $200 million. If it backdates the legislation, it will get out of that commitment.

What effect has the two-price wheat system had? Let us look for a moment at the transfer of income under the two-price wheat program from 1969 to 1978. There has been a direct transfer from the taxpayers to the consumers of $396 million, from the taxpayer to the producer of $75 million, from the consumer to the producer of $40 million, and from the producer to the consumer of $35 million. In addition, in the first four months of the 1979-80 crop year the producers have subsidized Canadian consumers by an estimated $22 million.

It is the same old story—call on the western producer to subsidize. It has cost the western producer at least $22 million in the 1979-80 crop year. Since the summer of 1979, the producers have subsidized consumers to the extent of $1 million a week. When is this Liberal government attitude of calling on western producers to subsidize going to stop?

When the Two-Price Wheat Act was brought in, the Conservative opposition asked the government to bring in an indexing provision to reflect the cost of production. Otto Lang said at that time that the legislation was adequate. At the time the legislation was brought in a bushel of wheat was in the $6 range. A bushel of No. 1CW red spring, Vancouver, is in the $6 range today. I quote from page 864 of Hansard for October 29, 1974:

> —levels which are still to this day pretty well close to a record, we decided that we should look at the proposition that as between the Canadian Wheat Board on the one hand, and other producers of wheat in Canada, and the consumers of Canada as represented by the buyers, millers and other users, we should enter into an arrangement whereby there would be a range of prices for grain, for wheat used for human consumption, a range which reflected more adequately than anything before that the cost of production to producers.

That was said by the then minister, Otto Lang. Let us look for a moment at what the special adviser to the minister of state in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, Ralph Goodale, said during the debate. At that time he was the member of Parliament for Assiniboia. I quote from page 890 of Hansard for October 30, 1974:

> It has been argued that this legislation should reflect specifically costs of production. I think that kind of suggestion is somewhat inappropriate in a discussion on a two-price system for wheat.
> I ask hon. members to remember this government's commitment to an over-all western grains income stabilization program.

● (1730)

The Western Grain Stabilization Act was implemented in 1976. The act provided that a review of its impact upon farmers be undertaken after the first three years of the act's coming into effect. There was to be a review undertaken after three years, and it was to be tabled in Parliament so that it could be discussed. No such review has been tabled. The same former member and now special adviser, Mr. Goodale, also said in 1974—and I refer again to Hansard for October 30, 1974, at page 890—the following:

> If conditions change drastically, as well they may, between now and 1980, if there is a downturn in the grain market—as grain producers of western Canada realize might happen—the figure provided for in the bill can be changed by this House to keep it in line with real circumstances.

At no time since the Two-Price Wheat Act was passed have members of Parliament been allowed to debate or legislate. Even now there is no consultation. The advisory board to the Canadian Wheat Board was not even consulted.

Again in the 1974 debate the Liberals were warned by the opposition either to include an indexing provision for the cost of production or, as an alternative, to shorten the frozen seven-year period from 1974 to 1977. A friend and colleague of mine and the former minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), said in October, 1979, as recorded at page 865 of Hansard:

> —this bill lacks an effective measure to take into consideration the increased costs of production. Therefore we would recommend to the minister the implementation of such a provision to reflect the rising costs of production over the seven year period.

I would like to refer hon. members to a situation which seems to be developing. We constantly hear in this House about how people who have made their home and their living in western Canada feel alienated from their federal government. Here we have a situation once again in which the government is putting a limit on the amount paid for the production of red spring wheat. This is exactly the same as what has been done with respect to the production of oil.

What does it do? I suggest that if a farmer wants to plant wheat on his farm, he has to decide whether to plant bread wheat or durum. I suggest he will opt durum because there is no limit on durum in the marketplace. The market determines what he gets for his produce. However, a misguided policy of this government has put a ceiling on what a farmer will get for the production of spring red. Alberta and Saskatchewan have subsidized the price of oil for the rest of Canada somewhere in the neighbourhood of $40 billion to $45 billion since 1973. That is a tremendous subsidy to the consumers of Canada. For the past seven years, western grain producers have subsidized consumers in the rest of Canada by some $350 million to $400 million. That is directly out of producers' pockets.

We were promised a new policy by this government before the Two-price Wheat Act would be passed in the other place. What did we get from the Minister of Transport's assistant in the other place? We received an announcement that the domestic price of No. 1CW red spring for human consumption would increase the minimum to $5, with a ceiling of $7. This is to be implemented during the next crop year. Forget about this year. It is to be implemented next year. Again the farmer has to wait until next year, maybe. For durum used in the marketplace a minimum was placed, but no ceiling on the upper limit. Again it is effective next crop year. What is the matter with this crop year? Why are we always putting it off? Next year prices will be higher. Farm expenses are not waiting until next year. We are not holding farm expenses in place. There will be more expenses next year. They are increasing this year. All we have to do is to look at the farmer caught in the bind of interest payments and at the cost of fertilizer, which has gone up. The cost of machinery and the cost of labour have gone up. At present the Two-Price Wheat Act does not cover the cost of production.

Let us refer again to what Mr. Goodale, the special adviser to the Minister of Transport, said. What did Mr. Goodale say? He introduced a very wishy-washy amendment which only Otto Lang could accept.

> The minister shall, on an annual basis and in consultation with the producers, review the provisions of this Act and all related regulations enacted by the governor in council with a view of making such recommendations to the governor in council as are appropriate in the light of prevailing costs of production of wheat and returns to producers.

Has there been consultation? Not a bit. The government did not even bother to consult with the members of the advisory committee of the Canadian Wheat Board. There was not one bit of consultation. There is a great worry that western Canadians feel alienated. We must make western Canadians feel that they are in the mainstream. There is an advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board, but not one bit of consultation. Instead, ministers traipse through western Canada giving high profile speeches and telling us in western Canada about what a good government they are.

Mr. McDermid: Full of emptiness.

Mr. Shields: Emptiness and promises. In other words, this new policy still does not adequately reflect the reality of the marketplace. The Two-Price Wheat Act, as it stands now and as it did in 1974, does not reflect it and never has. What have been the consequences from 1973 to the second quarter of 1979? The cost of total farm inputs have increased by a whopping 80.6 per cent. And what does he get for his wheat? Exactly the same as in 1974 because of a misguided government policy to place a maximum on what he can receive. It astounds me when this sort of thing comes to light. Do not be surprised if next year and the year after we cannot meet our commitments on foreign sales because the wheat producer has said: No way, I am not going to produce red spring wheat for human consumption, the bread wheat, the Cadillac of the wheats. Do not be surprised if that producer goes into durum wheats. If a man is going to invest his time, labour and money into planting wheat, it is only logical that he is going to plant durum wheat when he sees there is no maximum, no ceiling on his return and the marketplace will dictate the price.

● (1740)

If the government truly wants to help the farmer, then it should get off his back. If the government truly wants to subsidize the consumer, then it should do it, but not on the back of the farmer. One little act by this government which would clearly indicate to the farmers of western Canada that it understands the problem, that it is willing to modify its stand and remove the maximum for bread wheat, one act like that, could do more for Canadian unity than all its fireworks in Yellowknife and the rest of the country. The farmer would truly believe for once that this government, with virtually no representation in the west, is finally listening and understanding what the problems are.

Mr. McDermid: They have no representation.

Mr. Shields: I hear from an hon. friend that they have virtually no representation. That is debatable as they do have two representatives from Manitoba somewhere.

An hon. Member: What about the Conservatives; don't they represent the west?

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer that question. Yes, they do, absolutely. That is what we are here for and that is what we are trying to make this insensitive government understand. It is a very moderate request; instead of putting a limit on red spring, I suggest they take it off. Do not put a maximum there so that the farmer is subsidizing the consumer. In fact, it is only the wheat farmer who is subsidizing the consumer.

An hon. Member: Share the wealth.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I heard one of those yahoos across the way yell out "share the wealth". My God, come to my area and look at the farmer, look at how they are out there grubbing the soil. What is the matter with you? You said, "share the wealth"? That is the most idiotic thing I ever heard. That is the kind of asinine stupidity we get from this Liberal government. They do not understand what the prairie producer is facing. I ask them, I plead with them to think about what was said for a minute. Come to my riding and I will take you to areas where there are farmers, young people trying to break out and plant new land for production so they can feed Canada and the world.

As I said, the cost of total farm inputs increased by over 80 per cent, and the price of wheat remains the same because this government has a maximum on it. Let us look at some of the crops. There has been an increase in the index of crop production costs of 105 per cent since 1973, that is seed, fertilizer and pesticide. You do not just throw the wheat on the ground, Mr. Speaker, hope for rain and see it come up. You have to work at it, you have to use pesticides and fertilizers, you have to clean your seed before you sow it. Since 1973, fertilizers are up 115 per cent, and agricultural chemicals are up 168 per cent. This government has put the producer in jeopardy and it shows insensitivity, callousness and disregard for the needs and objectives of western Canadians, who make up a large segment of our population. Fifty per cent of all employment in western Canada is directly or indirectly related to the farming community. It is still a farming sector.

There are some other areas where the government has been clearly insensitive and on which it has flip-flopped. They want to build a grain terminal at Prince Rupert capable of handling more than 150 million bushels of grain a year. It must be built to meet the commitments we are making to other countries in the world. What is the result? There is no final agreement. Site preparation was to begin this summer. What has happened? It is going to start, maybe, in 1982.

An hon. Member: Take your time.

Mr. McDermid: He is just letting it sink in.

Mr. Shields: I am taking my time and hoping it sinks in.

Mr. Ouellet: What a filibuster.

Mr. Shields: No, it is not a filibuster. I am asking hon. members to think for a moment. Let him put himself in the place of the prairie producer. He does not even know what his initial payment is going to be this year. The government has broken with all tradition and not even announced the initial payment, and now we are bringing in a two-price wheat system. Essentially we all agree with it.

Mr. Ouellet: Well, vote on it.

Mr. Shields: However, why put a maximum on it? Yes, it was brought in, in 1973, and all we are trying to do is to save the government from its moral commitment to the producer right now, amounting to a debt of $200 million. That is what this does. Do you backbenchers not even understand what your government is doing? I advise you to read some of the information.

I ask for one thing, Mr. Speaker. I ask the hon. members to consider what I say, and I ask hopefully, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), or someone in his department, to read my remarks. He is not here to hear them, of course, but I ask that we remove the maximum. Why set a maximum? All the government is doing is to put itself in a straitjacket. It does not reflect the cost of production. Let the marketplace determine what the maximum is. Let them admit that what they want to do is to subsidize the consumer. At least let them bring it in openly and honestly and say: What we are going to do is to subsidize the consumer with the taxpayers' dollars. Fine, but let them not do it on the back of the farmer by putting a maximum on what he will receive for red spring. They are going to force that guy to put in other crops, and that will put pressure on the Canadian dollar because if we cannot get enough here, we will have to import it from somewhere else. The idiocy comes across. It is an artificial way of holding down inflation, but it will blow the lid. I ask the government to bring forward an amendment which will eliminate the maximum on No. 1CW red spring wheat.

● (1750)

I thank hon. members, particularly some of those across the way, for listening to what I had to say. It is a genuine concern. If we addressed it in a logical, moderate manner, as I said before, we would be doing more for Canadian unity than all the television advertisements with flying geese or the fireworks, which God knows cost how much across Canada. It would do more for Canadian unity. It would do more to address the feeling of concern of grain producers about the government.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I will be the last speaker for the Official Opposition with respect to this bill. I want to deal with a number of items rather briefly.

The purpose of the bill is to remove any obligations on the government to make subsidy payments in accordance with the provisions of the Two-Price Wheat Act in light of changes made in the domestic pricing system in December 1978. I would not be surprised at all if this bill were to cause great concern among western farmers because farmers in general are suffering very badly from the costs of inflation. The input costs with respect to agriculture have zoomed dramatically.

I ask hon. members who represent rural ridings, as I do in part, and others who represent urban ridings to consider what has happened to the price of fuel, not only in the last two years but since February 18, 1980 when those farmers were promised that if they voted Liberal, gasoline and fuel prices would stay down. I remind the House and the country that those promises will not be forgotten by those farmers who feel very badly let down. Also they are affected by a government which has decided to use interest rates and to adopt a high interest rate policy. Therefore, the government and its backbenchers ought not to be surprised if hon. members in the House who represent western agricultural interests, given the atmosphere in the country today, speak about something which bears so heavily upon them. As I said at the outset, this is a bill which will ultimately dramatically change the pricing of a very serious part of Canadian agriculture. It is a $200-million obligation which will be picked up by consumers as a result of this matter.

I do not think hon. members should forget that this is a piece of housekeeping legislation which grew out of the marvellous conference in Bonn. A number of things came out of the conference in Bonn in 1978. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) will recall what came out of it, aside from the promises affecting western farmers. The slashing of 5,000 public servants from the public payroll also came out of that conference. On August 1, 1978 in the dead of night, without warning being given to the then President of the Treasury Board about it, an announcement was made that these public servants would be slashed. I get worried about world conferences involving the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or his colleagues around the world. He should remember that.

The issue with respect to this is quite clear. Hon. members who have spoken have said that the price range with respect to the two-price wheat policy is unsatisfactory, that it is not keeping up with the cost of production and that the ranges are too low. As everyone knows, there is no limit on durum but there is a maximum limit of $7 on Canadian red spring wheat. They are really saying to the House that it is unfair to apply a maximum in 1980 or 1981 which was going out of date in 1976, 1977, 1978 and 1979. This is the position. It is a clear one and it is important.

I hope members are not saying that this is only a western problem. I think Ontario members should remember that there are 18,000 producers in Ontario who market wheat each year. The annual production involves about 700,000 tonnes—that is the metric system creeping into agriculture—nearly all of which is of the soft white winter wheat variety. When the bill goes to committee, they will not only have to deal with western Canada. They will have to deal with the wheat producers of Ontario who are very much concerned about this system.

Also these producers are very concerned that these changes are taking place at a time when there is no clear grain transportation policy in Canada, despite all the talk of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). I do not say this in any unkindly way, but there is no clear policy in Canada. The minister knows, every wheat producer, whether he lives in western Canada or in Ontario, knows, every farmer and every manufacturer who ships anything knows, that the rail system is proving itself gradually more inadequate as cars go out of repair. We are losing approximately 1,800 cars per year, and new ones are not being produced that fast. This is why western farmers, Ontario farmers and others are concerned about the system.

The minister must respond at some stage, probably at committee stage, to the railroads' threat of rationing the rail system. Who are the railway companies anyway? Who runs the railroads of Canada? Are they so independent that they can make their own decisions free of government influence? Does the government have something to say about a system which was put in place to tie the country together and to give it some reason for staying together? Those are the things we want to question in this debate.

From the point of view of western or eastern grain producers, the entire system—the operation of the St. Lawrence Seaway, the deepening of ports, and the capacity of elevators—must be part of a clear transportation policy to serve agriculture, manufacturing and so on. Despite the promises of the 1980 election of action and of renewed vigour, the fact of the matter is that wherever we look there is inaction, there is no vigour, there is no imagination. There is stagnation throughout the country. This is why farmers and members of Parliament have railed against the transportation policies, or lack of them, interest rate and inflation policies of the government. Therefore, it is important that this not be seen as solely a western problem. It is a very major western problem, but what we are talking about in the course of this debate affects grain producers in Ontario and agriculturalists in Quebec. It is evidence of an attitude which must change. Whether we are speaking of agriculture or of anything else, the country is in deep trouble.

Therefore, it is important that this bill get to committee where Ontario wheat producers and everyone who is interested can be heard. May I call it six o'clock, or will Your Honour put the question, if you so wish?

● (1800)

Mr. Collenette: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I thought that perhaps, due to the graciousness of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton we could now put the question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You may put the question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6.02 p.m. the House took recess.

ADULT OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING ACT, NO. 2

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved that Bill C-67, an Act to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act (No. 2), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the presentation of this bill introduces a number of very significant amendments to the Adult Occupational Training Act. But before getting into the actual substance of those proposals, I would like to make one short comment about the present situation we face in relation to training. It has been one of the issues which, over the past year or two, has gradually emerged as one of the important public and private priorities across Canada. Increasingly, members of the business community, trade unions, provincial governments and our own government, have focused on the need to substantially increase the availability of skilled workers in Canada as one of the major solutions we can provide to some of the economic problems that we face in this country. It is for this reason that the amendments being presented tonight, I hope, will commend themselves to hon. members of this House for speedy and quick passage.

These amendments are designed to give us the ability to respond, in a flexible and effective way, to many of the concerns which have been registered by Canadians and to the need to substantially improve and upgrade the availability of highly-skilled workers for our industries across Canada.

It is interesting, if one looks at some of the projections, to note that we are going through some major transformations in the labour markets of Canada. For the last 10, 15 or 20 years, what we have been faced with is an increasing need to respond to an expanding labour force. The large numbers of young people coming into the labour market, as well as the increased participation of women, have given us a very strong and increasingly forceful need to supply any kind of job, almost at any price; but those conditions are now changing. The composition of the labour force is now going through a major change. We must begin to total our resources because we will find that the labour force growth is slowing down while at the same time there are increasing shortages in key sectors of the economy.

While the supply of the labour market is changing, the demand is also changing. While service work—work in the areas of public administration, clerical, management, health services, education and others—was the major stimulus for growth in the last two decades, it will increasingly decline as a supplier of jobs in Canada. We will find the slack taken up in the areas of manufacturing and resource trades, which will necessitate a very different set of requirements for skilled workers. Therefore, the emphasis will be on an area which has really been neglected for a long time. There will have to be improvement in our blue collar trades, our higher-skilled trades and our technology trades. We will have to reallocate our resources, our interest and our attention to supplying those skills. That will mean some major changes in many of the vested interests of our society, many of the educational institutions, our apprenticeship programs and many of our industrial programs. It is for this reason that we have brought in these changes to the Adult Occupational Training Act at this time, so that we are able to get a leg up to take some lead initiating those changes.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the federal government must play a major role in helping both workers and employers to adjust to the realities of the present labour market. We must promote the integration of women, native people and disadvantaged workers into a larger field of employment. We must train more workers in skilled trades and occupations. We must help the workers already on the labour market to learn new skills without undue difficulties. I believe that we must now amend the Adult Occupational Training Act and that this will be a first step towards adapting our employment and training policies to the labour market of the 1980s.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: That is from western Canada, Mr. Speaker!

Of course, we recognize the need to look at the report that will be presented shortly, we hope, by the special parliamentary committee that was established last year to examine employment opportunities in this country. We await with great interest the finding in that report as well as the report which I hope to be able to table in this House within a matter of days. Those will give us the larger picture of the entire labour market situation in Canada for the 1980s.

I hope that the parliamentary committee report and that report from my department will open up a very far-ranging debate and consultation in the entire area of job training, job creation and employment opportunities for this country as we proceed into this new decade.

I do not think that we can wait for the full deliberations or consultations that will be based on those reports, however. Important as they are and critical as they will be to the major transformations in our policies, we must act now. We cannot afford to lose a day or a week or a year which might impede or restrain the development of new approaches to training. Some hon. members have asked me for the assurance that passage of this legislation will not close the door to further changes in training legislation after the studies have been considered. I am pleased to offer those assurances. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, the amendments introduced in debate on second reading are simply the prelude to a much wider range of changes that must take place.

The changes introduced tonight are necessary in order to respond to the very well defined and articulated need expressed to me by employers, by trade unions and by provincial governments. I feel it is important to have the House adopt these measures before we leave so that we can put some of the more obvious changes and innovations in our training programs in place by next fall. That would mean that we would not lose time. There is a critical time gap that we must overcome if we are to meet the shortage of skilled workers in Canada.

None of the changes proposed in this bill will in any way pre-empt the work of the parliamentary task force or the other proposals that we will be debating and consulting upon over the next several months. They will have the desired flexibility, efficiency and effectiveness that will give us a good start.

The bill we are studying today has three basic goals. The first is to simplify the administration of the Adult Occupational Training Act and to eliminate much of the unnecessary paper work that small businessmen in particular must face in developing industrial training on the shop floor.

Second, we want to make the act more flexible so that it will respond to the variety of needs in the training area.

These two sets of proposals were presented in the previous Parliament. The third set is in addition to those. It is based upon the measures introduced last January as part of the industrial assistance program which was designed to deal with communities facing industrial dislocation. The amendments to this act are an essential ingredient to enable us to fully perform all the services to those designated communities under the industrial assistance program.

As far as the specifics of this bill are concerned, I am sure we would all agree that the critical place where training must occur is in the private arena. We must provide as much encouragement and incentive to the private employer to develop on-the-job training as soon as possible.

It is my intention, through these amendments, to make the program more effective and attractive by reducing the paper work burden on employers. For this reason, one of the amendments provides a flat-rate method of reimbursing training costs. This will free employers from keeping detailed records of training expenses. When the payment for each contract can be based on a composite, single rate, a great deal of time and money will be saved. The small employer will not need a legion of accountants or clerical workers to keep records on each worker in the training program but will be able to apply for a training agreement with the department under a flat rate formula.

The amendment has particular appeal for the small employer, the employer who provides the majority of jobs in this country but until now has not provided a great deal of training. Through this amendment, we hope to provide further incentives to the small businessman and employer in Canada to give on-the-job training.

Employers will also benefit from the change which will allow us to help with the cost of training that is conducted outside Canada. I want to caution hon. members that we would use this particular provision very sparingly. I believe we must develop and enhance our own training facilities, but there are certain skills that can only be acquired abroad. By way of example, Mr. Speaker, just last week I received a letter from the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) who sits on the opposition benches. He indicated that one of the oil companies in his city wanted to send six trainees to a program in Houston to develop a specialized skill for the oil industry that is only available in that city. As the act now stands, unfortunately I could not provide direct assistance to that employer for the training program. If the House were so kind as to allow quick passage of this bill, then we would be able to respond quickly to the very fervent appeal of the hon. member for Calgary West. Six new trainees would soon arrive in the wonderful city of Houston to be trained in these new skills.

There are skills that cannot be obtained in this country, Mr. Speaker, and so we need to provide the opportunity for workers to go abroad. We think we can provide support to the private small employer by giving some assistance under the training act to enable that to take place.

One of the most important amendments in this bill extends the period in which we will allow support for training beyond the 52 weeks now contained in the act. We have recognized that as we move into a high technology economy, we must develop high-skill trades. In many instances those skills cannot be acquired within the 52-week period allowed in the present act.

Hon. members know that much of our effort in the past has been concentrated on short-term job entry skills. Now, because of changing economic conditions, we must shift to occupations which require a longer training such as tool and die makers, sheet metal workers, industrial mechanics and machinists. All of these require more than 52 weeks of training.

Again I can speak, by way of example, of a representation made to me two or three weeks ago in the province of Saskatchewan. The native organizations in that province had developed programs of training and management skills for native people so that they could go back to band councils and non-profit corporations and develop management aptitudes to make those programs work. At the present time we cannot provide training beyond the 52-week period. This is another very important program that could go ahead if we could allow the additional time that is required for training. We would use this authority with a great deal of care and caution and obviously would consult with the provinces regarding the credentials and standards required. We would be able to provide for the additional training beyond the 52 weeks. This would give an incentive to people to develop high-skill trades in Canada.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Is it open to municipal corporations?

Mr. Axworthy: I will come to that.

Another important and complementary amendment would erase the present requirement that people in need of skill training wait one year after leaving high school before they can be referred to institutional training. The amendment would allow a person to go from a high school program directly into an institutional training program. This would give an opportunity to young people in particular, to move directly into high-skill programs. In this context, I want to mention the representation of the hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni). The hon. member indicated that perhaps in the next round of amendments we might even consider waiving the rule for those who have not yet reached the high school leaving age but who do want to enter the high school trades. I think it is a useful proposal to consider. I am attracted to it and I would welcome further representation. But again it comes back to the basic point that we are not interested here in paper credentials; we are interested in getting people trained. Therefore, we want to eliminate some of the overregulation and some of the kinds of difficulties and handicaps that have been put in the way of people getting access immediately to training programs.

● (2020)

A further important amendment in this area, and one that I personally believe would make a major improvement in our training capacity in Canada, is that this bill, with these amendments, would provide authority to negotiate industrial training contracts with persons or groups other than employers. This will give us the flexibility to make use of additional training expertise or resources.

Up to this time we have been limited either to institutional training places provided by provincial governments or to individual employers or groups of employers. Under this amendment, again subject to provincial standards or rules to make sure that the quality of training is high, we would be able to negotiate with trade unions to provide a training program for their membership. We could negotiate with agencies, such as the non-profit organizations like an Indian organization or a social agency which had the capacity or competence to provide specialized training in those areas.

Again, one of the areas in which we have been conducting much negotiation over the past several months has been with native groups to develop native-based institutions to supply workers for the big megaprojects in western Canada. Our experience demonstrates that through such institutions as the Blue Quill school in Alberta and the Indian training institute in Saskatchewan, natives can provide first-class training for their own resources. This amendment would give us the ability to provide a much broader range of sources of training for Canadians. Therefore, it would give us a multiplication of opportunities and a multiplication of resources.

Here we come back to the issue of flexibility to give us a broader range and more effective response in the training area. Bill C-67 is aimed not only at making our training programs more effective and flexible, it is also aimed at increasing the financial flexibility under the program. Employers are now reimbursed for their trainees' wages at a rate which must not exceed the maximum training allowance set for people enrolled in courses at provincial training institutions. In the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, and indeed in other areas of the country such as British Columbia where wages are rapidly increasing, the maximum allowable weekly payment for trainees under the existing act is simply not enough. The bill would give us the ability to increase this payment and aid employers in these high-wages regions who may have to pay more than $500 a week to attract potential trainees.

I have also referred to the changing labour market conditions of the 1980s because it is important to realize the kind of challenges and demands that we will face. One of the most critical challenges to which this government has already devoted a high degree of attention is coping with the impact of sweeping technological change. This will be of particular interest to members from Ontario and Quebec, where major technology adjustments are taking place in some key traditional industries. In line with this thinking, the third goal of the proposed amendments is to enable designated workers and communities to deal more effectively with the consequences of industrial disruption.

We introduced the special industrial adjustment program last January. Within that program are a number of labour adjustment programs: portable wages, assistance for early retirement and employment incentives. The amendments proposed in Bill C-67 will further strengthen our ability to deal with workers in those communities that are affected by industrial change, such as the automobile industry, the textile industry and the shipbuilding industry. They will encourage workers to learn new skills by permitting us to offer training allowances at a period when workers are laid off in these designated industries. One of the unfortunate consequences in an economic downturn is that apprentices and trainees are usually the first fired because of seniority rules and other kinds of regulations which have grown up and evolved over the years. The first people who are the victims of industrial change are those, in many ways, who should be the last victims. I am referring to those who provide the new skills for the future. Under these amendments we will enable the trainee to go to either a new institution to continue his training or to provide for an additional allowance for that company to allow the trainee to stay on the job. Therefore, we will be able to smooth out the up and down cycles of the economic pattern so that it will not drastically affect the training opportunities of many of our workers. That is of critical importance in many of our higher industrialized provinces and regions which, by shifting the burden of the economic downturn on to apprentices or trainees, gives short shrift for the future. People who are being laid off now are the future skilled technicians, technologists and manual workers whom we will need two or three years down the line in order to maintain our economic growth.

In view of that particular serious need, the amendments we propose in this second reading are of great importance. They add to the impetus and necessity for us to put these programs into place as part of our industrial adjustment system so we can provide the incentives and supports, encourage workers to train for those occupations in demand, to leave occupations where work is obsolescent and to move into new occupations where the work is to be found.

The incentive allowance contained within these amendments would give workers up to 70 per cent of their previous earnings, with a weekly ceiling of $220 per week.

Bill C-67 is one, I believe, on which all members of this House can agree. I do not believe that the training of workers in Canada is an issue which lends itself to rigorous partisan division. There can certainly be different points of view as to the kinds of amendments that can be made, improvements, but I repeat, this is just the beginning of a substantially wholesale change in the wide arena of training opportunities which Canadians will have to debate and discuss over the months and the years ahead.

Bill C-67 gives us immediate tools and instruments to apply at a time when we see the gap for workers getting shorter. Unless we start now and begin to overcome that gap, years hence members of this Parliament will be looking back with some degree of regret that this session of Parliament did not act in an expeditious way to pass this bill.

The improvements contained in Bill C-67 should recommend themselves to all members of the House. Because we must act quickly and with dispatch, I trust and hope that it will be possible to secure the consent of members of this House for a speedy passage of this bill so it can become law this summer and we can get on with the new training horizons that we must face by this fall.

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to take part in the debate on Bill C-67, an act to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act, No. 2. This act proposes amendments to an act which, I think we all agree, needs updating badly.

● (2030)

We on this side are concerned that the minister is making changes that do not fit exactly the recommendation of Parliament's select Committee on Employment Opportunities for the '80s. I am a member of that committee. I must say that in the last year I have enjoyed my work immensely. I know that several members of the committee wish to speak on this bill as well as other members of my party.

Something I find rather amusing is that everyone on the other side is in a hurry. We get to July and they want to rush everything through. This minister is no exception. He said we need to rush this through, we need it in a hurry, these programs cannot go on without legislation. I am surprised to hear that coming from him because not having the legislative authority to do it has never before stopped the government from doing something.

Mr. Cousineau: Name them.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He already did. He said Axworthy.

Mr. McDermid: I do not have time to name them all. The government introduces bills at the last minute and then wants to rush them through the House so that it can get away for the summer. However, this is a very important subject and it must be discussed thoroughly.

In this country we have a very serious problem. We have a shortage of skilled workers and a shortage in certain professions. We have about one million unemployed. According to the latest statistics, the unemployment rate across Canada is 7.1 per cent. The goverment likes to talk about that figure in glowing terms. Even the Governor of the Bank of Canada is now in on the act. His definition of full employment is 7 per cent. I am not an economist, but even I know that is not realistic. I doubt whether there are many people in this House who believe this is a realistic figure.

The government and the minister failed to mention that for young persons under the age of 24, unemployment is in the 12.7 per cent range; well over 13 per cent for men that age and under 12 per cent for women. This group makes up 25 per cent of the age 15 and over population, but accounts for 45 per cent of the unemployed.

In the last 14 years the unemployment rate for young people has dropped in only 5 years, but over that period the rate of unemployment for youth has risen from 5.6 to 12.7 per cent, the present rate. Their share of unemployment has risen from 40 per cent to 47 per cent in that time. Of the close to one half million young people unemployed, 50 per cent have less than a grade 10 education.

The problem is immense, as we have found out over the past year when studying and debating the situation in Canada. Recommendations will be forthcoming from the employment opportunities committee. I urge the minister to pay heed to what the committee recommends. I can assure him and his predecessors that we will not rest until the report is implemented or reasons given which prove conclusively that it would be impossible to implement. I am sure pressure will come from all sides of this House.

There are many shortages in some regions of Canada and a surplus of manpower in others. Bringing the two together is a major problem that must be addressed. Are our young people getting the proper training? Why have we not trained in Canada? Is training going on now?

I think it is fair to say that the training going on in Canada is generally of good quality. There are some areas where the equipment being used with which to teach is outdated and some instructors have not had an opportunity to upgrade themselves in the latest techniques, but generally there is good training.

Most definitely there is not enough training being carried out in Canada. One may wonder why. Traditionally, Canada has imported its skilled labour from many countries of the world. It was easy to find the tool and die makers, the aeronautical technologists, the machine operators, and one could go on and on. However, that supply is fast disappearing for a number of reasons.

First, this government changed its emphasis regarding immigrants from one of importing necessary skills to family reunification. I am all for family reunification. As the minister knows, I am probably knocking on his door as often as any member of this House regarding those people who immigrate to Canada and make a new start here. However, one statistic which concerns me about our immigration policy at present is that only 24 per cent of those immigrating to Canada have the skills that are required. If the trend we have experienced over the last few years since the act was changed and came into effect in April 1978 continues, the number will be down to 12 per cent in two years. That is dangerous.

The second reason, and this may be hard for some Canadians to understand, is that there are not as many skilled people anxious to make a new start in Canada as has been the experience in the past. With Canada's slip from second to seventh place in standard of living, we are not quite as attractive as we might have been in the past.

The third reason, and this is becoming more of a factor every year, is that with major projects around the world, megaprojects or world projects being carried out in many countries, a shortage of skilled labour is being felt everywhere. Other countries are coming to Canada to try to entice our skilled labour to go to their country to work on major projects. Australia is a prime example of that. Of course, the falling birth rate around the world is another factor. Skilled labour is in short supply.

Canada's manufacturing and service industries must train, and must train in a very big way, if we are to remain competitive in the world marketplace. How do we go about it? I do not want to second guess the findings of the committee, but I think I can sum up our recommendations by saying we need co-operation, we need emphasis in certain areas of our country, but we have the capacity in Canada to do the job.

Let me discuss co-operation for just a moment. The Dominion of Canada has two levels of government which share certain responsibilities. Therefore, it is important that there be co-operation between the federal and provincial levels. I am very concerned that the back of the spirit of co-operation may be broken and positive moves will be required to heal that broken back. The controversy over the Constitution and the controversy over energy prices have poisoned the atmoshpere.

I am sad to say that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) has not seen fit to have a meeting with the provincial ministers responsible for education, manpower and apprenticeship programs and the federal government with regard to its involvement in manpower planning and training. Yes, he made a flying trip across Canada when he was first appointed some 16 or 17 months ago, but since then he has not had meetings, and the two levels are unmistakably entwined. As recently as June 8, 1981 ministers responsible for manpower in four western provinces and the Yukon and Northwest Territories met and set up advisory teams which will address common labour market issues in western Canada, issues such as manpower training, manpower planning and analysis, including mobility of labour, and the effects of immigration. They stated that they would ask to meet the federal Minister of Employment and Immigration to discuss changes prior to implementation. In their communique the participants stated the following:

● (2040)

We hope this kind of consultation is an example the federal government will follow in future and thereby remove one of the issues—that of federal intrusion, unilaterally and without consultation, into fields of education and training, which are under provincial and territorial government jurisdiction.

That is quite an indictment. The situation must change and, being such an open individual, I am sure the minister will take the advice of that committee and its report in this regard and hopefully will call meetings of manpower ministers from across this fair land, and not just the western ministers.

There must be co-operation between labour and management. As I mentioned before and as the minister mentioned in his remarks, more must be done about job training in order to keep Canada competitive. The fault lies at many levels. No one person is to blame for the lack of manpower training in this country. One of those levels is union and management. Unions naturally want to protect those who are working, the journeymen. That is understandable, but unions must realize that to provide a trained work force a number of apprentices must be assured that they will finish their training from start to finish. This can be negotiated and put into contacts.

I toured Orenda Engines in Mississauga. I wish the minister would take time sometime to go down there are take a look at that company. The average age of its skilled workers frightens me. Its skilled work force is aging rapidly and approaching retirement, and there is not one apprentice in the place. This is in the aeronautics industry, in which we all know Canada has a great future. What will happen to companies like this five to ten years down the road? They will be knocking at the minister's door and saying, "We want a mission to Britain to bring some skilled workers from their aeronautic industry back to Canada to work here." They are not training.

We visited Germany and Britain as part of our study, and one of the things we found was that when an apprentice takes on an apprenticeship, he finishes it. He is assured of finishing it. He is not assured of a job, but he is assured of his training, much like our young people going to university. They are guaranteed to finish their courses and to get their degrees. The same is true in our community colleges. Apprenticeships in Canada are not like that. They are last on, first off, and that has to change to assure apprentices that they will complete their education. In Germany 80 per cent to 90 per cent of the companies train skilled workers. In England, it is between 70 per cent and 75 per cent. In Canada it is 20 per cent. We have a critical shortage, and the minister now sees fit to bring in a piecemeal bill. It will help somewhat—I do not argue about that at all—but in no way does it have the answer to Canada's manpower problems.

One of the other problems is mobility of labour. There tends to be a double standard on the gouvernment side. Case after case has been raised. The Department of Employment and Immigration is not allowing a constituent of mine to apply for a job in the metropolitan area of Toronto because he happens to live 100 yards outside an arbitrary boundary set up by personnel. The only reason it was set up was to weed out applications. It was a method of weeding out applications. To my way of thinking, that is not mobility of labour. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) is here tonight. He should be ashamed. Secretaries can apply for work in his department only if they live in Ontario and Quebec. That is some mobility of labour! Pilots for the government must come from one province, or they cannot apply. There is no mobility of labour there. We see this type of thing happening in the government, and we hear great pious remarks from hon. members opposite about how they have to solve the mobility of labour problem, but I suggest they take a look at their own closets before they ask other people to clean up their closets.

We begin to understand why a premier of a province, such as Premier Peckford, says, "Jobs for my people first, and then we will go much wider." Some of my friends opposite from Quebec have discussed the problem with me. Naturally they want jobs created in the province of Quebec for Quebecers first. I understand that, but the double standards which are being preached are very unfair.

Then there are special interest groups of workers with limited access to the labour market. Discrimination is a barrier to access. In the labour market there is a distinction which is made based solely on race, sex, age or physical handicaps. In the case of natives, they suffer general discrimination on the part of employers. This is particularly visible in the service sector where the jobs require contact with the public. In many cases this discrimination takes place during the selection of candidates, while in other cases it takes place during employment. This situation pushes natives to choose social welfare rather than being subjected to such humiliations. Other groups make much less frequent use of the word "discrimination", which leads to the belief that barriers are less insurmountable or the work environment less hostile.

However, women claim to be subject to job discrimination and discrimination in training possibilities. The same happens to physically handicapped persons and to senior workers. Natives face problems which seem deeper than those of other groups. Natives want to have jobs, as do all citizens of Canada. They find the working environment alienating because it is insufficiently flexible to their socio-cultural peculiarities. It is therefore necessary to establish improved dialogue between the world of business and industry on the one hand and natives on the other. I feel that the attitudes of employers must change, and concrete measures should be taken in this regard. Unemployment among natives is alarming. Unemployment rates reaching up to 90 per cent in some areas are quoted. This problem will only become more pressing as a massive influx of young natives into the labour market is forecast over the next ten years. Given that the current employment possibilities on the reserves are limited, these young people will increase the ranks of the urban unemployed, and they must be trained.

Women also have specific problems to overcome in order to enter the labour market and to keep stable employment. They are often limited to subordinate, low-paying jobs. They have no hope of moving out of them by orienting themselves toward non-traditional types of female employment because of rigid social attitudes which classify them by sexist stereotypes.

Labour market structures are another important barrier, particularly for those women who have family responsibilities. The rigidity of work schedules is a case in point. So is the limited availability of part-time jobs, shared employment and so on. The other main obstacle to the access of women to the labour market is the absence of employment support services. Representatives of women's groups agree that employment prospects will remain limited as long as there are no day care services easily accessible to all. It is also necessary to introduce other improvements such as better professional counselling, which, I might add, is handled very capably in Outreach programs. In summary, if it is desired that the work of women contribute to economic performance, it is necessary to introduce services to facilitate their access to the labour market.

● (2050)

The physically handicapped, Mr. Speaker, even in this year of the handicapped are still perceived as being incapable of making a positive social contribution. If their access to work were facilitated and if changes in the social attitude towards them could be introduced, they could become productive. The current rate of unemployment among young people is high, due no doubt to demographic factors, career choice errors and, at least partly, to the imposition of abusive entry requirements for jobs, as well as demands for previous experience which is often not necessary. The attitudes of unions, for example the closed shop, would also limit their employment opportunities. These are people who really do need help and training in a manpower planning program, and this is not specifically addressed in Bill C-67. As the minister knows full well, the matter must be addressed and quickly.

The matter of financing of professional training is an age old problem. Who should finance the training? How can the present financing system be improved? I personally feel manpower training is as important a part of post-secondary education as is university or community college education. Manpower on the job training, apprenticeship training and skills training in technical fields are a part of our post-secondary education system and should be treated as such. I think the financing system can be grouped under four main themes: Financing problems which enterprises must face; current policy on grants and the means to improve it; use of the fiscal system as a means to subsidize training; the establishment of a grant levy system.

Training involves costs for firms either directly or indirectly by an increase in the cost of production. Although these costs may eventually be recovered in the shape of higher productivity and eventual reduction of bottlenecks if the employee turnover rate is low, there is still an immediate burden the firm must bear. Small and medium-sized businesses are often unable to bear these costs and need some kind of assistance. In this regard, in spite of an often questionable allocation of funds, government assistance for training is very important to those firms. In spite of this assistance, a large share is borne by the firm. In certain sectors the share would be in the order of 75 to 80 per cent, and even more. Under these circumstances it is not surprising to find that the training activity is lower than what the companies themselves would like to maintain. Therefore, they should receive greater government assistance in the form of wage subsidies, capital subsidies for the equipment required for training, and general subsidies for human resources they allocate to training. Otherwise they cannot have a sufficient level of activity in these fields, particularly at a time when profit margins are low, non-existent or negative.

In their judgment, government assistance is further justified because they finance through corporate income taxes an education system which supplies at no cost trained personnel to other sectors, particularly the service sector.

As to the present grant policy, we have heard that the desirability of maintaining this policy is not uniform. One group, mainly business representatives, wish to maintain the principle. As for changes in fund allocation, it would be desirable that government offer financial assistance for training periods of up to four years. In addition, the assistance offered for the training of apprentices should cover a greater share, or even all, of the costs incurred by the firm. There is also a general feeling that training should more closely match the needs of the local community and this should lead to different financing mechanisms. Funds should be redistributed to support initiatives at the local level. This is being done in some areas to a limited degree. Other groups, mainly labour representatives, would like the government to withdraw completely from the financing of training programs, or at least play only a complementary or ancillary role. The reason invoked is that training is usually the responsibility of the firm and it must therefore fully assume it. Many raise the issue, however, from the viewpoint of economic efficiency. Such a system of complete self-financing has the advantage of assuring society that the cost to the firm of trained personnel more closely approaches its real economic cost. Furthermore, the parties directly involved are better equipped to define the over-all needs for financing and to undertake an efficient allocation of resources to training.

Some people suggest the use of the fiscal system to expand training and distribute its benefits and costs in a more equitable way. There are already employment tax credit programs, and it is felt that they have had a positive effect on training. Some people have proposed innovations. For example, grants could be given to training in the form of corporate tax credits, or tax breaks could be given to those who must train highly qualified manpower, or the training costs should be made tax deductible. Alternatively, a special tax could be imposed on business enterprises which use journeymen, while allowing these firms to deduct the total training expenses from their taxable income. All these ideas have been presented to the Standing Committee on Employment Opportunities for the '80s.

Then, Mr. Speaker, there is the grant levy system. This has been discussed a great deal by the committee. The reactions vary from very supportive to very unfavourable, with a wide range of opinions between the two. I am sure my colleague from the NDP will be touching on this a little later on. The main thrust of the argument of those who support this type of financing is that it distributes training expenses for a sector equitably among the firms, thereby eliminating piracy from one business to another. It would guarantee firms that their training costs will be reimbursed and penalize those which do not train people. It is therefore seen as a way of eliminating the free-riders and increasing the efficiency and volume of training. For those who express opposition, there are different reasons behind the positions they take. The system is inefficient, it would only lead to compounding of the existing problems, or it is inequitable as it does not treat all sectors equally and penalize the goods-producing sector while imposing no additional costs on the service sector.

Positions between the two extremes provide a more qualified argumentation. Witnesses in this group recognize as a whole that at least part of the training costs must be transferred to industry and that industry must make a concerted effort to increase training. Three aspects of the grant-levy system caused some reticence. The need to apply such a system to all industrial sectors has not been demonstrated. Some sectors could establish their own self-financing system for training—and it was indicated that this is now the case in some industries—without being forced to do so and without having to create a new bureaucratic structure. If the government were to establish the system, it was felt that it should be on a very limited basis or through pilot projects.

Before formulating recommendations, the central question to be solved is to know whether or not firms need government assistance for training. The following recommendations are presented in three groups: recommendations which support the position, first, of those who believe that government financial assistance must be increased, second, of those who believe that such assistance must be abolished, and third of those who have mixed positions on the matter. Increased government assistance to firms, particularly those of small and medium size which have difficulty in meeting the high cost of training, must be maintained. Training assistance must be increased. Government should consider expanding this assistance into the area of capital grants for the equipment required for training, as well as to the wages and subsidies for employers who are doing the training. Government should proceed to reallocate funds currently earmarked for training so as to link them to initiatives taken at the local level. In other words, the government should target its expenditures more carefully.

Then there are those who would eliminate government assistance to the firms. The government should recognize that training is the responsibility of the firm and withdraw completely from the field. It should redirect funds currently assigned to training programs toward training fields centred on the third sector of the economy. Other positions somewhere in between suggest that the government should use the taxation system to encourage firms to become involved in training. I see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) sitting over there thinking about that one. To this end the government should provide tax credits for training. Perhaps it should even increase them. The government should make all training costs tax deductible, or it should introduce a special tax for enterprises which use trained labour and combine this measure with the tax deductibility of training costs.

Those are some of the problems and some of the solutions which were presented to the Standing Committee on Employment Opportunities for the '80s. We should think about some of these solutions very carefully before forthcoming recommendations are made. This is why we are somewhat concerned that the minister is presenting the bill before the recommendations from the committee are presented to him.

Bill C-67 provides assistance in much needed areas. I am pleased the government will contract with independent groups at private educational facilities which provide excellent service. This will help us train some of the skilled workers we are missing. As I understand it, it affords the right of unions to sign intertraining contracts and to be given allowances. I am pleased with the lifting of the one-year ceiling and the revocation of the requirement that trainees must be out of school at least one year. There are many other factors in the bill with which we are very pleased. However, although we feel it is premature, we will not prevent its passage.

I should like to sum up what we feel must happen in manpower training and planning in the country. We have not seen too much evidence of it, but we assume that in this decade there will be economic policies to create growth based on the perception of long-term economic strengths which can be exploited. There is a critical skill shortage. We will not be able to achieve our growth potential without a significant investment in training. I hope the government is aware of the crisis situation.

There is a great deal of growth potential in many areas of Canada. In the east there are the energy finds with which we are all so pleased. In the west there are the megaprojects of the not too distant future. Of course there are great opportunities in more sparsely populated parts of the north. But the growth will not be achieved unless there is some significant movement in the labour force. A portion of our population will have to move to where the jobs are. Solutions will be arrived at in direct proportion to the degree to which the federal and provincial governments, as well as industry and labour groups, are willing to work together as partners in solving the problems. The solutions will have to encompass a strong sense of the uniqueness of particular communities, industries, cultural groups, regions and required skills.

This bill does not make a dint on the problem. The recommendations are fine but they are piecemeal. It really does not take a fresh, imaginative, gutsy approach to the problem. In typical Grit fashion, throw a little money at it; put a band-aid here and a tourniquet there; patch up the holes and make it look good, as if we were doing something—"Public, here we are; we are great and we are helping you out."

Could it be that this stop-gap measure is put in so that the government can wait for the little munchkin from the office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), The Alberta boy who cannot win a seat in that province for the Liberals and must be parachuted into Spadina? Is the government awaiting him? I notice one of his priorities is manpower planning. Perhaps that is why the government has not brought in a comprehensive bill and is not looking at the problem in total. Perhaps the government is parachuting this Alberta boy into Spadina because it knows he cannot win out west and that he will take the place of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) in planning. I would advise the minister to watch himself.

An hon. Member: He has not even been nominated yet.

Mr. McDermid: Listen to them. I must have struck a nerve over there. The curtain bangers in the back row are rattling their sabres. We of the Progressive Conservative party are dedicated to long-term meaningful employment for all residents of Canada. We will work hard toward that end. In the meantime we must put up with this "stick your finger in the dike" approach to solving what is a crisis problem in Canada. I wish the minister would wait for the report of the Standing Committee on Employment Opportunities for the '80s, the Dodge report and the other reports which are reaching fruition at the present time. He should take time to absorb them and then bring in comprehensive, exciting, imaginative, workable solutions to the manpower crisis in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, for almost a year now a parliamentary committee on employment, representative of the three political parties in Parliament, has been meeting. The committee held hearings from one end of the country to the other. It heard submissions from industry, labour, educators, community groups, outreach organizations, native organizations and handicapped people. All of these groups were extemely critical of government manpower employment training programs until now. They were especially critical of the federal Department of Employment and Immigration. All of them expressed the view that we needed to have a great deal more on the job training than we have had.

• (2110)

When the committee visited a number of countries in Europe, it was able to see how backward Canada was as compared to the western European countries in terms of training people to fill the skilled jobs which every modern industrialized country needs. Virtually all the representations we heard stressed the need to have a great deal more decentralization of the planning and the administration of programs than we have had in the past. All of them believe—and this was particularly true of both employer and employee groups, union groups—that no programs could succeed unless there were the fullest consultation between labour, management, educators and governments at the federal and provincial levels. When it is ready, the committee will be tabling a report which, I suppose, 97 per cent of the members support. I am amazed at how few of the views which the committee heard and the opinions which the committee formed are embodied in the bill before us or in the statement made by the minister tonight, or even on earlier occasions since he became the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy).

Before going into some of the difficulties I see in the bill I would like to spend a few minutes making it clear that as far as our party is concerned we believe it is impossible to plan and implement a really successful job creation and training program which will be of any real benefit, unless we are committed to a program of full employment. If we do not have full employment, all we will accomplish will be a better educated and better trained group of unemployed.

Back in 1945 a Liberal government tabled a white paper on employment and income in which a policy of full employment was laid down on behalf of that government. The white paper expressed the belief of the government that a job should be provided for every Canadian who wished to work and the adoption of policies which would achieve that end.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: Members opposite shout their agreement and I agree with them.

In the first annual review of the Economic Council in 1964, full employment was discussed. The council estimated that full employment in Canada would be reached when we had an unemployment rate of 3 per cent. It is interesting to note that in the periods after these goals were affirmed, they were substantially met. Between 1946 and 1953 the unemployment rate averaged 3 per cent. After the review of the Economic Council in the mid-sixties, to which I have referred, we had three full employment years between 1965 and 1967 when the unemployment rate averaged 3.8 per cent. Since that time, the unemployment rate has moved steadily upward, and by the mid-1970s the average rate had almost doubled. Between 1975 and 1977 it stood at 7.4 per cent. We have now had 60 months—five years—in which the official seasonally adjusted level of unemployment has been in excess of 7 per cent. That is more than twice what the Economic Council projected back in 1963.

I would ask you to keep in mind, Mr. Speaker, that the 7 per cent rate very substantially underestimated the real rate of unemployment, since we have somewhere between 250,000 and 350,000 people who are not calculated into the official rates by Statistics Canada because they are no longer actively looking for jobs. These people live in areas of high unemployment where there is no use looking for a job because there are no jobs. Also accounted for in these figures are native people living on reserves. It is important to note that youth unemployment is almost twice the official rate of over 7 per cent. It is over 12 per cent. Native unemployment on reserves, for at least part of each year, runs at between 60 per cent and 90 per cent. Mr. Speaker, the government has given up the objective of full employment as enunciated—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. member will have noticed that I have been looking at the bill which is now before the House in order to determine whether or not he is addressing himself to it. I understand that a discussion on employment is related to Bill C-67, but I think the hon. member should try to bring his remarks a little closer to the nature of the bill, which is related to adult occupational training. If the hon. member could do that, it would be of some assistance to the Chair.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I have only spoken for a few minutes. I intend to get to the guts of the bill very shortly.

As I said a moment ago, it seems to us quite fruitless to be discussing occupational training unless we really have a full employment policy. Thus, I would like to conclude this part of my speech by pointing out that over the years the government has moved away from a full employment policy, which meant 3 per cent or 4 per cent unemployment some years ago. The government now seems prepared, as does the Governor of the Bank of Canada, to accept an unemployment rate of over 7 per cent as being full employment. Our party does not accept that. We say that if that is the government's view then, in fact, the whole program of training people will be a failure.

I would now like to deal with some of the clauses of the bill which is before us, a few of which we think move in the right direction and one or two of which we think are fundamentally wrong and which will lead to the failure of the whole program as enunciated by the minister.

Clause 1 of the bill amends the existing act to provide for training courses for periods longer than a year. That is to say, training allowances will be paid to people for more than a year who attend courses which have been approved by the department. This is a very late acceptance of a criticism which has been made in this House and outside it almost since the time the bill was first introduced. It was obvious from the beginning that, particularly for highly-skilled occupations, a one-year training course was not sufficient and, therefore, the government should have arranged for people to receive training allowances for more than a year. Hence, we greet this amendment with approval.

However, we note that this change applies only to full-time training, which we think is a mistake. We think the bill should be much more flexible. We believe that the bill should provide that part-time training courses be made available for more than a year if that is deemed to be useful to the community. This bill has an amendment which removes the former regulation that a person would have to be out of school for a year prior to being committed to take a training course and to have training allowances. That is another provision which we have criticized for a number of years; and to the extent that it changes that and gives the government and the individuals some flexibility, we support it.

I want to spend a little time on the section which I think is extremely important and is extremely bad. The minister will not be surprised if I raise this matter because I have raised it on a number of occasions in the last few months. I refer to the section of the bill which says the following:

> The commission may enter into a contract with
> (a) any employer that operates or undertakes to operate an occupational training course . . .
> (b) any employer that arranges or undertakes to arrange for the training of adults employed by the employer . . .
> (c) any group or association of employers referred to in paragraph (a) or (b).

If there is one message which the Committee on Employment for the '80s got from almost everyone who made representations to the task force, it was that training programs would be a failure unless they were worked out in consultation with employers, with employees and with the educational institutions and the federal-provincial governments concerned. Yet here we have in this bill again the insistence of the minister and the department that the agreements worked out by the department need only be worked out with the employer or groups of employee associations.

In the last year, we have had a number of agreements announced by the minister. We had the industrial labour restructuring program, for which $350 million was provided in the budget by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). That program was to be used to help train people in part in areas like Windsor, Sept-Îles, Sydney and several other cities. Then we have had the individual agreements announced almost every week by this minister or other ministers, and I will just name some of the industries they cover: the foundry industry, the aerospace industry, the coal association, the mining association, the shipbuilding industry and the clothing and textile industry.

As I said, if there was one message which was given to the task force, it was that these programs would not succeed unless they were worked out in co-operation with both labour and management.

The committee was not the only group which got that message. I have before me a report by the major projects task force on major capital projects in Canada to the year 1980, a joint industry-labour committee set up through the good offices of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). What does it say about employment and manpower? Let me quote, beginning on page 55 of the report. It reads:

> There should be a shift in emphasis in training programs towards increased on-the-job training.

The minister is moving in that direction, although I think much too slowly, in these agreements, some of which I have listed. Then it goes to say:

> This should involve a reallocation of spending priorities for government training programs such as the Canada Manpower Training Program.
> Action will also be required to ensure the expansion of on-the-job training by industry. It is proposed that a levy-grant system be introduced on an experimental and selective, sectoral basis to impose a payroll training tax levy on employers in those industries where training-related shortages are known to exist.

I do not intend to go into detail about the levy-grant system tonight, but it recommends as follows:

> Academic institutions, industry and organized labour must work together more closely to help ensure the relevancy of academic programs.

There is nothing in this bill, and there was nothing in any of the agreements announced by this minister or the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) in their announcement about the training programs for the textile and clothing industry which would indicate that the government paid any attention to the views of labour at all. I raised this matter on a number of occasions, and each time the minister has brushed off the suggestions which I made. The minister knows that I was not just talking for the sake of talking, because I have here a letter sent to the minister by the national director of the United Steelworkers of America, one of the largest unions in this country. The letter is dated June 1, 1981. He deals very specifically and critically with the minister in respect to the matter which I am raising at the present time. Let me just quote the following sentences from the letter which the national director of the United Steelworkers of America, Gérard Docquier, sent to the minister on June 1, 1981:

> The labour movement has not been consulted in the preparation of these programs.

He is talking about the coal and mining training proposals. Then he goes on to say:

> Only after the fact, that is only after the programs have been announced, has there been any effort by your government to consult with the labour movement.

Then he goes on to say:

> These agreements were signed on April 14 and 15 respectively and we heard about them for the first time when they were publicly announced. We were subsequently notified that officials of your department and of the associations were willing to hold a briefing session with officials of our union. This cannot by any means be described as consultations.

Then he goes on to say, further:

> The union is, for all practical purposes, completely denied any opportunity to contribute to a program that will directly affect its members. In other words, the people who will be touched by the programs have no input into them.

Let me pause for a minute to remind the minister of one of the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) when he pointed out the difficulties which now exist when there is a slowdown in some plant, and following the usual practice, the last people hired are the first people laid off. Therefore, according to the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown, many times apprentices who are being trained for the skilled jobs for which there is such a shortage are laid off. Is it any wonder that unions will insist on that kind of procedure? They want to protect their members. If they are not consulted, as this letter indicates they have not been consulted by the minister in these new agreements, is it any wonder that unions will be less than enthusiastic about co-operating with the government and with employers in the programs to try to meet the skilled shortages which we are beginning to see?

Then Mr. Docquier goes on to write about that industrial labour training program, the $350 million program announced last October, and points out that the CLC wanted to be consulted on that program but it was not. Regarding that program and how it was worked out, he said:

> Officials of the CLC were told of the program late on a Friday and it was made public on the following Monday. They were also told then that labour would be involved in the committees at the level of the designated communities for the implementation of the programs.

Then he goes on to say:

> If labour had been consulted on the training agreements or the industrial adjustment program, it would have meant that labour would have had an opportunity to provide some input into the preparation of the programs. This has obviously not taken place and we regret it because better programs might have resulted from consultation with the people affected.

What we have now is a criticism of the programs which the minister has been announcing, as I say, almost every week. This bill enshrines in legislation the same kind of policy that is so harshly criticized by unions and is ignored by the government.

● (2130)

A similar letter went to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in connection with their announcement about the training program for the textile and clothing industry, from the vice-president of the Canadian Textile Workers Union, Mr. Sam Fox. I do not have time to put that letter on the record but I think it is pretty clear that, to say the least, labour is very dissatisfied with the policy the government is following as it is spelled out in detail in this bill.

Let me go to another part of the same clause in the bill. Clause 5 reads in part as follows:

> Where an employer or a group or association of employers is not able to operate an adult occupational course or to arrange for training in an adult occupational course as described in subsection (1), the Commission may enter into contract with any other person who, or any other group—

Why does the department lock itself into that kind of restrictive policy? Why should the department not be able to make an agreement with any group which can train people to fill the skilled positions we need?

The minister mentioned the success of a couple of native groups which are involved in training and we know the committee on employment learned a few things in its two short visits to the United States. In Washington and New York we saw decentralized programs of training. Instead of all the decisions being made in Washington by a department of government, to a very large extent these programs have been decentralized. The department that—

Mr. Axworthy: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I want to point out to him that what he is saying does not correspond with the act. Under Section 6(2) of the act we can sign an agreement with any group or association which wishes to provide training. I recommend that the hon. member read the act that we are dealing with rather than whatever act he is quoting from.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I will read the section again. It reads as follows:

> Where an employer or a group or association of employers is not able to operate an adult occupational course or to arrange for training in an adult occupational course as described . . .

That indicates to me that the initial action has to be taken by a group of employers. Then, and only then, can other groups come in. Up to now the government has been very slow to do the kind of things that have been done in the United States.

I know the minister will not agree, but he certainly has not convinced any of the Outreach groups about this. He is in the process of bringing to an end virtually all the Outreach programs which have been so successful up until now.

Mr. Axworthy: A point or order, Mr. Speaker. Again I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but again he is stating something which is not a fact. He neglected to read the full Section 6(2). We have not ended any Outreach program; in fact, we have expanded them. I think it would be useful if the hon. member stuck to facts rather than whatever he has conjured up in his imagination.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened to what the hon. gentleman said. The hon. minister's comment is not a point of order, and the minister is in danger of prolonging the debate. Might he not just let the debate roll?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind the interjections of the minister. The facts are there; the record is there; the Outreach groups have been very vocal in saying that they are being phased out. They are certainly operating on a month-to-month basis. They certainly do not know how long their projects will continue. The minister has made an announcement that his department is going to expand its special services. It sounds to some members on this side and to Outreach groups that what the minister is proposing is that the department will do the work which the Outreach groups have been doing until now.

In the United States we saw non-governmental, non-profit groups which were doing the things that the Outreach groups are trying to do in this country. They were doing these things much more successfully than the Outreach groups because they were not working on a one month, six months or one year contract. They had reason to believe that they could continue indefinitely. They were finding jobs and training people in areas of the community where there is very high unemployment. They had the finances and manpower to go out, as our Outreach groups do not have, to meet prospective employers and to talk to them about their needs within the next year and to train people for those jobs.

We saw two projects in the black ghettos of New York where there is very high racial unemployment. They had information from 65 banks about the number of tellers needed in the coming year and, they were training people from high unemployment areas to be bank tellers. These people had the assurance that if they succeeded and finished the course, there would be jobs for them. We were told that 75 per cent of those who graduated found jobs, and a year later 50 per cent of them were still working. We saw similar projects where people were being trained to feed information into computers.

We have nothing like that, Mr. Speaker. We have very few projects which train native people. In Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary or Vancouver there are large numbers of unemployed native people. The minister has talked a great deal about helping them find jobs in the private sector, but we have not seen much evidence of success. There has been virtually no success in finding jobs in the public service for the native people who are moving into our cities in increasing numbers. They are not in the police department or the fire department in Winnipeg or in the parks department. They are not in the federal government. There are no native letter carriers or mail sorters in the Post Office. I could list 25 or 30 occupations in Winnipeg in which native people could find employment if they had the training, which they do not have, or if they had the work experience, which they do not have.

We would like to see the kind of programs begun in the United States and which have been so successful there. Non-governmental, non-profit or even private enterprise projects train people who have not been able to find jobs, particularly the women, the handicapped, the native people, to mention just three groups. They are helped to get the training and move into jobs where they are needed. Yet we see very little of that in this bill. While there are some facets of this bill with which we can agree and make improvements over what we have had until now, we see very little if any reason to believe that the government believes enough in full employment to devise policies which will move us toward full employment. Indeed, most of the emphasis which we have seen on the part of the government, as expressed by the Minister of Finance, talked about the need to control inflation as being much more important than the need to cut down on the number of employees. The government talks about the need for restraint rather than the necessity of job creation.

Even without regard for what we believe to be a fundamental flaw in the government's philosophy and policy, we still believe that this bill merely puts another patch on a tattered policy which the government has had for many years now in terms of manpower training.

As I said at the beginning, I wish the minister had waited for this bill until the task force on employment, on which there are a majority of Liberal members, had reported. When that report comes out, the minister will see the unanimous view of the committee that what is needed is a much more flexible program, a much more decentralized program and a much more open program, one which is worked on not from the top down, as our training and employment programs have been for many years under Liberal governments, but a program that is worked out in consultation with community groups, native groups, labour and management, all designed to meet the needs of the communities in slow growth areas and in areas of this country in which there will be a tremendous increase in the number of skilled workers, who will be needed to fill the jobs opened up as a result of the tremendous expansion we are likely to see in megaprojects over the next ten to 20 years.

While we approve of some of the clauses in this bill, I say to the minister that it is far short of what is needed.

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to add my comments on Bill C-67, representing as I do a riding that is industrial and highly urban. It is a riding with a large number of people making demands for adult and apprenticeship training programs.

St. Catharines has for some time experienced high unemployment, while local industries, the automotive and the shipbuilding industries, go begging for skilled labour. The solution to date has been one of seeking offshore employment, bypassing the great numbers of people who feel they are qualified and able to fit into those jobs. As we know from the press, from the Special Committee on Employment Opportunities for the '80s and from the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) himself, Canada will not be able to hire enough skilled labour overseas to cope with our present labour demands.

Why should we be surprised at this? How could we truly have expected other nations to go on training people only to have them emigrate to Canada on completion of that training? To stop this drain, foreign industries have improved wages, working conditions and fringe benefits. In the meantime, Canada is not the attractive place that it once used to be.

Figures themselves bear this out. In 1975, over 75,000 immigrants came to Canada with skills appropriate to our needs—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I must apologize to hon. members. I do not know whether it is the Chair who is at fault or whether there is a tendency to drift on to other subjects, but I am looking at a bill which has to do with adult occupational training. I have to ask the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid) to deal with that bill. It is not an opportunity to go into an entire concept of employment or unemployment practices in Canada. The bill has to do with adult occupational training.

Mr. Knowles: For employment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): With respect to the hon. member, I would ask that he please direct his remarks to that bill.

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): With respect, Mr. Speaker, I am not challenging the Chair but I was attempting to emphasize that the concern in the community from which I come is for adult training programs and increased apprenticeship training programs. I thought that was the very nature of the bill before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): I want to emphasize that in Ontario, a province which provides half the nation's output in goods, it is expected that in four years there will be a shortage of some 35,000 skilled workers. Ratio figures do, of course, vary but as a minimum this shortage will create other unskilled job losses of 175,000 positions.

In Alberta, the Alberta Oil Sands Technology and Research Authority is predicting severe shortages in a wide range of highly skilled jobs, including a shortfall of some 1,000 scientists a year.

Finally, the Minister of Employment and Immigration said in Halifax on May 27 last that Canadians might have two to three years' grace before the bubble of imbalances in the labour market bursts, causing severe shortages of skilled labour.

The burning question is how did this problem develop. Unfortunately, like most disgraceful and blameworthy situations, the culprits have no end of excuses. Government, industry, unions, secondary and post-secondary institutions, even society in general, can all be said to share the responsibility for the labour shortage problems of today. Our responsibility here is to examine the federal role, of which Bill C-67 is one response and only one, to the impending crisis.

Recently, a publication called Odyssey carried a three-part special report on the skilled labour shortage here in Canada. One comment in the third part of that report read:

> Ottawa's approach to training is something of a dog's breakfast.

I considered referring to that article this evening but I ultimately decided not to do so because I find the situation reprehensible. In fact, I despair at the inability of this government and the minister to address this problem seriously.

Over and over again, Canadians and the Progressive Conservative party pounded away at this government on the issue of the Constitution, making the essential criticism that the entire process was arbitrary and authoritarian. Just as the provinces were ignored and snubbed by the government over the Constitution, so now this minister is barging ahead with his bill without a full discussion with provincial authorities or even the labour movement. To add further insult to this, the minister will not shy away from impressing upon everyone else the need for consultation and co-operation with the provinces.

Only a week ago, the minister said in Toronto that what was needed was intelligence work, a co-operative effort and a wide-ranging debate on the issues. Presumably this will take place after the passage of Bill C-67.

Once again, it falls to the Progressive Conservative party to speak out for the provinces. And who should know better than the provinces what the industries of those provinces want and need. Why would the federal government bother with committees on manpower needs if it is going to ignore the provinces on amendments to the Adult Occupational Training Act?

● (2150)

If we are to make any headway on the skilled labour front, and I have to join in the criticism levelled against the federal government, the federal government will have to get off its high horse and work in concert with the provinces. However, I doubt that the provinces could really object to any of the amendments proposed in Bill C-67. The simple fact is that, given the magnitude of the problem, these amendments are woefully inadequate. No one can snub a little help, but you sure can scream for more.

For example, an extra $25 a week over and above regular UIC payments is to be given to laid off workers who enter an apprenticeship training program. What, may I ask, is so magical about $25? How or why was this figure arrived at? On an individual basis, the amount is neither here nor there, yet for the government it represents a significant expenditure. As such, I must conclude that this is neither an incentive nor a necessary expense, and is therefore simply in keeping with the government's long-term policy of simply throwing money at a problem.

Various other amendments denote housekeeping efforts as opposed to improvements as such. The one-year ceiling on government assistance to trainees has been lifted; assistance for short-term training outside Canada is provided for, and various areas and industries are to receive increased assistance for apprenticeships. These measures are of some help but they pale by comparison with the magnitude of the problem.

In that regard, allow me to give the House an example. The General Motors plant in Windsor, Ontario will have 50 apprentice positions opening up this year. GM officials expect some 2,000 applicants. How, I hate to ask again, is Bill C-67 going to be of any help in a mess like that, where there is such a demand?

In a country like Canada which can boast of a highly educated population and a relatively high standard of living, surely we can do better than Bill C-67. We know what the problem is and we know that increased apprenticeship programs are a good part of the solution. Prior to this mail strike, I had been receiving correspondence from constituents who were truly caught in a bind, seeking an apprenticeship training program.

For these people academic upgrading is the solution as it supplies an income coupled with a comfortable atmosphere. Once their academic upgrading has been completed, they are then able to undertake training at community or technical colleges. For reasons not yet clear, Niagara College is cutting back on its very necessary adult training program.

The other avenue is apprenticeship programs, and that is where the respective governments are going to have to work in concert. For its part, the federal government should be doing everything it possibly can to assist and encourage people to enrol in apprenticeship programs. Bill C-67 is not going to do this. As I stated earlier, this minister and this government will have to act quickly on the skilled labour shortage problem or Canadians will be in serious trouble.

I began by saying that my riding of St. Catharines has been experiencing high unemployment for some time and that local industries were going begging for skilled labour. The amendments proposed in Bill C-67 to the Adult Occupational Training Act are not sufficiently meaningful to change that situation, nor do the amendments represent any meaningful consultation with the provincial authorities. It is therefore with regret that I cannot support this bill. It is simply too little, too late.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C-67 to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act. I compliment the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) on bringing forward this amendment. It is long overdue. This bill should have been brought in at least two years ago, because under current legislation there is little incentive to have an apprenticeship or training program.

Unemployment insurance payments have risen to such an extent that there is absolutely no incentive. A man or woman is much better off receiving unemployment insurance benefits than undergoing retraining. There should be some incentive.

I question whether the extra $25 a week proposed in the bill is enough. Again there is a ceiling. Next year at this time we may have to deal with another bill because if inflation continues, unemployment insurance benefits will also rise. This is something I caution the minister about and suggest he seriously consider.

I understand the minister would like third reading of this bill before the summer recess. Hopefully this can be accomplished because the bill is long overdue. Those receiving extra benefits will be in the skilled trades—this currently include tool and die makers, welders, boilermakers—as well as in some of the other extensive areas of training.

I have some difficulty with this bill. Applications are made by employers for immigrants in a certain category. This applies to special skilled trades. Consideration should also be given to certain secondary trades. Certain skills in some areas are not addressed in this way. Certain skilled areas may not appear highly sensitive to the economy. I refer to the hotel service industry and the food industry. Skilled labour is required in that industry. It is very difficult to fill these jobs. Canadians do not want them. In addition, it is difficult to hire people from other countries to come here and fill those jobs.

Other areas of industry have been designated by governor in council for increased assistance for individuals entering training. They will be paid up to 70 per cent of their income up to a maximum of $225 a week. I know it is costly, but I believe placing a maximum of $225 a week is a mistake. I seriously suggest that this be left open. A system should be set up in consultation with the provinces so that there are certain high growth areas. Workers will be attracted to areas paying higher salaries. However, the cost of living in those areas will be higher and therefore this $225 maximum may not meet the requirements. I would like to see it open-ended with either a higher range or no maximum at all. If the requirement is critical in some areas of training, this may need to be increased by 25 per cent or 30 per cent. Right now I understand this $225 a week applies mainly to the auto assembly industry in Windsor, Ontario, primary metal industry in Sudbury and shipbuilding in Sorel and Tracy, Quebec, but I suggest there are other areas, particularly fast-growth areas, where this is happening.

● (2200)

I have only a few more remarks to make, and I would like to continue them when the debate resumes, but at this point may I call it ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The parliamentary secretary to the government House leader is in his place. Could he confirm that we will be dealing with this bill tomorrow?

[Translation]

Mr. Collenette: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we shall consider the same bill tomorrow, namely Bill C-67.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: And if we conclude that will we move to Bill C-53?

[Translation]

Mr. Collenette: Yes, Mr. Speaker, several bills still to be considered before the adjournment of the House, perhaps next Friday, perhaps next week.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AVIATION INDUSTRY—MANPOWER TRAINING—NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN GOVERNMENTS AND INDUSTRY

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take the floor this evening concerning an industry which has created thousands of jobs, and in the light of what I hear about the performance of the Progressive Conservatives, job creation in the aviation industry has been a real disaster if we consider the approach of the Diefenbaker government which cancelled outright the Canada aircraft Arrow and the sale of that aircraft because of the price of the metal.

The approach of the Liberal government has indeed been to promote the aviation industry in 1975 through the purchase of Canadair and de Havilland in Toronto. Those two companies today employ over 7,000 workers.

I think that the Liberal government must now take the initiative and create jobs for Canadians in a sector of advanced technology.

On June 15 last, Mr. Speaker, still in connection with job creation in aeronautics, I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) if in that field there was an anticipated labour shortage of more than 13,000 skilled workers for the year 1983. I was trying to make the minister aware of the fact that the province of Quebec accounts for more that 50 per cent of that economic sector, both in terms of the sales which is close to $1 billion and the number of jobs offered by the aviation industry.

I asked the minister whether he had given consideration to the establishment of a manpower training and planning program jointly with that industrial sector and the government of Quebec. I asked that question as a follow up on a press release issued by his department last May 13 where it was stated that, after an agreement with regard to planning in that industry, the chairman of the board of the Canadian aerospace industries and the president of the association, Mr. Desroches, had signed an agreement, a planning program providing manpower training and a large scale expansion of businesses. Thus one of the first results of that agreement was the creation of a training program related to engines in Ontario. I fully agree that we have to start somewhere.

I do not object to the program starting in Ontario but I would have liked it to have some advantages for Quebec. Therefore, I wonder if the minister or his parliamentary secretary could tell us tonight whether the minister intends to sign or has already signed an agreement with the province of Quebec, because both the federal government and Pratt & Whitney are aware of the importance of manpower training. I certainly support the second reading of Bill C-67 to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act in order to promote job creation in areas where there is a demand and a market for it. Could the parliamentary secretary tell us whether an agreement has been signed in the province of Quebec in co-operation with the private sector and the federal department of Employment and Immigration, to help Quebec residents who want to go into the aviation business in order to be in a position to compete for the 13,000 jobs that would be available in 1983?

• (2205)

[English]

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member that the minister has been aware for some time of the importance of directly linking manpower requirements of the aerospace industry with retraining facilities. In recognizing that manpower need, the minister, along with the commission, has been working with the industry to identify precisely the future manpower required by occupation and time-frame.

With respect to Quebec, in 1978, the province of Quebec, the commission and nine Quebec members of the Air Industry Association of Canada jointly with their unions signed a manpower consultative agreement funded 25 per cent by the industry and 37.5 per cent by the federal and provincial governments respectively. This agreement has been renewed for the 1981-82 year. A survey and forecast of 50 occupations covering the period August, 1978, to December, 1982, was completed and published in November, 1978. The Quebec deputy minister of education has indicated to the Quebec aerospace companies that the survey results, which are updated each year, will be taken into consideration in the planning of technical courses at certain universities and community colleges.

It was as a result of the survey in Quebec and the other provinces that a manpower agreement was finally negotiated with the National Air Industries Association of Canada. While the commission's officers in the Quebec region will work closely with the province of Quebec in the implementation of the manpower agreement—and they have been doing this, Mr. Speaker—it is not yet known whether a formal agreement will be signed with the province of Quebec since the executive director of the commission's Quebec region, having just recently received the national agreement, has not yet had the opportunity to complete his plans for its implementation.

ENERGY—NEGOTIATIONS TO CONCLUDE ENERGY AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise to put forward some views I have on a question I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) on June 12, 1980. I took exception at that point to the reply I was given. I do not think it was adequate and at this time I would just like to read the reply the minister gave to a question I asked in which I pointed out that Alsands at Fort McMurray and the Imperial Oil Cold Lake project were in danger of being shelved and stopped. That was on June 12, 1980, over a year ago. I pointed out there would be a delay, and I pointed out the real cost not only to the Canadian economy but also to the small businessman in the communities of Fort McMurray, Cold Lake, Grand Centre, Bonnyville, and the surrounding areas as well as to people in Alberta generally but, more particularly, to the industrial areas of Ontario and Quebec. The minister said:

> Madam Speaker, I would only answer the hon. member by indicating that the federal government is ready to and has approved proceeding with those two plants. As a matter of fact, Petro-Canada, with Alberta Gas Trunk Line, has already come out with a proposal for another plant, a third plant. So the federal government is very supportive of the construction of more tar sand plants. The companies are ready to go ahead with those plants.

I am sure the minister did not mean to mislead the House, but that is what he most certainly did because the companies are not ready to proceed with those plants. Spokesmen for Alsands and Imperial Oil have stated emphatically, over and over again during the past year, that they will not proceed with the plants even if they have the approval of the Alberta government because a pricing regime has not been established for the production from the two megaprojects in northeastern Alberta.

I am alarmed that no one has taken these statements of the spokesmen of these companies seriously enough to approach this very critical problem. The government has established and said that it would offer to the oil sands plants, the megaprojects, a floor price of $38 per barrel and tie any further price increases to the consumer price index. The companies have stated emphatically—and I must agree with them on this point because I live in Fort McMurray and I understand what they are talking about—that the consumer price index, as it is measured across Canada, does not relate to the costs experienced in northeastern Alberta in communities such as Fort McMurray, Cold Lake, Grand Centre and Bonnyville. It does not reflect the production costs and the construction costs because of the high cost of living and the high cost of contruction experienced in those areas. All these factors add to the cost of producing the oil. It is much higher and continues to escalate much more rapidly than the consumer price index. It is based upon what could be called a construction price index or whatever, but it is there.

I feel the minister, perhaps inadvertently, misled the House when he said that Alberta Gas Trunk and Petro-Canada were ready to proceed with another plant. Certainly in committee I asked officials of Petro-Canada if they were going to proceed with the development of a tar sands plant in northeastern Alberta in the heavy oil and tar sands area. They answered emphatically that they were. I asked them when they would have the plant on construction and producing. The minimum time required was at least ten years. They said that they were ready to proceed immediately, but in fact they are not ready because it takes five years of intensive work on the site to test the site area, to test the way the bitumen lies in the sand and to test how they will mine it. It takes at least five years to do the necessary preparatory work before they can get on with the construction of the plant. So I take exception to those answers.

In the one minute remaining I should like to point out that the government is still dragging its feet on a very fundamental issue. It is obvious the government has taken the position that it will take control and be damned about a secure supply of energy. The tar sands are the one thing we have in Canada which will adequately secure the supply of oil to the rest of Canada. The government has taken the position that it will hold them back as long as it has to, that it is control it wants, and security of supply be damned. This is a miscarriage of justice for every man, woman and child in Canada.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out two things to the hon. member opposite. First, I do not think the minister misled the hon. member in his reply on July 2. Second, I think to some extent the member himself is misleading the House when he states that the federal government at the present time has no consideration for tar sands development in western Canada.

It has always been a principle behind the National Energy Program to place heavy emphasis upon the development of the tar sands projects in western Canada. The hon. member pointed out rightly that in October, 1980, the minister was prepared to offer the sponsors of those projects $38 per barrel for their oil and in addition a cost of living indexation so that it would be that much more profitable for these companies to develop the tar sands projects.

On July 2 the minister mentioned in the House that in the last several months some statements were made by the people involved in resource development indicating that they were not willing to go ahead with that kind of a joint venture. The minister pointed out that after his meeting with the minister of energy for Alberta on June 29, the project sponsor confirmed that it had dropped all such threats and was encouraged by the significant progress being made in the present negotiations between Ottawa and Alberta. At that time the minister went on to explain to the hon. member opposite that they have had several meetings in the last five to six weeks concerning the energy pricing agreement. Both the federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), and his provincial counterpart in Alberta felt that significant progress was being made in reaching an oil pricing agreement.

● (2215)

I want to point out to the hon. member, with respect to the development of the tar sands projects in October, 1980, when the minister offered $38 a barrel with this indexation clause, that it was the Province of Alberta, which under its jurisdiction has the right to grant the licence for the development of the tar sands project, that it was the Province of Alberta which halted it and said that it would have to be part of the whole package in terms of the oil pricing agreement. Thus, the federal government's position has always been clear. We place great emphasis on the need to develop the tar sands projects in western Canada. We feel very strongly that, given the size of those resources, they, in fact, will be very decisive in terms of the ability of Canada to become oil self-sufficient during this decade.

As the minister has pointed out, the tempo of negotiations has been stepped up, with the fourth meeting since May being scheduled within the next few weeks. The minister also wanted to make it known that he feels these are very productive meetings. There is an increasing optimism of a good resolution of these difficult and complex issues.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES—DANGERS OF USE OF MARIJUANA

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question on June 12, 1981 was directed to the Minister of National Research and Welfare (Miss Bégin). It reads in part:

> In light of the growing advocacy by some members of this House and the press for changes in laws pertaining to possession of marijuana which appear to lessen their severity, will the minister take equally aggressive action to warn and educate the people of this country by every means at her disposal of the long and short term medical dangers and hazardous effects of this drug, and introduce important medical considerations into the implementation of any proposed change?

In the answer given, the minister did not appear to put emphasis on the seriousness of the health dangers and hazardous effects involved with this drug and seemed to give priority to the legal injustices over the medical implications.

Marijuana is a very powerful agent which affects the body in many ways. A copious amount of scientific data has been accumulated in the period from 1975 to 1979. This data has been published in over 2500 scientific papers. Marijuana is unique in that it contains 60 chemicals called cannabinoids, which are not found anywhere else in nature. Of these 60, only five have been studied to any degree of completeness scientifically. The greatest and most intense work has been done on only one of these chemicals, namely, tetrahydro cannabinol, the most mind-altering chemical in marijuana. This drug has a tendency to seep into the fatty tissues of the body, including the brain. It is removed from the body slowly, requiring over 30 days to be completely excreted. Hence, many months are required before the body has totally recovered from the effects of this drug. Moreover, at the time of the LeDain report in the early 1970s, marijuana cigarettes had a THC potency of .5 per cent to 1 per cent. Today marijuana cigarettes contain a 3 per cent to 5 per cent concentration of this drug.

Recent research has shown that five marijuana cigarettes do as much damage as 112 ordinary tobacco cigarettes. Cigarettes containing marijuana have 50 per cent to 100 per cent more cancer producing drugs or chemicals than those of ordinary tobacco cigarettes. One third of the people smoking ordinary tobacco show an incidence of chronic cough and a predisposition to cancer as manifested by atypical cells in their sputum. However, with people smoking marijuana cigarettes, over 61 per cent show an incidence of a chronic cough and 100 per cent show atypical cells in their sputum, which is a step before a pre-cancerous change takes place in the lining of the airways.

● (2220)

Hard evidence is surfacing indicating that marijuana is far more dangerous to the health than suspected. At present, the scientific community is only in the preliminary stages of investigation. Not only does marijuana affect functioning of the body organs and systems but it also affects one's behaviour and performance.

In the field of driving skills, a 1974 British Columbia study has shown convincingly that subjects under the influence of cannabis showed impaired judgment in assessing traffic signals, and their response to rapidly changing environmental situations and their ability to concentrate on driving was impaired.

In the United States post-mortem studies were carried out on drivers involved in traffic fatalities. It was found that 16 per cent of the drivers had used marijuana. This drug was second only to the use of alcohol as a factor in traffic fatalities. Current studies do not give a clear picture of the role played by marijuana in traffic accidents. In the hospitals of this country, it is impossible to assess the concentration of THC in blood by a rapid clinical test. Such a test has not yet been devised and is not available for clinical purposes. The assessment of the concentration of this drug in the blood necessitates a laborious clinical exercise carried out in a forensic laboratory. There is, therefore, a double standard in assessing impaired drivers. For those drivers suspected of being impaired by alcohol, there exists a test which gives a rapid, accurate and a precise indication of the concentration. However, there are no tests for those impaired by cannabis. The use of this drug can be discovered only by its odour, by previous contact with it, by training or by speculated guessing.

There is also considerable evidence suggesting the enhancing effect of cannabis on alcohol. The use of cannabis in combination with alcohol therefore presents another serious hazard in traffic safety. Alcohol is by far the most dangerous, best studied, most understood and publicly accepted intoxicant contributing to traffic accidents. Our knowledge of marijuana and its effects on car accidents is approximately 50 years behind that of alcohol and tobacco. But must we use the trial and error technique to establish its frightful role in traffic accidents and fatalities by allowing its more widespread use, by recommending what appear to be more relaxed marijuana laws, or should we be more cautious in changing any legislation until we really understand the part played by marijuana usage in the mounting traffic tolls?

Epidemiological studies on large segments of the population of users, such as have already been done in relation to alcohol and tobacco, are needed to fill in the gaps in our knowledge. It will take a generation or more of wide-ranging public health observations to provide a clear picture, especially among adolescents who are more susceptible to physical and mental changes due to rapid physiological and psychological development of their bodies.

In an atempt to correct legal injustice, let us not pave the road to greater assault on the body and mind of Canadians by facilitating the use of a powerful intoxicant such as marijuana which is not yet completely understood as far as its medical implications are concerned.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, perhaps before getting into the technical response to the question asked by the hon. member, I want to point out that I think there is some confusion which is being created here by the government's intention to lessen the penalties for possession of small amounts of marijuana. In fact, the rest of my response is predicated on the premise that if and when the government introduces the legislation, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) is prepared to undertake a rather extensive training and educational program for the Canadian public, because I think that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is very much aware of some of the serious side effects that marijuana can, in fact, produce.

This is not to say that when the government introduces this type of legislation we as a government are condoning the use of marijuana; we are simply becoming cognizant of the fact that there are significant numbers of young people in this country who have permanent criminal records because of very small quantities of marijuana being found in their possession. The government intends to continue going after the importers and traffickers of large amounts of marijuana as rigorously as it does under the present legislation.

I want to point out to the hon. member that the minister is aware of studies that have taken place all over the world regarding the side effects of marijuana. As a medical practitioner, I am sure he is aware that the Minister of National Health and Welfare recognizes that the regular use of marijuana, for example, can be as carcinogenic as any other kind of tobacco use; that we are aware that the use of marijuana, for example, can rapidly increase the heart rate of cardiovascular patients; that we are aware that marijuana used by very young people can change the hormonal balance; that there is growing evidence that it has some teratogenic side effects; that its use is not condoned by the government for young people or pregnant women.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has a responsibility to teach the Canadian public about the health hazards of marijuana. If and when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) introduces the legislation, the Minister of National Health and Welfare will undertake a program of education in collaboration with a number of the provinces and territories which are very anxious to jointly sponsor projects with the federal government. These would explain to the Canadian public the health hazards associated with marijuana.

I want to conclude by saying that it is very important that the public know the federal government does not condone the use of marijuana but realizes that it is a fact of life in the country. If people are going to use marijuana, then I think an educational program should be undertaken by the federal and provincial governments that would adequately explain the health hazards associated with its use.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

At 10.27 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION OF REFUGEES FROM EASTERN EUROPE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, in view of increasing concerns and fear in Poland about the possibility of Soviet invasion, concerns and fears which are causing thousands of Polish people to flee to Austria where they can seek refuge in the west, and given that the Canadian quota of refugees from eastern European countries for the current year has almost been exhausted and that the next few weeks will certainly see an even greater number of Poles fleeing their homeland, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the government announce immediately that it will raise its quota of refugees from eastern European countries to take into consideration the worsening situation in Poland, and that it not leave such a critical decision in the category of merely looking at the possibility as the Minister of Employment and Immigration indicated in the House last week.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL STRIKE—CALL FOR SERVICES OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), by statements in the House yesterday, appears to condone the lawlessness and irresponsibility of the CUPW leadership with Parrot promising defiance of any back to work directive from the House; whereas the current disruption of postal service in Canada only adds to the already heavy economic burden the government has heaped on all Canadians; and whereas it is time the federal government finally took a firm stand with the militant union CUPW, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That this House direct the President of the Treasury Board to seek assistance immediately from the Armed Forces to open and run the Post Office to move the mail and to defy the leadership of CUPW.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas a minister of the Crown has recently indicated that by the year 1985 it will be necessary to ration railway cars in western Canada and the government has offered no solution to the problem; and recognizing the fact that the handling by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) of the Dubin inquiry into air safety and the Grange inquiry into the transportation of dangerous goods has lost him the confidence of the industry; and since it has been reported that to fly a scheduled airline in Canada is twice as dangerous as to fly in the United States, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That this House calls on the Prime Minister, for the safety and welfare of the Canadian public, to request immediately the resignation of the Minister of Transport and to appoint someone who comprehends the importance of transportation to the economy of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

FUNDING FOR SOLAR RESEARCH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Despite the fact that the energy crisis first appeared some eight years ago, the National Research Council of Canada continues to devote roughly 11 per cent of its budget to energy research and development. In spite of a recent all-party House of Commons report recommending increased R & D funding for alternative energy projects, some $750,000 originally earmarked for solar research has been "immobilized" and transferred to space research. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That the minister responsible for NRC instruct the manager to return or replace the funds immediately to solar research.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY CONVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the recommittal of the New Democratic Party to the policy of withdrawal from NATO and NORAD which, if implemented, would leave Canada susceptible to expansionist pressures from unfriendly nations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for London-Middlesex (Mr. Bloomfield):

That this House condemns the New Democratic Party for continuing to accept a policy which could destroy the national integrity of Canada and severely weaken the western alliance.

CALL FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION ON HIGH INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House condemn the government for not making a positive move on high interest rates which are bankrupting home owners, farmers and small businessmen and having a serious economic effect on the entire country, and call on the government to take some positive direction on high interest rates before the House recesses for the summer.

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF TASK FORCE TO INQUIRE INTO URBAN LAND HOLDINGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas railway lines interlace urban areas throughout Canada, often occupying extensive land surface areas in the downtown or core areas of cities; whereas the air rights and the subsurface rights above and below railway rights-of-way in urban areas have become extremely valuable and useful for high rise structures as well as for underground or subterranean structures; whereas much of the surface land for railway rights-of-way was deeded to Canadian Pacific and Canadian National Railways through federal government action, and ambiguity exists as to the ancillary rights of such deeds, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

• (1410)

That the government move to establish a joint federal-provincial-municipal task force to inquire into the matter of air rights and subterranean rights associated with railway rights-of-way in urban areas and subsequently make appropriate recommendations for government action.

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport to commence action immediately—even short-term action if long-term action is repugnant to the government—to eliminate the Welland Canal bottleneck so that it can cope with present and future increased shipping demands.

In view of the fact that the CBC has been on strike for over two months and that the people of Canada have been denied Canadian content in the field of broadcasting, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

SUGGESTED INTRODUCTION OF BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Yesterday, when urged to introduce back-to-work legislation which would end the damaging postal strike now in its second week, the Prime Minister replied that Mr. Parrot, head of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, "made it clear that, if legislated back to work, he would disobey the order." Therefore the Prime Minister said he was "at a loss to know what would advance negotiations for a settlement in this area." In view of the fact that in making this incredible statement the Prime Minister as much as conceded any sense of legal responsibility to CUPW and has, in fact, sanctioned their veto over parliamentary authority, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That this House condemn the Prime Minister for abdicating his responsibilities in this regard and, further, that it instruct the government to introduce immediately back to work legislation and, further, that this House not adjourn until full postal service is restored in this country.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the burning of coals of high sulphur content aggravates the acid rain problem, and whereas Alberta has vast deposits of coals with a very low sulphur content, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

POSTAL STRIKE—QUERY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister who is aware, I assume, or must be aware of the direct and indirect costs of the postal strike or mail strike. After all, the government was extremely eloquent about these costs in 1978. Reliable estimates to date are that between 1,000 and 1,500 small businesses will go bankrupt each week, that 6,000 to 9,000 jobs will be lost each week, that the direct mail business people will lose some several millions of dollars every day that the strike goes on, not to mention those who are dependent on mailed cheques, and also the costs to government of lost revenues. Can the Prime Minister therefore confirm to this House whether, in fact, the statements of the President of the Treasury Board yesterday, to the effect that the government is prepared to see this strike go on all summer, are government policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member does not ignore that any strike anywhere is bound to hurt someone. A strike against the government is more serious than other strikes. The basic question is: do we recognize the right to strike of public service unions or not? If one recognizes the right to strike, whether it be in the private or public sector, the way the strike operates is by effecting damage on one or other of the parties, and sometimes on third parties. I have not heard the Conservative party come out clearly and suggest that we abolish the right to strike. If they do, that will be more consistent with the position which they have been taking in the past few days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

STEPS TO ARRIVE AT SETTLEMENT

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, the Conservative party has not heard the government indicate that it even cares whether these people go back to work. The government's position, I take it, as again expressed by the Prime Minister, is that the government would prefer a settlement at the bargaining table. That has been his position all along. At the same time the government has clearly indicated that it refuses, in any way, shape or form, to modify its offer. That suggests one interpretation, and one only, that there is only one settlement acceptable to the government, and that is the government's offer itself. Can the Prime Minister, in face of that, therefore indicate to this House and to Canadians how we would expect to get such a settlement without legislation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is quite wrong in the premise of his question. We have not said we would not discuss or we would not modify. We have said that that should be done at the bargaining table. Surely, if it is to be done at all, the other parties should come to the bargaining table and begin bargaining.

Some hon Members: Hear, hear!

TIMING OF PARLIAMENTARY SUMMER RECESS

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, we have this strike because for three days there was hard bargaining at the bargaining table, and the government's negotiators were given a mandate not to move one penny, one inch or one jot on a clause. The only credible way in which one can interpret the Prime Minister's answer to this House is to assume that the Prime Minister and the government in fact, are planning an initiative which they have not yet announced. Therefore my question to the government is this: does the government, in fact, intend to adjourn this House before the strike is settled?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, we do not know when the strike will be settled. We do know that the House leaders are talking about adjournment days. The opposition House leader mentioned possibly next Friday. I believe the House leaders are discussing matters now. Therefore the two events will happen, one before the other, or the other before the one, depending on whether—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: It might happen simultaneously, depending on whether the CUPW union negotiators want to come down and sit at the table.

INTRODUCTION OF BACK-TO-WORK LEGISLATION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I would like to address my supplementary question to the Prime Minister. After the rather gobbledygook answer he gave to the previous question, perhaps he could give some clarification to the rather ridiculous proposition that he put forward yesterday, in terms of the fact that legislation was not contemplated because Mr. Parrot would not obey any law which was brought before Parliament and passed by Parliament. It was not bad enough that the Prime Minister said that, and I thought that maybe it was a joke on his part, but the Liberal headquarters in Toronto are now giving that answer to people who are phoning in to ask why the government is not taking any action. The answer given is that it is because Mr. Parrot will not obey any law which is passed by Parliament. I want to ask the Prime Minister whether it is government policy that it will not bring in any legislation until Mr. Parrot is satisfied with the law which will be passed by Parliament.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member refers to my answer yesterday, he will see that I was pointing out the rather, I believe, unsustainable position of the union leaders. Mr. Parrot, on the one hand, does not want to sit down and negotiate, which, as the hon. member's colleague argues, should lead us to want to legislate; but on the other hand Mr. Parrot says he would not obey the legislation, if I understand him to be reported correctly.

An hon. Member: Throw him in jail.

Mr. Trudeau: Therefore I think that this indicates that the union leadership is somewhat inconsistent with its logic. I wish the hon. member would attack that question rather than the position that I explained in the House yesterday.

• (1420)

REQUEST FOR COMMITMENT TO ACTION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, the position of the Prime Minister is completely irrelevant to the whole issue of whether Parliament should have the right to legislate as it sees fit and as is appropriate under the circumstances. What the Prime Minister has done, in effect, is to give Mr. Parrot a veto over whether Parliament is going to act and to take its responsibility.

Negotiations between CUPW and the government are paralysed. The Prime Minister seems to be paralysed by a fear of Mr. Parrot. I want to ask if he has no compassion for the average citizen of this country who is bearing the brunt of the postal strike, and will, if we listen to the President of the Treasury Board, bear the brunt over the course of the summer until Parliament is reconvened, at least until next fall. Has he no compassion? Will he not give an undertaking that, unless there is some movement forward before Parliament adjourns, he will take legislative action? We on this side are prepared to stand and take our responsibility and to stay here until the matter is resolved.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I wish the hon. member opposite had not referred to the fear of the government of union leaders. If my recollection is exact, it was during the 1980 election that the party opposite, when it formed the government, settled with the LCUC at an unconscionably high rate. It did that because it was afraid either of the union leaders or the electorate.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—CANADIAN GOVERNMENT POSITION ON HOLDING OF ELECTIONS

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it concerns the question in El Salvador which is continuing to do damage to the people there. Recent reports in The Globe and Mail indicate that the people in the elite, who one would think would support the present junta, are saying, and I will read a small paragraph quoting a person interviewed there as follows:

> He regards elections for a constituent assembly, scheduled for next March, as "a gimmick" to cement the Christian Democrats' hold on power. "Nobody else is going to campaign," he says. "They'll be killed the first day."

In light of this situation, I wonder if the minister is now prepared to reconsider his position regarding conditions in El Salvador.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member quotes some people from the press who were interviewed in El Salvador. There are many people interviewed by the press about the situation there. It is not our role to pass judgment on the daily events in that country in that respect. Having profound faith in democracy, we believe the best way to resolve the problem of that country is through free elections.

METHODS TO ENSURE RETURN OF PEACE

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, my second question would be along a similar line. I, too, believe that the question should be solved in a democratic way if that is possible. It would also seem, and again I take my information from journalists going into the country, that now the peasants likewise see no possibility that there can be free elections. I would ask the minister again if he is prepared to look at other ways in which the problem can be faced, so that peace can return to that land.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, our interest is certainly in peace, and in a political settlement. We retain an open mind on the best way in the future to proceed toward that. We have not lost our confidence that the democratic process and the process of free elections can bring about a resolution to the problems in El Salvador.

REQUEST FOR HOLDING OF MINISTERIAL TALKS

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the minister if he would be prepared to go and talk to his counterparts in the different countries neighbouring El Salvador, the ministers of external affairs for Mexico, Venezuela, Cuba and Nicaragua. Canada still has a role to play and has a very good image in that part of the world. Would the minister be ready to make such a move to see if there is a better way to solve this than waiting for elections?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, to the best of my knowledge our policy is the same as that of the other countries the hon. member mentioned. Since I will be meeting the foreign ministers of most of those countries this weekend, I will certainly undertake to discuss that issue with them.

ENERGY

NEGOTIATION OF AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCE OF ALBERTA

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It is very clear that the lack of an agreement with the province of Alberta on energy policy as well as the many other aspects of the Liberal energy program, including the Fina purchase, increased imports, etc., have resulted in a large outflow of capital of approximately $10 billion over a one-year period, with a consequent increase in interest rates of at least 3 per cent to 4 per cent.

Is the government conducting any studies on the cost of this 3 per cent to 4 per cent increase in interest rates to the Canadian economy, whether it is to small businessmen, home owners, large business, governments themselves, all of whom must pay these high rates directly as a result of the Liberal energy program, and are these costs related in any way against any possible benefits that might be gained from these protracted negotiations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's question seems more rhetorical than real. I have no way of challenging these figures which he brings forward. They are of a statistical nature. He asked if studies are being done. I am sure that if the hon. member sends me the basis of his calculations, I could have them verified. But in so far as the issue itself is concerned, the hon. member knows that there have been meetings, even quite recently, between officials and ministers of the government of Alberta and the Government of Canada, and both sides have stated that they very much want to reach a settlement satisfactory to both sides.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER ENTER NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I am very surprised that the government is not conducting any studies on the cost of high interest rates to the Canadian economy—

Mr. Trudeau: I did not say that.

Mr. Wilson: —because it is clear, according to many observers, that these are as a result of the National Energy Program. The three to four percentage point increase in interest rates, the deadlock with the province of Alberta, the high imports of oil, the loss of 40 per cent of Canada's drilling rigs, are all the result of the failure of the minister of energy to reach an agreement with the province of Alberta. The cost to Canadians in the form of these high interest rates, the $6 billion increase in tax that has taken place, plus the lost opportunities, is immense. Will the Prime Minister now accept his responsibility, replace the minister of energy in the negotiations and take part himself directly with the Premier of Alberta, and try to reach some resolution to this stalemate after 16 months of failure?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member could talk about more than 16 months of failure because I think he should add to that the eight months when the government of which he was a member failed to reach an agreement with Alberta.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We got an agreement.

Mr. Trudeau: In view of the fact that the Tory government was brought down without having reached an agreement with Alberta, it seems to me that the Tories should more realistically than others be aware that to reach an agreement you need two parties to agree.

Mr. Wilson: Sixteen months?

Mr. Trudeau: Sixteen months. But the same time span ran against the government of Alberta as against the people of Canada, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Wilson: Sixteen months.

Mr. Trudeau: Sixteen months ran against both parties. I repeat, whether it is six months or 16 months, you need two people to reach an agreement.

Mr. Wilson: Replace him.

Mr. Trudeau: It is beyond me why the hon. member on the one hand complains about inflation and the high cost of living, and on the other hand wants this government to sign an agreement at any price with the government of Alberta. That is not our position.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

REPRESENTATIONS MADE BY UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In recent weeks some U.S. administration officials and a number of congressmen have warned about the possibility of U.S. retaliation against Canada because of various aspects of this country's National Energy Program. What specific official representations have been made to the Canadian government regarding possible retaliation against Canadian interests arising out of Canada's energy policy?

● (1430)

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the United States Congress is a very turbulent place, perhaps even more so than this House. We do not follow a policy of taking every comment made in Congress as an indication of an intention on the part of the U.S. administration. To the best of my knowledge there have been no representations of any kind by the U.S. administration except those that were made some time ago, to which we responded, concerning the National Energy Program.

POSSIBILITY OF RETALIATORY ACTION BY UNITED STATES

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my final supplementary is to the same minister. Surely he will recognize there is more than one way for the United States to skin the Canadian cat. In light of that, does he appreciate that United States reprisals against Canada over energy could be direct in the form of tough action against oil companies, or indirect through a lesser commitment by the U.S. administration to address other bilateral concerns between the two countries, for example, acid rain? In light of what I just said and what he just said, either through specific representations, through public statements or other avenues, has U.S. pressure on Canada been in the form of direct retaliation against our oil industry, or of indirect retaliation like the clear lack of support for such bilateral concerns as acid rain?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, there is no indication of retaliation of any kind on the part of the United States government. Generally speaking, both the U.S. and Canadian governments follow the policy of not linking issues in various fields, in other words not retaliating in one field for what happens in another field. I believe that still to be the policy of the U.S. government as it is of this government. We have no indication of any kind of indirect retaliation of the kind spoken of by the hon. member.

THE CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY WHETHER PRIME MINISTER WILL MEET INDIAN LEADERS

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Considering that the relations between the Indians and the Quebec government have now taken a turn for the worst, that the salmon issue has gone far beyond salmon fishing as such, directly affecting as it does the Indians' way of life, their property rights as well as their habits and customs, would the Prime Minister agree to propose a meeting with the Indian chiefs with a view to taking a closer look at the whole native question in the light of the amendment made to his constitutional proposal?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is right when he states that this problem goes far beyond the sole issue of fishing, about which indeed the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said in the House that it was of great concern to him. But, first and foremost of course, it is also a matter for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I heartily welcome the suggestion of the hon. member that perhaps those two ministers might consult each other to arrange a meeting with the Indian chiefs if they feel that it might promote better understanding. I for one have already indicated to the Indian leaders of Canada, including those of Quebec, that I would be prepared and willing to meet with them this fall to discuss the whole question of native rights. In my opinion, the suggestion of the hon. member is therefore worthy of consideration.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

PLEA FOR PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL MEN AND EQUIPMENT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. It concerns the sinking of the Canadian vessel Arctic Explorer and the tragic loss of 13 lives. The commanding officer of the Canadian Armed Forces rescue co-ordination centre said late last year that he did not have the manpower or the equipment to fulfil his mandate. He went on to recommend:

> We need fixed-wing support out of Gander, Newfoundland. We have requested it but perhaps someone will wait until we have a tragedy and then suggest it.

Why has the minister not responded to this public plea of the commanding officer of the rescue co-ordinating centre for more men and equipment and for the deployment of fixed-wing aircraft in Newfoundland?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I read very carefully the question asked yesterday by the hon. member of my colleague, the Minister of Transport. I believe that the minister gave two answers which were quite adequate in the circumstances. The hon. member should know that, since 1978, we have been implementing improved programs in all areas of search and rescue. We have increased the budget. At the same time, we have developed a satellite program. Moreover, we have established a program to improve the facilities and material available in search and rescue operations.

Like all my colleagues, I am terribly sorry there was loss of life yesterday when the Arctic Explorer sank. According to the preliminary reports I have received, there does not seem to have been any negligence on the part of the officers or of the search and rescue team. On the other hand, as we are always aware that this whole issue must be fully looked into since it is often a question of life or death, we shall request a complete report on this incident in order to determine how we make the system even better.

STATIONING OF FIXED-WING AIRCRAFT IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, the question is a very simple one. The commanding officer said the centre just does not have the type of resources that can respond to a mid-ocean tragedy. They do not have the resources to respond to a tragedy in the northwest Atlantic, on the 6,000 miles of Newfoundland coast and/or the coast of Labrador, because of the time required to get an aircraft from Prince Edward Island or Nova Scotia to the scene. It has to refuel in Gander. That takes anywhere from four to six hours. Would it not help to cut down on the lead time and reduce the incidence of tragedy by having fixed-wing aircraft deployed in Newfoundland? Why does the government not follow this simple yet very important recommendation of the commanding officer of the rescue co-ordination centre?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I find the request of the commanding officer of this station quite normal. He would like to have the facilities and equipment required to respond to every possible accident or incident. However, as the hon. member has just said himself, it is obviously impossible to have the resources and equipment required to guard against all possibilities along 4,000 miles of coastline both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific coasts. We try as much as possible to centralize our equipment and resources in locations where most incidents happen. Everyone knows that we try to station most of our equipment on the west coast for spring fishing and we do the same in north eastern Canada at the time of the seal hunt. However, it would be absolutely impossible—and I believe that the hon. member realizes it—to cover 4,000 miles of coastline with all the equipment and resources required to be able to respond within 10 or 15 minutes. We have all sorts of programs in this regard, and I mentioned earlier our participation in the SARSAT program which is a satellite program that might allow us to respond more quickly. However, with the resources and the equipment now at our disposal, we make every effort to save lives, and I believe that rescue operations were most satisfactory in the case of the Prinsendam, for instance. And even in this most recent instance, I believe that our team showed much leadership and that if lives were saved, it was because our search and rescue operations were very effective.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

FUNDING FOR SOLAR RESEARCH

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. The minister knows full well that very little R & D money in the National Research Council budget goes into energy research, I believe about 11 per cent. The manager of the NRC has admitted that over $1 million of R & D funds has been diverted from solar research to other programs. In the past ministers of the Crown have suggested that alternative energy is a priority among Canada's research and development projects. In view of the fact that this diversion has taken place, will the minister demand that these funds be replaced immediately so that Canada can maintain a lead in solar research and technology?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is correct. Certainly we are extremely interested in alternative energy sources and are conducting considerable research into that area. Perhaps he may not have noted that recently I appointed a task force on alternate energy uses. It will be reporting to me, I hope fairly promptly, with useful suggestions as to how we might remodel our research efforts in this area. There is much that is done outside the National Research Council to which he specifically referred. I will look into the question the hon. member has raised and report back to him.

APPORTIONMENT OF FUNDS

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister would be quick to admit that whatever the task force reports in terms of recommendations, it would be very difficult to accomplish this task if $1 million were missing from the R & D till. Is the minister aware that $750,000 was tranferred from solar to space research? Another $350,000 went into fusion which is still in the energy bag, admittedly a long way down, and there was no consultation at all with EMR, according to the reports I have, at a time when I think it is essential for Canada to develop its technology and strength in those various alternative fields. The ground rules have been broken in terms of transferring energy funds to another fund not directly related to energy, without consultation. Will the minister look into this and develop some ground rules so this kind of transfer, the old shell game, will not be permitted in future?

● (1440)

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the member is incorrect in asserting that somehow basic rules or guidelines have been broken. There is considerable flexibility in the allocation to the National Research Council's resources. I doubt that the hon. member would want me to supersede the National Research Council in those legitimate functions. I have said that I will examine what the rationale is for any transfers of funding that have taken place. The hon. member should recognize that there is in Canada's research efforts a major emphasis attached both to energy and alternate energy sources, and those projects, not all of which by any means are within the National Research Council, do go before the energy panel for assessment which involves all relevant departments and government institutions.

HOUSING

ALLOCATION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSING—POSSIBILITY OF INCLUDING HOUSES FOR THE HANDICAPPED

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The Minister of Finance announced yesterday in Vancouver that the minister's department would provide special allocations for 2,500 additional housing units. Can the minister tell us where these low cost housing units will be built and whether he plans to include housing for the handicapped?

[English]

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to respond to the question of the hon. member and to her concern for the handicapped. Yes, the Minister of Finance indicated that CMHC had announced an additional 2,500 starts this year to serve co-op and non-profit organizations, with special preference and attention to those people having special needs, the handicapped. I might indicate that in making the announcement the minister also indicated it was a modest response, bearing in mind inflation and the need for government restraint, but I think the allocation will be received well by the municipal representatives who have indicated the very tight markets. I am thinking in particular of the 1,000 increase in unit designation in Vancouver, the increase in the designation in Calgary, and similarly in metropolitan Toronto as well as in Halifax.

THE JUDICIARY

REQUIREMENT FOR EXTRA JUDGE IN DISTRICT OF PEEL, ONT.

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General. On July 2, 1980, I wrote the minister requesting an extra complement for a judge in the judicial district of Peel. At that time he passed the buck to the Ontario Attorney General who did make a request for that extra complement in September, 1980. When might we expect that extra complement in the judicial district of Peel?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, very soon.

TIMING OF APPOINTMENT

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): That is good news, Madam Speaker, but I have heard that for about a year now. Since the senior judge has literally gone on strike at the court and refuses to assign any more cases until another judge is appointed, will the minister give us a specific date so that Judge Shapiro can start assigning cases again? He has quit assigning them out of sheer frustration.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I said I will be making an appointment very soon.

COMMUNICATIONS

DEPARTURE OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS INVOLVED IN DEVELOPMENT OF TELIDON

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications who is currently behind the curtains. I wonder whether he could be encouraged to return to the House. The Minister of Communications recently announced that two senior officials of his department will be leaving the employ of his department to join Norpak Limited which is the sole licensee of the Department of Communications technology for Telidon. Those senior officials were involved in the development of Telidon. Has the minister satisfied himself that those job transfers from DOC to the private sector meet the terms and conditions set down by the Prime Minister in the conflict of interest guidelines in 1978, and in particular the guidelines which were sent to each senior member of the Department of Communications by Bernard Ostry, the former deputy minister, on August 2, 1978?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, one of the challenges that faced this government with the Telidon project was the taking of this technology which was developed within the government, within the government laboratories, and getting it out into the hands of industry so it can be promoted in a way that only business can accomplish that kind of promotion. One of the side effects, of course, is that a whole new industry was launched in Canada, and a number of people with the Department of Communications, particularly those associated with the development of Telidon, were asked to join some of these new ventures.

As to the specific question raised by the hon. member, there is also a proviso in those guidelines whereby an application can be made to the Public Service Commission for an exemption from the guidelines. We are in the process of requesting that exemption. That exemption can be made when the public interest is better served by the people leaving the government to join the private sector.

DATE OF PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION DECISION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, are the two officials in question still in the employ of the Department of Communications, and when is a decision expected from the PSC?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I would have to check, Madam Speaker. My understanding is that at least one of those two individuals involved is still with the Department of Communications but will be leaving in the near future. As for the decision requested from the PSC, we hope to obtain it as soon as possible.

SERVICE PROVIDED BY RURAL OFFICES DURING POSTAL STRIKE

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that in many of the rural areas of Canada CUPW workers and members of the postmasters' union are keeping our rural post offices open, delivering that mail which has been posted locally, distributing it primarily to individual mail boxes, would the minister, in a positive vein during this time of the strike, now that the government appears to want to allow the strike to continue for some time, allow those people in those rural areas who have kept these post offices open, and providing a service, to take the mail in given regions from one post office to another, allowing distribution locally so that at least within a given region we can continue the mail service there? These are rural areas where we have small businesses, without the electronic transfer of money or telex, and the post office is so essential to the business community.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, we are aware of this situation and, indeed, as the hon. member will understand, this situation could create some pressure on union negotiating teams to go back to the table to settle through negotiations. Quite clearly there are a number of individuals who belong to this union who did not vote when the vote took place, who are dedicated to the postal service, and who are indeed very much eager to work and perform.

If every member of the House of Commons understands that the best place to negotiate is at the table and not on the floor of the House of Commons, and if everybody takes this responsible approach the hon. member just took, rather than the one taken previously by some colleagues of the hon. member, this would enhance our chances of a negotiated settlement.

TREATMENT OF EMPLOYEES WHO REMAIN ON DUTY

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I would still appreciate if the Postmaster General would answer the question as to whether he will authorize that inter-post office exchange of mail, because it would obviously help in rural areas. I agree with him that there are many union members, at least in the rural areas, who want to stay on the job, and in fact are doing so. Having said that, would the Postmaster General give us one other assurance, that those members of CUPW who are manning the local rural post offices, if the strike continues for some time, will not be issued unemployment slips and will not be locked out, as in fact happened in previous strikes of this nature?

• (1450)

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): The hon. member will understand it is too early at this stage to have an exact reading of the situation. I think we have to monitor the situation, and look at it very carefully. Indeed, in consultation with Treasury Board, the Post Office will take the appropriate steps as the strike evolves and as chances of bringing the parties back to the negotiating table are foreseen. I would rather wait to see how things evolve before giving any specific assurance one way or the other to the hon. member.

STATUS OF RURAL MAIL CARRIERS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the Postmaster General, given his answer that it is too early to make a decision with respect to the matter raised by the hon. member for Provencher. It is unfortunate the government will not legislate the postal workers back to work, but that is a decision ministers have made. However, it has not been too early for the government to make a decision with respect to rural mail carriers. I have heard from several of them that the government has exercised its prerogative to reduce their compensation because of inactivity and, as a result, those people, who are also anxious to work, are being penalized. Would the Postmaster General investigate that situation to see whether that order, which incidentally was delivered by courier, to one I spoke to, could be rescinded so these faithful employees do not have to bear that burden?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Yes, at the request of the hon. member I will investigate this. His representations clearly indicate the difficulty we are in; there is pressure on everybody. When the hon. member indicates it is regrettable we have not decided to legislate, I think he is wrong in saying that, because clearly at one point union leaders will have to realize they also have to suffer the pressure of calling the strike. If they could always run for cover, thinking that Parliament will immediately act and pass legislation, I think that would be a very bad process. The hon. member should appreciate that it is important that everybody suffer the pressure for a little while, including the union leaders who called for a strike.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The question of the public interest is always involved in matters of public service strikes. It is not the right to strike; it is a question of the public interest.

DELIVERY OF INCOME TAX REBATE CHEQUES

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): My supplementary is to the Minister of National Revenue. He indicated on Friday a plan was in place to deliver some 600,000 or 700,000 income tax refunds, and there had been some complaint about the system previously in place. Could the minister enlighten us as to whether or not a scheme has been arranged, or rearranged, in order that all those Canadians, not just the hardship cases, can get the money owed to them by the Government of Canada?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, we are presently making arrangements to transfer refund cheques from the offices of my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, to our 28 district offices across the country. This process will take several days, but they will be sorted and made available to people in those district offices. I am further consulting with my colleague to see if indeed we can go even further than that.

I should say that some of the cheques are indeed in the Post Office now and it will be impossible to get them back. As the cheques are sorted by computer on an ad hoc basis and not a regular basis like other transfer payments, it is not going to be as simple to effect the distribution. I would also say we have to be careful here because of the way these cheques come out of the computer, and also because of the amounts involved. We have to bear in mind not only making the money available to people but indeed making sure that the right money gets to the right person. We are putting a system in place, Madam Speaker, which I hope will be effective.

HEALTH

MARKETING OF BABY FOOD BY DUMEX COMPANY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Canadian government took a very commendable stand at the WHO conference when it supported the international code of marketing of breast milk substitutes. However, it has been reported by International Baby Food Action Network that Dumex, a company controlled by the CDC, is in repeated violation of the code in Asia and Africa. These violations, including posters advertising Dumex products, the distribution of samples, and milk nurses, continue to this day.

In view of the harm done by inappropriate use of breast milk substitutes which the government has recognized by its stand at the international conference, will the minister, along with the government appointed members of the CDC board, approach the chief executive officers of the CDC and Dumex and ask them to make sure Dumex is conducting its activities so that they conform to the code of conduct which the government supports?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, neither at the officials' level nor at my own level in the ministerial office have I received any complaint against any specific Canadian companies on that topic. However, I have requested my officials to look into the matter of Dumex and report back to me as soon as possible. I will then consider the appropriate action.

QUERY RESPECTING FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL ACTION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, Canada has a responsibility and an opportunity to follow up on its support of the code of conduct by moving in Canada to eliminate inappropriate use of breast milk substitutes and the promotion used by the formula companies to increase this use.

Is the minister working with the provinces to negotiate a joint plan of action to stop infant formula promotion, particularly in the hospitals, and would she be willing to enlist Canada as one of the countries in which adoption of the code is monitored by WHO, as requested by INFACT Canada and other groups interested in promoting breast feeding?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes, we have started working with the provinces. I am very happy to say that the province of Quebec has now stopped distribution of free packs of infant formula by way of promotion in any hospital of that province. In addition, federal hospitals do not permit this practice. I count on the other provinces to join the group, and I am sure the hon. member will help me to obtain Saskatchewan's approval as soon as possible, as well as Manitoba and a few other provinces where he could be very useful in making sure these packs are not distributed.

As to the plan for monitoring compliance with the WHO code, that plan will be presented to the executive of WHO in January, at which time we will study it to see how it can apply to Canada.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION OF DISABLED REFUGEES—AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCE OF MANITOBA

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Media reports this morning indicate the province of Manitoba and the federal government were working on an agreement to permit disabled persons to enter Canada who otherwise might not qualify under health requirements. If this is in fact taking place, it is commendable. Is the minister taking any initiative to encourage other provinces to take similar action?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, with respect to the proposed acceptance of disabled refugees, last October I wrote to the minister in Manitoba and we have drafted an understanding or agreement on that matter. We have now submitted that draft to other provincial governments and we hope they will follow the lead of Manitoba and join us in this co-operative venture.

Oral Questions

POST OFFICE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON POSTAL STRIKE

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. As he knows, the Liberal government under his leadership legislated striking postal employees back to work in 1975, and again in 1978 after a one day illegal walk out. In view of the fact the present strike is now into its second week at a time when our economy is already being devastated by high interest rates, inflation and so on, can the Prime Minister explain the inconsistency between his government's past actions and its present stubborn position of refusing to legislate CUPW back to work?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Surely, Madam Speaker, I do not have to explain what the hon. member calls inconsistency. He must know that when the right to strike exists there is no determination that one or the other party must cave in on a certain day.

• (1500)

Mr. Jelinek: Madam Speaker, I do not have to say that the Prime Minister did not answer my question at all.

SUSPENSION OF RIGHT TO STRIKE

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is a different one but on the same subject. Earlier in question period the Prime Minister said that one of the reasons he will not legislate the posties back to work was because he has not heard anyone suggesting that the right to strike in essential services should be suspended. That does not really make sense from one to the other, but that is what the Prime Minister said.

I have before me a questionnaire which indicates that 83 per cent of my constituents want us to suspend the right to strike in the essential service sector of the economy, and by all indications so do the majority of Canadians. Why does the Prime Minister and his government consistently refuse to act in accordance with the wishes of the majority of Canadians on this matter, and others in the past as well?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member misquotes me. I did not say no one wanted to take away the right to strike. I said that it was not, to my knowledge, the position of the Progressive Conservative party.

An hon. Member: It is.

Mr. Trudeau: If it is, they would be listening to the 83 per cent of the constituents of the hon. member.

Mr. Jelinek: You are the government; you are the government.

Mr. Trudeau: Thank you very much.

PETITIONS

MR. WILSON—RESOLUTION OF POSTAL STRIKE

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of my riding of Etobicoke Centre. It arises out of the concern they feel respecting the effects of the postal strike and the anticipated duration of the strike as a result of statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and others in the government. In effect, the petition calls upon the government to seek a resolution of the strike immediately because they believe the country cannot survive another period of postal disruption.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RCMP—APPEARANCES BEFORE INTERNAL SERVICE COURTS

Question No. 1,328—Mr. MacKay:

1. For the fiscal year (a) 1976-77 (b) 1977-78 (c) 1978-79 (d) 1979-80, under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act and its regulations, how many members of the RCMP have been required, as part of a disciplinary action, to appear before internal service courts without the aid of legal counsel?

2. (a) For the same years, how many members of the Force were convicted of an offence by the service courts using Sections 36 to 38 of the Act and how many convictions fell in each of the various categories of punishment (b) did any of the trial officers act without benefit of legal training and, if so, how many?

3. For the same years, how many appeals were forwarded by the commissioner to the board of review as established under Section 43 of the act?

4. How many appeals were forwarded to the commissioner for the attention of the officer in charge of discipline pursuant to administrative bulletin 290 of May 23, 1975, entitled "Grievances and Appeals" or its successor?

5. With reference to regulation No. 33 respecting the organization, discipline and administration of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, established under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, does the regulation deny members of the force legal counsel and, if so, is consideration being given to its revision?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. The following figures represent the number of members required to appear before internal service courts during fiscal years 1976-77 to and including fiscal year 1979-80. Regulation 33 and force policy prohibited representation by professional counsel:

(a)	1976-77	31
(b)	1977-78	20
(c)	1978-79	15
(d)	1979-80	5

2. (a) Of the 71 service courts convened, 39 were for minor service offences (RCMP Act, Sec. 26) and 31 convictions were registered as follows:

1976-77 7 members were fined (Act, S. 36(2)(b))
3 members were reprimanded (Act, S. 36(2)(e))
3 members received a fine and a reprimand (Act, S. 36(2)(b) and (e))
1 member was fined and recommended for discharge (Act, S. 36(2)(b) and S. 38))

1977-78 5 members were fined (Act, S. 36(2)(b))
1 member was reprimanded (Act, S. 36(2)(e))

1978-79 5 members were fined (Act, S. 36(2)(b))
2 members were reprimanded (Act, S. 36(2)(e))
1 member received a fine and a reprimand (Act, S. 36(2)(b) and (e))

1979-80 1 member was fined (Act, S. 36(2)(b))
2 members were reprimanded (Act, S. 36(2)(e))

The remaining 32 service courts were for major service offences (RCMP Act, Sec. 25) and 29 convictions were registered. Following are the punishments imposed during fiscal years 1976-77 to and including 1979-80:

1976-77 7 members were fined (Act, S. 36(1)(b))
1 member was reprimanded (Act, S. 36(1)(f))
1 member was fined and demoted (Act, S. 36(1)(b) and (d))
1 member was demoted (Act, S. 36(1)(d))
2 members were fined and recommended for discharge (Act, S. 36(1)(b) and S. 38))

1977-78 6 members were fined (Act, S. 36(1)(b))
1 member was reprimanded (Act, S. 36(1)(f))
1 member was fined and reprimanded (Act, S. 36(1)(b) and (f))
1 member was fined and required to pay restitution (Act, S. 36(1)(b) and Act, S. 37))
1 member was demoted and recommended for discharge (Act, S. 36(1)(d) and S. 38))
1 member was demoted and required to pay restitution (Act, S. 36(1)(d) and Act, S. 37))

1978-79 1 member was reprimanded (Act, S. 36(1)(f))
1 member was fined and required to pay restitution (Act, S. 36(1)(b) and Act, S. 37))
1 member was recommended for discharge (Act, S. 38)
1 member was required to pay restitution (Act, S. 37)

1979-80 1 member was fined (Act, S. 36(1)(b))
1 member was reprimanded (Act, S. 36(1)(f))

(b) Of the 54 trial officers involved in the 71 service courts convened, 53 acted without the benefit of formal legal training.

3. During fiscal years 1976-77 to and including 1979-80, five (5) appeals were forwarded by the commissioner to the board of review as established under section 43 of the act.

4. The following figures represent the number of appeals of cautionings and warnings forwarded to headquarters of the force for determination by the deputy commissioner (Administration) or the commissioner pursuant to administrative bulletin 290 of 75-05-23. No figures are available for 1976-77.

	1977/78
Cautionings	6	Warnings	16
	1978/79
Cautionings	4	Warnings	12
	1979/80
Cautionings	3	Warnings	21

5. RCMP regulation 33 and force policy currently prohibits representation by professional counsel. Forthcoming amendments to the RCMP Act will provide statutorily, the right to representation by counsel.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION LOANS

Question No. 2,481—Mr. Greenaway:

1. In each fiscal year 1978 to 1981, how many loans were made by the Export Development Corporation to foreign countries?

2. For the same period, by year, which countries received loans and (a) for what purpose (b) in what amount (c) at what rate of interest?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (Trade)): In so far as the Export Development Corporation is concerned: 1. Export Development Corporation does not make loans to foreign countries as such but it lends to borrowers abroad to finance sales of goods and services sold by Canadian exporters. In the years in question the numbers of loans and allocations under lines of credit to provide financing for such sales are as follows:

Year	No. of Loans
1978	27
1979	53
1980	94

2. (a) and (b) During the years in question for the loans made, purpose thereof and amounts, please refer to the corporation's annual report tabled in the House of Commons for 1978 on October 16, 1979; for 1979, on April 17, 1980; and for 1980, on March 26, 1981.

(c) As to the rates of interest charged on such loans, in view of the intense competition that prevails among countries in foreign trade, it is not in the public interest for the Export Development Corporation to discuss its participation in export transactions or proposed export transactions. Such information would assist an exporter's competitors both foreign and domestic. Since information on bids, participation or negotiations is given by companies to EDC in confidence, the corporation, to respect that confidence, refrains, until the sale arrangements are final, from discussing a deal or even from indicating that it has been approached in a transaction. EDC makes public its participation in direct lending transaction when the financing agreement therefor is signed, and, on request, in credits and foreign investment insurance cases where the exporter or investor consents to publication. If the exporter or investor has not given its consent the reply will so state. When EDC makes public its participation in direct lending transactions it does not, because of the intense competition above mentioned, publish the rates of interest it charges, for the reasons mentioned.

PORT FACILITY STORAGE SHED, GROS CACOUNA, QUE.

Question No. 2,488—Mr. Crosby:

1. On what date was the storage shed in the port facility at Gros Cacouna, Quebec completed and operational?

2. How many tons of cargo were handled at the facility (a) through the shed (b) over the adjacent open area in each year since the shed was operational and what was the tonnage for each commodity included in the cargo?

3. How many cargo ships docked at the facility during each year it was operational and what was the dead weight tonnage of the larger ships docked?

4. Does the government receive revenue from assessments of cargo handled at the facility and, if so, in what amount for each year?

5. What was the cost of constructing the (a) storage shed (b) quay wall related to the storage shed?

6. What is the estimated amount of revenue that must be generated annually to recover the capital and operating costs associated with the facility?

7. Will the facility be placed on a cost recovery basis and, if not, how will the capital and operating costs be recovered?

8. What amount was spent on access roads connecting the facility to the main public highway and will the cost of the roads be recovered through charges to the users of the facility?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The storage shed was completed on January 28, 1981. Transport Canada assumed operational responsibility from Public Works Canada on March 30, 1981.

2. (a) 4,540 tonnes of paper products since March 30, 1981.

(b) 21,988 cu.m. of wood products since March 30, 1981.

3. Seven vessels since March 30, 1981. Tonnage of largest vessel: 15,000 T.

4. Charges are assessed in accordance with regulations under the Government Harbours and Piers Act and the Canada Shipping Act. Revenues since March 30, 1981, total $14,855.59.

5. (a) $1,176,082.

(b) $6,639,597.

6. Full cost recovery over the useful life of the asset at a discount rate of 15 per cent would necessitate an annual revenue of about $187,900 for the shed (20-year life) and $999,600 for the wharf (40-year life).

7. Those project costs which can be ascribed as being for transportation purposes will be recovered.

8. The access road was built in 1965-66 at a cost of $461,141.00. User charges will contribute to recovery of the cost of the road.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE—FIELD OFFICER, BROCKVILLE, ONT.

Question No. 2,504—Mr. Cossitt:

Does a representative of the Department of National Health and Welfare visit Brockville in the constituency of Leeds-Grenville approximately once a week to deal directly with persons who have old age pension problems and, if so (a) what is his/her name and what is a complete record of his/her career in the Public Service (b) is the government satisfied with the service being rendered to the public by the representative (c) does the government consider the representative is demonstrating sufficient compassion and concern to people with problems (d) did the representative receive training in public relations?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare):

(a) Mr. Kenneth Ziebell, a field officer of the Kingston district office of income security programs, National Health and Welfare, is in charge of the Brockville local office located at 35 Church Street, Room B-17. This office is open each Monday and Wednesday from 9:15 a.m. to 3:00 p.m. Mr. Ziebell has been a field officer with the Department of National Health and Welfare since September, 1967.

(b) Mr. Ziebell's performance has always been and continues to be fully satisfactory.

(c) Mr. Ziebell has always demonstrated concern and compassion in his dealings with the income security programs clientele and the general public.

(d) The officer concerned had special training in interviewing and counselling and has had extensive experience in public speaking both in the public and private sectors.

ALLEGED RAID ON HALIFAX OFFICES OF PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE

Question No. 2,566—Mr. Crosby:

Did the Minister of National Defence authorize a raid by officers or men of the Canadian Armed Forces on the offices of the Public Service Alliance of Canada in Halifax on or about May 13, 1981, and, if so, what was the purpose of the raid and under what authority or direction was it conducted?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): No. On May 13, 1981, the military police under the authority of the base commander CFB Halifax conducted a search of a DND filing cabinet, on DND premises, a drawer of which was used to file Union of National Defence Employees' (UNDE) material. This search was conducted following allegations that Mr. Ryan, president of local 407 of UNDE, was improperly using information which he had obtained in the course of his duties as a clerk in central registry. The military police seized 46 documents which had been originated by management. Further investigation has resulted in Mr. Ryan being accused of improperly acquiring, and using a total of 26 management originated documents, three of which were classified as confidential.

PRIVY COUNCIL ESTIMATES

Question No. 2,607—Mr. Lawrence:

Is there a 44 per cent increase in the Privy Council estimates for professional and consulting services for next year as compared to the estimates for this year and, if so, what is the explanation for the increase?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The following explanation applies to the 1981-82 (current) estimates to which it is assumed the question refers since the estimates for "next year" (1982-83) have not yet been tabled: Main estimates as tabled in the House of Commons for 1980-81 provided for a total of $2,169,000 for professional and consulting services. Main estimates for 1981-82 provided for an amount of $2,683,000 in this expenditure object or an increase of 23 per cent. Approximately half of this increase, an amount of $231,000, is attributable to price increases required to maintain the same level of services in the current year from the previous year. The remainder represents increased funding to cover new requirements for internal audit and management consultant services, a new classification plan for governor in council appointees and miscellaneous studies related to the work of the Privy Council Office and Federal-Provincial Relations Office.

Order Paper Questions

PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE—EMPLOYEES INVOLVED IN SECURITY AND INTELLIGENCE

Question No. 2,609—Mr. Lawrence:

What is the number and what are the names of the employees of the Privy Council Office whose functions include security and intelligence matters?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): There are 24 employees of the Privy Council Office whose functions include at least in part security and intelligence matters. By name they are:

Officers

Mr. P. M. Pitfield, Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the Cabinet

Mr. G. S. Smith, Associate Secretary to the Cabinet

Mr. T. D. Finn, Assistant Secretary to the Cabinet—Security and Intelligence

Mr. G. H. Craven

Mr. G. F. Frazer

Mr. J. T. Gannon

Mr. J. R. Godfrey

Major W. J. Hackett (secondment from DND)

Mr. Arthur Katona (secondment from EA)

Major P. A. Lemieux

Col. J. C. Upton (secondment from DND)

Mr. Peter C. Cameron

Mr. Alisdair MacLaren

Mr. John Graham

Insp. Ernie Boyd (secondment from RCMP)

All secondments are charged against the PCO budget and person-year allocation.

Adult Occupational Training Act, No. 2

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION—CONTRACT TO CONTEMPORARY RESEARCH CENTRE

Question No. 2,615—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Department of Employment and Immigration award a $34,000 contract to Contemporary Research Centre, Ottawa, and, if so (a) what are the names of the principals of the centre (b) what services were provided?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): DSS awarded a contract to Contemporary Research Centre, on behalf of the Department of Employment and Immigration, for an amount of $34,000.

(a) Mr. E. Lacy, president.

Mrs. S. Mahta, manager, Ottawa branch.

(b) The services provided were for a post evaluation of an advertising program conducted in support of a program entitled "Non-Traditional Job Training for Women".

ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—CONTRACT TO McCONNELL ADVERTISING CO. LTD.

Question No. 2,617—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources contract with McConnell Advertising Co. Ltd. for $295,625 for advertising services and, if so, what services were performed?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): DSS awarded a contract, on behalf of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, to McConnell Advertising Co. Ltd. for the amount of $295,625. The contract was for the provision of creative advertising services in support of the Canadian Home Insulation and the Canadian Oil Substitution programs.

ADULT OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING ACT (NO. 2)

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Monday, July 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy that Bill C-67, to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act (No. 2), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, once again I should like to reiterate what I was saying last night when the House adjourned. I think the minister and his departmental officials are to be complimented for bringing forward Bill C-67.

As I said last night, under the present legislation there is little incentive for an individual to enter an apprenticeship or training program in the adult area because, as things presently stand, people who are unemployed can go on unemployment insurance and remain on it and they have absolutely no incentive to go for retraining or training.

I have a couple of suggestions for the minister regarding the legislation. Hopefully he will be able to incorporate them in the legislation. It provides an extra $25 per week above the unemployment insurance figure which an individual would draw if he goes into adult occupational training. I find this provision to be particularly good because some incentive is offered to an individual to go into training.

One area amended by the bill which I feel is good but does not go quite far enough is that extra benefits will be given to those people entering employment training in certain skilled areas or trades. Currently these are targeted at tool and die makers, welders and boilermakers, these very specialized areas designated by the governor in council. Somehow a mechanism must be put in place in the various regions of our large country for an advisory committee appointed by the Department of Manpower and Immigration to evaluate at a very local level the kinds of occupational training which are essential for an area.

Nowhere do we see in the legislation as a skilled area the requirements of the hotel service industry or the food service industry. Yet these industries in certain localities within our great country are hard-pressed to find trained employees. Employees working in the hotel and food service industries need intense training, perhaps not for as lengthy a period but certainly as intense as the training of a tool and die maker.

The legislation itself is narrowing down too quickly and zeroing in on only those areas where in the past shortages have occurred to such an extent that employers have gone to the Department of Employment and Immigration and requested permission to seek workers elsewhere in other countries and bring them in as landed immigrants.

I am particularly pleased that the legislation will lift the one-year ceiling on government assistance to trainees. We all know that many programs go beyond one year; some last two years and some even three. Also I am pleased that the legislation will abolish the requirement that trainees must be out of school for at least a year. The current legislation is very discriminatory. It really causes a great deal of hardship for young people who are not functioning academically in the school system and want to enter training programs. The only training programs being offered are those supported by manpower assistance. Manpower arranges the training place in junior colleges and technical schools. These young people have actually been denied admittance into the schools. This is being addressed in the legislation; again the minister should be complimented. Previously if a course was not offered in Canada and students had to go outside the country for training, the government offered no support. Now it has recognized this need and included it in the bill.

The government is primarily amending this piece of legislation so that the department of manpower will be able to sign contracts. They then propose to sign training contracts, but they aim primarily at unions with the thinking, of course, being that unions are in a position to know their manpower requirements. If unions do the training, then those unions in the specialized trades in particular will be more prone to accept a trainee into its ranks and, therefore, offer employment.

• (1510)

One area which I think is not being addressed clearly enough is the employment of native people. If one goes to certain bands, particularly the ones I am familiar with in northeastern Alberta, one will find that the need and requirements of the band may be something very nebulous. An official sitting in Ottawa might not consider that training programs are needed. I direct the attention of the House to basic life skills training programs. Many of the enlightened bands in northeastern Alberta have attempted to train their men and women in basic life skills.

These programs cover a myriad of topics which we in urban society take for granted and expect everyone to understand. I am talking about banking, immunization programs, public health programs for children which we take for granted, and basic housekeeping. After years of living in shacks without running water admittance is suddenly gained to more modern housing. It takes skills to go into these homes and run them in a way which we all take for granted since we were raised in those kinds of homes. I am afraid the minister is missing something here by not putting into place legislation to sign contracts with the unions for training programs and contracts with various bands throughout the country on the basis of a suitable training program to develop the skills necessary to survive in our Canadian communities. I would like to see the minister add a clause to this legislation which would clearly indicate the intention of this government, through the Department of Manpower, to address this very serious problem.

Another aspect of the legislation which is before us that I thought was particularly good is that dealing with the negotiation of fixed rate training allowances with employers. There was no such provision in the old legislation. In other words, you can negotiate fixed rate training allowances with employers.

Although the legislation is long overdue, and although it is good, I must point out to the minister the sense of futility which is felt not only by the people in the Department of Manpower but by members on this side of the House in respect to there being no forecasting facility to pinpoint areas which need employment incentives in skilled labour training.

I would like to expand on this point. Legislation is brought in to deal with the retraining and training of people for employment opportunities which are developing in the country. Later on another minister will introduce legislation, for example the National Energy Program, which will destroy an industry to the point where the people who hold skilled jobs move to another country. I am talking about the drilling industry. It takes two to three years to train good drillers, good floor men and good derrick men in the drilling industry. But what will happen when the government finally comes to its senses and enters into an energy agreement with the producing provinces? All the skilled labour will have left the industry, along with the rigs. Each rig employs 20 to 30 people and each is like a small factory.

I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that one megaproject in northeastern Alberta, and I am referring to the Alsands plant in Fort McMurray and the Cold Lake plant, causes a secondary spin-off into the Ontario economy which will affect training programs geared for Ontario. Can you see the inconsistencies, Mr. Speaker? On the one hand is a minister who brings forward what I consider to be long overdue and good legislation, while on the other we have a minister who brings in legislation which counteracts the first.

One $10 billion plant in northeastern Alberta will create $800 million in business for Ontario's iron and steel industry. What will happen when the iron and steel industry slows down, as it is doing today? Trained employees will be lost. When the plant starts up again it will have to fill the positions which have been vacated in order to meet the capacity and requirements of the megaprojects. Training will have to be targeted in these areas. This cannot be done in a vacuum, nor can it be done under the present legislation without there being a co-ordination of legislation.

Bill C-67 does not complement what is happening as a result of the National Energy Program. That same $10 billion plant will create $370 million in business opportunities for Ontario's metal working industry. As a matter of fact, one should double these figures since there are two plants which have investors waiting to spend money to the tune of $20 billion to $22 billion. It has been forecast that there will be five or six plants like these developing in northeastern Alberta.

That same plant will create $325 million for the Ontario transportation industry. Today the transportation industry is sagging. It is losing its trained employees who are moving to other parts of Canada where they feel they can find a job. Some of these people are taking retraining. Imagine trained men in the industries in Ontario and Quebec leaving their jobs and taking retraining because the market has sagged. Legislation is now brought forward which would enable these men to be retrained for another job.

Once an energy agreement is reached with the producing provinces, the activity in central Canada will increase and then we must retrain other people to fill the jobs which have been vacated. This concept staggers the imagination. There is no apparent co-ordination between government departments, at least co-ordinating the legislation, so that we are not duplicating or wasting our resources, which in the main is our manpower.

• (1520)

One plant creates $740 million for other manufacturers and processors in Ontario. That is a secondary spin-off. It creates $370 million for Ontario financial enterprises and $750 million for the Ontario trade and service sector. Those are the kinds of matters we have to address. It is just too bad that there is no co-ordination. This means $1.8 billion in extra Ontario household income which, in turn, generates again.

As I said, the legislation before us is good. I am sorry it does not go further. I am sorry that the government does not seem to be co-ordinating and trying to bind together the legislation so that there is a complete understanding. I do not know what ministers do at these cabinet meetings, if they do not talk about the legislation they are bringing forward. This is good legislation. It is legislation which is long overdue. However, it is being completely undermined by legislation which we are receiving from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde).

It would appear to me that an industrial strategy for Canada must be put in place once and for all, and very quickly. We have been hearing about this industrial strategy for a long time. But how can one department, manpower and immigration, operate in isolation when we do not have an industrial strategy? There is coal development; there is oil development; there are resource developments; there are manufacturing developments. All these developments will take place, not because of the present government, but in spite of the present government. It has to happen. But there must be some co-ordination or we destroy the effects of Bill C-67.

We are setting up manpower and immigration as a reactionary department. In other words, it will react to the alarm bell. The department will react like firemen. There will be a sudden employment crisis or lack of skills in one area, and the department will rush to try to overcome this. Then another one will pop up and it will rush to try and assist in that area. But what it needs is a common industrial strategy so that it can focus all the way through.

I would like to suggest to the minister one way this can happen. If he cannot get co-operative legislation from other parts of the House, what he should be doing is setting up very distinct regional advisory groups, small ones, two, three, or four in each province, which will come together with their recommendations to the minister at least every four months. Since the minister is not getting co-operation now, there is no reason to think that he is going to get it in legislation from other departments. Therefore, he must try and do it himself. The only way he can do this is to try to get forecasts from individuals living in various areas, because they know what is happening and what will be required. That is my major concern, and it is one suggestion I would like to make.

There is a lack of co-ordination in legislation, on the whole. This is a good piece of legislation. I would like to see it passed. I would personally like to see third reading given practically immediately so that the minister and his department can get out there and address the needs which are there. I remember I did suggest that he could amend a few areas, particularly as they relate to native communities. He should address the energy sector because there is the potential for a real emergency situation coming, because skilled employees are moving south of the border with their rigs. At last count, there were 185. Another 150 rigs will have moved by fall. Skilled workers are going with them, which means we are not going to entice them back. When an energy agreement is reached, they are not coming back because they have signed contracts, some for two years and some for three years.

We will have to retrain in that energy sector again in the western basin, covering the prairie provinces and Alberta. We will have to retrain, so the minister should be targeting in on that. There is a real potential for jobs there; but as I said before, they are being discouraged by the National Energy Program. However, the national energy policy will be changed, I am confident.

Those are the remarks I have. I do hope that I have been able to contribute in a very positive way to this debate. I know the minister is not in the House. I do know, however, that the minister will have his assistant, and so on, reading the remarks which are made when he is not here. I hope that that assistant will take my remarks and put them in front of the minister, because I think they are positive suggestions, and I feel very strongly about them.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, this bill deals with one of the most important questions this country will have to deal with in the eighties, and that is: How do we ensure that our Canadian population, all Canadians, will be trained to do the many complex jobs that will be opening during the eighties and the nineties as a result of the new technologies of energy developments and so on?

As hon. members know, during the past year I had the pleasure and the honour of chairing the parliamentary Task Force on Employment Opportunities for the '80s which heard hundreds of Canadians on that subject. We heard people from all parts of the country, from Victoria to Newfoundland, and from Windsor to the Northwest Territories. I must say that, in general, the recommendations of those many witnesses have been taken up, to a certain extent, in this bill. This bill does go in the direction that Canadians want to go, but it does not go far enough and it does not cover a wide enough area of reform.

In his remarks last night, the minister said that the goals of this bill, first of all, were to simplify the administration for occupational training in this country by removing much of the paperwork, the red tape and so on. That is an excellent goal and I think would have great support in the country.

The second goal is to make the adult education training programs more flexible. That was a theme we heard over and over again. Very many individuals and groups appearing before our task force complained bitterly about rigidity and inflexibility in the adult education training programs and the manpower retraining programs. That criticism came most often from those parts of the country where unemployment was highest, from the Atlantic region, the Gaspé, the more remote parts of Quebec, northern Ontario and the northern parts of the prairie provinces. They said that many of these programs for retraining and upgrading were probably based on data which came out of the great population areas of the country, such as the Golden Horseshoe around Toronto, the lower mainland of British Columbia and the Greater Montreal area.

I think that is true to a great extent. Our economic analysts who sit here in Ottawa and carry on their research, for the most part carry out what is called macroeconomic analysis. That macroeconomic analysis deals with the total population figure and national trends, and ends up with solutions which might deal with those national trends; but they do not help very much in many of the slow growth areas of the country. In these slow growth areas of the country the people ask for more flexibility so that the retraining and upgrading programs of the government will suit their needs, be it in northeastern New Brunswick, Cape Breton, the west coast of Newfoundland or northern Manitoba. If the bill achieves that, Mr. Speaker, it will certainly be a step forward.

The minister also said that one of the main objectives of the bill was to deal with the effects of industrial dislocation; that is, where large industries are put out of business or are forced to reduce their manpower needs due to world conditions, such as is the case at present in the automobile industry in south-eastern Ontario. When that happens there is a great need to retrain workers who are laid off for new jobs opening up in communities near them or in other parts of the country where great developments are taking place.

I applaud the three goals of the bill, Mr. Speaker. With respect to the specific provisions, the minister said that one of the greatest needs in this country is for more on-the-job training. At the committee hearings we found that less than 20 per cent of Canadian manufacturing industries provided on-the-job training. That is a deplorable figure compared with France, West Germany, Holland and other countries of western Europe where 80 per cent to 85 per cent of manufacturing companies provide on-the-job training. Industries and employers there look upon on-the-job training as an investment in the future, while many Canadian companies look upon it as a cost, not an investment. Consequently, we have a very poor record.

One reason that we have such a poor record is that immigrants were easily available to Canadian companies over the last half century. Whenever trained tool and die makers, welders or machinists were needed, it was easy to take a recruiting team to Europe and pick them up in England, Holland, Germany, Belgium or wherever, rather than spend the money to train native Canadians who, by the way, have remained unemployed because they did not have that chance to be trained. Whether the "carrot" measures, as I will call them, contained in this bill and in present government programs are sufficient to get Canadian companies to provide more training, I do not know. Perhaps we will need "sticks" in addition to the carrots, and our task force will make some recommendations in that respect.

It was agreed by employers and employees, students and educators that the best type of training they had seen in this country was what we call co-operative education based on the University of Sherbrooke or the University of Waterloo model. This is where the student spends approximately four months in the educational institute and then four months on the job. He alternates back and forth throughout the entire educational process and then when he has obtained his degree or certificate or diploma, he has logged a lot of hours of practical training to go with the academic training. An employer is usually willing to hire him right away. He is not faced with the common answer, "I am sorry, I would like to hire you but you have no experience and I need someone with experience". The co-operative educational model of institutional training combined with on-the-job training will deal with that problem.

There are certain measures in the bill which are laudable and which members of the committee support, although we think the minister could go further. It is, of course, necessary to provide training programs beyond the 52 weeks. Time and again witnesses told our task force that it is impossible to train people for certain skill trades in 52 weeks. The ordinary apprenticeship program in this country is for four years. I think that is too long and in Europe it is two to three years. It is unreasonable to expect to train a man to become skilled in 52 weeks and the measure to extend training beyond 52 weeks is long overdue.

Second, under the present federal legislation a young person had to wait for one year after getting out of high school before he could be financed for an industrial training program. That restriction was harmful to many young people. Many got into trouble or went off and did something else because they had to wait one year, and never returned for skills training. This amendment, which will allow them to go into industrial training even though they have not been out of school for one year, is a good amendment.

Finally, the amendment that will provide for training contracts with other than provincial governments and employers is also good. Provincial governments, through their educational systems and employers, are not the only bodies, that have good training programs. Unions have good training programs and there are non-profit voluntary groups with good training programs. Private schools also have good training programs. We found that some of the best secretarial schools in the country are private schools and some of the best schools for electronic and computer education are private schools. The amendment will allow the minister to conclude training contracts with the unions, with non-profit voluntary groups and with the private schools, associations and groups that provide industrial training or want to provide it.

The other important amendment provides for increased payments for companies that provide the training. Existing industrial training allowances are much too low and give no encouragement to people to come off unemployment insurance or welfare and seek training. If we want a skilled labour force, we must finance people through their training period. I do not think the measure goes far enough but it is certainly an improvement.

I have said that what is in the bill is laudable, but if we are to deal with this massive problem of skilled-trade shortages in the country and the mismatch in the Canadian economy where high levels of unemployment exist side by side with serious shortages in skilled trades, then much more will have to be done.

When the minister appeared before the committee I asked him whether the bill was the last word and he said that it was not. He said he felt he had to get it through this month or before the summer recess in order to be able to deal with some immediate problems, but that he certainly intended to bring in much wider-ranging amendments to the Adult Occupational Training Act next fall or winter after he had received the report of the task force or the report of the Dodge committee which he tabled in the House today.

I want to mention a few of the other things that have to be dealt with if we are to cope with unemployment and skill shortages in this country. We need a better defined industrial strategy. Representatives for many companies told us that they would be glad to provide more money for on-the-job or industrial training if they knew what the government's approach to their industry was going to be. Spokesmen for the shipbuilding industry told us that if they knew the government's long-range plan for their industry, they would invest much more money in training young people. The same was said by people in the mining industry and other industries. They told us that they had to know the government's industrial strategy before they would invest in very expensive training programs. I urge the government to come forward with a comprehensive industrial strategy program so that we can get on with the training that is needed in this country.

Anyone who is going to build a new factory or establish a new industry cannot expect the skilled labour to appear immediately. It takes from four to seven years to train a skilled workman or skilled professional. It takes at least seven years to train an engineer and for a highly qualified welder, tool and die maker or machinist it takes four years. If we want something to be done for Canadian industry within four years, we should start providing the training today. An industrial strategy is very important.

Another thing that is extremely important and which is not dealt with in the bill is the high rate of functional illiteracy in this country. At the hearings we found out that almost 30 per cent of Canadians are functionally illiterate. That means that they are not even ready or qualified to take the training and upgrading programs provided by the government. Before they would be ready to take those programs, they would have to be trained in basic reading, writing and arithmetic. They have to learn how to read plans, how to communicate, and how to compute before they would be able to take these programs. How can you train a man to be an electrician if he does not have these basic literacy skills? I think it is shocking for a country like Canada to have almost 30 per cent of the population functionally illiterate. People who are functionally illiterate are traditionally the ones who are unemployed. This status unfortunately follows generation after generation. However, we will be dealing with that point in our report.

Even if a lot of money were put into training, if training facilities were expanded and companies were willing to do much more on-the-job training, people will not take that training if the support systems are not there for them. While people are being trained they need at least a living allowance to support themselves and their families. If their homes are at a distance from the training facility, people need the transportation costs to get to the facility. If parents of children are in training, they need a place to leave their children during the day. All of these things cost money. Too many Canadians, and perhaps some government officials, look on those expenditures as transfer payments of one kind or another. But they are not transfer payments; they are really an investment in the future of this country. If we do not get these chronically unemployed and functionally illiterate people trained, the whole industrial output of Canada will be affected.

We heard from many companies that they were unable to expand—this is especially true in the west—and had to turn down orders from abroad because the skilled labour force was not available in the areas where they were set up. If we want to get these people permanently off the welfare and unemployment rolls, we have to be willing to put money into the support systems and into the training necessary for them to become productive Canadians.

There is also the problem of the mobility program, which is not dealt with in the bill but must be dealt with. There is the whole problem of flexible work schedules, part-time work, shared work and flexible retirement.

Finally, if we fill those skilled labour shortages, we have to make sure that the many special groups such as women's groups, native groups and the handicapped have a chance to be trained to do any kind of job in this country, whether it is skilled blue-collar work or professional work. Not only does justice demand it, but economic necessity will require it. If we do not train these women, the native and the handicapped for those jobs, we will not have enough trained people to do what this country demands.

Before closing I want to mention that all of these things could be done better. We need a better forecasting and planning system. We need better federal-provincial co-operation, which I do not think we have now. It is not altogether bad, but it needs great improvement.

I mentioned at the beginning that we are entering the 1980s and 1990s which will be a period of technological change even more rapid than the technological changes we saw in the 1960s and 1970s. If we are to have a more rapidly changing technological age, it means that a man or a woman who is trained at 20 will have to be retrained again at 35, again at 45 and perhaps retrained again at 55.

In other words, we will need an educational and training system which will be an ongoing one where people will be able to enter and leave the educational and training system throughout their lifetimes. It will no longer be the style for a child to stay at home from birth to six years of age, attend school from the age of six to the age of 20 and work from the age of 20 to the age of 65, and after that go home and wait to die. Instead we will have a life and a society where we will continually be in and out of the educational and training system, in and out of the workplace, at leisure, at home, taking a sabbatical or whatever. If we are going to meet the industrial and commercial challenges of the 1980s and 1990s and keep Canada a major industrial and commercial nation, we will definitely need much better training, retraining and upgrading systems. This bill goes in the right direction, but we need more.

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak to Bill C-67, which is a bill to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act. I am pleased because the contents of this bill and the subject of the main act are something which vitally affect all parts of Canda, from Newfoundland to central Canada, on to the Prairies and right through to Vancouver Island. I am speaking of the lack of skilled workers that we have in Canada, and have had for a number of years.

As previous speakers have pointed out, the whole aspect of our society in the 1980s will be changing. We are now into the technological society with more manufacturing, more mega-projects needing more skilled and trained workers. This need will continually increase as we enter the 1990s.

The present system of training skilled workers has been inadequate for the last 10, 15 or 20 years. That is because we have placed too much emphasis and money, not only at the federal and provincial level but also at the municipal level, on the wrong kind of education at the wrong time.

In my opinion, this problem started just after the Second World War. The government in its wisdom allowed every veteran to attend university or other higher learning institutions, and for those who did, their way was paid. That was a very good thing because at that time the country needed people with higher education. In the 1950s, and perhaps even in the 1960s, a university degree was a passport to a job; any kind of a university degree. Admittedly, in the 1940s and the 1950s one could not get a university degree listening to birds or watching flowers or things of that nature. Nevertheless, in order to get employment, people looked to the universities and the universities became pre-employment schools. In a sense they lost a lot of their research capacity perhaps to impart some knowledge and wisdom.

As a result we continued to rely too long on that particular aspect of our training program. This has resulted over the past few years in too many university trained people who we now find are underemployed. We find them doing all sorts of things, even driving taxis. I have nothing against taxi drivers, it is a very honourable profession. I understand that one of the members opposite who recently went to the other place used to drive taxis. Some taxi drivers make a lot of money, sometimes more money than members of this House. I understand also that during the recess some members opposite will be driving taxis to supplement their income. I have nothing against taxi drivers, but I have a lot against trained university people being underemployed.

We used to say that it cost about $8,000 of public purse money, other than tuition fees, to train a person at university. I do not know how much that figure has gone up, but I dare say it has doubled. It probably costs now $12,000 or $16,000 a year.

This year the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) has predicted that there will be 15,000 unemployable university graduates, or a 10 per cent surplus. We cannot afford that kind of misdirection of public funds. The public will not put up with it much longer.

• (1550)

What has been the history of our source of skilled workers? Previous speakers have pointed out how we have relied almost completely on foreign countries to supply our skilled workers. That was a good thing in the past. Earlier in our history we had neither the capacity nor the knowledge to train the kind of skilled people which this country needed.

After the depression and the last war, we were fortunate to have these people come to our land to help develop the frontier, build our cities, our bridges and provide the high standard of living which we have enjoyed and are enjoying. These people from foreign lands have added to the diversification of our society and have enriched it greatly. I am pleased that these skilled workers came to our country.

We are still doing this. For example, 15 per cent of the registered nurses employed in British Columbia are from outside Canada. A recent survey by the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce showed that some 30 per cent of the skilled workers in that city are from outside Canada. In a report to the committee on employment by the principal of the Pacific Vocational Institute of British Columbia, the largest vocational institute in that province, he quoted figures which are very significant. I would like to read them to the House. He talked about percentages of the Canadian work force. Skilled workers born and trained in Canada amounted to 27 per cent and those born and trained outside Canada amounted to 73 per cent. Almost three-quarters of our skilled workers have been trained outside Canada. What have our federal and provincial governments been doing since World War II?

I wish to place another significant figure on record. Skilled workers in the labour force today who are over 40 years old account for 87 per cent of our work force. Surely that underlines the need for a vast, vital and energetic program to obtain more skilled workers.

The next figure should frighten hon. members most of all. As a percentage of the Canadian work force, presently registered apprentices account for .6 per cent. If that does not indicate the need for drastic action, I do not know what does.

It is just not good enough in the eighties to rely on foreign countries to supply our skilled worker needs. I say this for two reasons. First, foreign skilled workers are no longer available. It is very difficult for a company in this country to obtain an adequate supply of skilled workers, even by going outside the country and offering very high wages. The economies of Europe, Japan and elsewhere are booming and they need their skilled workers. Second, it is no longer socially acceptable.

The government has estimated that we will need 500,000 immigrant skilled workers in the eighties. When that figure was released, my desk was filled with letters from constituents, mothers and fathers of children who have completed grade 12 and cannot get into a trade school or find employment. These people are up in arms, and I do not blame them. If we cannot train our young people to take the jobs that are available, something is badly lacking. Somebody is to blame. Someone is not doing his job.

One wonders about this tremendous need for skilled workers. Previous speakers have underlined this. Before the national energy policy was announced, it had been estimated that something in the area of $1.5 trillion would be spent on energy and the energy-related field in the eighties. I cannot imagine what $1.5 trillion is other than that it is $1,500 billion. In any event, that is a huge amount to be spent on oil, gas, coal and hydro projects.

The potential is staggering. The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) gave some of the figures with regard to the spin-off effects. It is in those fields that we need more highly qualified and skilled people.

The government's National Energy Program should not be called the NEP but the NED, "national energy disaster". That policy is so bad it makes one wonder whether it is a deliberate attempt by the Liberals to solve the problem of a shortage of skilled workers. What better way to solve the embarrassing problem of a skilled worker shortage? The NEP is doing that by depressing industry.

Statistics have been quoted about the effects of the NEP. I wish to place on record some statistics with regard to employment. There have been 154 drilling rigs and 84 service rigs leave Canada. By midsummer the total will reach 200. Of the remaining 400, 200 will be idle. According to my calculations, 20,000 jobs will have been lost. That is certainly one way of solving the shortage of skilled workers. However, it will not be acceptable to Canadians, particularly those in the west.

Even without the megaprojects, the employers council in British Columbia, in calculating the needs in that province for the next 20 years by surveying 46 major firms, calculated that 1,338 tradesmen will be required. There are only 577 apprentices in training.

I wish to quote some of the figures which are relevant and extremely interesting. In the years 1980-81-82, 82 diesel mechanics will be required in British Columbia. Only 16 are presently in training. There will be a requirement for 556 heavy duty mechanics, but only 174 are in training. Fifty-eight electronics technicians will be required and only three are in training. Surely those figures indicate how short Canada is of skilled workers. At the same time we have an unemployment rate of 7 per cent, 8 per cent or 9 per cent. These people are unable to find jobs.

We have failed badly to solve what should be a basic right in our society. We can fault the unions, the employers, industry and certainly the government. However, often the technical schools have produced the wrong product. For example, they have produced electricians when electricians were not needed. In other words, they were unable to keep up with the requirements of industry. This will probably be even more true in the future when requirements change more radically.

● (1600)

Unions, too, often are at fault for demanding full wages for those people who are under training. Certainly the employer bears a large responsibility for failure to train and to provide training programs for the industry in which they are involved. Most of all, probably governments are at fault, both provincial and federal. They foul up the whole process with bureaucratic red tape.

Let me give one example. In my own constituency we have complaints about the Unemployment Insurance Commission sending people to technical schools to take up the seats they have there in order that they can continue to get their unemployment insurance. They must do this in order to continue to get their benefits. Many times the people who are sent there are not the least interested in training in the jobs they have. They are merely taking up valuable seats which are in short supply in these technical schools, thus preventing people who are interested in getting an education from becoming skilled and getting out into the work force. Certaining the complexity of the problem is immense, and I think I would be the first to admit that.

I have quoted from this study before but it contains some interesting figures. It shows just how wrong governments have been in the past in the kind of approaches they have taken. Companies were asked in 1980: "Has your company an on-the-job training program?", and 71 per cent said they had. The companies were asked: "Has your company ever been in a position of not having sufficient or trained skilled workers?" and 76 per cent said, yes, that was true. They were also asked: "Do you believe your company or your particular industry could benefit from an on-the-job training program?", and this figure is most significant because it confirms what the chairman of the committee who just spoke before me said; 73 per cent said that on-the-job training was the best.

Here is another significant question: "Do you feel the education available from educational institutions could properly train employees in your business?"; 61 per cent answered no. They felt existing educational technical institutions were not capable of training the kind of people they wanted. That says a great deal for the lack of direction and the inability of our existing institutions to move with the times.

I have no objection to Bill C-67. It is a good bill and I think we should pass it. I do not treat it with the same enthusiasm as my seatmate did, the hon. member for Athabasca. I think it is a band-aid approach that is typical of this government. We have a very large problem, but I suppose when your leg is cut off and you are hemorrhaging it is better to have a band-aid than nothing at all.

I feel sorry for the chairman of the Committee on Employment Opportunities for the '80s who spoke ahead of me. Why is the government not paying attention to that committee? Why is the government not waiting until that committee reports? Why is the government not making a comprehensive plan to solve what obviously is one of the worst problems we have to face presently and in the future?

I think those are the kinds of questions that should be answered by the government. It is not good enough for the minister to say: Fine, we will deal with those problems later when the committee reports. He seems to be ignoring the committee and already downgrading what it is going to say by that process of bringing in this bill which deals only with part of the problem. There are obvious areas that have to be looked to and I do not understand why the government has not moved in those areas.

First of all, there should be better reporting and forecasting on both the supply and the demand side. Certainly the federal government is in a position, with its multitude of bureaucrats, its computers and all the other aids it has, to be able to forecast accurately what the supply is and is intended to be, and what the needs are in various parts of the country, so that we can feed this information to the various technical schools and they can gear up and be able to train and provide skilled workers at a time when those skilled workers are required.

What about the target groups that were mentioned earlier, the women and native people? Surely that is where we are going to get most of the additional skilled workers in our labour force. That is where the supply is and certainly the government should be able to move on that. This is nothing new. I have only been in this House for a short time but we have been talking about that since I came here. Does it take 18 months for the government to lay out a simple or a complex plan in order to involve these people, the women and natives who are very anxious to get into the work force and make a positive contribution to this country? I think not, if the government was at all interested, and I suggest it is not.

Finally, I think this government should remember that education and training is a provincial jurisdiction. The government would be very unwise to proceed with some of the powers it has under this legislation without the full and complete co-operation of provincial governments. Certainly provincial governments met recently and complained, as previous speakers have said, that there has not been enough consultation and co-operation between the various authorities, and too often the standards the federal government imposes on these training programs are in addition to and often in conflict with those placed by provincial governments.

As the previous speaker said, and I certainly agree with him, there has to be more company-employer involvement. He said 20 per cent of our skilled people are trained by industry as opposed to some 80 per cent in Europe. That is something we can no longer tolerate in this country. Industry will have to solve this problem. If it does not solve it, governments will have to help solve it, either with a carrot or a stick. One of the things I am sure industry fears, being involved in these programs, is the lack of confidentiality. Certainly no company is going to tell their competition what they expect in terms of required employees for the next five or ten years unless they can be assured that this is confidential information.

Those are a few of the things I wanted to speak to in reference to the bill. Again I say I will certainly support it but I express the hope that this government will treat this only as a very interim measure and get on with the problem of finding skilled people to fill the very many opportunities this country will present in the 1980s.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow will mark the seventh anniversary of my entry into this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: For much of that time I have been looking forward to speaking in this House on this very subject that we are dealing with today, because it is a subject which has very high priority, if not the highest priority in my own riding; that is, adult occupational training.

Last night the minister was good enough to refer to me in his speech. He said I was not too happy with one of the references in the bill, perhaps even more. I do very much welcome this bill; I think it is a step in the right direction. I am even more pleased to note that the minister recognizes it is only one step, because in order to get to a solution to the problem facing Canada today, particularly the problem of unskilled workers, the road is going to be very long indeed, and many steps will have to be taken.

My initial query about this bill can be found even in the title, or more particularly in the definition. The bill now defines an adult as a person whose age is at least one year greater than the regular school-leaving age in the province in which he resides. I shall refer only to the province with which I am most familiar, Ontario, where the school leaving age is 16. Therefore, according to this amending bill, a young adult would have to wait until he is 17 before taking advantage of occupational training. That is my main concern about this legislation.

Why do I stop at the age of 16? Mr. Speaker, a couple of months ago I was fortunate enough, with the tremendous co-operation of the Department of Employment and Immigration and my own local board of education, to initiate a program called the High School Dropout program, which I believe is the first of its kind of Canada. I did this because, like the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand), I was personally extremely disturbed about what seems to be an increasing number of functionally illiterate people begging for jobs. Perhaps not just jobs, but jobs which would pay enough to keep them and their families. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I looked at them and I could not blame the employers for not paying the wages they needed because they did not really merit them. They had nothing to offer the employer, and it was a tragedy.

Looking back over their past histories I realized that more of them in this category had left high school. So we started this high school dropout program in York South-Weston. In essence it is a very simple program. The beauty of it is that it hardly costs anything. What it does involve, though, is very special counselling, and this perhaps is a point which has not been stressed enough in the debate I have heard so far. It is one thing to train people, but before you do that I think the counselling has to be perfect. We can no longer afford to put square pegs in round holes. It has happened too often in the past. Only the counsellor can help find the trainees' real aptitude, so counselling must be absolutely excellent. There are many excellent counsellors in the department, but unfortunately they do not get the recognition they deserve.

The second thing I think we have to be careful of is the attitude of the trainees themselves. I am sure every member of this House has heard complaints from their corporate constituents to the effect: I do not want to hire any more of these people, they do not stay. Perhaps there is a little justification in that complaint.

However, what do you find on the other side of the coin, Mr. Speaker? Well, as an example, we had a youngster in my riding, aged 18, I think, who had been accepted for an on-the-job training program through the Department of Employment and Immigration. His desire was to be a carpenter and his aptitude tests showed he would make an ideal carpenter. He had a tremendous artistic streak in him, too. He would have made an excellent carpenter. So the government helped him with on-the-job training as a carpenter. What happened to him? The first day on the job he was given a finished table leg and told to screw it on the top of a finished table. That was his job on the first day, the second day and the third day. By the end of that week he could not stand it any more and quit.

Now, luckily we were able to help him there, too, because another project in my riding is called the York Home Repair Service, which I started. What do we do? We have three unemployed but skilled workers who teach their skills to six unemployed and unskilled workers, skills such as carpentry, painting, home decorating and minimum repair services. Once they have learned those skills they go out into the community, to senior citizens and low income workers, and they repair their homes free of charge. The home owner has to bear only the cost of materials. The experience these young people gain is terrific. So the youngster who was attaching finished legs to finished tables now makes his own tables and chairs. He can make doors and put them up. We have to give the youngsters this kind of incentive and train them properly.

As to the quality of training, the bill makes reference to this in clause 6(3) where it says there will be consultations between the commission, the employer and the person, group or association to decide the kind of course to be given. That is a good idea, Mr. Speaker, as far as it goes. However, is that all? Is there going to be a follow up? I am afraid of the abuse which can happen because it has in the past. We have had employers who have accepted incentives from the government to train or hire young people and they have used them as cheap labour without any thought of the consequences for the person involved. I gave you the example already of the youngster and the table legs and tables. This kind of thing has happened too often in the past and I think we have to be very careful to monitor the program so it does not happen in the future.

We should also be careful in the rationalization of this training. There is a Chinese proverb which says if you give a man a fish, you will feed him for one day; if you teach him to fish, you will feed him for a lifetime. That makes an awful lot of sense. However, I think we have to be careful to make sure there is enough water around for him to fish in. Here again there have been pitfalls. I believe on the east coast we trained hairdressers and barbers, too many to look after the population of a given town. This is what I mean when I talk about rationalization of these programs.

I also very much welcome the extended period over which the training program can be held. I have not heard in this debate one particular facet of the extension of this program, perhaps because the members who have spoken so far do not have the same kind of experience I have in Toronto. I have a riding which is blessed with constituents from about 61 different countries. Obviously not all of them are fluent in English or in French. I suppose in Toronto the most important language would be English. However, many of these people who come to Canada have a tremendous aptitude for the very skills we need. Our employment counsellors have verified that the aptitude is there. They perhaps know enough English to get by in a social environment. They can go to the supermarket and converse with their neighbours and what not, but what they are lacking so often, Mr. Speaker, is the jargon of the trade.

● (1620)

It has happened on countless occasions that people who would have made good electricians, mechanics and what have you, were stuck because they did not know the particular words in English for the machinery they were using. People in the medical profession experience a similar situation. They are trained in other countries and come here. Their scientific knowledge is perfect but their language requirements hold them back. When it comes to the definition of occupational training, as in clause 1 of the bill, I hope that the minister agrees to use the broadest possible definition so that people who would otherwise be perfectly willing and able to work in the trade would not be held back because of a lack of knowledge of the jargon of the trade.

Another project was recently started in my riding. I am delighted to say that it is being spearheaded from York South-Weston. It is a project to train women in non-traditional jobs. If I may, I should like to spend a little time on this. It is a subject which has not been discussed sufficiently in the House or perhaps even in the country at large.

When we speak of women in non-traditional jobs, we do so from a very pragmatic point of view. Up to now the government has spent a considerable amount of money training women—and I will stick to my own area because it is the one I know better—for traditional jobs, such as secretarial ones. This is fine. The women are well-trained, they learn, but many of them are single mothers. Unfortunately, at the end of the course the going wage for them will be the minimum wage. There is no mother who can afford to keep herself and her child in Toronto on the minimum wage. Therefore there has been a large attrition rate in this particular field. Women who have been trained in secretarial skills such as typing or whatever have had to abandon their skills at the end of the course when they found that they could not literally afford to work and had to go back to welfare. This is one problem we must face when we speak particularly of single mothers.

What is the solution? In my view there are two. One solution has been referred to very frequently on the west coast in Vancouver. It is a type of phased-in period so that the welfare payments would not be automatically cut off the moment the woman graduated from her training course. It would be phased in until such time as she earned enough to keep herself and her child, particularly for necessities such as medicines and so on which, as we all know, are covered at the moment by welfare. This is one idea. I brought it to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Begin). She was most sympathetic and promised to discuss it with her provincial colleagues.

However, I believe in most cases there is a better solution, and that is to train women in non-traditional jobs. Here again we are being very pragmatic because once they graduate from training in non-traditional jobs they will earn very much more than the minimum wage. Once we have said that, let us think of what is really happening.

As I said, the Department of Employment and Immigration agreed to start this pilot project in my riding. Obviously I wanted to help as much as possible. A few months ago I spoke with the area manager who told me that she had a little difficulty with a certain firm in the aerospace industry which, by the way, is doing rather well in Ontario at the moment. She told me that the difficulty was one of attitudes. She did not feel that the company was very co-operative or even very sympathetic to the idea of hiring women who would be trained by the federal government for non-traditional jobs in its plant. This struck her as shortsighted on the part of the company because it is dependent upon the government for its contracts.

However, I telephoned the manager of the company. I asked him if what I had heard was true, that he and his officials had been less than co-operative with the officials of the Department of Employment and Immigration. He blustered, he denied things for a long time, and eventually he said, "Of course, we must not practise inverse discrimination". We will have to tackle this point because it is one of the lamest excuses. It is a new one but it is still lame. Ever since the inception of this firm, even of the industry itself, discrimination has been practised. Only men were assembling aircraft until the Second World War, when men went out to shoot at others and women had to assemble planes. Is it not funny that no one complained at that time that women were making the planes?

Apart from that, inverse discrimination bothers me because it is so illogical. It is similar to complaining that the pendulum moves only to the right but never to the left and therefore the pendulum is discriminating whichever way it goes. The pendulum will have to swing again to the left in order to get back in the centre where it should be. If this is called inverse discrimination, then I welcome it because it is necessary.

I have heard other hon. members imply that we need the women because we do not have enough men. I do not think women would be too pleased to hear that kind of comment. We need women because they are a wealth of ability and capability. They are a rich resource which we have not tapped enough in the country. I do not want to hear "Yes, we will put women in the assembly line because we do not have enough guys". No, it would not do justice to women. Certainly it would not do justice to the calibre of work we want. It must be first-class all along.

This is the attitudinal problem which we face, sometimes in women themselves. It will take a tremendous amount of public education in order to get over it. But there is another problem when it comes to women in non-traditional jobs. I know some of my colleagues on both sides of the House have already referred to this fact. If we are speaking of women with family responsibilities, no woman I have ever met in my life can take training or do a proper job if she is not first convinced that her child is being properly looked after. Daycare is essential. It is not a hand-out. It is essential that the future generation of Canadians be properly looked after while infants.

I wish the minister were in the House. Perhaps he or his officials could reply to me later in writing. Clause 7 refers to the training allowance. It reads as follows:

> The Commission may pay to any adult who is being trained in an occupational training course described in section 5 a training allowance related to the family circumstances—

I would very much hope that these family circumstances would include the serious circumstances of children who need to be looked after while their parents take training.

• (1630)

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to rise to speak to Bill C-67. As I make my remarks I would like to relate to the House a number of experiences which have taken place in my riding in the last few days in this area.

Before I do that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by complimenting the previous speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mrs. Appolloni). It is not my desire to congratulate members opposite, but in this case I believe the parliamentary secretary has made points which any member of this House should pay attention to. I respect and applaud her for having made the points she did about daycare centres and about counselling, which I would like to come back to in a moment. I hope she has more luck in persuading her government of the wisdom of the daycare argument than opposition members have had up until now.

I suspect that she would not mind if I said to her, through you, Mr. Speaker, that one of the measures by which we will judge backbenchers in the Liberal party on this question is how effective they are in encouraging the government in the area of daycare.

Miss Bégin: It is up to provinces to take the initiative.

Mr. Bosley: Ministers of the Crown are already leaping to the defence of their backbenchers. After paying a compliment I receive hostility.

The parliamentary secretary was very careful not to name de Havilland. I take it from her remarks that it is the firm she was referring to. As she will remember, some of us raised that issue in the House about a year ago on behalf of one of the unions which was petitioning the government with regard to de Havilland's practices. The parliamentary secretary is not saying no to de Havilland, nor is she saying yes. Rather, she is laughing behind her hand and, therefore, I take it that de Havilland is the firm in question. I urge her to raise this issue again with other ministers, such as the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) who has some direct involvement with the employees of that company and who took almost no action at the time this issue was raised.

What happens in that company is a shame. To go even further than the hon. member has, the company appears to have a very direct and deliberate policy of steering women to secretarial jobs and away from jobs on the floor. I have said outside the House, and I will say it inside the House, that it is a most regressive and unfortunate policy.

We raised this issue in the House a year ago and, to my knowledge, nothing has been done about it directly by this government. It is a company which is largely funded by the government. I think the goverment has a major responsibility to demonstrate within companies it owns or funds what it believes should be good practice that all Canadian companies and employers should follow. If it will not set the example then it is in some difficulty when it criticizes others. I say this because I agree with the parliamentary secretary that this issue needs clearing up. I encourage her to continue pressing this issue, if only because we raised it.

I would like to come back to the valuable points made by the parliamentary secretary regarding special counselling by the department of manpower and relate a couple of stories which took place in my riding, since they reflect the difficulties which underlie this act. What seems to happen if you are good at counselling, which is an area quite distinct from training as the hon. member knows, is that you either have to leave the field because you are good at your work—and the only place you can find a substantial promotion is in the private sector—or you are promoted to a position where you are not really able to continue with the direct counselling of people who come to the department for help.

There does not seem to be the other kind of counselling in the department which is critical, which is the counselling of those who will do training assessments. That is a very important hole which needs to be filled. It does not make a lot of sense to have people who want to help the unemployed and those people who need help if they have not been given the proper tools and training in the counselling aspect of the job.

This point came home to me most clearly on Saturday morning when I was in my constituency office and met with a constituent of mine who is currently trying to gain entrance to one of the government's training courses. She knows the problem better than any of us since her career background is in social work, for which she holds a Bachelor of Arts degree. She now has the problem of trying to obtain work in the child care area, after six or seven years of working in that field, only to find that she has been passed over in favour of people with masters' degrees in social work—called MSW's in the trade. Therefore she must pursue a new career, which is unfortunate but which is also a reality.

Thus, she approached the department to see what was available to her and in order to obtain some assistance to determine what she might best be suited for. With her background in the area of counselling you can imagine her shock when she found that the counselling being offered her was inadequate. She related this to me at length, not because she felt the people in the department are poorly motivated or because their intentions are less than honourable, but because she believes that they have not been adequately trained to deal with people in her circumstances.

I now come to the second part of her dilemma. Having decided that she would like to pursue a second career in the area of secretarial sciences which is called word processing, she took the manpower tests for that course and completed them extremely successfully, as one would expect, only to discover two months later that the department was cutting back the program she had applied for. It would appear that, having been accepted into the course, she would have to wait an additional four months to receive the training which the government said it was trying to give her.

It is frustrating to be standing before you, Mr. Speaker, speaking to a bill which has the stated intention of improving training opportunities in Canada while knowing our constituents are having trouble gaining access to existing training programs. While the government says it is taking this course of action to improve the situation, at least in my riding in metropolitan Toronto where unemployment is substantial, it is cutting back on the available retraining programs. It is taking away seats from one of the approved community college courses, at least in the case I have referred to.

Further, it says that once you have chosen the college where you wish to take a course, if the seats are cut back at that college you may not reapply and be reassigned to a different college where seats are available because you have indicated your college of preference. Therefore, you must now wait to receive the training. Where this bill says that what we need is more flexibility, the practice is to create more inflexibility. The good words in the bill would appear not to be met on the ground that the people who are trying their best to deliver programs cannot do so because the strictures placed upon them by departmental rules are inflexible.

I would like to make this plea, through you, Mr. Speaker. I ask that these representations be taken into consideration by the committee at any time it is dealing with this measure. As a member of the committee I can certainly make a commitment that I will be raising these issues. I see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Dawson) is nodding that he might be interested in these areas. That is terrific.

As I indicated earlier, on the face of the bill there are a number of matters which are quite exciting and useful. As members will know, for some time one of the problems with retraining programs has been the effect that the payments under retraining have been roughly the equivalent of payments made under unemployment insurance. The bill proposes to increase the allotment for retraining. Let us assume that what seems inevitably to happen with this government will not happen in this case. Let us hope that next year the government will not introduce a bill to increase the unemployment insurance allotment because this year it increased the training allotment. Let us hope that the spread between training and being unemployed, which is presumably to produce an incentive to undergo training—if one believes the government's press releases—will be continued. I believe that is an important point. What is before us is good.

The bill proposes to grant more flexibility to the government in choosing who will be eligible for training and benefits, and in what areas and industries. It reintroduces the usual problem in that at least areas and industries will be designated by the governor in council and not by Parliament or a parliamentary committee. If you look at those areas and industries which qualify, it is amazing the resemblance they bear to ridings held by certain Liberal cabinet ministers. There does seem to be this parallelism which goes on whenever the government brings in this kind of a program, and that is a problem. The idea of the act is to help. We would hope that the help in the act is available across the country where there is a need, and is not simply based on whether one's representative is in the cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bosley: Equally, the bill proposes, significantly, to end the limitation which has existed whereby the training programs have only been available for one year. Those who have been involved in this know that sometimes it is necessary to go on longer than a year simply because, as we become an increasingly complex world, the training program takes longer than a year; and that is welcome.

Having described what I think is relatively good, and having indicated that I do believe the bill, while cosmetic in its actual impact, is nevertheless a move in the right direction, there are some matters I want to put on record as being worrisome in the sense that the bill still does not get at them.

Most significantly, as has been previously mentioned, hon. members will know there is a task force meeting now called Employment Opportunities for the '80s. Its members, I gather, to a man and a woman, are opposed to this legislation at this time, and I can understand why. It is because the whole argument about training relates ultimately to the ability of the government to forecast well. There are very real reasons to criticize the government for its forecasting in the past, and yet we are faced with a bill to enter into the training area at a time when the task force on what we ought to be training for has not reported. Therefore, I suspect we will have to see a complete revamping of the government's ability to target for training purposes as a result of that report.

It might have been better if the initiative had waited so that it could take into account all of those things, since the track record in this area is that it takes a long time to get the government to move in training areas. It would, therefore, seem to me that the government is likely to use this initiative as an excuse. What it will say when it does implement the task force recommendations quickly will be, "It is okay, we did a little for you last year with these changes". If that becomes an excuse or is used as a reason to justify not proceeding with what good recommendations do come out of the task force, then we will be back on our feet to say, "We told you at the time that this does not replace a good training program", which we hope will be recommended.

Equally significant is that we continue, as far as I can tell, to have in this bill a provision which allows the government to announce its training initiatives and programs without automatic or necessary resort to consultation with the provinces. The possibility continues to exist that a program will be announced and implemented, and the province consulted after the fact as to whether it was useful. That is a shame. Indicative as it is of this government's attitude toward provincial consultation, which is more evident in other areas which are before this House or may be before this House shortly, it is still, in this case, a shame.

If I can again cite an example of the kind of quandary one gets into when there is not the kind of adequate consultation which should go on, I have a constituent who is desperately attempting to find someone to help him in the particularly innovative area of spot welding. The provincial government has advised the federal government, I gather, that that area should be one of the areas subject to training funds. It is not but should be.

The case could most easily be put this way. This particular constituent applied through manpower for someone to fill this job for eight weeks, as is his right and as is his obligation before he can go anywhere else to find someone. Having done that, having indicated that there was someone from outside the country who could fill the job and do the work which needs to be done in our area, having tried to find a Canadian, the department said, after the fact, "No, we are not going to let you bring anyone in to fill your job need, which may produce more wealth in your area; we would prefer that you train someone." When this man turned around and asked whether there is one of these subsidies to train, the answer was no. The federal government says that that is not an area of need.

That is the kind of problem one runs into when one is dealing with the government and its forecasting ability. When employers take to the government specific areas of job need for which they cannot find people, there seems to be some reluctance to accept what the private sector says is a job need as opposed to what the statistics say is a job need.

I might point out an example found in Toronto. I use this example gently because I do not want to offend any of the people in the florist business. However, one of the programs which is currently regarded by the department as being in demand, and therefore subsidizable, is one which shows up on the form as "floral design". I should say that when I first saw it on the list it reminded me of those of us who went through college in the last 15 or 20 years in the country, which is what the government told us we ought to do in order to get a job. Even if we did so by taking courses in basket weaving or other things, that was okay. A degree was going to get us a job. That was the government's forecast 15 years ago, and it is now showing up as being disastrous. I am therefore suspicious whenever I see a government list of occupations there will be a demand for, so I called. No one can tell me where that demand is; no one can yet tell me how many people are needed in it; and no one so far has been able to tell me why it is on the list. That is a little worrisome when one is being asked to support this kind of program.

Therefore, I believe that while we may not have the perfect system when we rely on provincial forecasting, at least it is a component of the forecasting system which is somewhat closer to the ground, in real need, than Ottawa. I hope we will see a reliance on provincial forecasting rather than the apparent ability in this bill to get around it.

If I might put on the record some of the problems which exist in that area, probably a report which would be of interest to anyone concerned with this subject is an Economic Council report called the Betcherman report, which deals with these figures and lists some of the existing situations where the government has said it knows what we need to spend money for and what the realities are. Perhaps some hon. members might be interested in some of these numbers.

Effectively, what the report would seem to say is that in the past funds have been spent in a relatively haphazard manner and not targeted to specific skills which are needed in certain locations, which is what should be done. For instance, the most critical shortages are in product fabricating and repair, machining and science engineering, but training is seldom targeted to meet those needs.

These are some examples. Product fabricating and repair accounts for 22.3 per cent of the shortages in Canada, but only 19.4 per cent of training programs, and only 27 per cent of those programs are government funded, according to that report. Equally, according to the report, machining personnel, who account for approximately 32 per cent of the government assistance today, account for 13.4 per cent of the shortage in Canada, and only 8.8 per cent of the training programs. Science and engineering workers, the third highest need group, account for 12.2 per cent of the shortage and yet only 5.9 per cent of the training programs, and less than 17 per cent of the total government aid. In other words, as the Betcherman report pointed out, groups for which we actually have a shortage are not adequately perceived by the government, and we do not get a proper response to the facts of the real world.

Sometimes—and this is a matter that the bill does not address—we find we are training in the wrong skills, or we are not even training enough in the skills which are needed. That, unfortunately, often winds up with lowering the employment standards for workers already in the force, and therefore often puts people in a position whereby they are competing for jobs which are already filled as opposed to filling jobs which are vacant in industries which need help; and a whole series of problems can arise from that.

Finally, let me return to the view which I think many of the hon. members on this side of the House will be presenting, which is a view which most of us hold. I believe we will be supporting this bill, from everything that I can see, not because it is a major initiative in the area, and not because it solves the training problems of the adult unemployed in Canada, but because it goes a little way toward producing some more flexibility if the department chooses to implement it. This is critical—if the department chooses to implement it. It would give some more opportunity and incentive to those who are unemployed to choose to take training work.

However, we hope—and this will be the plea, I believe, of those of us who have been in this area for some time—that the government will take seriously its stated goals toward employment development and that it will take seriously the recommendations when they come from the Employment Opportunities Task Force. As I said earlier, I hope that we will not, as I fear, receive any claims from the other side, here or in public terms, that the government has provided, through this bill, a major and sufficient initiative in the area of adult training. Because it clearly is not that. It is an important but small matter. I hope it is understood by hon. members opposite and by the minister that it is in that vein that those of us who rise to support the bill do so, in order to remind him that we expect better from the government. We will continue to press for that.

• (1650)

Mr. Bruce Lonsdale (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak in this debate on the amendments to the Adult Occupational Training Act. As a member of the task force on Employment Opportunities for the '80s, I had a unique opportunity to travel across the country and listen to the views and concerns of many Canadians with respect to the manpower training programs, the employment programs in the Canada employment centres that have been established by the government to assist unskilled and unemployed individuals to find better jobs and get better training.

As a result of the hearings, I have become aware of the importance of these amendments to our training policies. As the task force nears the end of its mandate, all its members have arrived at a deep interest in any changes in the policies that provide Canada with the skilled workers necessary for the continuation of our economic advancement into the next decade.

The task force has heard from hundreds of concerned groups of employers, workers and educators over the last year. Most have called for changes in the way which the federal government funds and oversees training programs now in existence in Canada. This experience has made me aware of the pressing need for fundamental revisions in our educational and training programs.

These experiences have made members of the task force aware that the present Adult Occupational Training Act is inadequate. There has to be more flexibility in the program to allow employers and employees to benefit from training programs with a minimum of red tape and administrative hassle. This bill now before the House represents a good beginning in the process of reform.

With the determined and co-operative efforts of all parties in this House and our provincial counterparts, we will be able to provide all Canadians with a secure and prosperous future. We all know that the supply of skilled workers is fundamental to our national economy. No one can argue against that point. We are all aware that the apprenticeship and training programs now in existence do not adequately meet our present demands, let alone those of the future.

In order for the economy to expand, we have to stress the importance of new technologies. These advancements will require skilled workers to see them carried out. We must have skilled workers in order to become more competitive in the marketplace; we must manufacture better products and be able to supply, to sell, and create new markets which will expand our economy and make more job opportunities. We have to be able to provide the manpower necessary for an adaptable economy, and therefore we have to have a labour pool which has the basic skills for any job as well as the skill levels to be readily adaptable to new employment requirements and opportunities. We cannot continue to rely on temporary solutions and catch-up measures in our employment policies and we certainly cannot continue to rely on offshore workers. Therefore, we must have a comprehensive skills training act which will eliminate the double-edged problems of high unemployment and skilled labour shortages.

There has to be a strong national manpower policy which will begin to eliminate regional manpower imbalances. This policy has to have clearly defined goals, aimed at ending shortages in some fields and surpluses in others. What is needed is a flexible set of solutions. The federal government has to lead the way.

I concede, Mr. Speaker, that many of the problems have arisen as the result of poor planning on the part of the government and its inflexibility in the past. Problems have also arisen because of the approach of provincial government educational institutions to higher education and their emphasis on post-secondary education. Wherever the fault lies, it is clearly indicated that the federal government must take the lead.

The bill under consideration today is but one step in this direction, and I believe it is a step in the right direction. The basic aim of Bill C-67 is to provide the federal government with the flexibility necessary to increase access to, and availability of, training programs. Any new program has to account for the fact that not all skilled trades can be learned in 52 weeks. Therefore, Bill C-67 provides for increased allowances for courses which last over one year. Not all training programs will last this long, as some skilled trades can be learned in the period now allowed by old regulations. This new extended length provision will allow Canadian workers to train for skills which demand more comprehensive training programs and training time.

Another welcome provision which has been included in Bill C-67 is the one where, under certain conditions, funding can be made available for training programs not available in Canada. This will allow a number of Canadian workers to train outside the country and then return home with the knowledge to implement these learned skills in national production. Our training policies and programs will then have the ability to reproduce newer technologies in Canada.

It is very important in the field of resource development that as new and innovative approaches are taken in other countries, Canadian industry, particularly in the forestry and mining sectors, is able to send abroad some of their better workers to be trained in new technologies for processing and timbering. The companies would then have better trained workers and this would raise productivity levels. This change, to allow employees to go outside the country for upgrading and higher skills does not question the capabilities of our Canadian schools; rather, it broadens our capabilities, which are presently footed on a strong base, to meet the needs of the future.

One of the major criticisms of the training programs that we heard as we travelled across the country concerned our young people having to wait a full year after leaving school before they qualify for training programs. Bill C-67 includes provisions whereby funding schemes will become more responsive to the needs of Canadian industries. With this provision, the employment commission could waive this condition and allow a number of young people to enter the training system without a long wait. As a result, skilled workers will enter the job market earlier and this will provide the incentive for more pre-employment training in our schools.

Another example of this bill's flexibility is the fact that it allows the employment commission to channel funding to areas where there is a demonstrated skill shortage. This is the kind of flexibility that a great number of submissions to the task force recommended. Not all of the new amendments deal with young people. In order to eliminate the possibility of older workers losing their jobs because of plant shutdowns and redundancy, Bill C-67 allows the commission to fund training programs to update their skills. This will eliminate one of the major problems the economy faces with respect to loss of skilled workers or not having them available for better training or being unable to train our young people.

The most important aspects of Bill C-67 are the provisions which will eliminate some of the red tape which until now has stopped a large number of firms from beginning training programs. A recent survey showed that only 20 per cent of all firms have training of any sort. In that same survey it was reported that only 15 per cent of all employees in Canada have received any training at all. This tragic situation has to be eliminated.

This bill will eliminate to some extent the red tape which caused some smaller firms to create an administrative job just to fill out the forms required to receive grants. I believe the bill will reduce this bureaucratic red tape and create incentives for smaller companies to apply for grants under the act so that they may provide more training opportunities for their workers and thus supply more skilled workers.

By providing for flat-rate payments to industries and fixed-rate payments to the provinces, most of the guess work has been taken out of the system. All the small employer has to do is ensure that the programs meet the criteria set out in the regulations and apply for reimbursement. This is especially important to the smaller firms which cannot afford the administrative costs required under the old regulations.

Besides allowing for less administrative work for companies when applying for funds, the act allows the commission to enter into contracts with persons other than employers for the creation of training programs.

As we travelled across the country, we heard that some private businessmen are better able to train individuals than the local institutions or the local major employer. I think the new provisions will give some skilled people who want to go into the private marketplace the opportunity to sign contracts at Canada employment centres to train individuals where and when they are needed. It will not always be necessary to rely on the local employer to do so. This will enable Canadian workers to train for new jobs in areas where there is a demonstrated shortage.

Therefore, these amendments provide the federal government with the flexibility to meet the changing employment market. Companies will have greater incentive to begin training programs, employees will see the benefits of learning new skills, and our young people will begin to have a clearer picture of their future in the Canadian job market.

● (1700)

In conclusion, I believe these amendments are a good start. They open the door to a serious re-evaluation of our total training programs. I know that some members opposite have some concern that this bill should be delayed until the employment task force has an opportunity to present its report and to have its recommendations embodied in the amendments to Bill C-67. Indeed, the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley), who spoke before me, presented that very argument; he did not want to see the government use Bill C-67 as the excuse to put an end to its proposed changes to the Adult Occupational Training Act. For the benefit of the hon. member for Don Valley West, I shall quote from the speech made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) last night. As reported at page 11239 of Hansard, we read:

> Some hon. members have asked me for the assurance that passage of this legislation will not close the door to further changes in training legislation after the studies have been considered. I am pleased to offer those assurances. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, the amendments introduced in debate on second reading are simply the prelude to a much wider range of changes that must take place.

I intend to take the minister at his word. I hope that this bill will receive third and final reading. But I want to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the passage of Bill C-67 will not, and should not, be considered the end of the government's initiatives in manpower training policies. Other members of the Task Force on Employment Opportunities for the '80s and myself will continue to push for changes once our report is released some time this summer. That report will include a wide range of recommendations. Some of those recommendations will be simple administrative changes that will be necessary and will have to be implemented by the department. Other changes will be more drastic, and perhaps even of an alarming nature. I think I can speak for many members of the task force in saying that we intend to see that those recommendations are listened to and carried out by the government.

Therefore, I welcome these amendments. But I wish to remind this House that these amendments can only be considered as a preliminary step towards a total re-examination, and re-evaluation of programs as well as a complete redirection of Canada Manpower programs and human resource planning in this country.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski)—Aviation safety—Curtailment of air traffic control services at Calgary International Airport (b) Shortage of air traffic controllers; the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn)—Post Office—Timing of Parliament taking summer recess—Effect on postal strike (a) Effect of strike on small business (b) role of Postmaster General; the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie)—Health and Welfare—(a) Status of Robertshaw study of child fatalities caused by parental neglect (b) responsibility centre for children.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

ADULT OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING ACT (NO. 2)

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy that Bill C-67, to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act (No. 2), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate on Bill C-67, to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act, which proposes a number of amendments to this act that are very much needed and have been a long time in coming.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) in his opening remarks on this bill yesterday said, as reported on page 11239 of Hansard:

> The bill we are studying today has three basic goals. The first is to simplify the administration of the Adult Occupational Training Act and to eliminate much of the unnecessary paper work that small businessmen in particular must face in developing industrial training on the shop floor.

That particular amendment is welcomed by me and I am quite sure it will be advantageous to small businessmen in the administration of this act. The minister went on to say:

> Second, we want to make the act more flexible so that it will respond to the variety of needs in the training area.

As I read those words of the minister, I see as usual he is full of hope that these measures will go a long way to solve not only our skills problems but also our unemployment crisis. I was rather interested to hear the previous speaker say, once again on behalf of the government, that this program is not a program to end all programs in terms of job creation, but is simply just the beginning in a long process.

I have been here for some 18 months and I followed the debate in this House rather closely prior to coming here. It seems to me the government is always making statements like that but it never does anything in a concrete way about any job-creation programs, at least in the long term.

While the minister was on his feet yesterday, in recognizing the changes in our society being brought about by technological change, he said:

> While service work—work in the areas of public administration, clerical, management, health services, education and others—was the major stimulus for growth in the last two decades, it will increasingly decline as a supplier of jobs in Canada.

In the next paragraph the minister said:

> We must promote the integration of women, native people and disadvantaged workers in a larger field of employment. We must train more workers in skilled trades and occupations. We must help the workers already on the labour market to learn new skills without undue difficulties.

While amendments to this act have been a long time coming and are welcome, I think the minister is dreaming if he believes that these amendments will solve both our unemployment problem and the lack of skills training in our work force.

Approximately 7.1 per cent of our population, or over one million Canadians, are unemployed. Close to half a million young people under the age of 24 are without work, and it is estimated that 50 per cent of those have less than a grade 10 education.

In the over-all scheme of things, the most that can be said of this bill is that it will improve the present inadequate legislation, but without additional policies it is simply a continuation of the government's cosmetic approach to these deep-rooted problems.

I find it interesting that the minister can wax so eloquently about the virtues of these amendments in terms of doing something concrete about the serious lack of skills training, when he knows, as do the unemployed, that there are simply very few jobs available in the marketplace. I would have been much more impressed had the minister come forward and told us that he recognized the very real problems we have and that he would present to the House an over-all strategy to solve them. But the minister has not done that. All he has done is forward some improvements to an inadequate piece of legislation which, even though welcome, do very little to treat the whole problem.

Surely the time has come for the government to recognize that we cannot seriously discuss the present lack of occupational skills training without talking about a full employment strategy. I suggest, as some members on the government side have suggested, that you cannot at this time in our history continue to ignore the needs for integrated strategies to treat the serious problems we face as a country and as a nation. In my view, you cannot talk in a serious way about job training without talking about industrial strategy. You cannot talk about an industrial strategy without talking about an economic strategy and a social policy strategy. I say that for a few reasons.

Earlier in my remarks I spoke about the general unemployment problem. However, the hidden unemployment figure is closer to 1.25 million. We do not include in this group of Canadians out of work another element in our society. I am referring to people who are considered to be disabled or handicapped in our society. They are not regularly included in the unemployment figures, neither the seasonally adjusted nor the actual figures.

I was a member of the Special Committee on the Disabled and Handicapped which recently tabled its report in the House. The report itself points out that while we have something like 2 million Canadians who are considered to be disabled or handicapped, or 10 per cent of the population, out of that group there are 700,000 disabled Canadians who are considered to be employable. In that particular segment of the population there is an unemployment rate estimated to run between 70 per cent and 80 per cent. The committee viewed this so seriously that, out of the 130 recommendations it made in that report, 19 centred on the unemployment problem.

While there are numerous problems faced by disabled Canadians that able-bodied Canadians are faced with, such as housing, education, transportation, recreation, communications and unemployment, none of these problems can be separated from the others. One is synonymous with another. If you want to provide people who are disabled and presently in institutions with adequate accommodation, transportation and access to educational facilities, you have to provide them with the means to do that. That is why the committee placed such emphasis on employment opportunities. Even with the special employment program which the minister brought forward earlier this year that was supposedly directed toward disabled Canadians, it is generally recognized within the disabled community that that program will do very little, if anything, to provide those who are disabled with jobs, particularly those who are physically handicapped.

The minister talks about the amendments to this act doing something in a very real way to provide employment opportunities or skills training opportunities to disabled and handicapped Canadians. He is kidding the troops, he is kidding himself, but he certainly is not kidding the disabled and the handicapped, and he is not kidding me. The amendments in this bill will not do anything for those who are disabled and require an upgrading in skills training. For the minister to make those kinds of statements is, as I said earlier, kidding the troops.

Mr. Orlikow: He is good at that.

Mr. Young: As my friend from for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) says, he is good at that, but he has not been so good recently, especially among women's groups, which is another area I want to talk about.

While the minister seems to recognize that society is changing very rapidly in terms of skills as applied to traditional jobs, there is an area that will change even more rapidly than it has up to this point. This is the area of clerical work, which will change rapidly as a result of electronic applications. For example, the impact of the microchip on the industrial work environment will have major repercussions on the structure of the work force as we presently know it. There is justified concern that those most likely to bear the brunt of the inevitable change will be those working in information processing occupations, and particularly in service industries. A West German study predicted that 40 per cent of office work could be eliminated within ten years. A French report forecast that 30 per cent of bank employees could be redundant within the same period. In Britain, a study predicted 25 per cent unemployment by 1990.

How fast the changes impact are a source of disagreement, but most experts agree that certain jobs will become redundant as new, relatively inexpensive machines with computing functions, such as word processors, do the work faster and more efficiently than the people now holding the jobs.

There is no consensus on whether more jobs will be created or lost, but women will probably face the brunt of it more quickly. Women are concentrated in clerical, sales and service jobs involving the straight handling of information, and it is these jobs that will be transformed. About 80 per cent of Canadian working women are in the service-producing sector of the economy. One and a half million women—34 per cent of working women—are employed in clerical jobs alone. In federal government secretarial work, the percentages go as high as 90 per cent. Therefore, jobs traditionally held by women are expected to suffer disproportionately from the microelectronics revolution.

The problem is predicted to be not so much displacement as much as a tendency not to hire the additional person. Attrition will also play a part. For example, with the introduction of the electronic switchboard, the number of operators on toll boards in Toronto dropped to 664 in October, 1978, from 1,048 in September, 1977. I understand that that work force has been reduced even more dramatically from the 1977 figure. But there were no lay-offs as such, partly because the turnover rate of operators is extremely high.

The changes are almost certain to create a skills gap. Some existing jobs will be downgraded as machines take over computing and sorting functions. When word processors were introduced in a large Calgary firm, the secretaries were freed of 50 per cent of their usual workload. At the same time, jobs created by the new industry will require more skill and aptitude.

Extensive retraining may be necessary for women if they are to get their fair share of the new employment. Without retraining, women may well end up in the lower paying jobs. For example, women tend to fill the minimum wage production line jobs in the high technology firms in the Ottawa area. Women are underrepresented as computer progammers, analysts, accountants and engineers, among other occupations where computers are expanding employment opportunities.

Observations noted in "Women and the Chip" included the fact that, at the clerical occupation level, labour requirements are seemingly being reduced in the following ways. First, there has been a reduction in the clerical steps involved in handling, processing, storing and distributing information. Second, there has been an erosion of the labour component of clerical functions. Third, there is a telescoping of the supervisory and low level administrative requirements.

At the specialist and professional occupation levels, labour requirements are seemingly being intensified in the following ways. First, automation of the clerical and administrative detail content of the job; and second, escalation of the job's scope and potential with computer aids, such as computer modelling and data processing.

Several dangers were identified in "Women and the Chip". Among them were the following. If women continue to be concentrated in clerical positions and if these continue to be usurped by automation, by 1990, if present trends continue, they could contribute substantially to the unemployment rate. The skills difference between clerical and technical-professional occupations could widen to the point of certain discontinuity between the two levels if present trends continue. If women are not able to bridge the occupational gap, industry could face a severe skills shortage in the specialist-professional occupations.

There is a need for immediate policy action on a number of fronts, such as training programs and educational leave opportunities, to enable women to acquire the necessary understanding of computer technology and the skills to make computers enhance their work and employment opportunities, instead of the reverse.

We need occupational bridging and other mobility programs, preferably giving legal clout in affirmative action agreements, which are necessary to ensure that women gain access to occupations being enhanced by computer technology. There is a need for health and safety concerns, such as stress, eye strain, back problems and the possibility of radiation exposure.

The federal government has been very slow to respond appropriately to the coming crisis. Most women taking manpower training courses continue to be slotted into secretarial and clerical classes, the very occupations which are going to be hit hardest by technological change. Entrance rates by women into non-traditional courses have been very slow and sparse, and part of the problem is the stereotyped bias of manpower counsellors who need some counsciousness-raising courses. The present training allowances, in my view, are a joke. As of August, 1979, the dependant care allowance of $10 per week per dependant was limited to a maximum of $40 per week.

In my view, manpower training courses must expand their shopping list to reflect predicted job vacancies and must offer incentives so women represent at least half the enrolment in these courses. Ancillary amenities, such as the training allowance, must more realistically reflect real cost so they do not serve as a deterrent to women trying to upgrade their job skills.

The federal public service should offer retraining to its employees, free of charge and during working hours. Women who have to pay for a class and daycare, plus add a third job to the two they already hold in the paid labour force and in household tasks, are unlikely to pursue more responsibility.

Affirmative action must be expanded throughout the federal public service and should be enforced through contract compliance with the private sector. The federal government does $11 billion worth of business with private firms. It should use this clout to ensure the removal of barriers to career development for women and to systematically ensure better access to employment possibilities.

Finally, the number of women's Outreach projects should be substantially increased, since they focus on the particular needs of women. Only by careful planning can the impact of microtechnology on women in the work force be cushioned. Retraining and occupational bridging can mitigate the coming skills gap if programs are started today. The federal government must start concrete action now to ensure that the wave of new technology does not break on the backs of women in the labour force.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few comments on Bill C-67. I listened with interest to other speakers and I will not be able to speak with the eloquence of members who were on the task force. I listened to the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Lonsdale), the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) and the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young) who were on the committee. They made some very important comments regarding this legislation.

I also think it is important that we deal with something that in our brief period of government we wanted to encourage and use more than had been used in the past. That was a system of encouraging members to be part of a task force. Members of Parliament could use their talents to study important issues in this nation, to build upon those studies recommendations which would be presented to Parliament, not just to the minister for his use or non-use, but to Parliament, so that members of Parliament would have these words of wisdom through a study done by members of Parliament elected by the people of this nation to assist in their government.

What we see happening with this bill is that it is before us before the parliamentary task force has reported to Parliament. This, in my opinion, does not make a lot of sense. If we place some value in the report that is coming forward, surely this type of legislation should wait for the advice of that task force. Then the measure could be altered in those areas where recommendations are made.

We started the procedure. We had four task forces set up. They were passed by Parliament, given a chairman and members to work on a number of topics, including volunteers, the disabled. We anticipated something on nuclear policy. We had task forces on branch line abandonment and emergency grain movement legislation. Two of those committees were able to report and those reports had a significant impact on what government did in those areas. This gave us as members of Parliament some encouragement that we had some value in this place. When we participate on standing committees we often find, more often than not, that the minister and the government are not prepared to accept any amendments from members of Parliament from other parties, or even their own party. They decide that the bureaucrats who advise the minister, and the minister who has put his stamp of approval on a bill, know all and there shall be no changes. That is why we get so frustrated as we participate in the standing committees and witness our inability to improve legislation; and it is why we have to move many amendments in this House at the report stage. We do not feel we have been given adequate hearing at the committee, or adequate hearing in the country through the only means many of us have, and that is the news media.

I heard the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) stating on "Question Period", I believe, a television show on Sunday, that he was concerned about Bill C-57 which came before the House with over 100 amendments. I say we are all concerned about that, but this concern results from a feeling, on the part of opposition members in particular, that we are not given an adequate hearing in committee, that the government is too inflexible and, therefore, we have to bring these amendments to the floor of the House, putting them before this chamber so we may get a little assistance from the people of this nation as a whole. That is why the system of task forces is so important to this House of Commons.

As I read the excellent reports on the disabled and handicapped, on North-South relations, the proposed trading corporation and hopefully soon in this area—I understand the task force will report some time this summer—I note adequate studies have been done with very important recommendations being made. These are recommendations the government should be encouraged to accept, maybe not in whole but in good part. This would serve the country well.

I remember serving on a task force on emergency grain transportation and the government accepted the majority of the recommendations. That was the only light we have seen in western Canada regarding grain transportation for a good number of years. I would like to encourage the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to begin to deal with that very quickly as we see a very good crop being produced on the prairies, but no initiative being taken by the government to obtain hopper cars and other rail facilities to move that crop.

That is an example, and we had the example of the branch line abandonment study, which was accepted by this government, put into place and which served the farmers of western Canada very well. We now come to this task force which will be reporting this summer, but we have before us a bill to deal with the very subject that committee is studying and are without its advice. I really think that is not advisable and actually is flying in the faces of members of Parliament who are serving on that task force.

The previous speaker spoke of the need of the governments of this nation to deal with the decades of the 1980s and 1990s. We are moving rapidly into the era of the computer and the robot, which have the capacity to displace people from the work force. It has been said in a number of studies I read recently that many people in the next two decades will have to change their occupation, some as many as ten times. A wage earner with one skill becomes a little apprehensive of this kind of study because he is concerned that maybe he will not have the kind of skills necessary if his job becomes redundant or is lost to new technology or competition. That is why this bill or one like it is important, because we have to encourage our people to train and retrain.

It is also important that the provincial and federal government co-operate in providing the kind of education which will prepare our young people for retraining and for accepting new challenges beyond what they can now envision. Movie theatres are doing an excellent job of showing what is ahead of us. Some of it is very speculative, but I think it shows that the computer and space technologies, which have provided a tremendous number of innovations to the industrialized world, really can influence the work habits and jobs available to our citizens.

Now, I look at my province of Alberta which has just announced that a $100 million training centre will be built. The two centres we have, one in Calgary and one in Edmonton, which teach skills to young and old alike in the technical trades, are inadequate because of the demand in western Canada for skilled labour. We also have a community college which is doing an excellent job. So this announcement is an excellent initiative, but obviously even by the time it comes on stream it will probably be inadequate to meet the demand for the kind of projects envisioned in western Canada. In the past, when megaprojects such as the Syncrude project have been proposed, labour had to be imported from across the country to meet the need. Well, this time, if we approve two additional projects larger than Syncrude, will we be able to supply the skilled labour necessary and at the same time supply the petrochemical plants and the needs of the rest of the nation? I speak only of the needs of industry in Alberta because I am familiar with it. I refer to the pipelines, the new types of welding and the new types of skills needed for deep drilling which are much different than in the past.

What I am attempting to say is that not only does our province need to provide this kind of assistance, perhaps other provinces do as well, and the federal government must co-ordinate and assist in areas such as secondary education and on the job training. Members have stated that in the nations of Europe which have had more experience in this area about 80 per cent of job training is done by the companies. They consider it an investment in the future. Here in Canada only 25 per cent of our skilled trades people are trained here. I suppose in the past we have been dependent a good deal on immigration. We have stated a need; if we could not fill it here, we went abroad and tried to attract people. Often this was done to the dismay of these countries because many of them could not afford to lose these skilled people.

So far as training of our own people is concerned, there are two groups we have really overlooked. Those two groups are native people and women. I think women could be very much affected by new technology. Whether we like it or not, many women in this nation are employed in secretarial and clerical jobs which in the future may largely disappear.

Now, these two groups can benefit from retraining and we must prepare ourselves for that. When I looked at this bill in preparation for speaking on it, I was not very encouraged. When I look at my constituency in Alberta, and when I look at a government bringing in reasonably good legislation, I see the same government bringing forward legislation which, at the same time, is driving skilled people out of my constituency and my province. My constituency happens to produce a good amount of Canada's conventional oil. When things were going well a couple of years ago, many Canadian entrepreneurs, people who had learned their skilled trades from the large oil companies—which seem to have such a dismal image at the present time, companies such as Imperial Oil, Shell Canada, Gulf Canada and so forth—decided it was time to grab hold of this industry. They went out and expanded industrial parks, built their own facilities and began to challenge these companies or to work with them in a farm-out type of operation. In fact, for many of them their life's blood was a farm-out to a large oil company so the land they bought for the province could be drilled. Then along came the NEP and the government destroyed 40 per cent of the budget of these companies and literally killed many of those struggling new entrepreneurs in my riding who were attempting to make their way in this industry.

As of June 17 we have lost 150 rigs to the United States with a resulting 20,000 unemployed. We have 221 rigs working in Canada and 237 which are not. I was talking to a friend of mine on the weekend who is involved in the trucking industry. He said that basically in the last two months he has hardly moved anything at all. His whole business was trucking rigs into the northern part of the province. What I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that here we have a bill to retrain individuals, yet we are sending our skilled people to the United States, those who were learning their trades and teaching others. I am sure the United States are very pleased. They realize how important it is to have energy self-sufficiency and not be at the whim of some foreign government. They are very encouraged by our sending people down there.

This bill says that areas and industries have also been designated by the governor in council for increased assistance of up to 70 per cent of income for individuals entering apprenticeship. They listed the automotive assembly industry in Windsor, primary metals in Sydney and the shipbuilding industry. We may well need that in our province, if we ever get the two governments together, to retrain individuals in the oil industry because we are losing them to the United States.

● (1740)

I should like to refer to the numbers of people who are being lost in my own constituency where a study of 41 companies was undertaken. They conducted a poll to which 41 companies responded. The summary showed that total sales for 1980 dropped from $225 million to $218 million. This was in 1980 when the budget was first announced. Approximately $38 million was lost in that little area. It is forecast that in 1981 there will be a drop from $277 million to $174 million worth of work. This is a loss of $102 million in a few companies in my riding. This can be projected because in that area there are some 300 or 400 companies involved in this business. Also the study indicated a loss of 255 jobs because people had moved with the rigs to the United States, as well as a loss of 173 jobs in branch and field operations.

If this is projected to other areas of the province such as Drayton Valley, Brooks, Red Deer and so forth, it is a phenomenal amount of lost expertise, skilled labour and capital, all of which we need desperately in the country. They have been lost to other countries because of our policy—because of the Liberal policy.

Mr. Cousineau: You were doing all right but then you had to change it.

Mr. Schellenberger: It is important that the citizens of the nation know whose policy it is.

I should like to speak for a few moments about a specific group of people. When the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) brings forward bills, I feel this group is left out. Again they are left out of Bill C-67, which is so important to that group of people. They, above any other group in the nation, learn and benefit more from on-the-job training, much more so than from secondary and technical schools. I suppose the reason for this is that the record of getting these people through our educational facilities has been very poor. This bill will not benefit this group of people.

I do not know how many times I have quoted the native unemployment statistics in the House. I wonder whether the government listens. The government tabled its own report last year, but I think it is important to give the statistics repeatedly so that members will be aware of the problem. The unemployment rate of natives in the summer is as high as 50 per cent and rises to as much as 90 per cent in the winter. There is a great dependence upon social assistance because of this.

I should like to refer to the study on Indian conditions which indicates that in 1970 federal government social assistance to native people amounted to $34 million. In the 1978-79 fiscal year, it rose to $104 million. Turning to the area of child care, there is the problem of broken families and families unable to keep their children because of unemployment. In that event the provincial foster care people come in and remove the children. To a large extent they are placed in non-native homes.

I believe the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) is addressing this problem. It is very important because once these children are removed from their cultural background—and historically they have no choice because they are enclosed in reserves—they become additions to the statistics as they grow older. The costs for child care have doubled from approximately $11 million to $24 million. The cost of trying to cure alcoholism, which is a very desperate problem among native people, rose from $167,000 in 1970 to $5.5 million in 1978. Even today that sum is inadequate, and it has probably risen by another couple of million in the last two years. The expenditures for other social services have risen from $1 million to $10 million, that is, adult care and welfare aid. The cost of medical services has risen from $36 million to $94 million.

The problem is that most of the Indian social assistance or medical assistance is not directed toward prevention; it is directed toward dealing with the after effects of the problem. Many of the things that we as citizens of the nation take for granted are not available to most native people. The expenditure on preventive measures such as sports and recreation rose from $97,000 in 1970 to only $2 million in 1978. This is something which should have risen faster; in fact it has not risen at the same rate as inflation.

The report also indicated that the cost of native people living off federal government social welfare has increased from $84 million in 1970 to $242 million today. This means that the economic development, job training and preventive service programs in many areas are failures. They are not working. They are not providing the type of assistance the government should provide to deal with these problems. It is only one statistic with which we must deal.

I should like to turn to the number of jobs which need to be created. The only way to have any success would be through training, not retraining because most native people do not have or have not been able to acquire any skills because of the situation in which they live. The government creates approximately 3,000 jobs a year for status Indians, but we need an additional 4,000 to 6,000 jobs for those coming on to the job market. I am not referring to those natives who have lost their jobs for some reason or those who have only been able to obtain one or two month jobs through LIP and LEAP. This is considered a man year, if they are all added together. These are the types of jobs which must be created.

If we build an economic development type plant, it may cost from about $30,000 to $60,000 to create one job. We are looking at many millions of dollars which would have to be spent to meet the needs of the young people coming on the market. It is a challenge for members of parliament and the House of Commons.

Returning to the report on Indian conditions, the estimated net increase in the Indian working population in the next ten years indicates that between 50,000 and 60,000 people will be coming on the job market. That is a great many people. And when I look at the reserves in my riding, I see that almost two-thirds of those people are under the age of 20, which shows the great baby boom which is taking place in those areas, probably because the job-creation program has not dealt with this problem, nor have our social programs.

● (1750)

How could this bill deal with that problem? As I mentioned before, if we want to meet the technology and the advances in job creation in Canada, there has to be education. One must have a basic education before dealing with the kinds of jobs which are available. The record with regard to native people achieving high school standard is abysmal. Thus, when one considers retraining these people, one finds they do not have a basic level of literacy. The bill does not deal with this problem. A new type of innovative program must be established to deal with this situation. This is why I suspect on-the-job training could be an important tool, since in many cases literacy would not be a factor in learning such trades as carpentry or construction work which a great many native people would find attractive.

Another problem with the bill before us is that it lacks provisions which would make it relevant to Indians living on reserves. We tend to forget that most status Indians live on reserves which are away from population centres. On-the-job training programs are situated in population centres. The kind of assistance which is offered in the reimbursement of living expenses is not adequate to allow these people to move into the cities. There is a natural feeling among native people that they do not wish to move to large cities since they are not comfortable there. Surely we should deal with this problem. Perhaps some on-the-job programs could be mobilized and moved to areas of high unemployment. Some kind of mobile on-the-job training programs could be set up when a company is building in the vicinity of a reserve. Surely this is the time to set up these kinds of programs which would create employment. Yet this bill does not deal with that aspect, nor does it deal with the problem which is very important when it comes to addressing unemployment in this country.

Another problem which has been mentioned before deals with the co-operation of the provinces. Some hon. members who have spoken before have said that there has not been any consultation with the provinces and that they hope that when the bill is passed it will meet some of the requirements of provincial governments. Most of the provinces are not dealing with the native unemployment problem. Because of our history, it has become a federal problem. If we are to deal with it then we must consult with the provinces to see if the kinds of jobs being created fit in with what the province is doing. This should be an important and crucial aspect of the bill, yet it is not dealt with at all.

I mentioned earlier the tremendous growth of our Indian population. We have had a difficult time coming to terms with the problems faced by Indians who move off the reserves. Employment is the major obstacle. When you live on the reserve and want to work but have no skills, you must move to the city to try to find a job. You cannot find a job if you are not skilled. Thus, you are left in the position of not being able to deal with the essentials of life—housing, food and clothing. Many social problems arise as a result of this situation. When we look at our jails, we see that over 50 per cent of them are inhabited by native Canadians. That is a problem which must also be addressed. Our adult training programs in city centres must address native Canadians who have moved to that area out of desperation. At the present time they are receiving no assistance. I hope these problems will be dealt with by the task force and that when it reports we can add points to this bill to overcome these difficulties.

I want to mention an excellent study which was done by Albert Cameron, who is principal of the Saskatchewan Indian Community College in Prince Albert. He made some recommendations which I hope will be dealt with by the task force and which I hoped would have been placed in this bill. In his recommendations he stated the following:

> The training should take account of the unique cultural and learning styles of Indians (e.g. courses must be flexible enough to accommodate different levels of education of the Indian students).
> The government should locate training facilities at or close to the reserves to allow adult participation and to eliminate relocation and its attendant problems.
> When the above is not possible, the government should set up a mobile training program for trade training, with complete facilities to circumvent the relocation problem.

I think these are three excellent proposals which should be considered. I hope the task force looks at them very seriously.

I want to conclude this portion of my speech by saying that when the government deals with this problem, it not only assists the native people of our nation but assists all Canadians. We cannot continue to shovel this under the rug, because the situation will just get worse. The statistics I have just enunciated prove that.

In conclusion I want to say that I have a difficulty in my own constituency with a pipeline company which needed trained individuals. It was unable to find any place in Canada where people could be trained as service technicians, so it had to send them to Houston, Texas for that training. Of course, the company received no assistance to do that. In effect, this meant training citizens of Canada to work in Canada. But not having the training facilities here, the company had to send them out of Canada where they could receive the necessary instruction. This problem is being addressed in this bill, Mr. Speaker, and I appreciate that very much. I know that while it will not assist the company which I have mentioned, since they have already spent their money, it will certainly assist it in the future if it must train new service technicians outside the country. That is one of the better aspects of the bill.

I want to summarize by saying how important I think it is to use the services of the parliamentary task force, to wait for its advice and to pay attention to what it has to say.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton rising on a point of order?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I was rising to speak for a few moments with respect to this bill. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to rise in the House tonight, with this assembled multitude, to speak for a few moments to such a distinguished group of hon. members—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —about a matter which is extremely important to Canadians. As the minister mentioned, because of the change which is occurring in Canada with respect to our work force and its necessities and requirements for education and training, there is a real challenge for young people in the country in the years ahead.

I am very pleased to follow in the debate the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) who made a very thoughtful speech, dwelling, as he did, on matters affecting women and native people for whom he has a particular responsibility in our caucus which he carries out extremely well, marked by a sense of concern and feeling. He raised something during the course of his speech which I think is worthy of comment. He indicated that a task force is presently at work, composed of members of all parties of the House of Commons, with respect to the employment opportunities for Canadians in the eighties. He expressed a concern that somehow or other this bill might be premature because that task force will be reporting within a very short period of time.

Neither the government nor anyone else ought to take any steps which would in any way undercut or diminish the work of those very important task forces, initiatives which were begun under the government of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) when he was prime minister engaging the attention of hon. members in particular areas. I think it is important that that does not happen.

As this debate winds down, and we anticipate this bill going to the committee, I hope it will go there with an understanding from the government. If the minister or his parliamentary secretary is here, it would be nice to have a response from him before the night is over, that the bill will go to the committee with the proviso that it is not the last word in adult occupational training. Out of that report which the committee will give at some later date, which I hope is not too long in the future, I hope there will be some consultation and some ideas which could lead to an improvement with respect to this bill because, as hon. members have indicated, it is our intention to support the bill.

Therefore, I hope the bill is not premature. I hope the hon. member for Wetaskiwin is not proven correct in that the government will attempt to do something in advance with respect to this matter which will ignore or render it necessary to bring in some other legislation in this area, because it is important and that task force is important. The whole question of adult retraining is important.

I think the purpose of the bill is clear. Under our current legislation as it stands, it must be apparent to the minister that there is little incentive for employers to enter into apprenticeship programs to provide training for people who want to work in the trades.

The purpose of this bill is to recognize the changing employment characteristics of the community, the changing technology in the world, and to ensure that there is some way in which we can be on the leading or cutting edge of this revolution in training. There is now little incentive for people to enter the apprenticeship program because the fact is that at present it pays almost the same rate as benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Therefore, there is not that much incentive. Our purpose is to find some incentive.

When this bill extends the definition of an occupational training course to include courses consisting of more than 52 weeks of full-time instruction which would be approved by the commission, it is a good provision. When it would permit the commission in certain circumstances to waive the requirement that an adult must be out of school for at least 12 months before he can be enrolled in the occupational training course, I think it is a good thing. Some young people are becoming discouraged with the traditional school system. Even though they have pursued one course of study, they may find it unproductive and they should be encouraged, as the government is encouraging them by this program, to enter other training programs. I therefore think this provision is a good one.

• (2010)

The bill will allow the commission to negotiate payments to a province in connection with occupational training courses, on a fixed rate basis or a basis of costs incurred. The minister did not answer my question last night but I presume that it will allow municipal corporations to become beneficiaries for certain trades and occupations, and that training in them could be provided.

The bill provides a tremendous amount of flexibility for payment. I suspect that the minister is correct and as people are trained to work in the manufacturing industries and the resource industries, the need for their skills will grow.

In the area which I have the privilege to represent in this Parliament, employers in the electronics industry say that they cannot find enough trained people. A great number of people apply for jobs but the employers still cannot find enough who are trained. As a result, they advertise offshore, in the United Kingdom or wherever they can get trained workers. It is important that incentives be provided by the Government of Canada. If one believes that the role of government is to provide leadership, and I happen to believe that is the role of government, then there is a place for the government to take leadership. The effect of this will be magnified one hundredfold as we move into the new technological age.

Many of the occupations that young people have gone into in the past are becoming obsolete. For instance, secretaries are becoming obsolete—not completely redundant but in terms of many of the things they do, obsolete. The word processing machine has invaded the office. The computer has invaded the business world. Some people are required to run those things but not as many as in the past. New opportunities can be created but old opportunities are gone. Women are looking for new occupations, and that is a significant change. As wave upon wave of women enter the work force in the years ahead, they will demand educational facilities to equip them for jobs that were never considered available to them in the past.

I think it is absolutely important that there be an element of co-operation in the program as well as flexibility. One of the things that has distinguished a country like Japan or Germany from Canada is the fact that they seem to have a national commitment with respect to both the goals of industry and the goals of government. There appears to be a sense of partnership in all the levels of government, and in Germany in particular there are other levels of government. There is also the sense of partnership with the business community, with labour on the one hand, employees on the other, and that very important third party, namely, government. That is the kind of joint effort that is needed in Canada.

I hope that as this program develops, we recognize the importance of that joint commitment and the fact that labour, management and government are all part of that one thing, the Canadian industrial, resource, economic complex. All are in it together.

If there was ever an indication of the importance of that sense of togetherness and co-operation, it is in the area that I happen to represent. There are two real growth industries in Canada, in the energy field and in the high technology field. The second one is a very important one in this area.

I do not have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the trend to government spending restraint at all levels and the decentralization of the federal bureaucracy is of major concern to citizens of the national capital area. It has changed the thinking in this area, the thinking of business people, the thinking of politicians and, most important, it has changed the thinking of young people in the national capital area.

The government-stimulated growth that we took for granted over the years is not going to be with us in the future. The two major political parties of the country have decided that restraint, and one may define it differently from the other, is the order of the day. There will be no more untramelled growth.

In families where young people are looking forward to entering the work force, they find that the ranks of government have closed. Man years not used, are not filled. There is a view that it is important to preserve the positions of serving public servants.

Governments themselves are involved in retraining programs. As programs change and government initiatives change, public servants can be moved from one area to another within the public service. That means, however, that opportunities for people outside the public service have diminished. The trend of untrammelled growth and untrammelled opportunity is at an end, however. Even without this change which would have taken place in any event, forces are at work, aside from the predetermined decentralization, that are decentralizing the workplace.

I refer to advances in communications technology; the trend toward office automation; the advent of electronic mail and distributed data processing. All these are leading us to an era of a distributed workplace. All this is having a direct impact on this local area and, I dare say, on the areas of other members.

In the recent past, alternate sources of employment were not easy to find. This was traditionally a lumbering area rather than a manufacturing area, but that business has died out. There was once a very marked and strong forest products industry here and that has decreased as well. Over the past ten years, for some reason or other, another industry has developed. A high technology industry has developed in this part of Canada which I think foreshadows at least the potential for tremendous growth. It began in the 1960s with the establishment of Bell-Northern Research Limited on the western outskirts of the city, in what was then the township of Nepean and is now the city of Nepean. Outside of government, it is the largest high technology employer in the area with a local work force of about 2,000 people. There are other firms as well. There is Mitel Corporation in telephone equipment; Digital Equipment of Canada Ltd. which makes mini computers, Gandalf Data Communications which makes digital and telephone equipment, Lumonics which is in the laser business, Leigh Instruments which is in avionics and Computing Devices Co. which makes electronics systems. There are many others in the service sector and computer business as well—software houses and consulting firms. All have grown out of the high technology industry.

It is the managers, the owners, the directors and the employees of those organizations who are telling us that they cannot get enough trained people. I think there is a challenge here that may affect other parts of Canada and other industries. But perhaps in the same way there is a challenge for business and governments at the provincial and the federal level to all come together.

• (2020)

Here in Ottawa we have a post-secondary institution in Algonquin College. If we are to meet the needs of our local industries from our own human resources, then the courses of study and the curriculae of that institution and our two universities have to be directed toward creating the solution to that problem. That scenario can be found in community after community across Canada. However, it will take a commitment to develop these courses.

I believe this program properly administered will be helpful in inducing employers and thereby young people who are looking for new challenges, as well as young people out of school looking for their very first challenge, to consider training under such programs. We have to get people into the technological trades which are so important to the development of these industries.

Technological industries are not just important to this area, they are important to the whole country. As I said at the outset, they are one of the two growth industries in Canada. With the proper amount of strategic planning, with the appropriate steps to encourage the right training programs, coupled with some decent incentives in the areas where we are strong, we will be able to contribute to their growth not only for the national good but for the good of our young people's future.

Our technology is the most promising in the world today. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) is the chairman of a committee of concerned members on matters of science and the development of it. I invite that committee when we return after our recess to visit the industries I have enumerated to talk with the administrators about the need for trained personnel and how that need is being met. These exciting, innovative companies rely as well on the federal government for technical support. Perhaps that is the reason why they have settled here.

I am rather pleased with the government of the province of Ontario for the way it has looked to this area. I know that all members in the House of Commons, even those sitting on the other side, regard the government of Ontario as a benevolent and far-seeing government. This part of the province is one of the areas where the government of Ontario would like to see development of a microelectronic development centre, according to statements made. In other words, it is important that we develop and build upon our strengths. It is important as well, when we remember the necessity for trained personnel, that one of the steps in the ladder to building the strengths will, of necessity, be the training and retraining of adults to fill the positions which good fortune and good management have made available, not just here, but throughout the country.

I will not take up much more time except to say that this bill is not the last word. It is the first word. But it is the first word worthy of support. It is recognition by the Government of Canada of the change in the requirements of the nation. I hope that it will not always be a piecemeal operation. We should not look at occupational training today without considering the necessity of a large industrial strategy.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) is always talking about bringing forward an industrial strategy. Retraining will be part of that strategy. I would like to see that industrial strategy and where the emphasis is. The problems are immense. The responsibility on government is immense. The burden on Canada as a result of our involvement in GATT, the changes that will occur to our manufacturing complex over the next seven years, along with the necessity to meet those changes, will make the responsibility on government immense.

I do not want anyone to think that this is the last word. It is a small step but an important one in meeting the requirements of our country as we move into the latter part of the twentieth century and the beginning of the twenty-first century. Part of the proposition is that a country is best built on its strengths and not its weaknesses. With respect to that thrust, I say this is a sound beginning.

I want to add that the government should not ignore the findings of the parliamentary committee. It was an initiative taken from the administration of a former government and translated into action by this government in which it asks members of Parliament from all parties to look at employment opportunities in the eighties. This bill is part of the machinery. I hope there will be nothing in the minds of the minister or the government to indicate in any way that the report of that all-party committee will be ignored. This report will likely be unanimous. I hope this bill will be looked at from all points of view when that report is brought down.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, if still waters run deep, this is a debate which no doubt has gained much attention across the country. This is one of the most important debates we have had in this Parliament. It is not my intention to delay the proceedings tonight. I believe the parliamentary secretary wants to speak, and I encourage him to respond to the points that have been made.

I shall take only a few moments to outline three points concerning this bill. I believe it is, as the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) who preceded me has said, a way in which we look at our own future in Canada with respect to the development of our human resources. Not too many things that we have talked about in this Parliament are as important as the development of the people who are able to respond to the technological challenge that we all face in this changing society.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) made quite a point in his intervention today, and it was also my understanding that the task force on Employment Opportunities for the '80s was about to bring in a report which would have taken a comprehensive look at the employment situation and the problems with respect to adjustment and the strategies necessary to that adjustment, as well as the training consequent to that.

Suddenly we find ourselves with a bill on which we are all in favour. I understand we will give it speedy passage at second reading because we are in favour of it. However, it does not do nearly enough to respond to the challenge of the technological age in which Canada has entered.

First I ask the parliamentary secretary to tell us in clear language why the government felt that it had to proceed with Bill C-67 before the task force report has been presented to the House. I believe that members of Parliament are to be encouraged, as I felt I was encouraged when dealing with the North-South task force report, a subject I will return to in a moment. If we are to be encouraged to take a good, hard, deep, comprehensive look at the problems that have been mandated to us for study, I do not believe that piecemeal legislation is an adequate response.

● (2030)

Second, I have to note with some irony that we are being asked to consider in Bill C-67 measures to help the technological training of people in the new society we have entered. At the same time another aspect of this government is driving out of Canada the very people who are technologically trained. They have been trained by many corporations and companies, particularly oil companies.

I would be remiss in my duty if I did not point out that the so-called energy policies of this government are having a deleterious effect not only on the national economy, but on the human capacity in my province to respond to the technological aids. It is driving people out of the country. It then comes along with piecemeal legislation and says, "Let us do a better job of training". There is a contradiction here in these two points.

I see I have the minister's attention. If he was here a moment ago, let me remind him that I made the point about the use of task forces. Conjoining my first point, I say to him very sincerely: if we are genuinely sincere in our efforts to help Canadians respond in the development of their own human capacity to plug into a technological society, the government has to speak with one voice and one concern. That would be met by parliamentary support.

I am not going to load on the minister tonight a great big harangue about the energy policy. He has heard plenty about it from my colleagues. I dare say he has heard about it from his own colleagues, probably in more private conversations. Nonetheless, I believe it proper to point out that if the government is serious about training people and helping people to respond to the need to find a place in the new technological society, we have to get together.

I now come to the principal point. I am glad I have the minister's attention. I assure him I will not belabour this point, but I do want him to hear me. One of the reasons that this is piecemeal legislation is that the government does not have an industrial adjustment policy.

I take the minister back to the North-South task force report which was tabled in the House on December 18, 1980, a report of some 38 recommendations. I am sure the minister is familiar with that report. I will focus on one recommendation in the trade section. In my judgment, this was the single most important recommendation in the trade section of the North-South task force report. It had to do with the recommendation that reads as follows:

> The task force recommends that the government immediately launch a major public inquiry of the industrial sectors that are likely to be at a long-term competitive disadvantage in relation to developing countries, with a view to adopting effective adjustment measures.

That is a lot of very heavy thinking. The task force said it is necessary for us to eliminate obsolete industrial capacities in our country in such a way as to encourage firms to invest in new and more promising areas or discouraging further investment in declining industries. The report goes on to read:

> Assistance given to individual firms should be aimed at improving their efficiency and over-all international competitiveness.

I emphasize that our concern and the long and objective study, and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras) can attest to this, represented the thinking on all sides of the House. If we are going to be serious in our approach to the North-South question, and that takes us into the areas of finance, development assistance and energy—I leave all that aside for the moment—and in our trade relationships, we have to figure out a way to respond to what in international terms is called the international division of labour.

We now have 250 million people in the world who are unemployed or underemployed. Before the turn of the century, we will have 500 million people unemployed or underemployed. That is not all Canada's responsibility, but it is a subject to which Canada has to respond because these people are in countries that are industrializing and that need to find new markets. If we are going to have some sort of aid program or relationship with North-South, there has to be a quid pro quo. We have to find ways in which we can live together on this planet. One way to do that is not to move adversely against the textile industry in Canada.

I hope the minister will not interpret my argument as one that is adverse to the interests of the textile workers. No sane politician in this country will stand up and say we should fire the textile workers. Not at all. The North-South task force emphasized that we are not interested in taking action that would hurt the textile workers who are caught in a situation that is beyond their control. However, it is not beyond the control of the government to phase Canada into a situation through an industrial adjustment strategy that will respond to the needs of Canada to become more technologically oriented in our industrial capacity and to phase out low-level technology, as many countries of the world can fill that void. There is a balance that needs to be attained. The minister is probably quite anxious to see Canada participate in finding a way to achieve that balance.

The task force report certainly was not anything revolutionary. It is not a document that says we have to do something overnight. It stated:

> The task force recommends that the government immediately launch a major public inquiry of the industrial sectors that are likely to be at a long-term competitive disadvantage—

Naturally we had the textile industry in mind along with others. What did the government do? It gave a response to the task force report on June 15 during the foreign policy debate which was held for two days in this House. It was the official government response. Responding to that very recommendation, this is what the government said:

> The difficulties of the Canadian industrial sectors which are most affected by the competition of developing countries are well known to the government.

The government claims all this is well known.

> Measures to help the competitiveness of these Canadian industries in the present international trading environment are already being taken or in the course of being formulated. Public inquiries concerning these industries have recently been conducted by the textile and clothing board and the anti-dumping tribunal. The government will be taking decisions shortly.

In other words, the government is rejecting the recommendation of the task force for a major public inquiry that would last for some time and go into some real detail and depth on industrial adjustment, which we claim to be necessary, saying it has the answers. The government certainly does not have the answers or it would have been bringing forward some comprehensive legislation.

I listened to the minister's speech last night. It was well received in the House. I heard the minister say there were future plans, there is more coming down the line. This is something to get us started. That is why this bill is going to achieve reasonably easy passage. However, I am disappointed, not just personally but on behalf of industrial adjustment in the country, that the government has rejected that principal recommendation of the North-South task force report.

● (2040)

Subsequent to that, a few days after the government gave its official response, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) brought in a new textile policy which, to be proper, was a continuation of the present textile policy, which is a shoring up of a declining industry. He announced that $250 million would be allocated by the government over five years. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) has, of course, a share in this decision, since it is a government decision to put $250 million over five years to establish new employment in communities affected by industrial adjustment, to help displaced workers take advantage of new employment opportunities and to assist the modernization of viable firms in the textile industry. That is what the government is doing.

The people who have been following the government's textile policy and its response to the need for an industrial adjustment strategy that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton was outlining a moment ago, all those people are very concerned today that the government is continuing to drift its way into this technological future that the minister has been trying to summon us into with Bill C-67.

I feel so strongly about the government's inadequate response to the North-South task force report and the government's announcement of the continuation of the textile policy that I am going to read some excerpts into the record tonight from an editorial from the Winnipeg Free Press. I do not think the minister will reject this out of hand because this is an editorial that appeared on June 23, 1981, under the heading "Propping up Textiles". The reason I am going to read some excerpts from this editorial into the record is that I believe the minister and his officials may very well want to take a good, hard look at the argumentation which has been put forward. Indeed, I would certainly recommend this argumentation to them.

So you will not think, Mr. Speaker, this is a partisan argument I am giving, let me say that I am giving the minister a reflection of what I think is a well-considered, objective view of the government's non-policy on industrial adjustment to which Bill C-67 only opens the door.

Let me quote the editorial as follows:

> Five years ago, when the federal government imposed strict and costly quotas on foreign imports of clothing and textiles, Canadians were assured that this was the last chance for the Canadian industry. It was to be given five years to modernize, to become efficient and capable of coping with foreign competition. After that, it was to be forced to stand on its own feet without further government help.
> The latest announcement at least abandons the pretence that protection for the industry is temporary. The government will continue the quotas for a further five years. It will provide the industry with $250 million to expand and to modernize. But this time there is no suggestion that, five years down the road, the industry will be any better placed to meet foreign competition than it is today. The clear assumption is that the Canadian textile industry will remain protected and subsidized, to the cost both of Canadian consumers and the people of the Third World, for all time to come.

I interject into my quotation from the Winnipeg Free Press at this moment to review for a minute with the minister the report of the North-South Institute which gave a very detailed report showing how the Canadian consumer is paying about $100 a year extra for clothing because of the protectionist policies the government is continuing. I resume my quotation from the Winnipeg Free Press:

The textile policy, of course, conflicts with two of the most ballyhooed aspects of the present government's policy—the national industrial strategy and the support of the new world economic order.

The industrial strategy is supposed to encourage a transfer of manpower and resources to the industries of the future. The textile policy, at a cost of a quarter of a billion dollars to the taxpayers and about $100 a year in higher costs for every Canadian family, encourages expansion of an industry which is largely unable to compete on the world scene and which will always pay relatively low wages.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect to the hon. member I would call to his attention the bill before us which is an act to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act. The hon. member appears to be straying from the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. Roche: As you know, sir, I never quarrel or argue with the judgments of the Chair. I have great respect, indeed, but I have been trying to advance an argument, that will only take a few more moments, as to why Bill C-67 is not meeting the very objective which it seeks to achieve, that is retraining for industrial adjustment. If you will bear with me, Mr. Speaker, I would ask for your indulgence, and I think I have the minister's attention and only intend to speak for a few more moments, but I think I am putting forth a case for the need for the government to take seriously an industrial adjustment policy that was laid out very clearly in the North-South task force report and which the government in its own response said it was not going to do. I think that is an argument to be presented with respect to Bill C-67. To continue this very short quotation, it reads:

There is an area in which Canadian textiles can compete in world terms and some Winnipeg firms are doing so successfully. But most of the industry survives only because of massive protection and continuing that protection into the indefinite future will only add one more roadblock to the modernization of the Canadian economy.

That, sir, is the modernization of the Canadian economy the minister stood in his place last night and said he wanted. I have said, and my colleagues who have spoken on this bill have said, including the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton and the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, that we are going to support Bill C-67, but we are calling to the attention of the government as surely as we can the inadequacies of Bill C-67 in attempting to meet the very challenge it opens up.

Resuming my quotation from the Winnipeg Free Press, and there is only a little bit more, it reads:

It is particularly ironic that the new quotas should be imposed just a month before Prime Minister Trudeau plays host to the leaders of the world's most economically advanced nations at the Ottawa Summit. Mr. Trudeau plans to lecture the world's leaders on the duty of the rich nations to help the countries of the Third World break out of the cycle of underdevelopment and poverty.

He will no doubt point out to them that fairer terms of trade are every bit as important as aid in achieving that end. He will presumably not point out that Canada's textile policy is the exact opposite of what he is preaching.

We have all said that fairer terms of trade are every bit as important as aid.

The article continues:

Even if he does not, the message may still get through. A week before the Ottawa Summit, a conference in Geneva will begin renegotiation of the international multifibre agreement.

That is also something we paid attention to, sir, in the North-South task force report.

The article continues:

Spokesmen for the textile-exporting nations of the Third World have already served notice that they will go to that meeting seeking better access to the markets of the economically-advanced nations.

I now come to the final paragraph of the Winnipeg Free Press editorial and I ask the minister to take note of this:

They will campaign against the restrictions imposed by the rich countries in North America and Europe against their exports. Canada can expect to come in for its share of criticism. It may be, as Employment Minister Lloyd Axworthy claims, that Canada's quotas are more lenient than those of most other industrialized nations. On the other hand, most of the other nations do not have leaders who continually proclaim their dedication to the interests of the Third World. We are not any worse than the others, just more hypocritical.

That is the end of the quotation and almost the end of the argumentation I wish to present to the House tonight since I said I did not wish to unduly delay the processing of this bill.

I ask you to consider, Mr. Speaker, that if we are to be serious on two counts, first that we are really going to modernize Canadian industry on behalf of Canadians—some very good speeches were made in the course of this debate about how Canadians coming on-stream today are going to have to change their careers two, three and four times in the period of their lifetime because of the speed of technological change today—if we are serious about meeting the needs of Canadians in a rapidly changing, evolving high technology society—my friend from Wetaskiwin pointed out the opening of the third facility in Alberta; we have one in northern Alberta, one in southern Alberta and now there is to be a third one to give technological training because of the demand for high technological skills—and if we are to be serious about responding to the needs of Canadians, we must have a comprehensive industrial adjustment strategy on which to build a continuing training program.

● (2050)

That is the first point I leave with the minister. The second is that if we are to be serious in our response to the North-South dialogue, if we are to be serious in responding to the international division of labour, if we are to be serious that Canada will play a proper role in international development in a world in which we are becoming technologically one society and to which Canada has to respond responsibly with a comprehensive and unified policy for international development where we do not hurt countries to which we are ostensibly giving aid and then refusing to buy products from them so they can industrialize in their own way because we are protecting low-level technological interests in our country, then I ask the minister to think seriously in his capacity to lead the government and this House with policies which will be truly aimed at job creation for Canadians and those people Canadians want to relate to in the interests of a sane world order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the minister who moved the motion, I must inform the House that if he speaks now he will close the debate on second reading.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will not take much of the time of the House because I believe I was able to express my interest in the passage of this bill, and I appreciate the comments and good wishes of members opposite in enabling us to bring this to a reasonably speedy and effective conclusion on second reading.

I would just like to say that many of the comments we have heard in this debate have been particularly helpful and useful in setting out the proposals, solutions and ideas about how we can improve the performance of training skills in Canada. I think it also indicates something perhaps far more important and essential, which is that there is an underlying agreement, regardless of party, region or whatever, that this is an objective which must be served by this national government. The improvement of the skills and talents of Canadians to meet the demands of the labour market of the 1980s is something to which there is underlying acceptance and agreement from all members of this House.

While we may differ on the details and the particulars, and while we may have particular tangents we want to follow, it is very gratifying to me to realize as we move forward in this area that we at least enjoy the initial commitment of all members to pull together. Whether we call it an industrial strategy or a labour market strategy, there is a common acceptance of a need to change and reform our institutions of training, education and our efforts at job employment and adjustment so that we can match the skills and aptitudes of Canadians to the jobs of the future.

Many speakers in this debate have indicated they wish this bill had more detail, was broader in its range and comprehension. I, too, wish that, but the timing was not there because we were just not ready for that. Any good idea has a certain gestation period. I believe we are still at the beginning of that process. I hope members of this House will take the time to read the report tabled this afternoon which my department produced, which I believe put forward a lot of new information concerning the changes taking place in Canada's labour markets. It sets forward some ideas which I hope will stimulate their interest and reaction as to how we change policies in unemployment insurance, job training and job creation.

I also look forward, as do other members of this House, to the tabling of the report of the special parliamentary committee which has had a large scale consultation with the Canadian public about the need for changes, and which will provide a very important contribution to an understanding of this very important area. It is my hope, Mr. Speaker, that this will again take place in a short period of time. I want to assure hon. members, because many of them raised the question, that those reports are simply the opening of a debate, the commencement of consultation, and we do not intend to act in this very critical area without some degree of acceptance and accord on the part of trade unions, business organizations, members of Parliament and the provincial governments.

The bill itself is an indication of agreement by provincial governments on the measures in this bill, and that we did spend time talking to provincial governments. They do agree with these measures and are looking forward to them because they give us the ability to begin changing our adult occupational training programs. These programs cost the federal government close to $800 million a year, one of the major investments we make in economic and social development. The provinces want extension of the time in which they can provide educational training, they want the ability, when necessary, to sign agreements not only with provincial institutions but with employer groups, trade unions, native organizations and social agencies, which this bill will allow us to do.

So there are very important innovations in this bill which are the first step towards the kinds of changes members have asked for. However, I do want to assure them that this is really only the beginning. There is the old saying that a journey of 1,000 miles begins with a single step. Well, this is one step we are taking in this House tonight. It is certainly my hope that this step will be completed before we adjourn this House this summer, that we will have a complete package of legislation so as not to lose the time to begin putting in place some of the training initiatives required.

While this country goes on to debate many of the major policy changes which will take place over the following year, we can also start working in a practical and expedient way to make changes beginning this summer so we can start training hundreds and thousands of Canadians this fall for new opportunities in the rapidly changing industrial and economic landscape of Canada.

So I thank members for this debate. I hope they will continue to support us in the committee hearings and third reading so we can come forward with a package for which I believe all Canadians will applaud this Parliament because it is an important first step in an area where we all agree action is required.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO SEXUAL OFFENCES AND THE PROTECTION OF YOUNG PERSONS

Mr. Pinard (for Mr. Chrétien) moved that Bill C-53, an Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and the protection of young persons and to amend certain other Acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Is the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) not here to introduce these amendments which have been called for by the government and by women of Canada? Is this the way this Parliament is being treated by the Minister of Justice?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Irwin) has the floor.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) was here earlier on this particular bill and we were prepared to speak to it last week. Unfortunately, the time was used up, probably well used up, by the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (2100)

Mr. Irwin: It is a pleasure to make a few remarks with respect to Bill C-53. As its title indicates, it is an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and the protection of young persons. The Royal Commission on the Status of Women, the Law Reform Commission of Canada and women's organizations across the country have all levelled criticism at the existing law. Many of these criticisms are justified, and it is hoped that not all but most of them will be met by Bill C-53.

To enhance the protection of children, the bill will create new offences against sexual exploitation of young people by adults and against child pornography. In addition, other changes will assist in prosecuting child abuse cases and cases of abduction of young children in custody disputes.

There are four broad principles I wish to address in this bill. First among them is the protection of the integrity of the person. The importance of this cannot be overstated. It is the very purpose for which men and women form governments and enact laws. The principle simply means that every person in our society is entitled to live free from violence and, as much as possible, free from the fear of violence. This clearly implies that no one should be compelled to engage in sexual activity without his or her consent.

The second principle is the protection of children and special groups. The need for this is obvious. Children clearly require protection from the physical and emotional consequences of activities with which they cannot properly deal.

Third, there is a duty upon government to safeguard public decency. Society has the right to expect laws which protect its members from other individuals and to safeguard its public morals.

The fourth broad principle is also of great importance. It is also properly the subject of increasing attention today, that is, the elimination of sexual discrimination in criminal law. Simple equity demands this. There are many rights of those who are charged, and hopefully they will be enshrined in the Constitution. But hand in hand with the rights of the accused must go the protection of those who are victims. Hopefully this bill will strike a balance in that particular area.

In the area of sexual offences, a number of changes are necessary. Above all, the law must recognize the element of violence. At present rape and indecent assault are listed in the Criminal Code under the part entitled "Sexual Offences, Public Morals and Disorderly Conduct". Bill C-53 would place the new crimes replacing rape and indecent assault in the part of the code dealing with offences against person and reputation. This change would separate violent sexual attacks from the concept of sexual morality. Furthermore—and we have received many submissions on this particular point—the bill would eliminate the stigma attached to terms such as "indecent assault" and "rape". There would be two new offences. The first would be sexual assault and the second would be aggravated sexual assault. Using a weapon or causing serious bodily harm would become aggravated sexual assault.

It would no longer be necessary to prove penetration. That requirement in section 143 of the Criminal Code has caused much anguish and embarrassment to complainants. It has done little, if anything, to protect these victims. Moreover, it has unduly complicated and prolonged trial. Also it has created an anomaly in the law. Some brutal and injurious sexual attacks not involving penetration have been charged, out of necessity, as the lesser offence of indecent assault. The Law Reform Commission of Canada pointed out in its report on sexual offences tabled in Parliament in November 1978:

> To retain penetration as a distinct element of one of the offences would be to emphasize the sexual character of the proscribed behaviour rather than to stress the aspect of violence or threatened violence.

I should like to add that most women's organizations in Canada strongly recommend the elimination of this outdated requirement. However, upon conviction the judge will be able to and should consider the nature and degree of violence when sentencing the accused.

Next I should like to deal with the question of consent as it is covered by Bill C-53. The question of consent has always been an essential element in the offence of rape. It would remain a central requirement in the new law of "sexual assault". The bill specifies the following:

> No consent is obtained where the complainant submits or does not resist by reason of (a) the application of force; (b) threats or fear of the application of force; (c) fraud; or (d) the exercise of authority.

If an accused claimed that the complainant consented, the jury would have to be told to consider whether or not his claim is reasonable. This is consistent with the Supreme Court decision in the Pappajohn case.

Also the bill deals with spousal immunity. Affected by this definition of consent will be the concept of spousal immunity. At present that immunity prevents a husband from being charged with raping his wife on the basis that marriage entitles him to intercourse with or without consent. This is something I would have thought would have disappeared a hundred years ago. Some concern has been expressed about the difficulty of proving lack of consent to sexual relations between married persons. Some also claim that removing the immunity would involve undue interference in the private lives of married persons.

However, proving lack of consent will remain a key factor in all cases where the parties have had prior sexual relationship, married or not. It is strange in this day and age that a person involved in a common law relationship, such as a common law wife, has the right to charge her common law husband with rape. Yet a married person who is separated and awaiting a decree nisi in a divorce action does not have the same right. This immunity from being prosecuted for rape persists. It should be noted that under the present law forced intercourse or assault within marriage can constitute grounds for divorce. There is no evidence in the Divorce Act that this involves an abuse of the law or its process. Consequently, by abolishing spousal immunity the government would eliminate this discrimination against legally married women. Equal protection under the law would be granted to all persons. Married women would be given greater protection of their personal integrity than the law now provides.

The matter of consent is very complex. As the law of rape has developed, so have certain rules of evidence relating to the question of consent. I refer in particular to the evidence concerning the character of the complainant and the doctrine of recent complaint. I will not burden hon. members with the history of these doctrines and laws. I should like to deal with the law as it is today. The judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Forsythe case is a final ruling on procedure whereby an accused may cross-examine a complainant on her previous sexual history and the extent to which the cross-examination may go.

Hon. members will recall that in 1976, Parliament enacted Section 142 of the Criminal Code to restrict this type of questioning of the complainant. As the court pointed out, what we did at the time was to alleviate the trauma, humiliation and embarrassment of the complainant. However, at the same time, the court has ruled that in some cases the accused is still entitled to challenge the character of the complainant by referring to her previous sexual activities with others. In a trial, these questions attempt to blacken the character and are very rarely relevant to the issue at trial.

What is the issue in a rape trial? The issue is: did the accused commit the alleged offence against the complainant beyond a reasonable doubt. I would add that those interested in law reform have objected strongly to this questioning of a complainant's character.

The proposed amendments would clarify Parliament's intent. Simply put, evidence of the complainant's character would only be admissible in exceptional cases. At a closed hearing a judge would have to determine whether the accused had personal knowledge of the complainant's previous sexual character which led him to believe that she consented. That is a very strict and high standard, one which I hope would only be invoked rarely.

Then there is the doctrine of recent complaint. What is the doctrine of recent complaint? I would suggest that it is almost as old as spousal immunity. It goes back to the days when the complainant had to raise a hue and cry when she was raped. Failure to complain was held against her. There are many reasons why a woman who has been sexually assaulted would not raise this hue and cry. The foremost reason would be that she would not want to go through a trial, nor would she want people to know. We have looked at the doctrine of recent complaint as an evidenciary rule, and it will be abolished if Bill C-53 is enacted and rightly so.

I wish to make two other points about the proposed changes before moving on to the very important question of protecting children from sexual abuse and exploitation. First, there is the problem of corroboration. The present law requires that the complainant's testimony—and now I am talking about young children—must be corroborated by other evidence before an accused can be convicted. This rule has undergone various statutory changes and is very confusing. Under the proposals before you, Mr. Speaker, corroboration will no longer be required. There is no reason why the law should remain confused in this respect. Sexual offences should be treated the same as other offences.

Second, there is the problem of trial publicity, which is probably one of the most serious problems in sexual, indecent assault and rape cases. At present, in the case of rape or indecent assault, the prosecutor can request the judge to order that the complainant's identity and evidence not be published. Under the proposals before the House now, if a request is made by the prosecution or by the complainant, the court must bar publication of any information which could disclose the identity of the complainant. There is no discretion; once the judge is asked to ban publication he must comply. However, evidence which does not identify the complainant in any way could be published. Along with this provision there is still a discretionary role of the judge to forbid any evidence being published. It is an extra safeguard on what is already in existence.

I would now like to deal with the proposals relating to the protection of children. In February of this year the Minister of Justice announced that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) and he had appointed a committee under the direction of Dr. Robin F. Badgley of the University of Toronto to undertake a very substantial study in the area of sexual abuse and exploitation of children. I might add at this point that further legislation may come before the House after that committee reports. The present law relating to sexual offences against children does not adequately deal with the situation to which young people are exposed. It is characterized by no longer relevant distinctions between the sexes. For instance, there is not equal protection to boys and girls. There are terms like "of previously chaste character", which few judges, let alone lawyers, complainants or prosecutors understand. There is also the term "more to blame", which is difficult to understand. What is done on the "more to blame" test? Are the number of beers which the boy gives the girl tallied up? Or is how much marijuana she smoked taken into account, how much she borrowed, on who went where and did what to whom? It is a very difficult test and I do not know if this legislation comes to grips with it. I think it is something which the committee will have to look into. We are still into the realm of definition, but possibly at the committee level that particular definition can be restructured and looked at again. But something must be done about it.

It is unnecessary to list the relevant provisions of the Criminal Code concerning sexual offences against children. Rather, I will outline briefly the changes we propose. First, the new law would prohibit any person from engaging in sexual misconduct with a child of either sex who is under the age of 14 years, whether or not there is consent. In other words, the infant cannot give consent. It will not be a defence for the accused to state that he or she believed that at the time the child was over the age of 14 years.

Second, anyone who engages in sexual misconduct with a person between 14 and 16 years of age, regardless of the sex of the complainant, will be guilty of an offence. However, the accused could not be found guilty if he or she was under the age of 16 or was less than three years older than the complainant. The best example I can give, where consent is involved, concerns a girl who is just under 16 years of age while the boy is over 17 but under 18 years of age. The girl could be 15 and the boy 17. In that case, if there is consent then there is no offence. Likewise, an accused would not be convicted if there was an honest belief that the complainant was 16 years of age or more, or if the accused was less responsible than the complainant. Any parent or guardian having lawful care or charge of, or exercising authority over, a person under 16 years of age, engaging in sexual misconduct with such a child, would be guilty of an offence.

As members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and the House recognized in 1978, sexual exploitation of children for purposes of child pornography is a serious problem. Therefore, a new offence is proposed aimed at stopping sexual exploitation of children under the age of 16. In this bill those who induce, coerce, or agree to use a person of either sex under the age of 16 for purposes of producing visual representations of sexually explicit conduct will be dealt with harshly. This would also include those who print, reproduce, publish, distribute, circulate, sell, offer to sell, receive for sale, advertise, or expose to public view such representations. In other words, anyone who would profit from this filth will be dealt with harshly. Anyone found guilty of any of these acts, or of possessing such material for the purpose of committing any of these acts, would be punished by imprisonment of up to five years. In addition, as is the case at present, the illegal material would be forfeited to the Crown.
