Mr. MacInnis: I cannot say why my mind works in a certain way; I only know it does. I cannot tell why the hon. gentleman's mind works in a certain way; I just know it does. I doubt if anyone can tell why he thinks as he does.

Mr. Ferguson: But why did you come to the conclusion?

Mr. MacInnis: Because when the Japanese were driven out of Korea and it was left to the United States and Russian military forces, they agreed on the 38th parallel as their line dividing their respective jurisdictions. Russia would have jurisdiction to the north of that parallel and the United States would have jurisdiction to the south. I was privileged to be at the United Nations assembly in 1947 as a parliamentary adviser to our delegation. A commission was set up by the United Nations assembly to supervise elections in Korea and try to get the whole country on a unified, democratic basis. Soviet Russia bitterly fought the setting up of that commission, and when it was set up despite her opposition, she refused to recognize it. From that day to this the commission has not been allowed to set foot north of the 38th parallel.

My reason for saying it would be useless for United Nations forces to cross the 38th parallel was that unless Russia changed her mind and agreed to participate in the efforts of the United Nations to find a solution, crossing the parallel could mean nothing but war; and so it has turned out. I was going to refer to an article of mine which appeared on October 4 in a weekly newspaper in Vancouver—and I am mentioning these things to indicate that I am not thinking of this situation only as of today. I have been thinking of them in this way from the very beginning. I suggested then that when we reached the 38th parallel the North Korean armies had been defeated, and the proper course to follow would be to maintain a force south of the 38th parallel to ensure that another invasion would not take place. I believe we—and when I say "we" I mean the United Nations—are in a better position to do that today than we were in October, 1950. At that time the United Nations forces had driven back the North Korean armies. In March of 1951 the United Nations forces have not only driven back the North Korean armies; they have also driven back quite a large Chinese army as well, composed, we are told, of volunteers, of course, but well equipped and with good leadership.

Having accomplished that I believe we should continue to reiterate our desire to resolve this dispute through negotiation. I am convinced that not only in this instance, but in all cases, because of the nature and spirit of the United Nations, we should never use a gun when we can accomplish the same end through discussions across the conference table. So I suggest that for the peace of mind of many Canadian people, parents whose sons are now serving in the armed forces in Korea, our people should know definitely what attitude will be taken toward this question by our delegation to the United Nations.

Already our forces have suffered casualties. Several homes in Canada are sadder places today than they were a few months ago because of the part we have taken in this affair. Let me say at once that I agreed with what we did in September, 1950, and I agree now that we did the right thing. Let me say also that whether or not the United Nations forces cross the 38th parallel it is not within the control of Canada or the Canadian government alone. We shall have to be governed by the action taken by the United Nations.

I hope that today the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will leave neither this house nor the country in doubt as to what the attitude of the government is on this question. Yesterday this house approved a contribution to the United Nations Korean rehabilitation fund; I believe that is the title. That is all to the good, and has my complete approval. I only wish it had been more. As I mentioned some time ago, either within or without the house we should not consider contributions of this kind, designed to improve the standards of living of such countries, or to rehabilitate a country because of having been devastated by war, as either loans or gifts. We should consider them as part of our defence expenditures. I am sure such expenditures would be as useful as any we have ever made for defence.

Let me point out that South Korea has been devastated because of the shifting fortunes of war as perhaps no other country has ever been devastated. I have in my hand a reprint of an article by one of the editors of The Nation of New York, Freda Kirchwey, which appeared in the Citizen of March 13, dealing with the destruction wrought by mechanised warfare in South Korea, from which I will read a brief paragraph:

> Only the other day J. Donald Kingsley, United Nations agent general for Korean reconstruction, reported that Korea was the most devastated land and its people the most destitute in the history of modern warfare. He described the 3,500,000 refugees, lacking clothing and food as well as shelter, for whom no adequate provision can now be made. But figures do little to awaken the minds of war-hardened newspaper readers. They respond only when the human anguish behind the generalities is made concrete.

There can be no doubt in the minds of any of us as to the devastation that has taken place in South Korea. I believe there can be no doubt in the mind of anyone who gives any thought to the matter, or who has any human feelings left—I know all the members of this house have—that we should do our utmost to show these people that we are not the kind of people they have been told we are. We have shown them what we can do in a military way. They have seen what our armies can do in—the word is hardly a good word to use in this sense—liberating them from their enemies. We should now show them what we can do by way of rebuilding their homes, and giving them some confidence in the future. That would not only be a good thing for South Korea, but it would be good publicity for the western nations throughout the whole of Asia.

With these few remarks, Mr. Speaker, which are not particularly well organized, I shall conclude by suggesting again to the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs that they do not leave this house or the country in doubt as to what Canada's attitude is concerning the recrossing of the 38th parallel.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker (Mr. MacInnis) emphasized the extent of the devastation that is resulting from war being waged in Korea. There are three million people suffering privation and want such as the world has never known before. I am quite sure that the representatives of the various nations in the United Nations have made up their mind that they are going to stop wherever they possibly can, be it the 38th parallel or any other line, so long as that decision is in keeping with the situation as their generals in the field see it. The opinions of these representatives will be formulated at that time. I am quite confident that the generals in the field, who are tried and proven men, realize that the feeling of the people represented at the United Nations is that they do not want war.

There is one thing of which I am sure, and I believe and I hope that the majority feel this way: that when the troops fighting in Korea reached the 38th parallel and called upon the North Koreans, who were responsible for the suffering and devastation mentioned by my hon. friend, to stop fighting and when the North Koreans refused to do so, the generals handling the tactics of our armies in Korea reported to the proper people in the United Nations that in their opinion we had better go after these fellows on the other side of the 38th parallel. We should dig them out, once and for all, and, if they could be apprehended, punish them for the atrocities they had committed. The North Koreans ignored the request of the United Nations for a cease-fire to discuss peace terms. They were impudent and arrogant, backed by Red Russia and the Red Chinese. When we ultimately arrived at the conclusion that it was necessary—and certainly the United Nations did not do so without a great deal of thought and concern about the ultimate results—our armies drove beyond the 38th parallel to the Manchurian border. They believed it was the right thing to do.

In my opinion all too frequently the question of the attitude of the Canadian government regarding our troops crossing the 38th parallel is raised in this house. The answer must be, and continue to be, that we will not cross it unless we have to do so. We will not cross it unless we think it is the best thing to do. If we have to cross it, we will. If we have to cross the Manchurian border, we will. If we have to go to Moscow, we will.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I do not altogether agree with the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) that we should stop at the 38th parallel. I believe it depends to a very large extent upon the action or intention of the North Koreans and Chinese. If they are willing to have a cease-fire when we reach the 38th parallel, so that there can be a general discussion in the hope that we may reach some agreement, then of course we can easily stop at the 38th parallel. On the other hand, if the North Koreans and Chinese are not willing to have a cease-fire, then we have to remember that the 38th parallel is not a natural defence line. In that case I believe we should proceed to advance until we have reached a line that can be easily defended, and in Korea that might well be where the land narrows.

When the resolution to unify Korea was before the general assembly, I recall that it seemed to be the general understanding that we would advance a certain distance and then establish a neutral zone. It was certainly understood that we would not go right to the Manchurian border. I gathered that it was the understanding also that Syngman Rhee would not go beyond the 38th parallel but would remain in South Korea. I do not know whether he stayed in the south, but apparently he played an important part in making political appointments in North Korea. I believe we made a great mistake in advancing to the Manchurian border, and also in allowing Syngman Rhee to make political appointments in North Korea.

During the special session last year I think I made it plain that I thought a mistake had been made in going into Korea at all. In the first instance I supported the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he refused to send troops there. Many members stated we had gone into Korea to liberate the South Koreans. At that time I ridiculed the idea, and pointed out that we were going there for one purpose only, and that was to establish the prestige of the United Nations organization so that it might be a warning to the communist armies that if they committed an act of aggression at any time they would be met by the armed forces of the United Nations. How can anyone talk about liberating people when you have to go there and smash the country and bring about the wholesale slaughter of the people? At that time I ridiculed the idea that you could have such a thing as collective security. There is no such thing. Collective action, yes, but collective action and collective security are two totally different things. We shall never have security until the member nations of the United Nations organization are willing to live up to the principles of the charter. Until that is accomplished, there will never be collective security.

We hear a lot of criticism of General MacArthur. No doubt he has made many unwise statements. On the other hand, he is in a position in which I do not believe any other general has ever been. He is in the position of having to fight an enemy with one arm tied behind his back. He is having to fight an army that is allowed to attack him from any point, while he is not allowed to attack the supply bases of the army attacking him. That is not fair to the fighting men of Canada, the fighting men of the United States, or the fighting men of our allies. Unless we can place our armies in such a position that they will be free to counter-attack the enemy at any point from which the enemy may come, then I believe we would be well advised to pull out of Korea entirely. We should draw a line, we will say through Formosa, and say: Now, if you cross that line it means war. In order to cross that line the enemy would have to have a navy. It would be an easy thing for us to stop the enemy at that point. I cannot see why we should allow the communist forces to choose the field of battle in every instance. I repeat that it is time that we chose the battleground and said: If you cross this line or that line, it means war. But let us choose a line that will be to our advantage instead of letting the enemy choose a line that is always to their advantage.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I disagree somewhat with the position taken by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). I think it would be a mistake for the United Nations to state definitely that it was their policy to stop at the 38th parallel. It would be just as great a mistake or even greater to advance so far in North Korea that again we seem to the Chinese to threaten their territory. Nevertheless this debate points up one of the most important aspects of the whole situation, and that is the essential need for civilian control over the commanders in the field. I am not certain that that objective has yet been achieved; but at the moment, so far as the tactics of the day are concerned, I believe the commanders in the field must have a reasonably free hand to decide how far they will go to secure a position which will be militarily defensible. After all, they must think of the lives of the men who are operating under them.

The commanders in the field must also consider this fact: They cannot attack the source of supply without declaring war on China; and I do not think any of us want that. Therefore all they can do is to attack the supply lines of these alleged Chinese volunteers—who are, of course, members of the Chinese army; and that can only be done in a satisfactory way if the supply line is fairly long. I reiterate my opinion that it would be a mistake just now to say definitely that it is our intention to stop at the 38th parallel.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of offering any opinion on the strategic or tactical situation. I want to make just one or two brief remarks.

I well remember my feeling on October 12 last, which I think was the date on which the 38th parallel was crossed previously. It was simple. I did not have any wisdom before the event. I did not have any extremely strong views. I just had this feeling: "I hope they know what they are doing." In retrospect, it seems to me that it is not clear that they did know what they were doing then. They disregarded the strong suggestion that had come from India as to what would be the effect of crossing the parallel. As a matter of fact, though it is a view that I personally abominate, I know that there is a strong view held by many in England—what we will call the leftist view in England—that we were grievously at fault.

Mr. Coldwell: And by some Conservatives.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That may be so. We will say it is a view that is quite broadly held in England. I happen to have seen it in an article written by G. D. H. Cole. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) may be quite right in saying that others had that view. I was astounded by that article and the want of sympathy it indicated with the course that had been taken. That is, however, merely a digression. What I want to come back to is to make this point quite simply.

It seems to me that we now have what one so seldom gets, namely a second chance—a chance to consider this situation. We have, as I see it, this unusual situation. Elements, at any rate, in the high command—men like Eisenhower and those who take what we may call the European view—certainly desire any chance with honour, or even with face-saving, which would enable us to disengage in Korea so as to be stronger elsewhere. My point is this. I believe that the ordinary man in the street in Canada also has that feeling strongly, I therefore merely wish to reiterate what the hon. member for Vancouver East has said, and say that I hope at this time it will be possible for the minister to take us more into his confidence than he has felt able to do up until now.

I do not wish to dissociate myself from what has been said about the military difficulties. Any man who knows the least thing about military operations knows that you cannot give a man a job to do and then prevent him from doing it. We all realize the difficulties in which they have been situated. I do not wish to see the commanders in the field with their hands tied so that they cannot carry out what they should do. I am only suggesting—and I understand it was the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver East—that at this time, when we have a second chance, the matter should be again reviewed, as I am sure it is being reviewed in all its aspects, and that the people of Canada should know as much as they can know about the situation now; because I believe that in overwhelming majority what they would like is that in some way this thing be stopped here and now.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should lose sight of the point of the speech made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). The speech which has just been made by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) and the one made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) show clearly, I think, that these views about the situation in Korea cut right across party lines and thinking. When I suggested to the hon. member for Greenwood that there were Conservatives in Britain who took the same view as Mr. G. D. H. Cole, I had in mind particularly one or two leading articles I read in the London Times. The London Times is by no stretch of the imagination a leftist paper, but it has been critical of the operations in Korea. I think what my hon. friend was really trying to impress on the minister and the house was that decisions that must be made to carry on this war must be political decisions; that is to say, they must be made by the political representatives of the countries that are associated in the United Nations, and particularly by the countries that are associated in the Korean affair. The fear that many people have is that this will not be done.

I was not at the United Nations assembly, as it happened, for some few days before the actual resolution was passed to cross the 38th parallel but I can remember distinctly last autumn the hesitation on the part of those of us who were there to accept the proposal when it was first made. I also remember that subsequently, in the month of November, we thought that a halt would be called and that negotiations would be opened long before the armies approached the Yalu river. But the political decision, if there was a political decision—or perhaps I should say this political understanding— was overriden by the general in the field. He may have been in consultation with his headquarters at Washington; even of that we were not particularly sure, but in any event he seemed to be paying little attention to what was, I believe, the opinion of a large group of nations in the United Nations.

Then there is what the hon. member for Greenwood has said about the constant warning that was given by India, an Asiatic nation knowing something of the feeling of these millions of people on the continent of Asia. I have no doubt that the minister of external affairs has expressed a view on this matter. But the important thing is this. I agree with the hon. member for Greenwood that not only the people of Canada but, if public opinion polls are to be relied upon, the people of the United States as well as the people of the United Kingdom, are anxious that there shall be a speedy end to this Korean campaign, with the greatest possible degree of honour to the United Nations. I believe they realize, as most of us do, that the real struggle and the real danger at the moment is not in Asia, but in western Europe, and that if we are persuaded to divert our attention and our energies to the Far East we are endangering the situation in the more vital centre elsewhere.

I agree with what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member for Winnipeg North, that in order to meet the threat of communism we should be paying much more attention to economic aid for these people than we have been.

What I really rose to say was that I hope we shall not miss the point of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East, as some obviously have done, that the decisions made should be political decisions, and that the military commanders in the field should follow those political decisions. As a matter of fact one of the things that has disturbed me in this Korean affair is that, as United Nations, we have failed to work out any effective method of controlling the military arm or the military forces assembled by the United Nations.

In our long history with these institutions that we call parliamentary, particularly in the Stuart period, and subsequently, the great struggle was as to who should control the standing army. In our parliamentary institutions we have achieved that control. It is rather different in the United States, however, where the president as commander in chief has great personal power. In our institutions nothing can be done without the actual and prior collective consent of the cabinet and of the parliamentary institution concerned.

I have been much disturbed about the lack of control of the military forces by civilian authority. At the moment we are setting up a western European force, and we are contributing to it. If I may just digress to this extent, I would say that one of the problems we should be thinking through carefully is how we are going to maintain effective civilian control of the armed forces that are being established in western Europe. I believe all the peoples of the democracies have confidence in General Eisenhower. I believe he is looked upon as being a wise man, a brilliant general, and a very human individual. But General Eisenhower may be removed; he is human. Anything may happen, and in such circumstances we do not know who would replace him. It could be someone in whom we would not have the confidence we have in General Eisenhower. And even with him, ways and means must be devised by the nations to retain control of the armed forces where that control should lie, and that is in the civilian arm of government.

The military have their tactical decisions to make after the civilian arm has laid down the objectives. I suggest that was the whole point in my hon. friend's remarks as to whether the 38th parallel is the actual place to stop. I believe it is. Whether there is a better defensive position just below or just beyond the parallel is a question, again, which should be referred to the United Nations which, in turn, would take the advice of its military advisers and reach a decision —not by Washington, not by General MacArthur, but by the United Nations, acting under instructions from their governments in unison.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I think it is rather unfortunate that this particular discussion should have come up at this time. As I see it, the Korean situation at the moment is fluid. I do not think anyone in the house, including the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), is in a position at this time to make a decision as to what the future in Korea is going to be.

I say it is inconsistent, first of all to make the statement—with which I agree—that any action taken must be collective action taken by the United Nations and then, in the next breath, to say that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should rise in his place and make a decision in the House of Commons without first having consulted with the United Nations. That is just the reverse of the first suggestion.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis: I would not, in my wildest moment, either awake or asleep, make a statement such as has been attributed to me by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I certainly did not say that; and if he says he heard me say it, then I say he was listening not to me but to someone else.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, I did not say the hon. member for Vancouver East made that statement. I did not mention his name at all. I have listened to four hon. members speak, and I gathered my information from the positions taken by those four hon. members. MacInnis—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gillis: —or the hon. member for Vancouver East, was quite explicit in wanting the Secretary of State for External Affairs to decide what Canada's position was with respect to stopping at the 38th parallel.

Mr. MacInnis: That, again, is wrong.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member had better read his Hansard.

Mr. MacInnis: You had better read it, too.

Mr. Gillis: I am summing it up as I see it. One correct statement was made by all hon. members who spoke, and that was that there is considerable confusion in the minds of the general public, including many members of the House of Commons, and that confusion arises from the fact that practically everyone one talks with outside the house, and many members in the house, are of the opinion that General MacArthur's action in crossing the 38th parallel in the first instance was contrary to United Nations policy, and that he took that action on his own initiative.

That is not the case. General MacArthur did exactly what the United Nations told him to do—"Exercise your own judgment." That position has never been changed. That mandate as to his action in the field is still the policy of the United Nations.

The unrealistic part of the situation is that action taken by the United Nations is collective action. I do not think the Secretary of State for External Affairs would be in a very sound position if he were to rise in the House of Commons and decide where General MacArthur's army is going to stop, without first having consulted with the other members of the United Nations who will make the collective decision.

The situation in Korea is such that the forces have been moving back and forth, and it is hard to tell today what the condition really is. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North in stating that I would not want to make a decision as to where General MacArthur's forces are to stop. The United Nations have been struggling for some time in an effort to have the Chinese government agree to cease fire. We know that our own minister was a member of that committee, and we also know that the attitude of the Chinese was arrogant, in that they were not going to decide where they were going to stop, except on their own terms.

We are still in that position. As the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) said, we cannot place a general in the army, give him responsibilities in a place as far removed as Korea, and then fight the war from an armchair in Washington. That cannot be done. The man in the field must exercise his authority and his knowledge of military matters.

Mr. Fulton: General Pearson.

Mr. Pearson: Corporal.

Mr. Gillis: The position as I see it, if we want to be realistic, is that we should suggest that our Secretary of State for External Affairs go back to Washington to consult with the other member nations affected in Korea, with a view to examining the situation and finding out what the present position is. If the Chinese still take an adamant stand and will make no decision except on their own terms—their attitude when their forces were on the march was that they were going to drive the united forces into the sea—there is not much use of talking about stopping anywhere. I think the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) was completely right when he said that if and when MacArthur reaches the 38th parallel and he considers that is a line which cannot be held, he should act according to what he considers is the best strategy. I think the proper line at which to concentrate our forces to the greatest extent is about seventy miles beyond the 38th parallel. This would provide a very good no man's land between the 38th parallel and the Manchurian border.

An hon. Member: Another military expert.

Mr. Gillis: I am not a military expert but I did have the privilege of packing a rifle for four years and a half through France and Belgium in a war quite similar to the war they are waging in Korea today. I think I am just as qualified to express an opinion arising out of my personal experience as are some people who have expressed opinions.

At the same time I would not want to instruct the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) who has so ably demonstrated to the country and to the United Nations that he is quite realistic and courageous and will take a stand when he thinks it is right. I am ready to accept his judgment on a matter about which I know less than he does. Otherwise he would not be in his present position.

I do not want the house to think that I am trying to tell MacArthur what he should do in Korea nor am I trying to prejudge the case before it is discussed by the United Nations. Our minister of external affairs is representing this country and when the facts are assembled he will make his decision and inform the house with regard to the situation that exists today in Korea.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the house will be glad to know that I have no intention of fighting General MacArthur's war either in Ottawa or at Lake Success. Like the hon. gentleman who has just sat down I also had the honour once of serving in the ranks. At that time I felt that I could probably fight more effectively than some of the generals in the field of strategy, but I have since learned better.

The question that is in our minds, the question that has been brought up this afternoon, is not, as has been pointed out, entirely a military question. While it certainly has military significance, it is political as well. It is a question, if I may put it that way, of whether to cross or not to cross the 38th parallel. More accurately it is a question of whether to recross or not to recross the 38th parallel.

There is a real difficulty from my point of view in dealing with this matter because at this moment, even this afternoon, informal discussions are going on in Washington with the other countries participating in the Korean campaign on the subject of what would be a proper political directive, if a directive should be issued, for the United Nations commander in Korea on this matter.

Although I do not think the United Nations has any right to fight General MacArthur's war, nevertheless it is our duty as members of the United Nations to lay down the political directives which would govern his operations. He is the first one to accept that fact. This question has come up before. As hon. members know, it came up last October when we were at the United Nations assembly. We then took a decision which authorized General MacArthur to use his own judgment whether to cross this particular line or not to cross it. We certainly have no right to complain of the decision although I think it is true to say that one of the factors in a good many minds at that time leading up to the United Nations resolution was the hope, indeed the expectation, that the crossing of this line might not result in a rush for the Manchurian or Russian border. I am not disposed to criticize that decision by virtue of hindsight because it might have been a very tempting idea at that time to clean up the war completely. It did not work out that way.

The discussions we are having now in Washington with the participating powers are concerned with this question once again. They are informal discussions, as any formal decision, or indeed any formal discussion will have to take place at the United Nations. But I think it is helpful for these countries which are participating in Korea to exchange views on this matter at this time, and that is what is going on. I do not think it is desirable for me to express any particular policy in regard to this matter at this time so far as Canada is concerned, for the reasons which have been indicated by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis).

It certainly would be unwise and unfair to the commander and to the men in the field to tell the enemy exactly what we were going to do in a military way when we reached that particular line. I think that that certainly would be playing into the hands of those whom we do not wish to help. No doubt when the decision is taken it will be governed by both military and political considerations. From the military point of view, the first responsibility of the United Nations to its commander and to its forces is not to prevent him from taking action which he may consider it necessary to take to safeguard his men. I am sure that none of us would wish to do that.

It may be possible, or it may not, for a certain type of military action to be taken which might involve the tactical crossing of a particular line or the withdrawal from that line. It is that kind of decision which has to be made and, with all respect, I do not think it can be made at this time as the result of anything I may say in this house.

Although military considerations are important, political considerations are equally important, possibly more important. When a decision was taken last October to authorize the United Nations commander to cross this line if he saw fit, there were political reasons behind that decision as well as military. The political reasons were that the United Nations felt that it should authorize necessary action to liberate and unify all of Korea. That is what we hoped would happen as a result of that decision, but unfortunately it did not happen.

I think most of us saw in our minds at that time certain dangers in that decision. Those dangers turned out to be much greater than we had realized. Possibly we were wrong in not realizing that. Well, we are up against the same kind of situation now and at least we have the advantage of experience. I hope that this time we will take all the factors into consideration so that the decision will be both militarily and politically wise.

It looks at the present time as if the situation in Korea may result in what General Ridgway, the United Nations commander in Korea, has called a military stalemate. He made that statement the other day and it was received with great interest in a number of countries. I myself would prefer to think of the situation, not so much as a military stalemate but as a stabilization of the military position. We might even reach a position where we have a sort of de facto cease-fire. What do we do then? All I would say on that point, Mr. Speaker, is that if we do reach the position of a sort of de facto cease-fire roughly along the line of the 38th parallel I think we should take advantage of that position, that military stabilization, to reopen negotiations with the people on the other side provided there is any possibility of that being brought about—and I have no illusions as to the difficulties on that score.

But if this position is to be stabilized in a way which now seems possible, it would surely be statesmanlike to take advantage of that position to see if we can work out the kind of settlement which will make it possible for us to extricate ourselves, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) has said, "with honour", from Korea, because Korea is not the main danger front. For that purpose it might be desirable to try to negotiate something along the lines of the six point proposal which was put forward by our own delegation at Lake Success after consultation with a good many other delegations. I know that that idea is in the minds of people now, and I hope that possibly we might be able to utilize a favourable military situation to bring about a favourable political situation. But there again we must never forget that it takes two to make peace although it sometimes takes only one to make war.

We have not very much ground for optimism that the Chinese communist government will meet us more than halfway in any effort of this kind. However, I hope that the opportunity may present itself, and that we may be able to work out some kind of solution which will make it possible to bring this horrible conflict in Korea to an end with honour to ourselves and with freedom and unity to the Korean people. As General Ridgway pointed out, it is not the obligation of the United Nations to unify Korea by force, but it is our obligation to do everything we can to bring about that unity. I should think that the best way in which it could be done would be by negotiation if that is possible.

The good offices committee of the United Nations has already taken action in this direction. It has made an approach to the government in Peking but it has received no reply whatever to that approach. I would think that it would be unwise for us to despair because of that fact. There may be other avenues of approach; there may be other ways in which this can be done. We should certainly, I feel, use every possible opportunity to exploit every military advantage to achieve a political result which will end this conflict. If we can do that the objective of the United Nations in Korea will have been achieved, and something may have been gained out of the horrible carnage that has gone on there because it will at least have shown that the United Nations can act effectively on the battlefield and in the council chamber.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has said that we should use the experience we have gained in the Korean operation to work out a system of control under the North Atlantic organization by which the military is brought under appropriate international civilian control, the kind of control we take for granted in our own country. There has been difficulty about this in Korea but I would point out to those who emphasize the difficulty—and at times it is a difficulty which leads to some exasperation—that its basis is the fact that in the United Nations Korean operation about 95 per cent of the actual fighting in the field has been done by the forces of one country. Naturally the government of that country is going to exercise a preponderating influence in that operation, and we should be the last to criticize that. I think that on the whole we have very little to complain about the consultation which we have managed to achieve at Lake Success and in Washington on this matter.

The translation of the results of that consultation to the commanders across the Pacific is not always as effective or as easy as we would like it to be, but I suggest that is largely because of the nature of the operation. We are working along different lines in the North Atlantic organization and we are building up not only a military organization which will be effective, we hope, in preventing war, but a political organization which will be able to control, as civilian governments should control, the military arm. I think that is all that I should say now, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to repeat once again that as we approach a decision on this matter in Korea—and we are approaching that—I hope that decision will be both politically and militarily wise.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Speaker, I have no desire at this stage to enter the debate but the minister mentioned in his address the example of the United Nations in taking forthright action to stem aggression in Korea. I want to ask the minister this question, although he may not be able to answer it offhand because I realize that statistics are sometimes illusory things even in a mind as good as that of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). I should like to know how many nations pledged help to the United Nations in the Korean war. Second, how many of those nations have a single man in the air force, navy or army in the Korean campaign? I think that is one of the situations which deserve some consideration because it is all very well, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) so well put it, for everybody to be armchair generals in this or any other parliament, with respect to the Korean campaign, but when it comes to effective action in Korea the forthright action taken by the United Nations was largely taken by one nation, as the minister pointed out. When we speak of collective action it seems to me that it has not been very collective so far as some nations are concerned even though they may have provided some token troops, or at least given some token indication of their desire to enter the campaign. I should like the minister to answer the two questions I have asked.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I think there were fifty, fifty-two or fifty-three members of the United Nations that supported the resolution declaring North Korea an aggressor, and agreed to take all action that was possible to meet the aggression. Of those fifty-three I think there are—and I speak again subject to correction—fourteen that have forces participating in military operations in Korea.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

National health branch—health services—

604. Food and drugs, further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. Knowles: I have a question to ask on this item, but before doing so, since the government seems to be jumping around in these estimates, I wonder if we could be told what is likely to be the order in which the departments will be called.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Last night I announced that we would take non-contentious items. Yesterday I was not very lucky. Today it is going a little better, but after these two items I think we will revert to agriculture and take up the special item of $65 million.

Mr. Knowles: Under this item for food and drugs, I may say that the Minister of National Health and Welfare will recall that some days ago I drew to his attention a report appearing in the Montreal Gazette which indicated that a prominent nutritionist in Montreal has stated that a good deal of the brown bread offered for sale is not whole wheat bread but is simply bread made of white flour and dyed brown by the use of molasses or other ingredients. I asked the minister if he would look into the matter, and the next day he made a statement in the house. As I recall that statement, without turning it up in Hansard, the minister said that under the Food and Drugs Act there are regulations which stipulate that if a baker puts out bread which he chooses to call Canada approved vitamin B bread, it must contain a stipulated percentage of whole wheat flour. However, he said a baker not wishing to use that label, not wishing to say it was Canada approved or vitamin B bread, came under no such regulations. This means, for example, that when unwrapped brown bread is put on the market the public has no way of knowing for sure whether it is whole wheat bread or whether it is, as the Montreal nutritionist described it, white bread dyed brown.

My purpose in raising the matter again at this time is to inquire whether consideration has been given to amending the regulations under the Food and Drugs Act so as to take care of this situation. I can tell the minister from the correspondence I have had that there is a considerable amount of interest in the matter. I find that a good many people are amazed to find that any brown bread, by virtue of being brown, would not be made from whole wheat flour. It does seem to me that the whole purpose of the act and the regulations under it is to protect people in these matters, and that a regulation governing this matter would be quite in order. I want to make it perfectly clear that there is no suggestion that any of this dyed bread fails to meet the health requirements; no suggestion is made that the ingredients used to dye it brown are not proper ingredients for human consumption. The point is that people generally assume that if bread is brown, it is whole wheat and has a certain vitamin B content. It appears now there is no guarantee of this; so my question is whether consideration will be given to amending the regulations to take care of this matter.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend reminded the house that I dealt with this question in part at page 713 of Hansard for this session, and there is no need to repeat now what I said then. He is quite correct in saying that in regard to brown bread, as distinct from vitamin B brown bread, there is no requirement as far as labelling is concerned. When we use the word "dye" I am sure my hon. friend would agree that we do not use it in the sense of a chemical dye. The colour of ordinary brown bread is generally brought about by the use of molasses or caramel, I understand, and the nutritional quality of the bread is in no way affected by the use of those substances.

My hon. friend is quite correct, I think, in saying that at least a large section of the public are under the apprehension that when they order brown bread they are buying whole wheat bread. I may say that in some of my efforts at reducing I have used brown bread from time to time thinking I was using whole wheat bread, largely for the purpose at arriving at a slimmer figure than I formerly possessed. I have not been very successful in using that formula, though I have used others and, as the committee may notice, with some success. I can only say to my hon. friend that we do not know of any brown bread of this type that is actually advertised as whole wheat bread. I am not saying there are no such cases, but my officers tell me that they do not know of any. At any rate, there is something in the point my hon. friend mentioned, and in my previous remarks I should have added that we are now having consultations to see if the regulations can be amended in some way to meet that point. I cannot say we will be successful, but I can say we are looking into the matter.

Mr. Knowles: I am very glad to hear that, and I hope the minister will be able to report progress when the main estimates are under consideration. I shall raise the matter again at that time.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Special—

576. To authorize and provide for a payment to the Canadian wheat board which shall be dealt with by the board in all respects as though it was money received from the sale of wheat produced in the designated area, sold and delivered to the board by producers during the pool period commencing on the first day of August, 1945, and ending on the thirty-first day of July, 1950, and to authorize the board, notwithstanding the provisions of subsections 2 and 3 of section 22 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, to distribute such amount together with all other moneys received by the board from the sale of such wheat, after making the deductions provided for in the said section 22, among holders of certificates issued by the board pursuant to part III of the said act during the pool period aforesaid, by paying to the person named in such certificate the same sum for each bushel of wheat referred to therein, $65,000,000.

Mr. Gardiner: This is an item, Mr. Chairman, on which there has been considerable discussion. I am not going to assume that it is necessary to follow the line of the discussion that took place last week on an amendment to a motion for the second reading of a bill, but I am going to attempt to answer what I think were legitimate questions to be asked in connection with a vote of this kind. After these answers are given I hope that under the circumstances the committee will be satisfied to pass this estimate.

I rise to move that a sum of $65 million be voted to take care of the announcement made by the Prime Minister on March 2 that this house would be asked to provide that sum to be paid the wheat board for distribution to the farmers under the five-year pool. The question has been raised as to why the payment should be made. The government has agreed that the farmers had a right to expect a payment. That is the reason for the payment being proposed.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Had a right?

Mr. Gardiner: The government has agreed that the farmers had a right to expect a payment. The United Kingdom government took the position that they did not agree they were further obligated. They have been informed from time to time that, although we must accept their decision, many of us in Canada would of necessity feel differently.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, may I ask how that was communicated, and in what form?

Mr. Gardiner: I shall give you this, and then you can ask your questions afterwards.

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Chairman, just let the record be kept clear.

Mr. Gardiner: You will find out by the time I get through with this.

Mr. Drew: The documents were tabled, and they did not indicate anything of this nature.

Mr. Gardiner: If my hon. friend thinks he is going to tell me what speech I am going to deliver in this house, he had better think again.

Mr. Drew: I am telling you what the facts are.

Mr. Gardiner: You can tell me the facts when I sit down, if you know what they are.

The United Kingdom government took the position that they did not agree they were further obligated. They have been informed from time to time that, although we must accept their decision, many of us in Canada would of necessity feel differently. We delayed taking action until they had been given every opportunity to change their position. I do not believe we can improve matters by discussing further the question of differences, although I am quite prepared to discuss them if my hon. friends want to have a discussion along that line.

The fact is that it was suggested in December, 1948, that a reasonable settlement of the "have regard to" clause would be made if the United Kingdom government would pay $100 million into the five-year pool. We estimated that the agreement entered into in January of 1949, to be applied to the sale to Britain of 140 million bushels in the fourth year of the contract, could have adjusted the amount by $35 million leaving $65 million to be met.

The question has been asked from time to time how we arrived at the figure of $65 million as related to the loan. Shortly after Sir Stafford Cripps began his drive to improve the dollar reserves of the United Kingdom, it was made apparent that this policy was going to be driven to a successful conclusion by eliminating every claim which could not be legally established. This brought on rather constant discussion of the "have regard to" clause in the wheat agreement. The matter came up first in December of 1947 when the British delegation on finance was in Ottawa; again in September of 1948 when Sir Stafford Cripps was in Ottawa; and finally in London in December of 1948 when I was there. After each of these discussions I raised the question with my colleagues as to how our claims under the "have regard to" clause could be safeguarded, and suggested holding back $100 million of the loan so that the dollar position could not be made a reason for not meeting the claim. It was explained to me on each occasion that the lack of a legal claim could make it difficult to make part of the loan available unless by mutual agreement.

When the special agreement was entered into in January of 1949, providing for a possible settlement of $35 million, I reduced my suggested caveat on the loan to $65 million. In June, 1950, shortly after the May 22 discussions, other justifiable reasons existed for reaching mutual agreement that no further amounts would be utilized from the loan excepting with Canada's consent. Unfortunately the United Kingdom took the position that the dollar reserve account would be affected by a loan in much the same manner as by paying cash, and could not be persuaded to use the remainder of the loan for the purpose suggested.

I am sure it will be understood that it could not be agreed that any arrangement entered into with Canadian farmers in 1946 could be set aside indefinitely because of dollar difficulties in the United Kingdom. When it was decided by the United Kingdom on May 22, 1950, that they were not paying more we felt we had to accept that as the legal position, and after every possible means of inducing them to reconsider their decision had been exhausted, we decided that the wheat farmer should not bear the burden of the decision alone, but that the amount we had asked the United Kingdom to pay should be taken out of the consolidated revenue fund in the financial year 1950-51 and paid into the wheat pool to be distributed as soon as possible. I use the words "wheat pool" there not in the sense that it is to be paid to the wheat pools of the different provinces but to the five-year pool that was set up under the wheat board.

We have been asked how we arrived at the figure of $100 million as a reasonable settlement for the years 1946-47, rather than $350 million as suggested by advocates of the grain exchange marketing system. We checked the method by which the grain exchange and others arrived at this figure of $350 million. I suppose it is not necessary for me to put the plan on Hansard because it has been put there a number of times by the member for Souris (Mr. Ross), and by others—I believe almost the exact figures that I am going to place on Hansard now. We took the agreement figures of the sales to Britain from the 1946 crop, which amounted to 160 million bushels, and found that on the basis of class II prices of $2.43 No. 1 northern Fort William being the world price, the difference between that and $1.55 is 88 cents or a total of $140 million. Then we took the agreement figures of sales to Britain from the 1947 crop, which amounted to 160 million bushels, and found that on the basis of class II prices of $2.88 No. 1 northern Fort William being the world price, the difference between that and $1.55 is $1.33 or a total of $212,800,000. This gives a grand total of $352,800,000, and that is the figure which has been used by all critics of this plan from the time it was first set up until the time the actual figures have become known.

But I maintain that the class II price is not a proper basis to take, first because only 89 million bushels were sold in small quantities to different countries, to many markets, and second because the entire profit of the speculative market of the United States is represented in the build-up of that price. The speculative profit would not go to the farmers and hence should not be charged to the British. This was when we were making our representations to the British at the different times I have indicated earlier in what I had to say.

In order to find a price which would only apply to farmers in a similar area, I went to the agricultural department of the United States and secured the average price received by farmers at their local points for wheat each year. I found that the difference between the average the United States farmer received and what the Canadian farmer received for his 1946 crop was not 88 cents but 33 cents. This on the contract sale of 160 million bushels to Great Britain in 1946 would be $52,800,000. The difference between the average the United States farmer would receive and what the Canadian farmer would receive for his 1947 crop was not $1.33 on the basis used by exchange critics, but 71 cents. This on the contract sale of 160 million bushels to Great Britain in 1947 would be $113,600,000. The grand total would be $166,400,000.

On March 8 when dealing with this matter I was criticized for going back into the drought years when I said that over the previous fifteen years the United States farmer received 15 cents a bushel on the average more than the Canadian farmer and on this basis a deduction of $48 million should be made on 320 million bushels of wheat covered by the contract in the first two years. If I were to meet the wishes of the critics and take the five years previous to the contract which is probably more fair the figure would be not 15 cents but 23 cents, and the deduction would be $73,600,000.

On the first basis this would leave $118,400,000 of a difference still to be dealt with; and on the second basis it would be $92,800,000.

When these calculations were made to the United Kingdom the actual figures were not available. They are now. I am sure that if they are used instead of the amounts in the agreement and if the further fact is acknowledged that the speculative profit is in the class II sales, the figure of $100 million will be acknowledged as reasonable. If we deduct $35 million already agreed to the figure is $65 million.

We think it was reasonable for the wheat farmers to have expected another $65 million under the terms of the United Kingdom agreement. We have decided that the ratepayers of Canada will not object to paying this $65 million and we trust that the fact that it is being paid, and the questions raised by the farmers thus settled, will result in a discontinuance of the kind of discussion to which we listened for six days last week.

The matter is in the hands of the committee, Mr. Chairman. I am quite prepared to answer all the suggestions that were made the other day with regard to lack of truthfulness, the suggestions that were made with regard to misrepresentation and the charges that have been made in other terms. But I am not going to invite the discussion by attempting to answer them in advance.

On the one matter that probably was in th minds of hon. members more than any other last week, may I say that I had not expected until a few moments ago to have any remarks that I might have found necessary to make so well illustrated on the other side of the house. It had been argued here for six days that there was some difference of opinion as between members of the government. If there could have been any better demonstration of the fact that there are differences of opinion on the other side of the house with respect to important questions, I should like to know what it is; it only required what took place in the last hour to demonstrate the truth that there are differences. All of the groups on the other side of the house were divided on an important question. I venture to say that if it were possible for any one of the leaders of the opposition in this house to muster sufficient force to form a government, some of those who were differing in expressing their views would likely be members of that government.

I want to add this in closing my remarks with regard to the suggestions that have been made. I am quite satisfied that if the leader of the C.C.F. party or the leader of the Conservative party were able to form a government in Canada, neither the Minister of Trade and Commerce nor myself would be in it.

Mr. Drew: That is certain.

Mr. Gardiner: And, Mr. Chairman, there would be a number of reasons as to why we would not. We are both quite satisfied to be where we are. One of the reasons why we are satisfied to be where we are is that we both know that we can afford to make statements knowing that we might be incorrect because we have a leader who does not make many mistakes; and we are quite satisfied that when we present arguments upon which we do not fully agree, if we present them clearly enough and set forth all the facts, the judicial mind of the leader of the Liberal party and the leader of the government will so sift out the facts and so express the conclusions that, when he has expressed them, we can both agree with the decision that he has arrived at.

After all, when we chose a leader we selected one we have confidence in. I am afraid that some of my friends on the other side of the house had certain reasons for the positions they were taking. My friends in the west were starting out with the idea that they were going to wipe the ground with the Minister of Trade and Commerce because they were going to accuse him of having killed any possibility of payment to the western farmers. My friends a little nearer the Speaker were going to utilize some periodicals in eastern Canada and some others in order to demonstrate that the Minister of Agriculture had taken out of the treasury $65 million that never should have been taken out; and so by walloping the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the west and the Minister of Agriculture in the east, they were going to get a government under the leadership of men who cannot control the membership of their own parties, as was demonstrated within the experience of this house within the last hour. There were three of them on their feet over there at one time in the C.C.F. party, trying to demonstrate that remarks that they made some time ago, as reported in Hansard, were not as they were being quoted by other members of their party. If my hon. friend wants to carry on his discussion any further with regard to what has been taking place recently in the province of Saskatchewan and elsewhere, I am quite prepared to go on with the discussion; but for the time being, I would prefer to have the $65 million passed.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, this chamber has listened to one of the most specious arguments ever presented to it since I have been here. It has listened to a statement by one of the senior members of this government which has established clearly that he does not even begin to understand the basic principles of our parliamentary system of responsible government. When he spoke of the fact that members on the other side of the house in speaking on the subject were not in agreement, and that this justified the measure of disagreement between members of the government to which he belongs, he simply displayed his common disregard for the fundamental principles of cabinet solidarity, which is the very foundation of our system of responsible government.

Mr. Gardiner: The government has much greater solidarity than any Conservative government we have ever had in Canada.

An hon. Member: How about price controls?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, these tawdry political remarks of the Minister of Agriculture—

Mr. Gardiner: Don't get angry.

Mr. Drew: These tawdry political remarks of the Minister of Agriculture, who has just spoken, simply indicate the basis upon which this whole problem is being approached.

He has returned to the house today and, not satisfied with his reckless disregard for the good will between the governments of Canada and Great Britain, he goes still further and now tries to carry forward his plan by sowing discontent between east and west. Having followed a thoroughly contemptible course in his earlier speech—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —he carries the same very contemptible course forward in his present remarks.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the hon. member has the right to refer to the remarks of any member as being contemptible.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

The Chairman: I think the leader of the opposition should modify the expression.

An hon. Member: Could the chairman keep order now?

Mr. Gardiner: Keep cool, and you will not use those words.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Agriculture has placed upon the record—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Agriculture has placed upon the record statements to the effect that it was the continuing representation to the government of the United Kingdom in regard to these payments which leaves the impression that the government of the United Kingdom has not fulfilled its obligation.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, a point of order was raised and I think you should rule upon it. If you decide that the expression "contemptible conduct"—

Mr. Drew: No, "contemptible remarks".

Mr. St. Laurent: —is parliamentary, we will respect your decision. But I do not think the leader of the opposition is entitled to go on until that matter has been disposed of.

The Chairman: I must rule that the remark of the leader of the opposition was unparliamentary.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

The Chairman: I would ask him to modify it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, there had been no ruling made that my remarks were to be withdrawn, and until there is a ruling I do not intend to withdraw them.

Mr. Gardiner: He just made it.

Mr. Drew: No.

The Chairman: If the remark is unparliamentary, I have to rule that it should be withdrawn.

An hon. Member: "If".

The Chairman: Or modified.

Mr. Drew: If it is ruled unparliamentary, that is different; but you have not ruled that it is unparliamentary.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes, he has.

The Chairman: I have; and I ask the leader of the opposition to modify or withdraw it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, under your direction I will withdraw. I certainly shall not modify it.

The Minister of Agriculture has sought to re-emphasize in the house the impression that the government of the United Kingdom did not make the payments it should have made. That is the basic difference between the points of view put forward by two ministers, which is of the utmost importance in dealing with the payment now before the parliament of Canada, and for which the government is asking approval.

On Thursday last, as sessional paper 113-A, the records of the meeting of May 22 of last year in London were placed upon the table, and also a copy of the message sent to the government of the United Kingdom on May 30. These records do not leave any impression that the government of Canada was simply recognizing the declaration by the government of the United Kingdom that nothing further was owing. On the contrary these make it perfectly clear that, as of May 30 of last year, the government of Canada in a formal declaration, communicated through official channels, agreed with the government of the United Kingdom that nothing further was owing.

There is a very great difference between those two positions. What is more, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) went to some pains in the house a week ago Monday to make it perfectly clear that in his opinion the government of the United Kingdom had fulfilled its part of the contract in every way. What is more, he finished his remarks by deploring the fact that anyone should suggest that the government of the United Kingdom had not played fair with the government and people of Canada.

Those two positions cannot go hand in hand. Those two positions have a profound effect upon the subject we are now considering. If there was in fact a belief on the part of the government of Canada that there was some balance owing in respect of the contract, then it might be natural that the government would say, "We entered into a contract believing it would be setting up a certain basis, and we are going to make good the difference between what we think should have been done and what actually was done."

But that is not the position of the government. By their agreement on May 30 last year that the government of the United Kingdom had carried out its obligation in full, they denied the possibility that they can now assert as a government that there was any balance owing under that contract. Therefore the payment now proposed by the government must be on some other basis—and we are still waiting to be told what that basis is.

Since the government by its own decision of May 30 last year cannot possibly ask the House of Commons now to approve of a payment in respect of a contract which had been fully paid, then they must ask us to approve of this under some other principle, and upon some other basis.

In the earlier discussions on the subject it was pointed out that there might be another basis. When the government takes over wheat, or any agricultural product —or in fact any product of any kind, or any personal service—by compulsion, then unquestionably there is a moral obligation on the part of the government to reimburse those whose products or services are being taken under compulsion, and to reimburse them on a just and proper basis. If that is the basis then we are still waiting to be told that that is the principle under which the payment is to be made. What we have pointed out is that if such principle is enunciated in this house then obviously that principle must apply with equal force to every other agricultural producer, to the hog raiser, to the fruit grower, to the potato grower, to the dairy producer, to everyone else whose products are taken over under the compulsion that goes with the emergency powers now possessed by the government. The same principle would apply with equal force to production of every kind and to personal services as well.

It has been made abundantly clear that in this house there is a desire to make sure that people in every part of this country are dealt with fairly and properly and justly wherever the government takes action that denies to the individual the right to assert his own position as to what he shall receive for his product or for his services. The explanation given today for the manner in which the $65 million was determined as the figure to be paid does not show any mathematical basis for the calculation of that amount. The obvious fact is that there was $65 million still unclaimed of the loan made available to the government of the United Kingdom. Whether we use the euphonious expression that it was pointed out to the government of the United Kingdom that there was $65 million available for this purpose, or whether we say that it was suggested to the government of the United Kingdom that they should pay $65 million as the balance under this contract by taking up the remainder of the loan and then paying it over to the government, the fact is that the figure of $65 million was arrived at in that way. No other basis of computation has been put forward as yet.

Mr. Gardiner: You were too angry to hear it.

Mr. Drew: Members of this house will read in Hansard a confused mass of figures which show no mathematical basis for arriving at the figure of $65 million.

Mr. Gardiner: They all understand it but you.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Agriculture has placed before this house still further reasons why it would have been highly desirable that the government should establish what the principle is under which the payment is to be made and then, having established that, set up a royal commission to inquire into what the balance really is under the principle set forth. That would give the members of this house some accurate estimate upon which they could base a conclusion, and it would give them the essential facts in relation to an understandable principle. We have not yet received any information of that kind.

What has been put before us today is a repetition of earlier statements which could only convey the impression gained from the earlier speech of the Minister of Agriculture, as demonstrated by statements made in this house by other Liberal members. It will be recalled by members who were here at the time that with the impression left by the Minister of Agriculture such terms as "repudiation" were used, and it will be recalled also that one Liberal member, obviously basing his views upon the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture, said that the government of the United Kingdom was not playing ball.

The Minister of Agriculture is prepared to sow the seeds of distrust between this government and the government of the United Kingdom to back up an argument which is not in accord either with the record or with the statement made in this house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It appears from the remarks he has made today that he is prepared to carry the same procedure still further and to seek to deal with every question that is raised in regard to this by trying to sow further distrust between different parts of this country.

This is a matter which affects all Canadians. On the one hand are those who were called upon to deliver their wheat to the government under the compulsion of the authority possessed by the government at that time, and on the other hand are the taxpayers of Canada who will pay whatever settlement is made. As has been said already, there could be no suggestion here that the taxpayers of Canada wherever they live will not be ready to support the payment of whatever obligation is clearly established by proper methods. I am sure that people in every part of this country will recognize that payment made upon any other basis would only leave a most unsatisfactory situation in which there would be no clear understanding as to how similar obligations would be dealt with in the future. Mr.

Chairman, for that reason I move, seconded by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks):

That consideration of this item be deferred until the committee has been informed as to the principle under which a payment of $65 million is to be made and the method by which the said amount has been arrived at.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the motion made by the Minister of Agriculture to approve the $65 million appropriation. I think it would be most unfortunate if any delay occurred in making the final payment to the farmers. Many of our western farmers were disappointed in their crops last year because of frost and low prices and the fact that some is still left unthreshed and they need the money that is coming to them. Although we think the amount suggested is inadequate to compensate the western farmers we shall support the motion, and I want to see it passed as rapidly as possible in order that the money may be paid to the farmers of western Canada without undue delay.

I know that the question of payment to the farmers of the west for the manner in which they subsidized the bread of the Canadian people during the war years forms no part of this appropriation. I could wish, and indeed if the rules of the house would allow it I would move, that an additional $48 million, the sum estimated, be put in the estimates to compensate the western farmers for the low price they received for grain milled in Canada to provide the Canadian people with a cheap loaf during the war. As I say, that cannot be done from this side of the house. The rules do not allow it.

I am not going to enter into any prolonged discussion. We had that last week and the record must speak for itself. The only comment I am going to make on what the Minister of Agriculture said this afternoon regarding the British agreement and the settlement that was made in May of last year is that on the 22nd of May the Minister of Trade and Commerce met the Chancellor of the Exchequer in London and, as is indicated by the papers that have been tabled in this house and which are a matter of record on Hansard, he came back with an agreed minute expressing the opinion of the British government that the obligations under the agreement had been fully met. On May 30 the cabinet of Canada authorized the Minister of Trade and Commerce to send a message to the British which in effect accepted that position.

The point I am making is that if the government felt at that time that the British had not fulfilled their obligations fully then, instead of sending that message of acceptance through the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the proper thing to have done would have been to have said: We are not satisfied with your proposal or, if the minister likes it better, we are not satisfied with your view. We are not accepting it. We are asking that the negotiations continue. Then the situation would have been entirely different. There could be no finality at the London conference. That was made very clear by both ministers, and indeed by the Prime Minister. The finality was reached in Ottawa.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask my hon. friend a question? It probably would relieve both of us from the necessity of discussing it further. Did the Minister of Trade and Commerce not say in the discussions the other day that what he said in Great Britain was that it would be necessary for the minister who had negotiated the contract to come over?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, he did, and he put it into Hansard twice.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gardiner: Certainly. Go back and read your Hansard.

Mr. Coldwell: I have.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, I can read it too if you want it read.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister will have to show me that in Hansard because I have followed this debate very carefully.

Mr. Johnston: Is it revised or unrevised?

An hon. Member: The answer is yes.

Mr. Gardiner: I will not make the obvious remark in reply to that.

Mr. Noseworthy: Not punctuated properly.

Mr. Gardiner: Go on with your speech. I will look it up.

Mr. Coldwell: I am willing to give the minister time to look it up. Certainly I have no recollection of that statement having been made.

Mr. Gardiner: You should have because you made him read it all the way through.

Mr. Drew: May I suggest that we take time for the minister to read this. It will be useful.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has the floor.

Mr. Knowles: Just hold on to the floor. But how will Hansard record the lapse of time?

Mr. Gardiner: Don't get excited. It is here.

Mr. Johnston: Should there not be a time limit on this? Page the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Gardiner: I had it buried amongst other papers. It is to be found on page 1072 of Hansard for March 8 about two-thirds of the way down the page. It reads:

I told those present that we looked to the minister who negotiated the agreement in the first place to negotiate the settlement, and that all I could do was to carry back a report of the discussions.

Now do you admit it?

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: Read it.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not have to read it. The minister has read it and he has read it correctly.

An hon. Member: Are you satisfied?

Mr. Coldwell: What I want to say is that I do not think the minister can interpret those words in the manner in which he is interpreting them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Coldwell: Oh, no, no. You can laugh. Let me read the whole paragraph and I think we will get the context and then the meaning.

Mr. Gardiner: If you read it all it will be much better than what I read.

Mr. Coldwell: It may be. I have not read it yet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: I thought you said you had. I thought you said you followed it very closely.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Coldwell: Just a minute. There was no occasion for the rather silly haw-hawing from the other side when I said I had not read it. I have not read it now. I remember hearing it when it was spoken in the house. I have not seen it since, but let me read it. The minister says it will put the matter in a better light from his point of view. If it does, I am simply being fair to him by giving the context, and that is what I try to do. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I am entitled to keep the record straight so far as I am concerned. I may say that the discussions about the disposal of the 1950 crop took place before there was any mention of the five year pool. That matter was discussed and settled and then discussions were opened on the five year pool, against our wishes really. I made it clear at the outset I had no authority to discuss or settle. I told those present that we looked to the minister who negotiated the agreement in the first place to negotiate the settlement, and that all I could do was carry back a report of the discussions. Nevertheless when the discussions continued I got a very positive statement from the chancellor of the exchequer, and there were other ministers present. I had to take their views back to my colleagues as the position of the United Kingdom government. I reported that position to them. The decision, if there was any decision, was made after I returned.

What is the interpretation? Obviously the interpretation is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he had not negotiated the original agreement and that the minister who had negotiated it should be in on the settlement.

Mr. Gardiner: May I just point out one other thing in relation to it. In the discussions the other evening, when we were talking back and forth across the floor, I made it very plain that that was the question at issue in the discussion overseas. The Minister of Trade and Commerce took the position that the minister who negotiated the arrangement should come back over to complete the negotiations.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fair: That is not stated here.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes it is; and I am repeating it whether or not it is there. That is the position the Minister of Trade and Commerce took. He came back and made that representation and said there was no use my going over because they had already made up their minds what they were going to do.

Mr. Coldwell: Very well. I was just going to say the Minister of Trade and Commerce came back. Apparently he made the statement the minister has just mentioned, and the cabinet decided that the minister who negotiated the agreement, the Minister of Agriculture, should not go to Britain to negotiate the final agreement. The final agreement outlined in the memorandum was then approved by the cabinet, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce so notified the government of Britain on May 30, 1950. Those are the facts.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend will have to read more of Hansard in order to get all the answers. He has not read it all yet.

Mr. Coldwell: I did not interrupt the minister, so let us not have these interruptions. When the position is so clear let us not becloud it. Let me put it on record again. On May 22 the Minister of Trade and Commerce met the chancellor of the exchequer and a committee in London. On that date, whether willingly or unwillingly, the minister discussed this matter with the chancellor of the exchequer. A minute was agreed upon, and that minute states very clearly that it might be considered that all obligations under this agreement had been fulfilled. The minister returned to Canada. A week elapsed. During that week no representatives of the farm organizations were called in to discuss the matter; no members of the wheat advisory board were called in to discuss it. On May 30 the Minister of Trade and Commerce was authorized to send a message to the chancellor of the exchequer saying the Canadian government accepted the view expressed by the government of Britain in the minute sent to this country. That is the point I am making; and while the Minister of Trade and Commerce may have said something else in London, it was not fulfilled in Ottawa during that week from May 22 to May 30. So I express the hope that we shall hear no more of these suggestions that the British more or less welshed on the agreement. If I may say so, I think I agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I believe the Minister of Agriculture said it also, that it would have been better if a further payment had been made at that time. But in the final analysis the government of Canada is responsible for that payment not having been made. They did not endeavour to negotiate further when this document was brought back from London.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, Mr. Chairman, is my hon. friend saying that the remark I made a few moments ago was false?

Mr. Coldwell: No, I did not say that.

Mr. Gardiner: The chancellor of the exchequer definitely said, according to the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that they were not prepared to discuss that question further. Can the hon. member imagine the Minister of Agriculture travelling all the way across the ocean to discuss something they had already said they would not discuss?

Mr. Coldwell: Of course that is what the minister did ultimately.

Mr. Gardiner: The minister did that after the gentleman who made that suggestion was not in the government.

Mr. Coldwell: This business of making statements regarding ministers of other countries, when we have to negotiate with the governments of those countries, is pretty serious, I think. I am not suggesting that the Minister of Agriculture could go over when his own government decided they would accept the British position. What I am saying is that we have two governments, the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Canada. We like to think that in this commonwealth of nations all our countries are equal, none being subservient to any other. If we are equal to one another, then the Canadian government should have assumed that equality and said, "That may be your view. It is not our view, and we want to negotiate this matter further." No individual in any government has the right to prevent further negotiations, and I am certain that if further negotiations had been demanded they would have taken place. So let us stop making insinuations.

I am going to follow the example set by the Minister of Agriculture and not go into other matters in connection with this agreement. I want to reiterate what I said when I first rose, that we want to see this appropriation passed expeditiously, though we do not think it is enough. The minister will remember that in August, 1946, when this agreement was under discussion I made the statement, which I repeat now, that if through government policy the costs of production rose during the lifetime of this agreement, it was the duty of the government of Canada, not the government of another country, to make a compensatory adjustment out of the revenue of Canada. This is an inadequate instalment, insufficient but nonetheless something I think the house should support under the circumstances.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Before the debate continues, Mr. Chairman, I want to submit that the amendment of the leader of the opposition is out of order. It reads:

> That consideration of this item be deferred until the committee has been informed as to the principle under which a payment of $65 million is to be made and the method by which the said amount has been arrived at.

If you will look at Beauchesne, third edition, citation 480 on page 178, you will see that it reads:

> The only motion allowed, when a resolution is under consideration in committee of supply, is that the amount be reduced or that the chairman leave the chair . . .
> Each resolution can only be dealt with by being agreed to, reduced, negatived, superseded, or, by leave, withdrawn, and the withdrawal can be made although the decision of the committee has been taken upon amendments proposed to the resolution. Here, the power of the committee ceases. It is not allowable to attach a condition or an expression of opinion to a vote or to change the destination of a grant.

And the following citation, 481:

> A proposed resolution may be allowed to stand over with general consent until another occasion, but if it has been regularly proposed from the chair and discussed, no motion for its postponement is regular because there is no period to which it can be postponed.

If you carefully read the amendment you will see that it does not fall under this citation, in that it does not reduce or supersede the resolution, or ask leave that it be withdrawn. I submit, therefore, that the amendment should be declared out of order.

The Deputy Chairman: Do other hon. members wish to speak on the point of order?

Mr. Fulton: Do you not think the wording of the amendment would bring it clearly—

Mr. Pouliot: Would you please read it again?

The Deputy Chairman: I shall read the amendment again.

That consideration of this item be deferred until the committee has been informed as to the principle under which a payment of $65 million is to be made and the method by which the said amount has been arrived at.

Mr. Fulton: I was going to ask, Mr. Chairman, whether it is not your opinion that the effect of the wording of this amendment is such as to bring it within the citation referred to by the Minister of Public Works which states that a resolution can only be dealt with by being agreed to, reduced, negatived, superseded or, by leave, withdrawn. It is the word "superseded" to which I should like to direct your attention.

This amendment does not seek to postpone the resolution to a certain period or to defer it absolutely, nor does it express an opinion contrary to the subject matter of the resolution. The resolution is for the granting of $65 million for a certain purpose. The motion made by my leader merely asks that it be superseded for the time being until a discussion has taken place, and the principle has been established upon which this is to be granted. Then a discussion could be undertaken as to whether the granting of the actual sum asked for, namely $65 million, is justified; so I submit the motion is not out of order.

Mr. Pouliot: I submit that the amendment is completely out of order, and for this reason. A distinction should be made between an increase and a decrease in the amount which is to be voted by parliament. If the leader of the opposition and the member for Rosetown-Biggar had moved and seconded—

Mr. Coldwell: Pardon me, I did not move anything.

Mr. Pouliot: No; I said if they had.

Mr. Coldwell: But I did not.

Mr. Pouliot: No, and I want the hon. gentleman to be as gentle as he normally is. I assume that the leader of the opposition might have sponsored an amendment, and that the member for Rosetown-Biggar might have seconded it.

Mr. Coldwell: But he did not.

Mr. Pouliot: I know. This is mere supposition. Let us suppose that the said amendment had been to decrease the amount of $65 million. The said amendment of the leader of the opposition and the leader of the C.C.F.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

would have been to decrease the amount of $65 million to $1. Then, I would have said "This is the best political achievement of both of them." I will add this—that I would have supported that amendment.

Mr. Fulton: Why not move it yourself?

Mr. Pouliot: For $1, yes, but not $65 million. Let us divide $1 between 260,000 great westerners, and we shall see the result.

Now that the house is in a good mood, and seems disposed to accept a few words of truth and consideration in accordance with the rules of the house, I shall remind the leader of the opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. group, jointly and severally, that according to the purest and safest British doctrine, no member can propose, by amendment or otherwise, a larger expenditure than the one that is submitted to the house by the government after the approval of His Excellency the Governor General. If the leader of the opposition has moved an amendment which has won the support of his closest opponent, the leader of the C.C.F.—

Mr. Coldwell: No, I am opposed to it.

Mr. Pouliot: Well, I am too.

Mr. Coldwell: Then, we agree.

Mr. Pouliot: If we all agree on the amendment, let us express our opinion that we are against it. But I come to this point, and the leader of the opposition understands my point before I have expressed it. I want to torture him a little by not coming to my conclusion at once, and I say that in the friendliest manner. It is that he is too subtle a politician to make a move to reduce the amount of the appropriation. I challenge him to say that he wants to send it back to a committee or something like that, to have it reduced. He will never say that. He wants it increased.

Mr. Brooks: He wants it justified.

Mr. Pouliot: That is hair-splitting. Let us be sincere and honest about this big amount. I am not a mind reader, but there is no one in this house, with perhaps the exception of the member for Rosetown-Biggar, who has not read in the mind of the leader of the opposition that he wants a larger amount of money offered to the westerner than the appropriation.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I believe I have heard sufficient to make a ruling at this point.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words before you do so.

Mr. Pouliot: Thank you, I was just concluding. I would say that, otherwise, the move by the hon. gentleman who leads His Majesty's loyal opposition in this house would be meaningless, and he is much above that.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I would point out that what we are discussing is one of the annotations, comments, and precedents and not one of the standing orders. It does refer to a practice that has been established, and I recognize that. These annotations result from discussions which take place, and decisions that are made. They change from time to time in view of the opinion of the house as to the manner in which debate can best be considered.

I would point out that the motion which is now before the committee is a motion that is consistent with what is frequently done while the house is in committee. Over and over again, the proposal is made that an item stand until further information is available. Frequently, that proposal is accepted and items do stand in that way. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the motion now before you is simply a motion which makes it possible for the members to express an opinion entirely consistent with the practice which has grown up here, and which has been regularized by acceptance over a long time.

There is one thing about the arguments of the hon. member for Temiscouata. Undoubtedly he contributes greatly to the good feeling within the chamber. As he himself has said, the committee seemed to be in good humour. I will say quite frankly that no one contributes more to the good humour than he does.

Mr. Pouliot: Thank you.

Mr. Drew: Sometimes, of course, it is difficult to follow the exact train of the argument, but the result is excellent. In this particular case the hon. member for Temiscouata undoubtedly has produced an atmosphere in which a subject of this kind can be discussed in a friendly and congenial way. In spite of our growing friendship, I must admit I was slightly startled by his suggestion that at this distance he could read my mind. I have no intention of moving to reduce this item to $1, for a reason which is clear. The motion to reduce this item to $1 would imply that we had information which made it possible to suggest that $1 was the proper figure. No such information is before us. That is the reason I have presented this motion.

I will satisfy the curiosity of the hon. member for Temiscouata by informing him that if this motion is not accepted, I certainly do not intend to support the main motion. In view of the fact that information is not available, I do not propose to move that it be reduced to $1 because that would imply that I was recognizing that we had sufficient information to make that decision and thought that only $1 should be paid.

I have made it clear that I believe that the people in every part of Canada wish to deal fairly with this problem. I am satisfied that the members of the committee require information before voting. My motion is simply for the purpose of carrying out a practice long established, that of seeking the deferment of the consideration of the item until we have the information upon which that consideration can be made.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If the hon. gentleman wishes to have information, it is not to be obtained by deferring consideration of the item and taking it away from the committee. We are to defer what? Consideration of that item which provides for an amount of $65 million to be paid into the pool. If you stop the committee from discussing that item by your motion, I do not know how you will get the information. The Minister of Agriculture is here and he is ready to answer any question. He gave you notice of his willingness to discuss the matter. He said: If you want to discuss this matter at length, I am ready to do so; and I will answer any question that is asked. Perhaps the hon. member for Kamloops and the leader of the opposition might agree on their stand as to the legality of their motion. One says that the motion is in order if we consider the word supersede in the citation. I cannot agree. By what does he want to supersede the $65 million? Does he just want to defer discussion on the item and replace it by something else? If so, what? He has not made any concrete suggestion as to what he wished to have. The leader of the opposition says that every day in committee of supply we have items stand. Certainly we do, Mr. Chairman, by agreement. But you never had an item stand unless it was by unanimous consent. And it is not done by formal motion. But this is a formal motion by which he says that he will have this item deferred, because he has not enough information. While it is deferred we will have to take up other items. I am just wondering how the hon. gentleman would get the information he desires. When we are so ready to give that information, I would suggest that we proceed with the giving of the information, and that the motion be declared out of order.

Mr. Pouliot: May I ask a question of the leader of the opposition?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member wishes to ask a question of the leader of the opposition, the latter must give his consent.

Mr. Pouliot: I know that. I do not want to force any question upon him.

Mr. Drew: I have no objection to any question being asked.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank the hon. gentleman. Having noted that he said he did not want the item to be reduced, may I ask if he is ready to say that he does not want it to be increased and therefore it should be voted as it is?

The Deputy Chairman: I think that the point of order raised by the acting leader of the house is well taken. As a matter of fact, citations 480, 481 and 482 of Beauchesne, third edition, to be found at page 178, are quite clear on the point. The object of the amendment is clearly to defer, not to supersede. In any event, I will read the citations to which I have just referred. They are as follows:

480. The only motion allowed, when a resolution is under consideration in committee of supply, is that the amount be reduced or that the chairman leave the chair . . .

Each resolution can only be dealt with by being agreed to, reduced, negatived, superseded, or, by leave, withdrawn, and the withdrawal can be made although the decision of the committee has been taken upon amendments proposed to the resolution. Here, the power of the committee ceases.

It is not allowable to attach a condition or an expression of opinion to a vote or to change the destination of a grant.

481. A proposed resolution may be allowed to stand over with general consent—

I should like to draw the attention of the committee to those three words "with general consent." It is true that it is the practice of this house to have resolutions stand over, but it is only done with general consent. The citation continues:

—until another occasion, but if it has been regularly proposed from the chair—

And this is the case in this instance.

—and discussed, no motion for its postponement is regular because there is no period to which it can be postponed.

482. When a resolution is proposed in a committee of the whole (not of supply),—

I wish to draw the attention of the committee to those three words as well, "not of supply".

—every amendment may be moved which might be moved to such a resolution, if proposed in the house itself.

In view of these citations that I have just read, I have no alternative but to declare this amendment out of order.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

At six o'clock the Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin) resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

TRANS MOUNTAIN OIL PIPE LINE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 115, to incorporate Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company—Mr. Laing—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in connection with this bill. I would call attention to a heading which appeared in a newspaper and which I feel is perhaps applicable to some who, as yet, have not seen the advantage in our endeavour not only to build up British Columbia but to build Canada as a whole. This article bears a Massachusetts dateline, but I believe it would apply elsewhere. The heading is, "774 Vote for Man Dead Two Weeks". It struck me that this might apply to those who as yet have not realized that there is such a thing as the province of British Columbia, and who do not know just how worth while it is to build up that province, thereby improving the entire economy of Canada, and particularly that of Alberta.

In the last couple of years some of us have been accused of conducting a filibuster. This is what the Vancouver Sun of March 15 has to say on the subject:

Filibuster Without Guns

British Columbia members of parliament are fighting in Commons to guarantee an oil industry in this province. And they rightly object to their struggle being dubbed a "filibuster."

They want parliament to make sure that any oil pipe line from Alberta to the coast is routed through B.C. and Vancouver so Canada will get a crack at the oil flow before U.S. does. They're opposed to incorporating any company that would skip B.C. to enter the U.S. through southern Alberta.

If it takes a hundred speeches to pound home the legitimate economic interests of B.C. that still isn't a "filibuster."

And, mark you, this is the Vancouver Sun; this is not a section of the press that believes in the building up of British Columbia only.

The word nowadays means "organized obstruction tactics by dilatory motions or artifices."

Perhaps B.C. members should use the word against supporters of U.S. routes. They could remind parliament that originally a filibuster was an armed raid against a peaceful country to secure loot. They could argue that companies which propose to pipe Canadian oil first to Seattle and Portland just lack the guns.

Vancouver got an indication this week of what a pipe line from Edmonton oilfields through the Yellowhead pass to this city could mean. British American Oil Company announced it would build a $10 million refinery here.

And may I add that if hon. members were to check Hansard they would find that that is exactly what those of us who have been fighting this battle for two years have been saying. This $10 million is just a beginning in the development of our province. It is unfortunate that this heading had not appeared earlier.

It might be too expensive to supply such a plant by tanker from Seattle or Portland.

The Yellowhead route also opens tremendous prospects for the development of B.C.'s Peace river oilfields.

This is of particular significance to some, so I shall repeat it:

The Yellowhead route also opens tremendous prospects for the development of B.C.'s Peace river oilfields. A major discovery there could be drained off by a feeder line running due south to join the main line in central B.C. That couldn't be done if the main line ran through Alberta.

Nor have parliamentary supporters of the U.S. route backed up their claim that a line running 400 miles south through Alberta then swinging west to the coast would be cheaper than an all-B.C. line. The B.C. route follows the C.N.R.'s easy grade over the Rockies for a direct 750 miles to Vancouver.

Though parliament hasn't the power to fix actual routes, it needn't encourage any route that skips B.C. It needn't incorporate any company proposing a U.S. route when already incorporated companies are pledged to B.C. pipe lines.

And all M.P.'s should remember that Vancouver is the west coast port of Canada as well as of B.C.

I am very pleased to have taken part in the development set out in this editorial, and to have had associated with me other members from British Columbia. I know hon. members from other provinces who in the last two years came to our aid will pardon me if I do not make reference to them. Time does not permit me to cover the ground in full—because this is one of the bills I want to see passed tonight.

However I should like first to refer to the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), a most courteous, courageous and cultured member. Representing the constituency of West Kootenay, he represents probably the second most beautiful riding in British Columbia. May I suggest to hon. members, particularly those from Ontario, who have not had the privilege of seeing the beauties of the Pacific coast, that if they have the opportunity to visit West Kootenay they should pay special attention to the delightful little town of Nakusp.

Then I would make special reference to the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), whose constituency we regard as a climatic paradise, and the hub of interior British Columbia. May I add that, in a small way, they also raise fruit. Then, from the famous Okanagan, the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones) came to our help. Some hon. members who may have credited the Fraser valley with producing the magnificent apples not only displayed to the house but sold throughout eastern Canada may not realize that the credit belongs to the constituency of Yale.

Then I move on to Comox-Alberni. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), whose only fault may be his over-generosity, helped us ably. I now come to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), that persistent and methodical member who displayed his persistency and his methodical effort last year and the year before in endeavouring to build up his city, the third largest in Canada and, in the opinion of those of us from British Columbia, the most beautiful on the North American continent.

I must not forget my hon. friend from Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) with his keen and—I cannot very well pronounce this word; I shall have to look at my notes to make sure of it—analytical mind.

Those are a few. I might make reference to the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), who acquitted himself so well in the 29th battalion, and who supported the west, particularly British Columbia, both last year and the year before. Perhaps he will forgive my not saying any more about him. I am sure however that I may be forgiven for making mention of one other gentleman, one who had the keenest mind of any in the House of Commons, whose mind was unsurpassed by that of any since my time in parliament. I refer to the former member from Calgary West, Mr. Art. Smith.

I could go on for hours in this connection. However those of us in British Columbia are particularly interested at this time in transportation. Years ago we were told that east is east and west is west, and never the twain shall meet. However by persistent efforts of people in British Columbia and Alberta, with a certain amount of assistance from Saskatchewan, we have at last attained at least a partial adjustment on our freight structure, through the board of transport commissioners. These pipe lines will be part of our transportation system and matters concerning them will have to come before the board in due course.

Many hon. members may not know that many years ago British Columbia pioneered in a new form of transportation. The only camel transportation in the dominion operated out of Cariboo. Many newcomers or those who have not studied our history probably do not know that in the early days of the gold rush in the Cariboo there was a camel train operating.

Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line

Many of us realize how fortunate we are in living in a province like British Columbia with its many possibilities. Incidentally, I might mention that I have been called to task in connection with another matter when I described certain people within my riding in a certain way. I was naturally interested in them because after all they are part of British Columbia. They were not only endeavouring to build, they were endeavouring to help us bring in cheaper gas and cheaper oil to the province and the Pacific coast at a time when it is most needed.

I do not know whether these papers have reported me correctly or not, but I would like to refer to the Vancouver Daily Province. This is a fine family journal and I wish I was wealthy enough to see that each and every member of this house received complimentary copies for life. This particular issue is the March 17 issue, a most appropriate date for the hon. member for Fort William and the hon. member for Battle River. I am sure that they will appreciate the details of this article because they have a far keener knowledge of these things than I. The heading of this article reads:

That's what George says. Valley phone girls prettiest.

The largest city in my riding has a population of 6,000, although the mayor would probably like me to say it has a population of 6,500. Two girls on the Vancouver exchange disputed my statement. Then along comes another paper published in Winnipeg, the Winnipeg Tribune with this heading:

Manitoba "Hello Girls" ready for M.P.'s beauty challenge.

I am leaving for the west coast tonight but I shall not have time to stop in to visit the Winnipeg exchange. But I do hope they have a delegation down at the station to meet me, especially after the pictures I see on the front page of this newspaper.

I do not want to take up any more time in discussing this particular bill. I am proud of the part that I was able to play in connection with this bill which I hope will go through tonight. I believe in my own province and I believe in Canada.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a word or two on the general sections while we are in committee and I want to echo what has been said by the hon. member for Fraser Valley. On behalf of all those members whom he has mentioned, including myself, I want to express our appreciation of his generous remarks.

I should like to refer to some of the information which was given in connection with this bill in the special committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines and which I think vindicated one hundred per cent the arguments which have been put forward and the battle which has been put up for the adoption of a "Canada first" principle in connection with these lines, whether they be oil or gas pipe lines. We have simply asked that they be built through Canada first before entering another foreign country on their way to their market.

Witnesses on behalf of the company and engineers appeared before the committee and stated that the Yellowhead route is feasible and economical. This company proposes to build a line from Edmonton to Vancouver through the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia exclusively. It will follow the Yellowhead route along the main line of the Canadian National Railways to Kamloops, from there to Merritt, thence to Brookmere, then down the Kettle valley railway line to the Fraser valley at Hope, and from there to Vancouver.

They told us that it was expected that some 2,000 men would be employed in the construction of the line. That is a fact that should be noted. It was estimated that approximately 150 men would be employed in the maintenance of the line. That means that 150 Canadians from Alberta and British Columbia will find what will be close to permanent employment. It was stated that approximately $50,000 per annum would be spent for materials, paint, hardware and so on required in connection with the maintenance of the line.

Mr. Lennard: How long will it take to build?

Mr. Fulton: They told us that if they obtained the approval of the board of transport commissioners this year they would expect to have it completed—I am speaking from memory—by June, 1952. Finally, they told us there would be at least three pumping stations initially to maintain a flow of 70,000 barrels, but as the capacity was stepped up, as it could be, to approaching 200,000 barrels the required additional pumping stations would be constructed.

These facts should be kept in mind in considering these requests for charters for pipe lines. I repeat that on this comparatively short line of 700 miles, that is comparatively short when compared with the length of a pipe line from Alberta to Montreal, approximately 150 Canadians will receive permanent employment, 2,000 will be employed in building the line, and in addition there will be those employed in manufacturing the materials necessary for maintenance.

I ask hon. members to bear these facts in mind when considering future applications to incorporate companies of this kind. With these facts before us I think the insistence upon the principle of "Canada first" becomes much more important.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Chairman, I suppose if not too many speeches are made this bill will pass quite rapidly. My interest in this bill lies in the fact that the line will pass through the Cariboo district. The government of British Columbia, through the attorney general, the Hon. Gordon S. Wismer, has stated that the proposed line will pass through the Yellowhead pass and on down through the populous centres of British Columbia to Vancouver by way of Prince George, McBride, Quesnel and Williams Lake.

May I say to hon. members from Ontario that they have an interest in the route which this pipe line will take. In 1862 a party of fortune seekers set out from Ontario over land and proceeded to the gold fields of Cariboo. They crossed the prairie in Red river carts and travelled in canoes. They got to Fort Edmonton and from Fort Edmonton they walked to the Rocky mountains where they discovered the Yellowhead pass. They walked through the Yellowhead pass, over the route this pipe line will take, and took boats on the Fraser river to the Cariboo of those days.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley said that camel trains were used out of Cranbrook in the early days. He is making a great mistake. Camels were used on the historic Cariboo road. They proceeded from Lillooet some hundreds of miles to the gold fields at Barkerville. As I understand it, the building of this pipe line means that it will be a common carrier. It is supported by seven of the leading oil companies, and it will be a great public utility that will add vastly to the industrial development of British Columbia and of Canada.

Private Bills

PATENT APPLICATION OF GEORGE R. HANKS

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East) moved the second reading of Bill No. 131, respecting a certain patent application of George R. Hanks.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that was passed by the Senate after going through their committee on private bills. It also has had the approval of the Secretary of State and the commissioner of patents. However, I want to explain the purpose of the bill. It is simply to validate a patent application filed in the Canadian patent office by one George Hanks, on July 16, 1947. In 1947, as hon. members will recall, parliament passed certain amendments to the Patent Act. One of them had as its purpose to permit the filing of patent applications in Canada by nationals of countries which accord reciprocal privileges where the normal time within which such applications should have been filed had expired during the war years.

Section 28A stipulated two conditions, however, attached to the receiving of such patent applications by the commissioner of patents. First, such applications had to be filed not later than the 15th day of November, 1947. Second, the application for a patent had to request the commissioner of patents to extend the time by special request. In the case of George Hanks the facts are these. He applied for and obtained a patent on his invention in the United States patent office under date of April 23, 1946. Since he had filed more than a year before that date in the United States, and since he had not filed his application in Canada before the issue of the United States patent, under our law he was forbidden to file an application in this country and obtain a patent.

After the legislation was passed in 1947 George Hanks through his attorneys requested that he be allowed to file an application in Canada. The attorneys filed before November of 1947 but through some mistake they did not accompany the application with a so-called formal request to come under section 28A. The bill would now allow George Hanks to have the right to validate his application in Canada in spite of the fact that there was not this so-called formal letter requesting that he be given the advantages of section 28A. As I said before, the commissioner of patents and the Secretary of State have approved. My purpose is to ask that the bill be allowed to pass so that it may be sent to the standing committee on private bills.

Mr. Cruickshank: What was the patent for?

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): My hon. friend probably has not read the bill. It refers to a chain dredge bucket and method of forming.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

BORDER PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Robinson for the second reading of Bill No. 118, to incorporate Border Pipeline Corporation.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say very much in connection with this measure. Probably to justify my own stand and that of some of the other members in previous discussions in our endeavour to build up Canada, I should quote one or two authorities who I believe agree with what I have said.

Mr. Blue: Who is "our"?

Mr. Cruickshank: As I said the other night, Mr. Speaker, one of the things that have made western Canada so great, particularly my own province, is the fact all the leading citizens of Bruce county in the great province of Ontario left there and came west.

Mr. Blue: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cruickshank: My hon. friend probably has not realized that I said "all the leading citizens of Bruce county."

Mr. Blue: I am going west next year.

Mr. Cruickshank: I want to quote one or two authorities who I think are in accord with our stand on maintaining for Canada for all time the resources that were given to us such as oil and gas that require very little to develop. I quoted authorities the other night and I shall quote them again. I am quoting from Hansard of May 5, 1950, at pages 2229 to 2230. I said the other night that I did not know of any better authority that I could use in speaking of Canada as a whole. And mind you, Mr. Speaker, we maintain that the stand we are taking is taken not only to build up our own province but to build up Canada as a whole. As I said the other night, no matter which company builds the pipe line, either gas or oil, it goes through the centre of my riding and the riding of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), and it will be satisfactory to us. It does not matter to us which company builds the line. I do not think anybody has a better right to speak on behalf of Canada than the authority whom I shall quote. He speaks as we do, not for the building up of just British Columbia, not merely the Fraser valley, Quadra, Kamloops or Kootenay West but Canada as a whole. I shall quote the Prime Minister who spoke on the date I mentioned, at pages 2229 to 2230 of Hansard:

> I am not going to suggest that the protracted debate in this parliament about the desirability of an all-Canadian pipe line for the gas and oil of Alberta has been a waste of time.

I want to emphasize how closely that was borne out by the editorial I read from the Vancouver Sun, published in the third largest city in the Dominion of Canada, the Pacific outlet to all our markets in the Far East and the Pacific supply point for our navy. I continue with the quotation:

> It has aroused public opinion as to the desirability of doing that if it is possible. I would expect that that would not be lost from the point of view of the members of the board of transport commissioners and that they would not lightly disregard the unanimous desires of Canadians that their own territory be used to the greatest possible advantage.

I am very proud to be a follower of a great Canadian, in spite of the majestic silence of so many of his supporters, who makes a statement like that. I continue with the quotation:

I would expect that when they got an application and before they approved anything they would want to be shown that there is or there is not a practicable way of doing it without going out of Canada. I would expect that they will require the applicants to satisfy them that surveys of the various routes mentioned in this discussion have been made.

Again may I point out, as was emphasized by the hon. member for Kamloops previously this evening, in speaking of the witnesses who appeared before the committee the other day, I do not happen to be a member of that committee. That was very well taken care of last year for reasons best known to some who thought it was not desirable that the member for Fraser Valley should be a member of that committee. I must admit, however, that British Columbia was well represented on that committee. For the first time in our history we had at least five members on that committee. I continue with the quotation:

I do not claim to know enough about the topographical conditions, about the mountain passes, to be able to formulate an opinion as to whether or not they present insuperable difficulties. But if I were a member of a body charged by parliament with the responsibility of making that kind of decision and were called upon to exercise my judgment, I would want pretty full evidence that it could not be done in Canada before I would put my signature to a plan or project that was not going to be carried out in Canada.

That is the Prime Minister speaking on May 5, 1950. I shall quote some other authorities now, Mr. Speaker. I could take time to tell you about Iran, but I do not think it is necessary. Many of you read the papers, I know. You are all equally proud, as I am, of the traditions of the British navy, so ably followed by our own Royal Canadian Navy. We had a gentleman here who two weeks ago I understand was in Iran, and we read in the newspapers that about one-sixth of the oil used by the British navy comes from that country. I do not think many of us would be sitting here tonight if we had not had a little assistance from the British navy in the past. As I say, we read in the press that one-sixth of the oil required by the British navy comes from Iran. I do not think we need to worry so much about acts of a few saboteurs of any province in the dominion plunging us into a third world war. I am no authority on external affairs, but it would seem to me that what is happening in Iran today is of extreme importance to every Canadian.

Any day some little extra combustion over there may plunge us into a third world war. So in asking for the building of an all-Canadian route we are at least trying to bring oil from one of the greatest oil fields on the North American continent, and we hope some day one of the greatest of the world, to the Pacific coast, where the navy can at least have fuel on British soil without any treaties or obligations that may be broken merely by the assassination of a certain leader.

I do not think that some of my eastern friends realize just how important this oil and gas line is to the Dominion of Canada as a whole. In that connection I might quote another authority, a man who I think knows a great deal about the oil situation, and certainly about production needed for national defence in Canada. I am quoting from Hansard of March 16, 1950, at pages 791 and 792. I apologize to no Canadian for quoting this hon. gentleman who has the confidence of the people of Canada for his great organizing ability, which he has demonstrated to the people of Canada and to the whole world. In a time of national stress he saw that the guns and the tanks, and all the munitions of war were made available. As I said, I want to quote from pages 791 and 792, which contain the answer given to the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart). The answer is as follows:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The answer to the first question is that I have no knowledge of any representations from the province of Saskatchewan in that connection. In answer to the second question I would say that I spoke on this subject at the last session of parliament, and pointed out that the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act is designed to protect Canadian consumers. It is necessary under the act for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to give a certificate to the effect that the present and foreseeable future needs of Canada are protected before any exports of electricity or gas are permitted.

I continue:

It has been suggested frequently in the current debate that gas will be sent to the United States from the pipe line before the pipe line reaches Vancouver. I stated last session that that would not be permitted. I know from discussions with the sponsors of the pipe line that it is not proposed to undertake any such export.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any higher authorities in the Dominion of Canada whom I could quote than the two right hon. members I have just quoted. I believe that if nothing else justifies the stand taken by a few of us, not only to see that it was piped within Canada but we are hoping by our efforts to bring home to the people of Canada as a whole what this means, then those quotations justify our stand.

As I mentioned a moment before, and as I am sure the member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), who is an old military man, and any other former military man, will appreciate what is happening in Iran today is significant. I am sure they will endeavour with us to see that the main supply is maintained in Canada.

Possibly I should justify our extreme interest in our own province. I should like to quote briefly from a book by Bruce Hutchison. At one time he was a member of the parliamentary press gallery. He has the good fortune to come from the province of British Columbia. In common with another famous newspaperman who used to adorn the gallery, Torchy Anderson, he spends most of his time fishing on Vancouver island. It is an excellent place to fish. When Bruce is not writing books he writes delightful stories for the Saturday Evening Post. I am giving him a little plug because he is a great Canadian. This is part of the reason, Mr. Speaker, why we want to see that pipe line maintained within Canada. I am only going to quote a paragraph or two of the book "The Fraser", page 205:

> This outshoot, which forms the south bank of the Fraser, extends less than a hundred miles from the sea. It is so small in Canada, and so fertile, that every yard of it will soon be cultivated. This land from the sea to the north-south barrier of the coast range we call the Fraser valley. The Fraser has cut a valley over 800 miles long and much of it, in the interior, will produce crops when it is irrigated, but in the vocabulary of British Columbia, the Fraser valley means only the stretch from the river delta to the mountains.
> This arable space of some 550,000 acres, including the north bank, is one of British Columbia's major possessions. It supports about 100,000 people. It provides the milk for Vancouver. It produces vegetables, some meat (especially feeders from the interior ranches), the hops for British Columbia's beer, small fruits, tree fruits, honey, and pelts from the fur farms. About $15 million worth of agricultural products a year come out of the soil the river laid down here in the leisure of æons.

I do not want to quote all of it, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to cover the Fraser valley because it is not only an important part of Canada, Mr. Speaker, it is also the district through which this pipe line will go.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is quoting literature dealing with the Yellowhead pass route and the Fraser river route. It has nothing to do with the bill under consideration.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Speaker, I am not speaking about the Yellowhead route at all. If my hon. friend was awake he would know that I am speaking about a different route. That bill was passed long ago. I am speaking about a company whose pipe line would take the oil of Canada through the United States at Kingsgate. That shows the hon. member is not listening.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): On a point of order—

Mr. Cruickshank: Just a minute; you have had three years to make a speech and you have not done it yet.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I insist that the reading of a book dealing with—

Mr. Cruickshank: What is the point of order?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): —the Yellowhead pass route is not in order.

Mr. Speaker: When an hon. member rises to a point of order, I think he should be allowed to state it.

Mr. Cruickshank: By all means, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The book in question, written by a very distinguished Canadian writer, sets out to tell the story of the Fraser river. The Fraser river rises in my constituency at the foot of mount Robson. It flows northerly for some distance, and then comes around by the beautiful city of Prince George, sweeps on majestically by Quesnel, Williams Lake, and on to the open sea. The whole book is one of the outstanding works of the year. Just to keep the record straight, and give Mr. Hutchison due credit for having written a fine book, he deals with the Yellowhead pass. He tells how the young adventurers from Ontario, the overlanders of 1862 travelled from Ontario clear through the Rocky mountains out to the Cariboo gold fields; that is the whole heart of the book, and it should be quoted in full or not at all.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The bill before the house concerns an act to incorporate the Border Pipeline Corporation. It does not refer in any way to this well known book. It seems to me that the two members who have just spoken are debating the merits of this book. I believe it would be better if the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) were to direct his remarks to the bill and not to the book.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Speaker, I have not found out what the point of order is. I want to assure the member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) that I appreciate his kindness. By taking at least six minutes of my time, he has assisted Canada's future as never before. Are there any more points of order? I would welcome them. Naturally, Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling. I would have liked to described a little of the territory. In order that there be no injustice done the member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray), I am glad to know that the mighty Fraser rises in his constituency. Now, Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate why it is so muddy.

I would have liked to describe the Fraser river and the territory it covers, through which this pipe line will go. Since I cannot, Mr. Speaker, I am going to stay strictly with oil. I shall quote from the Canada page in Time magazine. I am sure that my friend knows Time magazine, and that he will not confuse it with Bruce Hutchison's book. It is a magazine published in the United States, in which many of us would like to have our names appear. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that my colleagues from the northern part of British Columbia will appreciate the fact that I have had the pleasure of seeing my name in Time magazine four times. This article is headed "Alberta" and then "Share the Wealth".

When Alberta's oil boom began three years ago, Premier Ernest Manning promised that all citizens, not just oil well owners, would share in the new-found wealth.

That is a fine statement for a premier to make.

Last week Manning began paying off on his pledge. His Social Credit government's—

I wish I could say Liberal government.

—1951 budget, enriched with an estimated income of $25 million from oil royalties, dispensed bounties for practically all groups of Alberta taxpayers.

I am sure that I am sticking to oil. Possibly I could quote my own premier here and the attorney general of British Columbia, if we had had the co-operation that we sought. If we had had the co-operation that we sought two years ago, I believe these figures would have been written about northern British Columbia and not Alberta. That is rather a deep one and will be read with a great deal of interest in British Columbia.

Grants totalling $25 million to all municipalities to cut up to 6½ mills a year off local property tax rates.

We in British Columbia would have been delighted—that is, we in lower British Columbia or central British Columbia—if northern British Columbia were doing that for us. Again I say that if we had had the proper co-operation, I believe that would have happened in the great northern part of British Columbia; and I believe that it yet will happen.

Mr. Blackmore: If you had a Social Credit government, you would have got it.

Mr. Cruickshank: We want many things in British Columbia, but I have not the authority to say whether we are prepared to go that far.

Mr. Blackmore: You will have to go without your oil companies then.

Mr. Cruickshank: I will build up your province if you give me a chance.

Reductions of $5 to $15 a year in auto licence fees.

Elimination of the one-cent-a-gallon tax on agricultural and industrial fuel, a saving of $1·6 million for farmers and businessmen.

A $10 million fund for grants and interest-free loans to school boards and municipalities.

A new system of government annuities, paying 3½ per cent interest, which any Albertan can start buying with a $10 down payment.

Mr. Wylie: Read the last part, and tell us what the Liberal leader said. You might as well finish it.

Mr. Cruickshank: There is one advantage we have on this side of the house. I remember this well from last year. When we wanted a little bit of assistance, it started out and we got excellent assistance from that far corner, from the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). I can well remember that. But apparently the clamp came on and we never heard another peep out of that corner over there; we could not get them to speak at all.

What I have read just emphasizes the possibilities there are with respect to oil, aside from fueling our great navy, which will be done in the Pacific through a bill that went through tonight. It emphasizes the other possibilities that there are in Canada, and particularly the possibilities we have on the Pacific coast for, may I say, in spite of ourselves, developing our greater northern British Columbia. Within the last few weeks the one company with which I am familiar brought in two excellent gas wells there. One of them is so great that, according to the last report I had, it had not yet been able to plug it. That is a good well. Bring us in about four or five more like it and we shall not actually need a pipe line to bring gas from northern British Columbia or northern Alberta. It will just pump off itself like that, it is coming out so strong.

I have to be careful here. I do not want to be called to order too often. I am not accustomed to being out of order. If you will just pardon me a minute, I should like to locate the document from which I want to quote. I want to bring in another province if I have time. I do not want to delay matters. This is a quotation from Hon. J. S. McDiarmid, Minister of Lands and Natural Resources for the province of Manitoba, page 99 of the

Dinning commission inquiry into reserves and consumption of natural gas in the province of Alberta:

It is the hope of the government of the province of Manitoba that the Alberta natural gas commission will find that there is sufficient natural gas to meet all the present and projected needs of the province of Alberta, and also sufficient surplus reserve to justify its exportation. If, on the other hand, the commission decides, as a result of its findings, that it is necessary to place certain restrictions on the exportation of natural gas, it is sincerely hoped that the commission will see fit to recommend to the government of Alberta that the transmission and distribution of natural gas to the other prairie provinces be given priority over other possible export markets.

That is from the government of Manitoba, Mr. Speaker. I think it is rather significant. I could go on quoting, Mr. Speaker, only I am afraid that I might get back to Bruce Hutchison. This one is with respect to the government of the province of Saskatchewan, an exceedingly fine province. Before I left the real west out on the Pacific coast I had hoped to have given a little talk on wheat. I do not know whether I shall have time tonight to speak on that subject, but I hope to be able to get this quotation in from the province of Saskatchewan. It is from pages 99-100, report of the Dinning commission:

The government of the province of Saskatchewan in a submission before the committee on transport and communication to the Senate of Canada, in May, 1948, gave unqualified support to the principle of utilization of Alberta natural gas in the prairie provinces where the benefits in reduced living costs and increased household amenities, as well as the stimulation of industrial development, would be incalculable.

The government of the province of Saskatchewan desires to reaffirm its support of this principle and to urge that every consideration be given the welfare of Canadians in the prairie provinces in deliberations regarding the use of this important Canadian natural resource.

I have read quotations showing the policy of two provinces. I am sorry that time does not permit me to say what I believe the people of Ontario and Quebec and the eastern provinces would say.

On motion of Mr. Croll the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume consideration of the matter under discussion at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Special—

576. To authorize and provide for a payment to the Canadian wheat board which shall be dealt with by the board in all respects as though it was money received from the sale of wheat produced in the designated area, sold and delivered to the board by producers during the pool period commencing on the first day of August, 1945, and ending on the thirty-first day of July, 1950, and to authorize the board, notwithstanding the provisions of subsections 2 and 3 of section 22 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, to distribute such amount together with all other moneys received by the board from the sale of such wheat, after making the deductions provided for in the said section 22, among holders of certificates issued by the board pursuant to part III of the said act during the pool period aforesaid, by paying to the person named in such certificate the same sum for each bushel of wheat referred to therein, $65,000,000.

Mr. Brooks: The subject under consideration is item 576. The subject matter of this item has been discussed in the house for the past two or three weeks and I do not intend to take much time. As a matter of fact, this is the first time I have discussed the subject. I have been a good listener, and I have tried to find some grains of wheat among all the chaff that has been blown about the house in the past ten days or two weeks.

This item has to do with the payment of $65 million to the western wheat growers. It is based on the wheat contract between Great Britain and Canada over a period of years. We all know that a contract is something which people more or less consider to be inviolate; and we expect all parties under a contract to live up to its conditions and its terms. If that contract has not been carried out by one party, we expect that that party should be made to carry out its terms. I might say at the outset that I have every respect for the grain growers of the west. I feel as do all people from my part of the country. If there is anything coming to the farmers of western Canada, we would be anxious to see them have it. As a matter of fact, to a great extent western Canada is made up of people from the maritimes. We have always, at all times, wished them well; and we still wish them well. If at times, such as at the time of the Red river flood, they need assistance, the people in eastern Canada will be most anxious to send what help they can. The same was true some years ago when they suffered from burnt-out areas. People from all parts of Canada were pleased indeed to send what aid they could to help the people in the west.

As I said a moment ago, if the grain growers are entitled to something under the contract, we would be in favour of passing the item. We know that wheat is our greatest exportable commodity; its export is the lifeblood of the country. It is responsible for the prosperity of the people in the west. If they are not prosperous the people in other parts of Canada are not prosperous either.

There is another point which I say that we as representatives of the people must take into consideration. We must ask ourselves what responsibility we have to our constituents. If this $65 million is to be paid—and it is a very large amount—people in my province and in other sections of Canada will have certain questions to ask their members. I know I will be asked: Why was it paid? Why did we pay $65 million to western Canada? Was it because the contract with the British people had not been lived up to? We can only quote what has been quoted so often in the house, namely the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he said that he deplored the suggestion that the British government had not played fair with the Canadian people. We have had tabled in the house a document which shows that the British government did play fair with Canada.

Well, if that is so, they must have played fair with the Canadian government and with the grain growers of western Canada—because these are all Canadian people. So when we are asked if there is any legal right to the payment of this $65 million, I do not think that, in the face of the facts and in the face of statements made and documents tabled in the house, we can say anything other than there is no legal obligation under the contract to pay any money to western Canada.

Another question our people would be justified in asking would be this: Are we morally bound? Is there any moral reason for our paying out this large sum of money to the grain growers of western Canada? As I said a moment ago, a contract is a contract. If it has been legally carried out, then it has been morally carried out. People are making contracts continuously, and when minds meet and a contract has been legally carried out, then to my mind there is no argument which would support any suggestion that it has not been morally carried out.

The third question which I believe our people would ask is this: Did the farmers of western Canada suffer because of this British wheat agreement? Did they have to sell their wheat below the cost of production, as the people in New Brunswick have had to sell their potatoes? We have been told by the Minister of Agriculture himself that he considers it a good contract. We have been told the same thing by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. No one in the house has suggested that the western farmers sold below cost of production. It is agreed that they got a price which was much higher than their cost of production, and I am told that during the term of the contract there was prosperity in the west.

Having disposed of the questions which might be asked by our constituents—whether it was legal, whether there was any moral obligation and whether the farmers have suffered—we will then be asked: Why are we paying $65 million to the grain growers of western Canada? If we reply by using the argument used in the house we would have to say that the western farmer was led to expect certain things, that expectations were raised in his mind, and that it is those expectations which form the basis upon which we are paying this large sum of money to the western grain growers.

I remember having read some years ago the book "Great Expectations". I am sure most hon. members have read that book by Charles Dickens and have seen the motion picture of the same name. As I recall, one of the characters in the book, a small boy, had assisted a felon who had escaped from justice, and the assistance had been given under compulsion. In later years the boy began to receive money from some source, although he did not know just where it was coming from. He was sent to a good boarding school, given money to spend and trained to be a gentleman. The money kept coming in constantly, and the young gentleman thought it was being sent to him by people having great influence and wealth.

One day however he found out who his benefactor was, it was disclosed to him that his benefactor all those years had been the felon who had escaped from justice, who had gone to Australia and made a fortune and who, as he thought, was repaying the boy for the help he had received in the past.

That is the story of "Great Expectations". I wonder if the expectations of the farmers in western Canada were raised on a somewhat similar basis; I wonder whether it was for past favours the government had received, or for future benefits it hoped to get. In any event we can have our own ideas in that connection.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member should be called to order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Brooks: This is the second time tonight the hon. member for Cariboo has been on his feet calling someone to order. It will be recalled that he made a speech a short time ago while the hon. member for Fraser Valley was speaking. There is just about as much reason for his calling me to order as there was for calling the hon. member for Fraser Valley to order at that time.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I respectfully suggest there is a very serious point of order here.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps the hon. member for Cariboo would state his point of order.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): In drawing his picture of "Great Expectations" the hon. member has brought before us a character out of Dickens who was admittedly a felon, a criminal, a man who went to Australia and while there made his fortune. Then the hon. member uses this character as an illustration of what he suggests has happened in connection with the farmers of western Canada. He makes reference to funds being supplied, and the inference he draws is that the Minister of Agriculture is playing the part of a criminal from Australia, who is placing $65,000,000 as a gift to western wheat growers—money which he came by dishonestly. I say that suggestion should not be made.

Mr. Gardiner: I saw the play, but he did not look like me.

The Deputy Chairman: I have listened with care to the comparison made by the hon. member for Royal between the story in the book entitled "Great Expectations" and its application to the situation now before the committee. I must say I would not entertain the same fears as the hon. member does. I do not believe the comparison applies as between the minister and the good uncle, as he might be described, in respect of their having been guilty of a criminal offence or having been sent to jail. I think the comparison was rather in relation to benefits past and future to which the hon. member for Royal was referring.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member is at perfect liberty to draw whatever inferences he wishes. I might say that I am quite content with the way Dickens wrote this story and prefer it to my hon. friend's version.

In connection with these expectations we have heard that they were raised more or less by the Hon. Mr. Strachey, the British minister of food, when he made a speech in Winnipeg. I have heard of the $64 question but I never heard before of a $65 million speech. That is what they are accusing Mr. Strachey of having made in Winnipeg. In fact, some people would have us believe that it was a $300 million or $400 million speech.

Mr. Strachey did make a speech in Winnipeg which the Minister of Agriculture quoted when he was speaking a few days ago, but he left out what I considered was the most important part of that speech. Mr. Strachey said:

> I repeat that the essence of the agreement—

> —is that in return for selling wheat at $1.55 during the first two years of the agreement, Canadian farmers get the protection of minimum floor prices of $1.25 and $1 in the third and fourth years. And I reiterate that it is an inescapable obligation of the British government to pay at least these prices however low the world price of wheat may go.

That was the essence of the agreement which was made, according to Mr. Strachey. The Minister of Agriculture will remember that in 1947 it was mentioned in this house and in the country that there was a great possibility of deflation. Our own government, and probably the government of Great Britain, thought that the price of wheat might go below $1.25 and $1. The British government guaranteed that no matter how low the price went they would live up to their agreement and would put on a floor price of $1.25 and $1 per bushel.

A lot has been made of the "have regard to" clause but so far I have not heard a proper definition of that clause given in this house. I think it can be taken for granted that one thing that was meant was that if the world price of wheat went up instead of going down, as the Minister of Agriculture expected it would, having regard to that the British government were willing to pay and did pay $2 per bushel for wheat. They did not say that they were going to pay the world price and that evidently was not demanded from the British, but they were asked to pay $2 per bushel for wheat and that is the price they paid. I submit that that is what was meant by the "have regard to" clause. They were having regard to the price of wheat going up and upped their price as stated.

I am not here to defend the British government, but as was stated the other day, Great Britain has built up trade in this country over a hundred years by honouring her contracts and by the excellence of her products. Great Britain became the greatest trader in the world and it little behooves us to try to blame that country, which has had such a long history of honour and integrity. Some people say it is the socialist government. I am not a socialist and I would like to see the socialist government beaten when they go to the country.

I have read the life of Mr. Attlee and I believe he is an honest and honourable man. I think all hon. members will agree with me in that. Mr. Ernest Bevin is respected and honoured by his own people and by democratic people throughout the world. So is Mr. Morrison. All these men are honourable men and I say it is unfair and unjust and untrue to say that such men would dishonour their contract.

The questions which I mentioned a few moments ago will be asked me by people in New Brunswick. I say to the Minister of Agriculture that if farmers in any part of Canada are suffering or have suffered during the last five years it is the farmers of the maritime provinces, particularly the potato growers. I am not using this as a quid pro quo argument, that because we are giving $65 million to the western farmers we must give it to the eastern farmers, but I do want to say that these people are getting hardly fifty per cent of the cost of production of the commodity they produce and yet they are being asked to help to pay this $65 million to the farmers of western Canada.

A few days ago the Turgeon committee after a most cursory investigation reported that the Chignecto canal was not feasible. We believe that it is. Sixty-five million dollars would have built the Chignecto canal which would have been of lasting benefit to the people in our part of the country. It will be pretty difficult for me or anyone else to go into my part of Canada and justify something for which there is no legal or moral ground as far as the records of this house are concerned and at the same time support this item for $65 million.

It is not my intention to take any more time of the committee. As my leader stated this afternoon, if instead of quoting a lot of confusing figures the Minister of Agriculture had given us some good and sound reason why this money should be paid, I and the people whom I represent would have been only too glad to agree to the fulfilling of obligations by the people of Canada and the paying of this $65 million. But when you analyse the minister's statements this afternoon and the statements which have been made in this house in the past two weeks I can see no just reason why the people of Canada should pay $65 million to the western wheat growers and I for one am opposed to this item.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Chairman, I wish to move:

That item 576 of the further supplementary estimates be reduced from $65,000,000 to $1.

In moving this motion I regret very much that we are in committee because it will be impossible for certain hon. members to record for posterity their opposition to this measure which, as I said before, I regard as an agrarian commando raid upon the public treasury of Canada.

An hon. Member: If it were lumber it would be all right.

Mr. Gibson: About the only reason we have been given for the payment is that the farmers on the prairies had very great expectations. I for one am very glad that it did not prove to be twins although a great number of hon. members have tried to introduce into the debate the thought that we should probably bonus apples, potatoes, cheese and a number of other agricultural commodities in order to make the whole deal equal. I can understand the position of the Social Credit party. They represent only recipients of this bonus and naturally they would be in favour of the payment of this amount or, from my understanding of what they have said, something very much larger. Of course they hold different views as to how much money $65 million is. To me it is a tremendous sum. To them of course I know it only represents about fifteen minutes work on the printing press, and from their point of view it is probably not too important.

The C.C.F. party of course is in much the same position. They also represent a group of people who they think are crying for candy like small children. I wonder if they have considered their position in the light of the fact that they are also known as the broken arm of labour. I warned them in this house before the last general election that they were going to find great difficulty in serving two masters, and I think they will probably find themselves in that position now.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the scope of this resolution is quite wide, but perhaps the hon. member should not go too far in discussing the attitudes of the various parties as to being the arm of labour or in any other capacity.

Mr. Gibson: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. I was really trying to analyse the position that the various parties had taken in this debate. I shall try to confine my remarks to things that are not too contentious, and of course they are very good natured people. I certainly do not think they are going to take too much offence. I have been wondering what effect their support of this payment is going to have on their members who come from industrial ridings. I wonder how they are going to explain to their constituents their support of a measure which I know they must realize will substantially increase the income taxes that urban workers will have to pay next year. Indeed if they got their wish, if the government had been foolish enough to listen to them and had let them have $330 million, I presume the income taxes which their workers would have to pay would probably be up almost 50 per cent. I am watching the Minister of Finance very carefully. He is not nodding to corroborate my statement but I think he will say it would represent quite a substantial increase in income tax.

I am quite sure of course that at the appropriate time the C.C.F. will find some way of oozing out from under any responsibility for the increase in income tax, and will probably load it on the Minister of Finance. I think they are probably overestimating the stupidity of even their own electors when they think they will be able to get away with it. I can perhaps forgive the members of the two minor parties in this house for the position they take because after all I often think they know not what they do. On the other hand the conduct of the official opposition to me, to put it very mildly, has been disappointing. I was going to use the word "reprehensible" but I think the word "disappointing" is probably more fair.

I was particularly glad to hear the hon. member for Royal stand up and say what he did tonight. It was the first forthright statement I have heard on behalf of the official opposition with respect to this payment of $65 million. I certainly congratulate him on having made a statement of that kind which even I can understand.

Mr. Sinnott: He wants to get together with his fellow member from Souris.

Mr. Gibson: It seems to me that the official opposition can be classified almost as accessories after the fact.

An hon. Member: Before the fact.

Mr. Gibson: I would not say before the fact, although some of them may have had great expectations. I would certainly say that at the present time they are condoning something concerning which I am not sure that they are all very heartily in agreement. It seems to me it would be a wonderful start towards saving the half a billion dollars, which the leader of the opposition stated last year was so easy to do, to begin with this $65 million. It would have been an exceptionally good place to commence.

Mr. Fraser: You should have heard him on the radio tonight.

Mr. Gibson: I am glad I missed that.

Mr. Abbott: Try again.

Mr. Fraser: You would have learned something.

Mr. Gibson: I now turn to the government, and I regret very much that I have felt it my duty to move this motion tonight. I have always had an almost childlike faith in the wisdom of the present government.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Childlike is right.

Mr. Gibson: It probably was childlike. I have always realized that it is natural that all political parties should have a certain amount of clay in their feet. I think it is inherent in the business of politics. I am sorry to say, however, that this affliction seems temporarily at least to have moved up to their heads. I think the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce would convince any fair-minded man that the farmers of western Canada had received a very good deal. In my opinion the matter was competently handled by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Agriculture, and indeed by the whole government. I am extremely sorry that the government feels that they now have to follow this course of action. It seems to me they are following the principle that to him that hath shall be given. The prairie farmers have had a successful five-year period.

Mr. Sinnott: So have the lumbermen.

Mr. Gibson: It has indeed been successful for those who have been fortunate to have crops. They will receive the major portion of this money, money which I am quite sure that class of prairie farmer does not need. I would be very happy to support an expenditure of this size, or indeed one twice this size, if the government had suggested that this money be spent on some of the irrigation projects which I realize are so necessary for the prairies. They could have sold me on that. I would have thought it would have been a much wiser way to spend $65 million. I would hope that my friends in the cabinet would say so too if they were able to express their private opinions on this particular question.

I wish to protest on behalf of every taxpayer in Canada against what I believe to be an unwarranted and painful operation on the pocketbook of every taxpayer in Canada. I invite every member of the house to assist the country in saving $64,999,999 for the Canadian taxpayers. At the same time I think that anybody who votes for this motion will administer a rebuke to the government which in this case I believe they have coming to them. I hope that as a result of our actions we will deter the government from any step of a like nature in the future.

Mr. Charlton: I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the few remarks I have to make will take very little time but I do want to put on record tonight the position of the eastern wheat grower. It is quite apparent that the government intends to put through this $65 million, regardless of whether it is sufficient or insufficient. It is an amount which they grabbed out of the air and nothing has been said in the house yet to verify whether it is correct or not so far as the losses to the western farmers are concerned. As a matter of fact, the government, through the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, have never admitted that loss to the farmers through the wheat contract. The Prime Minister admits, however, that the western farmer is disappointed that he did not get more from that wheat contract. The amount of $65 million is simply grabbed out of the air and it is said to be the amount to be paid to them.

Is it that this amount has been taken to satisfy election promises or to save the hide of the Minister of Agriculture in the western provinces?

This afternoon the Minister of Agriculture showed a small sign of arrogance and admitted his error when in effect he stated that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and he himself could make statements which may not be correct because they have a leader who can iron out their differences. That is a terrific admission for the Minister of Agriculture to make.

I just want to point out the grave injustice to the eastern wheat growers, as admitted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in report No. 4 of the agriculture and colonization committee at page 108, of Wednesday, June 7, 1950. I shall quote from the report:

Mr. Charlton: The eastern farmer in the years 1945, 1946 and 1947 took $1.25 for his wheat, when the western farmer was getting $1.75, so the eastern farmer took a beating.

Right Hon. Mr. Howe: He was free to sell it where he liked.

Mr. Charlton: Yes, that is true, but at a stated price.

Right Hon. Mr. Howe: Yes. Almost everybody was put under a ceiling at that time but the eastern farmer was not. So far as pegged prices go, everything which the farmer bought was at a pegged price, under November, 1941, prices yet his wheat was allowed to go up.

There was an interjection by Mr. Wright which I do not think is necessary or relevant, and then my question goes on:

By Mr. Charlton:

Q. Yes, but not nearly up to $1.75.—A. No.

Right Hon. Mr. Howe: I always thought that the eastern producer got trimmed in that period.

That is an admission made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself. He said that he thought the eastern farmer took a trimming during that period in which the wheat board was in effect handling eastern wheat.

Then on March 6 of this year I asked the Prime Minister a question on the orders of the day which is to be found on page 947 of Hansard, and reads as follows:

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in view of the announced policy of the government by the Prime Minister to subsidize wheat producers for losses incurred under the wheat agreement, has the government given consideration to the position of the eastern wheat growers, cheese producers, hog producers and apple growers whose products were sold below world prices under government contract to the United Kingdom?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

To be fair I think I should go on and quote the supplementary question and the answer to it, which are found on the next page:

Mr. Charlton: In view of the short answer given by the Prime Minister to my question, may I ask, if the government has not already considered the matter, whether it is prepared to do so now?

Mr. St. Laurent: We are always prepared to consider anything, but that does not mean that the results of the consideration would be something that would comply with the apparent hopes behind the hon. member's question.

It took 33 words to say the same thing as the answer to the first question.

In report No. 5 of the committee on agriculture and colonization, dated June 8, 1950, we find a fairly concise report of what the eastern situation really is. The discussion started on page 125 of that report. A question was asked regarding the handling of eastern wheat by the wheat board, and the witness said that he could get the information. I will quote what he said:

The Witness: This is contained in our report for the year 1946-47.

Ontario Winter Wheat.

From August 1, 1939, to July 31, 1944, board operations in Canada eastern winter wheat were governed by the terms of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

In the crop year 1941-42 the board was relieved of the responsibility of purchasing Canada eastern winter wheat unless the market price fell to support levels. This policy continued through the crop years 1942-43 and 1943-44.

Changed circumstances brought about a new government policy with respect to Ontario winter wheat in the crop year 1944-45, the main features of which were:

(1) The board was exempted from its obligations under section 14 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act;

(2) The board was charged with maintaining a floor price of $1.25 per bushel for top grades of Canada eastern winter wheat, basis delivered Montreal;

(3) The Ontario wheat equalization fund was established and it became the responsibility of the board to assess equalization fees against Ontario wheat and wheat products sold for export.

The board did not have to purchase wheat in support of floor prices on Ontario wheat, but fees collected in connection with the equalization fund resulted in a surplus of $188,226.09 which was distributed to producers.

The 1944-45 Ontario wheat policy was continued in the crop year 1945-46. Again no action was necessary by the board in support of floor prices. The equalization fund amounted to $262,114.91 and was distributed to producers.

Government policy with respect to Ontario winter wheat during the crop year 1946-47 included several major changes and was as follows:

(1) The board was charged with the responsibility of maintaining a floor price of $1.25 per bushel for No. 1 Canada eastern winter wheat basis delivered Montreal;

(2) The maximum price of $1.26 per bushel for Canada eastern winter wheat basis delivered Montreal, established in 1941 was continued;

(3) Equalization fees on exports of Ontario winter wheat and wheat flour were continued;

(4) The board was directed to administer a treasury payment of 9 cents per bushel over and above the maximum price for deliveries of Ontario winter wheat;

(5) The board was directed to administer the payment to producers, at time of delivery, of a fixed and final equalization payment of 5 cents per bushel.

In administering this program the board received the full co-operation of the private trade in Ontario. Grain dealers and millers became the agents of the board in distributing the 5 cents equalization payment and the 9 cent treasury payment. They made both payments to producers at the time of delivery and were later reimbursed by the board. Wheat equalization payments amounted to $207,336.23 and treasury payments amounted to $373,207.11 on total reported marketings of 4,146,738 bushels.

Equalization fees collected on Ontario wheat and flour exported during the crop year amounted to $290,134.82, and exceeded equalization payments to producers by $82,798.59, which amount was credited to the dominion government. The net cost of the 1946-47 Ontario wheat operation to the dominion government including the treasury payment and administrative and other expenses, was $309,025.52. Financial details concerning the board's Canada eastern winter wheat operation are set forth in exhibits VIII and IX of this report.

Now, a further question by myself:

Q. Just in that connection, the last paragraph in part reads "—and exceeded equalization payments to producers by $82,798.59, which amount was credited to the dominion government." That was money collected through flour sold and in excess of the amount paid to us?

A. In excess of the estimated payment which was made at the start of the year. The fund actually realized a profit of $82,798.59.

Q. Which was not distributed to the producers?
A. No.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that might seem like a very small figure, $82,798.59, but on top of this price which we were forced to accept the government still has $82,798.59 which they are holding in the dominion treasury. On the basis of these five years, eastern wheat producers in 1943-44 took $1.25 per bushel; in 1944-45, they took $1.25 plus approximately 3 cents; in 1945-46 they took $1.25 plus 5 cents; in 1946-47 they took $1.25 plus approximately 5 cents and 9 cents. In 1948 the price was allowed to go free and we received at least $2.20 per bushel. Averaging those five years, the price worked out at $1.48 per bushel, which is 35·3 cents less than the price now guaranteed to western producers. Now, Mr. Chairman, on an ordinary basis the difference between eastern and western wheat is approximately 10 cents.

If the $65 million is paid to western producers of wheat, when there has been no loss actually proven, and I say that a loss is proven to the eastern producers, then I think this government should do something about it. On top of the loss per bushel there is still $82,798.59 in the dominion treasury which is owing to the eastern growers.

Mr. Fulford: In rising to speak briefly on the motion made by the member for Comox-Alberni, I wish at the outset to say there is no one in this house who realizes more than I do how vast a country this Canada of ours is or who realizes how diversified are its interests. I further realize what a difficult country it is to govern. At the same time, I have always believed in the old adage that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. Certainly, if the wheat producers are entitled to a bonus, then so are the cheese producers of Ontario and Quebec. The producers of those two provinces have been required to furnish cheese to fill the contracts with Great Britain. For the first ten months of 1950 this cheese was sold at 11 cents less than the domestic price, and since the war it has sold for less than world market prices.

If one follows this argument to its logical conclusion, then the hog producers are also entitled to a bonus, as are the fishermen and the gold mines that are selling their gold at less than market value. I believe the ramifications of this thing are infinite. I am sure that in a few weeks he will hear arguments being used to the effect that high taxation is a method of taking wealth out of circulation, and will therefore act as a detriment to the inflationary spiral. When I was in New Zealand last November, I learned that the New Zealand government felt obliged to withhold one-third of the wool payments owing to farmers in order to curb the danger of serious inflation in that country. We, however, are deliberately placing in the hands of the farmers of the three western provinces a sum of $65 million.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): It all comes back to Ontario anyway.

Mr. Fulford: I do not know about that. If the western farmer were really hard up we would all have the greatest sympathy for him. I am told, however, that bank savings accounts were never higher than they are today in the western provinces. Certainly, I feel that the farmers of Ontario and Quebec have just as good a case as, or even a better case than, the farmers of the west for the $65 million. If the $65 million must be spent in the prairie provinces, why not use it to construct irrigation schemes? We have heard from all sides of the desperate need for more moisture in the ground in some of the western provinces. If we had an irrigation system in the western provinces—I do not believe anyone would contradict this point—it would definitely make for more diversified agriculture. It would mean that the western provinces would not be so dependent on wheat prices, whether they be domestic, contract or world prices.

Few if any are satisfied with the grant, and if other agricultural interests are not to receive any benefit, I have no alternative but to agree with the member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. Wright: I am rather surprised to hear the member for Leeds make the statement he has just made. He complains about certain people who produce cheese not receiving a subsidy, and includes certain other Ontario producers. I have in my hand a statement which appeared in yesterday's Hansard, and it shows that since the beginning of the war there has been a subsidy paid on cheese amounting to $13,567,000, of which $2,732,000 went to the province of Quebec and $10,531,000 to the province of Ontario. For factory improvement there has been paid $1,330,000, $770,000 of which went to the province of Quebec and $542,000 to the province of Ontario. The subsidy on milk for cheddar cheese totalled $14,740,000, of which $5,494,000 went to the province of Quebec and $9,350,000 to the province of Ontario. Then, for freight assistance on feed grain the total was $138,937,000, of which $51,870,000 has been paid to the province of Quebec and $50,119,000 to the province of Ontario. There are also the hog premiums, showing the subsidies which have been paid to the hog producers of Ontario. There are also the subsidies paid for maple products. Nearly all of that has been paid to the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec. I may say that this information may be found at page 1375 of Hansard of March 19, 1951. I agree with the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth when he complains of not receiving a sufficient price for the wheat which went into domestic consumption in eastern Canada here. We in western Canada are in exactly the same position. I have in my hand the 26th annual report of the Saskatchewan Co-operative Producers Limited. This report states:

> The government was advised that in the final settlement of the five-year pool, which terminated on the 31st July, 1950, provision should be made for:
> (1) An adjusting payment on all wheat sold for domestic consumption during the period 1st March, 1945 to 17th February, 1947.

That is pretty much the period which the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth was speaking about. It further states:

> As pool delegates will recall, wheat used for domestic consumption was supplied by the Canadian wheat board at $1.25 per bushel, plus carrying charges, for the period 1st March, 1945, to 17th March, 1947. During this whole period all wheat for export was sold at a price substantially above this figure. In the opinion of your board the export price during this time would average probably $1.55 a bushel.

On the basis of that subsidy to the consumers of bread in Canada, we believe that there is another $48 million due to the five-year pool over and above the $65 million which the government have placed in it. I want to say that the Liberal members of the legislature in the province of Saskatchewan have made a statement in which they are urging this government to place this additional $48 million in the five-year pool, and I have not heard the Liberal members of parliament from Saskatchewan or from western Canada getting up in this House of Commons and backing that request. I have not heard the Minister of Agriculture nor the Minister of Trade and Commerce getting up and explaining why the farmers of western Canada should not be compensated to the amount of this $48 million. Before this debate closes I hope the Minister of Agriculture will give the reasons why this government is not meeting the request not only of the wheat pools but of the Saskatchewan farmers' union, the Alberta farmers' union, Liberal members of the legislature of the province of Alberta, Liberal members of the legislature of the province of Saskatchewan and in representations that have been made to them from the province of Manitoba. We think that this is a compensation which this government owes to the wheat producers in western Canada.

There is just one other point that I want to cover and it is this. Why were not the representatives of the advisory council of the wheat board called in between May 22 and May 30 when the government finally accepted the memorandum or minutes of meetings that were submitted to them from Great Britain? When the Minister of Agriculture went to Great Britain recently he took a representative over with him. But that was after they had finally accepted on May 30 the minutes or the settlement offered by the British government. The time for the government to have called in for consultation the representatives of western Canada was before those minutes were accepted. I should just like an explanation from the minister as to why we are not entitled to another $48 million payment as requested by all representatives from western Canada, and why the representatives from the west were not consulted before the final agreement was made on May 30.

Mr. Gibson: It was $300 million to start with. Why do you not make up your mind?

Mr. Wright: Before I sit down, Mr. Chairman, may I add this word or two? I have not said anything with regard to the hon. member who has just spoken; I refer to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. But if he would remember that back in 1949, when he could not sell his lumber, the wheat producers of western Canada allowed 12,500,000 bushels of wheat to be taken out of their 1949 contract in order to make $25 million available for the purchase of lumber by Great Britain, perhaps he would not have moved the motion which he has just moved. I must say that I heartily disagree with it.

Mr. Gibson: No subsidy.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member for Leeds has raised a question which I had expected was going to be raised much earlier in the discussion. As a matter of fact, I have been carrying the answer in my pocket until I have almost worn it out. The statement which was made a few minutes ago, from the Hansard of March 19, is only a part of the statistics which are available in connection with the payments which have been made by the Department of Agriculture over the years from 1939 down to the present. I have in my hand a sheet which covers all of the net costs of subventions, bonuses and subsidies paid by the federal Department of Agriculture for the fiscal years 1939-40 to 1949-50. From those dates it will be noticed that there is still one year that we have been paying after that. The total amount of the payments, before there was any vote proposed for wheat, was $727 million. Of that, over $169 million went to the dairy farmers in one form of subsidy or another; $248 million of it went to the livestock producers and the greater part of that $248 million will be paid to the same persons as are producing dairy products. Then one could go on to quote the figures with regard to all the products that have been talked about. But the only other figure that I am going to use at the moment is the one having to do with apples and vegetables, including potatoes—and I must say that the potato one is the small one among these—of $30,124,000. When one recalls that there are only about 4,000 fruit growers in Nova Scotia, where they got about $21 million or rather $18 million of that amount—the $21 million would not apply until another year's payments are made—and that the province of British Columbia, with a similar number, received up to that time some $2 million, and since then has had $2 million, one will realize that when 250,000 farmers have a subsidy of $65 million, per family the payment in every one of the other classifications, with the possible exception again of potatoes, has been higher than the payment per family in connection with any grants that have been paid to the wheat growers in connection with wheat. I give those figures in order to ease the minds of those who think that they have got to vote against this item because the people they represent did not get anything. They have all had something. In my opinion, if you take into consideration the farmers in this country from one end to the other with regard to the payments that they have received, it will be found that they have been dealt with with extreme equality, no matter what part of Canada they live in or no matter what part of agriculture they have been conducting.

May I say that I am not altogether sure that the potato growers have been dealt with as favourably as others. There has been a reason offered, one which has been explained to the house on a number of occasions. It is more difficult to find a way of subsidizing potato growers from Ottawa, to pay federal subsidies to potato growers which I presume we would have to make apply all the way across Canada, if such subsidies were produced from here, without injuring the industry itself where it is necessary for it to continue so as to provide a reasonable living to the people concerned, than it is in connection with any of the others.

However that matter is being considered; and what we have in mind in connection with it is that when we have fully dealt with it we at least have the hope that we will have established, or assisted in establishing, some method under which these potatoes can be marketed to better advantage in the years ahead, without depending upon subsidies which may cause people to produce potatoes in great quantities in some other sections of Canada, and thus destroy the market available now for those who must produce potatoes and sell them at some distance away from the farms on which they are produced, without doing injury to those people.

I thought I should say that much. There was no wish on my part to raise a discussion in the matter, because it can be discussed at any time. But facts have been asked for by members in the house. They were placed on Hansard on the 19th, and I think a study of that partial list of facts would be useful.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister seems to be using a more comprehensive list than appeared in Hansard yesterday. Could we have the one he is using placed on Hansard?

Mr. Gardiner: I think it could be placed on Hansard. I do not believe I could, between now and the time Hansard appears in the morning, get a copy which would take in the last year. I had thought at first that I had the last year with me, but I find now that I have not.

Mr. Coldwell: Perhaps it could be brought tomorrow.

Mr. Gardiner: We could probably put it on some time tomorrow.

Mr. Hatfield: The minister is talking about future plans for the potato growers. What about the present year, when they are selling potatoes for a quarter of the cost of production?

Mr. Gardiner: I am talking about the present year and the future. As I said yesterday, the matter is under discussion for this year. I am talking about whatever may be done this year in terms of what might be done in the future. My hope has always been that we could set up some form of organization, perhaps on a co-operative basis, in the two provinces where they must be able to sell potatoes if they are going to be able to stay on their farms, which would take control, and I think would pretty well relieve us here of the responsibility of considering this matter every year. I wanted to say that with regard to the general position.

Then, I have been asked questions as to why we have not consulted this one and why we have not consulted that one with regard to our activities in connection with certain matters.

Mr. Ferguson: Is it your opinion that, owing to the excellent quality of Simcoe county apples, you have never found it necessary to subsidize the farmers of Simcoe county?

Mr. Gardiner: That is not the major reason; but the fact is that during certain years we were subsidizing others we eliminated their apples from Ontario and Quebec, and left that market entirely to the Ontario and Quebec growers. Later on we did quota the number of apples which could be shipped from British Columbia or from the maritime provinces to Ontario and Quebec. And thus there has been left the best market in the world, right under their noses in Ontario and Quebec—Toronto, Montreal and elsewhere—to the people who produced the apples in Ontario. And I have sometimes wondered, in view of the fact that the apples up in Simcoe are so good, why they buy so many British Columbia apples. But apparently that is a fact.

Mr. Ferguson: Just the spice of life; I suppose that is why. It is not the superior quality.

Mr. Gardiner: The question asked as to our consulting different people who are interested in the marketing of wheat as to the decisions made brings to my mind the fact that when we started to consider this question first we were confronted with a resolution which had been introduced into the legislature of Saskatchewan.

During our discussions reference has been made time and again to the possibility of this being somewhat of a political issue—that somebody's hide has got to be saved. Well, I think most of the members in the house, and particularly those from the west, will agree that I have never needed anybody to save my hide, politically. I have been running elections now for thirty-eight years, and I have won them all. So that there is not any hide-saving required. Last time I had the largest majority I ever had; so I am not worrying about that part of it.

Now, I do not know whether the legislature of Saskatchewan was playing politics with wheat or not. There was a suggestion made that there might be an election this summer. I have never agreed or never thought that there would be. As a matter of fact I have my own idea of when that election will be—and I do not think I will be more than a week out. But I am not going to announce it for the benefit of my hon. friends tonight.

The resolution which was introduced on February 21 into that legislature read like this:

Mr. Coldwell: What year?

Mr. Gardiner: 1951.

Mr. Coldwell: We were talking about 1950.

Mr. Gardiner: And I am talking about 1951, which is more up to date. It said:

> Mr. Thair, on Friday next, to move the following resolution:
> That this assembly, recognizing that there exists a national responsibility to compensate the wheat producers for the heavy losses sustained under the Anglo-Canadian wheat agreement and in view of the fact that the farmers of Saskatchewan have carried an undue burden of consumer subsidization, recommend to the dominion government that a final payment of not less than 25 cents per bushel be made as a final payment under the five-year pool.

I would call attention to the fact that in this resolution they mention the heavy losses sustained under the Anglo-Canadian wheat agreement. That is the chief fact mentioned in the resolution. Then they go on to refer to the question raised a few moments ago by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), namely the subsidizing of the consumers in this country. Then they recommend a final payment of not less than 25 cents a bushel—which works out to about $350 million.

Well, it is true that that is not all suggested as a subsidy. There is 3·81 cents of it already in the pool as a result of having sold wheat. So that, as was suggested the other night by the hon. member for Melfort, the subsidy is something over $300 million. That resolution was on the order paper of February 21. The Prime Minister stood up in this house on March 2 and made the announcement that we were paying $65 million into the pool which would result in a payment of about 8·3 cents per bushel on the wheat. On March 5, just three days later, this appears on the votes and proceedings of the legislature of Saskatchewan:

The motion, to be moved by Mr. Thair, respecting a final payment by the government of Canada, under the five-year wheat pool, of not less than 25 cents per bushel was, by leave of the assembly, withdrawn.

It remained on the order paper from February 21 until March 5, and then by leave of the house it was withdrawn. Then on March 6, the next day, Mr. Thair moved another resolution as follows:

Mr. Thair, on Thursday next, to move the following resolution:

That this assembly regrets that the government of Canada has failed to give the wheat growers a sufficient return for the wheat delivered to the five-year pool during the period 1945-49, and urges the said government to give immediate consideration to the revision upward of the 8·3 cents per bushel final payment recently announced, in order that the wheat growers may be more adequately compensated.

It will be seen that they have dropped all mention of the "have regard to" clause or of the British agreement. They did not want to talk about that. They even dropped all mention of the 25 cents per bushel and left our friends who sit in this house and who support the same party sitting holding the bag. There is no 25 cents mentioned in the resolution at all. Those men back in Regina who are close to the farming population of western Canada, who are close to the organizations that handle grain in great quantities, came to the conclusion that the 25 cents should not be there and they withdrew it from their resolution.

Apparently they did not know that I was going to make a speech in the house on Thursday, March 8, when they suggested putting this resolution on the order paper on Thursday, March 8. I made a speech on Thursday, March 8, which was published in Regina, and instead of having the resolution proceeded with on Thursday, on March 9 this appears in the votes and proceedings:

By leave of the assembly, the resolution to be moved by Mr. Thair respecting the final settlement for wheat delivered to the five-year pool during the period 1945-49, was withdrawn.

It was withdrawn.

Mr. Coldwell: Was that a private member's motion?

Mr. Gardiner: You know Mr. Thair.

Mr. Coldwell: Was it a private member's motion?

Mr. Gardiner: It was a private member's motion, yes.

Mr. Coldwell: Private members withdraw their motions here.

Mr. Gardiner: But they do not do it that often and with the same relationship to what other people are saying. The speech which I delivered in the house that evening did lay some responsibility upon the British government for the decision reached. The resolution which was on the order paper or which my friend thought was on the order paper, but which from his attitude now and at the time he made his speech, he did not seem to know about—

Mr. Coldwell: As a matter of fact I did not know that those motions were on the paper.

Mr. Gardiner: I am beginning to think you did not, although I thought you had other ideas.

Mr. Coldwell: If the minister wants to start a debate on this I am sure we will be glad to accommodate him.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not starting anything, I am just trying to give information. I am giving it.

Mr. Coldwell: You have not given any explanation yet as to why the producers were not called in for consultation between May 22 and May 30, 1950.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not interrupt the hon. member when he was speaking.

Mr. Coldwell: This afternoon?

Mr. Gardiner: Not when you are giving so strong a speech as you were the other night and when you are far off the track as you were.

Mr. Knowles: The minister was not here.

Mr. Gardiner: Some of our friends in the press gallery ought to realize you are not always on the track.

Mr. Coldwell: May I suggest that the minister address the chair.

An hon. Member: Can't you take it?

Mr. Gardiner: I can quite understand why you do not like my looks. I will turn the other way.

Mr. Coldwell: Again I suggest that the minister should not address me personally but rather should speak to the chair. That is a rule of the house.

Mr. Gardiner: I looked right straight in your eyes the other night when you were saying that I was making statements that could not be believed.

Mr. Coldwell: That is right.

Mr. Gardiner: So that resolution was withdrawn on the day following the speech which I delivered in this house and in which I said that there was some responsibility on the British government. I refer now to votes and proceedings of the Regina house of Tuesday March 13, 1951. My friend made his speech in the house on the night of March 12 and it was reported in the Regina Leader-Post the next morning. There is no question about whether or not the members of the legislature of Saskatchewan, private or otherwise, knew of that speech and what was said. Let us read the third resolution they put on the order paper, after having withdrawn two. I am not too sure that this one is going to stick for reasons I happen to know about, but we will put it on the record anyway. The votes and proceedings of March 13 contains this:

> Moved by Mr. Thair, seconded by Mr. Brown:
> That this assembly endorses the resolution passed at a joint meeting of the Saskatchewan Federation of Agriculture and the executive of the western agricultural conference held in Regina on Wednesday, March 7, 1951, as follows:
> "That the government of Canada be asked to pay on the five-year pool settlement at least $48,000,000 as a return of the subsidy paid by producers on domestic wheat, plus a further substantial payment in addition to the $65,000,000 token payment already announced in consideration of the 'have regard to' clause of the Canada-United Kingdom agreement".

If anybody can run an election on those resolutions I would like to see them try it. There is not going to be an election run on the wheat payment. There is not going to be any election run as a result of any vote that is passed here, whether it is $65 million or any other number of millions. The people who have been trying to build up that theory in the minds of the people are doing it without any knowledge of the facts, without having given any thought whatsoever to what is going on in the section of the country from which we come.

If in spite of what I am saying there happens to be an election in western Canada or in Saskatchewan two years before the time the government needs to have it, it certainly will not be run on this issue. As someone said the other night, the issue upon which they are threatening to run is the Korean issue. When we see the Korean issue discussed in this house in order to obstruct the discussion of this particular resolution—

Mr. Coldwell: I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. member for Vancouver East certainly had no thought in mind of obstructing this discussion. As a matter of fact he did that on his own initiative. When the minister says that there is disagreement, look at the disagreement there is in the Liberal party tonight on this wheat issue.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I probably have no right to suggest that the hon. member had any motive in mind when he discussed Korea this afternoon and I probably should withdraw the suggestion because it is not in accordance with the rules of the house. Nevertheless I would point out that the premier of Saskatchewan did suggest having an election on that issue.

Mr. Coldwell: No, that is not what he said.

Mr. Gardiner: From the floor of the house.

Mr. Coldwell: No, no.

Mr. Gardiner: On the issue of the activities in Korea.

Mr. Coldwell: That is not what he said.

Mr. Gardiner: This is sufficient for the purpose we have at the moment. The party that my hon. friend leads is not very well decided as to just what they think about wheat. I have been asked why we did not consult the farmers. Three members of this government did consult the farmers last week.

Mr. Coldwell: Ah, but—

Mr. Gardiner: We will get around to your "ah, but" after a while, but right now I am telling you that we did discuss it with the farmers. It may surprise my hon. friends when they go home at Easter to find out that what I stated here very early in the debate is true, namely, that I have not yet met a single farmer who was asking for 25 cents a bushel, and that I was much nearer right than some of the others are. That is the position in relation to this matter but I did not rise so much to deal with that. Many things have been said in this house with respect to myself personally and with regard to my general attitude toward this question. In that regard I want to say that a great deal has been said about the relationships of this country with Great Britain, and about the attitude that one should take towards discussions between this country and Great Britain.

I do not think I need to make any apologies to anyone—and more particularly to the leader of the C.C.F. party—for any attitude that I have ever taken towards Great Britain either in this house or outside of it. As a matter of fact I have perhaps a peculiar opinion in the minds of some people but I still believe in the good old theory that was enunciated many years ago by the leader of the Conservative party at that time when he said: "A British subject I was born and a British subject I hope to die."

An hon. Member: I will die.

Mr. Gardiner: No, I read it myself today and he said "I hope to die."

Mr. Knowles: Speak for yourself.

An hon. Member: Revised version.

Mr. Gardiner: There are more than modern members of parliament who get their Hansard corrected at times.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You go and look at the monument at Kingston. You will see which is right.

Mr. Gardiner: That was after it was revised, I suppose, but the way it is in Hansard is just as I have stated. What I wanted to say was that as a Canadian citizen I am also a British subject, and I think I am so recognized and acknowledged when I am in Great Britain. The British do not expect that we are going to take exactly the same attitude or feel ourselves under some obligation to withhold discussions in certain directions when we are in London as we might feel if we were in Moscow. There is a little different attitude taken by people in the capitals of the countries of the British commonwealth compared with people who are in other capitals. International complications are not the same.

That brings to my mind that when I turned on the radio on Sunday night to listen to the review of the news I heard the most scurrilous description of myself that I have ever heard, and I have heard a lot of them. This one was made by the son of one of the most gentlemanly individuals whom I have ever had the opportunity to meet in my political life, the former leader of the C.C.F. party. I do not know that I would have listened to it if I had known what he was going to say but once I started to listen I had to listen to the end to see how far he would go.

An hon. Member: The editor of a Liberal paper.

Mr. Gardiner: That paper is not Liberal.

An hon. Member: Since when?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: The story was to the effect that there was something wrong with my morals. Well, probably there is but they will compare favourably with those of some other people. Then he went on to say that I was doing something which would injure international relationships. I want to tell the hon. gentleman—I don't know that I should give him that title because he does not sit in this house, and for that reason and no other probably—that after this speech which I have in my hand was delivered—

Mr. Fulton: Which one is that?

Mr. Gardiner: I am going to read it to you and you will know all about it—I had to sit at a dinner in this city to which I was invited and listen to this man and his speech being criticized by the representatives of another nation. I had to apologize for him by saying that his opinion does not count for much anyway. Maybe on that basis I should not say anything about it in this house but nevertheless I have spoken to so many people who have stated in the last few days that I should say something about it that I want to read what this American gentleman was objecting to. This speech was delivered on December 17, 1950.

An hon. Member: By whom?

Mr. Gardiner: By the editor of the Evening Citizen. Here is what he said, as reported in the Ottawa Citizen of December 19, 1950:

> I do not think Canadians are more afraid than other people are of getting involved in another big war. What they are afraid of, I think, is that they may be dragged into a war that might be avoided if it were not for America's hysterical fear of communism and blunders in American foreign policy this fear has caused.

If I ever say anything in this house that is as strong as that, or anything that is more likely than that to cause trouble between two countries, then I will expect someone to make on the radio and elsewhere the kind of attack which was made by the editor of this paper in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What has that got to do with item 576?

Mr. Gardiner: My friend says: What has this got to do with this item? It was this very matter that he was discussing when he made this statement with regard to myself.

Mr. Drew: On December 19?

Mr. Gardiner: He said because I had suggested that $65 million was to be paid that it was immoral because it was being done to bribe people for this election that was going to be held. There were other reasons why it was immoral. It was a terrible thing to be doing at this time of difficulty throughout the world because of the effect it might have internationally. I am just suggesting that if I had ever gone as far as this gentleman has gone in that direction I would not be surprised at anything that might be said.

Mr. Warren: Excommunicate him.

Mr. Gardiner: I have in my hand another publication which has been dealing with this question for some time. I think I should deal with it because it has been quoted twice tonight in the debate so far. There are some rather complimentary remarks made at the beginning of it by Mr. Michael Barkway in commenting upon the discussion in this house last week.

What I should like to say at the beginning is that in the 38 years that I have sat either in the legislature or in the House of Commons, on two occasions I have seen men brought before the bar of the house for disrespect to members who have been speaking in different legislative bodies. I doubt very much if they had gone any farther than, or as far as, either of these gentlemen did go with regard to discussions in this house recently. I am not going so far as to make statements in this house with regard to either of them that I would not make outside the house because I do not think it is fair for any member who is under the protection of the house to attack men who have not the protection of the house; but I do think it is most unfair for men, who are given the privilege of sitting in the press gallery of this house, to abuse that privilege by uttering statements which are not borne out by the facts in connection with any discussion which took place in this house. Therefore I think I must make the corrections that are necessary in order to make sure that these matters are not reported again in the discussion as being matters of fact. They are not matters of fact. This gentleman says:

> There is nothing of finesse about Mr. Gardiner's technique.

Mr. Fulton: He is not the only one who has said that.

Mr. Gardiner: I never pretend to be an after-dinner speaker or anything of that kind. I continue:

> There is nothing of finesse about Mr. Gardiner's technique. "The British were confident," he said, "that the price of wheat would fall below $1.55 in the last two years of the agreement, and we were just as confident, that with United States aid and a Canadian loan, the price would go and remain above $1.55."

Then there is a part put in which I am not sure that he could have said. It is in brackets to show something that is supposed to be in the agreement and I think it is. Then he goes on to say:

> Probably no other member of parliament would have dared to bank on the shortness of public memory to this extent. In all parts of the house, members remembered perfectly well that in the years Mr. Gardiner was speaking of, 1945 and 1946, the one great fear of the farmers' organizations, and the one compelling motive for signing the four-year contract was the expectation that the bottom would drop out of the wheat market. Mr. Gardiner, who has an exceptionally good memory, must remember that in the summer of 1946 an international wheat agreement was already being discussed, and the price then being contemplated as a maximum was $1.55. He will also remember that the preamble to the United Kingdom agreement—

Said so and so. Let us take a look for a moment at the prices during the period of which he speaks and when he says the price was $1.55. The world price as we have been discussing it, the Chicago price, in September of 1945 was $1.72 when we started to discuss $1.55 as a ceiling. The price in June of 1946 was $1.95; at Chicago in July, 1946, it was $2.01. It was in July, 1946, that the contract was signed at $1.55. How anyone can suggest that there was any reason for considering $1.55 as the actual price of wheat, or anything associated with it, is most difficult to understand.

The next paragraph says that a world agreement was being discussed at that time, an international wheat agreement. An international wheat agreement was first discussed in 1932, and in case somebody looks up the record I had better recite it now. I was opposed to it and, as a matter of fact, led the attack upon it in the legislature of Saskatchewan when I was leading the opposition. That opposition to the agreement continued for some years, as members of the C.C.F. party know. But in recent years I have been a convert to the idea and you know converts always believe in anything much more firmly than those who had always believed in it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And how!

Mr. Gardiner: And so I am somewhat of a convert. But what was the ceiling price that was being discussed? It was not $1.55 a bushel. It never was. The ceiling price being discussed at the beginning at that time was $1.50 a bushel, and the floor was $1 a bushel. And we in Canada agreed to accept that ceiling of $1.50 and the floor of $1. But when the matter went before the conference which was held, as he stated here, it was not agreed to. The reason that it was not agreed to was that the American parity price was $1.80; and they insisted upon the ceiling price in the agreement being $1.80; and not $1.55. I should like my friend to explain why, under these facts, he tries to tell me that we were absolutely convinced that at that time wheat was only going to be worth $1.55. Then we come down to the next statement where he says:

> As late as April, 1947, Mr. Gardiner said to the House of Commons: "If the world market remains as high as it is now, which very few people expect . . ."

He just cuts the sentence off there. I do not know what I said after that; I have not looked it up; but he says that in April 1947 I said: "If the world market remains as high as it is now, which very few people expect"—he says that in order to prove to the Canadian public that I had not thought wheat was going to stay up as compared with what it was at the beginning of this contract. Well, what was the price of wheat on the Chicago market in April of 1947? It was $2.58, and it continued to go up until it was $3.09 later in that year. Wheat never has been as high as that since. In other words, I said that wheat could not remain at the very high peak that it was in 1947. It was bound to come down from there, and it was because it was bound to come down from there that there was no reason in the world for being absolutely convinced when we accepted $2 a bushel later on that that would not result in any payment being made under the "have regard to" clause. All I repeat this for is to indicate that that was the position.

In his next statement he goes on to say:

> No wonder members found the rest of the argument topsy-turvy. But if Mr. Gardiner is anything, he is ingenious. By carefully chosen references he built up his precarious structure.

Someone quoted the remainder of this this evening indicating that I had left out something. The only thing I left out was what everybody agrees with regard to, namely, that a legal floor was established under the agreement and that the "have regard to" clause had relation to the ceiling and not to the floor, and therefore there was no reason whatsoever for my using this quotation in connection with what I had to say on the matter. But I would point this out, that the Canadian government put a floor under wheat before the British government put in any floor. We put a floor of $1 per bushel for five years in 1945, to be continued until the end of the five-year pool. That floor which was there in the last year was an obligation to this government which the British government only accepted when they were drawing up this agreement, and the fact that they put $1.25 in the other was not going to be of any particular help to the farmers because we had already guaranteed them $1.25 for the whole five years of the contract.

Every member of this house recalls that we here passed an amendment to the act a year later than this contract was drawn raising the advance payment from $1.25, where it had been and which was as high as the British ever put it, to $1.35. They had that guarantee right through the whole contract no matter what the British had undertaken to put in it. I believe that is sufficient to cover that particular matter, but there is one other thing which is his final crack. He says this:

> The other essential basis of Mr. Gardiner's argument was that the British government, in his own words, "owed us something or owed the farmers of western Canada something." But here he was up against the fact that last June 5, Mr. Howe, the minister responsible for marketing wheat, had told parliament that the British said they had fulfilled all their obligations; and Mr. Howe added: "We agreed on behalf of Canada that considering all the circumstances that was the case."

Now, here is the important thing.

> Mr. Gardiner simply ignored this.

I have in my hand the Hansard, Mr. Chairman. What are the facts? I was being interrupted while I was attempting to put the whole matter on the record. I read the first two sentences, and then someone said something and I went on to read the other, "We agreed on behalf of Canada that considering all the circumstances that was the case." This man says I passed that up altogether. He says I passed it up as part of my technique. I am not going to say anything more with regard to the remainder of the article, because it deals with Mr. Howe's position, other than to say this to the members of this committee, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce on two occasions corrected that statement. The statement was repeated here a few minutes ago by the member for Melfort. On two occasions the Minister of Trade and Commerce corrected that statement before someone said to him, "Well, do you want to correct it?" Mr. Howe said no. He had already corrected it. He corrected it again later on.

All I want to say about it is, that under those circumstances I think an article of this kind is so far away from the facts that the gentleman who wrote it ought to get the information and read it himself. This afternoon someone said that the information is all on the record. There is information on the record with regard to one incident, and after that information was placed in the hands of the committee the mover of the resolution requesting the information withdrew the resolution and the other information is not in the hands of the committee. But that information only bears out what has been said; and, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to go any further into the discussion than to say that there are no two members of this government—I want to say this—there are no two members of this government who have worked more closely over the last fifteen years than the Minister of Trade and Commerce and myself. I do want to say this, too, that I have never made a move in connection with this wheat matter without first discussing it with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, since he became the Minister of Trade and Commerce. We discussed all these matters as I indicated in the story I told more than a week ago, and which has been the subject of criticism in this house. As was demonstrated this afternoon, the members who got up and made criticisms had not read Hansard themselves. I would suggest that if criticisms are going to be made, that really ought to be done. I make no apology whatever for taking up a little time tonight in order to straighten out one or two things. I have never asked for anyone's sympathy—

An hon. Member: Indulgence.

Mr. Gardiner: —indulgence, yes, that is probably the better word—at any time since I have been in this house or at any time since I have been in politics. I have always attempted to keep myself informed before I tried to inform others. I should like to suggest to those who are going to write articles like this that they ought to have themselves informed before they write them.

For the benefit of my hon. friend, I am going to tell a little story. There is another periodical that is printed not very far away from where this one is printed. On two occasions that periodical undertook to write articles like this one. One occasion was when I was fighting a battle in Saskatchewan in 1929, and I am not going over the details of it now, but the most scurrilous attack prior to this one and prior to the one on Sunday night that has ever been made upon me—I think they have been just as scurrilous upon me as anyone else—was made on that occasion. We lost the election. Then, we had another election five years later, and we won that. The same gentleman wrote the same kind of article again. He could not understand why the Saskatchewan people would put me back again.

Do you know what happened? That periodical was thrown off most of the newsstands in Saskatchewan; they said they would not sell it.

Mr. Coldwell: What was the name of that periodical?

Mr. Gardiner: It was Maclean's magazine.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It still survived, you know.

Mr. Gardiner: But the man did not survive who wrote the article; that is the point of the story. They sent the gentleman out to Saskatchewan to find out from me what was wrong with the article. I told him there was not anything wrong with it; I was delighted with it. He said, "What delights you with it? Everybody seems to take the opposite view." I said "You have shown me how many friends I have all the way from Halifax to Vancouver". I was kept busy answering my correspondence. You can write to Maclean's publishers and they will agree with this. They wrote me and asked me the first time I was in Toronto to submit to having my picture drawn by an artist. They said it would be a little difficult to put it in Maclean's magazine, but they would put it in the Financial Post. If anyone doubts the story he can get the Financial Post and find one of the finest pen pictures of me that anyone has ever drawn, and a very fine story about my whole political life, leaving out all these criticisms that had been made.

I should like to remind my hon. friend who sits in the gallery sometimes, and who writes this kind of thing, and the Ottawa editor of the publication, that there are precedents for what has happened to fellows who write things like this. I would suggest that they become informed before writing them. The other part of the story that I have just been telling is that I understand why people attack me. I understand why they are always saying that I am a machine politician. I smashed two of the worst political machines that were ever set up in Canada. I did not set them up. They were both headed by newspapers. I would not like to stand on the floor of this house and give you the story as to how they managed to set them up, although I know it.

Mr. Fulton: Which newspapers?

Mr. Gardiner: One of them was a Liberal paper and the other was a Conservative paper.

Mr. Nowlan: What are the names?

Mr. Gardiner: The first was the Leader-Post of its day and the second was the Regina Star of its day. There is not anyone in the newspaper business who will question the fact that both of the machines that were set up around them were smashed. My difficulty is that some of those associated with these ventures are still alive and scattered over Canada, and some of them are still in the newspaper business.

Mr. Fulton: You would rather that they were dead, I suppose.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not worry about them. They elect me every election. I just wanted to state these facts in order to indicate to the members of this chamber that I am not at all concerned about what these men write, but I am concerned about the welfare of the House of Commons which carries on discussions regarding public affairs and then has reports put out from these galleries by persons who pay no attention whatever to the facts when they have some reason for trying to propagandize someone out of this house or someone out of this government. But again I say that we in this country are in the fortunate position that we have a Liberal party and it believes in Liberal principles. This afternoon I said something which I probably did not make complete, and I want to complete it now. The Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I and every other member of this government believe in the principles of Liberalism.

An hon. Member: Why do you not live up to them?

Mr. Gardiner: We are out and out Liberals; and the essence of Liberalism is that you are out for reform. When you are out for reform, you are always pulling into the future. You are not always in agreement on what is being done today, although you hope to be all in agreement when what is advocated is accomplished and on what is being done after it is accomplished. We have all been working together in the government toward a certain end. If I were looking for compliments, and wanting to acknowledge them, I would say that the finest compliment that I have ever had since I have been in public life—and as I said a moment ago, I have been in public life now for 38 years—was the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other night in this chamber when he got to his feet and said what he did. He said what? He said that, even although he did not advocate it when we started, there had been a five-year pool set up, a year later there was a British contract drawn, and that this contract and this pool had been the best things that had ever been done in the interest of the wheat growers of western Canada. It just so happens that I was entrusted with the task of establishing the wheat pool; that is the five-year pool. It just so happens also that I was entrusted with the task of establishing the four-year contract; and that is the reason why I am entrusted with the task tonight of trying to put through the $65 million vote which is the final act in connection with that contract.

An hon. Member: You did a good job.

Mr. Gardiner: The Minister of Trade and Commerce says I did a good job.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would you read us the last sentence of his speech?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: The last sentence of his speech will stand a lot of investigation on the part of a man like the hon. member; and if he fully understands it—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister read it?

Mr. Gardiner: I will read some other parts of the speech in which the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that, in spite of the fact that he felt this and he felt that, he was in agreement with the fact that the government had decided to pay $65 million into this pool.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes; he said that.

Mr. Gardiner: And that is all that is involved now.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister read the last sentence?

Mr. Gardiner: If you read the whole speech you will be better informed than you will be by just reading the last sentence.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Read the last sentence.

Mr. Gardiner: As I say, that is the present position; and so far as the party itself is concerned I think that the party, led as it is, is one of the strongest parties we have ever had in Canada under any name. I also think that it would be weakened if any one of the three men who are being discussed so much in connection with this debate were to drop out of the party. I want to assure my hon. friends, however, that if I were out of the government tomorrow I would not drop out of the party. I would be hammering the Tories and the C.C.F.'ers just as strongly as when I was in the government. As long as the three of us remain where we are, I think it will be fairly generally agreed across the country that we have an exceedingly good government.

Mr. Coldwell: Really, Mr. Chairman, I never know just how to describe the minister, whether as irrepressible or incorrigible. I think one of those two words suits him tonight. What I really rose to say was this. I am wondering if the minister is trying to talk out his own resolution.

Mr. Gardiner: We can still put it through if you sit down.

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. member for Melfort asked the minister two questions, and I have repeated them. I would ask him to answer those two questions when we meet tomorrow afternoon. One is why no advice was sought from representatives of the producers between May 22 and May 30 before the government's acceptance of the final settlement; and second, why the amount which is owing to western farmers for their contribution to Canadian bread during the years that were mentioned of approximately $48 million has not been included in that estimate. May I tell the minister that I read Hansard and that when I heard the sentence he extracted from Mr. Howe's statement this afternoon, I did not recognize it because it was taken out of its context; when read in the context, it means something different from what the minister said it meant and supports my view and not his.

Item stands.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported, read the second time and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I generally announce a great many measures for the next day; but tonight I think I should limit myself to mentioning continuation of consideration of these supplementary estimates.

Some time ago the motion was passed that the house would adjourn tomorrow at six o'clock. I would suggest that if we got through with the estimates about six o'clock, we might get unanimous consent to sit a little longer so that these bills may be sent to the Senate.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Does the hon. member say he would not wish to have the supplementaries passed?

Mr. Coldwell: Tonight. This afternoon most of us were co-operating to get these estimates through. Tonight we have heard an hour-long speech from the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Drew: An hour and a quarter.

Mr. Coldwell: And I do not propose to sit tomorrow night under those circumstances.

Mr. Abbott: May I add a word. In connection with these supplementary estimates, I think we will have to sit Thursday or whatever time is necessary, until the supplementary estimates are passed. I am going to be here all the time, through Easter. I am not leaving. I hope the house will work to pass the balance of the estimates as soon as possible.

Mr. Coldwell: We listened to an hour-and-a-quarter long political speech.

Mr. Abbott: Hon. members can talk as long as they like, but I point out that the supplementary estimates must be passed before we adjourn for Easter.

Mr. Drew: May I point out that if there is any problem arising, then it is the entire responsibility of the government. The Minister of Agriculture has talked for an hour and a quarter about everything except wheat.

Mr. Gardiner: I talked an hour about wheat.

Mr. Drew: He conducted a filibuster against his own estimates; and if there is any responsibility it must rest entirely upon the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that I understand that after a speech like that of the Minister of Agriculture some people are a little nervous. Tomorrow—

Mr. Drew: No, not nervous at all; but it did not relate to wheat.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would not want to have a quick decision made, and I would not think this would be the proper time to make it. But I suggest that from now until tomorrow at three o'clock we think this over; because the passing of the supplementary estimates for this year is a quite important matter, and the consequences ought to be thought about. As to responsibility, we will not go into any long speeches. I have listened to a good many of them.

Mr. Fleming: One tonight.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes, and from the hon. member for Eglinton nearly every day.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The house is adjourned until tomorrow at three o'clock.

Mr. Drew: Before the house adjourns, it is all very well to make light of it. But the Minister of Agriculture to his own satisfaction has conducted a campaign this evening against the government of Saskatchewan, and against several responsible newspapers, and has discussed everything but wheat. If there is going to be any problem arising, then the Minister of Agriculture might well consider the course that he himself has perhaps made necessary, and that is letting this item stand by itself, in relation to the other items before us.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If we could agree, we could continue sitting tonight.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We could sit for an hour tonight.

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Mr. Abbott: Easter does not begin until Friday.

Mr. Coldwell: We listened to an hour-and-a-quarter political speech tonight, and I am not going to agree to that sort of thing. If we get that kind of treatment, we have some rights in this house and we are going to insist upon having them respected.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Gardiner: I think my hon. friend will agree—

An hon. Member: You made a good speech.

Mr. Gardiner: —that I took quite a bit last week; and I do not know why they should not be prepared to listen to my answer, especially when I took it from those outside the house who could not be answered any other place but here. I think I had the right to say what I had to say tonight; and I would just like to suggest that I think what the minister his just said is perhaps true. We may feel better tomorrow; and if I took up too much time tonight, then could we meet at eleven o'clock tomorrow, or some other time to discuss the matter.

Mr. Coldwell: But the minister's speech deliberately played Saskatchewan politics.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: It did.

Mr. Coldwell: And I have nothing to do with the legislature of Saskatchewan.

An hon. Member: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Coldwell: I have nothing whatever to do with it. I did not know those private members' motions were on the order paper, incidentally. And to drag such a matter extraneously into the house, and then expect us to accommodate the minister and the government by sitting tomorrow night is, I think, something that we should not tolerate.

Mr. Martin: To accommodate the people of Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: I would say to my hon. friend that I did not refer to the scurrilous attack he made upon me the other night. I think he will agree that probably I had sufficient reason to have done so; but I did not.

Mr. Coldwell: I am very anxious to see this $65 million item pass but my previous criticisms are justified by the record.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Let us finish it then.

Mr. Coldwell: But I think there is a point beyond which we should not retreat in circumstances such as these.

An hon. Member: Retreat?

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 21, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

ATOMIC ENERGY

CONSTRUCTION OF NEW REACTOR AT CHALK RIVER—REFERENCE TO QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN ON MARCH 12

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that it is expected that this will be the last day before the house rises for the Easter holiday, I should like to refer to a matter on a question of privilege, in view of the fact that I was not in the house the day that this matter arose.

On March 12, as reported on page 1133 of Hansard, a question asked by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr Courtemanche) was passed as an order for return. Had I been here I would have objected to that procedure, because a question in precisely the same form was asked and answered by the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor), with regard to certain developments at Sept Iles. The wording was precisely the same, the other question was answered, and I am sure this is a question that should have been answered. The hon. member for Labelle has been seeking the information and has not been able to obtain it. We shall now be adjourning for the holiday, and I should like an explanation why this question was made an order for return when a question in the same form with respect to another project was answered a short time ago. I should like to know why the information has not been made available.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps I should say something in reply to the question of privilege that has been raised. I was not advised that a question of privilege was to be raised, or I might have looked up some of the authorities with respect to passing a question as an order for return.

The simple fact of the matter is, however, that the question involves a reactor in the atomic energy project at Chalk River. It was passed as an order for return and sent out to the atomic energy control board in the usual way. I presume the answer will come back in the ordinary manner and will be given in the house.

If there is any guilt at all it is the guilt of trying to be careful with respect to some of these things that involve some degree of security. I am not in a position to discuss the question in detail, because the information is not at hand.

I might also point out that I have had the duty of answering a great number of questions in the house during the last five years, and members who have had questions on the order paper, the preparation of the answers to which appeared to be taking an unusual length of time, have often come to me and asked when they could obtain the answers. In this case there has been no such move. There could easily have been an explanation as to the procedure and possibly a speeding up of the obtaining of the answer. I will certainly try to get the information and give it to the house in the ordinary way.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the impression should be left which has been left —and I know quite unintentionally—by the hon. member who has just spoken. I am informed by the hon. member for Labelle that he addressed a letter to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) yesterday stating that he was seeking this information, and that unless the information had been made available to him by three o'clock today the matter would be raised. I am raising it because this question is one of procedure which I think carries with it important consequences.

I should also like to point out that the question is not with respect to the reactor, and is not one involving any matter of security. The question is: What firm of engineers have been employed with regard to the construction of that reactor?

Mr. McIlraith: I think I should point out that the question involves more than that. It is in five parts, and involves, among other things, the basis of the fees payable. I have not seen the information, and am not able to say whether it involves the question of security, but I have had enough to do with matters arising out of that project to know that answers must be looked at carefully and properly. There may be a question of security in what looks like an innocent question.

Mr. Drew: I do not wish to enlarge this into a debate, but I would point out that there can be no possible question of security in answering a question as to what percentage is to be paid to this firm of engineers for the work they are doing with regard to the reactor.

Mr. McIlraith: I must object to that statement going on the record in that dogmatic way. How can the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) state that as a matter of fact, when I, who have been dealing with this sort of thing for some time in connection with this project, am not able to know whether or not a question of security arises.

Mr. Fraser: Then you ought to read the question properly and you could understand it.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fraser: Read the question. You can see it right there.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, March 21, 1951

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, Wednesday, the 21st of March, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. F. Delaute
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the communication from the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General that you have just read, I should like at this time to reserve the right, if it should be necessary to do so, to make some appropriate motion later in the day in order to dispose of the legislation for which royal assent would be required. I hope that it will not be necessary, and that by general consent we shall be able to dispense with making any motion; but I should not like to forgo at this time the right to submit a motion to Your Honour should it become apparent that it was necessary to do so.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the Prime Minister he is simply placing the presentation of the motion in a reserved position, and any of the rights with respect to consent or otherwise are not waived by the house.

Mr. St. Laurent: All I am asking is that we may revert to motions without there being any other commitments on anybody's part.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTS OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION RECOMMENDING CHANGES IN COMPENSATION OF STAFFS OF HOUSE OF COMMONS AND LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to lay before the house a report from the civil service commission recommending changes in the compensation of the staff of the House of Commons; also a report from the civil service commission recommending changes in the compensation of the staff of the library of parliament.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I move:

That the report of the civil service commission recommending changes in the compensation of the staff of the House of Commons, tabled today, be concurred in.

Mr. Fulton: Have you a summary of the effect of the motion?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Some months ago increases were granted to all civil servants on a scale that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) announced in the house. The same scale was applied to the staff of the House of Commons, but cannot be paid to them without the concurrence of the house because they come under our jurisdiction.

Mr. Casselman: Does that apply to all members of the staff of the House of Commons, or only to certain chosen members?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am relying upon the report of the civil service commission. I do not know whether they would make any discrimination as between members of the staff.

Mr. Casselman: Then you cannot answer the question; is that it?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I can always answer, but I do not know whether I can satisfy the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Speaker: Probably the house would like to know that a number of employees of the house are not under the civil service commission. I think that may be the point of the question raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman). The temporary and sessional employees who are not under the commission are not covered by the report which has been tabled, but according to the practice these employees are receiving comparable increases under another schedule the Clerk has drawn up, which it is not necessary to present to the house.

Mr. Knowles: May we take it, then, that between these two schedules all the employees of the House of Commons are covered?

Mr. Speaker: I think I am safe in saying that is correct. I do not say the increase is exactly the same, but I believe I am right in saying that all employees are covered by those two reports, according to the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): By leave of the house I move:

That the report of the civil service commission recommending changes in the compensation of the staff of the library of parliament, laid on the table of this house today, be referred to the joint committee on the library of parliament.

Motion agreed to.

AIR TRAINING PLAN

STATEMENT AS TO OPERATION OF FLYING SCHOOLS, PRODUCTION OF AIRCRAFT, ETC.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that, in the statement I made on February 5, I said that the government had offered to the North Atlantic treaty organization to train additional aircrew. The number proposed was 1,100 per annum, which would bring the total to be trained for NATO and the United Kingdom something over 1,300 per annum.

We have now received the recommendation of the standing group that all the places available in respect of this additional number up to December 31 of this year should be allocated to the United Kingdom. After that the allocation will be reconsidered.

At present our plans provide for a build-up to an annual output of aircrew of over 3,000. That represents an increase of six times the figure for 1950 and fifteen times the figure for the previous year.

This will be accompanied by a fivefold increase in groundcrew training facilities.

Administrative establishments will also be increased though not to the same extent.

This will require the reopening of a number of airfields. During the war we had a total of 56 airfields used for training either under the British commonwealth air training plan or other plans.

Air Training Plan

We already have air training schools and operational stations or other units in operation or under construction at Goose Bay, and, to a very limited extent, Torbay in Newfoundland; at Summerside in Prince Edward Island; at Dartmouth and Greenwood in Nova Scotia; at Moncton, to a limited extent, and Chatham in New Brunswick; at Bagotville, St. Hubert, St. Johns and Dorval in Quebec; at Rockcliffe, Uplands, Arnprior, Trenton, Downsview, North Bay, Centralia, Clinton and Aylmer in Ontario; at Winnipeg, Gimli and Rivers in Manitoba; at Edmonton, Calgary and Suffield in Alberta; and at Patricia Bay, again to a limited extent, and Vancouver in British Columbia. There are, of course, other headquarters and depots in addition.

Experience during the second world war, when Canada trained 131,000 aircrew, showed that the best places for flying training was in the prairie provinces. Located in these provinces are a number of flying fields with runways, hangars and buildings in a relatively good state of repair, enabling re-establishment to be done as speedily and economically as possible.

Accordingly, all the new flying schools will be located in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Also, to facilitate maintenance and administration and to take advantage of more suitable weather, basic flying training schools will be grouped in the western part of this area, while advanced flying schools will be grouped in the eastern part of this area.

The new schools to be re-established are flying training schools at Claresholm and Penhold in Alberta and Moose Jaw in Saskatchewan. Advanced flying training schools are to be at Saskatoon in Saskatchewan and Portage la Prairie in Manitoba, with a gunnery school at Macdonald. The flying training school at Gimli will later be converted to an advanced training school. A large air navigation school will be established at Winnipeg in addition to the present school at Summerside, P.E.I.

Of the existing establishments, Aylmer, Camp Borden and Clinton in Ontario will concentrate on trades training. Selection and manning will be carried on at St. Johns, Quebec, where there will be a very large establishment.

With hardly an exception, all the other establishments will be increased in accordance with the expansion of the program. Abbotsford will be used this summer for training some of the auxiliary squadrons, others going to other schools. In all probability Abbotsford will later be used as an operational station.

Air Training Plan

In this connection I should like to say that a large number of representations have been received from members of parliament, mayors, boards of trade and other representatives of most of the localities mentioned and many others. They have all offered the closest possible co-operation and reception to the R.C.A.F., with which they had such excellent relations during the war. That co-operative spirit is very greatly appreciated.

The places chosen have been selected having sole regard to two factors: first, suitability for the purpose intended; second, the condition of the existing facilities so as to provide for the most economic and speedy rehabilitation.

The facilities of all the stations will be used to the fullest extent possible. For example, by improved training methods we expect to have pupil populations of 300 at the flying training schools, as compared with 240 during the second world war. The limiting factor at each school will be the number of hours of flying that physically can be fitted in, having regard to the weather and capacity of the airfield.

To operate the plan will require a large number of additional aircraft for training. My colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), announced in the house on March 5 that we would be manufacturing Harvards of the most modern type, as well as engines. In addition to meeting our own requirements, we expect to make a number of these aircraft for sale to the United States. In the meantime, our own needs can be met out of our own stocks, supplemented, if necessary, by aircraft borrowed from the United States, to be replaced out of our own production later.

We shall also be acquiring from the United States some two-seater jet training aircraft to be used until our own production enables us to meet all our own needs for this type of aircraft.

The record made during the second world war in the British commonwealth air training plan has shown that Canada is particularly qualified to make this important contribution to our collective security.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) has very properly availed himself of the privilege which is accorded by unanimous consent to make a statement of this kind, I think it is proper that I should refer to the subject which he has mentioned.

It will be recalled that on earlier occasions I have urged that time should be set aside for a debate in an orderly way on the subject of national defence. There can be no more important subject for this house to consider at a known time, and in a way which will make it possible for views to be clearly expressed on all sides of the house, than that of national defence.

What has now been placed before the house by way of information as to the general plans for training pilots and aircrew indicates the increasing importance of this subject. It is important not to overlook the fact that every night, and in fact at times during the day, the Department of National Defence is making an appeal in which the words are used, "The need is urgent; the time is now." Mr. Speaker, with this greatly expanded program announced by the minister, I urge that the Prime Minister indicate that there will be a settled date for a debate on national defence immediately or shortly after this house resumes following the Easter recess.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I believe it will be very easy to arrange that under the existing standing orders of the house. The general estimates have now been tabled, and I shall be glad immediately after the Easter recess to discuss with my hon friend and with the leaders of the other groups the selection of a day to call the estimates of the Department of National Defence, and to arrange as to what time should be devoted to that subject before passing anything else.

Mr. Dechene: Mr. Speaker, in view of the announcement made by the Minister of National Defence may I be allowed to direct a question to him? Some time ago a rumour was circulated in Edmonton, pursuant to an announcement made in the legislature of Alberta by a local member, concerning the establishment of an air training school near a place called Lac la Biche in the constituency of Athabaska. Is there any truth in that report?

Mr. Claxton: Consideration has been given to that, and discussions are now under way with the government of Alberta as to whether the very large area that would be necessary might be made available by the province.

ESTIMATES, 1951-52

TABLING OF SUMMARY OF STANDARD OBJECTS OF EXPENDITURE AND SPECIAL CATEGORIES

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table, in connection with the estimates, a summary of standard objects of expenditures and special categories. I indicated when I tabled the estimates that at that time this summary had not then been printed. It is now available.

[Mr. Claxton.]

QUESTION AS TO REARRANGEMENT OF HOURS OF SITTING

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. In some sections of the press this morning there was an indication that yesterday I had made a plea in the house for shorter hours of sitting of the House of Commons. I am quite sure that the fault with the announcement in that form could not properly be laid at the doorstep of the press, but was rather attributable to the way in which I phrased it yesterday. Perhaps I did not make my point as clear as I should have. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that what I had in mind, as I believe most members knew, was not a request for shorter sitting hours. I was only asking for a rearrangement of the present sitting hours so that they would be more convenient for members, particularly with respect to the late hours that we sit at night.

While I am on my feet, may I say how pleased I was to have had an offer of co-operation from the Prime Minister in connection with this matter. I hope that after the Easter recess we shall somehow be able to work out something which will be satisfactory to all members, and which at the same time will not interfere with the work of the house but will rather expedite it.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS IN REACHING AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before we rise for the Easter recess, will the Minister of Justice bring us up to date in the matter of negotiations with the provinces concerning old age pensions?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for having given me oral notice of his question. I have not yet received a reply to my letter of February 28 from Premier Campbell. I received a reply from Premier Douglas approximately one hour ago. I should like to add that these facts have not prevented us from carefully considering all the points which have been raised by the other eight provincial premiers in their replies to my said letters. This we have done in order to put ourselves in a position to deal with this matter promptly as soon as we hear from Premier Campbell and give consideration to Premier Douglas' letter.

While I am on my feet, I should like to deal with a point which was raised by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on Monday last when this same question was mentioned.

The hon. member at that time stated that both Premier Campbell and Premier Douglas had answered favourably long ago. That, Mr. Speaker, is not correct. It is true that in reply to previous letters they had both written that they favoured the proposed old age pensions amendment, in principle. The points with which we are dealing here are whether there shall be a constitutional amendment authorizing federal old age pensions, and also with the form of that amendment; and also, of course, with the substance and form of an amendment relating to a three per cent provincial indirect retail sales tax. In this connection we are dealing not with only two provinces, but with ten.

In my letter of February 28 I was chiefly concerned with observations which a number of the provincial premiers had made with respect to both the form and the substance of these two draft amendments which the federal government had previously submitted to them. Four provincial premiers had objected to the form of the old age pensions amendment. In my letter of February 28, concerning which these questions have been asked, I did submit two new alternative drafts to take care of the objections which these four provincial premiers had raised, and also of course dealt with other matters.

The replies which we have been awaiting are as to whether Premier Douglas and Premier Campbell concur in our attempts to meet the views of these other provinces. Since we wish, if at all possible, to get unanimous agreement in this matter, there is no purpose in my writing another letter to all the provincial premiers, in a further attempt to secure agreement both as to substance and as to form, until I hear from all the provincial premiers in reply to my letter of February 28. Or, to put it another way, there is no purpose in commencing another stage of the work until we complete the present stage, and we cannot complete the present stage until we hear from all the provinces concerning it.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

REPORT AS TO REMOVAL OF HEADQUARTERS TO MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Resources and Development. Having regard to the fact that provision has been made for a $300,000 building in Montreal, which rumour says is to be a national film board undertaking, will the minister comment on the report to the effect that the headquarters of the film board are being moved to Montreal?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, the film board is at present occupying, in whole or in part, eight buildings in Ottawa and three at Pendleton. In the interests of efficiency and economy, it is considered that steps should be taken toward consolidating the board's operations under one roof.

In this connection some thought has been given to a suitable location. Montreal is among the centres under consideration. Being a centre of bilingual culture, it has much to commend it. No site has been chosen, and no plans have been prepared. The amount in question in the estimates is for the purpose of obtaining a site and starting plans for a suitable building. I might add that this is a long-term plan and that no move is imminent.

Mr. Sinnott: Winnipeg would be a good place.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF COMMITTEE APPOINTED TO STUDY ACT AND RELATED STATUTES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. Will he indicate when it is expected that the report of the committee engaged in the revision of the Combines Investigation Act will be completed?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I should like to thank the hon. member for Eglinton for having given me notice of his question.

On February 14 last the hon. member asked me whether I could indicate to the house when I expected to receive the report of the committee, and I replied then that I would think that the target date, about March 1, which was planned, would still remain the target date and that we should then shortly know whether it would be possible for us to achieve that goal in actual fact. I have since received from the Hon. Mr. Justice McQuarrie, the chairman of the committee, the reasons why this goal has not been achieved. I think that I should preface these reasons with a brief statement of the events down to the present in order that the house will understand that the committee is proceeding with the utmost haste that is compatible with the seriousness of its task.

On June 27, 1950, I announced in this house the appointment of the committee and its terms of reference.

The committee held its first meeting in Ottawa early in July, 1950. Following this meeting, the committee, in order to obtain as wide an expression of opinion as possible, notified the public, by letters to trade, labour and consumer organizations and to business firms and to the press, that for its assistance in this study the committee was anxious to receive at an early date from such organizations, firms and individuals, whatever views they might wish to express upon matters within its terms of reference.

In response to this request a considerable number of formal briefs and numerous informal letters and communications were received by the committee. There were many requests for delay from persons and organizations who wished to make representations but were unable, by reason of its being the summer holiday season or for other reasons, to prepare their material within the time indicated by the committee. There were also many requests for interviews. In the result, few briefs were received before mid-autumn, and briefs have continued to come in to the committee until December, 1950, the last one being received from a large national organization in a covering letter dated December 7, 1950. Many interviews were held throughout this period, that is, from midsummer to February.

The committee, since its first meeting in Ottawa on July 4, has held a considerable number of further committee meetings in Ottawa and completed a session of two and a half weeks during February, 1951. Towards the end of this last session the chairman informed me that, because of the voluminous data to be examined and the complexity of the problems that required extended study and consideration, the original target date would have to be advanced, since the work of the committee would require considerable further time before completion.

He said that he and his colleagues would do their best to finish and present their report before the end of the present session of parliament, but he could not guarantee that this would be possible.

SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

OLD AGE PENSIONS—PROGRESS IN REACHING AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I should like to take this opportunity to comment briefly upon the remarks made a moment ago by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). I wish to thank him for the answer he gave indicating that an endeavour is being made to reach an agreement with the various provinces as to the wording of appropriate constitutional amendments so as to make possible implementation of the old age pensions program recommended to parliament last June.

What I wish to say resolves itself into two items. In the first place I feel it would be only fair, since the Minister of Justice has referred to the fact that he received a communication from the premier of Saskatchewan today, to indicate that I have in my hand a copy of the Votes and Proceedings of the Saskatchewan legislature for Friday, March 16. From exchanges of telegrams I have had this week with the premier of Saskatchewan I believe I can say that a copy of this issue of Saskatchewan's Votes and Proceedings has been furnished to the Minister of Justice, with the letter he received this afternoon.

I note that on Friday, March 16, the Saskatchewan legislative assembly adopted two resolutions dealing with this matter, both of which were moved by Premier Douglas and seconded by Mr. Fines, the provincial treasurer. The first one deals with an amendment to the British North America Act with respect to old age pensions. The second one deals with an amendment to that same statute regarding indirect taxation within the province. May I read the first of these resolutions:

> That this assembly approves in principle the amendment to the British North America Act proposed by the government of Canada following the federal-provincial conference held in December, 1950, designed to provide that while the legislature may make laws in relation to old age pensions within the province, the parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, and authorizes the lieutenant governor in council to approve any amendment incorporating such principle or to approve any amended wording suggested by the government of Canada and deemed to embody such principle.

I will not take the time to read the other resolution. It is longer, but it concludes with the same language, namely, that the assembly has authorized the lieutenant governor in council to approve the amendment suggested in the resolution regarding indirect taxation, or any amended wording suggested by the government of Canada having the same effect. The point I wish to make clear is that in addition to the earlier stand taken by Premier Douglas in support of the general plan for the new old age pension set-up, which is what I was referring to on Monday, that province has now made clear that it is prepared to co-operate fully in the wording or the redrafting of any necessary amendments which are required so as to proceed with this matter. I hope the Minister of Justice will soon receive a similarly favourable communication from his successor in the premiership of Manitoba, Mr. Campbell, and then he will have had communications from all ten provinces.

The other point I wish to make is that I hope the Minister of Justice and the government as a whole will proceed with this matter just as rapidly as they can. I realize the kind of difficulty that they are working under. They are dealing with constitutional amendments; they are dealing with ten provincial premiers and with the constitutional lawyers who sit at the elbows of these various premiers. Nevertheless the reason I am bringing it up is that in the speech from the throne on January 30 it was indicated that the new old age pension proposals had been laid before the provinces, and I quote:

> The provincial governments are at present giving consideration to these proposals and to proposals for constitutional amendments which may require to be submitted to you before the close of the present session.

On February 5 I directed a question to the Prime Minister as to what efforts would be made by the government to deal with this matter in sufficient time so as to bring before the house at this session both the necessary amendments to the constitution and legislation based on those amendments. My latter reference was to legislation implementing the plan recommended last year by the special committee. The answer of the Prime Minister, as recorded on page 72 of Hansard, was—and I think I am fair to him if I quote the second paragraph only, since it is the relevant one:

> As stated in the speech from the throne, the matter is before the provincial governments for their consideration, and it is and will be the policy of the government to avoid any possible delay when agreement has been reached to have that agreement implemented.

Those were the words of the Prime Minister. Let me point out that two or three times since then, when questions have been raised regarding early implementation of this plan, reference has been made back to that statement given by the Prime Minister on February 5. We are all agreed. We want to see action at this session. Whatever the date of the end of the session may prove to be, time is moving on; and my reason for rising at this time is to urge the government to give the best attention that they can to this matter, in the hope that their own desire, which we support very strongly, to take action at this session will be implemented before prorogation date overtakes us.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I think I can reply in two sentences to the points raised by my hon. friend. In the first place, I can say that there has been no act or omission of this government which is in any way inconsistent with the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) which my hon. friend has just quoted. In the second place, I think I should say that we in the government can only feel very much complimented that the legislature of Saskatchewan, by unanimous vote, has approved the principle of the amendment which we proposed, and has authorized the lieutenant governor in council of Saskatchewan to approve any amended wording suggested by the government of Canada and to embody such principle. That is as gracious a gesture of confidence as we have had from any source in quite a long while.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Special—

576. To authorize and provide for a payment to the Canadian wheat board which shall be dealt with by the board in all respects as though it was money received from the sale of wheat produced in the designated area, sold and delivered to the board by producers during the pool period commencing on the first day of August, 1945, and ending on the thirty-first day of July, 1950, and to authorize the board, notwithstanding the provisions of subsections 2 and 3 of section 22 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, to distribute such amount together with all other moneys received by the board from the sale of such wheat, after making the deductions provided for in the said section 22, among holders of certificates issued by the board pursuant to part III of the said act during the pool period aforesaid, by paying to the person named in such certificate the same sum for each bushel of wheat referred to therein, $65,000,000.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I should read again the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson). It is as follows:

> That item 576 of the further supplementary estimates be reduced from $65 million to $1.

Mr. Coldwell: Is the minister able to supply the house with the comprehensive statement on subsidies and subventions that was asked for?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes; I have it. In order to bring it up to what was suggested last night there will have to be two tables put on. One is a table for the first eleven months of the fiscal year 1950-51, ending February 28, 1951.

Mr. Coldwell: Put in on Hansard.

Mr. Gardiner: I will put it on Hansard.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Coldwell: Can the minister reply to the two questions asked by my colleague, the hon. member for Melfort?

Mr. Gardiner: The only reply I can make is this, that just so far as the regular rules with regard to the action of cabinet ministers made it possible to meet with and discuss these matters with the leaders of the farm movements, I did in every case, and I have known right along what the views of the leaders of the farm movements were from one step to another.

Mr. Coldwell: That is with regard to $48 million?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes; that has been discussed with them, and with regard to all matters dealing with the whole position.

Mr. Coldwell: May I take it that there is no appropriation coming down with regard to $48 million?

Mr. Gardiner: There is no appropriation in any case involved in connection with that matter. This matter is being dealt with on its merits as it is.

Mr. Gibson: It is going down to $1.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drew: When this subject was being discussed yesterday the Minister of Agriculture put forward certain arguments in regard to the payment of the $65 million, which, on careful examination of Hansard, are just as impossible to understand as they were when he made the speech in the house yesterday.

The fact is that his attempt to create the impression that the $65 million was arrived at in some orderly mathematical manner is not borne out by the statement of the Prime Minister, because the Prime Minister made it quite clear that this was not a figure arrived at in that way. On March 15, as reported at page 1283 of Hansard the Prime Minister had this to say:

> Now, why $65 million? From the start it had been clearly understood there could not be any mathematical calculation of the consequence of this "have regard to" clause.

Then later in his remarks the Prime Minister said:

> That has been the position from the start, that there could not be any mathematical calculation of something expressed in the terms used in this agreement.

The Prime Minister then went on to say that $65 million remained of the loan of $1,250 million, and the words he used were these:

> Had the government of the United Kingdom seen fit to draw that amount of $65 million and use it as a settlement of anything legitimately or properly expected under the "have regard to" clause, the government of Canada would not have felt required to do anything more, and would have been quite content to say that everything that could reasonably be expected as a consequence of the "have regard to" clause had been discharged by that payment.

I submit that those words are not open to any misunderstanding or misinterpretation. They make it perfectly clear that in the mind of the Prime Minister the only way in which the figure of $65 million was arrived at was that there was a balance of this loan still there, and that if the suggestion of the Canadian government had been accepted and the $65 million had been taken up by the British government and then paid as the balance owing under the contract, that figure would have been accepted by the Canadian government and paid over to the pool as the amount that they were able to obtain from the government of the United Kingdom.

I mentioned the statement of the Prime Minister for this reason. He has stated clearly what actually happened. When discussion of this subject was renewed last December and a few weeks later when the Minister of Agriculture went to England, it related to the figure of $65 million which was the balance outstanding, just as the $100 million which was mentioned earlier related to the fact that at that time there was $115 million still outstanding. It had been reduced to $65 million, and that was the amount still there. If the government of the United Kingdom had been prepared to take that up and go through the motions of paying it over as the balance, the Canadian government was prepared to accept it.

Having said that, I then point out that we are not simply in the position that the government of the United Kingdom has stated that it is not prepared to pay any more; we are in the position that the government that is asking that this item be approved declared by its own formal communication on May 30 of last year that it agreed that the government of the United Kingdom had fully discharged all obligations under that contract. That being so, there are no obligations remaining under the contract. I come back to the position that seems so obvious and yet apparently requires re-emphasis: that if something is to be done, then we should be told what the principle is upon which that payment is to be made. According to the statement of the government, it is not under the contract.

We now are asked to pass an item of $65 million with no explanation as to the principle which will govern this case or guide members of this house in the future when considering the application of that principle to other cases. Not only are we told by the Prime Minister that this is not a subject of mathematical calculation; we are told that it is not something that can be calculated in a mathematical manner.

The fact is that the very remarkable statement yesterday of the Minister of Agriculture, which ranged all the way from a political fight in Saskatchewan to a veiled warning to the press that if they did not modify their remarks about him somebody might be haled before the bar of the house, was interlarded with a lot of unrelated figures which in some way that met his satisfaction finally worked out to $65 million. In this case I prefer, and I think members of the house are likely to prefer, to take the statement of the Prime Minister that it is not arrived at by any mathematical process. The Prime Minister has related it to the one figure to which it can properly be related, and that is the balance of the loan that British had coming to them.

That being so, we as elected representatives of the people are being asked to approve a payment of $65 million under no declared principle and under no mathematical calculation. I simply wish to govern the remark I have made by what I said before. I am satisfied that members of this house coming from all parts of Canada are prepared to support any clearly declared and sound principle which will assure that wheat producers, and agricultural producers of any kind, industrial producers or those whose services are required, shall be properly compensated where that production or those services are taken over by compulsion. I have emphasized that at a time when this government has assumed such sweeping emergency powers it is important that some principle be established which will let the people know what they may expect where there is to be compulsion. Nevertheless we have no facts before us from which we can say whether this is too much or too little. It is for that reason that I think hon. members of this house will find it difficult to justify their course if they vote in this particular case.

I come now to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. The hon. member expressed some surprise last night about the position I had taken and seemed to anticipate that I would approve this item. If he had been in the house, or if he was here and had been listening, he would have heard me make it quite clear in the afternoon that I was not prepared to approve the payment of this item, but I said further that I would not support the amendment to reduce the item to one dollar. I gave my reason. The reduction of the item to one dollar indicates that we have before us information which makes it possible to fix a money value on this particular proposal of the government. I pointed out that we have no such information.

Mr. Gibson: We have the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, have we not?

Mr. Drew: There is no place in the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in which he places a value of one dollar on this payment. On the contrary, I think he gave us most conclusive reasons why he thought that nothing should be paid.

Mr. Gibson: That is what I mean—one dollar.

Mr. Drew: We have the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that in his opinion nothing further was owing, and also that in his opinion the British government had fully lived up to the contract. Whether he is right or whether he is wrong, that is the record of what he said. Therefore, not only is there doubt as to the basis upon which this is computed; there is the argument of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that there is in fact nothing owing under this contract.

It seems to me that an amendment to reduce this item to one dollar implies the acceptance of some unstated principle, and a reduction of the amount given under that principle to what might be regarded as a contemptuous estimate of the value of what is owing under that principle. I am not prepared to support such a proposition, but I am going to vote against this item for the reasons I have given. I suggest to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that this is the proper course. In his case he apparently accepts the principle and then moves to reduce the item to one dollar. I suggest that it is much better to vote straight against the adoption of this item, and that is what I propose to do.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Last night I think the curiosity of the house was aroused by the rather astounding speech of the Minister of Agriculture. I think he sought to leave the impression that, while western farmers were not provided for, eastern Canada farmers had been provided for through subsidies during the war years. He mentioned one item of $169 million for subsidies to the dairy industry. At the outset let me point out that the dairy industry and all other industries at that time were under a ceiling and not a floor, and that the subsidies were given after representations by the dairy industry pointing out that, to maintain production for our own people and also to have a highly concentrated nutritious food for our fighting partners in Europe, it was very necessary to pay enough to maintain the high production that the dairy industry established during those years. It bears no relation whatever to the $65 million that we are now discussing.

Actually it seems to me that the payment of the $65 million is an attempt to bail the Minister of Agriculture out of a very embarrassing situation. I should like to mention two agricultural commodities that were dealt with by the minister last night, although there were many others. I have referred to the dairy industry and I want to mention cheese particularly. I know at once that the minister will say that in 1950 the producers asked that cheese be requisitioned. That is true but they did not ask that it be requisitioned at the price that the government set. The government requisitioned it at a lower figure than was suggested by the cheese producers.

As a result of these policies the cheese industry of Ontario is a vanishing one. It was the industry that absorbed a lot of the surplus milk during the summer months. Now we are paying a part of the price of that folly in the ever-increasing price of butter. Incidentally you will note that the price of margarine, the substitute for butter, the cost of which has no relation whatever to the production of butter, has followed the rise in the price of butter. We are paying the price for a policy that was shortsighted so far as the dairy industry was concerned.

It is also interesting to note that in his speech the Minister of Agriculture mentioned three people, the triumvirate, who were going to guide the destinies of this country. I suggest that the Prime Minister has many duties on his hands without trying to steer a course between the divergent views of two ministers, his right and left bowers. I thought it was a rather peculiar statement to make that either of them could make a mistake but the Prime Minister could correct them and get away with it. When eastern members of parliament have talked against the $65 million western producers have said: What about the freight assistance policy? I will tell you about the freight assistance policy. Today the government through the wheat board has the greatest monopoly in the grain trade that ever existed. Whether a monopoly is a government monopoly or otherwise it is a vicious set-up, but above all a government monopoly is certainly the most vicious.

We have reached the point now where a farmer living in western Canada cannot ship grain that he produces to a farm that he owns in eastern Canada. What do we find? The western producer is getting very little for his feed wheat and coarse grains, and the eastern feeder is paying very high prices for these same products. Somewhere along the way the advantage of the freight assistance policy is being siphoned off. It is not being carried through either to the producer on the one hand or the ultimate consumer on the other.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Don't be in a hurry. There was no hurry to bring down these estimates, and that is one of the reasons you are in the fix you are in now. In an attempt to correlate the divergent views of his two ministers, the Prime Minister said that the $65 million was based on expectations. That is a rather peculiar statement also because other producers in Canada have expectations. However, the Prime Minister said, answering the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth, that they would not be considered. To give you an indication of how far to the left the government has gone, the actual formula for the paying of the $65 million is a Russian communist formula. I will give it to you. It is: From each according to his ability and to each according to his needs. That is exactly what they are trying to work out.

The hon. member for Brant-Wentworth referred yesterday to the eastern winter wheat producers. He went into a lot of detail and I think he presented the problem very fairly. I have in my hand a report of a meeting at Chatham, Ontario, last summer at a time when the problem of marketing Ontario's winter wheat was most serious. I am going to quote from the Chatham Daily News of July 21, 1950. The heading of the article is: "Growers—Elevator Men Ask Floor on Wheat Price", and the subheading is: "150 vote in favour of distress action". In a motion that was never put to a vote Ernest Campbell suggested that a minimum of $1.90 be established as a floor price for winter wheat. In putting forward that motion he said:

> Wheat is worth $1.90 as feed for animals, and it isn't unreasonable to think that it is worth 5 per cent more as feed for human beings.

The motion was seconded by G. Harry Wilson, who said:

> If I sell my wheat at $1.50 will the consumer get the benefit of a cheaper price for flour and bread?

Everyone knows there was no reduction in the price of bread because of the fact that wheat was selling at $1.50 instead of $1.90 and $2. Since that time the price has risen and is fluctuating between $1.95 and $2.05, or even more; I am told I am putting a low price on it. At that time it was suggested that a floor price be established. The right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was interviewed; a lot of promises were made to the growers—

Mr. Howe: Just a moment. What did the minister tell that delegation?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Let me read from this article, under the heading "Ottawa Trip":

> The growers spent much of their time reviewing developments. They heard detailed reports on the meeting ten days ago when elevator men and growers decided that something would have to be done if wheat was to sell for more than $1.50.
> A trip to Ottawa followed and ultimately Hon. C. D. Howe announced that elevator space would be available for farmers to store their wheat until the price improved. Later he admitted that he had hinted that the Canada wheat board might again enter the picture to take care of any surplus.

It was suggested at that time that storage space would be provided, and I believe the minister made arrangements under which storage space was made available at Sarnia, Ontario. But the cruel part of it was the cost of about 18 cents per bushel. By the time the farmers got their wheat to Sarnia for storage they figured they might have to wait a long time to even get their storage costs out of it, so most of them took a loss. This article goes on:

> Strongest and most vocal of the delegations from outside Kent was the one from Essex. Ed. Nicholson, Essex, told the meeting he had tried to find storage for 5,000 bushels and had been turned down by Walkers in Windsor, operators of one of the large elevators.

So he had to sell and take a loss. I realize now, of course, that wheat was not covered by the prices support act, but the government can find a way around other difficulties when they wish, and a way could have been found here. Where there is a will there is a way, but the government had not the will to do anything about it. As a result the wheat growers suffered. The younger men just starting in the business, many of them returned soldiers, were the chief victims. The more established farmers, with greater storage space on their farms, and who were in a financial position to hold their wheat, gained the advantage. The only thing needed was for the government to say they would use some of this $200 million under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, and the western Ontario winter wheat growers would not have had to take such a loss.

Mr. Howe: I might say that the delegation came to me and explained the situation, saying the price as of that date was $1.50 per bushel. I advised them not to take it, but to put their grain in public storage. I understand that the great bulk of them did so. Within the next day or so the price advanced to $1.65 per bushel, and today those who followed my advice are getting from $2.15 to $2.25 a bushel. It seems to me that if they had come to the government for advice instead of going to the hon. member, who obviously could not help them, they would have gotten along very well.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The advice given by the minister and by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture was as the minister has stated; nevertheless those who could least afford it were the victims of circumstances. If the government had thought they were not going to lose any money they would have applied the price support legislation; but they thought this situation was serious and did not want to get into it, so they said winter wheat was not covered by the act. That was a way out. If they had thought it was going to turn out well, that wheat would go to $2.15, they would have made good fellows of themselves and brought in the price support act.

I want to ask one other question. Many figures were included in the statement by the minister last evening, but I have not been able to find where he said what was the actual loss to the western growers. What did they actually lose on this deal?

Mr. Gardiner: As the leader of the opposition said a few moments ago, everyone who has spoken on this question, including myself, has said that no attempt would be made at an arithmetical calculation of any loss. That has been said by everyone who has discussed the matter. As a matter of fact the very phrase "have regard to" makes it impossible to have a mathematical calculation; but in order to satisfy the British and our own people that we were somewhat near the mark we made the calculation I put on the record last evening. That was submitted to the British as a near approach to the $100 million we had asked of them. The leader of the opposition is perfectly right when he says we submitted that figure to the British, but he does not go on to agree that $35 million taken from $100 million leaves $65 million. When they made some provision for the $35 million there was $65 million left. He does not agree, either, with what I said last evening, which nevertheless is a statement of fact, that on each occasion this question was discussed with my colleagues I suggested that an amount should be left in the loan similar to the amount we had asked the British to pay, and that amount was not there by accident.

Mr. Nowlan: I had not intended to intervene in this debate, had it not been for one or two references made last evening.

I am sure the committee was thrilled by the amazing show put on by the right hon. Minister of Agriculture. It was a histrionic display which would rank with any dramatic production that might be seen throughout the country. He told us, I believe, that he had thirty-three years in politics, and had been successful in winning all his elections. That must have been fairly obvious, because certainly anyone would need thirty-three years of training to put on such a display as he gave last night. He was a circus all by himself. If by any chance this public in which he places such great trust ever decided to dispense with his services I am sure he would have no trouble in finding employment as a whole three-act circus either as barker, medicine man or manager.

An hon. Member: Are you talking about wheat?

Mr. Nowlan: I am not talking about wheat at the moment, I am talking about the right hon. gentleman who dealt with wheat or alleged to deal with wheat last night, and the marvellous way in which he skated over thin ice. It would have brought envy to Barbara Ann Scott if she had been here to watch the performance. It is certainly a performance which we shall all recall when we remember the demonstration of a week ago, and the suggestions made of consultation as to whether action should be brought against Great Britain in an international court. Apparently the decision was that there was not enough evidence to warrant a conviction. The inference I gathered from reading that statement in Hansard was that it was something like a police magistrate dealing with someone charged with vagrancy, shrugging his shoulders and saying there was no evidence and so there was a nolle prosequi.

Having heard the debate of a week or ten days ago, you can imagine the surprise of some of us when the hon. gentleman put on the cloak—a little bit too long for him—of Sir John A. Macdonald and quoted his statement, "A British subject I was born, a British subject I will die", or as he said, "I am about to die"—even there, there was a misplaced period or comma. The minister mentioned another matter to which I should like to refer briefly, and that was apples. I am not questioning the figures which he used. I have not any doubt but that they were in accordance with his records, although there have been various figures produced in connection with that matter. As I followed him I thought he was suggesting that there have been payments made to apple growers and some other producers, so the government is asking us to make a payment to the wheat grower on the same basis. It is that idea to which I wish to register a very brief but rather emphatic objection.

Mr. Gardiner: Not on the same basis.

Mr. Nowlan: It certainly was not on the same basis. I am glad the minister says that. It is true that the apple growers in Nova Scotia did receive substantial amounts of money from this government during the war years. Those were payments which the growers appreciated, but those payments were made on a very definite basis, Mr. Chairman. In the first place, it was recognized that the apple industry of Nova Scotia was a war casualty since it was dependent upon markets in Great Britain. The industry was deprived of those markets because of the exigencies of the war. The government intervened to assist the growers. As the minister suggested last night part of the consideration for this assistance, at least for some time, was that we were not allowed to ship apples to the markets of Ontario and Quebec. If we had, Mr. Chairman, the quality of those apples being what it is, undoubtedly we would have wrecked the apple industry of Ontario and Quebec. The demands for assistance which you have heard from the growers in these provinces would have been much more expensive than the cost of the assistance to the fruit industry in Nova Scotia.

The point I want to make is that the fruit industry in Nova Scotia was helped on a mathematical basis. There was no subsidy, but there was a computation of the loss on an accurate basis. I believe the minister will admit that every year representatives of that industry came to Ottawa. They met him and officers of his department as well as officers of the Department of Finance. They presented figures showing the losses they suffered, and in every case they were beaten down. I am not objecting to it, I am simply stating this as a matter of record. The departmental representatives said, "No, you may have taken that loss but the Dominion of Canada cannot assume all of it." They were finally paid on a basis which was a mathematical computation of a proportion of the losses which the fruit industry had suffered, and that is the direct opposite of the policy which is being adopted in this case. This payment is being made on a basis which none of us can compute. Apparently the hon. member for Comox-Alberni arrived at this solution by gazing in a crystal ball and picking out a dollar. We had the Minister of Agriculture suggesting $48 million. Some members suggested $300 million, and some newspapers represented it as $600 million and going up to almost a billion. You are simply told to put your finger in a glass bowl and pay whatever amount you pull out. It is that principle we protest because it is the reversal of the principle adopted for Nova Scotia.

With respect to the payments made in Nova Scotia I want to point out that a substantial portion of those payments did not go to the growers. They were made for processing apple products which were afterwards distributed by private agencies or by the government, in accordance with government policy, to institutions and to relieve distress throughout the world. I believe that represented a substantial part of the millions to which the minister referred last night.

Those figures also contain moneys being paid for the removal of trees which formerly produced varieties suitable to the British market. Since this market is not now open to us, those trees are being removed or have been removed at a distinct sacrifice to the growers. The amount which the grower has received from this government, helpful though it may have been and appreciated as it is, is only a small part of the actually computed loss which the grower has suffered. I suggest, therefore, there is no validity whatever in using the figures paid to the fruit grower as an illustration of justification of these moneys which are to be paid to the grain producers of western Canada.

I have been confused about this matter, as I am sure other hon. members have been. We would all like to arrive at some basis upon which we could do the right thing, if such a basis can be established. No evidence has been forthcoming as to that.

I am not going to repeat the arguments which have been advanced by my leader and other speakers in this debate. I refer particularly to the statements made by the member for Royal when he reviewed the situation from the standpoint of the maritime farmer. For the reasons which he enumerated I am opposed to this payment at the moment, Mr. Chairman, and I propose to vote against it.

There are other reasons with which I shall deal briefly. We are today in a period of stress and strain for this government. The question of inflation has been before the house on various occasions during this session. What could contribute more to inflation than the payment of millions and millions of dollars at this time without any mathematical basis for it?

The Minister of Finance has been worried about cutting expenditures. He has been worried about extravagance. Undoubtedly he has exercised his influence in attempting to cut expenditures in the various government departments. What are the mail carriers in Vancouver, Regina, Ottawa or Halifax going to say when they walk their route with heavier loads realizing the little saving achieved through their sacrifice, and seeing this $65 million being paid without any basis which is discernible to themselves or anyone else in this country? What will other people say who are called upon to make similar sacrifices when they are confronted with this expenditure which has not been justified in any way?

Mr. Chairman, I hope the member for Comox-Alberni, and our genial friend the member for Temiscouata, who yesterday afternoon tried to quarterback the opposition by suggesting he was prepared to vote for a dollar, will influence the others to join with those of us from this side in expressing our opposition to what we believe is an unjustifiable decision of the government in the light of the information which has been placed before us.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I have sat through about the most ridiculous drivel that I have ever heard talked on this subject during the wheat debate, and more particularly during the last two days. I kept out of this debate until now because the two members of the Social Credit group who were charged with the responsibility of dealing with agricultural matters had done a right good job for us, and put our position quite straightforwardly and clearly. But there have been so many foolish and stupid things said in the last two days, started by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), of all people, that I felt I had to say something at this stage, to put myself on the record.

I sat and listened on what I thought was one of the few occasions upon which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni could have asserted what he calls his independence. You see, he does not have a single farmer, perhaps, in his whole constituency; and so he selects this occasion to demonstrate to the world that he is independent. He is independent, at the expense of 250,000 wheat farmers from whom he wants to take a measly, paltry $65 million that is being offered today as a token payment on account—not even as a final settlement. But he is going to take that away. I would like to hear him talk some time when the question of assisting lumbermen is under consideration.

Mr. Gibson: We never asked for it.

Mr. Low: But you got it. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni got it during the war, and immediately after the war years; and he is getting it today through the most inflated prices I have known. All one has to do is go down to a lumberyard and try to buy a few sticks of the poorest lumber Canadians have ever been able to buy at any time—because the rest of it they are sending out of the country to other markets. He will not let us have anything, but he is full of suggestions. No one, at any time, has stepped in and said to the lumber people of this country, "Although there have been certain boards"—lumber boards, perhaps—"set up to sell your lumber for you, and although you have had this kind of service from the government, we are going to take it out of their hands and superimpose another government policy upon you. Whatever your losses have been as a result of superimposing that government policy upon you, you must not complain".

Nothing like that has ever happened to the lumbermen. But I will tell him that it has been done with regard to the farmers; and I thought that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni would be the first man to see it, because usually he is fair and just. In this case, however, I am satisfied that he is playing to the people in his constituency who are not farmers.

Mr. Gibson: No.

Mr. Low: He is going to be the white-haired boy, so far as those people are concerned. We have to be statesmanlike about this matter, it seems to me, and try to balance our interests for the good of all Canada. That is one of the things I want to say a word about now.

Then, by the way, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni sort of felt sorry for us down here in this end of the chamber, because he suggested we did not know what we were doing. He said we thought that $65 million was only a matter of a few moments' run of a printing press. Let me impress upon the hon. member for Comox-Alberni the fact that we most emphatically do understand what $65 million is, just as well as he does—and perhaps a little better than he does. I do not look upon $65 million as peanuts, at all; it is a lot of money. Let me also remind him that $375 million is also a lot of money. But he is quite prepared to let the farmers of Canada carry that $375 million, calculated by some of the best brains in the country as being the loss to the farmers in the first two years of the contract.

Mr. Gibson: Not by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe).

Mr. Low: I understand the Minister of Trade and Commerce is in a certain position where he cannot accept that statement; and I shall show why in a minute.

But the situation is just exactly as I have stated it. Here is the statement, based upon the report of the Canadian wheat board, as set out in a sessional paper tabled in the house. It shows that in the first two years of the contract there was a net loss to the farmers of $375,618,000. And that means simply this, that although the wheat board of Canada was set up for the purpose of marketing the farmers' wheat, they were not allowed to market that wheat and to get what they could get for it on the world market. The government of Canada in its wisdom, or lack of wisdom, whichever way one looks at it, did superimpose upon the board a certain policy. The government interfered. It sold the wheat itself, and took affairs out of the hands of the wheat board, with the net result that in the first two years of the contract the farmers did lose $375 million.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni, along with the leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Drew), cries about how much per capita that will mean in taxation—that $65 million. The leader of the Progressive Conservative party said last night in a radio speech that it would amount to $25 per taxpayer. Certainly; but how much would it mean per taxpayer if the farmers were paid what they should be paid—the $375 million? That is the question.

Here, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, along with all other hon. members in the house who have seemed to be opposed to the $65 million, has never attempted to justify his position with respect to the subsidization by Canadian farmers of all the people of Canada, in the form of cheap bread.

Mr. Gibson: You get cheap lumber and cheap fish. What more do you want?

Mr. Low: Cheap lumber, my eye!

Mr. Gibson: Sure you do.

Mr. Low: You will have to talk a lot louder than that to convince the Canadian people that they are getting cheap lumber.

Mr. Gibson: Yes.

Mr. Low: Or cheap fish. That policy of subsidizing the Canadian people so that they could have cheap bread alone cost the western farmers $136 million. That is on the basis of figures which have been supplied by the Canadian wheat board and tabled in the house.

I should like to see some of these people get up in the House of Commons and try to justify their position. Let them get up and argue that 25 per cent of the population of Canada ought to bear the full cost of subsidizing all the people of Canada for cheap bread. Let them get up on their hind legs and do that. And when you do, then you will be entitled to move that this $65 million be cut down to $1. But until you do, and can supply the figures to back up your contention, then I will say you are playing politics with one of the most important items in the supplementary estimates, or that will come down in the budget this year.

I am going to say there has been altogether too much politics played in connection with wheat—altogether too much, and on both sides of the house. It looks to me as though it were high time that that be stopped, and that we began to look at these things sensibly and reasonably.

I am not going to spend too much time on this matter, but I should like to say just this, Mr. Chairman, that a lot of talk has gone on as to why the government selected the sum of $65 million. I have heard a whole lot of foolishness talked about expectations. Well, now, let us see what the facts are: The government selected $65 million because it realized it had some obligation to the Canadian farmer. It was not on compassionate grounds at all. It was not on a subsidy basis at all. The government realized that its policy had cost the western wheat farmers a lot of money, and that those farmers therefore were entitled to some sort of payment. That is the only reasonable answer to the situation, right there.

The government selected $65 million, I suggest, because that happened to be the amount still left to the credit of the British government in the loan granted to them some years ago. They figured that if they selected that sum and arranged to pay it, as the Minister of Finance is now offering to pay—he said a minute ago, and I am quite sure he will not mind my repeating it, that this is the hardest $65 million he ever tried to give away. He has offered to pay that much, and while it may be looked upon by the government as a final payment on the five-year pool, and while it may be looked upon by the eastern members of this house as a subsidy, let me just say to you, Mr. Chairman, that we western members cannot look upon it as either one. We look upon it as a partial settlement of an obligation, which the government recognizes; otherwise they would not have even made the suggestion of $65 million. That is all there is to it; and it is the only way that you can look at it. It seems to me that we ought to pass the item and cut out all the foolish talk that has gone on here.

There is just one thing more, Mr. Chairman. Yesterday afternoon I heard some hon. members facing me complain about the high price of feed, the price they have to pay for western feed. I know that it must be high in spite of the fact that millions of dollars in subsidies have been paid for carrying that feed down here. But when they complain about that feed I wish they would come out to the west and just sample some of the prices that we have to pay for the automobiles that are made down here in the east, and for the shoes that are made down here in Quebec and Ontario, and for the clothing that is made down here, and for the maple syrup that is produced down here and shipped out. Let them come out and buy some of them, and then let us hear the complaints that they make. It looks as though there is too much sectionalism in the discussion of any of these important items. It is about time we began to look at this as statesmen, as Canadians, realizing that you cannot possibly have a prosperous Canada unless the 250,000 wheat farmers are prosperous and on their feet, realizing that you cannot have a prosperous Canada unless your maple syrup producers down here are prosperous and on their feet, and all the rest of them. I could go on and name them. Let us cut out this foolishness, get this item through and then talk some sense.

Mr. MacKenzie: I had no great thought of taking part in this debate until the last few minutes. I would not go so far as to say that hon. members who did not agree with me were talking a lot of nonsense and did not know what they were talking about. I should like to give a man at least credit for his own views, and appreciate that probably he might be as near right as I am myself. I think it is a mistake, and I am sorry that anything has entered into this debate that indicates any hostility toward, or comparison between, subsidies or grants drawn from the east to the west.

I am now talking about agricultural subsidies, and particularly with reference to wheat. I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken that after all agriculture is the basic industry of Canada. That being so, I still think that we must have a prosperous agriculture before we can have a prosperous dominion. I should like to see the western wheat growers and the eastern wheat growers have all the prosperity that they can get.

I want to make a reference to the question that has been raised by the hon. member for Middlesex East. He has mentioned it several times, and again this afternoon he referred to a meeting that he attended in Chatham last year. I attended that meeting myself, and I was one of the delegation that came down here to Ottawa to interview the officials of the Department of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce to see if something could be done to help the situation, because we had a lot of wheat on our hands and no storage, and no place to put it. At that time the hon. member for Middlesex East said, and he said it again this afternoon, that there should be some provision made for that under the Agricultural Prices Support Act. I agreed with him. I remember quite distinctly when the prices support act was brought into effect. It was on August 15, 1944, and it made provision for supporting agricultural produce, and the amount was not to exceed $200 million. I was here when that act was brought into effect and became operative. I quite appreciated that it did not take wheat into consideration. Section 2 of the act reads:

(a) "Agricultural product" means any natural product of agriculture (except wheat) designated by the governor in council and includes processed meat, dairy and poultry products, if so designated.

Therefore, under the Agricultural Prices Support Act we have no authority to put a floor price under wheat. I would say to the hon. member that when the Agricultural Prices Support Act comes up for amendment we should try to have it enlarged or made broad enough to embrace Ontario wheat, because it is true that we do not operate under the wheat board. We did at one time, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture well know, and it did not operate very successfully in the east.

When we came to Ottawa and went to the Department of Agriculture—I think the minister was in the west, but his deputy was here—we were told that under the act they had no power to give us any support out of this $200 million. We went to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and he said: "You are not under the wheat board, and we have no authority to purchase your wheat." The only thing that could be done, and it worked out fairly satisfactorily, was to provide storage for the wheat, which they did, and the wheat is now selling at reasonably good prices.

I do want to put something on record that I think should be there. Last night the Minister of Agriculture said that he was carrying around in his pocket the answer to something that was going to be put on the record regarding eastern subsidies, and he had it nearly worn out. I am glad that he had the opportunity to give it. I do not believe that we should go into all the details of it, but I would say this. I received this information from the Department of Finance. It may not be exactly correct, but if it is not correct it is their fault, because they gave it to me. I do want to put on record some of the subsidies that have been paid to the wheat producers and to the wheat farmers of western Canada.

[Mr. MacKenzie.]

Take the wheat acreage reduction plan. That was a subsidy from 1941 to 1947. It was a policy which induced the people to go out of wheat growing and into the growing of coarse grains and summer fallow. I remember quite well when it was brought up and discussed in the house. It was discussed for some time. From 1941 to 1947 the amount expended on this plan was $86,389,000.

Mr. Sinnott: Why beat a dead horse?

Mr. MacKenzie: Then there was prairie farm assistance. That is something that has been before this house and debated at great length. From 1939 to 1950 inclusive approximately $125,806,000 has been paid out. I am not giving the odd hundreds because in these figures they do not count very much.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the hon. member answer a question? Is that over and above—

Mr. MacKenzie: Just a minute! Let me finish my remarks. I know what the hon. member is going to ask.

Mr. Coldwell: Is that over and above the amount contributed by the farmers themselves?

Mr. MacKenzie: Pardon me. That is the total amount. But the Department of Agriculture through the various offices told me that the western grower had made a contribution to that, the people who delivered their grain and their wheat. They said to me, if you took one-quarter you would hit it about right. I took one-third to be sure I was right so one-third of that is the contribution of the western farmers who delivered the wheat at various places from year to year. The amount they contributed would be $41,935,000. When you take that amount from the total the amount paid by the government would be $83,871,000. I think that is correct. The prairie farm rehabilitation vote for 1950-51 was $35,257,000. I am not taking in the various subsidies that were paid under that vote, but there was the St. Mary river and major irrigation work amounting to $13,809,000. The major portion under the prairie farm rehabilitation vote was $49,495,000.

I come now to the losses on wheat board operations. In 1935 the losses on the wheat board amounted to $11,858,000. In 1936 there was a smaller amount. In 1938, the amount was $61,525,000. I remember being in the house when this question was brought up. The price of wheat was pegged at 87½ cents. I want hon. members to understand that we in Ontario have some problems to face and in that year, according to the bureau of statistics, we sold our wheat for 55 cents per bushel average. That was one reason why I felt that we should try operations under the Canadian wheat board, which we did. However, it was not successful as they had no storage for our wheat and all they could do was sell it as it was threshed. In 1939 the losses amounted to $8,413,000, giving total losses on wheat board operations of $81,846,000.

That amount can be considered as assistance to grain growers in western Canada since 1939, and in all it makes a total of $301,602,000 paid to western grain growers since 1939.

Mr. Gardiner: Is the hon. member including that last amount of $61,000,000 and the other amounts in 1935 and 1936?

Mr. MacKenzie: For the wheat board operations?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. The hon. member mentioned a loss in 1935, a loss in another year and then $61,000,000 in 1939.

Mr. MacKenzie: In 1938. I have record of no losses since 1939 under wheat board operations.

Mr. Gardiner: For the 1938 crop it was $61,000,000. The figures that were put out yesterday were from the time the war started.

Mr. MacKenzie: I quite appreciate that. I do not think we should go into all these questions that have been asked about the subsidies that have been paid to the east. I am not going to enumerate them.

Mr. Gardiner: May I make just one correction. The figures which I gave yesterday were not figures applying to the east or the west. For example, the figures on dairying applied right across the country, and also the figures on livestock. Those figures are now being used as applying only to the wheat farmers.

Mr. MacKenzie: I have obtained from the Department of Finance details of the subsidies paid during the period 1939 to 1950. For cheese and cheese factories, $15,943,000. Subsidies to apple growers have been discussed. The assistance on freight for western feed is something that has been given a lot of publicity. From 1941 to January 1, 1951, a total of $159,336,000 was paid out. Premiums on hogs, $50,957,000, but that would apply to all Canada.

I felt that these figures should be placed on the record so that we may know what subsidies have been paid to grain growers in western Canada and how they apply in regard to the $65 million that is being asked for now.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this item of $65 million on the present basis that has been laid before us and I intend to vote against it. I should like to put on the record some of the reasons why I am opposed to it and to ask other hon. members if in the light of the information that has been given and of their own statements they too will not agree that this item should not be allowed to pass.

First, I want to say that I agree entirely with what was said by the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings with regard to the payment to apple growers being on an entirely different basis from what is being asked here today. I am referring now particularly to the apple growers of British Columbia. They lost their United Kingdom market owing to the shortage of dollars. However, in this case the Minister of Trade and Commerce has assured us that under the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement the wheat growers of Canada secured a larger share of the British market than they had ever had before.

We have asked for justification of this item; we have asked to be told the basis on which the $65 million has been arrived at; but we have not yet been given that information. We have had a large number of completely conflicting statements, not only from ministers of the government who are particularly concerned but from private members on both sides of the house. These statements have been so conflicting as to make it clear that no member, even with the best will in the world and the greatest desire to understand the basis upon which this payment is being asked, could possibly justify support for the payment of $65 million.

At a rough count we have had no fewer than twenty-one different conflicting statements, and I am including the statement made by the hon. member for Peace River just a few minutes ago. The hon. member for Souris, an experienced wheat farmer, estimates the loss at close to $500 million. The Minister of Agriculture stated yesterday he had recommended the holding back on the British loan of $100 million to cover the losses for the first two years of the contract. Yesterday the minister gave five different figures which might be regarded as the total of the losses under the contract. He started with the $100 million, to which I have referred. He then referred to a possible loss of $350 million on one basis of calculation. Another figure was $166 million on another basis, and $118 million on still another basis. Finally we had a figure of $92 million on his fifth proposed basis.

The hon. member for Melfort suggested that the loss was $431 million. The hon. member for Battle River suggested it was $568 million. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe suggested that by various computations it might run even as high as $1,000 million. The hon. member for Calgary East suggested that it was $338 million in the first two years. The hon. member for Acadia suggested that it was $375 million in the first two years. On an earlier occasion the Minister of Agriculture suggested $166 million.

The hon. member for Assiniboia said it was $555 million. The hon. member for Bow River said it was $568 million. The Minister of Trade and Commerce with most welcome candour said that he did not know just from what point of view the losses could be reckoned. On another occasion the Minister of Agriculture said that he was not sure, and his five different totals would indicate that that is so. He said yesterday, as recorded at page 1475 of Hansard:

> It may surprise my hon. friends when they go home at Easter to find out that what I stated here very early in the debate is true, namely, that I have not yet met a single farmer who was asking for 25 cents a bushel—

He went on to say:

> —and that I was much nearer right than some of the others are.

The minister does not on this occasion suggest that he is actually right. Then the hon. member for Comox-Alberni suggests that the loss is $1. The hon. member for Leeds shares the same view. He suggests we give $1. The hon. member for Temiscouata suggests that the loss is $1, and said he would be prepared to support an amendment to that effect.

An hon. Member: Where is he?

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member for Meadow Lake, on the Liberal side of the house, said that at $65 million the farmers would probably be glad but he asked that it be based on 10 cents a bushel which would be $78 million. The hon. member for Macleod said that if the farmers were paid $265 million no one would know the difference. Then the hon. member for Peace River referred this afternoon to the payment of $65 million as a measly, paltry payment of $65 million, only a payment on account.

Finally, to cap the statements, we have the Prime Minister who said that from the start it had been clearly understood that there could not be any mathematical calculation of the consequences of the "have regard to" clause, and $65 million was only a rough approximation of the measure of loss or of expectations, as he put it, of the growers. In addition to the twenty or more conflicting figures which have been given, we have had four different general statements from the ministry as to the basis upon which this money is being requested. Not even the cabinet is agreed on the basis on which this payment should be made. Yet they ask us to approve a huge item of $65 million at a time like this when they themselves can get no closer to agreement on the very basis on which they are asking it.

We start with the Minister of Agriculture who said at first that it was to compensate the farmers because the British had not lived up to their obligations under the agreement. We go from there to the Minister of Trade and Commerce who said that he did not know on what basis the losses could be reckoned, and that in fact the farmers had never been more prosperous than they had under the contract, which had worked to their great advantage. We go from there to the Prime Minister who says that the basis of payment agreed upon by the government is the expectations of certain producer groups. Then we come back to the fourth basis put forward by the Minister of Agriculture yesterday which conflicts even with his earlier statement that it was because of the default of the British.

Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture said that he could produce figures to show that the payment should be made because of the difference between what the farmers had received and what they would have received if they had obtained world prices for their produce. Of course, Mr. Chairman, it is not surprising that the Minister of Agriculture should make one statement of policy on one occasion and another statement of policy on another occasion. He does not hesitate to differ from his colleagues in the cabinet. Now he has carried it one further logical stage. He does not hesitate to differ from the statement which he made just a week ago in explanation of this request.

I say we need not be surprised at finding this lack of consistent principle, this lack of cabinet solidarity, because the Minister of Agriculture yesterday set forth as his policy that he felt there was no need for consistent statements to be made on different subjects by different ministers, not even the necessity for consistent statements with regard to government policy. At page 1448 of Hansard the Minister of Agriculture stated that that situation should give rise to no wonder, particularly in dealing with the present government, because he said:

> One of the reasons why we are satisfied to be where we are—

He was referring to himself and the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

> —is that we both know that we can afford to make statements knowing that we might be incorrect...

I wonder if the Minister of Trade and Commerce agrees that he can afford to make statements knowing that he might be incorrect. Nevertheless the Minister of Agriculture, apparently having set that forth as a principle, resents the fact that sometimes it is suggested that his statements are incorrect. I do not know why he should resent that. After all, he says: We know we can afford to make statements even if we know we are incorrect "because we have a leader who does not make many mistakes."

I point out therefore that it is no wonder that we have these conflicting statements before the house as to what is the actual basis of payment. It is no wonder that the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have constantly contradicted each other from the start of this debate. It is no wonder that the Prime Minister had to attempt to reconcile their statements, and the only reconciliation he could effect was to say: Neither of them is correct and the reason we are making the payment is because of the expectations of certain producer groups.

Therefore we have the position that the House of Commons is being asked to vote $65 million without any logical, consistent or coherent explanation of why the taxpayers should be asked to provide that sum of money. We are in a position where we have no basis for this item except the expectations referred to by the Prime Minister. There is a most peculiar thing about these expectations. The Prime Minister indicated that a very large factor contributing to the arousing of these expectations was the statement made by the British food minister. So we are being asked to subscribe to the government policy of payment of $65 million because of a statement of a British minister. I might ask the Prime Minister, I might ask the government, I might ask the Minister of Finance: Since when has the financial or fiscal policy of this government depended upon statements made by British ministers? Since when has the Liberal party reverted to the policy of government from Downing street? The ministers apparently are not prepared to answer, I take it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: I take it that no definite date can be set for the commencement of this policy and that it has been going on for some time. Certainly it is the only basis upon which we can raise this payment of $65 million if we are to take the statement the Prime Minister made in the course of the debate that the expectations were aroused by the statement of the British food minister, and it is on the basis of the expectations of the producer groups that this money is to be paid. I should like to hear the Minister of Finance tell us some time how he justifies asking the taxpayers to put up this money when the minister, as other members have pointed out, has with probably considerable difficulty achieved a reduction in the estimates this year for normal expenditure of some $35 million according to the difference between this year's estimates and last. He sees a reduction of $35 million on ordinary account, and I wonder how he justifies the payment of $65 million on the basis of expectations aroused by the statement of a minister of another government.

In the last statement by a minister as to the basis for this payment the Minister of Agriculture came back to the difference he alleges between what the farmers received and what they would have received at world prices. If that is the basis, whose fault is it that the farmers lost money under the contract? Surely the fault lies with the government whose marketing policy this was. If there be a loss, the basis of which we have not yet been told, that loss is the fault of the government which insisted upon this marketing policy that was attacked in the house by the leader of this party in 1946. The Minister of Agriculture was responsible; yesterday he claimed credit for the marketing policy that has produced this result. If that is the case I can see no other reason for the payment of this money to make up a loss incurred by the farmers under that policy than to retrieve the reputation of the minister, whose lack of qualifications as a dealer in grain has been exposed by the way this contract has worked out.

In 1946 our leader was opposed to this contract. I am therefore opposed to the voting of this money, when we can draw no other conclusion than that the purpose is to redeem the reputation of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Gibson: I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member for Peace River speak as he did today, with some little heat. That is most unusual for him, because ordinarily he is very good-natured in his remarks. I ask him to accept my word that I did not move my amendment merely because of its political significance, nor because of the fact that there are no farmers in my riding. That statement is hardly accurate. I wish he would come out and see me sometime; I would show him some beautiful dairy country in my constituency. Political kudos means very little to me. I certainly have no aspiration to lead a political party in Canada, but I rather gather that very large sections of the Canadian people feel the same way about this payment as I do.

I was amazed at the rapid change of heart of the Conservative party. When I moved a comparable motion on the second reading of a bill, having practically the same effect, not a single member of the opposition supported me. I am glad this amendment to reduce the amount of the vote to $1 has had some effect on their thinking, and so it has served a useful purpose. I rather gathered from the speech of the leader of the opposition that he had no intention of supporting my motion.

Mr. Drew: You are bright if you gathered that. I was definite enough.

Mr. Gibson: It is very seldom the hon. member speaks so clearly that I can understand the point he is trying to make. On this occasion I was able to follow him, which I think speaks well for the speech he made. I feel now that my purpose would be very well served if I support the hon. gentleman. I am going to be a little more generous than he has been; perhaps I do not need the political kudos of having a motion of mine voted upon as much as he does. That being so, if I have unanimous consent I shall be glad to withdraw my motion, and when the appropriate time comes I intend to support the motion of the leader of the opposition.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: The amendment is withdrawn. Shall item 576 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Item agreed to: yeas, 83; nays, 21.

Health of animals—

573. Compensation for animals slaughtered, including compensation for eggs destroyed from infected premises in accordance with regulations of the governor in council—further amount required, $450,000.

Mr. Blackmore: Before this item carries I think a word or two should be said in reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Lambton-Kent a few moments ago. I refrained from saying anything at the time because of my desire to get the item through. In all the unhappiness felt by a number of members from British Columbia and the east over the amount of assistance given the farmers of the west, they should bear in mind that most of those farmers are located in what is called the Palliser triangle. Many years ago the Palliser triangle was completely condemned as a possible agricultural area. Now, because of the courage of men who have gone in and settled there, we have taken out of that area an untold amount of wealth, and there are still tremendous possibilities for the creation of wealth there, if we give a ghost of a chance to the people who are struggling to create it. If hon. members will think it over I am sure they will realize that from a national standpoint the money we have put into the Palliser triangle to date has amounted to a pretty sound investment.

It has been suggested that as an example I say a word or two about the tremendous sum of money represented by one acre of sugar beets in my constituency, as a result of irrigation. I have not the figures before me, and I have no desire to detain the committee, but I do hope that members of parliament across Canada will come to realize that this country has to move forward as a whole, and we simply must not encourage such sectional talk as we have been hearing.

I want to say just a word or two to the British Columbia members. The finest market British Columbia has is down there in the Palliser triangle; yet they want to take away from those people the money with which they would buy British Columbia goods.

Mr. Gibson: On a question of privilege, I think the hon. member should be fair enough to recall that I said I would willingly vote twice as much money if it was properly invested in the prairies.

Mr. Blackmore: I am glad the member for Comox-Alberni spoke up. I have just listened to the member for Kamloops. For a man, the products of whose constituency depend so much on Alberta and Saskatchewan for their markets, to say anything against this $65 million payment that will mean a larger market for the products of his constituency, is something which quite surpasses my comprehension.

Mr. Fulton: I am sure it would.

Mr. Blackmore: I hope British Columbia members can come to realize that the money put into the Palliser triangle is not wasted. Much of that money will go to buy British Columbia lumber, British Columbia fruit, British Columbia mineral products, and fertilizer and British Columbia poultry products. I am not going just now to say anything more about this matter.

Mr. Abbott: I wonder if I might make my annual appeal on these final supplementary estimates? The committee know that, as a rule, they include no items on which policy has not already been approved in the main estimates, but in which there has been an underestimate of the amount required. There were some exceptions in these supplementaries, such as the wheat payment, the debate upon which has just been concluded, the amount for the superannuation fund, T.C.A. travel, and so on. I believe, however, we have completed consideration of all the items on which any new policy was involved. I would hope that such further discussion as may be found necessary—as a rule we do not have much on these final supplementaries—could be kept strictly relevant to the details of the items.

The Deputy Chairman: The item before the committee is No. 573.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Chairman, I understand some flocks of poultry in my county have been destroyed. The owners of some of those flocks have been compensated, but others have not. When I have endeavoured to obtain some information about it I have found that Dr. Boisvert of London is away on statutory leave. Could the minister say whether there is more than one type of poultry disease for which the birds are slaughtered? If so, what are they, and will this vote take care of the farmers who have not been compensated in my county during the past year?

Mr. Gardiner: I shall just give an official statement on the vote. It is necessary to provide additional funds for this object, that is compensation for animals slaughtered, of expenditures chiefly on account of the large sum required to pay compensation in connection with the control of Newcastle disease. In the main vote, No. 18, there was only a minor provision of $10,000 for this purpose. A supplementary vote of $550,000 was obtained and it was expected to be sufficient. The over-all compensation claims as of March 1, 1951, total approximately $825,000. An unusually large carry-over of compensation claims from the fiscal year 1949-50 in connection with the control of bovine tuberculosis has been responsible also to a considerable extent for the depletion of this appropriation. The large carry-over could not be avoided as the cleansing and disinfecting of infected premises was retarded greatly by the bad weather near the end of the fiscal year. Compensation cannot be paid until the cleansing and disinfecting is satisfactorily completed.

As of March 1, 1951, there are compensation claims totalling approximately $375,000 that have been released, and the payment of which is held up pending appropriation of additional funds. It is estimated that another $75,000 of compensation claims will be released for payment before the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. Charlton: According to an item in the Ottawa Journal tonight the Hull lab men have licked the dread poultry scourge. Could the minister give us anything definite on that? They are producing a vaccine now for this Newcastle disease?

Mr. Gardiner: They are producing a vaccine now, and this sum is to provide for all the means whereby the battle is being waged against Newcastle disease.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

601. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services and to authorize total additional commitments, including authority notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, for the current year for this purpose of $47,810,000 against which commitments it is estimated that the total additional expenditure in 1950-51 will not exceed a further amount of $19,410,000.

Mr. Abbott: In essence, this is a sort of transfer item. It relates, as will be seen from the details, to the acquisition of buildings, structures and so on. In essence, it is almost entirely defence housing which was built and financed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In considering the position it was felt by both the Department of National Defence and the treasury that this was more properly an item for the defence department. This is defence housing in the more remote areas, not in the settled areas. Consequently this vote is to enable the defence department to be charged with the cost of these houses with the proper credit to the Central Mortgage and Housing account. It is not a cash item. The houses have been built, of course, but it is to effect that transfer.

I am not in a position to say much about the defence research item. I do not recall offhand all the details, but it is an additional amount required, partly for construction, which is in accordance with the agreed policy. But the $19 million item is a transfer item of defence housing cost from Central Mortgage and Housing to the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Drew: As I understand it, it involves no new policy in regard to the construction of houses?

Mr. Abbott: None.

Mr. Drew: It simply represents the decision that it is more proper for this to be charged to national defence than Central Mortgage and Housing.

Mr. Abbott: That is right, rather than being considered an asset in connection with Central Mortgage and Housing in connection with ordinary rental. These houses will not be sold, but they are rented to these members of the armed forces.

Mr. Nowlan: Will there be a similar item in the general estimates under which a discussion can be held?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, there is a similar item.

Item agreed to.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

607. Railway mail service, further amount required, $5,000,000.

Mr. Abbott: This large item perhaps needs a word of explanation. It represents an additional due because of the increased rates payable to the railways for the railway mail service. Following long negotiations with the railways a new scale of rates for the carriage of mail was introduced, and this reflects the added cost.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

612. Prince Rupert drydock—to provide for operating losses and essential repairs in the fiscal year 1950-51, in accordance with the terms of order in council P. C. 29/4700 of September 30, 1950, $157,000.

Mr. Applewhaite: I should like to speak on item 612, under the heading Department of Public Works. I note that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is in his seat. In this connection may I just take one minute of the time of this committee to point out to the government that this is a drydock and shipbuilding plant owned by this country. Its record during the past war included the construction of thirteen 10,000-ton ships; four minesweepers; two 1,500-ton China coasters, and a tremendous amount of repair work on ships up to 22,000 tons. In defence construction ensuing, which will be put into effect by the government during the coming months, I would urge that they take into consideration making use of their own plant and equipment. If it were only a matter of community pride then I would not feel justified in bringing this request forward; but any additional expenses which would be involved in using this dock, as against using one which is perhaps closer to the desired point, would be only an additional cost to some other department of government, or to some other agency such as the Canadian National Railways.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Therefore I submit that the advantage of having a plant of that nature in operation, and capable of immediate use at any time in the location, well justifies consideration of the plea I now make.

Item agreed to.

General—

614. National Gallery of Canada, further amount required, $55,000.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Would the minister say what works of art were secured. Have they been acquired already?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes. Three of the pictures are of the Vollard collection. They are Portrait de Paysan, by Cezanne; Forêt, by Cezanne; and Chevaux de Courses, by Degas.

Mr. Ferguson: Where are those great works of art?

Mr. Abbott: I might explain that these are paid for out of the blocked funds which were discussed in the house. They are most valuable and splendid works of art, and a great acquisition to our gallery.

Mr. Ferguson: Serious consideration should be given to these matters before such expenditures are made. Again it is the old taxpayer who is suffering.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT

Engineering and water resources branch—

615. Notwithstanding the Trans-Canada Highway Act, to authorize and provide for a payment to the provinces of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and Newfoundland, which have entered into an agreement with Canada for construction of a part of the trans-Canada highway, in respect of construction of the highway carried out between December 10, 1949 and the day on which these provinces respectively signed the agreement with Canada, in accordance with the regulations of the governor in council; the amount paid to each province, however, not to exceed fifty per centum of the cost to the province of the said construction as determined by the governor in council; the maximum amount authorized to be expended by section 7 of the Trans-Canada Highway Act to be decreased to the extent of any amount paid pursuant to this vote—further amount required, $1,100,000.

Mr. Nowlan: I would ask the minister to make a brief statement on this item. I notice that Nova Scotia is not included among those provinces entering into the agreement. The minister, I believe, made a statement a while ago which signified that he was waiting for further instructions and further consultation with the Nova Scotia government. I believe the government of that province has been in touch with him with respect to the matter. Perhaps he would take a minute or two to explain the situation in Nova Scotia as applied to this transaction.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Chairman, Nova Scotia has not indicated to us that they intend to sign the trans-Canada highway agreement. I know that at the present time they are surveying a route which they have designated and made public. I presume that depending upon whether that route will qualify for the co-operative approach under the agreement, the government of Nova Scotia will consider further whether or not it should enter into the agreement, the same as the other eight provinces have done.

Mr. Nowlan: Then, the Nova Scotia government is not waiting for word from this government. If anything, the situation is reversed. The statement has been made that they were waiting.

Mr. Winters: The Nova Scotia government is not waiting for anything from this department.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

619. Commodities branch, including assistance in the development of markets and the procurement of supplies, and contributions as detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $75,250.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the development of markets general, or are there special efforts in any one direction?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It is a general program of trade development. Occasionally special situations arise which call for unexpected expenditures. But generally speaking, the vote covers the deficit in the appropriation for the trade commissioner service.

Item agreed to.

622. To reimburse the Canadian wheat board for final balance of the deficit incurred from the operation of the 1948 crop flax account for the period August 1, 1948 to July 31, 1950, authority P.C. 3376, dated July 28, 1948, $2,536,775.

Mr. Charlton: Does this include flax grown in eastern Canada?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Charlton: Not at all?

Mr. Howe: No, it arises out of a price support policy applying to the flax crop of 1948. At that time the government placed a floor of $4 under flax grown in the designated area which, as my hon. friend knows, is western Canada. Under that floor price policy the government had to buy about 10 million bushels of flax, which we have been liquidating over a period. It is all liquidated now. There was a total loss of about $6 million, of which this is the last instalment.

Mr. Charlton: There is a considerable amount of flax grown in eastern Canada. How does the price compare?

Mr. Howe: They seem to sell theirs without help from us.

Mr. Charlton: Perhaps they do not kick up so much fuss.

Item agreed to.

Special—

624. To provide for costs to be incurred in the planning and construction of emergency works to safeguard against the dangers of floods in the Red River valley and the Winnipeg area generally, under an agreement or agreements with the province of Manitoba which shall provide that Canada shall meet 75 per cent of the costs of such works, excluding the costs of land, and that Manitoba, or its municipalities or residents, shall meet the remaining cost, including the cost of land—further amount required, $1,353,000.

Mr. Knowles: Has there been any discussion between the federal government and the government of Manitoba with respect to the position of homes in Winnipeg behind the dikes? I refer to homes between the dikes that have been or are being built, and the river.

Mr. Howe: Those are not matters for the federal government. The agreement between the federal government and the province provides that the federal government will build dikes on land provided by the province —which we have done. The federal government does not have anything to do with houses or property outside the dikes.

Mr. Knowles: I asked the question because I had understood, subject to correction, that Premier Campbell indicated to the Manitoba legislature last fall that consideration would be given to discussing this matter with the municipal governments concerned and also with the federal government. I take it there has been no request by Manitoba for any such discussion.

Mr. Howe: I would not say that I positively remember that; but in any event considerations of that sort are excluded from the responsibilities of the Winnipeg diking board, to which this government is a contributor.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Payments to or for veterans and dependents—

641. To authorize payment to David Bruce Steele, under the Pension Act, of such benefits as would be awarded under the said act if the disabling condition had been incurred by him during service in world war II, $1,050.

Mr. Cardiff: What is the nature of the claim under this item?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Chairman, these two items are to authorize compensation for what might be called medical accidents which occurred in hospitals of the department, in the course of treatment of the veterans whose names appear in this and the following item. Although it was not established that the injuries suffered by these two veterans while being treated were the result of negligence of the department, nevertheless the director general of the treatment services considered there was reasonable doubt, and recommended that these men be awarded the same amount of compensation as would have been awarded to them for similar disability suffered in the service. This was done last year, and payment was made last year by order in council. However, it was observed that a long established practice of paying lifelong pensions should be done under a statute or by special appropriation under the act, and that is what we are doing this year.

Mr. Cardiff: I was not objecting to it at all. I was trying to get consideration for a case that I had brought to the minister's attention some time ago. I have always claimed that no law can operate without some flexibility given to those who are operating it. That is why I wanted to know what this particular item was for.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Indian affairs branch—Education—

579. Grants to residential schools—further amount required, $60,668.

Mr. Knight: I am interested in votes for education. The other day I was pleased to note a vote for education for the town of Rimouski, and I am glad to support a grant for education in any place in the dominion. I see some money here being given to the Indian schools. When I was speaking on the Indian bill the other day I paid some tribute to the work of those institutions, and I am glad to repeat it. I do want to repeat also that I think that it is best where possible, and particularly for Indian children, that they should, where such schools are available, attend schools in their own districts, whether these schools are run on a denominational or on a public school basis.

My reason of course is simply this, as I said before, that contact can be constantly maintained as between the child and its parents, and that the educational process which goes on in the school can be conveyed daily to the home.

[Mr. Howe.]

I know the very fine work that these residential schools are doing. I had an opportunity not very long ago to look over one of the residential schools in the constituency of the hon. member for Rosthern. It was the school at Duck Lake. The gentleman who was in charge then—and he was the principal—said to me—it may be the same man today—that where there was inefficiency in many schools of that type, that inefficiency was due to the lack of money available. He asked me at that time—and I know he has asked other hon. members of parliament—to make a plea so that these residential schools could have the money with which they may proceed to do even better work than they are doing now.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. St. Laurent: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, may I have the unanimous consent of the house to suggest that as soon as we dispose of this you leave the chair until eight o'clock so that we may be available at eight o'clock to attend in the other place for royal assent to such legislation as will have been passed by that time.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, last night I made protest about the long speech that was made, but I am very happy that the agricultural estimates are through, and I shall be very glad to be here at eight o'clock.

Mr. St. Laurent: Unless we put the bill through we would have to wait on the pleasure of the hon. gentlemen.

Mr. Abbott: I take it that Mr. Speaker will not be required to look at the clock for perhaps five minutes or so.

WAYS AND MEANS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Abbott moved:

CIVIL DEFENCE

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): In view of the intense interest in civil defence, when may the house expect to have the agreement which was signed on March 27 between the United States and Canada with respect to civil defence co-ordination measures as between the two countries?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall make inquiries. There will be no delay; it will be brought down just as soon as the documents can be prepared.

POSTAL SERVICE

BACKLOG OF MAIL AT HAMILTON POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): On March 20 I asked the parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General what was being done to relieve the backlog of mail that had piled up in the Hamilton post office. May I ask the hon. gentleman again what has been or is being done to relieve that situation?

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO PRESENT SITUATION

Inquiries of the Ministry

JAPANESE PEACE TREATY

REFERENCE TO ANNOUNCEMENT BY MR. DULLES ON SATURDAY, MARCH 31

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if Canada is a party to the announcement made on Saturday by Mr. John Foster Dulles in reference to the proposed treaty of peace or treaty of rearmament with respect to Japan; and if so, whether Canada gave her consent to having the statement made by Mr. Dulles on our behalf.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I believe Mr. Dulles spoke in Los Angeles on Saturday evening in regard to a treaty of peace with Japan. He spoke on behalf of the United States government, and not on our behalf or, so far as I know, on behalf of any other government. It is quite true, however, that a draft treaty of peace with Japan has been worked out by the United States government after informal consultations with certain other governments. That draft treaty has now been submitted to the Canadian government and other governments for their consideration, and in due course we shall have some comments to make on it. So far, however, the consultation has been entirely informal, and the draft represents the views of the United States only.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the minister if the draft he refers to is what Mr. Dulles referred to in his speech as a series of pacts?

Mr. Pearson: No, I was referring to the the draft treaty of peace with Japan. However, during his speech I believe Mr. Dulles made reference to certain other possible security and mutual assistance arrangements between the United States and Australia and New Zealand. That may have caused some confusion in the minds of those who read press reports of his speech.

Mr. Graydon: Then may I ask the minister whether they would be the forerunners of a defence pact for the Pacific area?

Mr. Pearson: No, I do not think so. This would be an arrangement that covered only the three governments I have just mentioned.

FERRY SERVICES

CROSS POINT, QUE.-CAMPBELLTON, N.B.—DESTRUCTION OF FERRY—QUESTION AS TO BUILDING OF BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works.

[Mr. Pearson.]

In view of the fact that the ferry-boat running between Cross Point, in Bonaventure county, and Campbellton, New Brunswick, was destroyed by fire a few days ago, could the Minister of Public Works inform the house of the steps which may be taken to speed up the building of a bridge between Cross Point and Campbellton?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada learned with regret that the ferry mentioned by the hon. member had been destroyed by fire. In the past, interprovincial bridges have been built through subsidies paid by both provincial governments and the federal government. Up to now, the federal government has not been informed by the provinces that they would undertake to pay a portion of the cost of the bridge. If the provinces indicate that they are ready to do their share, I am sure that the government of Canada will seriously consider their request.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENT AND CONSOLIDATION—PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO BAND FUNDS

The house resumed, from Friday, March 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for the second reading of Bill No. 79, respecting Indians.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Before the motion carries there are several matters I probably ought to mention as the bill progresses.

As I think everyone in the house realizes, Canada's 136,000 Indians, scattered from ocean to ocean, constitute to us in this parliament an urgent and inescapable challenge. Our Indians are potentially either a magnificent asset or a menacing liability. By what means, and with the greatest likelihood of ultimate success, can we aid our Indians to make themselves the priceless partners both Indians and non-Indians fervently desire to see them become? I feel that the Indian Act as it is now before the house is a great improvement over what we had a year ago. I have a letter from one of the prominent Indian leaders in Canada in which he says that Bill No. 79 has removed at least seventy-five per cent of the objections the Indians had to Bill No. 267 hardly a year ago.

I want to congratulate the minister on this achievement. The letter to which I refer comments upon the increasing sympathy and understanding displayed by the minister towards the Indians during the months he was meeting and discussing this matter with them. As I expected, the minister has great potentialities as a statesman. His youth and inexperience in the department might have plunged him into many difficulties which a year of careful study of the problem would have helped him to avoid, and have helped him to avoid. I believe it is a source of satisfaction to the minister himself that Bill No. 267 did not go through. I am sure that the Indians throughout Canada are far more likely now to have that magnificent future to which I referred than they would have been had the bill gone through less than a year ago.

There are still several matters which should be given careful thought as we progress in the study of the Indian problem. Some of them cannot be suitably dealt with in any Indian act, but must be considered by the department more or less apart from the Indian Act.

Among the many problems which confront us in respect of the Indians, there are four which stand out particularly, and to these I should like to refer specifically.

The first problem has to do with what we might call the psychological attitude of the Indians throughout Canada. There remains in most Indians a lack of confidence. The minister has dispelled much of that, but there are still the results of years and years of what we must call mismanagement of Indian affairs in Canada. This lack of confidence must be removed. I am sure that the minister recognizes that as readily as any other man in the house, perhaps more readily.

The second problem is one of education. I am sure that no Indian act can deal suitably with the problem of Indian education. It is an exceedingly difficult problem with which to cope, for many reasons. It is, though, a problem which must be grappled with and mastered. I see no reason why the education of the children of 136,000 Indian people in Canada cannot be taken care of as efficiently and satisfactorily as we are now taking care of the education of non-Indian boys and girls in Canada. Until this educational problem has been properly met, I fear we are not likely to lay the foundation of that stable superstructure which we hope to build.

The third problem is that of rehabilitation. One of the greatest dreads that the Indians have arises from the fact that if by any chance they should be excluded from the protection of the reservations and the treaties they would not be equipped to compete with the white man on anything like equal terms. Obviously in order to build up the Indian population as partners in the great Canada to be, we simply must make adequate provisions for the rehabilitation of the Indians. By that I mean that we must enable the Indian to learn how to make his living, much as the Caughnawaga Indians have done. Many of these are able to compete in the structural steel industry with any white man on the American continent. I can see no reason why we cannot so train our Indians; the problem must be grappled with and solved.

The fourth problem is that of teaching the Indians to govern themselves, or of guiding, protecting and advising them while they learn to do so. It is something which we desire they shall learn to do.

I believe these four problems are not even successfully approached in the present Indian Act. As I have indicated, I doubt that they could be. However, while we are at this business of providing something like a satisfactory arrangement for our Indians, we must not forget these four problems.

May I just mention one or two considerations in relation to the matter of increasing Indian confidence. In times past I have suggested that we should have an Indian claims commission to go into all the various problems which the Indians have in their hearts. Here is an example of the kind of thing which must be met and dealt with. I am not sure that I should give the name of the reservation involved; I have thought about it for some little time, and I am inclined to believe I should omit naming the reservation on the floor of the house, but I will give it to the minister personally. Unless the members desire particularly that the name of the reservation be given, I shall not give it. Some of the things that are said in this communication to me cast a great deal of reflection upon a great many men who are not in a position to defend themselves, and it may thereby cause some injustice; but this is what is said concerning this particular reservation:

> In the first place, this reserve covered a very large territory which comprised a great amount of spruce and fir lumber, also hardwood; but the reserve was allowed to be sold off by degrees—not only sold off, but different political parties were allowed to go in and take lumber at different stumpage rates. The reserve has now lost seven-eighths of territory of what it was when the reserve was set up, and the Indian population of the reserve has doubled, with hardly sufficient timber left to furnish firewood for the Indians now on the reserve. The lumber has been completely taken from the reserve.
> On investigating I discovered that the relief given the Indians was not in any way adequate to their needs. The Indians of eastern Canada have no treaty fund on which to draw. They depend on the vote of relief from parliament from year to year. There was a small hospital on the reserve, but there were only one or two rooms available for patients outside of the staff and the teachers in the schools on the reserve.

I am just quoting excerpts from the statement. It continues:

So far as I can learn, this reserve has been used as a political football, and everything is operated on a patronage basis. The clothing, food and everything is to be supplied by someone who has the patronage for this part of the constituency.

Whether or not the details concerning this reservation will justify the statements which my communicant makes, certainly when a responsible man makes such statements as these, they should be examined with the minutest care.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Where is this reserve?

Mr. Blackmore: I could easily give the name, but I gave reasons why I thought it would be better not to state it. There will be men involved, probably men right in this house, who will perhaps not be able to satisfactorily answer the allegations. If it is desired I can give the name in the committee, but after what I have already said I think that I should not give the name of the reserve to the house and to the country. I shall give it to the minister.

I imagine that if we were to go from ocean to ocean in Canada we would find dozens of cases at least as bad as the one I have cited. Will someone tell me how in the world the minister, with his overworked department,—and no matter how large his department is, it will be overworked—can possibly do justice to these many cases which have grown up through scores of years, unless a claims commission is set up?

If an Indian claims commission were appointed with authority to proceed with an absolutely free hand, the only demand upon them being to ascertain what was just, and to suggest how the injustice which the Indians have suffered could be removed, that would be the kind of thing I have in mind.

There are a great many other things. I will just mention one more. I do not believe it would be well at the present time for me to go into details; all that I need to do for the members of the house is to hold up this file of documents which I have on my desk, all bearing on the matter I am going to talk about, and I think they will all see that there is a great deal that can be said. I would rather have time to go into it with care before I do anything more than make a few remarks in a general way.

I refer now to the situation which confronts us with respect to the Six Nations Indians. The Six Nations Indians appear to believe, as a matter of religion and of history, that their organization was founded by the Great White God to whom I referred in one of my previous speeches. Because of that they believe that their hereditary chiefs are men clothed with hereditary authority of the highest possible kind. They maintain that in 1924—and they submit documentary evidence to prove what they maintain—men representing the department of Indian affairs in Ottawa violated their privileges by entering their—what word shall I use? I was going to say "sacred" but that is hardly the right word—their buildings where they kept their records, seizing those records and subjecting certain of their respectable leaders to indignities which in the minds of these people amount to an outrage.

How can the minister possibly arrive at the facts concerning this matter? When we remember that the Six Nations Indians constitute by far the most influential, well-organized and, we might say, powerful group of Indians in Canada, I think we shall realize that until we can satisfy the Six Nations Indians that justice has been done them to make up for all the unfairness they have suffered, we have not really placed ourselves on a sound foundation in constructing an Indian affairs set-up which will endure. I will say no more about the necessity for an Indian claims commission, although the information I have at my disposal would occupy several speeches, each as long as Mr. Speaker could possibly allow me to make.

May I now turn for a few minutes to the matter of education? The members of the house as a whole are familiar with the problem which confronts us in relation to Indian education. I would imagine that the majority of the members of the Indian affairs committee would agree that, properly speaking, education of Indians is a matter which properly ought to come under the direction of the provinces. If the Indians are to be placed on a basis comparable with that which obtains among their non-Indian fellows, they also must come under the provinces in the matter of education.

But no province in Canada is prepared to assume responsibility for the education of the Indians without adequate monetary compensation and guarantee. This puts the department at Ottawa in a difficult position. I want the minister to realize that I recognize that fact. But that fact does not remove the insistence of the demand that there shall be adequate treatment of the Indian educational problem. If the department must hand over the throttle, so to speak, in respect of money and say to the provinces "You solve this problem of Indian education and we will give you almost a blank cheque while you do it", it will have to do just that. Unless the dominion is ready to do that, I do not see how we are going to solve the problem of the education of the Indians. I am sure that any province in this dominion will gladly assume that responsibility and will admirably discharge it if provided with the funds with which to do the job.

We must not expect to get education for our Indian boys and girls as cheaply as we get education for our white boys and girls. We know how costly it is to educate our non-Indian boys and girls. We must expect it to be much more costly to educate adequately the Indian boys and girls, and we must be prepared to stand right up and face that fact. I know that it is rather trite to speak in the house about what I am going to mention, but when we face a $5 billion appropriation for war for three years, we should not be too mercenary when it comes to making provision for the education of the great Indian people that is to be. One hundred and thirty-six thousand Indians in seventy-five years will be a large proportion of our Canadian population—not a body of men and women who can be disregarded in any respect or skimped in their treatment.

The problem of education remains to be solved. The minister will be virtually as helpless in his attacks on this problem as previous ministers have been, no matter how earnest and eager to solve it he may be, unless we put an adequate financial guarantee behind him. He must not have to go before the cabinet and before the treasury board and, I was going to say, break his heart in a vain effort to get them to loosen up and give him the money with which to do the job. That is just stating the facts in a simple way.

We now come to the matter of rehabilitation of the Indians. As I indicated, that means teaching the Indians how to live in the environment in which they dwell. This morning, while I was meditating on this speech, I was thinking of how, when I was a small boy, the Indians would come to visit our home, as they did the homes of most non-Indian people in the neighbourhood, just out of friendliness. The Indians were fine, friendly and co-operative people, as I knew them. They were altogether different from the Indians in the United States, because they had been treated much more fairly and honourably than the Indians in the United States had been treated. Whenever an Indian came to our home, we were fairly sure he knew how to tan a hide; almost no matter how long the hide had been off the animal, you could turn it over to the Indian, and he would go and tan it and make a good job of it.

I was wondering if there is any reason why the Indian could not be taught to do the necessary work in the tanning of leather and in the making of shoes. How skilful they were in making mocassins with the most meagre equipment with which to do it! I remember the works of art and efficiency which the Indians used to produce and bring to my parents to offer for sale; I refer to the mocassins beautifully trimmed with beads artistically placed on them. People whose ancestors were able to do such work over sixty years ago surely can be taught to do almost any kind of handicraft work with great skill and efficiency. Why should they not, if they were guided by vocational directors, acquire any kind of skill which they would need in order to fit into our everyday economic life? Why should Indians not be most skilful electricians, plumbers, shoemakers, garage men, mechanics generally, and so on all through the list?

There is another thing that has always been a conundrum to me. When the Indians came to our home, no matter what was wrong with us—and we had plenty wrong with us, struggling as we were under trying conditions in those old pioneer days, when we could not give much thought to having the kind of food we needed; we were lucky if we could get enough to keep body and soul together—they knew what to do. If it was in the summertime they would go out and go down to the brook, and the first thing we knew they would come back with several different kinds of herb. They would put these together and they would often cure whatever was wrong with us almost with astonishing skill. They knew the poultices and they knew the medicines generally. The Indians must have had remarkable skill in the matter of medicine. Why should we not have more Indian doctors today? We already have a number of our girls from the Indian reservations learning to be fine nurses. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister will find it an impossible task to rehabilitate the Indians and to teach them to be perfectly successful in competition with the white man in almost any vocation that you could name by which the white man makes his living.

All that is necessary is to have someone who understands the Indian and is sympathetic with him, who has money enough at his disposal to send the Indian boys and girls to technological schools and all that sort of thing. I do not think there will be any difficulty in rehabilitating the Indian financially. And just as soon as the Indians are sure that they can step out into the paths of the white man and make their way much of the anxiety which inhibits them today, and which fills them almost with consternation, will be dispelled as a mist on a July morning. Therefore I think we can approach this problem with complete confidence if we will just go about it in the right way.

That covers education and rehabilitation. Now, the fourth problem I mentioned, and which I shall deal with only briefly, is that of teaching the Indians or helping the Indians to learn to govern themselves. I do not think there will be any difficulty in that sort of thing if we just go about it right, with the advice that we can get from men skilled in Indian affairs. But the problem has to be solved.

One group of Indians who live on a reservation not very far from where I live—not the one that is in my constituency—asked me, "By all means"—I can see them now with the greatest concern on their faces—"let us ourselves have charge of the education of our boys and girls and we will see that they will get the training they need. We want our boys and girls to be as skilful as the white men are. We know their problems. Let us have a hand in it. Put the money and the facilities at our disposal, under the direction of white men, if you wish, but let us determine how we are going to do it."

I am not saying that that group of Indians would succeed, but they certainly believe they can succeed, and where they honestly believe they can succeed I am prepared to give them a chance. They would make mistakes, but it is the God-given right of any man in government to make a mistake. Should they make mistakes and learn by those mistakes they will feel far stronger and far more satisfied.

I do not think I need to say much more about the matter of allowing the Indians to govern themselves. Remember, they did it for 2,000 years or more before the white man came. They went to war a great deal and had many troubles like a good many others, but the Six Nations Indians had pretty well cleared up the difficulties of war among themselves. As far as I can learn the Six Nations had rather an effective government which they possibly formed themselves. If we build on the basis of what they had achieved in the past, on what they think they can do now, I believe we shall have staunch and happy allies in the Indians, and real partners in the building of this commonwealth we are working for.

How shall we go about it? With the limited amount of attention that I have been able to give this matter, struggling along as all other hon. members are, coping with the scores of different problems, it seems to me that it would be advisable for us to have two commissions. One of these should be an Indian claims commission. Before that commission the Indian could present his case and take it to court, if need be. He would be sure that when he had a case it would be heard, and that the decision would be just.

I believe there should be a rehabilitation commission also, quite independent of the department. As nearly as I can make out the department of Indian affairs is largely an administrative department. It has been beset with all sorts of worry, and I have the greatest sympathy for the men who have struggled with the Indian problem in times past, but it is not a department that can get out and find facts in all cases, weigh those facts satisfactorily, and draw suitable conclusions, as a royal commission would be able to do. If we had a rehabilitation commission to take charge of the education and the training of Indian boys and girls to meet the competition of the world before them, and the providing of funds for those on land to establish farms and herds and to engage in sawmilling and things of that kind by which they could make their living, I believe that commission would do a highly gratifying job for our generation and the generations yet to come.

I do not know but that it would be a good thing to let the Indian claims commission enter into the problem of teaching the Indians to govern themselves. It may probably be better to teach the Indians to govern themselves under the rehabilitation commission, but certainly I believe we shall never succeed in this country in dealing with the Indians adequately until we do have at least two commissions just as effective as our transport commission and just as efficient as our wheat board is or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is. These two will have just as much responsibility and authority. Probably it will cost just as much money, or a good deal more, but they would do the job if we had the right men. Probably the best thing to suggest is to have two commissions, one the Indian claims commission and the other the rehabilitation commission.

May I close, Mr. Speaker, by reading one more compliment to the minister? It is an excerpt from a news report of a meeting in Macleod, Alberta, that appears in a recent issue of the Lethbridge Herald. The minister will recognize the two chiefs who are speaking, and he will know that out there they are saying just what they feel. The excerpt reads:

Bill 79, the new federal government bill dealing with Indian affairs, meets the wishes of the Indians by about 75 per cent, Chief James Gladstone told the gathering in speaking of his meeting in Ottawa at the end of February with other Indian delegates to confer with Citizenship Minister Walter Harris, sponsor of the legislation.

"It was the first time in the history of Canada that Indians from Halifax to Vancouver had gathered to discuss their problems with the government," Chief Gladstone stated. "I thought it was the sublimest moment of my life," he said.

He paid tribute to Mr. Harris as the first minister at the head of Indians affairs to search out the viewpoint of the Indian. The Indian has to be educated before Bill 79 can be applied in its entirety, he said.

"It may take a generation," Chief Gladstone stated. "If the vote was forced on us now the Indian would not know how to meet it. We want to be Indians, always Indians, even though we gradually take full responsibility as Canadian citizens," he declared.

"We listened to Mr. Harris and we feel that what we get will be gradual," Chief Gladstone said. "We will have to satisfy him that we can handle it first," he stated.

Chief Albert Many Fingers, Chief Gladstone's fellow delegate, stated the Indian's first need is education and that there is a need of day schools. The two chiefs stated the government is apparently willing to improve upon the education facilities of the Indians.

I believe that that will be valuable not only to the minister but to the members of the house who address themselves to this problem, as an indication that much progress has been made. I am of the opinion that we can make just as much progress in the next year by the earnest, tactful efforts of the minister as was made during the last year. I would not be surprised to see that he may find it advisable to adopt the suggestion which I have tentatively made concerning commissions, which will find the facts, weigh them, sift them, organize them and present them to him so that he, with his fine skilful officials to assist him, can make the necessary decisions to present to parliament.

Out of all this I believe we shall be able to say honestly, and confidently that we in our generation shall have done our bit for the Indians; that we shall have done all we can to give them the square deal they deserve.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the introduction of this bill justifies the attitude taken by many of us last summer, when we expressed the view that the inadequacies in the bill then presented were such that it should be redrafted and changed, and that so far as possible the Indians should be again consulted. I agree with the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) that the minister, in calling together representatives of the Indians from one end of the country to the other, has done much to make this measure more acceptable than any proposals of the kind we have had in the past. That is to say, the Indians will feel that they themselves have had some influence in formulating policies which will come into effect as a result of this measure.

No matter how good an Indian Act we may have, it seems to me the principal problem is one of administration, involving the raising of the standards of education, health and living, and the standard of citizenship—of a new type, of course—among the Indians. I hope that what the hon. member for Lethbridge said a few moments ago toward the end of his speech will be said of this generation both by the Indian people and by the people of Canada generally. But if this generation fails to the extent that previous generations of Canadians have failed in doing justice to the original inhabitants of this country, then indeed we shall not deserve much praise. On the contrary, as a generation, we shall deserve only condemnation.

I have often thought it strange that after something like one hundred and eighty years since the first reserves were established in Canada, and now after about eighty-four years since confederation, we have living among us a depressed people, a people who have the attributes to make a contribution to our country, a people capable of enjoying standards of living and education as high as those of the white population with whom they dwell.

There have been evidences that it is possible that our Indians are capable of enjoying high standards of living and of education. For years many men and women of Indian descent have occupied important positions in Canada. I am not thinking only of those who have been full-blooded descendants of the original inhabitants of our country; I am thinking as well of those who have had high percentages of Indian blood in them. I think of a chief justice in one of our western provinces. I think of people of Indian descent who have occupied positions in various churches, and who have occupied posts in the Department of National Defence. Indeed I believe one of these attained the rank of brigadier in the first world war, and today is a respected magistrate in the second largest city of Canada.

Some years ago I had the opportunity of seeing some of the Indian schools. At that time I was fairly familiar with educational standards and age groups, and I remember being struck by the fact that the intelligence of the average Indian child in primary grades measured well with the average white child in primary grades in the ordinary common schools of the country.

Then something seemed to happen. They went back—indeed, they were encouraged to go back—to their old conditions. Gradually their condition reverted, and no further attempt was made to provide opportunities for them to develop the aptitudes about which the hon. member for Lethbridge spoke. That they have those aptitudes is certain.

I know the Indian Act does not deal in any respect with Eskimos. I have been told, however, on more than one occasion that when airfields were established in Eskimo regions of the far north it was discovered that the Eskimos had aptitudes that in some instances were above those of the white men who were associating with them. As engineers they learned rapidly about the mechanism of even complicated machines such as airplane engines. Intelligence tests given to Indian children in North America show that, if tests are based upon the environmental experience of those involved, those children have as high intelligence as any of the white children.

I have often compared our record in Canada with that of the white settlers in New Zealand. When I say this I am not thinking of New Zealand under a Labour government, but of New Zealand in the long years before that government took office. In the early part of the last century—yes, indeed, approaching the second half of the last century—the original inhabitants of New Zealand were cannibals. They were not cannibals in the sense in which some other tribes were, as a matter of ritual; they were cannibals because they liked human flesh. As a matter of fact some of the missionaries who went out there became food for the Maoris. I remember well that in the city in which I was educated a memorial pulpit was erected in the cathedral to the memory of a missionary who was killed by the Maoris in 1845 or 1846. We were told that he or some of his colleagues had been consumed by them.

Yet, when parliamentary institutions were established in New Zealand in 1856, followed by fifteen years of struggle with the Maoris, we find that in 1871 they were given the franchise, and that four Maoris were elected to the parliament of that country. Today the Maoris are not assimilated—and in this country no one wants to assimilate the Indian—but they are integrated into the New Zealand community. Their sons have occupied high positions in the army, the air force, the church and the state, and have served in cabinets of the Dominion of New Zealand. Yet after nearly 200 years, after eighty-four years since confederation, our Indians in the main, with the exception of the Caughnawaga reserve, the Brant reserve and one or two other places notably in British Columbia, present a picture of economic and social depression, lacking sufficient educational facilities, living under health conditions that are a reflection on the whole of our country with tuberculosis, though the incidence has been greatly reduced lately, still taking a relatively greater toll than among the white population in the same areas.

These are indications not of the failure of the Indians but of the failure of the white settlers of Canada to do what should have been done for this intelligent, one-time physically fit and loyal aboriginal population of this country. I agree with the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) that much depends on the education of the Indian child. I do not think that our educational efforts among the Indians have been successful. I know many of the Indians regard that as one of our greatest failures. That was brought out again and again when the committee was sitting. They desire that educational opportunities for their children shall be provided in a greater, more comprehensive and more efficient manner than before, comparable in all respects to those provided for Canadian children generally.

After all, these people are capable of independence, of initiative, of making a contribution to the cultural, economic and social life of the country in which we live, and they have been denied that opportunity. To a very large extent I think that is due to the fact that our attitude has been purely paternalistic, and the Indian Act has been administered purely from the paternalistic point of view. Not enough opportunity has been given to the Indian population to guide their own destinies and to raise their standards of life and of living.

When we look at the way in which their old treaty rights have been set aside, forgotten or impinged upon, that also is a reflection on our good faith as a people in our dealings with the Indian population. Therefore, while I think that the bill is a distinct improvement over the old Indian Act, while it is an improvement over the bill that was presented to us last summer, nevertheless it is defective in that it perhaps has not sufficient vision in the realm of education and, I regret to say, in the realm of health of the Indians. I would have liked to see more direct control of health facilities among the Indians placed in the Indian department, although I am not for one moment belittling the great improvement that has been made since the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) took over the supervision of that department. I think there has been a very great improvement, and I want to say that; but we are concerned with the standards of living and the social rehabilitation, if you like to call it such, of the Indian people.

There are two fields that need particular attention, health and education, and to a large extent the two go together, education for health, health for education. Consequently I would like to see more attention to the problem of health and welfare in the bill. However, as I have already said, the bill is an improvement over the one introduced last year. I hope that in the administration of the new act every attempt will be made to raise the standards of the Indians and to use those aptitudes that they have in such large measure to enable them to enter upon vocations and ways of life that will not only help them to improve their physical and economic conditions but also enable them to make a contribution to the cultural life of our country and which will gradually bring about the integration—not assimilation—of the Indian population into the general population of Canada.

I think the whole basis of our thought over the last number of years with respect to racial and other differences in our country has not been to try to make all Canadians of the same pattern of speech, thinking, religion or culture, but rather that each particular group in Canada, whether they be English, Scots, French, Ukrainian or whatever they may be, by preserving their cultural heritage, may contribute together to the making of a Canadian culture which will be not of one sort, kind or pattern but rather like a mosaic, a picture composed of many different types of stone or, in the words I have just used, of many cultures. Therefore I welcome the bill as an improvement. But no bill, no matter how good, will succeed unless we have a minister, and a department manned by officials, who have a high ideal and who are determined not to keep on treating the Indians as children but as human beings who have capabilities which, if given scope, will enable them to make a contribution not only to their own welfare but to the welfare of the country in which they and we hope to live together in unity for generations to come.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I intend to take only three or four minutes in discussing the bill at the present time inasmuch as I have spoken in the house many times in the past about Indian affairs, and I do not wish to repeat what I said on those occasions. Second, a good deal of what I might otherwise have said has already been said by speakers who have preceded me. Needless to say, I welcome the introduction of the bill at a fairly early stage in the session when we will have time to consider it without being pressed to get it through so that the session may end. That is one great advantage, so far as the timing of the introduction of the bill is concerned, over the one which was introduced last year.

I am sorry that I was not able to be here when the minister made his speech introducing the bill. However, I have read it carefully and by and large I agree with the general tenor and spirit of the speech he made on March 16 last. The steps he mentioned in that speech as having being taken to obtain the opinion of the Indians and others across Canada interested in the welfare of the Indians I think were exceptionally good and have had fruitful results, as indicated by the changes that have been made in this act. That is also indicated, if I may say so, by the different attitude being displayed by the minister this year as compared with last year, for which I commend him. I believe the steps taken to obtain the views of the Indians were extremely important as far as the psychological effect upon the Indians themselves was concerned. They feel they are in on the thing now, that they have been consulted, and that some weight has been given their opinions. If any Indian act is to work I think one of the essentials is that the Indians themselves have some confidence in it, and are able to feel that they had a hand in framing it.

In the same way I think it was an excellent move to bring Indian representatives from across Canada to Ottawa for a conference, as was done at the end of February and the beginning of March of this year. I was glad to learn from the minister's speech that such a large degree of unanimity existed among those representatives. The situation as far as Indians are concerned differs greatly as between the various parts of the country, so it is almost impossible to bring in any act that will please everybody. Of course I do not suppose any act of any kind ever pleases everyone; but because of the great difference between living conditions among Indians in the maritimes and those on the prairies, for instance, what may suit one group will not suit another. So I hope this will be taken into consideration and there will be some flexibility in the application of this act.

In my opinion a number of clauses in the present bill could still be improved. Some of them I would say will prove unacceptable to the majority of the Indians when they see them in operation, even though a majority of their representatives did not oppose them at the conference. I should hope that when this bill is considered in committee the minister and his officials will not take an inflexible attitude toward amendments to various clauses. I believe the bill can be further improved, and I sincerely trust that in the committee every effort will be made to bring about those improvements. I see the minister nodding his head, which is a good sign.

I do not want to go into the various clauses at this time. Particularly do I not want to draw down upon my head your ire, Mr. Speaker, for transgressing the rules. However, I should like to make reference to one or two of the provisions which I think are not acceptable and in which I hope some changes may be made. The first is section 4 (2) in connection with the power of the governor in council to abolish Indian reserves, or to abolish the Indian status as far as an individual is concerned. That has been referred to already, so I need say no more about it. One thing which needs revision, which is still unsatisfactory, is the definition of an Indian, which takes up several clauses of the bill. I would agree with the statement by the minister, I think it was last year, that the business of defining an Indian is extremely difficult. It is very hard to draw up a definition that is simple and at the same time more or less all-inclusive. The definition in the old act was comparatively simple. The definition in this bill, as I say, is far from simple, running through a considerable number of clauses; and I think it is quite bad in some respects. Then the matter of the disposal of children is something else in which I believe there could be a change for the better, and I trust something will be done in that regard.

One paragraph in the minister's speech disturbed me to some extent. At page 1352 he said:

> I received many letters from people saying: There is nothing whatever in the bill about old age pensions for Indians. Similarly there were many letters saying: You have not provided in the bill that, wherever possible, an Indian child should obtain the same standard of education that a non-Indian receives. The house will readily understand why those matters are not contained in the bill. Those are matters which are provided for in this house by votes in the estimates and not by legislation.

The reason that disturbed me is that in 1945, when I first came into the house, I moved a resolution asking that the government take into consideration the payment of the old age pension to Indians. That resolution was debated for at least a day, and at the end of the day the then Minister of Mines and Resources stated that it should be allowed to stand because they proposed, and he promised, that a committee would be set up to consider Indian affairs and that as a result amendments would be made to the act. So he did not think anything could be done about paying old age pensions until the committee had met and the act had been amended. That has been more or less the answer ever since, except that last year a payment was introduced which was supposed to be in lieu of old age pensions. Ever since 1945 the story given us has been that old age pensions could not be paid to Indians until this act was amended; but now the act has been amended this statement would seem to indicate that old age pensions are still not to be paid.

I do not think it is much use for the minister to say that this matter should be dealt with in the estimates unless he is prepared to deal with it in that way. We on this side of the house certainly cannot put anything in the estimates for the payment of old age pensions; and if they are not provided under the Indian Act by statutory authority, it means that they can only be paid if the minister or the government decides to put an item in the estimates. Personally I would much rather see this thing settled by a provision in the act that the Indians shall be treated, in the matter of old age pensions, just as other citizens of Canada are treated. That is all that would be required, one short clause added to the act. Then we would have the statutory authority for equality of treatment for the Indians in that regard.

The situation is the same as far as education is concerned. I know that is not something which can be written into the act, however; and I must say that during the last four years in particular there has been a very considerable improvement in education as far as the Indians are concerned. However, I would like to have more definite assurance in regard to what we might call a policy of educational opportunities equal to those afforded white children, as far as that may be possible. The only reason I say that is that some of the Indians in the more remote areas of this country will not, for some considerable length of time, be able to have equal educational opportunities with the white children in the more populous areas. As has been indicated by other speakers, this matter of the education of Indians is perhaps the most important question in so far as the handling of our Indian problem is concerned. As was stated by the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) a short time ago, only by providing improved educational facilities can the Indians possibly be integrated with the rest of our population.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, there are one or two general remarks on this subject which I should like to take the opportunity of emphasizing at this time. Practically no statement which can be made, in this house or elsewhere, about Indians could be correctly applied to all the Indians in Canada. There is an almost unbelievable difference between the state of their educational and financial advancement in the various parts of the country, so that it is impossible to say that the Indian is this or the Indian wants that. Such statements are likely to cause a great deal of misunderstanding. Not only is that true as between one part of the country and another, but in my own district, which happens to be one which represents both coastal and interior areas, the difference is almost beyond belief.

We have Indian settlements on the coast where the majority of the people living in those villages are paying income taxes on larger amounts than I ever hope to pay income tax upon, and whose homes are of a better quality than any it has yet been my privilege to have. Two hundred miles or less from those areas we have villages in which the conditions are nothing less than deplorable, and those conditions apply both to the physical circumstances under which the Indian lives and to the mental and physical condition of those Indians themselves. In trying to meet this Indian question, therefore, we must realize that we cannot adopt any hard and fast rule that applies to the Indians as a whole. No section which can be written into an act of this sort, or very few of them, can be said to apply in detail to the Indians of Canada. If such a section contains maximum or minimum provisions which apply directly to certain Indian groups, then it is certainly going to be out of place in its application to other groups.

It is as a result of that that many of the sections of this act appear to me to be safeguarded. It is because of the difference between the various Indians, as mentioned by the member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness), that these sections which are causing the greatest amount of opposition throughout the country have to be retained in the act. I believe that all legislators, and certainly all legislators who have had occasion to practise law, will realize that in many sections of acts such as the Criminal Code there are maximum penalties which are out of all proportion to the seriousness of some of the offences committed under those sections. Those maximum penalties are not there to be applied in every case. They are to be applied in the extreme cases where the person who is administering that act believes they are applicable. I submit the same rule applies to those sections which have to be retained here, where in certain cases the minister, who I presume will be acting upon the advice of his departmental officials, has certain overriding authority. It does not follow that he is going to use that authority, even if he considers it might be advisable to do so. But I hope that it follows he is going to use that authority when he considers it is necessary in the interests of the Indians concerned that some act should be overridden by the power which has been retained in certain sections of this bill.

I am going to say something which could easily be misinterpreted, Mr. Speaker. It is because I submit that safeguard must be in the act to apply to the more backward and more helpless Indians, I think there is a duty on those of us who are in this house, and on the citizens of Canada who are not in this house, to discuss this matter and deal with this subject in such a way that the faith of the Indian in the government of Canada will be retained. In order to make it clear to my friends opposite, I am not referring at the moment to this government but to the government of Canada as an institution. The government of Canada as an institution is primarily responsible for protecting, as well as for advancing, the Indians of Canada. So long as they must look to that government for that protection, and for that advancement, it is certainly up to those of us who claim to have the interests of the Indian at heart to see that he looks to that overriding authority with a certain amount of faith and trust.

I assume we are all discussing this act and its administration with a view to the improvement of conditions for Indians, and not with a view to arousing agitation or opposition to the bill either amongst the Indians or the whites. I do not suppose I am the only member who has found in his district a certain inclination among some Indians and some whites to use the fact that this bill is up for discussion as an excuse to arouse a certain amount of agitation and opposition, not necessarily on party political lines at all but in order that there might be unrest in the district. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that most members in whose ridings there reside a large number of Indians, and who state that does not exist in their district, are either not very familiar with what is going on in their district or are extremely fortunate. I say with regret that in my district there are those who have not the interests of either the Indian or the Dominion of Canada at heart who are making use of this bill as an opportunity to belittle and hurt the body politic of Canada.

I should like to mention one other point in connection with the act. We must remember that administration and legislation are not the same thing. I tried to point that out at the commencement of these few remarks in my reference to the minimum and maximum. Those who are charged with the administration of the act will be the people who will decide whether the maximum, the minimum or something halfway between is to be applied, and whether a permissive section must be called into account. When we look at these permissive or restrictive sections, I would urge that we remember that, while in perhaps seven-tenths of the country there may be no need for this if in one-tenth of the country there are Indians whose circumstances may make that section advisable, then the section should be allowed to remain. Our duty then will be to watch the administration of the act.

In my own district there are amongst the Indians two major fears. There is the fear of the Indian who has reached a considerable stage of advancement that he is going to be held down and not allowed to advance any further. There is the fear of the Indian who has reached a very low stage of advancement that he is going to have advancement forced upon him, that he is going to be gradually edged out of the comfortable situation in which he finds himself—and I use that word "comfortable" not in its literal sense—whereby he has practically no responsibilities of his own. He has his reserve; he has his little grants; he has a government to fall back on and he does not want advancement, and in some cases he is not being encouraged to want it.

There you have two diametrically opposed situations; and it is going to be up to the administrators of the act to raise those in the lower categories so that while we have a restrictive act to protect them we shall not deter those who are more advanced from going ahead. In other words, we must not hold back those who are well ahead until those who are far behind have caught up.

Before I sit down I believe it is my duty as spokesman for the Indians in the riding of Skeena, or at least for that large part of them who are taking an interest in these matters, to express our sincere thanks to the present Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) generally for the patience, genuine good will and sincerity which he is bringing to the whole question of the Indian Act, and specifically for calling the conference which he called from February 28 to March 3 and discussing not just Indian problems but Indian legislation with the Indians themselves.

I want to mention one other thing, Mr. Speaker, and then I am finished. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) referred in passing to a situation which did exist, and I believe still does, in New Zealand. By his reference I do not know whether he meant to imply that we should give that matter serious consideration here; I hope not. The matter of parliamentary representation for the Indians comes under the Dominion Elections Act and not under the Indian Act. So far as the natives of New Zealand were given the vote, they were given the right to elect four, I think it is, members at large to sit in the house of parliament representing them. That idea appealed to me some time ago and I discussed it with many of our more enlightened Indians who are still on reserves in British Columbia. They told me that is the last thing they would like to see introduced in Canada. By so doing we would by statute perpetuate a differentiation in citizenship, something which is the last thing the progressive Indian wants to see.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I want to take part briefly in the discussion relating to the amendments to the Indian Act. This is one of the problems to which there does not seem to be any definite solution. As one other hon. member has said, regardless of what you do, there will be certain ones who will not be satisfied. The suggestions I make this afternoon are not made in a critical way at all. I put them forward as suggestions in the hope that possibly through the act or the regulations under the act there will be improvement in the relations between ourselves and the Indians, and a betterment of conditions among the various tribes and bands in the country.

I think the minister was well advised when he laid over the amendment of the act until this session of the house. All parties were given an opportunity to look into it still further and those who are interested in Indian affairs were given the opportunity to have representations made to the minister.

I happen to live near a reservation and I know a considerable number of the Indians. Last week a delegation came over to see me. They said that, as far as the Indian Act was concerned, it was applying democracy in a left-handed manner. By that they meant, "we have this forced on us." That is democracy such as the totalitarian states have. I think the minister should keep that consideration in mind in the working out of the regulations under the act.

Another interesting thing that came to my attention was the fact that in 1885 the Indians were given the franchise or the vote. That is the first time. All Indians east of the province of Manitoba were given the franchise. If you look back into history you will find that was in the days of Sir John A. Macdonald. If you go into the matter still further, you will find that in 1898 they were denied the right to vote and that situation has continued until this day except in certain cases where Indians have been in the armed forces. In 1898 you will recall that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in power. Those Indians who were talking to me have not forgotten that.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): 1898.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The minister waves his hand, but those Indians have not forgotten that. I looked the matter up in the guide and find that such is the case. In two wars they were expected to fight for the country and they did so creditably. But after they return they find that, as far as their band is concerned, they are just back where they were. That remark does not apply of course to pensions and other benefits under the veterans charter but it does apply to their status in the community. I am told that in the United States all Indians are privileged to vote in a general election.

Years ago there were disputes as to the rights of Indians freely to cross the border between the United States and Canada. I believe this was dealt with in what is referred to as the Jay treaty. But finally after many years the Indians have again been given the right to cross and recross the border freely. But some peculiar things have happened. One of them is that the Indians in my area will go across to Detroit in Michigan and secure employment; they will purchase a car which will have a Michigan licence on it. When they enter Canada, if they are not going to stay for more than a day or two, that is all right. But if they are going to stay for any length of time, they are given a permit card and they go to the reservation and are not allowed to use their car for business or pleasure while they are there. When an American tourist comes to this country, driving a United States car with a United States licence on it, he can go anywhere he likes. We welcome him for the United States dollars he brings to this country. But the Indian is not given that right.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): He is not a tourist.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): They feel that they are discriminated against. That is what actually happens. They are actually tied up. Some of those who have spoken previously have mentioned clause 4. The hon. member for Skeena pointed out that there had to be certain restrictions and that they could not very well be removed. As with most acts, I find that the source of difficulty is not so much with the act itself but with the regulations under the act and the administration of the act. Probably much of the difficulty—I do not like to call it ill feeling—that arises between the Indians and the department arises out of the administration of the regulations under the act. You will find that in one area many difficulties arise, and in another area everything goes along smoothly. I think in many instances it comes back to the man who is in charge of the administration.

Then, again, the Indian has no recourse to law. The Indian affairs branch is judge and jury. Provision should be made so that a band of Indians should have recourse to the courts and to the laws in the disputes between the department—

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): They have always had that.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): That is not what they told me. Perhaps I was misinformed.

An hon. Member: The wrong man told you.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): He was an Indian, anyway. Most Indians whom I know drive old cars. They are warned to get these cars off the road because they are a menace to traffic. I think if hon. members look back over the records of traffic accidents in Ontario they will find that Indians have an enviable record as far as traffic records are concerned. It is not always the man with the old car who is causing the accidents. It is someone with a fast car but lacking judgment who is causing the accidents. Therefore I think we should look into it a little more carefully and find out just how far we can go in telling these people what kind of a car they can drive and how old it should be. Some discretion should be used in that regard.

The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) mentioned pensions. That is something that should be taken care of and dealt with right away. The men of this country, especially the Indians, are just as much entitled to pensions as anyone else. Then I hear that discretion is used by the department as to the other allowances that are paid to the Indians, and that they are not always paid directly to the Indians. It is left to the discretion of the superintendent as to how that money is to be disposed of. Probably that is advisable in some instances. The individual Indian has no one to whom he can go to get that corrected. He is the victim of circumstances, and therefore he feels a bit of resentment toward the department. Education along the proper lines is probably the greatest solution and the most desirable thing to have so far as the Indians are concerned.

May I point out the attitude taken and the conclusions that are arrived at by some people? The government is administering the affairs of the Indians. The delegation that came to see me wanted to know about the C.C.F. I said to them: They believe that the government should own and control all the means of production. They said: If they do not control it any better than they do the Indian affairs branch, why, God forbid.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, a good deal of light has been thrown upon the position of the Indians this afternoon, particularly by the hon. member who said that you could not make a rule to apply to Indians in one part of the country and expect it to apply to individual Indians in another part of the country. Up in the northern part of the Dominion of Canada there are Indians who today are living in a very primitive state, who are not settled down. They travel about the country. Their employment is seasonal. They fish during one season and hunt and trap during another season. Certain of those tribes are continuously on the move; therefore it would be very difficult to establish day schools, for instance, in that part of the country and expect the children to go to school as the white children do in Ontario or elsewhere with their school bags under their arms and then come home in the evening to mother to have their suppers, and so forth. You cannot make such rules in that part of the country.

And yet, in south Cariboo on the Fraser river you will find Indians well settled, tilling farms and conducting business in a very proper manner. You will find that these people have good incomes and good homes. I know of one group who grew tomatoes last season near Lillooet and received $400 per acre net profit on the production of that particular crop. I know of one settlement down on Seton lake in the south Cariboo country where the Indians have electric lights in their homes, and many of them have modern homes and live on standards quite equal to that of the whites.

How then can you make a rule that will apply to all of these people? There are some 3,000 of them in the riding which I represent. In the southern part, as I have said, many of them are prosperous. They do cattle ranching and conduct saw mills. They have co-operative activities in agriculture; they have co-operative stores; and it all comes about largely through the good management that this government has shown in that regard.

Day schools have been established. In my own lifetime I have seen these people emerge and progress and come up to a very good standard of citizenship in that part of our Cariboo country.

We hear a good deal of weeping about the sad plight of our Indians. Great sympathy is shown here and there. I often think they are crocodile tears, because the Indian does not require so much of our commiseration, so much of our sympathy. Somebody referred to Sir John A. Macdonald, who was the prime minister of Canada, seeking an amendment to the Indian Act. At that time, in 1878, he proposed that the Indian be given the vote. Well, fortunately there were Liberals in the house at that time. One prominent Liberal rose and said: "Mr. Speaker, if you give them the vote they will just quit the scalping party and come over to the polling booth." At that time the Indians in the western part of the country particularly were living under very primitive conditions. They were savages in the truest sense. They engaged in tribal wars. They still held "scalping parties." In the annals of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police of the last few years there are reports of cannibalism up in the north, where people were reduced to poverty through bad weather and so forth. I was speaking to a man who was very well informed on this subject and he said that in the Fraser valley not very many years ago tribal wars were still going on; although the white man was there with his police and so forth, rival tribes fell upon each other and inflicted casualties whenever the opportunity arose.

As I say, they are emerging and have emerged in one or two generations from a condition of primitive people. To whom should the credit be given for lifting them up? I am speaking of my own part of the country. The credit must very largely be given to ministers of religion who worked so diligently with these people on the Mackenzie river, on the Peace river and on the Fraser river, to open up hospitals, schools and missions and to guide and help those people to the position in which they are today. As I have said, they are emerging very rapidly to a place of equality with the rest of the Canadian people. I regret I have heard in the house disparaging remarks regarding the part religion has played in the affairs of the Indians. I say the Christian missionaries who went into that country rendered a great service to Canada and the world.

When I make that statement I am not limiting it to any one denomination. I think of the work of the Anglican church on the south Fraser river. I think of their opening schools such as the one at Lytton where several hundred Indians are in residence. I think of men like the late Rev. Archdeacon E. W. W. Pugh who came from Cambridge as a medical missionary, and who practically gave his life for the service of those people.

That was in the lower part of the Cariboo. Then, in the north the work was taken over by the Oblate missionaries. The history of the service given by the Oblate Fathers to the Indian tribes is one of the most inspiring in the history of our country. It is going on today, and it has been going on for more than eighty years. Those missionaries are giving their lives in the conducting of schools and hospitals, and in the giving of other services to Indians. All this is being done without hope of reward, save the possibility of a crown of glory in the life hereafter.

Right up on the Cariboo highway at Fort Nelson only two winters ago Rev. Father Levesque, an Oblate missionary, went into the wilds to rescue an Indian family. He drove his dog team about eighty miles to bring service and help to those people. He froze his feet rendering that service and, as a result of it, is maimed for life. Such unselfish service is going on continuously in the part of the country I represent. I might state that Father Levesque is now in the Royal Canadian Air Force and, fortunately, is able to act as padre.

My mind turns to the Sisters of Religion at Williams Lake in the Cariboo, who conduct a hospital up there. These are Indian women of culture and education, and they take their places along with those doing similar work of any denomination or any racial group.

I think of Father A. G. Morice, who was up in Fraser Lake, at Stuart lake and at Fort St. James; of Father Lacombe, Father Seguin, and others like Father Mulvihill who is a missionary at Lejac today. I think of Rev. Father Patterson, O.M.I. of Lillooet, a native son of Perth county, Ontario, who is today assisting in organizing the co-operatives I mentioned, and in setting up credit unions and assisting Indians in co-operative saw mill and stores enterprises. In other words, he is assisting them in a material way as well as spiritually to attain their proper place in the life of the country.

I say that in bringing in this bill the minister is rendering a great service to Canada. Sir John A. Macdonald was not of the party to which I belong, but in his day he rendered heroic service. I see today a promising future for the minister who follows in the steps of great Canadian statesmen and now brings forward such progressive legislation for the benefit of the Indians and all the Canadian people.

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a few moments before the bill goes to committee. I was pleased with the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when he referred to the number of Indian people who have made a real contribution to Canadian life.

I see the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) in his seat. I have no doubt the minister will be well aware of one of them as an official high up in his department who has rendered a real service and is a credit to the civil service of Canada. That man, who is serving in the minister's department, is Mr. Gilbert Monture who, I know, is recognized as an authority on minerals in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

I am happy that the minister has given an extension of time for the discussion of the bill because, in looking over it, there are one or two points I find I should like to bring to his attention. Perhaps it might be done more effectively at this time than when the bill goes before the committee.

The minister has said that the Indians will be given control of their affairs when they demonstrate their ability to do so. To my mind this is an excellent approach to the problem. In the matter of the location of roads, the administration of estates of deceased persons, the handling of wills and matters of that kind the Indians can give valuable advice to the minister because they are familiar with local conditions.

It is true that many sections of the bill provide that, at the discretion of the minister, band councils are to be consulted. However, there are still several sections in which that provision does not appear, and where I think it should be included. Those sections lack the statutory authority which means so much to the Indian people. They know that if it is included in the act and brought into effect they will be recognized and be given the proper consideration.

At this point I should like to voice my objection to section 4(2)(a) and 4(2)(b). I believe that, upon reflection, the minister will agree that it does violate the principles of good citizenship, and that it is contrary to constitutional law.

All hon. members are familiar with the many sacrifices made by the Indians in the two great wars. I know that from the Six Nations Indians, located close to my home, there were five hundred who enlisted for active service. The records of those men compare favourably with those of others who took part in the war effort. I say the minister would be making a real contribution to the Indian people if he were to make provision whereby Indians could have a voice in the government of our country, without at the same time losing their identity and rights as Indians. We as Canadians are always deeply concerned about any infringement upon our rights and freedoms. I do feel that in all these matters set out in the bill we must make sure that the Indians are given proper consideration in the affairs on which the government of our country legislates.

Mr. H. H. Hatfield (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that a measure is being offered to improve the conditions of Indians on reserves. I support the request of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) that a commission or a committee be set up to investigate Indian reserves throughout Canada. In my view the committee headed by the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) did good work in travelling throughout eastern Canada.

There are two Indian reservations in my constituency. Let me put on record the fact that the Indians of eastern Canada depend for relief upon a vote by this parliament. They have no treaty money, as do the Indians in western Canada. The Indians in the west are preferred, just as are the white people. They are a preferred class—as was clearly indicated when, before Easter, approval was given to the $65 million bonus to western farmers.

I should like to place on record the scale of the monthly ration for Indians on relief. Each adult Indian can receive flour to the value of $1.44 a month; rolled oats, 54 cents; baking powder, 30 cents; tea, $1; sugar, 22 cents; lard, 69 cents; beans, 50 cents; rice, 40 cents; cheese, 48 cents; and meat or fish, $1. Hon. members all know what one dollar will buy by way of meat or fish in a month's time. Then he is allowed ten cents' worth of salt and ten cents' worth of matches. That is all one Indian adult is allowed for a month, and it comes to $6.77. Two adult Indians are allowed $11.11 for a month. Three adult Indians are allowed $14.30. Four adult Indians are allowed $16.76. Five adult Indians are allowed $19.09. Six adult Indians are allowed $22.54, and nine adult Indians are allowed $34.30 per month. You will notice that in this ration there are no vegetables of any kind.

An hon. Member: No potatoes.

Mr. Hatfield: There is no butter, milk or eggs. In my constituency there are lots of potatoes that are selling cheaply. There were a great many Indians on relief in that reserve a year ago. They were out of work. Many young returned veterans could not get work. Potatoes were cheap. They could be bought for 50 cents a bag of 75 pounds. Yet the agent was not allowed to give them a potato. One adult Indian could buy 40 cents' worth of rice for a month's time, but he was not allowed to have potatoes. Children were not allowed to have milk, eggs or butter. I think the scale of monthly rations issued in Ottawa by the superintendent of welfare and training is disgraceful. It should be revised.

The Indian chief advised me that a sick Indian on his reserve, Simon Paul, had six children and is only allowed $16 per month to feed his wife and the six small children. I consider that is a disgrace. I would ask the minister to look into the question of the ration allowed Indians in eastern Canada. The answer I was given by the superintendent of welfare and training was that the Indians were supposed to grow their own vegetables. They have land on the reserve but very few of them put in a garden. If they are on relief they are not supplied with seed to grow their own vegetables, and I think they should be. When there is a large reserve with plenty of land they should be helped. A man experienced in agriculture should be put in charge of the land and the Indians should be shown how to grow their own vegetables. They should be able to grow enough vegetables on this reserve to feed all the Indians, and vegetables are the cheapest and best food that they can use.

I would impress upon the minister that he should have the regulations changed, and that on large reserves someone should be in charge of agriculture. Someone should teach the young Indians how to put in gardens and how to grow enough vegetables for their own use. I hope the amended act will be an improvement. I still submit that there should be a committee or commission to travel throughout the country looking into these different matters on the reserves.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since the principle of the measure before the house is what is under discussion, I think it is appropriate to say something about the principle which is really inherent in what we are now discussing. Complimentary things have been said about the approach that has been made to this subject. To the extent that we accept the continuance of the present relationship between our native Indian population and the rest of the Canadian people, the statement of the minister was a commendable expression of friendship toward the descendants of the original citizens of the area that is now Canada. He indicated a desire to meet them, to hear their point of view and to improve the law now in force.

It seems to me, however, that we should have something more in mind. In so far as one can establish a principle under discussion at the moment, that principle is that we shall continue the existing relationship of the Indian to the state. In many ways the bill represents an improvement both in the approach to the problem of the Indian and in the administrative procedure that will be brought into effect, subject to the reservation that I think section 4 is a most improper one having regard to what can be done thereunder no matter what the minister may intend to do. Nevertheless it seems to me that there is something lacking in our approach to this subject, and that it is something not only of concern to the native Indian population but also of very great concern to every Canadian who believes in the principles of individual freedom which we are asserting so continually at this particular time.

I do not think that we have any right to be satisfied with the bill. When I say that I am not suggesting that the bill may not be a great improvement over the legislation now on the statute books. What I am suggesting is that every one of us as a Canadian should feel much less than satisfied that at this point in the history of Canada we should still be dealing with a very large number of people in this country as a people with less than the regular rights of citizenship. Surely, if we are going to join in declarations that every individual throughout the world has the right to equality the place for us to start that discussion is right here at home. If it is wise for us to urge the extension of equality to the peoples of other lands, let us in this parliament assert that principle in dealing with the descendants of the original citizens of the country that we are trying to build and advance in every way within our power.

I do not believe that we should be satisfied until we can say with conviction that every Indian child has the same chance of education and advancement as every other Canadian child. Surely no one will suggest that with the passing of the bill now before us or even with such improvements as may emerge by way of amendment, with its present form and structure, we shall have even approached a point where we can declare that we have extended to the young children of native Indian blood that measure of equality which is the hall-mark of democracy itself.

Surely what we should ask ourselves is not whether it is advancing the cause of the Indians in Canada, but whether we as Canadians are satisfied to have from 130,000 to 140,000 people continuing to live in this country with less than the basic rights of citizenship which we have joined in declaring through the United Nations to be the right of human beings everywhere. In saying this I am questioning neither the motives nor the attitude of the minister towards those people with whom this legislation will deal. The drafting of the act will depend upon how we approach this subject. From the fact that this bill has been presented as a government measure and will now be referred to a committee, with whatever improvement may be made there, it is obvious that what is under contemplation is a measure that perpetuates a situation which should not be satisfactory to any Canadian today. In giving this bill second reading and referring it to a committee where further discussion may take place and improvements may be made, I do hope there will be in the minds of the members of this house the hope that before long we shall achieve that measure of advancement in regard to this matter which will bring the Indians fully within the citizenship of Canada.

There is nothing in the mind of any young Indian which prevents him from absorbing education and becoming successful in this country. We have seen evidence, which has been referred to already, of the great success of educated Indians in the ordinary professional and other activities of this country. There are many examples of great achievements in the peaceful occupations of Canada. And we should remember that during the years of war the Indians of this country did their full share in preserving that freedom which should be their heritage as well as the heritage of every Canadian. They showed themselves gallant and skilled on the field of battle. They showed themselves responsible and reliable. The Indians themselves have demonstrated that if we lay the foundation for full citizenship they will be worthy of the opportunity we give them.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): If I have unanimous consent of the house to revert to motions I should like to move:

That a special committee be appointed to consider Bill No. 79, an act respecting Indians, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time; and that the committee consist of members to be appointed later, and that standing order 65(1) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce) moved:

That Bill No. 79, an act respecting Indians, be referred to the special committee appointed to consider the bill.

Motion agreed to.

VALLEYFIELD BRIDGE

PROVISION FOR CONSTRUCTION AND MAINTENANCE

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. 148, respecting the construction and maintenance of a bridge over the St. Lawrence river at or near the town of Valleyfield, in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

YUKON ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE THE NUMBER OF MEMBERS OF THE TERRITORIAL COUNCIL

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to increase the number of members of the Yukon territorial council from three to five.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Winters thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 188, to amend the Yukon Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR ELECTED REPRESENTATION IN TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT AND APPOINTMENT OF JUDICIAL OFFICERS

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide elected representation in the territorial government for the population of the Northwest Territories and to give the governor in council power to appoint judicial officers for the said territories.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, since 1905 the Northwest Territories have been administered by a commissioner appointed by the governor in council, acting on instructions from time to time given to him by the governor in council or the minister. The Northwest Territories Act now provides for a council of six members to aid the commissioner in the administration of the territories. All the members are appointed by the governor in council. This is the form of government that has existed since 1921.

With the increase in population and the development of the territories, it is considered that there should be some elected representatives in the council. It is intended, therefore, to enlarge the council to eight members, of whom three shall be elected and five appointed. Provisions are contained in the bill to authorize the establishment of three electoral districts to be represented by three elected members. There are several other minor amendments in the bill, the most important one being the granting of authority for the appointment of sheriffs.

Mr. J. A. Simmons (Yukon-Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity of saying a few words in support of the bill which will be introduced. For administration purposes the Northwest Territories were divided into three districts, namely, Mackenzie, Keewatin and Franklin, by order in council of March 16, 1918. In accordance with the Northwest Territories Act, the Northwest Territories are governed by a commissioner, a deputy commissioner, and five councillors appointed by the governor in council and operating from Ottawa. The commissioner and council have power to make ordinances for the government of the territory under instructions from the governor in council or the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), subject to any act of the parliament of Canada applying to the territories.

Prior to confederation the land now known as the Northwest Territories was governed by the Hudson's Bay Company, and it was transferred to Canada on July 15, 1870. Upon the creation of the province of Manitoba in 1870, a single lieutenant governor performed the offices of the crown for the province and exercised a personal rule over the Northwest Territories under the direction of the federal government. He was assisted in the administration of the territories by a council not exceeding fifteen nor less than seven persons appointed by order in council. The Northwest Territories Act of 1875 provided for the administration of the territories by a resident lieutenant governor, assisted by a council of not more than five persons appointed by the governor in council, and all other members elected according to population. There were many changes in the form and size of the Northwest Territories council or legislative assembly in the succeeding years leading up to the creation of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta in 1905.

During the years 1876 and 1877 the seat of government was at Livingston on Swan river. The capital was then transferred to Battleford where it remained until 1882, when Regina became the capital and remained so until the creation of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta in 1905. Following that, the capital was transferred to Ottawa. Since 1905 the territories have been administered by a commissioner acting under instructions of the governor in council or the Department of Resources and Development, or its preceding departments.

The commissioner has been aided by a council which, up to 1921, did not exceed four persons, and which since 1921 has not exceeded six persons. It will be noted that the Northwest Territories has been governed since 1905 by a commissioner, who was aided by a body of appointed councillors, situated at Ottawa. The great proportion of these councillors have been civil servants. No matter how able and sincere these councillors have been, this form of government is not democratic. Can you imagine eastern Ontario being governed by an appointed body of men residing and meeting on Vancouver island?

Our people feel that, while the present administrations are good and composed of able and conscientious men, the council is not in a position to deal with many of the problems of the territories as well as a similar body of elected members resident in the territories, and that in the very near future we should have responsible government throughout in keeping with the Canadian tradition of responsible government. It is admitted that the revenue found in the Northwest Territories has not been sufficient to defray the expenses of government, and the population has not been large enough to carry the cost of governmental machinery. For many years the population consisted predominantly of nomadic Indians and Eskimos, who made their living by hunting and trapping.

Since the 1920's, and especially since the end of world war II, there has been a considerable change in the situation. Industry and mining have moved into the territories, and I venture to say that many more will be moving in within the next few years to develop the vast mineral resources which are being discovered almost every day. There are the oil fields at Norman Wells along the Mackenzie river; the rich gold mines in the Yellowknife district; the uranium mine at Eldorado on Great Bear lake; the rich lead deposits at Pine Point on the south side of Great Slave lake, which I am hoping will lead to the construction of a railway; hydro developments at Fort Smith; and the nickel find at Ferguson lake in the Keewatin district. On Great Slave lake there is one of the largest inland fisheries in the world, resulting in a population of approximately 1,500 at Hay river. All this development has meant a large increase in population in the Mackenzie district.

It is about time that these Canadians were granted a form of local self-government similar to that enjoyed by Canadians in other parts of our country, and I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you will agree that the present form of appointed members to the Northwest Territories council can never be as good and efficient as local self-government. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) on introducing this bill. It is a move in the right direction towards giving complete local self-government to these people, which is the basis of our form of democracy.

I hope it will not be long before the people of the Mackenzie district of the Northwest Territories are governed in local matters by a wholly elected council which will meet in the territory, and which will consist of people who live in the territory, make their living there, and who have the interest and future of the territory at heart. This form of local self-government has worked well in the Yukon Territory for the last fifty years and more. For the life of me, I cannot see why it will not work as well in the Mackenzie district of the Northwest Territories.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Before the motion is dealt with, Mr. Speaker, there are one or two questions I should like to ask. I recognize that this matter can be dealt with effectively when the bill itself is before the house, but it seems to me that in dealing with this motion at the present time it might be desirable to have an explanation as to how the elected representatives are to be chosen and whether it is to be for limited areas or for the whole area of the Northwest Territories. The reason I raise that question is this. If it is to be for a limited area based upon a concentration of population, then we would have a system of election related to population on the one hand and on the other a system of appointment related to a recognition of the difficulty of getting an expression of opinion of the members. I think it would be helpful if we had some indication as to that at this stage.

Mr. Winters: I made a statement. I cannot speak again until we go into committee.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The minister could close the debate on the motion or he could answer the questions when we get into committee.

Mr. Drew: The only reason I was raising the point is this. It would indicate to us the basis upon which we were proceeding. Then when the bill came in we would have an idea of the basis on which it had been prepared in that respect.

Mr. Winters: Perhaps in the committee stage on the resolution I could answer those questions, as the house leader suggested.

Mr. Drew: In the committee stage of the resolution?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Drew: That would be satisfactory.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Winters: Perhaps I should first of all answer the questions asked by the leader of the opposition with respect to the contemplated method of having representation in the Northwest Territories. It is proposed to divide the Northwest Territories into three electoral districts centered about the centres of population at Norman Wells, at Yellowknife and Hay River. That would result in three general electoral districts, one with a boundary running north and south somewhere along the Mackenzie river; the others divided by a boundary running east and west somewhere between Yellowknife and Hay River, thereby using those three main concentrations of population as the general centres of the electoral districts that are being contemplated.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I ask the minister if this does not indicate that a new province shall soon be evolved in the Northwest Territories, as Alberta was in 1905? Within these Northwest Territories there is a great deal of opinion to the effect that it is about time that a new province was created in northern Canada.

Mr. Winters: Time effects a great many changes. The present resolution forecasts a bill which has regard to the growth of the Northwest Territories. It is the opinion of the government that the time has come to recognize that growth and to give to the people of the Northwest Territories some elected representation in the Northwest Territories council.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): From the speech of a member who spoke previously, I understand that we now have a commissioner with a council of eight; and if I rightly understood the matter, the commissioner is in the district itself. No, he is here also. They are all here.

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is proposed to do something which does not immediately make itself clear to me; that is to say, we are going to introduce self-government or at any rate make a step towards self-government by having three out of eight elected. How is the matter going to function? There will still be a commissioner, five members here in Ottawa and three elected in the territories. Will that be correct?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister say how that set-up will function? Will we have a parliament of the Northwest Territories sitting here in Ottawa? Will they come here? While I am on my feet, let me ask this question also. I can understand a selected group of eight, and I could understand an elected group of eight; I think also I could partly understand a group of eight, of which five might be elected. But I find it difficult to understand just what reality there is given to the principle of self-government by having three out of eight elected when those three will be several thousand miles away from Ottawa where, I would judge, the decisions will still be made.

Mr. Winters: The present constitution of the council is six members, one of whom is appointed as a resident of the Northwest Territories. It is proposed to increase the number to eight and to have three from the Northwest Territories, those three being elected. The remaining members will be appointed and it is likely that they will be from Ottawa as they are now; that is, prominent civil servants. At the present time the commission meets in Ottawa and the business of the government of the Northwest Territories is transacted here in Ottawa. By the bill which will be introduced later it is contemplated to have at least one meeting each year of the Northwest Territories council held in the Northwest Territories; this should have some advantages which I am sure are evident to all hon. members.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I ask the minister how long he thinks it will take before it will be possible to have a body similar to the present Yukon council; that is, add to the membership of it and bring it abreast of the Yukon council?

Mr. Winters: That is something that will depend entirely upon developments and the growth of the Northwest Territories. It is something as to which I would not care to make any predictions at this time.

Mr. Simmons: Is it the intention of the government to increase the number of the elected members of the council from year to year until such time as they eventually reach the stage of fully elected government similar to the Yukon Territory?

Mr. Winters: The whole purpose of this legislation is to tend toward elected representation. I would say that as the territories grow and develop, the trend in that direction will continue. Just when there will be a fully elected government in the Northwest Territories is something that will have to wait on the development of the territories.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): It has been Liberal policy to set up self-governing groups of this kind. The government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier of course proposed the creation of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and in 1905 that proposal was carried out. But it was only incidental to a general policy of settlement and development of the west. Sir Wilfrid, with his able lieutenant, Sir Clifford Sifton, who was at that time the minister of the department which dealt with matters now under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Resources and Development, outlined a big immigration policy. People were invited to come into the northwest to take the free land that was offered them and to share in the opportunities of that great country. The Liberals carried out that policy. But of recent years there has been a hesitancy about bringing in new people. Up in that country to which we are referring now there is opportunity for a great many new settlements all over the place, and it is a matter not only of local but of national interest—and of even international interest—that we should invite people to come into that country to settle and to share in the opportunities which were so ably outlined by the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River.

The oil resources there are very wide; their limits are unknown, and yet the oil at Norman Wells is not being used today save on the river for local consumption. Then there is the fact that we have the greatest uranium deposits in the world there; there are great resources of gold at Yellowknife and elsewhere, and there are large areas of timber, and fish, and everything that an empire needs. And yet in the Northwest Territories we have a very scattered population. I hope to see something done about putting new population in there and creating in the north a province similar to Alberta. I would prophesy that such a province some day would be wealthier than any of the other ten provinces of Canada.

Mr. Knight: The administration at the moment is in the hands of a council of which only one member is a resident of the territories, as I understood the minister. That would mean, I presume, that he lives at Ottawa to carry on his business. Does he travel back and forth as a member of parliament does? Is the council made up of a majority of non-residents; that is to say, roughly, top civil servants, who live in Ottawa? There must be advisers or an advisory committee of residents. Can the minister tell me whether he has such an advisory committee? If so, of whom does it consist? How is it appointed?

Mr. Winters: The member of the Northwest Territories council, appointed from the Northwest Territories, resides in the Northwest Territories and he travels here to Ottawa for meetings of the commission. There is no advisory committee as such.

Mr. Knight: In that case this council whose members are resident in Ottawa must have advice from local people in the territory, whether there is an official advisory committee or not. Otherwise, how could they administer a country from which they have no advisers? Is there any regular advice, not official advisers, I mean, as individuals?

Mr. Winters: We have of course a very good elected representative from the Northwest Territories and the Yukon sitting in the house at the present time, namely, the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River, with whom I had the privilege of touring the greater part of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon last summer. There is, moreover, a very capable body of civil servants, many of whom spend their full time in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, and who, of course, provide the council with information on various subjects from time to time.

Mr. Fraser: How long will these three people be elected for, for one year, two years or three years? What is the term, or does it vary?

Mr. Winters: That is covered in the bill. I have not the bill before me, but speaking from memory now, the period is for three years.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have two more questions. What is the population of the territories now? Have the members of the council who reside in Ottawa had experience of that area from living there, or do they have to be briefed—may I put it that way—by civil servants who are there now? In other words, have we in Ottawa people who in the course of their career have acquired knowledge of that territory?

Mr. Winters: There are on the commission people who have acquired knowledge by virtue of the fact that they have lived in the north, and there are others who, I presume, have to be briefed, as the hon. member has said.

The population of the Northwest Territories at the present time, based on an estimate, is about 15,500 people. That is only an estimate. The last census in 1941 showed a population of 12,028.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I refer to the great investment that the people of Canada already have there? The Alaska highway penetrates the northern country. It is an excellent highway. It is really an international highway. There are airfields which were constructed, of course, under the defence plan. Very valuable airfields exist there and are available for civilian use. Extensive telegraph lines have been constructed throughout the north. Alaska, our neighbour, being under the United States flag, of course, is now considering statehood. They are to be brought into the American union as the forty-ninth state. Alaska is a very great hive of industry. Settlers are coming in there over the Alaska highway. The place is being developed. Extensive defensive measures are being developed there, of course. The attitude of the United States is to develop Alaska, to develop her industries, her timber, her fisheries, her mines and so forth. Therefore we Canadians should be abreast of our United States friends and see that this northwest country is not neglected, but that everything is done to parallel what is being done in Alaska in promoting settlement and prosperity in that part of America.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Winters thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 189, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND LIFE OF ACT UNTIL JULY 31, 1954

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 130, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fraser: Is the parliamentary assistant going to make a statement?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, as soon as he has an opportunity.

Mr. Fraser: That remark is unnecessary.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the bill before the house is comparatively simple, but since, among other things, it provides for the extension of the life of the Export and Import Permits Act, perhaps it would be appropriate for me, and the house would wish me, to say a few words about that act, and to give some information with respect to it and to the operations under it, as well as to deal with the provisions of the bill itself.

Hon. members will recall that export control was established under the authority of the War Measures Act in 1941, and with the ending of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act legislation was brought forward in 1947 and the Export and Import Permits Act was passed in that year, having at that time a provision in the act itself for termination in 1948. In 1948 the bill was amended and the life of the act was extended until 1950. In 1949 the life of the act was again extended until July 31, 1951, so that the present act would expire on July 31, 1951, unless extended. During all this period a continuing effort was maintained to remove items from control as quickly as the necessity for their control disappeared. At the end of the war there were 1,100 items under export control.

By October, 1950, this number had been reduced to 82 items. Unfortunately however since that time it has been necessary again to place certain items under export control. This has been by reason of the well known developments on the international scene. It was done both for domestic supply reasons within Canada and also for the reason that it was desirable to prevent this country's serving as a back door for exports from the United States. As hon. members know, there is a free flow of material from the United States to Canada, and it was necessary to prevent that freedom being used as an indirect method of exporting United States goods from that country contrary to their export control legislation.

Commodities fall within three broad classifications for export control purposes. The first list covers items under control for all destinations and includes all items on which it is necessary to restrict or deny movement to the United States to maintain adequate domestic supply within Canada. It will be appreciated that in the type of article affected, such as scrap materials, it could easily happen that this Canadian market could be denuded if export controls were not maintained against the United States as well as all other countries.

List No. 2 is a list of items under export control to destinations other than the United States, and comprises those items which may be in short supply, and also a large number of strategic materials. Commodities within this group may move freely between Canada and the United States, but they cannot be exported without licence to other destinations from either country. An illustration of this might be raw cotton, which moves from the United States to Canada without restriction, but which the United States and Canada have under export control to other destinations.

The third list is a list of countries exports to which require permits, or to which there is a general control of exports required. It is true that there is a very small list of items for export to these countries that is exempt. However, that list is quite small, and the items in it have no strategic significance whatever. This area control at present affects exports only, and does not affect imports.

The export powers under the existing act may be summarized under four headings. Those four headings are:

(a) To establish a list of countries, exports to which shall be subject to licence.

(b) To control exports of arms, munitions, war materials or supplies.

(c) To control exports of commodities where this is necessary to ensure adequate supply and distribution within Canada, and

(d) To control exports where this is necessary to implement inter-governmental arrangements or commitments.

So much for the exports part of the existing legislation.

Then, as to imports: When the act was passed initially in 1947, there were one hundred items under import control. These had been reduced to the point where at the end of 1950 no items were left under import control. Since the first of the year it has been necessary again to bring some items under import control. These are basic steel products on which control was imposed in order to direct the flow of imported steel into essential uses in compliance with the minister's orders issued under the Essential Materials (Defence) Act.

The authority or powers under the existing act, as they affect imports, may be subdivided into two headings:

(a) To regulate or control the import of commodities subject to allocation by inter-governmental arrangement, governmental controls in the country of origin or scarcity in the world markets, and

(b) To control imports where the price of the commodity is supported within the Canadian market, under existing legislation.

The purpose of the amendments in the bill before the house may be set out briefly under three subheadings. The first is to extend the life of the act for three years, until July 31, 1954. I may add that a provision in that respect in the bill as originally drafted and submitted to parliament made provision for extension for five years. In the other place that was reduced to three years, and the bill now before the house makes provision for an extension for three years.

Secondly, the bill empowers the governor in council to establish a list of countries, imports from which may be controlled, in order to enable Canada to implement obligations which may be incurred through international action. Hon. members will recall how some months ago there was discussion of international action which would affect imports as well as exports. We had no authority under any existing legislation to implement such a policy, had we agreed to it or had there been any international action making it desirable or necessary.

Then the third authority set out in the bill is that for imposing import controls where the production, supply, distribution or use of the article is restricted or otherwise regulated under the authority of any act of parliament. As an illustration, if it becomes necessary to regulate or prohibit the manufacture or distribution of certain products, it will be apparent to hon. members that it would be desirable to be able to exercise a similar control over an import trade in the same products. That can arise as the defence preparedness program accelerates in pace.

While the bill before the house is brief, and while, with the exception of the last point mentioned, it involves no new principle, perhaps I could supply any additional information required when we are in committee. If it is required, I shall be glad to give it.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make some comments about this bill to amend the Export and Import Permits Act. Here we have another control measure which is being placed before us because of the situation in which we find ourselves. This measure is really ancillary to the broader measures which we have already had before us during this session. It represents a considerable extension of the measure which we have had on the statute books under the same name since 1947, in particular because this bill now asks for authority to control imports on a country basis as well as on a commodity basis. As I say, it is a bill involving a great extension and before I take my seat I propose to move an amendment that the bill be sent to a committee so that its effect may be studied. I suggest that the extensions which are being made are of great importance. When the act was made law four years ago it was considered carefully by a committee.

One of the things to which I wish to draw particular attention is that this measure has been used—I think it is desirable that we should know whether it is proposed to be used again—for purposes of discrimination. Let me hasten to say that I do not use that word in any sinister sense at all. I merely mean that the control powers have been used, as I shall show in a minute, to enable controllers to determine that Manufacturer A is more worthy of getting import materials than Manufacturer B. That is one reason why I think it is desirable that this measure should go to a committee. Then that aspect of the matter can be considered.

In order to make clear what I mean by that I should like to read briefly from the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee of 1947 when this act was first considered. What I am proposing to show is what I indicated a moment ago, that the powers have been used for the purposes of discriminating and judging that this manufacturer is more worthy of getting material than that manufacturer. Lest I forget, let me say that the civil servants who came before that committee won the respect and admiration of us all. It was perfectly evident that they were trying to do their job in a faithful and efficient manner. I am not criticizing them; rather I am criticizing the whole conception that these powers are being put in the hands of people, I do not care how good they are.

During the course of the evidence given by Mr. Bull the question of bench vises came up. I quote from the evidence given by Mr. Bull, as reported on page 295 of the proceedings:

> On this question of bench vises, applications have been turned down on bench vises fairly generally because the bench vise is an article of very simple manufacture.

Then later on:

> There is a minimum amount of machining going into a bench vise so that the price, on export, is not a great deal more than the price of the raw steel going into it. These vises are going to Holland where we never sold bench vises in the past and it is very doubtful if we will ever sell them in the future. We have difficulty competing in an article of simple manufacture. We usually do much better in a complex piece, such as a generator or a motor.

That outlines briefly the situation I am drawing attention to. I asked a question regarding it and then later Mr. Mackenzie, the deputy minister, made a statement which covered the point in a rather comprehensive manner. I quote from page 296 as follows:

> Mr. Mackenzie: May I say a word? I am speaking now not of any particular item but I am talking of the general policy of those unfortunate people who have to administer export permits. Where we have a very small supply to meet a large demand we have to make some decision and some choice because everybody's demands cannot be met. One of the guiding principles is that token shipments should go to those markets where it appears that there will be some continuing value. Mr. Bull pointed out that in the case of these items which require a very small amount of manufacturing in Canada, and are only one degree removed from the raw material, it is highly improbable that under more normal conditions, if those ever come, that we will be able to compete with manufacturers much closer to the markets. Under circumstances like that we would deliberately use our influence—
> Mr. Macdonnell: Power, not influence.
> Mr. Mackenzie: —to try to direct what limited supply there was to the markets where we thought there was some advantage.

I bring that before the house to indicate how powers taken for the purpose of controlling quantities can easily be used—I am perfectly sure in good faith—for the purpose of discriminating between one person and another. I hope that we can pursue this matter further when we get into committee because it seems to me to be dangerous in the highest degree that anyone should be asked to undertake the responsibility of making such a decision. The parliamentary assistant pointed out to us this afternoon what was satisfactory to hear, that the items under control under the old act had sunk to a very small number. But with the situation that has recently developed and our need for defence preparations, the number of articles under control will rise and have risen very substantially.

We should remember that we may be stepping into legislation which may go on for years and years. I suppose the best hope we can have is that it will go on for years and years because the alternative probably is war. When we remember that, it seems to me that these things should be carefully considered. I say again that this is discrimination, whether it is beneficial discrimination or not. Apparently we are giving the power to government officials to determine as between one person and another. They will have to have wisdom which I suggest is beyond all human wisdom. In addition they will have to be absolutely detached and impartial.

I should like to say a word or two about the public aspect of this. Do not think I deceive myself into believing that there is as yet any real apprehension on the part of the public as to the wide powers which parliament has granted. However, we in the opposition have questioned these powers because we consider it to be our duty to do so. I consider it to be my duty to go on trying to make people realize just what is happening, because it makes a very great deal of difference whether the public says to itself, "These arbitrary powers are things we do not like; nevertheless the situation is such that we must give them. But we will watch exactly how they are exercised, and we will be on guard to try to diminish them as soon as the situation warrants." That is one thing, but that is not the situation we have in this country at the moment, as far as I can see. There is very little evidence I can detect outside this house, and not very much inside it, to suggest that anyone fears these powers. Therefore I am going to take a few moments of the time of the house to stress this point and put on record one or two quotations from people who have thought deeply about these matters, in the hope that they may come to the attention of members of the public, perhaps leaders of public opinion, who may be impelled to do something about it.

When I say that, I recognize that broad powers have to be given at the moment. Without them we cannot meet the issues we are facing now. What I am hoping is that they can be given in a considered way, so that people will recognize that it is a dangerous thing to do, and it is only done when you are in danger so great that you have to give up liberties—temporarily, we hope—which have cost much in the winning. For that reason I propose to quote a sentence or two from a man whose name is very well known and whose opinions are highly regarded. I refer to Walter Lippmann, and I am quoting from page 332 of his book "The Good Society". He is speaking about arbitrary powers, and we must remember that these powers are arbitrary. Although the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said the other day, and I am sure sincerely, that these great and arbitrary powers would be used with moderation, nevertheless we should remind ourselves that even in the hands of good men powers are sometimes used for purposes for which they were not intended. It was not the wicked Hitler who began the use of arbitrary power in governing by decree in Germany; it was the good Brüning who began it. He was driven into it not because he wanted to but because he felt the circumstances warranted it, so it was he who really destroyed the German constitution, though he was a good and well-meaning man. Now I quote briefly from Lippmann:

> The idea of arbitrary power exercised at the wilful discretion of any man is alien to the very conception of a civilized society. It is the legalism of the barbarian, and the instinctive political philosophy of all who have not been disciplined to, or are in reaction against, the usages of civilization. For every man, until he has been taught differently, is predisposed to believe that what he wills should have the force of law.
> The struggle to subdue this primitive disposition is the age-old struggle against the barbarian.

I quote this passage from Lippmann, as I said, because of my feeling that it is our duty to try to make the people understand what is going on, so they will realize that the powers being given are far-reaching and could easily be very dangerous and harmful. I wish now to quote briefly from "The New Despotism" by Lord Hewart. At page 150 he quotes from a speech by the Master of the Rolls, who said that—> —time was when the great danger against which the judicature had to guard was the encroachments of the crown. Happily there was no longer that danger; but there was another danger which was more real than that—namely, encroachment by the executive.

As I say, I am bringing this to the attention of the house in order to get it on the record and call it to the attention of the people who also, I hope, may be led to reflect on these matters. Now I want to read just one other short passage from Lord Hewart, where he speaks about the delegation of authority and the position of the official who is endowed with these powers and exercises them. He says:

> More than that, it is his duty, as an official, to obey any instructions given him by his superiors, and, in the absence of special instructions, to further what he knows to be the policy of his department. His position makes it inevitable that he should be subject to political influences.

I do not think the writer means that the official himself will be directly subject to political influences. I think he means that you have this power in the hands of a minister; men being what they are, the minister is a politician, and in that way political influences are bound to come in.

As I pointed out in the case of a similar measure, if this power was being asked for a month, a year, or any short time, one would feel quite differently about it; but none of us believes that three years from now, when this measure comes up for renewal, there will not be the slightest chance of taking the legislation off the statute books, unless the situation has changed radically. Therefore I think it is proper and indeed inescapable that we should think about this in terms of something that may go on for many years, and which may become part of the whole fabric of special powers that we have constructed. When I imagine that going on for such a period of time it is almost impossible for me, at any rate, to believe that we will have a generation which even knows how to practise the arts of freedom, and I am speaking now about freedom in the realm of economic enterprise.

I do not think I need detain the house longer. For the reasons I have given I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard):

That the said bill be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce, with instructions that they have power to review the administration of export and import permits since May 14, 1947, and to consider and report to this house upon the scope of amending legislation sufficient and appropriate to provide for necessary import and export restrictions.

As I said in my opening remarks, I feel that the additional scope given this legislation in the bill now before us is of such importance that it would warrant consideration by a committee just as fully as consideration was warranted some four years ago, when the original bill came before us. I suggest the obvious advantage of such a committee is that we could make it available to interested citizens if there were any who wished to come and have the matter discussed. That is what was done four years ago, and it is for that reason I have moved the amendment.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think I should say something on this amendment. I must say I found a little difficulty in understanding the hon. member, for the reason that his remarks seemed to be directed to the desirability of having a committee, particularly the banking and commerce committee, look at the bill before the house, while the motion is in fact a repudiation of the bill. The motion as I have it is that the bill be not now read the second time, and it goes on to refer the subject matter to a committee. As I understood the remarks, there was an expression of the dislike for controls as such. I believe that dislike is widespread throughout Canada, and I believe on all sides of the house. There is common ground on that point.

The question of the principle in the bill is limited pretty well to the wisdom of its extending the Export and Import Permits Act for three years. The other questions, as to the language of the clauses and the proposed amendments, are proper subject matters for a committee, either of the whole house or the banking and commerce committee, as the case may be. In my opening remarks I did not indicate whether or not it was proposed to proceed in the committee of the whole or whether there would be a motion following the second reading to refer the bill to the banking and commerce committee. On the latter ground, of course, there is no objection whatever to having the bill referred to the banking and commerce committee, if it is thought by hon. members that is a more desirable way of examining the details of the bill. As I see it, however, there is every objection to repudiating the principle of the bill, and that is what is contained in the amendment moved by the hon. member. I therefore see no alternative but to oppose the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the amendment please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the amendment lost.

Amendment (Mr. Macdonnell, Greenwood) negatived.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the motion for second reading.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Establishment and publication of list of goods for export.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the parliamentary assistant give us a little more information than he gave this afternoon about the articles that are likely to come under control?

Mr. McIlraith: As I stated on second reading of the bill, we had no items under import control at the end of December. Since that time we have had to bring iron and steel items under import control, but that is the only item under import control at the present time. It is impossible to say with any degree of accuracy what items are likely to be brought under import control. There may be other metals of a similar nature, but there is nothing immediately contemplated. I do not want to be held too strictly to that commitment because the situation, so far as strategic metals are concerned, is changing rapidly. There is always a possibility of a change taking place.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the assistant explain further subsection 2 of clause 1 which is described in the sidenote as necessary to enable Canada to implement possible action by the United Nations organization.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps I could best elaborate on that by using an illustration. It will be recalled that some months ago when the whole Korean operation was being discussed at the United Nations, the wisdom of applying import controls against certain countries was then discussed. In this country we were in the position that had such a resolution been thought desirable and carried by the United Nations, there was no legislative machinery to provide for anything in the nature of area import controls. It is that type of situation that is envisaged. There is no intention at all of applying area import controls at this time, but again the world situation changes fairly rapidly.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would that be more in the nature of political sanctions than economic measures?

Mr. McIlraith: To a limited extent it would be, yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Could the assistant say anything concerning the point which I raised as to the previous operation of the control? I refer now to the evidence which I read from the banking and commerce committee of several years ago.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I think the explanation of that is somewhat difficult, because by its very nature any control involves at least discrimination in an academic sense. If you create a list of products for which an export permit is required under control legislation, then you have discriminated against the producers of those products. Unfortunately, in control legislation discrimination is involved in that academic sense. I believe the thing that has to be watched for is discrimination that is not of that academic nature, but discrimination between individuals of equal claim. I do not think there has been any suggestion of discrimination of that kind in the years that this control has been in operation. I do not think anyone on any side of the house has suggested discrimination as between individuals under this legislation.

There is, of course, and the hon. member quite properly raises the point, an authority that is arbitrary in its nature. I believe the only effective answer to that is that no one has yet come forward with another method of handling such a difficulty. Academically there is no doubt that there is authority for a discriminatory use of the power.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): But in the sense that I was putting it to the assistant, he will agree that there was discrimination because officials decided that material given to one manufacturer was more likely to be nationally useful than that given to another because his business was more likely to continue. Can the assistant say whether that kind of judgment will continue to be exercised? It does not seem to be necessarily inherent in the kind of control that we are talking about. There are other things which could be used as yardsticks, such as the history of the business and so on. Probably the assistant is more familiar with those than I am. What I do want to know is, are we going to have a continuation of the exercise of that judgment that one business shall have steel because it is more likely to be able to continue than another business?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, that type of discrimination is what we are constantly seeking to avoid. We are constantly seeking to avoid having the administrative officials in such a position, because it is unfair to them as well as to all others. I cannot say dogmatically that such authority will not ever be used, because in the very example used as a reference we are concerned with the production of a steel product. Steel is in extremely short supply and if export permits are granted I presume there will have to be an examination not only into where the steel is ultimately going but into the quantities involved and the value of the market; that is, the value from the point of view of maintaining the market for old customers. For instance, we had to keep supplying a few nails to the West Indies when we were short of them in this country. We certainly did not seek to export nails, because of the great shortage of wire rod and so on. It is quite true there is discrimination in favour of exporters exporting some nails to the West Indies, but that discrimination was exercised because that had been a traditional outlet and we had supplied that market with nails over a great number of years. I think all hon. members will agree that the only fair thing to do when we had kept that market supplied for a great number of years was to continue to keep it at least partially supplied. That of course involved discrimination against other exporters who might want to export another steel product to some other country.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Another question which was raised at the same time in the committee and which I did not read was a question raised by another member: whether in fact the exercise of judgment—I will call it that for the moment—did not almost inevitably tend to work, first, against the small exporter, as between him and the large one; and second, whether it did not almost tend to prohibit the inception of new businesses.

Mr. McIlraith: With respect to the first of the two questions, I would say that the exercise of that discretion does not tend to discriminate against the small business operator in favour of the larger one. There is not that difficulty as a practical administrative problem. There is a difficulty about the new business; that is, the business not yet formed, but which would normally be formed to go into the export field. In that second case there is a discrimination in favour of an established business.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Do you actually have to go further than that? Does it not make it almost impossible for a new business to be set up?

Mr. McIlraith: If the particular control involves total prohibition of the export of the product in question, it does, of course, if export trade is necessary in order to establish the business.

Mr. Hatfield: I should like to ask if the export permits will be issued in accordance with the previous business of the exporter.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. That is the point I just made, Mr. Chairman. When there is a quota, an attempt is made to issue permits on the basis of the previous business of the exporter.

Mr. Hatfield: What about the import of steel?

Mr. McIlraith: As to import control of steel, its primary purpose is to subject imported steel to the effect of the steel control order that prohibits the use of steel for certain types of construction. In the United States, from which country we import a great deal of steel, they have export control over steel but this export control is not applicable to Canada. With power to apply import control over the steel products we can direct them into the more essential uses and we can also avoid having export control made applicable to us from the United States.

Mr. Fraser: The idea is to limit exports to the United States and other countries of essential goods from here. Is that it? What I am getting at is a question I have asked many times in the house, namely with regard to nails. In the report that I have here I notice that 365 hundredweight of wire nails were shipped to the United States last year. We have a desperate shortage of nails at the present time and fewer nails were manufactured in Canada last year than the year before.

Mr. McIlraith: I thought I made that point clear in answer to a question a few days ago in the house, but I am afraid I have not done so. As will appear from the answer, the quantity of nails exported is slight. The nail operation to the United States involves a plant where the rod is shipped in from the United States, the wire is cut here, and a percentage of it is returned to the United States. In other words, while it is quite true that there is an export of nails to the United States, there is no loss to the Canadian market. It refers to a semi-finished product imported.

Mr. Fraser: There is between Canada and the United States, with regard to the rods coming in, an agreement to the effect that you must return so much to the United States. Is that the idea?

Mr. McIlraith: No. It is a matter of having the facilities of the plant fully used, and we get some net benefit out of it. There is actually no agreement with the United States on it, but there is quite a close liaison between the steel offices in the two countries.

Mr. Hatfield: Is there any arrangement between the control board in Canada and the control board in the United States with regard to imports?

Mr. McIlraith: The situation is simply this. We have our liaison in Washington, and we have working information and knowledge about each control they have on there. There is no specific arrangement as such, but we have knowledge of all these things; that is, we have day to day knowledge and liaison on such matters as steel and similar products that are crossing the border regularly and come under this legislation.

Mr. Hatfield: I had occasion to use some steel a few weeks ago and made a request to the steel controller, Mr. Harris, here in Canada. He turned me down. I was, however, able to buy that steel in the United States. Is there any arrangement whereby I can import that steel now I have bought it?

Mr. McIlraith: There is close examination before we permit the import into Canada of a product for a use which is prohibited in the United States.

Mr. Hatfield: It is not prohibited in the United States or I would not have bought it.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to have a look at that particular case again.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to come back again to a point which interests me and that is the danger—and the parliamentary assistant has not fully satisfied me on this point—that the small man is penalized as against the big man. A reference was made to that point in the evidence. I do not remember the exact words, but the tenor of the argument was that the bigger people, with their larger operation, could probably operate somewhat more economically than the smaller people and that therefore you sometimes had to prefer them over the smaller man. I regret that I have not here with me the exact wording of the argument—I have sent for the book—but that was the tenor of it. I think that would be a terribly unfortunate thing. I should like to hear something more about it.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not think there is much more I can say about that. It is perfectly obvious that if you are exporting a product and you cut down eighty per cent, a large manufacturer may be able to adapt his plant to the small output for export, and a smaller manufacturer may of course be hurt; but beyond that I have not, in my experience, run into any complaint of the small businessman as opposed to the large businessman. There does not seem to be any difficulty on that score. I am not aware of any.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Chairman. There is a point that arises in connection with the exchange of remarks that has been taking place which I think should receive the attention of the Prime Minister and the consideration of the house.

As I apprehend the practice, there is a well established custom that the minister of a department speaks on behalf of his department, and that there is a special reason for his giving certain explanations and undertakings related to the principle of joint cabinet responsibility. Without in any way questioning the capacity of any individual member to deal with any particular subject, I think a question is now raised that should be considered without our waiting any longer. So far as I am aware, this is only the second department in which the parliamentary assistant has dealt with legislation before the house, and, in the process of dealing with legislation before the house, has been called upon to give explanations and what would amount to undertakings that would, in the ordinary course of events, be regarded as binding the government as to its intention in relation to that legislation.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that there is a long established reason for ministers giving that explanation, which has no suggestion of a reflection on the capacity of any other individual member of the house, but it does relate to the fact that only ministers can speak for the government. In this particular instance we are dealing with very important legislation. It is apparent that the parliamentary assistant in this instance has taken pains to inform himself in regard to the details of the measure before the house, and he has obviously made an earnest effort to give the explanations which he thinks are appropriate. I submit, however, that he is not in a position to bind the government as to its intentions; I submit also that the government would be free from any measure of responsibility in regard to a statement that he might make. I therefore suggest that the Prime Minister should inform the house as to whether in this instance the parliamentary assistant is to be regarded as speaking with the responsibility of the government; and also whether it is suggested that it is a desirable practice in this house for parliamentary assistants to make statements on behalf of the government as a whole, rather than to follow the longer established practice of having other ministers speak on behalf of the government, if the minister in question is not available at the time.

I think also the Prime Minister should take under consideration the wisdom of having parliamentary assistants make statements on behalf of the government at a time that the minister of that department is available, and that under our well established practice he would appear to be the minister or the member of the house best suited and best qualified to give the explanation.

Another question arises, perhaps of minor importance, but one which it seems may well be settled in regard to matters of that kind. It was my understanding that by long established custom members speak from their own seats, and a question arises as to whether we are to have the practice of parliamentary assistants moving onto the cabinet benches to give to themselves the mantle of some added appearance of authority.

Mr. McIlraith: It is to enable you to hear, a courtesy.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I am raising this as a matter of very clearly established parliamentary practice and not, as I pointed out before, with any reflection on any particular member. But questions have already been raised during this session, and earlier sessions, as to the principle of joint cabinet responsibility which is involved in matters of this kind; and I once again place before the Prime Minister the desirability of his clarifying this situation and informing the house as to whether we are now to be regarded as having established the practice that in matters which come before the house on behalf of any department it is the accepted practice to authorize parliamentary assistants to speak on behalf of the department and on behalf of the government.

Mr. McIlraith: I think perhaps I should say something about the remarks made by the leader of the opposition. I do not know just how relevant they are in the committee stage of the bill, but in any event I think I should, out of obligation to all hon. members, make one point clear right at the very first of my remarks. My reason for moving from my own seat a little closer to the front was twofold. First of all, and above all, it was as a courtesy to all hon. members opposite so that they might hear me a little more clearly. I hope that that courtesy will be appreciated, because it was intended to be a courtesy, and it was done for that reason mainly.

I noted the remarks of the leader of the opposition—as a matter of fact I wrote them down. It was suggested that the movement forward was to give the appearance of added authority. I did not raise any point of order when those remarks were made, and I think perhaps the best thing to do with them is just to leave them as they were uttered. It seems to me there has not been much evidence of a desire to take the appearance of added authority from those who have observed things around here during the last five or six years. And while the new complaint, if I may call it that, comes forward tonight, I do not know that I should say much by way of reply to it.

I know that all hon. members in all parties, including the official opposition, will draw their own conclusions on the point. I am content to leave it thus.

Mr. Drew: I think one point that should be raised is that the hon. member now speaking is not the appropriate member to deal with this subject.

Mr. McIlraith: I note the interruption of the leader of the opposition and my colleague from the adjoining constituency. I know his apparent feeling with regard to it. I am not entirely unflattered by that. As to his earlier remarks about parliamentary assistants giving undertakings and so on, quite a few questions were asked tonight about the bill. As a matter of fact, they seemed to me to be thoroughly relevant, since they had to do with the operation of the act and the bill before the house, but I do not recall a specific undertaking as such requiring to be given, but a great many explanations were asked for. Those explanations were given as fully as I thought was reasonable in the circumstances, and in an effort to answer each point raised.

Now, the doctrine of an undertaking being given when there was none asked is another thing altogether. I recall that at law school, in dealing with the interpretation of statutes, I always held the opinion that the important thing in the interpretation of statutes was what those statutes said, and that the debates in the House of Commons in support of them, while possibly of interest and illuminating, certainly were not the criterion of what was the law of the land. The law, rather, was to be found in the relevant sections themselves. I do not know that there is much purpose in digressing into a discussion of that subject at this time.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps I should say a word in answer to what is not the first suggestion by the leader of the opposition that the business of parliament in this House of Commons is not properly conducted. It is not the first time the hon. member has suggested that things we were doing may be all right, but that we were doing them in the wrong way. That was one of the very frequent notes sounded when he first came to the house. Recently we have not heard it so frequently.

But perhaps we might not hear the kind of suggestion he made this evening if he read the form of the legislation in which he himself participated. It is not in force for this fiscal year, because the estimates for 1952 have not been adopted yet. But the item in question is couched in the same language as was used the first time the appointment of parliamentary assistants was decided upon, and ratified by the house.

The vote in this year's estimates, proposed to the house is in the same language as has been voted for many years, reads as follows:

> To provide hereby, notwithstanding anything contained in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act or the provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act respecting the independence of parliament, for the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund to each member of the House of Commons appointed by the governor in council to be a parliamentary assistant (which appointment shall not render such member ineligible or disqualify him as a member of the House of Commons) to assist a minister of the crown in such manner and to such extent as the minister may determine and to represent his department in the House of Commons in the absence of the minister therefrom, a salary of four thousand dollars per annum and pro rata for any period less than a year.

In previous years this has been part of the statutory legislation of this country, and I suggest that it is apt to be part of the statutory legislation of this country for the fiscal year 1951-52. It provides that the parliamentary assistant is to assist the minister of the crown in such manner and to such extent as the minister may determine, and to represent his department in the House of Commons in the absence of the minister therefrom.

That seems to me to justify the minister in asking his parliamentary assistant to take over the duty of supplying the information that may be required in the discussion of a bill such as this. The fact that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Defence Production is here, and gave the explanation on second reading of the bill, and the fact that he is answering questions with respect to the bill in committee stage, should be sufficient proof that his minister has indicated that that is the manner and the extent to which he wished to have his assistance, in this instance, in return for the stipend of $4,000 a year provided in this vote.

I was here during the whole time this discussion in committee has taken place, and it did not appear to me that there was any undertaking being requested. Of course the practice is to have motions submitted by one of the minister's colleagues; because when a minister proposes second reading of his bill, or proposes any forward movement of his bill, he proposes it in the form in which it is submitted; and if there is to be any amendment, then under our rules he is not competent to move it himself.

Until parliament revokes this practice of there being parliamentary assistants, I suggest that the manner in which they have dealt with the business of the departments to which they have been appointed has, so far, been very satisfactory; and that if and when any undertaking is required, such as for instance the undertaking that is given when supplementary estimates are voted, that is always given by the minister of the department concerned. If in the course of the discussion of any of the measures before the house an undertaking were required, the question of its being given could be properly referred, by the parliamentary assistant supplying the information, to his minister, for that undertaking. If it were given by the parliamentary assistant, and were not an undertaking the government was prepared to respect, I suggest the one who had given it would not long remain a parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the Hansard record of what was said earlier will show very clearly that no comment was made which called for the manner in which the Prime Minister proceeded to deal with my remarks at the outset. I am dealing with a question of established practice and principle; and when the time comes that members of the House of Commons are not free to raise questions as to practice, procedure and principle, then indeed we shall have gone a very long way toward defeating the very purpose for which we are now carrying on these discussions.

When the Prime Minister referred to undertakings as specific undertakings, he indicated himself that it would be customary to entrust the giving of such undertakings to a minister. I would point out that this evening we have been dealing with legislation that can hardly be regarded as the ordinary type of legislation for this or similar legislative bodies. We are dealing with something in the nature of emergency legislation, which gives to the government very wide discretionary powers, as has been frankly admitted by the parliamentary assistant now dealing with the measure before the committee.

The explanations given as to the effect of the legislation and as to how it may be employed, and as to what the intention of the government is in regard to it, and the necessity for it, all form part of the pattern of a very loose system of dealing in an emergency with matters of this kind in a manner that ordinarily would not be regarded as acceptable to members of the house.

At such time it would seem that it is desirable for the members of this house to know the extent to which the government is bound by explanations that are given, and that it is also highly desirable that the people of this country and the people whose business will be affected by measures of this nature should also know how far the government is to be bound by statements of this kind. The Prime Minister has referred to provision that is made for parliamentary assistants and he has stated that a parliamentary assistant may be named who, under the direction of the minister, will carry out certain duties on behalf of a department. He has pointed out also that in the provision for parliamentary assistants it is explained that the parliamentary assistant shall represent the department or may represent the department in the absence of the minister.

There is a difference between representing a department and making explanations which amount to expressions of the government's opinion as to how something shall be done, or what the extent and effect of legislation will be. I have raised this point but I do not intend to press it further at this time. I suggest that it would be well when we are dealing with emergency legislation to be careful that we do know that the government is bound by such explanations or undertakings as are given, and it was with that in mind that I raised the question tonight.

We have had other emergency legislation before the house already and we may have more before the session is concluded. I suggest, having regard to the reasons why ministers speak on behalf of the government, bound as they are by a special oath of office and by special traditional responsibilities, that where explanations are to be given which will have great effect upon the business of this country and upon the understanding of the legislation that is being passed in very loose form, but granting very wide powers, ministers themselves should be the ones to speak on behalf of the government.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Customs officers' duties.

Mr. Hatfield: It is provided that no goods shall be imported which are supported under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, the Fisheries Prices Support Act, the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act and the Agricultural Products Act. What about goods imported into Canada from the United States which are supported by the United States government? It might be that the cost to an exporter in the United States would be only 25 per cent of the raw material cost in this country.

Mr. McIlraith: That would not be a matter for import control under this authority but rather for dumping duties under the Customs Act, as I see it.

Mr. Hatfield: Potato starch has been coming in from the United States to compete with the Canadian products and that particular commodity is supported in the United States.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like the parliamentary assistant to give a further explanation with regard to the new section 4 with its clauses (a) (b) and (c), and also subsection 2. Will he explain just how the section is to operate? This section provides that no article is to be included in the list with regard to imports and then the qualifications are given in the paragraphs (a) (b) and (c).

Mr. McIlraith: I take it that we have reverted to section 1 of the bill.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think there was a misunderstanding.

Mr. McIlraith: This section sets out the authority for applying import control. There is no change except a grammatical change in paragraph (a); paragraph (b) contains no change, while paragraph (c) is new and involves the one new principle in the whole bill, the authority to apply import controls where the production of a product is restricted under legislation other than this bill. Perhaps I should point out that under the defence preparedness program wide powers are given, as I think my hon. friend will agree. There may be demands made on an industry or on materials and supply and this section authorizes the application of import control where the production of a particular product is regulated or otherwise restricted. There is authority under paragraph (c) to control the import of a similar product. When it is viewed in that light I think it will be seen to be quite desirable.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will this subsection apply in the case of a Canadian manufacturer who is forced to carry out a utility form of manufacture with various gadgets left off from his product? I understand that the intention is that such manufacturer would not then be exposed to the import of a similar article from the United States.

Mr. McIlraith: The power to do that, if it were done, would be found in this subsection.

Mr. Hatfield: Does that mean that a person who is prohibited from producing in Canada would not be able to import from the United States?

Mr. McIlraith: It means that if a manufacturer were refused permission to produce a particular type of article under this legislation there would be authority to control the import of similar types of articles.

Mr. Hatfield: If I cannot buy steel in Canada and can buy it in the United States, if there is no prohibition in the United States of export to Canada, will I be prevented from importing that steel into Canada?

Mr. McIlraith: The only quarrel I would have with that is that the example is perhaps not too apt. If the hon. member would take some other manufactured product the example would be better.

Mr. Fraser: Previously the minister mentioned three different lists. Would it be possible to have those in Hansard, or are they too long?

Mr. McIlraith: They are much too long, and I understand they were tabled with the report for last year. If there is any desire at any time to have the lists tabled, that could be done. The export list would be much too long to include in Hansard. The import list is quite short, covering simply iron and steel products.

Mr. Fraser: Then how about the changes from last year? Would it be possible to put those in so that we could know what they are?

Mr. McIlraith: It would be rather difficult to do that, because they involve some quite small subheadings. To pick them out I think would be meaningless and not helpful to the house. There is no objection at all to having the lists tabled from time to time. If it is helpful to hon. members I can do that any time it is desired.

Mr. Fraser: What I was getting at is the different categories of goods, the different lines of goods prohibited. Previously, when we had full control, it was difficult for people who travelled to the United States to know just what they could and could not bring back. I think we should have the list so they would know just where they stood. There was difficulty previously. People went over and bought things without knowing they were on the prohibited list. When they got back as far as the border they were told the articles were prohibited, and the people from whom they bought them would not take them back.

Mr. McIlraith: I am inclined to think the difficulty of which the hon. member speaks was under the emergency import control legislation, which was rather different and very much wider in scope.

Mr. Fraser: This would affect them in the same way.

Mr. McIlraith: There is a great difference between the two pieces of legislation. If you examine the authority for applying import controls you will see that they can be applied only to a narrower list of goods. I do not foresee the difficulty my hon. friend envisages. I am aware that it did exist under the other legislation; I quite admit that.

Mr. Fraser: It did; and it caused hardships.

Mr. McIlraith: But it will be remembered that the previous legislation applied not only to capital goods but to a long list of consumer goods. It is not anticipated, nor is it easily foreseeable, that the same difficulty would arise under this legislation. At the risk of coming close to an undertaking, I would be of the impression that there will not be great numbers of items under import control under this legislation.

Mr. Hatfield: If I am a manufacturer of steel products in Canada and cannot buy steel in this country because of the steel controller but can buy steel in the United States, can I bring that steel into Canada and manufacture it here or am I out of business?

Mr. McIlraith: I cannot imagine the situation arising in just the way outlined by the hon. member, because the two steel authorities work in close conjunction with each other, and the iron and steel import control is for the purpose of preventing the importation of steel for a use which is prohibited. Bearing that in mind it is very difficult to understand the anticipated difficulty.

Mr. Hatfield: A man who manufactures in Canada has been refused steel here, but he can buy steel in the United States. There is no trouble in buying steel in the United States today, but are you permitted to import it into Canada to be manufactured here?

Mr. McIlraith: I must correct that last statement. There is the very greatest difficulty in buying steel in the United States. They, like ourselves, have a shortage of steel and other metals, and there is very real difficulty in buying steel there.

Mr. Hatfield: Why should you prohibit the importation of steel products from the United States when there is a shortage of steel in Canada? That is what I would like to know.

Mr. McIlraith: The simple answer is that we do not. We apply import control and grant permits only where the use of the steel is consistent with the steel controls, which are based on the idea of a similar use being made of steel in Canada to that being made in the United States. In other words they are applicable to the extent that steel cannot be used to build certain less essential structures such as places of amusement. There is no general prohibition on the import of steel.

Mr. Hatfield: Is there any prohibition against the importation of steel for the manufacture of automobiles?

Mr. McIlraith: I am not sure if it comes under the order; but whether or not it does, steel for the manufacture of automobiles is in scarce supply.

Mr. Hatfield: We have the iron ore, we have the coal, we have the hydroelectric power. Why is there a shortage of steel in Canada?

Mr. McIlraith: That is rather a large question to answer in the committee stage of a bill, but there are two or three obvious reasons.

Mr. Hatfield: Why not do something about it?

Mr. McIlraith: One of the obvious reasons is that a sufficient number of men in this country lacked enough confidence in our development to enlarge the manufacturing capacity to make steel out of the iron ore, the limestone and the coal which go into its manufacture. This subject rather interests me and I could get off on it; but I think that is the simple answer. They have not had sufficient faith in the future of the country to build the additional capacity required.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Without enlarging upon it I would venture to suggest another reason, that we have had demands for steel quite beyond the imagination of most of us, at any rate. However, I rose to ask this question. If in fact there is a situation such as the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton has described, however exceptional it may be, where a man does own steel in the United States is there anything in our legislation to prevent him from bringing that steel into this country?

Mr. McIlraith: No, not in a general way; but it could be brought under import control, and the import control is only applicable to uses which are forbidden. Let me put it a little more bluntly if I may. I suppose in most countries there is that horrible thing called a black market. I suppose if one found a product in that black market and bought it, the importation of that article conceivably could be prevented under this legislation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wonder if the parliamentary assistant would carry that a little further. I understood him to say a moment ago that he thought it would not come definitely within the purview of the act; if I misunderstood him he will correct me. It seems to me that is something quite outside the ordinary scope of the act. It seems an exceptional situation.

Mr. McIlraith: The simple and rather short answer to the proposition put up by the hon. member opposite, but which is so harsh I did not want to give it in that way is no. Theoretically I suppose that "no" would not be a complete answer, because as I said it is possible to buy steel in the United States and apply for an import permit when the steel is to be used for a purpose not permitted. It is technically possible, but it is against the whole purpose of the legislation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Why is the answer "no" if it is not covered by the law?

Mr. McIlraith: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am wholly unable to answer why such things as criminals exist in the world today. The point I made was carefully illustrated, was carefully phrased, and was surrounded by the words "in the black market." I do not know what the hon. member for Greenwood understands by the "black market" but I understand that as something outside the law.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We are not talking about that.

Mr. McIlraith: I am sorry, but I used that example when I referred to it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That still is not an answer to my question. If in fact a Canadian owns steel in the United States, is there anything in these powers that would enable you to prevent him from bringing it in?

Mr. McIlraith: There is authority, and there is in fact the necessity, for an import permit under this legislation. The import permit would not be granted for steel bought in the United States which was to be used for a purpose prohibited by orders under other legislation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The assistant is importing into my question something which was not there. He has answered this question on the assumption that it would be forbidden by the steel orders. He does not know that, he is just assuming that.

Mr. McIlraith: Well, the particular facts would have to be looked at. The question can only be answered on that assumption.

Mr. Drew: Let us take a specific illustration. It is well known, for instance, that the Krupp firm now has an agent in this country. I believe it is well known to the parliamentary assistant that they may be shipping steel into Canada. In that case it would be necessary for the purchaser here to apply for an import permit. None of the questions that are suggested in regard to importation from the United States apply in that particular case, so far as I am aware, in view of the controls that are exercised at the other end, what would be the circumstances which would guide the nature of the import permit that would be granted to those importing for Krupps under this arrangement?

Mr. McIlraith: I am sure we would be very anxious to get the steel. When we are using the term "steel" I should properly point out that only certain forms of it are brought under control at all. I would say that we would be rather anxious to get the steel into Canada.

I must say that I am perhaps subject to the criticism that, in answering the member for Victoria-Carleton, I got off on the point of importation of steel from the United States. Indeed, that is the country from which a great part of it is imported, and because there was a reference to the United States in the earlier part of our remarks, I perhaps continued my remarks on the premise of that earlier reference.

Mr. Gillis: With regard to the import and export of steel, I find it hard to understand why, at this stage of the game and with the potential steel productive capacity of this country, we should be talking in terms of a shortage of steel and depending upon the United States for that product. This shortage is not something that developed overnight. As the parliamentary assistant and the Minister of Trade and Commerce know, this problem has existed since 1945. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was fully aware of it, and I am not blaming him particularly. Four years ago in this house he announced that the government was prepared to assist the operating steel companies in Canada if they would expand their plants to take care of the obvious shortage in the future. For every dollar the companies would spend in expansion, the government was prepared to give them a dollar.

At least eight months after making that offer, when the minister was questioned in the house as to how much of that money had been taken up by the three operating steel companies and what their plans for expansion were, the minister reported that Dosco had refused any of it; Algoma did not take any of it, but Stelco did take some and did expand their capacity to a considerable extent. We cannot wholly blame the government in that particular case. What is the matter with the operating steel companies in Canada? They knew the shortage was coming, and they knew they could not supply the market. In season and out of season groups in the country who recognized what this was going to do to the country in the future have been urging upon the federal government, and the provincial government, the necessity for the steel companies to do something about this developing shortage. This was four years ago, yet we wait until we reach a crisis before we do anything about it.

I just came from Nova Scotia. The federation of labour, the labour councils and the unions are now meeting with the provincial government of Nova Scotia, and urging them to urge the federal government to urge the steel companies to expand their plant capacity in Nova Scotia. Everyone has been urging the steel companies for the last four years. It appears to me as though the three major steel operating companies in this country control steel. Whether our requirements are going to be met during peace or war, it is immaterial to them. I believe that the crux of the matter is that the steel companies believe this is an abnormal market. They are afraid that when the defence program is over, and the needs of war are met, they will find themselves with plants on their hands and no market for the product; that is the problem. This talk about import and export of steel is quibbling with the matter, and we have been doing that for four years. The United States is making plans to take care of future shortages by building basic steel plants in eastern Canada now. I always thought that the policy of the government was to assist free enterprise up to the point where it falls down on the job. I believe that statement was made by most of the ministers in this house. Free enterprise has fallen down on the job on the production of steel.

During the last war the Minister of Trade and Commerce built plants all over this country when risk capital could not be found to do it. With the iron ore, coal, and manpower available, instead of quibbling about exports or imports from the United States, why does the minister not issue an ultimatum next week saying that if Dosco, Stelco and Algoma cannot meet the requirements of this country in a commodity that is as basic to our whole economy, particularly now in this developing defence situation, then he is going to do something about it. It would not take the Minister of Trade and Commerce long to throw together a basic steel plant in a part of the country where all the material and the manpower are available. That would be carrying out government policy as announced right after the war: where free enterprise falls down, we take over. I think the time has come to take over and to develop in this country a steel plant that will at least assist in meeting our own Canadian requirements. I think we should tackle the problem in that way. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton said he wanted a few hundred pounds of steel and could not get it. That is a situation that holds true all over the country. The little fellow has been squeezed out of the picture completely. The big fellow who has enough power behind him will get steel to carry on his normal business; and if he drops off 25 per cent of his peacetime production, he will take up the slack in wartime contracts. But the little fellow who wants only four hundred or five hundreds pounds of steel cannot get it.

I did not want to get into a left-handed discussion of this kind of thing, Mr. Chairman, but it leaves me a bit impatient. We have been screaming about this steel business for the last five years; now we hit the spot where we have not any and we must say, "Please, Mr. Truman, can we have some steel?" That is the situation, in spite of all the potential steel development there is in this country. If free enterprise does not do the job, let us do it ourselves. Let us put a plant up. Free enterprise will move quickly if they find that the government intends to take up that slack as they promised right after the war was over.

I do not get greatly excited about this import-export business. We are just hitting a problem that we ourselves made and we have been sitting in this chamber and neglecting over the last five years. We have bowed to the will of the fellow who is thinking in terms of profits only and not in terms of the requirements of the country for any particular purpose. He is thinking five years ahead when he may not have a market, when the abnormal market of defence is gone. That is the policy of the present people who control steel in this country. I hope the parliamentary assistant will come to the conclusion that, instead of being held up to ridicule in the house and talking in terms of a few thousand pounds of steel back and forth across the border, we should get down to business and use the resources of this country to do the job that those who have risk capital today appear to be afraid to use. I think it is time to implement government policy and to take over where risk capital fails to meet the requirements of the country.

Mrs. Fairclough: It always seems to be a popular sport in this chamber to impute motives, whatever they may be. I should like to draw to the attention of the committee the fact that in the city from which I come are some of the largest steel plants in this country—in fact, some of the largest ones on this continent. At the present time two of those plants have undertaken huge expansion programs that should come to the notice of this committee. I do not think it is right and proper for any member of this committee to say that the people who run those plants are selfishly inclined when they are investing huge sums, in excess of $30 million, in plant expansion at the present time.

Mr. Gillis: But we have not any steel.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Now, by leave.

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION ACT

POWERS OF GAME OFFICERS TO SEIZE MOTOR VEHICLES OR AIRCRAFT, ETC.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the Migratory Birds Convention Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the Migratory Birds Convention Act, which was originally enacted in 1917, implements the migratory birds treaty between Canada and the United States. The treaty is similarly implemented in the United States by act of congress.

[Mr. Gillis.]

The treaty and the implementing acts were intended to preserve the various migratory birds which cross the international boundary each year; and as is well known to hon. members the treaty and its implementing acts have served their basic purpose.

It is not proposed at this time to make any substantive changes in the act. There are, however, a few minor matters which require amendment in order that the act and the machinery established for its administration may continue to perform in the best possible way the functions for which they are intended.

Subsection 2 of section 5 presently provides that persons who are appointed game officers by the minister responsible for the act or who are, as in the case of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, game officers ex officio, hold office during pleasure and have the powers and duties defined by the act and regulations. Legal opinion is that this subsection is unnecessary, and it is therefore proposed to repeal it.

It is also proposed to repeal subsections 5 and 6 of section 5 and to replace both subsections by a subsection to be numbered 4. The purpose of this consolidation is to make it clear that all the provinces of Canada are on the same footing with respect to the appointment of game officers. Subsection 5 in its present form was placed in the act because the province of Ontario was the first province to indicate its desire that its game officers appointed under the Ontario Game Act should also act as game officers under this act. Subsection 6 was later added when other provinces made similar requests. The present proposed consolidation does not alter the scope or effect of these subsections but does provide for uniformity of treatment of all provinces in respect of the appointment of provincial game officers as game officers under this act.

The principal amendment embodied in the present bill is the amendment proposed to section 7 of the act. In recent years it has become clear that, with the increased use of motor vehicles and aircraft in hunting migratory birds, these means of transportation should be specifically included among the articles which, if used in committing violations of the act, can be seized by game officers. I may say that most of the provinces have already amended their provincial game acts to accomplish this purpose; and the amendment now proposed to the Migratory Birds Convention Act was requested by the 1950 conference of federal and provincial wildlife officers, in which the principal game administrators of the provinces took part.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there was before the house a motion which dealt with certain problems connected with migratory birds. While it would be improper to discuss the subject matter of that motion in relation to the bill now before the house, I would point out that an undertaking was given at that time by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) which keeps alive the possibility of an amendment which goes beyond the amendment contemplated in the bill now under discussion. It is not desirable in the ordinary course of events for two amending bills dealing with the same act to be introduced during the same session, although it can be done. For that reason I would remind the house that an undertaking was given to approach the government of the United States to see whether it would not be possible to have an appropriate arrangement made so that there might be an amendment to the Migratory Birds Convention Act, which would make it possible for the people of the province of Newfoundland to continue, as they did in the past, to shoot certain migratory birds which have been used for food.

Having regard to that undertaking, and having regard to the fact that it did seem more convenient that the amendments be brought in in one bill, if there are to be any other amendments, I would ask the minister if he is in a position to say whether anything has resulted from the approach to the government of the United States, and if it is not more desirable that this bill should stand with the possibility that there might be one amending bill which would embrace those further amendments of advantage to the people of Newfoundland, to be dealt with at the same time as the present amendments are under consideration?

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to say a few words on these amendments. Although this may be an inconspicuous bill to some hon. members, it is an important bill to the members of this group, because throughout the years the members of this group have always been great advocates of the conservation of our natural resources, and migratory birds are very valuable natural resources so far as this country is concerned. Therefore because the principle and purpose of this bill are to provide for a better conservation of migratory birds in Canada this group gives it its wholehearted support.

I might say before passing on, Mr. Speaker, that I for one am very pleased to know that the minister himself has become somewhat of a migratory bird; that he has been getting around Canada and seeing all these various aspects of the branches of the department which he has the honour to administer. I think it is excellent indeed. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I might say that in British Columbia I have met at least a dozen people who appreciated very much that the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) did something that very few ministers do, namely, spent a few days in the interior of British Columbia during December last.

Fortunately for this country throughout the years, Mr. Speaker, there have always been a number of Canadians and a number of Canadian organizations that have been interested in the conservation of our natural resources: forests, water, land, game, fish and things of that kind. Before passing on I do wish to pay tribute to an organization that has done a great deal on the North American continent for the conservation of geese and ducks. I refer particularly to Ducks Unlimited, an organization, Mr. Speaker, which was formed I understand in the first instance by United States sportsmen and supported by many Canadian sportsmen and other Canadians interested in the conservation of our natural resources. This organization did a great deal to develop the protection of migratory birds by the preservation and extension of breeding grounds and nesting places. I understand that around 1934 the migratory bird population, so far as ducks and geese are concerned, was very much reduced, and there was a great deal of alarm aroused in Canada over this reduction of the migratory bird population. But just as the result of a little planning—I would like to point out that up to that time free enterprise had full play, or practically full play, so far as our migratory birds were concerned—since we have had a little planning, a little co-operation, a little regulation we have increased immensely the migratory bird population of Canada, and also the birds that go to the United States.

Mr. Prudham: That was private enterprise.

Mr. Fraser: Absolutely, all private enterprise.

Mr. Herridge: The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys says that it was private enterprise. Yes, there were a considerable number of private enterprisers who had been infected by the doctrine of conservation preached by people belonging to the group to which I belong.

Mr. Fraser: Oh, now, now; don't praise yourself on that.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I see that I have annoyed the hon. member for Peterborough West. I think his conscience pricks him.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, my conscience does not prick me because in this house, five years ago I believe, I mentioned the fact of shooting from aeroplanes. I mentioned that, and said it should not be carried on.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad to hear of the exception which proves the rule.

Mr. Fraser: It is not an exception. You will find many other members around here who have been speaking along the same lines.

Mr. Herridge: I understand that the successful administration of this legislation depends upon the co-operation between the provincial and federal governments. So far as British Columbia is concerned, I understand that that co-operation has been extended and has been very successful.

I should like to say that the game commission of British Columbia, which has done excellent work throughout the years in connection with this act and other acts regulating the conservation of game, has been assisted to a great extent by the rod and gun clubs of British Columbia, which are very well organized now, and which throughout the years have done a great deal to develop public opinion in support of game conservation and the conservation of our natural resources.

Without a doubt, Mr. Speaker, my experience has been—and I have had some considerable experience with rod and gun clubs and fishing and hunting, and things of that sort, living in the country in which I do—that this type of legislation cannot be successfully administered by even the federal or the provincial authorities unless it has the support of, shall I say, a good percentage of people interested in these problems; and that is exactly what has happened in British Columbia. In British Columbia great credit is due to the rod and gun clubs of the province for their co-operation with the authorities and with the game commission, and for their advice and their assistance throughout the years. In fact in British Columbia the game commission depends to a great extent upon the recommendations forwarded to it by rod and gun clubs of that province.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that the constituency I have the honour to represent has one of the most active organizations of that type in the province of British Columbia. For years these people have worked to build a public opinion in support of the conservation of our wildlife and of our natural resources. That was not so in the early days. In the early days game was very plentiful; fish was very plentiful; wildlife in general was plentiful. As a result of overshooting and overfishing there came a period when the stocks of game, of fish and of wildlife were sadly depleted. Then a small number of people began to take an interest and these organizations were formed. The result today is a very satisfactory administration of our game laws in British Columbia in co-operation with large numbers of people organized, as I said before, in the rod and gun clubs of that province.

Another interesting feature of the development in my province is the interest that has been stimulated among younger people, junior members of the rod and gun clubs. These young people enter fishing competitions, and join in the activities to a great extent of the adult clubs in fishing and hunting under supervision, and are inculcated with the idea of the value of our game and natural resources. It is a wonderful training ground for sportsmanship, and sportsmanship is a basic requirement of a sound and functioning democracy.

I am very glad to see the amendments mentioned in this bill, particularly the one with respect to extending the powers of the game officer to seize motor vehicles or aircraft which had been or are being used in violation of the act or any regulation under the act. I am particularly pleased to say that because personally even in recent years I have seen some rather ghastly things happen so far as game is concerned because we had not a section like this in this act or in similar acts. I have seen American sportsmen come from the eastern United States to our district. They come in a car, or one of those vans, filled with dogs. I have seen them spend days driving through the mountain valleys, with their dogs trained to drive the grouse toward the road. They will go down the centre of the road for about thirty miles or so, and the dogs are trained to drive the birds toward the highway. Those men can sit in their motor vehicle or, if the occasion requires, get out of it quickly, and shoot grouse in wholesale quantities.

The amendment will prevent this sort of thing, so far as the migratory birds are concerned. I have seen power boats used in the shooting of geese and ducks in large numbers. This amendment will remedy that situation.

Only three years ago I saw a light aircraft used to fly around the peaks of some of our mountains, for the purpose of spotting herds of mountain goat which were sheltered on ledges facing the sun, as they usually do in the afternoon. Those aircraft would spot the herds of goat, and then land on a nearby lake. Following that the sportsmen could go directly up to where the goats were, and shoot them in great numbers.

That is not sportsmanship. This measure would not apply in that case, but I mention it only to indicate the problem we have to face in connection with the conservation of game. In conclusion may I say that this group welcomes these amendments, and we trust the minister and his officials will have every co-operation, as in the past, in giving effect to these improvements in the act.

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I do not think anyone could complain about the suggested amendments, so long as they will help in the preservation of game. I do not believe the minister intended that this bill should become the occasion for a full-scale debate on the Migratory Birds Convention Act. At the same time we are well aware of the fact that when the estimates are before the committee, and the expenditure in connection with this act is called, it is met by hurried cries of "carried, carried, carried," from the government side, and from all who are anxious to finish the work.

However, I intend to have more to say about the matter at that time. In view of the fact that it may be some time before the estimates are called, I would put this to the minister: I have become aware—and I believe I am not far off the mark—that the migratory birds convention is not being observed by all who are signatories to it. I refer particularly to Mexico, and to some other countries in the south where commercial shooting is carried on. I suggest to the minister that, in view of the fact that there may be discussion later, in which certainly I intend to participate, he should obtain information regarding those countries.

I have been a duck shooter for years. However, last year I called the minister's attention to the fact that the season was altogether too late in our section of the country. Local ducks had gone, with the result that when the season was called we had no shooting of northern ducks. I would agree readily to a closed season if it would do any good, but as I see it—and I have made this statement in the house before—while the provinces are doing a good job of conservation, and doing everything they can to preserve game, all that work is being done at a loss if we preserve the birds in this country only to have them shot farther south.

Anyone who is familiar with duck shooting knows it is much easier to do the shooting in the United States because they know the time, almost to the hour, when the northern ducks will fly into their locality, at which time they will be waiting in the marshes to shoot them.

I still believe however that the department in the United States is trying to do a good job. They have made limitations as to the number of ducks to be taken, and their game wardens have acted efficiently. The trouble begins farther south, however. Before we have any further debate on the Migratory Birds Convention Act, as it may develop when the estimates are before the committee, I would suggest that the minister would do well to make some inquiries—I am sure he has the means at hand to do so—as to whether we are accomplishing all we might accomplish in North America and in the Caribbean countries to preserve game. I am wondering if some attempt could be made to bring those countries within the provisions of the migratory birds convention.

If commercial shooting exists in the West Indies and in Mexico, then let us have that fact out in the open and do something about it. We are not responsible for the administration of law in those countries; but as matters now stand there can be no doubt that they do have commercial shooting, and that we are protecting ducks that we ourselves are not getting a chance to shoot.

I have said I would agree to a closed season, if it would help. I do not think the fault is with the United States, but I do believe we should do something to get the countries I have mentioned under the provisions of the migratory birds convention. In this way we would be doing something to preserve game. However, so long as we protect ducks in our northern areas, while commercial shooting exists in other areas, we will have difficulties.

The ducks from our northern areas fly over here, and a certain amount of shooting is done. I have never found our sportsmen unreasonable; they have never gone in for wholesale slaughter. I believe a good job is being done in the United States, but I still feel that the convention cannot work effectively so long as commercial shooting exists in those other countries. In those southern areas there is a large influx of people during the winter months. They are not opposed to eating canvas backs or black ducks, if they can be obtained or bought—and I believe that is going on. I do not think we will ever accomplish anything until that practice is stopped.

I make the suggestion that, in preparing his estimates, the minister make further inquiries along these lines. We have done and are doing in Canada what we can to clear up this affair; and I believe the United States are doing something—although large numbers of ducks perish each year from oil slicks on the eastern coast.

The whole situation is changing rapidly, and I do not find myself as optimistic as the hon. member who spoke a moment ago. The duck population is going down. However, I said at the outset I would not speak at length. My suggestion is that the minister get further information as to what can be done with respect to those Caribbean countries in which commercial shooting is permitted. In this way we would be getting down to the root of the matter.

I approve of everything in Bill No. 80. Any means we can take to stop unsportsmanlike practices in dealing with wild or migratory birds is a step in the right direction. I believe the provinces are doing a good job. While I give the bill my wholehearted support and approval, I would leave the suggestion I have made with the minister.

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, large numbers of ducks come to our northern lakes in Manitoba, and on occasion they come quite close to farm lands. One of the great complaints in those areas concerns the destruction of crops adjoining those lakes. I do not suppose that can be helped to any great extent, but I would urge upon the minister that, in conjunction with the provinces, this matter be considered.

I have been told of quarter sections and of sections of land upon which the crops have been destroyed. I am informed however that there are means of inducing the ducks to go to other fields, and I should like to have that followed out more thoroughly. In other words the suggestion has been made, by some people who have given the subject some study, that certain types of crop can be seeded and will become available at about the time the ducks migrate. It is pointed out that the ducks can be induced to go to those places, and thus leave the other crops alone.

Let me suggest to the house that this is a most serious matter in areas closely adjoining lakes. I know of many farmers who have suffered almost complete loss of their crops because of the damage done by the ducks. Therefore any effort that can be made toward helping to relieve the farmers who happen to be so situated is something that should be followed up. I believe that in our section of the province we have as good sportsmen as are to be found anywhere, and I do not think they can be accused of taking advantage of the rules and regulations which apply to hunting. There is one thing I am going to mention and I do it only to bring it to the attention of those who may be guilty of the rather common practice of digging pits in which to hide when shooting geese in particular. Frequently those pits are dug on farm land and then not filled in. This creates a hazard and danger. I am suggesting it here so that what little notice there can be given will be taken by those who make a practice of digging these pits in order to shoot the geese or even ducks. In fairness to the farmer on whose land they go they should fill them in after they are used.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I support the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). On March 14 we had a motion introduced dealing with this very subject. It was rather fully debated and at the conclusion the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) promised on behalf of the government that the matter would be taken up immediately with the representatives of the United States to see if the objectives of the motion which received such general support in the house could be achieved. Remembering that that motion was supported by petitions from thousands of people in Newfoundland, remembering the economic importance of it, I think this an opportune time to ask if any progress has been made by the government in arranging a conference with representatives of the United States.

Since that debate took place I have been informed that thousands of the birds we were talking about on that occasion go from the mainland of Newfoundland to the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon where they are shot in great numbers, because France is not a signatory to this convention. It seems rather absurd that a Newfoundlander should not be allowed to shoot these birds while the inhabitants of these islands only a few miles away can shoot them in such great numbers. Therefore, I support the view of the leader of the opposition and trust that when the minister replies he will make some reference to the discussion we had previously.

Mr. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, in closing this debate I wish to thank all hon. members who have taken part for the contribution they have made. It is quite evident to everyone in the house, and I think it is also quite evident to everybody in the country, that there is the greatest interest in the conservation of our migratory birds. I am quite certain that whatever steps are taken will be taken to that end.

I would refer specifically to the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and supported by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne). Following the useful debate we had earlier having to do with the shooting of murres or turrs in Newfoundland, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) indicated that we would approach the United States authorities to see what could be done to make it possible for Newfoundlanders to pursue their practice when it was necessary to do so in order to sustain life. I have not had an opportunity since the Easter recess of speaking to the Secretary of State for External Affairs about the problem, but I am quite certain that he has not lost sight of it and that he will carry out the commitment he gave to the house at that time that he would have the matter discussed wtih the proper official in the United States.

I am not at all sure that whatever relief one can contemplate will necessarily be in the form of an amendment to the convention. On the other hand, if an amendment is indicated and agreed upon I am not at all sure that it could be brought forward in time to have it dealt with this session, which many of us hope will not be of too long duration. I would think the practical thing to do would be to proceed with this bill and then at a later date, when it becomes clear as to what action can be taken, to take whatever steps are indicated at that time. I believe that that course will commend itself to the house and I hope it does because I attach considerable importance to having this bill passed at as early a date as possible.

I do not think other hon. members would wish me to make specific reference to the points they raised, but I do wish to thank the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) and the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir) for their contributions and assure them that their suggestions will be borne in mind.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Repeal.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I want to make just one remark in regard to section 1, which is regarded as the appropriate section on which to make any general comments. I do not wish to take any exception to what the hon. member for Kootenay West has said, because I think everyone is in agreement with the purpose of the amendment. However, I would point out to him that one reason I am so strongly in support of these amendments is that I have had some experience in the working of amendments of this nature. I think it is an extremely healthy thing in this house that every hon. member should display, not only his enthusiasm for the part of the country from which he comes but his general enthusiasm for the country as a whole.

I might point out that this provision is not new. It happens that the dominion government deals with migratory birds whereas the provincial government deals with the ordinary birdlife that comes into their areas. It is now five years since this amendment was introduced in Ontario and I may say that it has worked with great satisfaction. For that reason I am strongly in favour of this amendment. My other remarks were merely to point out that the earliest possible consideration should be given to another amendment which I think is most important.

Mr. Argue: I should like to say a few words on this section following up the remarks of the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa and bring to the minister's attention a situation which prevails in many parts of southern Saskatchewan. Under this bill we seem to be taking steps which are necessary to protect our migratory birds against persons who may take undue advantage of the hunting season, but I think it is also important to protect the material welfare of farmers in certain areas. Great damage is frequently caused to farmers' crops. I know from personal experience of farmers who have lost as much as $1,000 or $2,000 worth of barley over a week end. I know in my area there is seldom a farmer's convention of any description which does not pass some kind of resolution asking that they be given the power to deal with ducks which may threaten the destruction of their crops.

I am bringing this matter to the attention of the minister. I would like his comment upon it, and would ask him to give consideration to anything that might be done to help those farmers protect their fields of grain which are important to the nation and to the individual, and which I am sure no one would like to see destroyed.

Mr. McCusker: There is already provision for that. A farmer whose crop is being destroyed or damaged by ducks may apply to the provincial government and obtain a licence to protect it. That is the situation at the present time.

An hon. Member: In what province?

Mr. McCusker: In Saskatchewan.

Mr. Winters: The hon. member for Assiniboia asked for my comments. They would be in line with those of the hon. member for Regina City. This problem was highlighted by a condition which developed along the Ottawa river and which was brought to the attention of the house on several occasions by the hon. member for Renfrew North. It came to a head this year. Each year a considerable number of geese were landing on the property of farmers in the area in question, and the matter of how to deal with them was the subject of considerable local controversy. One group felt the geese should be fed, otherwise they would starve. On the other hand the farmers who owned valuable property there were having their crops destroyed and their land rendered pretty well useless. Delegations came to see me representing both sides of the argument. The federal government took the position that fundamentally it was a provincial problem to deal with the geese once they were within the province, but that we would do all we could to help carry out a program in co-operation with the province that would be in the best interests of all concerned.

After a number of years, and after considering all the factors, it seemed clear that the best thing would be to lure the geese somewhere else when they could alight on property not so valuable. Despite considerable pressure brought to bear on the Ontario government to feed the geese where they were in the habit of landing, they decided against that course and we supported that view. We thought the welfare of the farmers in the district must be a prior consideration, and that steps should be taken to lure the geese away in the first place, or to drive them away by scare methods where that was indicated.

Mr. Argue: Does the minister mean farmers cannot obtain permits to shoot the ducks in order to scare them away? It is pretty hard if you can only go out and wave a flag at them. If you shoot a few you may scare the rest away.

Mr. Winters: Farmers may obtain permits to take what steps are necessary. If shooting is indicated they may get permits to shoot.

Mr. Argue: I am interested in getting the particulars. Is that within the jurisdiction of the province?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Argue: How early in the season may permits be obtained? Can they be obtained only as soon as the ducks arrive, or can the farmer start taking steps earlier? I do not want the ducks shot before they are even there, but very often they are hatched and raised in the vicinity of a field of barley, for example. Does the farmer have to wait until a specific time of year, or can he start out early in June to take measures to keep the ducks away? If you wait until the ducks get there it may be a little late to apply for a permit. I should like to know the extent of the jurisdiction of the province. If they have plenty of jurisdiction that will satisfy me.

Mr. McCusker: My experience in shooting in Saskatchewan for a number of years is that they usually wait until the ducks have grown before they start killing them off. Ducks do not attack a crop until it is ripening. They do not go after green grain. They want the ripe barley and wheat, and they do not damage oats very much. Any farmer who can prove to the provincial government that his crop is being destroyed can obtain permission to protect it, but he cannot sell the game.

Mr. Knight: I might add that those permits are issued before the regular duck season opens. I would disagree with my colleague from Assiniboia and say that the main destruction to the crops in Saskatchewan is not caused by ducks hatched in the sloughs at the bottom of the fields. It is caused by the birds that come down from the north in their thousands and gobble up the grain just when it is ready to be put in the stooks.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In the course of the debate on a resolution introduced by my colleague from St. John's East the Secretary of State for External Affairs had this to say at page 1261 of Hansard:

> The act would have to be changed if the purposes of this resolution are to be achieved and, as has been pointed out, that act is based on an international convention. An amendment to that convention would require approaching the government of the United States.

Now we find the act being changed, and there does not seem to be any special difficulty about it. Has the government of the United States approached the government of Canada, or does the government of Canada intend to approach the government of the United States in regard to this matter? There seemed to be great difficulty about the other resolution. Is there any difficulty about this, or has it been done by international arrangement?

Mr. Winters: I imagine we would be out of order in discussing a subject which was disposed of earlier this session. However, on the broader question of whether or not an international agreement is required to effect the amendment now before the house, the answer is no. This has to do with the enforcement of regulations previously agreed to by the two nations concerned.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): But still it is contrary to the logic of the argument put forward in the previous debate.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Winters moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I suggest that we take order No. 3, which is a non-contentious measure concerning the appointment of auditors for the national railways.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 6, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) suggested that we take this bill, despite the fact that it was not announced for today, on the ground that it would be non-contentious. Well, substantially he is correct, but once again I would like to express the view that the job of auditing the accounts of the Canadian National Railways, instead of being farmed out to a firm of private auditors, reputable though this firm may be, should be done under the direction of the Auditor General of Canada.

As the minister knows, we have suggested this a number of times, and on at least a few occasions he has replied to the arguments we have put forward. I may say that these arguments have been put forward, not only from this corner of the house but they were made in a comprehensive and effective speech by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance some years ago when he was the member for Vancouver North. It seems to us that this job certainly could be done by the Auditor General of Canada, for the amount of business involved with the Canadian National Railways is smaller in terms of the millions and hundreds of millions of dollars that is the case when he audits the accounts for the government of Canada. There is no doubt as to the feasibility of the job being done by the Auditor General of Canada.

So far as we are concerned, the strongest reason for urging that this be done by our own Auditor General is because of the type of report that the Auditor General makes when he audits the public accounts, as contrasted with the type of report that any private auditor makes, and such is the case with the audit made by George A. Touche and Company with respect to the accounts of the Canadian National Railways. When a private auditor audits the accounts of any firm, as I understand it, his job is to make certain that these accounts are in order. He makes sure that there are all the necessary vouchers, and that he is given access to all the various accounts he needs to see to make certain that everything is in order. That is what this company does, and the statement which they make at the end of the year, a copy of which is always furnished to us, is drawn up in the traditional form of auditors' statements. However, when the Auditor General of Canada deals with the public accounts he goes a bit further and deals with matters that, shall I say, at least border on questions of policy. The Auditor General not only gives us a statement as to the fact that he has seen all the vouchers he wanted to see, but he gives us that interesting report that is furnished each year at the end of the big book known as the public accounts, in which he points out any seeming irregularities which he feels should be drawn to the attention of parliament, whose servant the Auditor General is.

I feel that we should have that kind of auditing job done with respect to the work of the Canadian National Railways, and it is for that reason it does seem to me that, instead of hiring a private firm, we should arrange for the auditing of the accounts of the Canadian National Railways, and its various subsidiary bodies, to be done by the Auditor General of Canada. I would be glad to hear from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), either at this stage of the debate or when we get into committee, as to whether any further consideration has been given to this matter, and if so what is the result of that consideration.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Auditors.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, this bill is not an unusual one. As the house knows, it comes up every year, and it seeks the appointment of the firm of George A. Touche and Company as auditors for the Canadian National Railways for the year 1951. The firm referred to have been auditing the accounts of the Canadian National Railways ever since its inception in 1923, with the exception of perhaps one year, so that they are quite familiar with the accounts of the railway. As a matter of fact, I believe it was George A. Touche and Company who audited the accounts of one of the predecessors of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Northern.

Addressing myself to the suggestion made by the member for Winnipeg North Centre, I should say that parliament has provided for the method in which the audit shall take place. The provision is set out in section 13 of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933, as amended by the act of 1936. In effect it states that a continuous audit of the accounts of national railways shall be made by independent auditors appointed annually by a resolution of parliament and annually reporting to parliament in respect of their audit. What the meaning of that is, I believe, is as clear to the hon. member as it is to me. I think an independent group of auditors—

Mr. Knowles: Surely the Auditor General is independent.

Mr. Chevrier: I think an independent group of auditors means exactly what it says. While it may be true that it does not exclude the Auditor General, there are reasons other than those contained in section 13, why the government has seen fit to continue to submit to parliament an independent firm of auditors, such as the one recommended in this bill. I do not want to repeat what I have said on earlier occasions, because this is not the first time that the suggestion has been made. It has been made on more than one occasion, and there are compelling reasons against it. For instance, the Auditor General would have to set up quite a financial staff of men to do the work which is being done by this firm of auditors, or which could be done by some other firm. Certainly it could not be said that there would be any curtailment of expenditure by the appointment of the Auditor General. In fact, the studies that we have made in our department lead us to believe that the cost would be greater by the appointment of the Auditor General than by the appointment of an independent firm such as is mentioned in the bill.

Another thing that has to be kept in mind is that this is a continuous audit. Whether or not it is done by the Auditor General, it would take him some time to familiarize himself with the various units and establishments of the Canadian National Railways; that is not done overnight. These people have been at it for years. Then again, the Canadian National Railways operates various units outside of Canada in Duluth, St. Albans, Chicago, and other points in the United States which do not come to my mind at the moment. The firm that is mentioned in this bill have offices in these United States cities. The Auditor General would have to establish some such staff in those cities in order to audit adequately the accounts of the railway. Those are the main reasons that come to my mind at the moment and which I think militate against the appointment of the Auditor General. For that reason I must tell the committee that I would have to oppose the suggestion.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I rise not to question what the minister has said but to raise this point with him. It arises out of what I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, namely that in this case those who receive or should receive the Auditor General's report, and should form a judgment from it, are far different from those who receive the ordinary auditor's report in the ordinary commercial company. I wonder if the minister has ever considered whether, in those circumstances, the auditors might be requested to go perhaps further afield than they would in the ordinary commercial report and whether they might not in some sense do for this house what the Auditor General does in his report at the end of the public accounts. I have not thought the point through; I raise it without much consideration; but it occurs to me that there is force in what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said in raising the question as to whether we should have some more comprehensive report than the ordinary shareholders get.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I should tell the hon. gentleman that in the railways and shipping committee there is each year a fairly thorough discussion about the independent auditors' report. For instance, I have in my hand their report. Each year there is a fairly lengthy discussion of this report. It contains a list of the recommendations made by the auditors. In addition, there generally follows a discussion of other things upon which in the minds of the committee the auditors should report. The auditors are there and give their reason why they have not reported on them and why in the following year they might do so.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And the report of that committee is available to the house?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it is.

Mr. Knowles: I just wish to say another word or two. The Minister of Transport sought to make a point out of a section of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act which suggests that this audit must be done by an independent auditor. At that point I made an interjection—but just in case it did not reach the record I should like to repeat it—that surely that does not exclude the possibility of having the Auditor General do the job. Surely the Auditor General meets the qualification of an independent auditor. He is not in the employ of the Canadian National Railways. He is the servant of the parliament of Canada, appointed under the great seal.

I was interested in what the hon. member for Greenwood had to say just now as to the desirability of having in that independent report, whoever makes it, a more comprehensive kind of thing than we now get, something more like that which we get from the Auditor General when he audits the public accounts. To the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, I give full credit for the view I am going to express now and I am referring to the speech he made on this matter two or three years ago when he pointed out that any private firm of auditors that made with respect to the Canadian National Railways the kind of suggestions with regard to policy and so on that are made by the Auditor General in relation to the public accounts, or indeed that made suggestions as far-reaching as that to the government, might find itself not always in favour with the government when this appointment is made. That is a suggestion made, as I say, by the hon. member whom I am quoting. My point is that I think we could get a more independent audit by the Auditor General who is the servant of this parliament and who is used to making the kind of report he is making, than we get from a private firm of auditors whose main interest, after all, is in bookkeeping accuracy and that sort of thing.

The Minister of Transport says that we might not save any money by having the audit done by the Auditor General, because he would have to take on additional staff to do the job now being done by George A. Touche and Company. Certainly the Auditor General would have to expand his staff to do this job; and I grant what the Minister of Transport says, namely, that it might cost us just as much to do it that way as to do it the other way; it might even cost more. But surely what we must look at is not just the actual cost of the audit but the results we would get from that audit. It might be worth more to have the kind of audit of the accounts of the Canadian National Railways that we get from the Auditor General with respect to the public accounts.

Mr. Chevrier: With reference to the last point, the question of the result we would get from the audit, let me tell my hon. friend that the report of the independent auditors is made to the railways and shipping committee. There is ample opportunity there to discuss it at length; and if there is any difficulty or any unsoundness about the method of the audit, surely it would come out in the committee and could be given consideration at that time.

With reference to the first point, may I say that I was not attempting to argue that the Auditor General could not be included within the meaning of the section. I was simply saying that parliament had decided that the auditors of the Canadian National Railways should be appointed under that section, namely section 13 of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act.

Mr. Coldwell: I think the minister is missing the point of my hon. friend's suggestion and that of the hon. member for Greenwood. It is not a question of how the audit is done or of how well it is done. The question is that the Auditor General appointed under the great seal, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre put it, and entirely responsible to this parliament, makes recommendations regarding policy. It is not a question of the audit so much as it is a question of recommendations regarding policies that might be beneficial to the railway and indeed to the country. The recommendations there, it is true, are recommendations that auditors generally make relating to the manner in which the accounts are presented, examined and so forth, and that the matter does come before the committee. That is true. But if you questioned the auditors on matters which involved policy, as we are understanding policy in this discussion, I think they would take the position, and properly so, that they were not engaged to lay down policy but that that was a matter for the directors of the railway and of the house if the house decided it wished to amend the legislation under which the Canadian National Railways operate. I think the point has been missed, and I believe that the suggestions made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Greenwood are worthy of more consideration than the minister and the committee are giving to them at the moment. I was rather sorry to see the house adopt the motion for second reading of the bill. I think this matter should have been discussed before second reading was given, before we adopted the principle of this bill. I do not say that a change would be made but I think there is involved a principle that is worthy of consideration by the minister and by the railway itself.

Mr. Chevrier: I would not want my hon. friend to think that this matter has not been carefully considered.

Mr. Coldwell: I am not suggesting that.

Mr. Chevrier: It has been considered on more than one occasion. My hon. friend seems to be of the opinion that careful consideration has not been given—

Mr. Coldwell: I would not say that.

Mr. Chevrier: —to the representations made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Greenwood. It has been, on more than one occasion, and it was again when this bill came before the government, and we decided, after discussion of the matter, that we would again recommend the appointment of this firm of auditors.

Now, then, with reference to the point he makes concerning policy, the hon. gentleman is familiar with the fact that the Auditor General should not make recommendations as to policy. That is not his province and—there is a better word I am looking for but I cannot find it at the moment—neither is it of the present auditors under this bill.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have spoken to the leaders of the other parties and suggested that we might call order No. 4 on today's order paper, the second reading of Bill No. 76, and have the minister make his statement. I do not think we would have time to complete the study of the bill this evening. I would suggest that that be done if hon. members have no objection.

RADIO ACT, 1938

VARIOUS AMENDMENTS—DEFINITION OF TELECOMMUNICATION—ACCESSION TO INTERNATIONAL CONVENTIONS, ETC.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 76, to amend the Radio Act, 1938.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anything very contentious in the bill but the minister might explain it.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; I was going to do that. The purpose of this bill is to carry out and implement the terms of an agreement, in fact it is a treaty, made between Canada and the United States covering several matters in connection with radio. That is, the agreement made between the two countries was made in order to permit, first, pilots who are qualified radio operators to operate radio transmitters installed in civilian airplanes of the other country's registry; second, operators of mobile radio transmitters installed in vehicles used in public service or for commercial purposes in border areas and private persons with radio telephony installed in their cars while in the territory of the other country; and third, amateur wireless operators to use their sets while visiting the other country.

Section 5 of the act of 1938, which provides for the licensing of stations, is repealed by this amendment, and the new section provides for the necessity of a licence in the case of the operation of a private receiving station or a radio station by the making of regulations by the governor in council so that (a) radio receiving sets installed in an automobile or other vehicles and (b) a radio station temporarily in Canada may by these regulations be exempted from the operation of section 5 of the act.

Section 7 of the act of 1938 provides that no one shall be employed as a radio operator on any coast, land or mobile station unless he is a British subject, and also makes provision for the taking of an oath of secrecy. The amendment to that section permits the exemption by regulation of the classes mentioned in the treaty which are (a) radio operators employed on any radio station in Canada or (b) any person who holds a valid Canadian certificate of proficiency or an equivalent certificate issued by the country of which he is a citizen, and (c) is a citizen and resident of a country that grants a reciprocal permission to Canadian citizens.

In other words, the matters I have referred to so far are to implement the treaty entered into between Canada and the United States. There are two other small amendments, one of which is a new one and gives a new definition of telecommunication, and the other amends section 3 (1) (c) of the act by substituting "telecommunication" for the word "radio" which is there now. It is simply to clarify the act and to permit of approval under international agreements of telecommunication regulations, telegraph regulations and the like. I do not think there is anything contentious in the bill. I think it is all to the good. It was given careful consideration by the two countries and I hope it will commend itself to the house.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Telecommunication.

Mr. Coldwell: Is there any particular reason why this amendment should be made at this time? Some of the changes in the bill, the explanations and so on, seem to indicate that perhaps this may be due to some arrangements that are made in broadcasting and so on, between the two countries, that arise out of the present defence arrangement or the international situation. Has that anything to do with the agreement?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it has not, definitely.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Gillis: Is there not a section 7 to this bill?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Gillis: In his explanation the minister made reference to qualifying section 7 of the act. He made reference to countries that have a reciprocal arrangement with Canada. Will the minister tell me whether, when he used the words "reciprocal arrangements with other countries" he just meant Canada and the United States?

Mr. Chevrier: In this particular bill, yes.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will take up Bill No. 172, to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act. This was read the first time today. Then we will proceed with Bill No. 188, to amend the Yukon Act, the resolution for which was passed this day; then Bill No. 189, to amend the Northwest Territories Act. Then we will move to go into supply, and call two departments, fisheries and labour. Perhaps we will go into the consideration of estimates of labour or fisheries tomorrow.

On motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 3, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ADJOURNMENT FROM APRIL 4 UNTIL 5.30 P.M., APRIL 5

Right Hon L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): If I have the unanimous consent of the house I should like to move that when the house adjourns tomorrow, Wednesday, it stand adjourned until Thursday at 5.30 p.m. The reason is that the President of the French republic will address the members of both houses of parliament in this chamber at 3.30, after which there is to be a reception in the chambers of the Speaker of the Senate.

The program that has been prepared and printed provides that the president is not due to leave this building until ten minutes after five, when the Speakers of the two houses are to accompany him to the front entrance. After the joint meeting in this chamber some time will be required to remove the additional chairs and put it in order for us to proceed. Therefore if I have unanimous consent I move:

That, when this house adjourns on Wednesday, April 4, it do stand adjourned until 5.30 o'clock p.m., on Thursday, April 5, and that standing order 2 be suspended in relation thereto.

This will enable us to get through the routine proceedings and down to the orders of the day, which may then be proceeded with when the house resumes its sitting at eight o'clock.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is hardly necessary to say that we would expect unanimous acceptance of this motion. There will, of course, be approval for everything that is being done to indicate the warmth of the welcome we would wish to extend to the head of the French republic, between which and this country there are very close bonds.

Motion agreed to.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER EAST OF MONTREAL—SUGGESTED USE OF ICEBREAKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Marcel Monette (Mercier): Mr. Chairman, before you proceed with the orders of the day, I have an extremely important and urgent question to address to the Minister of Transport in my capacity as member for the most highly industrialized county in the province of Quebec.

Is the Minister of Transport aware that the St. Lawrence river, as is the case nearly every year, is now flooding the east end of the island of Montreal and has wrought considerable damage in my county? Does the government intend to do something to cope with that condition?

In order to prevent such disasters in the future, may I suggest that the government should dispatch to that part of the river, each spring, two icebreakers at least in order to break the ice-jam at the onset.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. I may assure him that the Department of Transport is aware of the damages caused by the swelling of the St. Lawrence river at Montreal. As soon as that condition was brought to our attention we immediately dispatched three icebreakers to the scene. The Ernest Lapointe, the Saurel and the Lady Grey are now breaking the ice and according to the latest reports I have received the situation is improving considerably.

The hon. member may rest assured that the suggestion he made in the last part of his question will be taken into consideration by the government.

WOOL

PRESS REPORT AS TO EXPORT FROM CANADA TO POLAND THROUGH THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce—of which I have not had an opportunity of giving him notice—concerning a report in this morning's Ottawa Citizen with regard to 400,000 pounds of wool which originated in Canada and was being shipped through the United States to Poland. Can the minister throw any additional light on this transaction that was not disclosed in the press report?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I regret to say that I am not able to throw any light on the matter. Our records indicate that no permit was issued in that connection, but further investigations are being made. If I find anything new, I shall be glad to announce it in the house.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO REVOCATION OF CITIZENSHIP, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the second reading of Bill No. 172, to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

Mr. Drew: Explain.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, as forecast in the speech from the throne, it is proposed in this bill to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act to prevent the retention of Canadian citizenship by persons who have renounced their allegiance or shown by their conduct that they are not loyal to Canada.

It is not a lengthy bill; in fact it contains but one section amending certain parts of section 19 of the present act.

Under the Naturalization Act, which was repealed with the coming into force of the Canadian Citizenship Act on January 1, 1947, there was provision, under subsection 1 of section 9 thereof, for the revocation of a certificate of naturalization by the governor in council after the minister was satisfied that the person to whom the certificate was granted had shown himself, by act or speech, to be disaffected or disloyal to His Majesty. This provision was applicable whether the offence was committed in Canada or outside of Canada.

When the Canadian Citizenship Act was being considered, it was decided to make the citizenship of a Canadian citizen, other than a natural-born Canadian citizen, liable to revocation only if the offence of disaffection or disloyalty had been committed outside of Canada, and to make it applicable in Canada only in the event of the naturalized Canadian citizen having been convicted of treason or sedition by a court of competent jurisdiction. These persons had the right to have their cases considered by a commission appointed under section 19 of the act. In this way their right to have a hearing was fully protected.

In recent years it has been found that a number of naturalized Canadian citizens have returned to the countries of their origin with the obvious intention of remaining there permanently and of severing their allegiance to Canada. Under present legislation, their citizenship can be revoked only after a period of not less than six years' residence outside of Canada and failure to maintain substantial connection with Canada.

In some cases a number of naturalized persons have asked, while still in Canada, to have their certificates of naturalization or citizenship cancelled on the ground that they no longer wish to retain Canadian citizenship. There is nothing in the present legislation covering this type of disaffection.

So far my remarks have had reference to the revocation of the citizenship of persons other than natural-born Canadian citizens. At present a Canadian citizen by birth loses his citizenship only on the voluntary acquisition of a foreign nationality. Very serious thought, however, has been given to the question of the revocation of the citizenship of persons, whether naturalized or natural-born, who take an oath or make an affirmation or other formal declaration of allegiance to a foreign state, whether they were residing in or out of Canada at the time of taking such action.

In view of the conditions which I have stated, and for obvious reasons of security, it is deemed desirable to introduce certain new grounds for revocation of citizenship.

Under present legislation, revocation may take place only if the naturalized Canadian citizen has been residing outside of Canada for a period of not less than six years and has failed to maintain substantial connection with Canada. The proposed amendment provides for revocation after a residence of two years in a country of which the Canadian citizen was a national or citizen at any time prior to his becoming a Canadian citizen or being naturalized in Canada. This would allow more speedy disposition of cases where naturalized persons return to their country of origin and lose substantial connection with Canada.

There is, further, an extension of the present provision for revocation for disloyalty. At present, revocation is possible where a person out of Canada shows himself "by act or speech" to be "disaffected or disloyal" to His Majesty or, if in Canada, is guilty of treason or sedition. The latter phraseology, especially, is too narrow. It does not, for instance, cover persons convicted of offences under the Official Secrets Act. It is proposed in this amendment to allow revocation for disaffection and disloyalty out of Canada, and for persons in Canada who are found guilty of sedition, espionage, treason or similar offences.

Subsection 3 of section 1 of the bill provides for the revocation of the citizenship of all categories of citizens whether naturalized or natural-born.

There is no substantial change in paragraph (a) from the present legislation, which provides for the revocation of the citizenship of a person who, by a voluntary and formal act other than marriage, acquires the nationality or citizenship of a foreign country, whilst in Canada.

Paragraph (b) of subsection 3 is new. It provides for revocation in the case of persons who take an oath or make an affirmation or other formal declaration of allegiance to a foreign state; this would apply whether the persons were in or out of Canada.

There is, finally, provision in paragraph (c) of subsection 3 for the revocation of the citizenship of those persons who make declarations renouncing their Canadian citizenship. This amendment would have the effect of legalizing the action of a person who renounces his Canadian citizenship, whether in or out of Canada.

The government is of the opinion that the amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act which are proposed in this bill are essential to the welfare and security of Canada. I wish to make it clear, however, that the rights of any person, the revocation of whose citizenship might be considered under any one of these proposed amendments, are fully protected under that part of section 19 of the citizenship act which provides, upon request, for a formal hearing by a commission constituted for the purpose by the governor in council. It is not proposed in this bill to deprive a person of his citizenship without granting him his right to have his case considered by this tribunal.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this bill, so far as it goes, makes it possible to deal with certain acts of disloyalty, but it does not deal effectively with many of the things that are being done by people who have come to Canada, have become naturalized Canadians and are now abusing the rights of that citizenship in an effort to undermine our democratic system. I shall support the bill before the house because the terms are good so far as they go. It is appropriate, however, in dealing with the principle now under consideration, to point out the advantage of going a great deal further; because the government itself could put forward appropriate amendments, if they were considered advisable, to carry the application of the bill to a wider field.

As has been pointed out by the minister, a number of people who have come to Canada have become naturalized and have then returned to their own country with the apparent intention of staying there. I am not objecting to their loss of citizenship. I should think that under those circumstances the loss of citizenship would be almost automatic. There is, however, a consideration that should be borne in mind. Some of those very people are now returning to Canada more completely disillusioned about communism—and we know it is communism that is under consideration—than anyone else in this country. I suggest that we should not disregard the possibility that some of the most effective exponents of our free democracy may be those who have mistakenly returned to the slave states and have seen what is actually going on there at the present time. That, however, is an observation that would apply only to a limited number. I must say that I am much more concerned about those of other than Canadian birth who have come here and been naturalized and are staying here and seeking to destroy our system, than I am with those who leave; in fact I think we should welcome the departure of many of those who come and do this.

It would seem to me that when an amendment is being considered which will widen the possibility of denying the rights of citizenship of those who leave Canada, or those who make declarations that amount to disloyalty to Canada or the abandonment of their citizenship, we should also consider the advisability of widening the basis upon which citizenship may be withdrawn.

I would of course wish that we were discussing this on a very much wider basis than it can be discussed upon the second reading of this bill. What I would prefer to be discussing at the present time is an amendment to the Criminal Code dealing effectively with communism in this country under a properly defined section of the code. In saying that I wish to make it perfectly clear that neither in my remarks now nor on any other occasion have I ever suggested that communism should be dealt with by name. That would not be effective. What I am suggesting is that the activities designed to undermine our democratic system in the service of a foreign power can be defined and should be defined in an amendment to the Criminal Code, which would apply to everyone, whether born outside of Canada or within our own boundaries. That, however, is not the subject now under consideration, and I therefore confine my remarks to possible amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act, and the withdrawal of the citizenship which has been extended to those who have come to Canada and who leave here.

There are many people who have become naturalized Canadians who will not come within the amendments now before us. Let us take some of the examples. At the present time there are weekly publications in different parts of Canada which are published in languages other than English or French. They are generally described as foreign language newspapers. I am referring to those of the foreign language newspapers which are regular and vigorous advocates of communist doctrine. I might say that my remarks would apply with equal force to any publications which advocated what might be regarded as nazi, fascist or any other non-democratic doctrines. However, it is communism with which we are mainly concerned at the moment.

Men who have come to Canada and have been naturalized, and through that naturalization have gained the rights of free citizens of Canada, are week by week doing their utmost to undermine the confidence and the faith of newly-arrived citizens of this country by holding up to contempt and ridicule those institutions upon which we rely for the preservation of our freedom, and are making attacks on all those who are seeking to maintain the vigour and the strength of democracy itself. These people, given the rights of citizens, freely urge the support of those against whom young Canadians are fighting at this very hour. If that is not treachery, I do not know what can be described as treachery. Nevertheless it does not come within the legal definition of treason contained in the Criminal Code.

I am sure that in the Department of Justice there are those who are competent to draft an amendment to the Criminal Code which, without using the word "communism", or "fascism", or "nazism", or any other definitive doctrinaire word, will at the same time define with clarity disloyalty to Canada of that kind.

I believe that people who are doing that should be dealt with in the manner that is contemplated by the amendments now before us dealing with those who leave Canada to go back to their native land, or dealing with those who are convicted under laws now in force. To me it seems strangely inconsistent that we should be, on the one hand, awaiting a budget which call for the expenditure of $1,600 million for defence—defence against only one possible enemy—and yet at the same time dealing with that enemy and his representatives in our midst with such gentleness and with such reluctance to recognize the danger for what it really is.

As I said before, I can only, within the terms of this act, deal with the citizenship of those who have come from other lands and become Canadians by naturalization. But the people who are trying to destroy democracy in Canada include within their ranks many of those who have obtained citizenship in that way.

Across this country there are communist organizations trying to undermine faith in Canadian democracy in many ways, not only through foreign language newspapers, but by means of the moving picture, by means of publications sold quite openly, and by other devices long employed for affecting people's minds and people's loyalty.

As the Department of Justice well knows, there are moving pictures in circulation in this country which have no other purpose than to spread propaganda in support of communism. In many instances that is being done by those who were born in other lands, have come to Canada and are now citizens of this country. There are also others within the same category who are running schools for young Canadians where disloyalty is the purpose of everything that is done. There again it should be possible to deal effectively with such people, just as effectively as with those who leave Canada to go back to the country to which these people are now expressing their loyalty.

I would urge the minister to give consideration to extending those definitions still farther. While it is true that there is not an amendment to the Criminal Code now before us, it is possible to introduce a definition of conduct of that kind within the Canadian Citizenship Act itself, which could be dealt with by the courts. If the Department of Justice is not prepared to put before this house an amendment to the Criminal Code, then I suggest that an amendment such as I have mentioned be introduced to the Canadian Citizenship Act; that a penalty be provided under which those guilty of conduct of that kind can be brought before the courts, and, if there is a conviction, citizenship should be lost in accordance with the procedure outlined in the amendments now before us.

I do not think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) will question my statement when I repeat that I believe the officials of the Department of Justice do regard themselves as competent to draft such an amendment; because I am under the impression that he has such an amendment actually drafted, although he has not yet been prepared to put it before the house. I mention that only with the thought that it is most commendable that a condition of this kind should have led to the preparation of such an amendment. I hope that if an amendment to the Criminal Code is not made at this time, a further amendment to this act will be introduced when the bill is in committee.

In the event that anyone might suggest that others in the house should propose the amendment, my answer would be that if an amendment of this kind is to be effective it should be one put forward by the government. Administration is just as important as enactment; and if the administration of an amendment of that kind is to be effective, then such amendment must be in terms the government will carry out.

While I approve the amendments so far as they go, and will support them, I believe that the time has come for us to act in accordance with the scale and magnitude of the task we are undertaking, and that an emergency which calls for the type of legislation the government has already presented to the house for purposes of defence is one which should call for legislation that will deal more effectively with these traitors in our midst.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the speech from the throne it was announced that there were to be certain changes in the citizenship act. One or two of us perhaps had our own fears as to what those changes might be; but, having seen the legislation I can say now and at once that we are in agreement with what appears to be the purpose of the bill. After all it is only reasonable that when an individual renounces his citizenship he should officially lose it. It is only reasonable that when someone affirms allegiance to another country he should lose his citizenship rights in Canada. There can be no objection whatever to that.

However, there is a vital principle in the bill which I suggest requires some clarification from the minister, and should be discussed to some extent. We are told that an individual loses his citizenship when he is convicted in some court of competent jurisdiction of any offence involving disaffection or disloyalty to His Majesty. Those are fairly sweeping terms. I remember well that when the original citizenship act was before the house there was much discussion about a section similar to the one I have indicated. One of the things upon which members of all parties insisted at that time was that there should be equality of treatment for all Canadians, no matter in which part of Canada they might live. It is conceivable that under this legislation there may not be that same equality. Appeal is to be permitted to ten different courts in the ten provinces. It is possible that the judges presiding over those courts will range from men of a most liberal turn of mind to those of the most reactionary. It is possible we may have ten different standards of disaffection; it is possible we may have ten different standards of disloyalty. In effect what we shall have will be ten different standards of Canadianism. That is something I would deplore, because it is the intention of all of us to try to secure equality of treatment for all.

There is another matter which has been discussed before, and which some conceive to be an aspect of discrimination between those who are natural-born Canadians and those who have adopted Canada as their home. There are those who feel that the degree of punishment for the same offence should be precisely the same, and that the most serious punishment one could inflict upon anyone would be to take away his citizenship. That is the punishment meted out only to immigrant Canadians.

I am an immigrant, but I must say I view the situation in a somewhat different light. I came here of my own free will. I came to Canada because I wanted to. I knew what my rights of citizenship and my obligations were going to be. I knew what my duties and privileges were going to be; and I was determined, so far as humanly possible, to live within the law of the land. I am convinced that from my point of view, and that of many others, no more serious hurt could befall one than to lose his citizenship. Nevertheless I believe that if an immigrant comes to this country and willingly and knowingly violates the law so that he is guilty of treason, he should lose that citizenship. There are others, among my colleagues, who were born in Canada, who would disagree with me.

The question arises as to exactly what disloyalty is. There are members of the house who advocated that Canada should be a republic. They would want to do away with the monarchy. They would abolish kings, and all the pomp and circumstance we associate with courts and kings. I disagree with them on that. However, I maintain they are entitled to their opinions, and if their opinions were to have the support of a majority I would accept the decision, as a good democratic citizen.

But is that being disloyal to His Majesty? Would one be disloyal if he were to advocate the setting up of a republic? Is there disaffection there, or is there disaffection when, during the Easter recess, I go back to my constituents and raise the very devil about what the government is doing or is not doing? It is conceivable that under certain governments that might be regarded as sowing disaffection. On the other hand we must remember that during the thirties there were Canadian citizens who went back to nazi Germany and who, after serving a year or two in the German forces, came back to this country. In my opinion those men were traitors; yet the legislation was not adequate enough to cover them then. It is possible we have the same condition today among those who acknowledge allegiance to soviet Russia. In my opinion those people are also traitors in just as great measure.

What we want above all is to safeguard the citizen from the growing encroachment of government. I do not think that encroachment can be helped; it is one of those things which will happen. But it means we have to be doubly sure to see that the citizen is protected. It may be said: Well, after all, we have a minister who is a man of honesty and integrity, and upon whom we can depend. That may be so. I should be quite content to take the minister's word that he will carry out this legislation as honestly and faithfully as he can. But there is no guarantee that a minister of a similar calibre is going to follow him.

I recall the history of the 1919 strike in Winnipeg, when we had a somewhat different type of minister at Ottawa—and I am referring to Mr. Arthur Meighen. I remember well that on the occasion when ten Canadian citizens were arrested in Winnipeg and thrown into Stony Mountain prison, Mr. Meighen sent a wire to Winnipeg which read as follows:

> Notwithstanding any doubt I have as to the technical legality of the arrest and detention at Stony Mountain, I feel that rapid deportation is the best course, now that the arrests have been made; and later we can consider ratification.

That was a most iniquitous thing to do. What guarantee is there that under some other minister it might not happen again? What protection is there for the citizen? That is what we are particularly interested in.

I remember during that same general strike in Winnipeg, when Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, the founder of this party, was thrown into prison for four or five days because he had the audacity to quote from the book of Isaiah in the streets of Winnipeg. That was then considered to be sedition. At times hysteria grows in any country until it becomes a serious menace. We hope that something like that will not happen again but we have to safeguard against it. Where the courts decide that an individual has been guilty of disaffection or disloyalty the minister is to have the last word as to whether or not that citizen will lose his citizenship. As I said before, there is no more serious circumstance that could befall any Canadian.

The minister has the right to decide, and it is no reflection on the minister when I say that all of us who are elected members of parliament know what it is to be the victim of political pressures and political urges. While I am content to leave this right with the minister, I am not content to leave with him the right to have the last word. We suggest for the earnest consideration of the minister, partly as a safeguard for himself and partly as a safeguard for those who might be accused, that the individual should have a final right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. That court is above all political pressures. That court is impartial. Let that court decide whether or not the individual should suffer the most grievous penalty of losing his citizenship. Were we to do that, then I think we would be restoring some of that equality for all which we desire. I hope that the minister will give this suggestion his most earnest consideration.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I do not usually take part in a debate of this kind, but to me these amendments are very simple. A man cannot be a citizen of two countries and be honourable and honest with both, just as the old book says that you cannot serve two masters. If a man is found to be using language, either in the press or vocally, that shows his disloyalty to Canada, he has no business to be a citizen of Canada. If he becomes a citizen of a foreign country, why should he want to be a citizen of Canada at the same time? I do not think we need to spend much time discussing these amendments, because they are so simple.

But I do know of one difficulty that is faced by a man who lives in the city of Fort William, which is considered to be made up of intelligent people. This man has raised a family but has not been able to obtain Canadian citizenship. I have always thought that after a person had been in Canada for twenty years, and had a good character, there would be nothing against his becoming a citizen; but this man has found that he cannot become a citizen of Canada unless he can answer all the questions.

I know a man who has lived thirty years in Canada and has reared a family that is a credit to Canada. They are all good athletes, good students and good university men, and yet the father is not able to be a citizen. I realize that these amendments do not cover such a situation, but I hope the minister will find a way to overcome difficulties of this kind.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the bill and to make a few remarks pertaining to it. So far as I can see, the chief purpose of the bill is to relieve a very few people of rights and privileges which by their own actions they indicate they do not value very highly. I say there are but a very few. I take this opportunity to reassure the great masses of new Canadians whose citizenship is cherished by possession that there is nothing in this bill that in any way prejudices their status.

As I say, the bill deals with two small groups of minorities. The first group consists of those who returned voluntarily to their native country to resettle and who endeavoured for their own purposes to retain some of the advantages they had gained by Canadian naturalization. What they want is dual citizenship; they want a privileged position. I cannot say that I have much sympathy for them. Dualism has been resolved in this country and we cannot tolerate it abroad. They cannot have it both ways.

No matter what inducements have been offered, no matter how rosy the picture was painted in order to get them to return to their country of origin, they automatically accepted life according to the dictates of the existing regime in that particular country, and the principal effects of such life, including a police state and forced labour, were well known to the most innocent of them. It scarcely seems reasonable for them to expect that their Canadian naturalization will exempt them from some of the unpleasantnesses that they found when they returned to the country of their origin. I imagine that they supplied more than their share of headaches to those countries as well as to ours, and this bill will reduce those headaches from six years to two years.

I said that there were two groups of people covered by this bill with whom I had little sympathy. If I have little sympathy for the first group, I have none at all for the second. They are the people who sought and acquired the privileges and responsibilities of Canadian citizenship but who are really the servants of another state. In the course of that service they have betrayed the Canadian state. When their offence has been proved I can see no justification for their continued enjoyment of the citizenship which they have acquired, a citizenship which, by the way, not only gives them a fair trial and just sentence.

Because some of the persons involved in the recent espionage cases were foreign born, a regrettable shadow of suspicion has fallen inevitably on a large and intensely loyal section of the community. I say inevitably, because in all times of international stress there are suspicions that arise, and there is a flaming and a fading of tensions from time to time. I should like to repeat what I said on April 9, 1946, and I quote:

> There have been those whose loyalty has wavered, who have imagined, in their confusion and in their woolly thinking, that there is a higher loyalty than that to Canada; who have not rated their acquired citizenship on so exalted a level as most of us have placed it. Recently we have been shocked to our very roots when we have had to face up to unpleasant realities which upset our comfortable and complacent thoughts and habits. There is no need to be alarmed. There is no point in hysteria, and there is no reason for losing our perspective. We have been tough with our enemies from without. We only need apply the rule of law in order to be tough with our enemies from within. That is what the law is for.

I went on to say:

> Let me say a further word about loyalties. It is well that we look to the structure of our own nest before we inquire too deeply to see who has fouled it. Loyalty is a coin with two sides. On the obverse is the attachment of the citizen to the state; on the reverse are the service and inspiration which the state gives to the citizen. I have no use for traitors or for those who accept the protection and benefits of the state and then sell it down the river. I entertain no belief that loyalty can be divided, so much to the state and so much to another organism. To me, as to other members of this house, treachery in all its forms is despicable, and the oath of allegiance is not double talk.

About all I can do at the present time is broadcast the reassurance that disloyalty is the rarest kind of exception; that those who have won their citizenship through risk and labour tend to cherish it at least as highly as those to whom it has come as a birthright. But in the opinion of many the disloyalty of one reflects upon the integrity of the many. For this and other reasons I believe new Canadians as a whole should welcome this measure, which is designed to penalize and discourage betrayal. All those who have spoken already have indicated that they approach such legislation with one eye to the special dangers of the moment and the other upon the preservation of the traditional freedoms. One of those freedoms, of course, is the right to advocate social and economic changes; and most of us, no matter what our own views, will champion the right of the other man to express his. The house will note that paragraph (f) reads:

> . . . if in Canada, has, by a court of competent jurisdiction, been convicted of any offence involving disaffection or disloyalty to His Majesty.

Hon. members will realize that a court will deal with this problem. To indicate that there is an awareness in high judicial places of what is going on in this country and in the world, I want to quote from a great judge and a great Canadian, Mr. Justice Ivan C. Rand. Speaking in Toronto on March 30 he delivered the annual lecture sponsored by the Hillman foundation, established in 1946 by the amalgamated clothing workers of America in memory of the late president of the union, Sidney Hillman:

> Mr. Justice Rand stressed the duty of judges to protect the nonconformist "against popular clamour, against any sort of subservience to that clamour or the betrayal from any quarter of our inheritance.
> Our liberties are largely the accomplishments of such men. North America has been born of rebellion, rebellion in government, in church, in social organizations."

He went on to say:

> The courts were constantly faced by the problem of determining the boundaries of individual freedom —the point at which individual action threatens the general security.
> This could be determined by application of the rule of law, as opposed to the rule of man's despotism. It was insufficient to define freedoms without granting them to every citizen. The rule of law was the uncompromising rule of principle as against expediency.

He went on further:

> Freedom of speech was also threatened by the discovery that it often was not exercised in good faith. Deceit had become an instrument in the propagation of an ideology, raising questions of the greatest difficulty in determining the point at which liberties must give way in order to maintain the wider security.

It is obvious to everyone in this house that the chief targets of this bill will be the communists. It is important, however, to make it very clear that the section is directed against them not because they are advocates of Marxism but because those it penalizes have become agents of a foreign state. It is one thing, for instance, for a man to attempt to convince his fellows that living conditions in the city of Omsk are better than those in Oshawa. That strikes me as a legitimate undertaking, though a bit foolish and I would presume rather thankless; but it is altogether different for a man to give his full devotion to another state and actively conspire against the country from which as a citizen he claims protection and all the benefits it may have in store for him.

Under this bill men will not be punished for their political beliefs but rather for their political treachery. I believe this bill is intended to make it very tough for traitors, which is as it should be.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I must say a few words on this bill. I cannot help feeling that it must have been with the greatest reluctance that a Liberal government felt it necessary to introduce a bill along these lines, just as it must be with the greatest reluctance that Liberal members will feel it necessary to support it. I think one could safely change the word "Liberal" in that sentence to "Canadian" and it would still apply.

As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has so well pointed out, that we are faced with legislation of this kind at the present time is entirely due to the activities of those whom we lump together under the name of communists. The principle of this bill is not new, but the principle in the original bill is becoming broader all the time. Despite our hatred of communism and all it stands for; despite the danger which communism presents to us, we must not lose sight of other dangers that may be even more alarming. There is a great deal of talk throughout the country, and justifiably, about subversive activities. I rather wish we heard less of the word "subversive" and more of that very plain word "traitor" which was used a moment ago by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), because that word leaves no doubt whatever as to what is meant.

Because one sees dangers in the principles which underlie this necessary bill, that in no way means that one has the slightest sympathy for those subversive actors whom I prefer to call traitors; and I trust that we in this house may continue to separate the two sides, one the necessity of combating that sort of activity, and the other the necessity of protecting those things in our own mind which are our main justification for opposing totalitarianism in all its forms. I was born and brought up in Canada in the days when we were British subjects and proud of it. I was brought up to regard the fact that I was a British subject as one of the most remarkable attributes which I could ever have; one of my privileges and one which imposed consequent duties.

In recent years the term "British subject" has become, for most of us, "Canadian citizen", and the same love of the term and respect for its implications I hope applies. There are those who have become Canadian citizens voluntarily. Perhaps they are entitled to more credit than I am. I did not become a Canadian citizen voluntarily but by an act of God. Those who have come to us from other shores have become Canadian citizens by their own choice. I assume the majority of them also place a value upon their Canadian citizenship, although most of us have taken occasion from time to time to regret that we did not emphasize that value sufficiently at the time we allowed them to acquire citizenship.

What I am leading up to, Mr. Speaker, is that I have, we all have, the greatest sympathy with the need and intent of this bill. There is not one of us who is not going to say "aye" when it comes to voting on the measure which is at least partially intended to protect this country against its enemies. But there is, sir—let us admit it—building up in this country a mass fear. Please note that I deliberately did not use the word "hysteria". I do not think there will be built up in Canada a mass hysteria, but a mass fear is being built up in this country. I am a victim of it. I believe that, to a greater or lesser extent, we all are. It is a fear to some extent of the unknown, which is a very dangerous fear because that type of fear is catching. It is, therefore, quite possible that we may fall into a trap and be carried too far. I do not want to lay myself open to a charge of international disrespect, but I suggest there are cases in the world today of mass hysteria from which we might take some lessons.

My purpose in speaking at this time in connection with a bill which takes away something from the individual is to urge upon the minister, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and the government of Canada that the greatest care be taken in the administration of this act. I know that hearings will be held in every case before a man can lose his citizenship. Mr. Speaker, what I hope not to see is dozens of hearings across the country because some well-intentioned individual thinks that someone else is not as loyal as he should be. None of us will object if we proceed expeditiously and relentlessly against those who are guilty, but heaven protect us from a wave of witch-hunting. We are not ready for it now, but I honestly fear that this wave of what I call mass fear might bring us to the position where we were almost ready to indulge in a witch-hunt, and that would be a great calamity in itself.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, and I believe that Canada believes in the principle that it is better for some guilty persons to escape than for one innocent person to suffer when he was not guilty. It is the innocent person, not the traitor, with whom I am concerned in connection with the broadening of these powers for taking away Canadian citizenship once lawfully acquired. I would say to the government, and through them to those who will administer this act as well as to those who may be considering amendments to the act: Do not make it too easy to deprive a man of his citizenship, because for once I agree with the member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart): there is nothing that we can give of greater value than Canadian citizenship.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in the beginning I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Applewhaite) and to say that, like him, I hope and believe that we shall not give way to hysteria or witch-hunting, the evils of which he has not exaggerated in the least. I should like also to associate myself with what was said by the member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), and to join with him in saying that I hope what we call new Canadians will not regard this as in any way derogatory to their status. I would even go beyond what the member for Spadina said. I believe that we will find in many new Canadians a prizing of their citizenship perhaps far beyond the value which those of us who have always been Canadians attach to it. I have met many new Canadians who have made me feel that if there was the same devotion to this country on the part of a large number of the old citizens, it might be a much better place.

It was only today that I carefully read this paragraph in the speech from the throne, and I observed the use of this wording:

> Appropriate amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act will be introduced to prevent the retention of Canadian citizenship . . .

It is only today that I realize the use of the word "retention" is intended to indicate that it applies to those who have received it and, therefore, not to natural-born Canadians. It is with regard to that general question that I should like to make a few comments along the lines taken by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), as to whether notwithstanding our approval of this bill we might not like to see something wider dealing with the situation.

I observe that when we debated this question a year ago I quoted a remark made by the minister of external affairs which he had made during the summer of 1949. At page 2130 of Hansard for May 3, 1950, I find the following:

> He . . .

That is the minister of external affairs.

> . . . told the Montreal Rotary club the domestic threat of communism must be met . . .

Here are his words.

> . . . "by strengthening, if necessary, our Criminal Code, against actions which threaten the security of the state.

I quote that and I remind you, Mr. Speaker, there was a reference to the Criminal Code made this afternoon by the leader of the opposition. I wish to stress what we have stressed before, that we are not advocating a witch-hunt. We are not advocating any attempt to penalize people for what, in Japan, they called dangerous thoughts. The only thing we are talking about is overt acts. The point we question is whether the code is adequate. Having regard to the fact that nothing has been done since the minister of external affairs made that remark, I think it would be relevant to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) to tell us this afternoon whether, in fact, the government has decided that nothing along that line needs to be done.

There is another thing that is a good deal in my mind, and it came out in the debate a year ago. I do not think communism would be nearly so dangerous if it only appealed to evil people, people whom we ordinarily characterize as undesirable. The thing that bothers me about it—I attempted to bring this up a year ago—is that it has a strange appeal to people whom, from many points of view, we must concede to be high-minded, good people, however completely misled they seem to be. I quoted at that time briefly, and I will quote again, from a book called "The God that Failed", and which brought out what I think is a fact and what I think accentuates our danger. I quote briefly from page 6 of the introduction which was written by the well-known English leader Crossman. Speaking of the intellectuals—and there were six intellectuals who contributed to this book—he asked this question:

> How could these intellectuals accept the dogmatism of Stalinism? The answer is to be found scattered through the pages which follow. For the intellectual, material comforts are relatively unimportant; what he cares about is spiritual freedom.

And again Crossman says:

> —the communist novice . . . wearied and worried by the privilege of freedom—getting relief by subjecting himself to the canon law of the Kremlin.

I read that quotation to the house partly because it called up to my mind an incident that happened to me a short time ago when I was visited by one of what I suppose you would call the followers of Mr. Endicott. He and a couple of other people appeared at my room one day and I had a short talk with them, and remonstrated with them for what seemed to me to be the extraordinary folly of their attitude. I might have been occupying my time more profitably, I expect. When they raised the question whether we were justified in holding the views we do hold about Russian despotism, I said: "What do you make of the case of Czechoslovakia?" One of these young men said to me: "Would you be surprised to know that I was at a demonstration in Prague last summer? We were all together, students, police and others, and we were celebrating in honour of peace. What would you think about that?" I said: "I would think it was one of the finest bits of arranged propaganda that I had ever heard of in my life." There you are, Mr. Speaker. There were young men, perhaps more or less sincere, who had been completely taken in by that propaganda.

I have another thing here that I want to read to the house because it indicates the kind of thing that is going on and which to me makes it much more serious than it would be, as I said a few minutes ago, if it was the kind of thing that appealed only to the hard-boiled people of the type that we always regard as undesirable, who are selfish and who are ready to break the law for their own ends. I hold in my hand a publication called The Frontier. It is a new publication. I do not know much about it. I think it is a respectable publication. I think so partly perhaps because the issue previous to the one I hold in my hand argued that we should have regard to the common-sense laws of economics when we were thinking about the various social measures that we should pass. That seemed to me to be a sensible remark. Perhaps I am therefore predisposed to regard this as a sensible publication. It is called The Frontier, "a Christian commentary on the common life". Here is the monthly letter, February, 1951. It has some things to say about communism and its appeal which I present to the house because I have to confess that I was extremely slow to believe that communism had in it the danger that it has. I was slow to believe that the kind of people one meets and finds agreeable, and with whom we share many common thoughts, could have a department of their life in which they were able to do things which to me were almost incredible. I read briefly from this publication:

> Current Christian literature about communism, including some that comes from missionary societies and notably from China, has a good deal to say about its revivalist power. Converts to communism, especially the young, embrace it with a zeal and ardour, for the works as well as the faith, that often greatly impress Christian observers. They see college students, boys and girls at school, and unlettered workers responding to the appeal of what they believe is a message of world salvation and undergoing a new, severe discipline with complete self-abandonment.

Then I skip a few lines and continue:

> But it is also important to get this fact of communist fervour in perspective and not to be romantic about it: for it remains true that what is propagated as a messianic faith marks the bid of a minority for political domination, and only a minority within that minority consists of sacrificial zealots and idealists. George Orwell wrote—and he had some first-hand knowledge of the matter—that a revolutionary is oftener than not a social climber with a bomb in his pocket.

I have thought it worth while to mention this because it seems to me that those of us who find it difficult to believe the kind of things that go on should remind ourselves occasionally of such facts as what I have just read. I always remember a German refugee, who had become a Canadian citizen and who had a profound loathing of the nazis, saying to me in June, 1940, just when the war really broke out: "Regard nothing as fantastic". By that he meant we could expect almost anything to be done. He was thinking particularly of sabotage. Incidentally, I have always thought that we owe a great deal to the police during those subsequent years for the fact that so little was done. But I mention that because I think it comes back to the point that I raised at the outset: whether in fact there is a broader situation here that we have not wholly dealt with. A phrase was used this afternoon, I think by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), referring to these people as agents of a foreign state. I confess that to me it is often unreal—something I have to pinch myself to remind myself of—that no doubt one is meeting every day and, for all one knows, perhaps eating at the same table with—I am not referring to the House of Commons—people who might be described in that phrase. I therefore say to the minister, it seems to me that what is being done is sound, although there may be points of detail that should be amended. But I put to him this broader question, and it is really the same question put by my leader: Is he satisfied and is the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), whose words I quoted although they are now more than a year old, satisfied that nothing further needs to be done beyond this rather minor and limited action which is now being taken?

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I would not rise and speak in this debate unless I thought I had something to contribute to it. In that respect I fancy that I am the same as those who have already spoken on this bill. Much has been said this afternoon in respect of certain phases of citizenship rights which prove perhaps to be disloyal to His Majesty the King. It has always occurred to me that the time to nip disloyalty in the bud is before the bud begins to bloom. In that respect I therefore think that we have reason to be particularly careful as to the type of people or, shall I say, the attitudes of the people to whom we grant citizenship. I am quite cognizant of the fact that the government has safeguarded this matter to some considerable extent in its present legislation. I have, however, one suggestion to make in respect of that particular matter. I know of course that a person coming to this country from some other country cannot just suddenly pick up and become a citizen. There are certain rules, regulations and procedures to follow, and he should not be given his citizenship until it is pretty well proven to the authorities that he is worthy to become a citizen. My suggestion, however, is that there should be a number of citizens who sponsor the application of one desiring to become a citizen. I would go slightly further. I would suggest even that the application be given some notice in the press. I would go so far as to say that the names of those who are sponsoring the application should appear in the notice. I would go one step further and say that those names, together with the applicant's name, should appear not only in the official publication, which is the Canada Gazette, but in some more widely circulated periodical, preferably the daily press in the particular community in which the person lives.

The reason I am making these suggestions is that I do not think one who may be accused of disloyalty or disaffection is perhaps entirely to blame. A man is in a sad state of affairs when he has no friends. I am of the opinion that his friends, and particularly those who would have to sponsor his application for citizenship, must bear at least part of the responsibility of what might turn out to be disloyalty or disaffection.

I am passing that suggestion on to the minister. I notice that during the debate he is taking notes, and I should like to have him express his views in respect of the suggestion.

As I see the bill there are just one or two further comments that I would care to make. One is respecting the fact that when disaffection has been proved the person loses his citizenship. I should like to dwell on that for just a moment. To me, and to the most of us, citizenship as Canadians is a very precious thing. On the other hand I should like to venture this rather modified observation. What advantages are there in citizenship? That may be a rather striking observation, but let us examine it carefully. A person comes to this country. He enjoys the courtesy of Canada by being able to stay in this country; and just so long as he behaves himself he is permitted to stay. He can invest his money; he can go into business. Under certain conditions he can seek employment, and he can enjoy all the rights of citizenship except perhaps the right of the franchise and the right to hold public office.

Looking at it in that way I am wondering whether the loss of citizenship is such a great penalty to impose upon one who is disloyal to the country. Just what would it matter to him anyway? Therefore I am inclined to agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that some more drastic steps should be taken to deal with those who are disloyal, or, in the words of the bill, are convicted of an offence involving disaffection to His Majesty, or which might be interpreted as disloyalty to our particular way of life. I recall as an illustration of what I am talking about carrying on an election campaign.

Some of us have been through a number of elections. I recall that in this particular campaign I had one man who was a particular opponent of the position which our party took. I am not saying that he was an opposition candidate. I do not want to leave that impression. No, he acted purely within what I would suppose to be his rights, namely, the right of any citizen to be able to express himself as our right of free speech gives him. But he followed me to some of my meetings. He tried to cause trouble. He was a vigorous opponent of what I was trying to proclaim. And after the campaign got well under way, in fact it was almost terminated, I began to wonder whether or not the chap was going to decrease my expected majority. I began to get a little bit disturbed. Someone came to me and said: "Oh, Hansell, you do not need to be afraid of him. Why, don't you know that man is not even a Canadian citizen." I was rather surprised at that. I do not mean to imply now that he came from some—oh, well I will put it this way. The gentleman was an American. He was farming in our part of the country and had farmed there for a good many years. It was taken for granted that he was a Canadian.

I found that he was not a citizen and never intended to become a citizen; yet here he was taking all the advantages of citizenship, even to entering into the position of influencing public opinion in an election campaign.

Mr. Coldwell: And breaking the law.

Mr. Hansell: Well, he did not vote, of course.

Mr. Coldwell: He must not take an active part in an election.

Mr. Hansell: Well, he was taking part to the extent that he was supporting one of the other candidates. I just cite that as an illustration. I am not going to say that he broke the law. I am not going to say that he did anything particularly harmful. He was just a little bit better able to campaign than some other citizens in that particular community may have been, that is all. I am only pointing to the illustration to show that even though a person is not a citizen of Canada he can enjoy all the rights of citizenship perhaps with the exception of the franchise and the holding of certain public offices.

I go a step further and say that what will make citizens really proud of their citizenship is to make effective in Canada our particular way of life, so that the citizens of Canada can enjoy the freedom we profess, and enjoy it with that standard of prosperity and quality of living that this country, with its vast wealth and with our free democratic concept, is able to give its citizens.

Before taking my seat I wish to make only two further observations, and I make them on the basis of what was said a short time ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart). He delivered what I considered a most excellent speech, one with which I agree almost one hundred per cent. I cannot say I agree the full one hundred per cent because, of course, he does not belong to my party. For that reason I shall have to depreciate my agreement with him to the extent of a fraction of one per cent at least.

However, he did bring out a point in connection with the interpretation of disaffection. I fear that there is a weakness in the measure in that respect. After all, under this measure a minister of the crown will have the final decision. I do not suppose this government would be guilty of what I am about to suggest, and I am quite certain the minister would not, but the interpretation of the section could be broad enough to hold a club over the head of any citizen who might oppose vigorously some principle or policy His Majesty's advisers might be pursuing.

I recall the early days of the movement this group represents. During the days from 1930 to 1935, when we were proposing monetary reform and were exposing the iniquities of this burdensome debt-creating monetary system, some of our opponents were so bitter that they declared publicly some of us should be locked up because we were proposing things that would upset entirely our whole economic system.

Some may smile. I see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) smiles, and I hope he does so because he believes such a proposal to be ridiculous. I thought he was going to answer and say that he did think it was ridiculous; however, he remains silent. Therefore I shall say for him that it is ridiculous.

We can say what we like about communism and about those people who are now at the head of the peace movement but I am convinced that some of them are conscientious in their approach to the problem. They lean over backwards in their pacifism, and they have been imbued with the ideas they now pursue. Whether it be they or whether it be other persons who are opposed to the status quo, such people are going to be looked upon with some suspicion. Who knows but that the interpretation of this section involving disaffection might not be so wide that it would affect the free expression of our people. I think the minister might give some consideration to that point—and no doubt he has, because he would not be presenting the bill if he had not.

I shall conclude by supporting the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North that there should be some final court of appeal, even to the extent of appealing a decision by the minister. Such a course would remove the matter completely from the political arena, and would leave it with our courts, so that justice could be rendered on the merits of any particular case. I support the hon. member in his suggestion, and I hope the minister will express himself in regard to it.

(Translation):

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, it was stated by an hon. member opposite that it would have been difficult for the Liberal party to ask this house to enact this kind of legislation. As far as I am concerned, had I been a member of the cabinet, I should not have hesitated to ask the house to enact it, chiefly because I am a staunch believer in Liberal principles. I would have been pleased to suggest to this house that the facilities which are given people from abroad to enter this country and to enjoy the rights of Canadian citizenship are too great and ought to be curtailed, for in certain cases, one may question those people's intentions.

I think this is an excellent bill, and I have no objection to conferring upon the hon. the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris), or the governor in council, the prerogative or authority to decide to whom this amendment to the Canadian Citizenship Act shall apply.

Those who in this house or elsewhere advocate a distinctly Canadian flag and national anthem are often considered as faddists. But such is not the case. In fact, those symbols have a very deep meaning for the Canadian citizen, and especially for the person who wishes to become a Canadian citizen. They help him understand how proud he must be of the privilege of Canadian citizenship. It is our duty to show these new Canadians the value of the privilege of being a citizen of a country like Canada and there is no better way of showing that than by having a national flag and a national anthem. Such symbols would make them prouder of being citizens of this great Canada because, even if our population is not large, we belong to a country whose unlimited resources can make it one of the greatest in the world. Besides, in the matter of exports our country ranks third and we can surely improve our position in other fields if all our citizens, by birth or naturalization, understand the value of this North American country.

I fail to see how this legislation could interfere with certain freedoms. I have always felt that freedom should not be granted equally to good and to evil. To those who enjoy Canadian citizenship, who believe in one philosophy or other, whether it be historic liberalism, Marxian socialism or what is called Fabian socialism, I say that a doctrine which is bad overseas is equally bad in Canada. To those who ask for the privileges of Canadian citizenship and who use these same privileges in an effort to destroy our public men and undermine our institutions, I say they have no right to those privileges.

We all seek to enhance the prestige attached to Canadian citizenship. We must therefore prevent anyone from outplaying Canadian authorities in certain fields, philosophy, in particular.

I congratulate the government for introducing this bill in the house. It certainly is justified. I feel we should thank our leaders because those who have long been unafraid to raise their voice against Marxist communist ideologies now see their warnings seriously heeded. I would even like the bill to be more drastic. In my opinion, those who leave this country under the pretext of returning to the paradise in which they were born should be compelled, before they are allowed to come back to this country, to go through a certain period of probation so as to prove that their mind is now free from the ideologies which first drew them back to the land of their birth, and that they will not again engage in activities detrimental to Canadian citizenship.

I would like the bill to go further. I may seem radical, but I believe that evil should not be permitted to operate freely and equally with good. A doctrine that is bad overseas is equally bad in Canada.

I am sure that the public will accept this amendment to the Canadian Citizenship Act. I dare say that a large proportion of our people who understand how right we are in asking that restrictions be applied to certain individuals will rejoice in the fact that the government is taking all necessary means to ensure that Canada is never faced with what many, even today, consider to be only an imaginary threat but which is a real danger, since the enemy is on the prowl, waiting for the proper moment to pitch into us, if I may be permitted that common expression. I hope the public will realize that our fear is not imaginary, for we see only too clearly the methods and the means used by Marxist communist propaganda to preach that doctrine in our country, almost openly. It is a danger that we must ward off once and for all. It is not a mere threat, but a real and immediate danger.

[Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf).]

(Text):

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, one of the reproaches of democracy in our country as well as in many others is that so little value is placed upon the privilege of citizenship. It may be because we make citizenship so easy to obtain. It may be that in the case of those who are born in this country something may still be lacking in the inculcation in minor years of an appreciation of the duties as well as of the privileges of citizenship. It may be that, in the case of those who acquire citizenship in Canada through the machinery of the citizenship act, we have not been as careful as we should have been with respect to the preparation of such persons, both for admission to Canada and then in turn for admission to the privilege of Canadian citizenship.

I have been pleased with one note that has run through this debate, as it ran through the debate on the introduction of the citizenship act in the 1946 session, that we in this parliament are now beginning to reflect the desire and purpose that throughout Canada a higher value shall be placed upon the possession of Canadian citizenship. It seems to me that if we achieve that end we shall have contributed not a little to the strengthening of the basic bulwarks of democracy in Canada.

There is one other note that has been sounded in this debate this afternoon which, it seems to me, was timely and proper. I refer to the concern that citizenship shall not be taken away arbitrarily from those who now possess it. There are so many dangers in interfering with freedom of expression that this parliament, as the champion of the freedoms of Canadians, must be most alert and vigilant that nothing be permitted, if we can prevent it, by the way of infringement upon the right of free expression which is one of the great embellishments and privileges of Canadian citizenship.

I am sure that the house received with pleasure the reassurance of the minister when introducing the bill this afternoon as to the intent of the department in administering the provisions of the act. There may be something lacking in section 19 of the act, and properly reference has been made to this fact this afternoon by several hon. members who have spoken. It is true that under section 19 of the act no citizen may be deprived of his citizenship without a hearing before a commission, if he desires an inquiry by a commission. We have in section 19 the clear provision that such a commission shall be presided over by a person appointed by the governor in council who holds or has held judicial office. That is a salutary provision, and undoubtedly is a most valuable safeguard in connection with the exercise of the powers under section 19 of the act. Of course, it will apply also to the amendments under consideration today. However, there are one or two features of that right which I think the house might well consider. For instance, attached to that right to a hearing before a commission is the proviso that, if the governor in council thinks fit, instead of being held by a commission any such inquiry may be held by the superior court of the province in which the person concerned resides.

That immediately raises the question whether it might be better to have these inquiries held by the courts. The suggestion was made this afternoon that in any event, even after one of these inquiries by a commission, it should be open to the person concerned to carry an appeal to the courts. It would be interesting to learn in connection with the inquiries held to date under section 19 (4) of the Immigration Act, how many have been held by appointed commissions and how many by the superior courts of the provinces. No doubt the minister has some statistics on the point, and I hope that at some stage of the debate he will give the house that information. It seems to me that with language like this in the act there could be no objection on the part of the government to providing either that all inquiries shall be held by superior courts or that there should be the right of appeal to the courts before an executive order is made by the minister depriving any individual of his precious citizenship.

As to the amendments themselves, Mr. Speaker, I am bound to say that the bill before us is of much more meagre proportions and much narrower effect than I for one had expected. I re-examined the appropriate paragraph in the speech from the throne to which the minister made reference this afternoon in moving second reading, and found these words:

> Appropriate amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act will be introduced to prevent the retention of Canadian citizenship by persons who have renounced their allegiance or shown by their conduct that they are not loyal to Canada.

Unquestionably many members of this house placed an interpretation upon that paragraph which is not borne out by the bill now before us; either that, or there has been some change of purpose on the part of the government in the intervening two months. Certainly the impression that went abroad was that the amendments the government proposed to introduce would be more rigorous and far-reaching than those we find in the bill. As a matter of fact the scope of this bill is quite narrow. It will be observed in the first place that it amends only one section of the citizenship act, namely section 19. It applies, of course, only to naturalized, and not Canadian-born citizens. Even within those narrowing confines the bill purports to confer the power of cancellation of citizenship upon the minister in only two cases, broadly speaking. The first case is that of the citizen who has taken up residence abroad under circumstances which indicate that he is transferring his domicile back to the land from which he first came. The second is the case of the individual who has been convicted of an offence involving disaffection or disloyalty to His Majesty.

May I just dwell on that latter provision for a moment. I should think the house would require, either from the minister or from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), some elucidation of those words "offence involving disaffection or disloyalty to His Majesty", particularly in comparison with the language of the present act, which is different. In the present act the conviction which is a ground for the deprivation of citizenship on the order of the minister is conviction of treason or sedition by a court of competent jurisdiction. At first blush one would say the words "offence involving disaffection or disloyalty to His Majesty" would cover more ground than treason or sedition, but I think the house will wish some clarification of the words in this amendment. What offences are involved there apart from those already covered by the present act, treason or sedition, and the other that comes to mind, namely, an offence under the Official Secrets Act? I think the house will desire that information from the minister.

There is one observation of a detailed nature I think might properly be made in connection with these provisions. What is to follow when the minister has made an order cancelling the citizenship of any individual who has offended the provisions of section 19? One immediately asks, does it involve deportation? Well, under the present citizenship act, of course, no question of deportation is involved. In all fairness, I suppose under the amendments one would say that where the individual has resided outside Canada for two years in circumstances which suggest that he does not intend to return, no possible question of deportation arises. Even there, however, it might be a nice question if that individual returned and sought to enter Canada. He could not enter as a Canadian citizen, but he might contend that he was a resident of Canada. There is nothing here touching his status under the Immigration Act, it seems to me. It might be well worth the time of this house to consider what further incidents should attach in a case of that kind, where in a clear case an order has been made taking away the citizenship of an individual who has left the country.

But let us take the other case, in which the individual has been deprived of his citizenship because of conviction of an offence involving disaffection or disloyalty to His Majesty. Suppose it is not a conviction of the serious offence of sedition or the even more serious offence of treason, but on a charge under the Official Secrets Act. What happens after he has been convicted and sentenced, and served his term? There are provisions in other legislation in regard to deportation, but it seems to me this house ought to include within the ambit of its consideration of a measure of this kind the question of what is to follow in such a case.

I refer to section 41 of the Immigration Act to see what light it may throw on this question of the right of a citizen who has been deprived of his citizenship under this act by order of the minister because of having committed one of the offences which are grounds for deprivation, to see what may be the position of such a person under this section of the Immigration Act. Section 41 has remained in its present form, without amendment, since 1928. It took that form in that year by amendment of the previous section which goes back to 1919. The language of this section, it seems to me, offers an interesting comparison with the language of the amendment now before the house. It reads:

> Whenever any person other than a Canadian citizen advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Great Britain or Canada, or other British dominion, colony, possession or dependency, or the overthrow by force or violence of constituted law and authority, or the assassination of any official of the government of Great Britain or Canada or other British dominion, colony, possession or dependency, or of any foreign government, or shall by word or act create or attempt to create riot or public disorder in Canada, or shall by common repute belong to or be suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from, or in any way attempts to control, any resident of Canada by force or threat of bodily harm, or by blackmail; such person for the purposes of this act shall be considered and classed as an undesirable immigrant.

Then follows a provision dealing with the machinery attaching to his being classified as an undesirable immigrant and the right of deportation provided by the act.

One naturally asks how this language, in the view of the Department of Justice, compares in breadth with the language of the amendment; in other words, where the offence involved is disaffection or disloyalty to His Majesty. Does it follow from the terms of section 41 of the Immigration Act that every citizen who is deprived of citizenship because of the conviction of an offence involving disaffection or disloyalty to His Majesty, immediately becomes subject to deportation, or is it the view of the Department of Justice that the language of section 41 of the Immigration Act is not as broad in some respects as the language of the new clause to which I have just referred? I think, Mr. Speaker, particularly having regard to the note sounded by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in his speech today, that this question of what follows, so far as the individual is concerned, the order of the minister depriving him of his citizenship is one of high importance. If the effect of the order is simply to deprive a man of his citizenship and leave him free to exercise all the other privileges enjoyed by persons in this country, it may be that we shall have fallen short of taking the steps that ought to be taken in the light of an offence so serious as that involved in disaffection or disloyalty to His Majesty, particularly in dangerous times like those in which we are living.

The minister may say that is not a matter for the citizenship act. That may be, Mr. Speaker, but it certainly is a matter that ought to be considered when we are addressing ourselves to an amendment of this kind. I well recall that in 1946, when the bill embodying the citizenship act was under debate in this house, the relationship of many of the provisions of the bill to those in the Immigration Act received very careful consideration in the house. It was the subject of a protracted debate.

One wonders, for instance, in considering this provision, about such cases as the one we have been reading about in the newspapers lately, the case of Freda Linton, now

I believe Mrs. Freda Linton Alexander. If after her residence in the United States she is now being returned to Canada, a question will naturally arise. If she was born in Canada—I do not know whether she was—it is obvious the provision in this bill could have no application to her. If, on the other hand, she was born outside of Canada and acquired citizenship in Canada, and is now to be brought to Canada before this present legislation comes into effect after more than two years in the United States, is this legislation going to have any application to her? It would be interesting to know whether her return, under some compulsion from United States authorities, would have the effect of depriving the minister of any jurisdiction under the language of subsection (d) which applies to residence abroad of not less than two years. If Mrs. Alexander is returned to Canada in this way, what is to be the effect of this section in such a case? As I say, I do not know whether Freda Linton was born in Canada, but I think that her imminent return, as we read about it in the newspapers, may raise some interesting questions as to the effect of subsection (d).

I observe also, Mr. Speaker, that we are not informed by the government as to what, if anything, is to be done in the case of those persons who are travelling abroad under Canadian passports which have been procured by false pretences or under improper representations. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that that subject was the basis of one of the important recommendations of the royal commission on espionage in 1946. We have heard very little about any attempt on the part of the government to give effect to that important recommendation. It seems to me that the use of a Canadian passport obtained by a person who, born abroad, has obtained citizenship in Canada and obtained a passport by false pretences, should be carefully considered, as to whether that ought not also to be made a ground for the revocation of citizenship. We know that there have been abuses of passports granted by the proper Canadian authorities.

I share with those who have expressed themselves this afternoon a concern that no citizen of this country should be arbitrarily deprived of his citizenship by executive action or decree. It would be a situation fraught with the greatest danger for Canadian citizens if it were open to any minister, by irresponsible or ill-advised action, to deprive a Canadian citizen of this very high privilege and possession, Canadian citizenship, apart from a clear offence against the provisions of the act.

It may be, Mr. Speaker, that the enactment of legislation of this kind will have a salutary effect, not simply in giving power to the minister to enforce a rigorous measure against persons who commit offences against the act, but also in dissuading persons from committing such offences. It may be that this measure will exert a little more restraint upon those who do not value adequately the high possession of Canadian citizenship, and do not show His Majesty that loyalty which is properly required of every Canadian citizen, and everyone who enjoys the protection and benefits of living under the laws of Canada.

One may be pardoned in conclusion for expressing, as others have done in this debate, amazement that there are still some people in Canada who are prepared to place a lower value upon Canadian citizenship, freedom under Canadian institutions and Canadian laws, a part in the precious Canadian heritage, than the subscription to a foreign doctrine that is based upon a denial of God, a denial of the right of the individual to freedom, and the right to worship God in his own manner according to his lights.

It simply fills one with amazement that people who have lived in Canada, and who have acquired this great privilege of Canadian citizenship, should still be prepared to place that citizenship in jeopardy by preferring to follow a foreign ideology whose political direction with all its revolutionary purposes is directed from the Kremlin today, an ideology which demands—as we well remember from the evidence taken before the royal commission on espionage in 1946—a higher loyalty than the individual or citizen owes to his own country, regardless of what that country may be or his rights and privileges in it. Yet that is the political essence of this foul doctrine which some people in Canada, even after living here, even after acquiring Canadian citizenship, are still prepared to value more highly than their rights in this country.

Where cases are proven of offences of that kind, Mr. Speaker, there should be no delay in applying the law according to its full rigour. There should be no hesitation in enacting rigorous laws in this parliament and in calling for rigorous enforcement of those laws, as long as we safeguard the rights of the individual by permitting him to go to the courts, in order to assure him that there will be no arbitrary application of the laws or arbitrary decision under the laws simply because parliament gives to the minister a right to revoke citizenship in the case of an individual. There, it seems to me, is the proper course that ought to guide parliament in a case of this kind. Let us maintain the right of the individual to go to the courts in order that there may be no arbitrary exercise of executive power, but in defining the offences which give rise to the power to take away from people rights of which they have proven themselves utterly unworthy, I for one would not hesitate for a moment in asking parliament to proceed to enact rigorous laws and in calling upon the government for the rigorous enforcement of the laws so enacted by parliament. It seems to me that while this bill goes a little distance in that direction, it is not one that really carries us very far toward coping with the broader problem with regard to those who are showing themselves daily to have much more love for and loyalty to this foreign ideology directed by the government of another country than they have for freedom and for Canadian institutions. I hope that some time the government, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) called upon them to do, will give the house an opportunity of dealing with legislation in proper form—with proper safeguards of the rights of the individual, with proper protection of his right to go to the courts—dealing with this question of disaffection and disloyalty that we are seeing expressed in many forms in many places in Canada today.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Loss of Canadian citizenship.

Mr. Drew: Before passing from section 1, I think it would be appropriate that the minister should indicate whether there is in fact any thought in the minds of the government that they will proceed under any other legislation to deal with communists or similar activity in this country. I think it is appropriate that this information should be before the members of the committee because, whether rightly or wrongly, at the time of the speech from the throne there was a good deal of comment in the press which placed a wider interpretation upon the reference in the speech from the throne to this legislation than the bill now before us justifies. In many newspapers across Canada there was the suggestion that the government at last were going to come face to face with this issue and that they were going to pass from the stage of twilight peace to some measure of reality in facing what they regard as an emergency in other cases but as not so much of an emergency apparently in this. For that reason I think that, before we pass from this section which calls for general remarks, we should know whether the government at this session intends to introduce any other legislation pertaining to communist activity in this country.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): As the leader of the opposition has indicated, the press comment at the time the speech from the throne was delivered speculated on what the particular reference to the citizenship act might mean. Nevertheless, it must be obvious, and it is obvious from what he has just said, that to be effective and to do what he recommends, any amendment to the laws of this country would be made by the Minister of Justice through the Criminal Code or through some other form of statute. The citizenship act is confined to the granting and the revoking of citizenship; and in my opinion it should not be the vehicle of any other form of legislation to apply to a particular group of people. Under those conditions, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that our consideration this afternoon is related to the present amendment to the citizenship act. If the government should at any time decide to take the action that the leader of the opposition suggests should be taken, I am quite sure that notice of it would be given on the order paper in the normal manner, and would reach the house in that manner.

Mr. Drew: I do not think that the remarks made by the minister in any way meet the situation. The act we have under consideration, and particularly the amendments included in this act, become a vehicle for bringing under the effect of this act other legislation such as the legislation to which I have referred and which I have suggested should be adopted. The section before us for consideration would provide that where an offence had been committed under the Official Secrets Act or under the Naturalization Act, and the courts had found anyone guilty of an offence under those acts, then under this act the governor in council could deny continuing citizenship to those who had been guilty of that offence. It is for that very reason that I have suggested that we should know at this time whether it is intended to introduce an amendment to the Criminal Code which will deal with those activities related to communism or any similar foreign invasion of our rights by the methods that are best known to us in relation to the communist party in this country at the present time. If something is not to be done to deal with those activities, then this act is substantially inadequate to deal with the major activities of communists, either of Canadian birth or of foreign birth, who are seeking to destroy our democratic processes at this time.

If, on the other hand, there were to be another act dealing with this subject, then this provision would be very much more effective, and could have much wider consequences. It was with that thought in mind that I asked the question; and I did observe that the minister very correctly pointed out that the introduction of an amendment to the Criminal Code would be done by the Minister of Justice. I think it would be proper, if the government has reached a decision, that the Minister of Justice should indicate to us now whether any amending legislation along that line will be introduced. I would point out before I sit down, in the hope that the Minister of Justice can indicate that something of that kind is to be done, that it was not only the press which drew conclusions which went beyond the apparent intention of the government. There was before this house a bill introduced by a private member, which would deal with certain aspects of communist activity. It will be recalled that when that bill was called on the order paper the hon. member who had placed the bill before the house stated that he did not propose to proceed with it at that time because of his expectation that the government did intend to deal with this matter as indicated in the speech from the throne.

I need not do more than point out that the hon. member who was putting forward this legislation perhaps had better opportunity than I have to know the views of the government in regard to some matters which are discussed elsewhere than in this house. For that reason I think it would be appropriate that we should know before we pass from this first section of the bill whether the Minister of Justice has any thought of introducing legislation along that line.

Mr. Garson: As I had thought that the leader of the opposition was aware, we have each year brought down in this house amendments to various sections of the Criminal Code. There seems a disposition on the part of some hon. members here to think that the government, or some members of the government, have a fixed idea with regard to these matters of dealing with communism and subversive activity, but I can assure the leader of the opposition that that is not the case; and that in our annual task of considering the various amendments to the various sections of the Criminal Code, which we think should be introduced under the circumstances that are applicable in that year, we do consider, and are considering at the present time, sections such as sedition, treason and the like. At the present moment I am wondering myself whether that was the draft that my hon. friend referred to this afternoon.

The law officers of the crown, in the ordinary routine course of their duties, are working on draft amendments to the Criminal Code; but I hasten to add that the fact that they are so working does not mean that all or any part of such a draft will necessarily emerge finally as a piece of legislation recommended by the government to the house.

Mr. Drew: Legislation if necessary, but not necessarily legislation.

Mr. Garson: The words are my hon. friend's. I do not think that I would even necessarily agree with his meaning.

It is a matter of the most elementary knowledge of any member of any legislative assembly that government policy originates sometimes in the minds of the ministers and sometimes in the minds of ranking civil servants and others who pass the suggestions on; and that in the course of considering changes of policy it may be necessary, in order to crystallize views upon it, to secure a draft of these ideas in the form of an amendment to an act; and then that draft is considered. I am not suggesting that this practice is being followed in respect to the draft amendment to which I referred a moment or so ago. Such a draft may be considered first of all by a committee of civil servants, and then get to a committee of the cabinet, and finally to the cabinet itself. It is not until it has been considered by the cabinet, and until the cabinet has reached an opinion upon it and it is brought into the house as a matter of government policy, that it is something for which the government is responsible.

Wishing to be as helpful as I can to my hon. friend I really do not think that the government in this case, or in any other case, is called upon to say at the present stage what decision it will reach with respect to Criminal Code amendments which have not yet come before the government for consideration, but which are in the course of preparation and will come before it in due course.

As soon as that decision is reached I shall be very happy to introduce the Criminal Code amendments bill in the ordinary course. At that time my hon. friend will have the opportunity of debating the provisions of that bill. If the bill does not contain the provisions which he desires, then he will have the opportunity of reproaching us for not having included them when we come to consider the estimates of the Department of Justice. I am afraid that beyond that I cannot help my hon. friend very much.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): During the debate on second reading I, on behalf of the C.C.F. party, offered to the minister a suggestion which had as its intention partially the safeguarding of the individual and in part the safeguarding of the minister. It was, that in a situation where an individual has his citizenship taken from him on the decision of the minister, this individual should have the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. Would the minister care to comment on that suggestion?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I have a number of comments to make on the debate as soon as I can get the opportunity. Dealing with the one point raised by my hon. friend and followed by the hon. member for Eglinton, there is in section 19 an alternative manner of revoking citizenship. The process begins with a notice to the citizen that it is the intention of the minister to revoke his citizenship for stated reasons. Upon the receipt of that the citizen can then request a hearing before the revocation commission. Under certain circumstances the governor in council may, instead of having that hearing before the commission, have it before a judge of a superior court. I am informed that that procedure has not been taken in the past, but that all the hearings have been before the commission.

When the commission hears the evidence, including that of the citizen, they make a recommendation to the minister, who then may or may not revoke the citizenship. I also want to assure the committee that in no case has the citizenship been revoked when the commission recommends that it should not be revoked. In other words, the minister has accepted the recommendation of the commission not to revoke citizenship in every case. I may go further and say that there are cases in which the citizenship is not revoked despite the recommendation of the commission.

If my hon. friend thinks that when this commission makes its recommendation the minister should then make a decision and that thereafter there should be an appeal to a judge of a superior court, I suggest that it is a new thought, and one which was not brought before the house during the debates of 1946.

I think it must be obvious that the very existence of the commission, comprised, as it is, of a judge, and several citizens, indicates that they would protect the citizen, quite as much as would a normal judicial proceeding in court. For that matter I think there are many citizens who would prefer to have it done in that way, rather than with the publicity which would attend a court. Nevertheless we can give consideration to the suggestion. I do suggest however that this body is quite as impartial as one would obtain in any other proceeding, and I doubt if a further appeal is necessary to protect the citizen.

Mr. Fleming: Would the minister indicate in how many cases inquiry has been held by the courts as compared with the number of inquiries held before commissions?

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): As I said in the course of my remarks, we have never employed courts.

Mr. Fleming: Never employed them?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): No.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Does a citizen who is in danger of losing citizenship have the choice of deciding whether his case shall be reviewed before a commission or before a superior court?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I believe I can answer that by saying that no request for hearing before a superior court has come to our attention. If a citizen were to make a request, and to give good reason for it, I could see that consideration should be given to it —subject, of course, to the convenience of the court, and many other matters of that kind.

Mr. Fleming: It still rests with the governor in council to decide whether a man shall have the right to appear before the court or commission.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): That is right.

Mr. Fleming: Then, Mr. Chairman, as I requested during my remarks on second reading, may I ask for some elaboration of the expression in paragraph (f) "any offence involving disaffection or disloyalty to His Majesty" as compared with the language of the present act, and the expression, "convicted of treason or sedition." Is there anything more involved in the expression, "any offence involving disaffection or disloyalty", than in the expression "treason or sedition", apart from offences under the Official Secrets Act? If so, what are those additional offences?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Perhaps this is a matter which should be passed upon by the Minister of Justice. The fact is however that we have in mind the Official Secrets Act. We are not aware of any other act at the moment which would come within the meaning. There may however be acts of espionage which would not come within the Official Secrets Act—although I think it is fairly broad. But the expression "disaffection or disloyalty" is known to all acts dealing with citizenship, and the revocation of it. It is taken directly from the United Kingdom act, and is employed there. As the hon. member knows, it was employed recently in revoking the citizenship of Dr. Fuchs. That kind of disloyalty and disaffection is what we have in mind.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, this bill is for the revocation of citizenship, in certain cases. It does not affect civil rights at all, because an alien has the same civil rights as has a full-fledged Canadian citizen or British subject. As it does not deprive anyone of civil rights, I wonder if it would not be more simple to check the list in the hands of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police setting out well-known communists, and then pass an order in council to deprive them of their public rights, and to deprive them of their Canadian citizenship—because they are not worthy of enjoying it.

In these times we hear a great deal about fundamental freedoms and human rights, for scoundrels. Honest men have been accused unjustly, men who could not defend themselves successfully before the courts. Yet we hear long tirades from Mrs. Roosevelt about scoundrels, the scum of the earth, who come here and, in the name of British justice, ask to enjoy fundamental freedoms and human rights. Yet they are the ones who advocate the denial of human rights and freedoms to others.

Why should we be so lenient with those people? It would do them no harm, it would not give them a toothache if they were deprived of Canadian citizenship. They should never be allowed to enjoy or exercise it. That is simple; it is not complicated.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the hon. member explain what he means when he refers to being deprived of public rights?

Mr. Pouliot: To be deprived of public rights is to be deprived of citizenship. My hon. friend, who is a learned jurist, knows very well that public rights go with citizenship. Aliens cannot exercise them. If my hon. friend were an alien he could not run for parliament. A public right given to a communist means that he can run for membership in the House of Commons, that he can vote at municipal elections, that he can run for office in a city council, a provincial legislature or anything else. He could even be appointed to the bench.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pouliot: Well, that is logical. I do not see why we should be so considerate of those people who try to undermine the pillars of our Canadian society. "Human rights and fundamental freedoms"—I am sick and tired of hearing that all the time in the house, because it is for the benefit of communists who have no other purpose than the broadening of legislation for their own benefit.

When the Department of Citizenship and Immigration is so hard on Count de Bernonville, I do not see why Tim Buck is not expelled from Canada and deprived of his citizenship. This I cannot understand. And there are others in Montreal, including Guy Caron, who are enjoying full Canadian citizenship, although they are well-known communists.

Surely there is something wrong there. Then, there is something in the bill that does not suit me. The suggested wording of section 19(2) is as follows:

> The governor in council may, in his discretion, order that any person shall cease to be a Canadian citizen if, upon a report from the minister, he is satisfied that such person has, when not under a disability,
> (a) when in Canada and at any time after the first day of January, nineteen hundred and forty-seven, acquired the nationality or citizenship of a foreign country by any voluntary and formal act other than marriage;
> (b) taken or made an oath, affirmation or other declaration of allegiance to a foreign country; or
> (c) made a declaration renouncing his Canadian citizenship.

According to what has been written about communism, as we see it in books and periodicals, a communist is a man who has no allegiance to His Majesty the King, or to the chief of state or to anyone who is not a communist and a vassal of Moscow. It is easy to understand that. Therefore it is not on the report of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that the government should act, but on the report of the Minister of Justice to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, giving him the list of names of avowed communists in the files of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Is that fair enough? That is my suggestion. I do not intend to move an amendment, but I do suggest that if there is injustice to anyone he should be given the right of appeal to the minister or notified, as the minister said a moment ago, of what proceedings are about to be taken.

I challenge any communist to deny that he is a supporter of Stalin. I challenge him to deny Stalin in public. Whether he is under oath or not means nothing because they do not believe in an oath even though their heads are covered. I hope that some action of this kind will be taken, if not now at least tomorrow. Hundreds of communists are enjoying special privileges in this country. The government knows what communism is and it has no sympathy for them. Why should these people be treated like newborn babes who are wrapped in cotton and bathed in olive oil? No one should be afraid to act with regard to communism and to stop it it at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): This afternoon the hon. member for Skeena enunciated what I thought was an admirable doctrine. He said that he would rather see two or three guilty individuals go free than one innocent person punished. I revert again to this subject. The minister has outlined for us the steps which can be taken by an individual to protect himself. I am not so much concerned about what will happen while the present minister is minister because I think his conduct is exemplary. He has been generous in his treatment of many cases. But I am concerned about what some other minister may do. That is why I want to see all the protection possible given to the individual, even though he may be guilty. I want to see him get all the protection to which he is legally entitled, and much more so if perchance he should be innocent.

That is why I suggest that the individual should have the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada and not to the higher court of a province. The stripping away of citizenship is a most serious thing indeed. Would it not be fairer and perhaps wiser to give the individual the alternative of stating whether he wants to be heard by a commission or by a superior court?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): To begin with, almost all countries follow the commission practice. It is a more informal procedure and does not burden the courts with cases which in many instances would remain on the list for two or three years before being heard. I think I can show my hon. friend that it does do justice to the citizen concerned. While I have not been in the house all the time, I do not think that any complaint has been made in the house since 1947 about any case handled by a commission.

One can argue that the judiciary is the best body to decide all questions of this kind. That may well be, but I think the committee will agree that if we removed that decision to the courts there would be members of this house who would feel that we had made a mistake. They might argue that the place to debate citizenship, how it can be gained and how it can be lost, is here, and that the minister should be responsible to the members of this house and through them to the people of Canada as to whether citizenship should be revoked. That is why we retain the present system. I think it is a good system and unless my hon. friend can point to errors in it I think we should continue with it.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister a question in connection with clause (d) of section 1 which reads:

> (d) has, since becoming a Canadian citizen or being naturalized in Canada, been for a period of not less than two years ordinarily resident in a foreign country of which he was a national or citizen at any time prior to his becoming a Canadian citizen or being naturalized in Canada and has not maintained substantial connection with Canada;

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

Can the minister say what is meant by the words, "substantial connection with Canada"? Would it be considered to be a substantial connection with Canada if a person who was going to another country wrote to the Secretary of State and informed him that he intended to be away for two or three years or something of that sort?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): There is a procedure laid down by the regulations whereby an individual may notify the local office of the Canadian government in the country to which he goes or leave word in this country as to his intention to return. If my hon. friend will turn to section 18 he will see that certain types of occupations are stated not to affect a man's status in that country. I shall be glad to send a copy of the regulations to my hon. friend.

Mr. Pouliot: It is natural that great importance should be given to evidence as to the place of birth of an individual, but there are times when the individual must rely on what is said by his relatives as to his place of birth. I know of a man who has been successful in this country and is now giving employment to a number of people. He has been here for thirty or forty years. I wonder if the Department of Citizenship and Immigration would be disposed to grant citizenship when there is doubt as to the place of birth?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The answer to that question is contained in section 11 under which the minister is given some discretion with respect to questions of fact. If my hon. friend will draw the case to my attention I shall be pleased to consider it.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

HUTTERIAN BRETHREN CHURCH

The house in committee on Bill No. 7, to incorporate the Hutterian Brethren Church—Mr. Viau—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Weir: Mr. Chairman, on the various occasions this bill has been called I have asked that it stand. I am obliged to the hon. member for St. Boniface for his courtesy in permitting that to be done. This bill was introduced in the Senate, where it was referred to the private committee and finally passed. In this house it has also been considered by the private bills committee, where it was thoroughly looked into. As far as I know no question has been raised with respect to it in either committee. Having asked that the bill stand on previous occasions, however, I thought I should give some explanation.

The people who are seeking the incorporation of this religious order are a particular sect who live for the most part in Manitoba and Alberta. In Manitoba they are located mainly between Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie; and to be even more precise, for the most part they live in the municipalities of Cartier and Portage la Prairie.

These people follow a strict, communal type of life, entirely different to anything else we have experienced in this country, and they follow that type of life religiously and conscientiously. Perhaps they can be best likened to a hive of bees, except in the matter of their thrift. They live in colonies, with a common dining room and common living quarters. Theirs is a common income, with no one being paid individually. But the time comes when each colony, which may number fifty families or more, finds it necessary to expand, and they swarm out wherever they can secure new property. In this area to which I have referred I believe there are something like twenty of these Hutterite colonies, located in the very best farming district in the province, and naturally when they expand they remain as close as possible to the existing colonies. Only last week I had the privilege of seeing a map of that area showing the Hutterite colonies, and it was somewhat alarming to say the least to see how they have expanded there. I am bound to say that if this goes on, in the course of time they might very easily acquire all the property in that district.

The point I am making is that while these colonies now have in the neighbourhood of 70,000 acres, their expansion would mean the acquisition of more property, which would make it almost impossible for those following a different sort of life to remain in those communities. Collectively the Hutterites are a large organization, and are good financial risks. As a result they are able to purchase large tracts of land, and in so doing they completely upset the community life. They dislocate the schools and other community enterprises. More than that, the neighbours do not find it congenial, to say the least, to reside close by. The result is that sooner or later these people acquire the properties of their neighbours as well.

My reason for asking that this bill stand on the various occasions it has been called is largely due to a very deep concern that has been expressed by the non-Hutterites of all classes in the community where these people have become established. Some two years ago these non-Hutterites formed themselves into a loose type of organization and made representations to the provincial legislature, requesting that steps be taken to bring about a larger measure of control, though I do not like to use that word. They asked that something be done to assist in bringing about a better relationship between the people who follow our way of life and the Hutterites. Certain things were done, but fundamentally little progress was made. I mention this in order to indicate that there is a very real concern in that area of Manitoba regarding these people. And we are not alone in that concern. I believe our friends in Alberta had a similar experience, and took certain steps to meet this very situation. One of the things Alberta did was to require that no new colony should be established closer than forty miles from an existing colony. I am bound to say I have a large measure of sympathy with that proposition. These people have shown no indication of any desire to be pioneers. As I said a moment ago they have resources, and being a collective corporation they are able to obtain credit and purchase land as a private individual cannot do. In other words, they are a good credit risk for anyone who wants to sell them property or do business with them.

I say that the Alberta government, in my view at least, took a rather reasonable course. I do not think it hurt the Hutterites at all, because I think it was to their advantage since it gave them an opportunity to see what they could do in other lands that were neither so fertile nor so well established as those on which they were residing. As an indication that I am not alone in raising some apprehension over this particular matter, I refer to a speech made in this chamber one or two years ago by the member for Calgary West, who was much more critical than anyone else I have heard in connection with these people.

The fact is that these people have no desire to become assimilated in this country. They follow their own religious beliefs. They do not want to educate their families, and they just do not want to pioneer or do anything except to live their own lives in their own easy way. We may say that is a perfectly sensible course to pursue. However, I do not believe any of us would feel that our country was developing or making much progress if everyone in it were a Hutterite. I have never known the children of the Hutterite colony to go to high school. I have never known one to enter any profession, that is they never become lawyers, doctors or anything of that kind. It may be their way of life, but I am bound to say that to me at least it does not give much confidence for the building of citizenship among those people.

I refer again to what I indicated a moment ago, that they have no desire to become assimilated with other people. Now that is what causes the apprehension among those people who are residents of the same community. They would regret exceedingly to see these people, who have not assumed the full rights of citizenship—incidentally they do not vote except in municipal elections to a limited extent—secure any advantage at this stage. As I said a moment ago, they do not appear to be prepared to assume the full rights of citizenship as we understand such rights in this country. It is for that reason that my friends, largely in my own constituency have expressed so much concern over a course of action taken by this body to acquire federal incorporation. I have done my best to satisfy them that this bill does not provide any encroachment by these people; that it is no different, in the main, from legislation that is provided for other religious organizations.

I confess that I am not a lawyer, nor am I an expert at reading legislation that is presented to us. We have however taken advantage of the opportunity of getting free legal advice. This bill has been reviewed by some of my lawyer friends, without cost to anyone. I think I am able to say to the member for St. Boniface that this bill is in conformity with similar legislation that has been introduced in this house for the incorporation of other church organizations, and on that score alone I have no intention of delaying the passage of the bill. But I do want to take this opportunity of reciting a few things in connection with these people to indicate why there is this measure of concern about them, and why we should exercise a measure of caution when dealing with a class of people who are not prepared to become assimilated in the way of life that we recognize in this country.

So far as the bill itself is concerned, any comparison I have been able to make of it with similar legislation that has been introduced into the house concerning other church organizations does not reveal that it is out of line at all. Just in passing I would say these people have a perfect right to introduce what is contained in section 6. These people have always been conscientious objectors. I understand that they have felt some concern over that principle of their religion because they fear others might attempt to cloak themselves under the mantle of the Hutterite Brethren church. For that reason, as I understand it, the main purpose of this bill is to get definitely established who can become a member of the Hutterite church. I think we will subscribe to that immediately, and hope it will work out to their advantage as well as to the advantage of the rest of the people of Canada.

In looking over the bill some of my friends did express a good deal of apprehension with respect to section 7 which has to do with the power to acquire and hold property. I might say that the fear in this regard was that federal incorporation might mean these people could combine their collective resources, and thus become a great monopoly to acquire properties and other things of that character without limit. I am assured that that is taken care of under our provincial laws having to do with property and civil rights, so I do not think we need to have any apprehension in that regard. I only mention that for the sake of the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Finance, and to urge them to look over matters of this character to see that it is not a means of cloaking an organization of this kind under the guise of a religious organization, thereby avoiding income tax.

The only other matter to which I wish to refer is what I assume to be the governing clause. It is contained in section 10 which says:

> . . . the exercise of the said powers shall in any province of Canada be subject to the laws of such province as to the acquisition and holding of lands by religious corporations, in so far as such laws apply to the corporation.

I take that to be the governing factor in connection with this bill, and if it is I am quite satisfied to have it go through as it is. Perhaps I should mention one other thing. The member for St. Boniface paid high tribute to these people in introducing the bill, as did the hon. senator who introduced it in the other place. I am obliged to them for that, and I do not quarrel with the observations that they made. I believe I can say I have been a little closer to this problem than either of those gentlemen. I do not say that in a critical sense at all, but I should like to suggest to them that, in spite of the good qualities they have attributed to these people, there are many little irritations, not of great importance in themselves, which from time to time arise. It is perhaps because of their method of living which irritates our own people in those particular districts. I refer again to their method of doing business. They purchase largely on a wholesale basis, and strange to say they can usually get ample credit to do so. Everything that they can, they make themselves. They make their clothing, their boots and shoes.

Consequently you can understand how there is a good deal of displeasure with regard to these people in the local communities that are affected. I think that one of the mistakes that we made in our own province was with respect to the question of education. These people do not believe in educating their children. Our mistake was that we did not require them to attend our public schools as other children did. They have, for the most part, lived within our school laws; but being a community, being really little towns in themselves, it has been convenient to locate the schools on their properties. Consequently, there has not been the opportunity for the children of these people to get out and take advantage of outside education; and I think they are the losers by it.

One could say other things regarding these people. I rose only for the purpose of voicing a serious feeling on the part of the people in the communities that are affected. They are apprehensive over the growth and the expansion of these colonies. They realize and recognize immediately that it is upsetting the ordinary community life as we have recognized it in our development from the first time this country was opened up. While I am not one of those who say that these people have not the right to follow whatever religious faith they choose to follow, none the less I think that there should be a greater recognition perhaps on the part of our own province of the particular problem that has arisen because of these people. I said a moment ago that I had a good deal of faith in or support for the action taken by the province of Alberta in requiring that these people should not create a new colony any nearer than forty miles from an existing colony. I said that I thought that was to the advantage of the Hutterites themselves, and I believe time will bear that statement out. If these people would go out farther afield and become more or less pioneers, I would think they would be appreciated more than they are.

But in connection with the efforts that were made by this same committee to which I referred in the province of Manitoba, immediately any suggestion was made that there should be a curtailment of freedom or any thought of an attempt at restricting their religious faith, naturally the hue and cry went up throughout the country that we were interfering with human rights and fundamental freedoms or whatever you may call it in that regard. Even the press of Manitoba took that line and pressed it severely. I want to say to the press of our own province that if they had to depend on the Hutterite people for their circulation, they would soon find that it did not amount to very much; because I will venture to say that there are not a dozen daily newspapers from the city of Winnipeg sold in all the Hutterite colonies in the province of Manitoba. Likewise there are no radios or musical instruments—nothing that we look upon as cultural necessities in our way of life.

Perhaps I have said enough at this stage. I am obliged to the hon. member for St. Boniface for not pressing consideration of this bill until those who were particularly interested—and I think that is democracy—had an opportunity to have it carefully reviewed and to be assured that there was no undue advantage being taken by federal incorporation of this group of people at this time.

On section 7—Power to acquire and hold property.

Mr. Weir: I wonder if the hon. member who is sponsoring this bill would be good enough to give me assurance as to its meaning and purport in so far as the acquisition of property is concerned vis-à-vis taxation and so on.

Mr. Viau: As members of the committee will know, clause 7 is the same as that in all bills incorporating all religious groups in this country, be it the Roman Catholic Church, the Anglican Church or the United Church, or even in the three bills we have before the house right now concerning the incorporation of the Ruthenian Catholic Church, and the Ukrainian Catholic Church in the different parts of this Canada of ours. As to the wording, that the corporation may purchase property, section 1 which was passed specifies that this is a bill for the incorporation of the Hutterian Brethren Church hereinafter called "the corporation", and specifies that all the property will only be property held by the Hutterian Church in the province of Manitoba or the province of Alberta. It has nothing to do with personal properties held by the Hutterites, as those come under provincial laws.

Mr. Weir: In the similar section of at least one other church incorporation bill there was a little difference in the wording following the word "corporation" in the fortieth line. In the other bills use was made of the phrase "ecclesiastic and eleemosynary." Those are not in this section in the same way that they are in the other sections that I looked up. I was wondering if the explanation for its being phrased differently arose out of the rather unusual type of organization that these people have. In other words, there is no thought of these people going out in the missionary field and attempting to bring in adherents, other than their own people, to this religious faith. Am I right in that?

Mr. Viau: I have not before me copies of the other bills incorporating other religious groups of this country; but I well remember the word "ecclesiastic". It refers to the rank held by members of the churches, in the Roman Catholic Church, the Anglican Church or the United Church, which rank is not held by any members of the Hutterite Church.

Mr. Carroll: Did they take up arms in the last war?

Mr. Viau: With respect to the taking up of arms either by the Hutterites, the Mennonites or any Anglo-Saxon religious group who claimed certain exemptions during the last war—and there were a good number of them in the last war—the Hutterities did claim certain exemptions.

Mr. Carroll: Do they all take the same grounds?

Mr. Viau: No. There were a certain number of Hutterites who joined the armed forces in the province of Manitoba in the last war.

On section 10—Application of mortmain laws.

Mr. Weir: I hope the committee will not think that this is developing into a little argument between two members from the same province in connection with this bill, because I assure you there is no argument about it. But what I should like to ask here is the amount of property that is set aside as church property for the purposes of the church alone. I am given to understand that in Manitoba it is a half section of land, three hundred acres belonging to the church and twenty acres as a cemetery. If that provision is made generally to church organizations who are prepared to go out and do missionary work and carry on other activities in connection with their religion, as generally promoted throughout the country and elsewhere, may I point out there is no desire and not even any thought on the part of these people of going beyond their own farmyards, so to speak. I realize, let me say immediately, that this comes within the scope of provincial jurisdiction having to do with property and civil rights. But if we have granted to other religious organizations a half section of land, if I am properly informed, as part of the church property in itself, then there might be good grounds for suggesting to our provincial legislature that with these people being more curtailed in their activities, steps might be taken to reduce the amount of land they could have as part of their church property.

Mr. Viau: I appreciate the remarks made by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa. When he refers to the Hutterites as citizens, perhaps I agree with him in that respect, but in respect to the church property which is now being held by any religious group in the province of Manitoba, that property is subject to municipal and provincial laws. That is also true with respect to the number of acres which can be held by a church for a church establishment within the province of Manitoba. That is subject to the close scrutiny of the municipality where the church is established. If an amendment is to be placed before the municipality, or if the city bylaws are changed, it is subject to revision by the provincial legislature, and as such if the amount of land which could be held by one church is in excess of the amount held by other religious groups in the province of Manitoba, then our provincial representatives could express their criticism of the excess land held by the Hutterites in the province of Manitoba.

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY

The house resumed, from Friday, March 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Applewhaite for the second reading of Bill No. 116, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this bill is described as an act respecting British Columbia Telephone Company. It provides for amendments to the act which set up that company quite a few years ago. The main amendments will be, in the first place, to increase the capital from $25 million to $75 million; in the second place, to make certain changes in the provisions covering preference shares; and finally, to give the company the power to pay a commission on the sale of its shares.

I am opposing the bill in its present form for several reasons. I believe that the people of British Columbia are not getting a fair deal in so far as telephone rates are concerned; that the telephone users in our province are not adequately protected now, and that their position will be worse if the bill passes in its present form. Parliament has a responsibility to protect the people of British Columbia, and I ask for the most careful consideration of the bill by my fellow members.

It is significant that the Vancouver city council passed a resolution unanimously, asking the members from that city to oppose this measure on two grounds: In the first place, because the council believe that an excessive increase in capital is being sought, and second, they believe that under the company's present act there is no protection against unreasonable charges which are levied against the British Columbia Telephone Company by its parent and affiliated companies. In other words, the Vancouver city council believe that the British Columbia Telephone Company is being milked by its parent company in Montreal, and by the parent company of the Montreal company, which is an American corporation, with headquarters in Kansas City. All the time the people of British Columbia have to feed the cow by way of paying the full rates.

I use the words "the people of British Columbia" not the words "the people of Vancouver" advisedly, because this company and its affiliates own over 90 per cent of the telephones used in that province, and of course they have a monopoly in all of those areas. I believe that all of the communities in our province endorse the stand taken on this bill by the council of the city of Vancouver. Last year there was a hearing before the board of transport commissioners of an application by the company for an increase in telephone rates. At that hearing the city of Vancouver was represented by counsel; also the cities of Victoria and New Westminster, the municipality of Burnaby and the Union of British Columbia Municipalities, and the provincial government. All of these bodies appeared opposing the application of the telephone company for an increase in rates.

The city council now ask that the increase of capital be kept to a reasonable amount. This bill seeks an increase from $25 million to $75 million, which means that the capital would be trebled. But that is not the whole picture. In 1947, just four years ago, the company obtained an amendment in the House of Commons which increased the capital from $11 million to $25 million. So that if the increase now sought becomes law it will mean that within four years there has been almost a sevenfold increase, from $11 million to $75 million.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in this bill the company is asking too much. At the rate hearing last year it said that it had large expenditures to make on capital account. There is no doubt that there will have to be a great deal of money spent in the years that lie ahead. I understand the evidence was that it would require about $10 million a year, by way of new capital expenditures, until the year 1952 which would mean a period of three years, and that there would be further expenditures in later years. The sponsor of the bill, upon introducing it in the house, said the company would require $10 million a year for ten years. I rather think that was an exaggeration. The annual reports for the years 1949 and 1950 show that the company has spent something like $8 million in each of those years. I would point out to hon. members that because of shortages of materials there will probably be a good deal of difficulty in these years lying ahead to get the necessary supplies. I doubt very much whether it will be necessary or, in fact, possible, to spend as much as $10 million a year.

British Columbia Telephone Company

However, let us look at the picture showing the money to be spent on capital account. In the treasury now there remains $5 million. In other words only $20 million of the $25 million has been issued. If this increase of $50 million is granted there will then be $55 million available to issue as shares. But the ratio of share capital to the bonded indebtedness in financing by this company is approximately 40 to 60. In other words where they raised $40 through the issue of shares, they raise $60 by issuing bonds and other securities of a similar nature. So that if they have $55 million in share capital available to issue, they would have $82,500,000 to be raised by way of bonded indebtedness. This makes a total of $137,500,000 which would be available for capital expenditures, if the bill is accepted in its present form.

Even at their own figure of spending $10 million a year, the increase they are now asking would be good for from fourteen to twenty years. I would point out that in addition there is approximately $17 million in a depreciation reserve, which would also be available for capital expenditures. I say that fourteen to twenty years is too long a time for the company to go, without being required to come back to parliament.

And it is so important that parliament should have some check on companies of this kind. There is no check by the provincial government. The company is incorporated under a dominion act, and is not subject to regulation by the provincial utilities body. The only groups which have any power of regulation are right here in parliament, and also in the board of transport commissioners. So I say there is great value to the people of British Columbia in the requirement that the company must come before parliament at fairly frequent intervals.

Always the situation is that the people pay the shot. In the long run, any increased expenditures have to be paid by the telephone users; and those users are entitled to all the protection they can be given by parliament. The present bill asks for too much at one time. It means that there will be much less control by parliament—in fact there will be no control for from fourteen to twenty years. It means there will be no control by the cities and municipalities of British Columbia. And those corporate bodies are always at a great disadvantage in trying to fight a utility company such as the British Columbia Telephone Company.

I know very well that there is need for a pretty close check on the company, because when in 1947 they applied for the increase from $11 million to $25 million I thought I had worked out a pretty good method of making sure that there would not be an application for an increase in rates in the immediate future. When the bill was before the house for second reading I asked for an undertaking from the then hon. member for New Westminster, who was sponsoring the bill. Hansard of that time, where the undertaking is recorded, reports my words as follows:

> I understand that the hon member has been authorized to give assurance to the effect that the company has no present intention of applying for an increase of rates and will not make any such application unless compelled to do so by extensive changes in conditions.

Mr. Reid answered, "That is my definite understanding". In so stating he was acting in perfectly good faith for he had been authorized by the company to give that undertaking. Then I went on to say:

> That assurance is clearly worded and contains a statement to the effect that an application will not be made unless the company is compelled to do so and then only by reason of extensive changes in conditions. If the hon. member for New Westminster is prepared to give that assurance on behalf of the British Columbia Telephone Company I for one shall have no objection to the bill passing.
> Mr. Reid: I am authorized to do so, and it is my definite understanding.

That was in May of 1947. In June of 1949 the company launched its application for an increase in rates. When the representative of the city of Vancouver pleaded before the board of transport commissioners that it should take into consideration conditions only since 1947, and attempted to read this undertaking, he was met by a vigorous protest from counsel appearing for the British Columbia Telephone Company—a distinguished senator; mind you, he was acting for the company, and representing them most efficiently. I have here a quotation from what he said to the board of transport commissioners: "I didn't know my learned friend was appearing on behalf of parliament." The company took the position that what was said in parliament had nothing to do with the situation, and that it was not any of the board's business. The deputy chief commissioner of the board, who was presiding, took the same position, and simply brushed aside the representations made by the city, and the undertaking which had been given in the House of Commons. Therefore I repeat that I for one think there should be some fairly definite curb on this company in that they should be required to come back here at frequent intervals so that the people of British Columbia will at least receive that amount of protection.

The Vancouver city council also asked protection against unreasonable charges by affiliates, all of which charges have to be paid by the telephone users. In order to explain that I must give hon. members the picture of the family tree of this company. It was founded by west coast pioneers and they deserve great credit for establishing this company. Some of the descendants of those pioneers are still with the company. In fact the president, Mr. Gordon Farrell, is a son of one of the key men of the early days of the company. I believe that it is well run, efficiently managed and has a very efficient staff.

For many years it was controlled in British Columbia with local men having all of the direction of the company and no decisions being made outside of the province. However, in the 1920's control was acquired by a Delaware corporation known as the Associated Telephone and Telegraph Company with headquarters in Kansas City. It holds control of the British Columbia Telephone Company through Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company of Montreal which owns 60,000 of the 80,000 common shares. For a long time, in fact until last year, Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company owned all of the issued common shares. Last year, however, 20,000 common shares were sold to the public and although the par value of the shares is $100 they brought $139. Dividends of eight per cent have been paid on the common stock for many years. Only the common shareholders vote. Preferred shareholders have no vote in the affairs of the company. Therefore Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company and through it Associated Telephone and Telegraph Company have been able to control the company although they only hold a small portion of the issued shares, there being a large amount out by way of preference shares.

Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company also controls other telephone companies in British Columbia. It controls Chilliwack Telephones Limited, Mission Telephone Company Limited, both of which are in the riding of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), Kootenay Telephone Company Limited and Northwest Telephone Company. These are smaller telephone companies operating in different parts of the province. In addition to controlling these local companies Anglo-Canadian also controls a company known as Canadian (B.C.) Telephones and Supplies Limited, and another one known as Dominion Directory Company Limited. These are companies operating in the province, and in effect operating in conjunction with British Columbia Telephone Company. They are affiliated companies, and I propose to deal with them at some length.

In the hearing before the board of transport commissioners last year it was disclosed that Dominion Directory Company Limited, which is owned by Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company, has a contract with the British Columbia Telephone Company whereby on all advertising contracts for the directory the directory company receives 35 per cent commission. It does not do the printing of the telephone directory. I understand that subsidiary companies of the Bell Telephone Company print their directory, but in British Columbia there is this contract with the directory company. The profits of the directory company go directly to Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company. In other words, British Columbia Telephone Company is being milked in that way, and the telephone users of our province are expected to pay the shot. The board of transport commissioners were not interested in that arrangement. They said it was purely a question of management.

Then the supply company to which I referred a few moments ago, namely, Canadian (B.C.) Telephones and Supplies Limited, purchases all supplies for the British Columbia Telephone Company, instals exchange equipment, and executes repairs. For that it is paid at a set rate. For example, on purchases it gets a commission of five per cent. Incidentally purchases by the telephone company in some cases at least are from other affiliated companies. I believe, for example, that Phillips Electrical Works Limited of Brockville is an affiliate, and much of the equipment is purchased from that company. The profits of the supply company also go back to Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company in Montreal.

Then there is a licensing contract directly between Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company and the British Columbia Telephone Company under which one per cent of all operating revenue of the company in British Columbia goes to Anglo-Canadian in Montreal. I must take a little time, Mr. Speaker, to explain that contract, so I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Green the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock the house will resume the business that was interrupted at six o'clock.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO REVOCATION OF CITIZENSHIP, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 172, to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act—Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce)—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Loss of Canadian citizenship.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): Mr. Chairman, I am not going to speak on wheat. While the bill is under consideration I think that the government should be made aware of the serious responsibilities involved in the return of certain people to Canada after leaving this country a short time ago. I should like to cite a few articles before asking the minister a question at the conclusion of my remarks. In this evening's edition of the Ottawa Journal an article appears headed, "Says Yugoslavians returned to Canada to work for Stalin". This story comes from Sudbury, the riding I represent in this house, and goes on to say:

Peter Borovich, leader of the Yugoslav colony here, protested today the return to Canada of men he said are avowed communists.

Borovich declared that Sam Lazich, whom he described as the former Sudbury leader of the communist party, is returning from Yugoslavia after going there four years ago. He said the federal government is "criminally soft and stupid . . . to readmit people of the very same kind as those who are killing Canadians in Korea."

Borovich claimed the return of the Yugoslavs is being financed by the communist party and by communist-dominated national groups. The Canadian government "is rescuing Lazich from Tito so he can work for Stalin in Canada."

"The Yugoslavs who left Canada were the most rabid communists in the country," Borovich said. ". . . they were no good to this country and never will be".

I know the man who made that statement. Mr. Borovich is a hotelkeeper in my city; we have been in the same business there for many years. I do not know if Sam Lazich is the man I think he is, but if so he was an outstanding communist in my district. I want to tell hon. members that the first communist candidate ever to get nomination papers in this country got them in my district, which was then Nipissing, in 1930. We have many communists in our part of the country, but not all the people there are communists; and I would not want to make that statement without qualifying it further by saying that not all foreign-born people in this country are communists. There must be at least 40,000 of these people in my riding, and I know them well. This statement by Peter Borovich, who is a responsible citizen, is very strong. Knowing Pete as I do, being a hotelkeeper and probably with a couple of beers under his belt, he would make the statement as strong as possible. But I always found that Borovich used his best judgment when he had a couple of beers.

At this point I would like to read to the house what was said by the present Prime Minister, then Secretary of State for External Affairs, when these people left Canada to go to Yugoslavia. I hope the lawyers will listen, because this is a legal position. I am glad I am not a lawyer; perhaps I would be in jail if I were.

Mr. Pouliot: You may not be a lawyer, but you have a natural legal sense.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): The Prime Minister had this to say when he was asked as to the status of those Yugoslavs who returned to their country on this so-called patriotic call; it can be found at page 3370 of Hansard for 1947, under the heading "Canadians leaving for Yugoslavia—position of naturalized citizen leaving Canada".

The legal position of an alien leaving Canada is governed by the Immigration Act which provides that an alien acquires Canadian domicile "only by having his domicile for at least five years in Canada after having been landed therein." He loses his domicile by "voluntarily residing out of Canada with the present intention of making his permanent home out of Canada and not for a mere special or temporary purpose."

Thus a Yugoslav citizen, regardless of the length of time he has lived in Canada, will lose his right to re-enter Canada if he goes to Yugoslavia with the intention of making his permanent home in Yugoslavia. Should he change his mind and wish to re-enter Canada, he would have no right to re-enter Canada and would have to apply for admission as any other prospective immigrant.

Moreover, if he should be readmitted to Canada, he could not count his previous stay in Canada for the acquisition of Canadian domicile. In order to become a citizen of Canada he would, after his return, have to remain in Canada for five years.

The legal position of a Canadian citizen by naturalization leaving Canada is governed by sections 20 and 21 of the Canadian Citizenship Act. Section 20 reads in part as follows: "A Canadian citizen, other than a natural-born Canadian citizen . . . ceases to be a Canadian citizen if he resides outside Canada for a period of at least six consecutive years," subject to various provisos. Section 21 provides inter alia for cancellation of citizenship by order in council if a naturalized citizen "out of Canada has shown himself by act or speech to be disaffected or disloyal to His Majesty."

It is important to note that a warning appears at the back of the current Canadian passport, which reads as follows:

"Canadian citizens by naturalization certificate or citizenship certificate should bear in mind that unless under the laws of the state to which they originally belonged or by the provision of a treaty, they have ceased to be subjects of that state, their certificates have no effect within its boundaries nor can the good offices of His Majesty's representatives be extended to them there."

There is quite a bit more to the statement, but I am not going to read more of it. I am going to use this as the basis of a question which I hope the minister will answer during this debate. However, I want to say that sometimes I have been accused by people in my district of receiving the support of the communist party in elections. That statement has been made in literature put out by other parties in this house, that sometimes the Liberals were hooked up with the communists. Let me tell those people what I have said publicly in every campaign in which I have taken part, and I have taken part in elections in this country since 1925. If I have to depend upon the support of communists to get to the House of Commons, I do not want to be a member of this house. We know communism has no place in our system, and there should be no pussyfooting in stating our position on this matter. I never pussyfoot on anything, certainly not on communism.

In conclusion I would like to ask the minister to answer this question at the proper time. Before their departure these people showed that they were propagandists for the communist doctrine, whether in my part of the country or elsewhere. If they are readmitted and continue their communist activities, has the government any laws under which they may be deported, or are we going to have to pass another bill? I say we should deport them if they continue their communist activities. You may not pay much attention to what Pete Borovich has to say, but I know he is one of the outstanding leaders of the Croatian people in Canada, and he knows what is going on among them; I am positive of that. If Pete Borovich believes that some of these fellows are coming back, under instructions of some communists in another country, and crying for Canada to take them back then these people may become embarrassing to our country. I hope and believe that the minister and his officials will do everything possible to check on these people since they have been over there before they are readmitted to Canada.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the matter just raised by the member for Sudbury has an interesting bearing on a point I raised this afternoon, and on which I think it is now fair to ask the minister to make a statement. Paragraph (d) of the proposed new subsection refers to a period of not less than two years during which a person who has been born outside of Canada and has become a Canadian citizen goes back to reside in the country from which he came. If this bill is adopted now, does an absence from Canada hitherto qualify within the provision of this paragraph (d), or is the interpretation that is being put upon this paragraph that the two years commence running only from the date on which this bill comes into force?

The question has point, I think, in relation to the case I cited this afternoon of Freda Linton. I do not know whether Freda Linton was born in Canada—probably the minister has information on that point—but if she was born in Canada then my illustration has no bearing. If she was born otuside of Canada and acquired citizenship here, then it will be very interesting to see how this legislation is going to have application to her case. We are told she has been residing in the United States in recent years, and is now being deported from the United States to Canada. Is her return to Canada, under some compulsion from United States authorities, going to have the effect of breaking this two-year absence—in her case more than two years—so that the section would not have any application to her?

In the case of those persons who were born in Yugoslavia to whom reference has been made by the member for Sudbury, of course if they did not acquire Canadian citizenship before they departed from Canada, then this bill has no bearing on their case. To the extent to which some or all of them had acquired Canadian citizenship before their departure in 1947, it will be interesting to know now whether this legislation is to be interpreted as having any application to them, in view of the fact that it is presumed they are now returning. I think the committee would be glad to hear a statement from the minister on this point, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pouliot: Before the minister answers, if I may be permitted, there is something I should like to say in this connection. It concerns the loss of Canadian citizenship. No mention is made of British citizenship. How can the minister deprive a British subject of citizenship, and prevent him from running in municipal, provincial, or federal elections?

Mr. Fleming: He does not have to be a Canadian citizen to run in those elections.

Mr. Pouliot: I am just saying that. Here is a man with British citizenship. He may come from any part of the British commonwealth or empire. He comes here, runs in an election and is immune. The minister cannot deprive him of Canadian citizenship, because he has none. However, he has the same privileges as if he had his Canadian citizenship. This shows the absurdity of dual citizenship. I say that purely from a legal point of view.

When the bill was passed originally, I said to the minister who was sponsoring the bill that dual citizenship was sheer nonsense. Naturally, I meet some people here in Ottawa who say they are British subjects and do not care about Canadian citizenship. Others, from Mr. King down, have taken Canadian citizenship and have remained British subjects. I should like to know what the minister can do in such a case? What can he do about a man who comes here from any part of the empire, and who is a well-known communist? How can he deprive him of his British citizenship? So long as he has it, he has full public rights.

Mr. Green: Under the Immigration Act he can be kept out.

Mr. Pouliot: But they are not kept out. They come in, and they come in in bulk. We had some very sad examples amongst the scientists who came from various places, and who were in the spy network. This may be good legislation, but I do not see how it can be operative because of this contradiction that exists in the law itself. If the law was drafted that way, it was to appease the imperialists who sit in parliament. They opposed a definite change which would have permitted the minister to safeguard national unity in Canada.

Suppose a man who is a communist or who belongs to groups that are affiliated to the communist party—they are all alike and are well known—comes along. I might mention that an important capitalist periodical of the city of Toronto, to the knowledge of everyone, boosted Tim Buck two or three weeks ago. I understand that such a periodical could have boosted Tim Buck if he had paid the regular advertising rates. How is it that men who are supposed to have a good head on their shoulders give such advertising to such a well-known communist?

Mr. Green: What paper was that?

Mr. Pouliot: If my hon. friend is not au courant, then I shall not reply to him.

Mr. Green: Is not what?

Mr. Pouliot: Well informed about it, because he knows all. It is a large paper in the city of Toronto, and it is a capitalist one.

An hon. Member: The Toronto Star.

Mr. Pouliot: No, I do not mean a daily, I mean a periodical. It was well known. It is a fine picture and shows Tim Buck looking like a dignitary of the Hutterite church, a nice old gentleman. This periodical is read in all the barber shops, on the cars, trains and everywhere. People read it as propaganda for Tim Buck, given to him by the capitalist press. It is nonsense. What is the use of passing legislation when the owners of such periodicals are so silly as that? If the member for Vancouver-Quadra does not know about it, he may ask his leader and he will be informed about it.

Mr. Green: I believe I read the article myself. I recall it now.

Mr. Pouliot: Perhaps that periodical has not such a large circulation in British Columbia, but it has in central Canada. I should like the minister to be kind enough to answer that question and to tell us how we shall deal with British subjects who have been living in Canada for some time and who have never taken Canadian citizenship, and if the act applies only to those who have taken Canadian citizenship by the usual pledge. My intention in rising now is to remind you, Mr. Chairman, and the members who sit in the committee at the present time that the communists are men who believe in the denial of everything. A nihilist is a man who is indifferent, who does not believe in anything. These men believe in the negation of everything. In the first place, years ago they were called nihilists—nil means nothing—and they were creating disorder. They were guilty of murder in Europe. Afterwards they called themselves anarchists; then they called themselves communists, and they take other names. I hope that the government will see to it that these men who belong to those parties are exposed and that they are deprived of public rights. To make myself clear about it, may I say that I do not want them to have public rights that will permit them to run in municipal, provincial or federal elections of any kind. If what I have suggested is done, there will be fewer riots and disturbances of any kind in this country.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): To answer the hon. member for Eglinton first with respect to Freda Linton Alexander, may I say that my understanding is that she is a natural-born Canadian citizen and as such is entitled to the provisions of this act, so that when she goes to the United States and becomes subject to deportation, we must accept her back here, whether or not we should like to have her here. My understanding is that if a charge was laid against her it was dropped. In any event, she was not convicted. So far as I am aware, there is no criminal offence marked up against her. I also want to advise my hon. friend that she has in fact returned to this country and that it is an academic question whether she can come back or not.

With respect to my friend the hon. member for Sudbury, I can well understand his desire to have this question cleared up, having in mind the particular interest of the people of his riding in some of those who left to go to Yugoslavia. As I understand it, there are three classes of persons who may have taken part in the movement back to that country in 1947. There are those who were aliens at the time they went back; that is, persons who, while in Canada, had not attained citizenship. Such a person, upon his return to Yugoslavia, placed himself in the position in which he was when he first came to Canada; that is, he would have to apply as an immigrant for admission to this country. Under those conditions, if he wished to return now, he would have to conform with our regulations and we would exercise that care and caution which we exercise in the case of every person from a foreign country seeking to be admitted to Canada. Then they might have been persons who were natural-born Canadians. They might also have been persons who were naturalized Canadian citizens. In that case they are admissible to Canada as citizens of this country. Perhaps my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs might have more information as to this matter than I have. But they being admissible for that reason, we would not be in a position to refuse it unless there are other grounds such as perhaps those he might indicate. When they return to Canada, they return with the status they had when they left; that is, Canadian citizenship. It might be that complaints would be made against them for their conduct abroad, which would bring them within section 19, subsection 1 (d), which refers to action abroad:

(d) if out of Canada, has shown himself by act or speech to be disaffected or disloyal to His Majesty...

I think we ought to judge these people as best we can on the circumstances as we can ascertain them, as to whether or not there has been a genuine desire to return to Canada in disillusion or whether in fact they may be persons who are coming for the purposes mentioned by the hon. member for Sudbury. I am quite certain, however, that no one would expect us to grant to a person who would come back as a confirmed exponent of principles that are contrary to our democratic processes one thing more than the law permits. I had my attention drawn only today to this article in the newspaper. For that reason I should like to have further time to consider the question asked by my hon. friend, in order to see if other light could be thrown on the subject.

Mr. Green: The minister did not answer the question as to time asked by the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. Fleming: I was coming to that. The minister has dealt with one aspect of my question. He has indicated that those who return to Canada now, so to speak, beat the gun on this present amendment. They have ceased to be residents in a foreign country under the provisions of paragraph (d); but that does not answer the whole question. What about the effective date from which the two-year period is calculated as running? If this bill comes into force now, is the minister going to assert jurisdiction in the case of persons who have been absent from Canada two years prior to the date on which the act comes into effect or is he going to say that the two-year period begins to run from the date on which the act comes into effect?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I forgot to answer that part of the question, Mr. Chairman, which was also asked by the hon. member for Sudbury. I am informed that the wording of paragraph (d):

(d) has, since becoming a Canadian citizen or being naturalized in Canada, been for a period . . .

and so on, in fact relates to any two-year period since first he became a citizen of Canada, and for that reason we could exercise jurisdiction to have an inquiry made under that section as to whether or not this person had maintained substantial connections in Canada. But you will notice that under section 19 it is discretionary; that is, it is not an absolute loss of citizenship such as you have under section 18. Therefore the governor in council would, I should think, bear in mind the reason I mentioned a moment ago as to the genuineness or otherwise of the desire to return, and any other consideration which might enter into the question of whether these people should be deprived of their citizenship.

Mr. Fleming: There is another matter I raised this afternoon in discussing this bill on second reading, and on which I would ask the minister to comment now. It had to do with what happens to persons who are deprived of citizenship under the provisions of this amendment. I asked about the position of such persons under the Immigration Act, for instance, in relation to the whole question of deportation. Without going over the ground again, Mr. Chairman, I just point out that as to persons who are abroad now perhaps the question of deportation does not arise, but the question of re-entry might well arise. They might assert that they are residents of Canada even though they may have lost their citizenship. As to persons who are deprived of citizenship by reason of the commission of an offence, or on one of the other grounds mentioned in the clause, I think it would interest the committee very much to know what is the position of such persons in Canada immediately upon being deprived of citizenship. Are they entitled to remain and enjoy all the other benefits and protection of Canadian laws and Canadian residence even though they are no longer citizens?

Just in passing, this illustration occurs to me, because illustrations give point to some of these questions which are in our minds. There was a gentleman who was a member of this house in the last parliament for a session or two, who was convicted of an offence under the Official Secrets Act, and was sentenced to a term of six years' imprisonment in the penitentiary. I suppose that term will be expiring before very long.

Now, Mr. Fred Rose presumably comes within the provisions of the new clause (f). He has been convicted obviously of an offence involving disaffection or disloyalty to His Majesty, and therefore I ask whether his Canadian citizenship can now be revoked by the minister under the provisions of this section. I think the committee would be interested in a comment of the minister on that situation, and as to the position of such a person with respect to continuing to reside in Canada and enjoy the benefit of residence and the protection of our laws today even though he has lost his Canadian citizenship.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The position is clearly set out in the section of the Immigration Act that my hon. friend read this afternoon; that is, those persons who can be deported under sections 41 and 42 of the Immigration Act are persons who have been convicted of the offences set out in those sections and by reason of committing those offences are designated undesirable persons and subject to deportation. It happens that the exception in sections 41 and 42 is an exception in favour of a Canadian citizen, so that those sections do not apply to a person who is a Canadian citizen.

My understanding of the sections is this, that if a person is convicted of an offence involving disloyalty and disaffection, and thereby loses his citizenship, he does not at the same time suffer the further penalty of deportation, because the act having been performed while he was a citizen he is exempted under section 41. However, if he subsequently commits any of the acts mentioned in sections 41 and 42 he then becomes subject to deportation, because he is not at that time a Canadian citizen.

Nevertheless it ought to be clear that when a person is accepted as a Canadian citizen after residing here five or more years deportation does not follow too easily upon an offence under sections 41 and 42. The other country of which he was a national or a citizen before becoming a Canadian citizen might possibly object to the subsequent deportation. That is a matter which has to be arranged on every occasion.

Mr. Fleming: I thank the minister for his statement. I think it will come as a conclusion easily followed that, as the minister has said, if the offence was committed while the individual in question was a citizen, section 41 cannot apply to him even though subsequently he has lost his Canadian citizenship, because the opening words of section 41 are: "whenever any person other than a Canadian citizen advocates in Canada the overthrow of", and so forth. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this discussion on this amendment has been a very useful discussion indeed. It has shed light on more subjects than the Canadian Citizenship Act. I think it has shed light where light needs to be shed on some of these provisions of the Immigration Act as well as perhaps—

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): May I interrupt just a moment? The speech from the throne forecast amendments to the Immigration Act, which will be before the house in due course.

Mr. Fleming: I am glad to be reminded of that, Mr. Chairman, and I hope that the amendments to which the minister has just referred will be amendments that will strengthen the provisions of such sections as section 41.

This afternoon I drew attention to the difference in language between section 41 of the Immigration Act and the language of the present amendment. In section 41 we have a long enumeration of offences which describe a person as an undesirable immigrant for the purposes of that act and render him liable to deportation. In the view of the law officers of the crown, how do these compare with this shorter but rather inclusive expression, "offences involving disaffection or disloyalty to His Majesty"? Which is the broader provision, because some interesting results might flow from the difference?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I am sure that my hon. friend would not expect me to go into great detail as to every offence which might come within the use of the words "disaffection and disloyalty"; but most of the offences under section 41 are of the nature that might very well be so considered. For example, it is considered a matter of disaffection and disloyalty if one advocates the assassination of, or attempts to assassinate, an official of the government of Great Britain, of Canada or of the various British dominions; but I am not prepared to discuss in detail the precise definition of section 41, nor for that matter of disaffection and disloyalty since it is obviously directed to a type of offence which goes beyond treason and sedition, but stops far short of those offences which were very properly mentioned with some degree of apprehension by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Skeena. The words "disaffection and disloyalty" do cover any act such as treason, espionage, sedition, offences under the Official Secrets Act, or some similar act directed against the welfare and security of the state.

Mr. Fleming: I wish to clear up this point I raised. In his comments on the effect of the Immigration Act and the proposed amendments the minister has not, I think, fully clarified the point that I was raising with respect to the application of this question to cases like that of Mr. Fred Rose.

I cannot, of course, anticipate, and I do not expect the minister to, the amendments to the Immigration Act that may be introduced, but I do think it is a fair question to ask if these are going to be tied in with the kind of amendment that we have before us at the present time in connection with this Canadian Citizenship Act? It would seem to me that is a very proper question to ask in the light of the discussion here today, because it seems that we are going to have anomalies otherwise where people are deprived of citizenship in this country but are free to do all the kinds of things that we most disapprove of, and for which we are seeking to punish them by the enactment of measures of the kind now before the committee.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): If there were no amendment to the Immigration Act, such as we have discussed, the position would not be altered from what it is at the present time. The annual report of last year shows that we revoked the citizenship of 219 citizens. Some of them, admittedly, were not in this country; they were people abroad. But there are persons in Canada whose citizenship has been revoked, and who are still here in what might be described as a stateless nature, but who nevertheless are persons who are not committing any crime against our laws. For that reason they are not subject to deportation under section 41. Whether or not we amend that section in due course, there will be persons in Canada without Canadian citizenship who may have been here long enough that their own country might not accept them back, upon deportation. I do not think I should go further in suggesting what amendments there would be to the Immigration Act, until they are brought down.

Mr. Knowles: Could the minister give a breakdown of the figure of 219? How many were out of Canada when citizenship was revoked, and how many were in Canada?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I do not think the annual report gives it, and I would have to get the details from the department.

Mr. Knowles: Has the minister any notion as to what the percentage might be?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): No, I have not.

Mr. Drew: Before we leave this section, may I say that the discussion has been helpful in clearing up a number of points in connection with the Canadian Citizenship Act, and the purpose of the amendments before the committee.

I am sorry the Minister of Justice is engaged elsewhere because, before leaving this subject, I would have wished to point out to him that I was quite aware of the general amendments to the Criminal Code, but that this particular amendment is something of a special nature—that is, the amendment which was under consideration.

The adequacy or otherwise of the amendments now before us will very largely be determined by whether or not there is other legislation which does make it possible to deal effectively with communists in this country who are actively seeking to undermine our system. Commendable though the intent and purpose of these amendments may be, this is a very limited attempt indeed to deal with an extremely important subject at a time when we are told the very survival of our nation and of our civilization is at stake.

The minister has explained that 219 citizenships were revoked last year, of which some were already out of Canada. This is but a small fraction of the number of the people who are actively engaged in this country today in subversive activities not now satisfactorily covered by any existing law. I am not only concerned with the possibility of dealing with those born outside of Canada and outside the British commonwealth; I am concerned about the possibility of dealing effectively with citizens who were born in this country. In fact I think the citizen who was born in this country, and whose traditions were anchored here long before the others came, is a worse offender than the man who comes here and perhaps must learn something of our traditions.

I do however wish to follow the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for Spadina, when he placed some emphasis upon the loyalty of the overwhelming majority of those who have come here from other countries. It would be the desire of every member in the house to understand that nothing said here would create any impression that members of the House of Commons, in any party, have in their minds the thought that there is any lack of loyalty on the part of those who have actually made the decision to become citizens of this country. In fact, the very choice they have made in many cases creates a more conscious sense of vigorous loyalty than may perhaps exist in the minds of those who accept as a matter of course the privileges they possess as citizens of this country. Nowhere will one find more vigorous expressions of loyalty to Canada and our great institutions than in the gatherings of those people who are truly loyal to Canada, to our democratic institutions, and to the ideals we are seeking to advance in our daily lives. They, I believe, are the very ones who would welcome most warmly some evidence that it is going to be possible to deal effectively with those who are seeking to implant in Canada a kind of life that they know only too well, from their own associations, and which they know in a way we do not quite understand. Those people who have lost fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters or wives under this vile form of despotism are the ones who know best how far we should be prepared to go in preventing any of that type of activity being carried on here in Canada.

Before we pass on from this discussion of citizenship, may I once again emphasize my belief that it is very important that we have a law which will define this offence, not only so that offenders may be dealt with, but so that there may be evidence of that very concern which has been expressed, that no man shall be deprived of his rights as a citizen, except under the law.

That is happening today. The government of this country has stated, with some display of satisfaction, that it has removed from employment those suspected of communist activities. If people are going to be deprived of the right to earn their livelihood, and to be deprived of that right by the most important employer in the country, then I say that first of all there should be an offence that can be defined. I say we are actually inviting that very disregard of the right to employment and citizenship that we are saying we should preserve, when the government of the country, as the main employer, says, "We are dismissing these people because they are communists; but we cannot define 'communist activity' or activities of the nature that should be dealt with in this way."

I think it would be agreed that there have been few people more vigorous than I have been in condemning communism. But I certainly believe the government of this country should be the first to see that, if people are going to be deprived of the most basic of all rights, namely the right to work, and if they are to be deprived of the privilege of maintaining themselves and their families by their work, there shall be a real offence defined by law.

[Mr. Drew.]

We want to establish the rule of law, and the government should be the first to insist upon it. So, in passing from these remarks on citizenship, at which time I had hoped we might have had some assurance that there would be an amendment to the Criminal Code to deal with this subject in a wider field, I once again seek to impress upon the government my belief that if there is something which in the view of the government should deny to a man the right to employment, then the government should decide to instruct the officers of the crown to define that very offence with which they are dealing.

Mr. Croll: I would draw the minister's attention to a person who under the act would be deportable to a country behind the iron curtain and we would suppose that the country would refuse to accept him. Would the minister tell us what happens under those conditions?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I wonder if I might be permitted to answer that on anything affecting the subject of immigration, rather than citizenship.

Mr. Fleming: There is one point I was asking the minister about earlier, and I have to come back to it because it is not fully clear to me. Dealing with the case of Mr. Fred Rose by way of example, again this touches on the effect of this act with respect to acts committed before it. With respect to paragraph (d) the minister has indicated that absence from Canada before this new amendment comes into effect will be treated as absence from Canada within the terms of paragraph (d). If we look at paragraph (f) we see that conviction for an offence involving disaffection or disloyalty to His Majesty is also a ground for deprivation of citizenship. Is a conviction for such an offence prior to the coming into effect of this act one for which the minister may exercise the right of depriving that individual of his citizenship after the act comes into effect?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): It is my impression that the period of two years referred to in paragraph (d) being a period of time is subject to interpretation to apply as it says to any period after the person became a Canadian citizen or was naturalized in Canada. On the other hand, paragraph (f) reading "if in Canada, has, by a court of competent jurisdiction", and so on, relates to the future and not to the past.

Mr. Fleming: In other words, Mr. Fred Rose was convicted of such an offence as is mentioned here, namely, one involving disaffection or disloyalty to His Majesty, and because his offence was committed prior to the coming into effect of this act the minister will have no right thereunder to deprive him of his citizenship because of that conviction?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I am informed that the section has no retroactive effect. I do not know whether there are any other acts in Mr. Fred Rose's career which might make him subject to losing his citizenship, but in so far as that conviction is concerned I am informed it does not come within paragraph (f).

Mr. Croll: The hon. member for Eglinton asked a question concerning a man who had been absent from the country for a period of two or three years previous to the coming into effect of the act. He wanted to know whether this act would affect him or would the period run, and if I recall correctly the minister indicated that once we passed the act the period would then have started to run from the time that he left the country originally. I was not sure of the answer. The minister now says that it has no retroactive features. That in effect is a retroactive feature, is it not?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Perhaps the hon. member misunderstood me. I made it clear that I thought under paragraph (d) the two-year period can be, as it says, any two-year period since the person became a Canadian citizen. Therefore it could apply to any two-year period prior to this but paragraph (f) does not relate to any past conviction.

Mr. Pouliot: The bill mentions that evidence must be presented as to disaffection or disloyalty to His Majesty. There must be some evidence of disloyalty or disaffection to establish that a man should lose his Canadian citizenship. Anyone may be a communist without showing exterior signs of disloyalty or disaffection to His Majesty. I wonder how one could proceed against those communists or subversive elements who do not give any exterior evidence of their disloyalty or disaffection to His Majesty and the royal family?

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR ELECTED REPRESENTATION IN TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT AND APPOINTMENT OF JUDICIAL OFFICERS

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved the second reading of Bill No. 189, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish the minister would say a little more than has been said on previous occasions as to what, on the face of it, seems a rather odd arrangement of government. I am not going to make too heavy weather about it. It seems in a way a curious half-and-half approach to self-government, and I should like to hear a little more about it.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, the principal purpose of the bill is to give the population of the Northwest Territories elected representation in the territorial government by providing for the election of three members in a council of eight. The other five members will be appointed. The details are set out in the bill and explanatory notes. I should like, however, to say something about the recent developments in the Northwest Territories which have led the government to propose the changes embodied in the bill.

Northwest Territories Act

When the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were created out of the Northwest Territories in 1905, the remaining portion of the territories, although large in area, contained a very small population and was of limited economic importance. The Northwest Territories Act, 1905, therefore provided that the territories should be administered by a commissioner acting under the instructions of the governor in council or the minister of the interior, and that a council of not more than four persons might be appointed by the governor in council to assist the commissioner in the administration of the territories. Until 1921, however, no council was appointed, and during these sixteen years the commissioner of the Northwest Mounted Police acted as commissioner of the territories.

In 1921, consequent upon the increasing public interest in the territories arising out of the discovery of oil, the act was amended to provide for a council of not more than six. In the same year the deputy minister of the department of the interior was appointed commissioner of the territories, and six councillors were appointed, all being senior officials of federal departments having an interest in the territories. The system thus inaugurated in 1921 has continued to the present time, the sole change being that since 1947 a resident of the Mackenzie district of the territories, who is not a government official, has been appointed a member of the council. This change was a first step towards giving the residents of the territories representation on the council.

Generally speaking, the original population of the territories was Indian and Eskimo, the Indians being largely confined to that portion of the Mackenzie district lying south of the tree line, and the Eskimo population to the Arctic coast of the Mackenzie district and to the Keewatin and Franklin districts. In 1941 the population of the territories was 12,028 divided among the three districts by races as follows:

	Mackenzie	Keewatin	Franklin
White (including half-breed) ..	2,119	86	85
Indian	4,322	3	9
Eskimo	863	1,302	3,239
Total	7,304	1,391	3,333

Since 1941 the increase in gold and pitchblende mining, the development of commercial fishing on Great Slave lake, and the opening up of the southern part of the territory by the Mackenzie highway, have resulted in a very substantial increase in the permanent white population. The estimated population of the territories at the end of 1949, compiled from the most reliable sources available, indicates that the population by races at the end of 1949 was as follows:

	Mackenzie	Keewatin	Franklin
Indian	4,220	3	9

In recognition of the substantial increase in the permanent white population of the Mackenzie district, the residents of that portion of the Mackenzie district lying east of the 109th meridian of west longitude were given representation in this house in the last redistribution of seats.

The government considers that the time has now arrived when provision should be made for elected representation in the territorial council. A fully elected council and its logical corollary, an administration located within the territories, seems to be a proper objective at which to aim. I do not feel, however, that it would be wise to achieve it in one step. To begin with, the territories are still greatly dependent upon the financial support of the federal government. Thus, in the fiscal year 1947-48 some $7,758,865.20 was spent in the territories from federal funds, while the revenue accruing to all federal departments from the territories was only $640,323.44 or about 8 per cent. Similarly in the fiscal year 1948-49 some $9,778,646.20 was spent in the territories from federal funds, while the revenue accruing to all federal departments from the territories was $719,-517.98; and in the fiscal year 1949-50 some $7,963,388.72 was spent in the territories from federal funds, while the revenue accruing to all federal departments from the territories was $720,073.90 or about 9 per cent. I should think the people of Canada generally would expect the people of the territories to be capable of bearing a larger share of total government expenses in the territories before they can reasonably expect to have a fully elective council.

The present proposal, by conferring upon the population of the territories the opportunity to elect three members of the territorial council, will, I hope, be a step toward ultimate fully elected government. The length of this transitional period will depend upon factors affecting the rate of development of the population and resources.

There are several other minor amendments in the bill, which are fully dealt with in the explanatory notes. I will only mention one of these. It is proposed to add to section 34 of the Northwest Territories Act a subsection giving to the governor in council power to appoint officers for the due administration of justice. At the present time section 10, subsection 1, paragraph (1) of the act gives to the commissioner in council authority to define the powers, duties and obligations of sheriffs; but paragraph (j) of the same subsection specifically excludes from the powers of the commissioner in council authority to appoint such judicial officers. The volume of judicial business in the territories now makes it necessary to appoint sheriffs. The proposed amendment provides the necessary authority for their appointment. This will bring the Northwest Territories Act into line with the Yukon Act, section 57 of which confers a similar power upon the governor in council.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—"Council".

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am grateful for the statement by the minister, which added a great deal to our knowledge, but there are still a few points of interest I would like to raise. In the first place I take it that while the minister refers to certain communities like Yellowknife and so on, there is no municipal organization; or perhaps the minister will answer that point later, because I am going to ask several questions. I was interested and greatly surprised to learn the very small revenue coming from that area, and I noted the remark by the minister that we might hope and perhaps expect it to increase. I suggest that he might give us a little more information on that point. Then can anything be said as to the wishes of the local people, and their feeling about this?

I am putting several questions while I am on my feet so we will not be bobbing up and down. Is there any analogy in the situation here to that which existed when the provinces were set up in 1905? Of course this community is immeasurably less developed than the southern portion of the area was, but can the minister say anything more on that? One other thing is this. Could the minister outline a little further just how this composite body will work? I think I understand much better than I did before his feeling that we not only have to move gradually but that at the moment we have to keep what I suppose may be described as a certain control through the appointed majority, until they have worked into the way of managing their own affairs. I wish he would say a word or two more as to just how the mechanism works; that is to say, can he give us a little more information as to the familiarity of those here with the territories. Something was said about that last night. How does the minister visualize the co-operation between the elected and non-elected representatives? Can anything be said as to the method by which the election is to take place? I do not think he has indicated to us anything about the voting qualifications.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, during the past summer, 1950, I took the opportunity of visiting the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. I spent as much time in both territories as I was able to do, and visited as many of the centres of population as possible as well as a number of outlying areas. I was quite impressed with the sense of responsibility of the people living in the north, and the great pride they are developing in the territories. Many people were asked about this matter of government, and I came to the conclusion that the time had come to extend some privileges to them in electing representatives to the territorial council. I believe that the feeling of the local people is that this is a step in the right direction. It is natural to expect that they feel the government should go the whole way just as quickly as it can. Undoubtedly there are people in the Northwest Territories who are of the opinion that there should be a fully elected council at the present time, and that this measure does not go far enough.

On the other hand I think the body of responsible opinion there is that, so long as the taxpayers of Canada are paying the great bulk of the expenditures in the territories, the process should be a gradual one. They recognize this as being about the right course of action for the present. The department, being responsible for the administration of the Northwest Territories, has tried to move in the direction of what one might term democracy just as quickly as possible. As any area has shown ability to administer its own affairs, appropriate responsibilities have been passed on to it. At the moment there is the Yellowknife administrative council which is a partially elected council administering the affairs of the Yellowknife administrative district. There is also a fully elected school board in the Yellowknife district. In Hay River there is a partially elected council which administers its own affairs. Both these administrative districts do an excellent job of looking after their own affairs.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Without outside money assistance?

Mr. Winters: Not entirely, but to a great extent. Where outside assistance is necessary, it has been given to the local administrative council in the form of grants which they administer. They have done that with a good sense of responsibility. I believe that answers the questions of the hon. member, but if there are others I would be glad to answer them.

Mr. Hodgson: There has been an increase in population in that district. How does the increase in population compare with the citizens who have been there for a number of years?

Mr. Winters: I am not sure that I fully understood the question. Will the hon. member repeat it?

Mr. Hodgson: The minister gave a few figures showing how many whites and how many others there were in the territories. How does the increase in population compare with the ones who were there a few years back?

Mr. Winters: A breakdown of the present population, to compare with the population figures I gave for the year 1941, is as follows: for the whites, including half-breeds, in the Mackenzie district, Keewatin and Franklin in that order, 5,525, 53 and 120; Indians, 4,220, 3 and 9; Eskimos, 1,627, 1,525, 3,057, or a total of 11,372, 1,581, and 3,186. In other words, the total number of whites in the Mackenzie district now is estimated at 5,525 as against 2,119 in 1941.

Mr. Hodgson: Can the minister estimate the increase in revenue for the future?

Mr. Winters: That is difficult to forecast, Mr. Chairman. I gave the revenue for three successive years, but I do not believe the house would expect me to estimate the revenues for the future.

Mr. Fraser: The minister mentioned the Eskimos and Indians. Will they be allowed to vote? They are Canadian citizens, and the bill says that Canadian citizens are allowed to vote.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, the bill confers upon the commissioner and council the authority to establish the terms of elections, and to say who will vote. In the 1949 federal election the Eskimos did not vote but the Indians did. Since that time there has been a change in the act which has made it possible for the Eskimos to be considered as voters. I have every reason to believe that both Eskimos and Indians living in the territories will be eligible to vote for these prospective elected representatives.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I ask the minister if any thought has been given to transportation for that area? I refer to railway transportation particularly. There is a general feeling that there should be an extension of the railway from Prince George, British Columbia, in a northeasterly direction ultimately tapping the southern part of the Northwest Territories. One plan was that this railway should contact another railway, possibly it is the Hudson Bay railway, and in that way the southern part of the territory would be given access to the Pacific coast, Prince Rupert and Vancouver. Has that been given any serious thought?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, the chief modes of transportation are by water and aircraft. There is one good highway into the heart of the district, the Mackenzie highway, which runs from Edmonton to Hay River on the south shore of Great Slave lake. There are also a number of roads for mining purposes in isolated areas. To contemplate a comprehensive system of highways or railways is a little beyond our present capacity. As the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River said last night, there is considerable development work being carried on in the Pine Point area on the south shore of Great Slave lake. If the prospect develops the way it gives promise of doing now, there is a possibility of having the railhead extended to Pine Point, and a considerable development resulting in that area.

Mr. Fraser: I have had inquiries from people in my own riding with regard to parcel post up to places in the Northwest Territories; for instance, up to Aklavik. These people said that the rates up into that part of the country are so high that it is almost impossible to send a parcel of any kind in there. I wondered if there was not some way in which that service could be subsidized or arranged, because there are missionaries up there and something should be done to help them. It is cheaper to send a parcel over to some European countries than it is to send one to some parts of our own Canada. I do not think that is the way it should be.

Mr. Winters: That is something that I shall be glad to discuss with my colleague the Postmaster General.

Mr. Herridge: If I heard the minister correctly when he was explaining the reason for not having more democratic procedure or more elected members of the council, he said that the reason was in effect that as the taxpayers of Canada paid the greater part of the cost of administration of the area, the power should rest in effect with the appointed members of the council who are in the majority. I cannot consider that as quite a valid argument because, after hearing the minister make that statement, I was thinking of my own province in which there are quite large areas in certain districts where the cost of administration is far greater than the amount of revenue received, yet the people in that area receive the franchise. I should like the minister to give a further explanation of that matter. I also notice in the bill that in addition to the majority of the members of the council being appointed, the commissioner in council prescribes the qualifications of the persons who shall vote and, according to the bill, who shall be elected to council. I should like to ask the minister to explain to the committee why the members of the House of Commons could not determine in this legislation who is qualified to vote.

Mr. Fraser: That is the way it should be.

Mr. Winters: It is true that any good administration tries to treat with the greatest equality the people for whom it is responsible. The Yukon territory has been set up as such, and is a responsibility of the federal government; and the federal government is doing its best to extend to the people who live in the Northwest Territories the same privileges as are available to people in other parts of Canada. I think perhaps the hon. member for Kootenay West is confusing local autonomy with the matter of general rights and privileges as Canadian citizens. There is no attempt to deny these people anything by virtue of the fact that they have not fully representative government. I think perhaps the fact of the matter is that they are better off and are getting more from the taxpayers generally than if they were given fully elected government at this time and required to stand more on their own feet.

Mr. Simmons: In the matter of parcel post rates into the Mackenzie river district referred to by my hon. friend, I might say that I have made representations to the Post Office Department for quite some time now, that the matter is under investigation and that I am hoping for a favourable reply.

Mr. Fraser: Something certainly should be done about it.

Mr. Wright: I am not satisfied with the minister's explanation as to why the appointed members of the council should decide who is going to vote in elections in the territory. It seems to me that we as a parliament here should be determining that matter instead of leaving it to some appointees of the government. It seems to me that would be the more democratic way to do it. As it stands, the qualifications for voting will be set by the appointees of the government who are civil servants of the government. It does not seem to me to be democratic to give to civil servants of the government the authority to determine who shall vote in an area of Canada. It seems to me that we should accept that responsibility as a parliament. Has the minister any explanation as to why we should give to appointees of the government, civil servants, the right to determine who shall vote and who shall not vote in a certain area of this country?

Mr. Winters: This is following the same pattern that has been followed in the Yukon Territory where the regulations governing voting are laid down by the commissioner in council. Under the Northwest Territories Act the government of the territories is assigned to the commissioner in council which passes ordinances which are tabled in the House of Commons. They are also subject to veto by the federal government. To that extent therefore the House of Commons here and the federal government have the final responsibility in any regulations that are laid down by the commissioner in council.

Mr. Knight: There are certain restrictions in the second clause. A person is not entitled to vote at an election unless he is a Canadian citizen, et cetera. In other words, there are certain things not within the discretion of the council and there are certain things which are within the discretion of the council. I should like to know what are the things that are within the discretion of the council, if these things are not; that is to say, that a person has to have attained the age of twenty-one, that he has to be a Canadian citizen, and that he has to be ordinarily resident in the territories for a period of at least twelve months immediately prior to the date of the election. If those things are not within the discretion of the council, what are the other qualifications of the voter which are within the discretion of such council? It is fairly well defined in this bill who shall be privileged to vote. Yet we are told that the final choice of the voter, if I may use that expression, is to be in the hands of the commissioner in council. I wonder what things are left. As a matter of fact, that is what worries me. I would rather see the whole thing left in the hands of the commissioner in council. But it describes these certain things and then we are left in the dark as to the certain other things that the council can decide. What are those things?

Mr. Winters: The general limitations for voting are laid down in the act, as the hon. member says. But there are likely to arise from time to time specific instances with which the council might wish to deal. It was felt that ,to follow the pattern of the Yukon Act, the section should phovide the council with the opportunity to make regulations as they see fit with respect to certain matters that have a bearing on who should vote and who should not vote.

Mr. Knight: The minister has not made it plain to my satisfaction. I wish he could suggest what some of those certain matters might be. That is what I am concerned about. If you have those qualifications as to residence, age and citizenship, then I want to know on what ground the commissioner in council would be justified in turning down a man's claim to vote. That is what I want to know.

Mr. Ferrie: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask—

Mr. Fraser: Let us first have an answer to the question that has been asked.

Mr. Knight: If the minister is going to answer, could we have his answer now so that the thing will be coherent?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Winters: I wonder if I might have that question repeated, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Knight: I did not hear what the minister said.

Mr. Fraser: He wants the question repeated.

Mr. Winters: I did not hear the question.

Mr. Knight: The question is this: What are some of the qualifications for a voter other than those mentioned in section 8A (2), namely, that a person is qualified to vote at an election if he is, (1) a Canadian citizen; (2) has attained th eage of 21 years; and (3) has been ordinarily resident in the territories for a period of not less than twelve months immediately prior to the date of the election.

If these are the grounds laid down by this act which permit a man to vote ,then I ask the minister what are the other grounds upon which the commissioner in council may refuse someone in that territory the right to vote? The bill says:

> Subject to subsection two, the commissioner in council may prescribe the qualifications of those entitled to vote at an election of members to the council.

Then in the next clause the act itself prescribes those qualifications, but we are left in the dark as to what are the qualifications, or the lack of qualifications, upon which the commissioner in council may refuse such a vote. The thing is a deep, dark mystery. What are the qualifications that should leave the selection of the voters in the hands of the commissioner in council? May I say that, so far as I am concerned, I would not be prepared to leave the commissioner in council any discretion as to who shall or who shall not have a vote, but that this parliament should lay down the qualifications in this legislation, as an attempt has been made to lay down certain qualifications of a voter in clause 2. I hope I have made it clear.

Mr. Winters: There are certain other qualifications of voters such as sanity, and I would imagine that matters such as imprisonment might be considered. There is a judge of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, and I understand that judges do not normally vote. Being charged with the responsibility for administering the territory, the commissioner in council should have the opportunity to deal with specific matters which are not defined in this general act.

Mr. Knight: Is it then to be within the discretion of the commissioner in council? Are these two things to be within the discretion of the commissioner in council, first of all whether a man is sane, and second, whether or not a judge shall vote? If these are two of the qualifications, then I should like to know it. Put them in this legislation and then we shall know it.

Mr. Ferrie: My constituency goes right up to the Northwest Territories. I want fully to endorse the statement made by the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River that everyone should be elected even though it is the Northwest Territories that are mentioned now. I fully endorse that democratic system of doing things, no matter how sparse is the population.

I should like to say this. Some years ago great men in eastern Canada looked at the west and they said, in developing the west we must have a railroad. It is time that the people of Canada looked to the north, and it is time that the northwest of Canada had a railroad. The amount of wealth that is in that north country can only be handled by railroad facilities. There has been some talk, and I understand action is going on now, to put a railroad up to Lynn lake. That could go from Lynn lake north of Reindeer lake, north to Athabaska and up to Fort Smith to tap the minerals south of Great Slave lake and out to Prince George. In this part of the world that sounds like something ridiculous, but I want to assure you that it is not ridiculous. It is time that the Northwest Territories were tapped. It is time that we found out what wealth is in that country, and it is time that the people of Canada began to realize what advantages there are up in that country. On that railroad it is suggested that you could find everything from agriculture, mining and fishing right down to the part of civilization that has now made a great name for itself in the north, namely, Flin Flon. You could start from Flin Flon and do as I suggest and even if we do not get anything else done we should have a survey made.

I should like to point out to the minister that if he wants to make the Northwest Territories the first thing he has to do is to see that they get transportation in there.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Wright: I still do not see why we should leave this matter of the qualifications of voters to a non-elected body. Has the minister any objections to the qualifications that we have in the Dominion Elections Act applying to voters in the Yukon? It seems to me that they apply to them with regard to dominion elections, and the same qualifications might apply in the Northwest Territories. There you have something that we have agreed on. We have agreed on certain qualifications for voters in the dominion elections, and I can see no reason why those qualifications should not apply in the elections in the Northwest Territories for councillors. Has the minister any objection to the qualifications that we have in the Dominion Elections Act being applied?

Mr. Winters: The government of the Northwest Territories by the commissioner and his council is somewhat analogous to the government of a province by the provincial premier and his government. The provincial legislative body can give consideration to matters of voting in provincial elections, and following the pattern of the Yukon, where roughly a similar form of government exists, voting qualifications are fixed by the commissioner in council. Since the commissioner and his council are responsible for the administration of the territories, I think that matters other than those defined by this act should be left to their determination.

Mr. Fleming: I am afraid the minister has given away his whole case now. I think his explanation has only led him into deep water. He says that the government of the Northwest Territories by the council is analogous to the government of a province by the premier and his government. The minister completely overlooked the fact that the provincial legislatures are sovereign, and it is the legislatures of the provinces that lay down these rules as to qualifications of voters.

The governing body responsible for the government of the Northwest Territories is this parliament, and this parliament simply appoints administrators in that area and a council with certain defined and delegated powers—because remember these are delegated powers, nothing more—but the rights of the provinces are not delegated. They are sovereign legislatures deriving their powers under the constitution. For the minister to say that because the provinces with their sovereign legislatures have the right to prescribe the qualifications of their voters, a body appointed under federal authority by the government should have that same power, seems to me to be just reducing the whole matter to a hopeless absurdity.

The minister has completely—and I regret to say this—completely misunderstood the matter. It is parliament that is responsible for the administration of the Northwest Territories. And if parliament is going to delegate some of its governing functions to a council up there, and is going to say that part of the governing body is to be elected, and then goes on to specify some of the qualifications of the voters, then surely it would be a most extraordinary thing for parliament to stop there after defining some of the qualifications of voters, and then leave it to others who enjoy the delegated powers from parliament, through the government, to specify the qualifications, or at least some of the qualifications of voters.

If it is possible for parliament to specify some of those qualifications, then certainly parliament can specify all. It would be an extraordinary thing to give to these persons possessing powers delegated by parliament the right to specify qualifications for voters who are going to vote on candidates for election to that governing body up there. That would be a most extraordinary thing. I suggest the minister should reconsider the whole matter.

If parliament can specify some of these qualifications, then certainly parliament is competent to specify all of them; and it would be a dangerous departure from principle if parliament did not go on to specify them all.

The Chairman: Before we proceed further may I point out that we are discussing section 1, but that the hon. member has been discussing section 3. Shall section 1 carry?

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Instructions.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I notice that the section says:

The commissioner shall administer the government of the territories under instructions from time to time given by the governor in council——or the minister.

And the "governor in council" is the governor of the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Winters: The governor in council is not the commissioner of the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does that mean the governor in council here?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The section is not too clear, because it says in the preceding clause that "council" shall mean the council of the Northwest Territories. Nevertheless I accept the minister's statement.

What, then, is the authority of the commissioner? It says that——the commissioner shall administer the government of the territories under instructions from time to time given by the governor in council or the minister.

Well, is he just a rubber stamp, to take instructions from the governor in council here in Ottawa? What is the scope of the body we are setting up? I am asking that question, now that I understand the governor in council is not the governor of the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Chairman, I think the minister is moving along historical lines. For some years provinces have been set up in the western part of this land. It is not long ago that the people of the Northwest Territories were being taxed, although they did not have representation at all. I am referring to that part of the Northwest Territories now under discussion.

This is a step forward. It is a step that was taken in connection with Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. That is a matter of record here. But at the same time I believe the people in the Northwest Territories will very soon desire autonomy and absolute control of their own affairs, just as those other provinces have desired in times gone by. This is a step in that direction.

I believe hon. members would agree that autonomy would be a splendid thing for the Northwest Territories at such time as the population has been somewhat increased, transportation facilities made available, an immigration policy initiated, and the course followed which was the pattern in connection with Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, it shall not carry. I would like at least an answer to my question.

Mr. Winters: Section 2 in the bill is the same as the old section 2, the only change being in the name of the minister from that of the minister of the interior to the minister here defined, who, in the definition section, is set out as the Minister of Resources and Development. That is the only change.

The functions of this body about which the hon. member was talking are basically legislative, whereas the functions of the governor in council, the minister and the commissioner are basically executive. That is the relationship between the functions of the two bodies in question.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Council.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, for reasons already stated I move in amendment:

That section 3 be amended by deleting therefrom subsection (1) of section 8A thereof and by renumbering subsections (2) and (3) of section 8A as subsections (1) and (2) respectively.

I have already stated my reasons, the chief of which is that I do not think the appointees of this or any other government should lay down the qualifications as to who should or should not be entitled to vote. I think that job should be done by the House of Commons, completely, as indeed it must be done in subsection 2 of section 8A.

Mr. Winters: I might say that the amendment is not acceptable, in that it is not in keeping with the spirit of the act, nor is it in conformity with what we are trying to do in the bill.

Mr. Knowles: What is the spirit of the act?

Mr. Winters: What the government is attempting to do is to extend to the body designated to administer the affairs of the Northwest Territories more responsibilities, by giving it elected representation.

We are seeking to put into its hands more authority to run its own affairs, and to determine how its affairs should be run. By this amendment we would be taking away from the council of the Northwest Territories certain powers which we think it right and proper that it should have. I submit therefore that it is a step away from the direction in which we are seeking to go in the measure before the house at this time.

Mr. Wright: I disagree with what the minister has just said because, in effect, this is what he is doing: He is trying to do by the back-door method something which apparently he is not prepared to do in the house, namely to define the qualification of voters. He appoints the majority on the commission, and therefore he can lay down the control of qualifications. If we are going to control qualifications, then we should do it by a method which is apparent to everyone, instead of doing it by controlling the number of appointed representatives on the commission, and therefore by that method say who shall be qualified to vote. If a majority of them were elected, then there would be some justification for the minister's argument, but when a majority are appointed I cannot see where his argument holds at all.

Amendment (Mr. Knight) negatived: Yeas, 19; nays, 51.

Mr. Hodgson: The minister and the government have not accepted the last suggested amendment to section 3. There is a population of 16,000 and the revenue has been increasing in that area. Over a long period of years the people have shown a lot of ability, especially in voting. For many years they sent the Hon. George Black here and now they have sent the present member for Yukon-Mackenzie River. If these two men are any example—and I think they are—of the calibre of people they have in that country, they certainly are capable of controlling their own vote. The first clause says that there shall be a council of the Northwest Territories consisting of eight members, three of whom shall be elected to represent electoral districts and five of whom shall be appointed by the governor in council. Three out of eight does not give these people very much representation. The minister also said that there were three electoral districts, Mackenzie, Keewatin and Franklin, and they are governed by the commissioner and deputy commissioner. Therefore there are really ten on that council, and only three representatives out of the ten are to be elected. I think the government should give these people more of a lead than that because it does not seem that they have any representation whatsoever. I move as follows:

That the word "three" in line four and the word "five" in the fifth line be deleted, and that there shall be substituted the word "six" in the fourth line and the word "two" in the fifth line.

The section will then read as follows:

There shall be a council in the Northwest Territories consisting of eight numbers, six of whom shall be elected to represent electoral districts, and two of whom shall be appointed by the governor in council.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Question.

Mr. Herridge: Before the vote is taken, may I say that I support the amendment for various reasons expressed by previous speakers. I think, Mr. Chairman, if you read the explanation of the legislation given in the bill it adds further to the reasons for supporting the amendment. On the page giving the explanation of the section we find the following:

The new section 8 provides for a council of eight members, three of whom will be elected and five appointed. Members of the council are, with one exception, senior government officials. If the bill is passed it is proposed to follow the practice of appointing senior government officials to sit on the council. The functions of the council which are set out in sections 9 and 10 of the Northwest Territories Act are primarily legislative; however, the commissioner may refer to the council for advice on matters of policy.

In my conception that is government backwards. I thought the legislative function was performed by councils, and commissioners and administrators simply gave effect to policies. I should like the minister to explain the explanatory note in the bill.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Question.

The Chairman: Those in favour—

Mr. Herridge: Pardon me. Would the minister explain the meaning of that explanation?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I think the explanation is fairly self-evident. Moreover, in the second reading stage the statement I made indicated quite clearly that what we are trying to do now is to move in the direction of an elected council as quickly as possible. Prior to this time there has been no elected representation on the council at all. We are seeking now to make it possible for the council to have three elected representatives, and I find it very difficult indeed to understand these criticisms that we are not trying to extend a measure of democracy in the government of the Northwest Territories.

Amendment (Mr. Hodgson) negatived: Yeas, 24; nays, 59.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Knowles: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of this house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will take up first the government notice of motion to set up a special committee concerning veterans affairs. Then we will take up third reading of Bill No. 172, third reading of Bill No. 188 and third reading of Bill No. 189. Then we will move to go into committee of supply and call four departments, resources and development, national revenue, fisheries and labour.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, April 4, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

SECOND ANNIVERSARY OF SIGNING AT WASHINGTON

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I trust I may have the indulgence of the house for a moment or two to make a short statement.

Today is the second anniversary of an historic event, the signing of the North Atlantic treaty on April 4, 1949. We entered into the treaty because we believed it was necessary for the continuing preservation of the freedom and the heritage of the Atlantic nations. It was necessary because the Soviet union had prevented the security council of the United Nations from discharging its primary responsibility for the maintenance of peace, and because a grave atmosphere of disillusion, anxiety and tension had been created by the enforced transformation of one eastern European state after another into a satellite of the Soviet union.

Against this background of the growing threat of communist imperialism, the North Atlantic treaty was concluded. In the two years of its existence, by increasing the ability of the Atlantic powers to resist aggression, important steps have been taken to lessen the likelihood of war. In the military field an integrated force has been established under General Eisenhower as supreme commander allied powers in Europe. The principle of mutual aid has been revived, and Canada has shared in the mutual aid program by transferring military equipment to a number of our European allies and by providing places for our North Atlantic partners in our military and air training establishments.

The strength and determination of the North Atlantic allies to resist aggression have been increased with the growth of their deterrent military strength and of their feeling of a community of interests, political, economic and cultural. While the primary purpose of the treaty is security, the development of mutual understanding which is taking place serves a deeper purpose which has a special appeal for Canadians; the ultimate creation of a great community of free nations working together for a lasting peace.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, everyone in this house will wish to join in the expression of satisfaction that, within two years of its existence, the north Atlantic alliance has already advanced far toward the building of a strong partnership for the preservation not only of peace but of that particular civilization which we know as western civilization. There is no thought of suggesting racial or other superiority, but it is necessary for us to remember that our own civilization came from the nations of western Europe, and that the survival of that civilization is inseparably associated with theirs. Whatever disappointments there may have been during the past two years, whatever concern there may be about the evidence of temporary misunderstanding from time to time, the fact is that day by day this association is becoming stronger. As the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has pointed out, the very steps that are necessary to build the military strength of these nations for the advancement of freedom and the maintenance of peace will in themselves lay a wider foundation for deeper and closer association throughout the years ahead.

We all hope, we all have increasing reason for confidence, that peace in the broader field of world affairs may be maintained, even though there is real war at this moment. All of us like to think that beyond the achievement of peace itself and the preservation of our freedom there will be greater understanding between nations which will make it possible for us to associate ourselves in the days ahead with those other parts of the world which are not now embraced within the North Atlantic treaty. If the United Nations organization, which is the one ultimate hope of stability, sanity and peace within our generation, is to have any enduring strength, that strength will rest upon the success of the efforts of the north Atlantic powers. What we as north Atlantic nations achieve will therefore be not only to our own advantage but to the advantage of the whole world including those nations now enslaved within the soviet empire. While we all must keep our eyes on the practical considerations of the real world in which we live, there is always in our minds that ultimate ideal of the parliament of man, the federation of the world, where all nations can join their efforts in the common cause of peace and the advancement of peaceful pursuits.

This pact is for that purpose. Already much has been done, and today in the heart of every one of us is the hope that it will lay the foundation for that wider fellowship of nations and of humanity throughout the world to which all thoughts are directed in the minds of decent men and women.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we of this group join in recognizing the significance of this day as the second anniversary of the signing of the North Atlantic treaty. We recall that this is a treaty set up within the framework of the United Nations, and I was particularly glad to notice the reference that was made in that connection by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew).

We of this group have indicated from the start our support of the purposes of the North Atlantic treaty. There are, however, two or three aspects of that treaty in connection with which we should like to see more activity. For example, we should like to see greater action in respect of economic aid, a greater emphasis, indeed, upon the terms of article 2 of the North Atlantic treaty. Further, we should like to see more effective co-operation in trade and monetary policies amongst the various nations of the north Atlantic community. Indeed, we feel that this is necessary if the high purposes of the treaty are to be achieved. We also feel that if we are to carry out our commitments under the treaty we shall have to find ways to limit the rising costs of defence production within our own country.

Finally, I should like to say that out of the experience that the western nations have had recently in the Far East, it is apparent that steps should be taken, in advance, to make sure that there is complete civilian and governmental control over diplomatic matters, and that such matters will not be left in the hands of the military leaders appointed under the provisions of article 9 of the treaty.

It seemed to us that on this occasion, when we recognize the significance of what was done two years ago, attention should be drawn to these other points that I have mentioned.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit movement is all in favour of co-operation for the achievement of the fine ideals which have been talked of ad nauseam for the last ten years. But the technique whereby Social Credit believes these objectives can be attained is widely different from the technique which seems to be envisaged by those who have thus far participated in this little debate. The Social Credit movement looks upon the British commonwealth as having been the ideal pattern through which to attain co-operation in all major matters affecting the welfare of mankind. It will be recalled that no member of the British commonwealth was called upon to surrender in the slightest degree the sovereignty over its affairs.

We wish to warn against too ready acceptance of proposals that seem to be emanating from one place and another in relation to the Atlantic pact, and which seem to be designed to give to some central body power over the economic development and other essentially domestic matters within the various nations participating in the Atlantic pact. If that sort of thing is attained, it will be a sorry day for the world.

I am really surprised at how little we hear about the British commonwealth and the British empire organization which took us so safely through so long a period of the history of the world. I am also surprised that people can talk so enthusiastically in support of plans which have already, since their inception in the United Nations organization, resulted in such spectacular failure. May I suggest that as we progress now we keep a steady, balanced mind. We can co-operate, with maximum efficiency, working under a system similar to that which the British commonwealth was envisaging and working toward. This is the one warning that the Social Credit movement has to offer to the Dominion of Canada and to the other freedom-loving nations.

FIFTH REPORT—CONCURRENCE IN RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING CANADIAN-MONTANA PIPE LINE COMPANY

Mr. L. O. Breithaupt (Waterloo North) presented the fifth report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved:

That the recommendation contained in the fifth report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines respecting a charge on the proposed capital stock of Bill No. 117 (letter L-1 of the Senate), intituled an act to incorporate Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company, be concurred in.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT

STATUTORY REMISSION OF SENTENCES, NORTHWEST AND YUKON TERRITORIES, AND CUSTODIAL CARE, ALBERTA

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 191, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the minister shall have leave to introduce this bill?

Mr. Graydon: After he has explained it.

Mr. Garson: This bill has two purposes, Mr. Speaker. The first is to make available for the administration of prisons in the Northwest and Yukon Territories those sections of the Prisons and Reformatories Act which provide for a statutory remission of sentence which a prisoner may earn by good conduct. The second is to provide a part X of the act to deal with the custodial care of select prisoners in a new reformatory in the province of Alberta.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Lesage:

1. There is no formal written agreement on this subject. However, on February 16, 1951, the Canadian ambassador in Washington, in answer to inquiries from the state department, sent a note to the United States Secretary of State. This note stated that the policy of the Canadian government remained as announced in a statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the House of Commons on April 24, 1947. This statement was as follows:

"The Canadian government was recently approached by the United States authorities regarding the possibility of reaching agreement in principle that the seaway be made self-liquidating through an agreed system of tolls the details of which could be worked out at a later date. The Canadian government has now concurred in principle with the proposal to make the St. Lawrence seaway self-liquidating by means of toll charges subject to the conclusion of arrangements satisfactory to both governments for the implementation of this principle."

VETERANS AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER SPECIAL FORCE BENEFITS AND AMENDMENTS TO EXISTING ACTS

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That a special committee composed of 27 members, to be named at a later date, be appointed to consider a bill to enact the Special Force Veterans Benefit Act; also proposed amendments to the Pension Act, the Veterans Insurance Act, the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act, the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act, and such other legislation as may be placed before it, and to make recommendations from time to time in respect thereto, and that paragraph one of standing order 65 be suspended in relation thereto.

That the committee shall have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee.

That the committee shall have leave to sit while the house is sitting.

He said: Mr. Speaker, if I can get the unanimous consent of the house, I should like to ask that the resolution be amended by substituting the figure "31" for the figure "27" in the opening words of the resolution indicating the number of members who shall constitute the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house that the motion be so amended?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Brooks: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Speaker, in presenting this resolution calling for a special parliamentary committee on veterans affairs, it was my thought, as I announced soon after I assumed this portfolio, that the time is appropriate when a committee of the house should make a study of certain of our veterans legislation. This is particularly true in view of changing conditions, and in view of the fact that once again we have Canadian troops in the front lines fighting against aggression.

The resolution as presented is a broad general indication of the legislation which, in the opinion of the government, needs certain amendments and revisions. It is not my purpose at this time to go into the details of these amendments, because they will be brought before the house and before the proposed committee in due time. At the moment, final departmental and interdepartmental attention is being given to the legislation, some of which will be ready to be introduced in a very short time indeed.

You will note, however, that amendments are proposed to the Pension Act, the Veterans Insurance Act, the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act, the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act—that is to be presented by my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), although this legislation is part of the veterans charter. In addition, there will be legislation to extend to members of the special force certain appropriate benefits which were available to the veterans of world war II. Some of those benefits have already been extended by order in council under the legislation passed at the last session, and it is our intention at this time to incorporate these into legislation.

However, I might point out at this stage that this legislation for the special force will not at this time be made to include all the benefits given to the veterans of the second world war. This decision is made because the situation is still far from being what I might call static, and in the opinion of the government it is advisable that some degree of elasticity in regard to benefits to the members of the special force should be maintained, and that permanent legislation in regard to certain of the benefits should not be placed on the statute book until such time as we have a much clearer picture of the situation. Hon. members will recall that in effect this will be following the practice in developing the rehabilitation grants program during and after world war II.

In moving for this special parliamentary committee to study the changes in legislation the government is following a long-established practice. Such committees were set up originally after the first world war, and they continued at every second or third session of parliament from 1927 up until a couple of years before the outbreak of world war II.

The committees which have considered veterans legislation during and after 1945 have contributed a great deal to its effectiveness. All told I believe there have been about eighteen parliamentary committees on veterans affairs in the thirty-two years since the end of world war I. Most of them have been called upon to consider problems relating to veterans generally. Some of them were called to consider specific questions, such as the disposal of canteen funds, and other matters.

As a private member I have been privileged to sit on those committees which were constituted following the end of world war II, and I think it is proper that I should pay my tribute to the sincerity of purpose of all members who sat on those committees. Representing all parties in the house, the debate was invariably on a high level and devoid of political partisanship. I believe that is as it should be in discussing veterans legislation.

I feel we can agree that in the over-all picture, Canada's veterans legislation is as complete a rehabilitation program as has been made available by any country to its ex-service men and women. It has provided almost blanket protection in the months immediately following demobilization. It has provided assistance in many forms to the ex-service men or women planning a peacetime career. In practice it has worked well, and the vast majority of veterans using intelligently and constructively the rehabilitation aids extended to them, are now firmly reestablished in civilian life.

With the exception of that general statement, I do not intend at this time to review the work of my department or the success of the rehabilitation program, because there will be adequate opportunity to go into these matters fully at a later date, as various legislation is presented to the house, and when the estimates of my department are called.

However, although up until this time the legislation has met most of the needs of veterans, in the opinion of the government the time is now appropriate when certain portions of that legislation should be reviewed. My information in the matter has been strengthened, because I have had the opportunity to visit many of our districts and to discuss legislation with the officers of the department and of national veterans organizations. Officers of the department who have been making a special study of these problems will be readily available to the committee, as usual, and I trust they will be able promptly to furnish such information and records as the committee may require, and as they have done in the past.

The committee will be asked also to consider a measure of assistance for the unemployable disability pensioners, for which a special appropriation will be provided under the authority of the Department of Veterans Affairs Act. It is not my intention to go into detail regarding this supplement for unemployables at this stage, as full opportunity will be furnished to the committee and, as I said earlier, officers of the department will be available to make known to members of the committee the results of their studies.

However I believe the following broad outline will be of interest to hon. members. In approaching the problem it should be borne in mind that the present liability for pensions on behalf of nearly 160,000 disabled veterans, with their dependents, wives and children, amounts to over $67 million annually. A survey made of these pensions paid out shows that, of that amount, $18 million is paid to pensioners with disability of 20 per cent or less, representing 60 per cent of the total number of pensioners; $14 million to pensioners of from 25 per cent to 45 per cent disability, representing 20 per cent of the total; $15 million to pensioners of from 50 per cent to 75 per cent disability, representing 10 per cent of the total pensioners and, finally, $20 million to pensioners with from 80 per cent to 100 per cent disability representing the balance of 10 per cent of the total.

A close study throughout Canada by the welfare service branch of the department has shown a remarkably high level of employment of disability pensioners. A more detailed examination of high disability pensioners, registered with the casualty rehabilitation branch of the department, including those pensioners with between 80 per cent and 100 per cent disability, and having reference to paraplegics, the blind and double amputation cases, shows that less than 10 per cent of these high disability pensioners are unemployed.

The strong pleas which have reached me have been directed on behalf of the unemployable disability pensioner, and particularly those in the high pension brackets who have no incomes other than their pensions. The new measure of assistance is to provide an unemployability supplement which, in the case of a married pensioner may be up to $40 monthly, and in that of a single pensioner up to $20 monthly. The sum total of war veterans allowances and these unemployability supplements shall not exceed those amounts.

In order that prompt action may be taken and a full inquiry made, it is the intention to administer this unemployability supplement under the direction of authorities in each departmental district, in the same way as war veterans allowances are now administered.

It is also the intention to refer to the committee a bill to amend the Pension Act. The main feature of the bill will be more adequately to care for the children of pensioned widows, and to provide means whereby the higher education of such children of disability pensioners will be encouraged.

In introducing this resolution the government has signified its approval of the appointment of this committee, which will be named as soon as the resolution is adopted. As minister of the department I should like to put myself on record as welcoming its assistance, for I am quite sure that the report which it will submit when its work has been concluded will reflect careful and constructive consideration of the legislation placed before it.

There is perhaps one further thought which I should add. I have said that it is the intention of the government to ask this committee to consider certain proposed changes in veterans legislation. However, it is probable that in addition veterans bodies and perhaps other groups will ask for permission to make representations through the committee to the government. I feel that if such requests are made they would come within the scope of the committee. This has been the custom in the past and is one which I hope will be continued.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all agree with the minister that this is an appropriate time to set up a committee to study veterans affairs. I congratulate the minister upon doing this, and I am sure that we all wish him success in the work he has undertaken as head of the Department of Veterans Affairs. I have had the pleasure of sitting on committees with the minister, and I know he is anxious to do a good job.

I have often felt that there should be a permanent veterans affairs committee. I am not suggesting anything new, because this has been suggested by many hon. members on different occasions. There is quite a number of standing committees of the house, many of which seldom sit. I have been on a good many of them myself, and I notice that there is practically no work for certain committees to do. Year after year these standing committees are set up; we have them on paper, but that is practically all there is to it. I think the minister and others will agree that matters concerning veterans come up every year which are of great importance to the veterans, and I believe a standing committee would be of great value.

I do not intend to discuss veterans affairs at any length this afternoon, because I do not think it would be appropriate to do so on the motion to set up a committee. I might point out that I am disappointed in the number on the committee. The resolution mentions twenty-seven members, but the minister has asked that the resolution be amended to increase the number to thirty-one. I think this will be about the smallest committee on veterans affairs we have had in this house. It is certainly the smallest that we have had in quite a number of years. The veterans affairs committee which was set up in 1945 by the late Mr. Mackenzie had sixty members. There were sixty members on the committee of 1946. There were thirty-five members on the committee set up in 1948, and at that time that number was considered to be small. With the large number of veterans on all sides of the house I think the minister would have been well advised to have a larger committee. Veteran members of all parties are interested in the welfare of the veterans, and I am sure that greater benefits would be derived if this committee were made up of a larger group of returned men. However, I am not going to press the point; no doubt the thirty-one members of the committee will do a good job.

The most important part of this resolution is the terms of reference, and I am wondering whether they are broad enough to include all matters which should be included. I note that the terms of reference of the committee of 1946 were entirely different, and the same applies to the terms of reference of the committee of 1945. Perhaps the minister will explain this later on. The resolution passed in 1945 read as follows:

Resolved, that a select committee be appointed,

1. To consider all legislation passed since the commencement of the war with the German reich relating to the pensions, treatment, and re-establishment of former members of His Majesty's armed forces and of other persons who have otherwise engaged in pursuits closely related to war;

2. To prepare and bring in one or more bills to clarify, amend or supplement the above legislation.

The committee of 1945 had the duty of preparing and bringing in one or more bills to clarify, amend or supplement the legislation. The resolution which has been moved reads:

That a special committee composed of 31 members, to be named at a later date, be appointed to consider a bill to enact the Special Force Veterans Benefit Act; also proposed amendments to the Pension Act, the Veterans Insurance Act, the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act, the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act, and such other legislation as may be placed before it, and to make recommendations from time to time in respect thereto, and that paragraph 1 of standing order 65 be suspended in relation thereto.

Under these terms of reference we shall be able to deal only with such legislation as is brought before us. For instance, we can deal with the Special Force Veterans Benefit Act, which, as I gather from the remarks of the minister, has to do only with the special force. I should like to ask whether this would include men who might be sent to Europe under the Atlantic pact, and men of the transport command who are carrying many United States soldiers, as well as our own troops, to the Far East. Then there is the matter of the men in the Canadian navy. They are mostly in the permanent force. There is the special force, and in that special force we have men who are volunteers for this particular duty, and there are men of the permanent navy and of the permanent air force. Will all these men be covered?

The minister has stated that there are a great many matters to be considered. For instance, he spoke of the unemployable pensioner. I think we all agree that legislation to assist the unemployable pensioner would be most beneficial and would receive the endorsation of all members of the committee and of the house. The minister spoke also of the Pension Act and said that it would deal principally with children. I should like to point out that we have to deal with more than children when considering the Pension Act. We asked in 1948, for instance, that the amount of pension under the Pension Act be increased by 33⅓ per cent. It was increased by 25 per cent. The cost of living today has risen in the neighbourhood of 79 per cent, and we cannot put off any longer increasing the pension in order to provide some relief for pensioners of the last two wars.

Then there are widow's pensions. I should also like to ask the minister if the terms of reference are broad enough—and I do not think they are—to include war veterans allowances, for instance. Today we are paying $40 a month to war veterans while old age pensions are being increased, and there is talk of increasing them further. This is a matter which should be considered now and not left until next year or some other year. The terms of reference must be broad enough to include all problems of returned soldiers, not just the problems connected with the special force.

I might also say to the minister that what the proposed committee will do will have a great effect upon the attitude that the young men of the country will take with respect to enlisting in our active forces. We are asking now for many thousands of men, and, although I hope we shall not, we may need hundreds of thousands of young men. If they knew that adequate provisions were being made for them, it would have a very good effect so far as recruitment and enlistment are concerned.

As I said at the outset, it is not my intention at this time to go into all the different phases of veterans affairs. There will be ample opportunity to do that later, but the important matter that I wish to put before the minister now is the question of the terms of reference. I do not think they are broad enough; therefore I should like to move the following amendment:

That the resolution be amended by adding after the word "it" in the sixth line thereof the following: "and the legislation relating to pensions, war veterans allowance, treatment and re-establishment of former members of His Majesty's armed forces and of other persons who have been otherwise engaged in pursuits closely related to war."

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the amendment, I should also like to compliment the minister for having introduced a resolution at this session to set up a veterans affairs committee. Like the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), we in this group have urged from time to time that there should be a standing committee of the house to deal with veterans legislation. The minister has indicated the number of veterans committees that have been set up during the past few years. Almost every second year since 1945 we have had a veterans affairs committee of the house. I am sure it is the wish, not only of the veterans organizations but also of the veterans themselves, individuals to whom I have spoken, that we should have a standing committee of the house which could deal from year to year with the various problems arising under the veterans charter.

Taken as a whole, I think our veterans charter compares quite favourably with similar legislation anywhere else in the world. We have nothing to be ashamed of so far as the way in which we have treated our veterans is concerned, but the extent of the legislation itself indicates that problems will arise from time to time. Problems in administration must arise from year to year, and I think they could be dealt with by a standing committee of the house in co-operation with the officials of the department. In former years there has been co-operation between the officials of the department and veterans affairs committees which have been established. I think something is to be gained from close co-operation between departmental officials and members of the veterans affairs committee that is of value to the smooth operation of any veterans charter in this country.

Like the hon. member for Royal, I think that the terms of reference are too narrow. As a matter of fact if he had not moved an amendment I would have done so, because I have one here that is quite similar. I can assure him that we will support his amendment, because I am sure that the terms of the present reference are not sufficiently broad to do the job which we believe should be done at this time with respect to veterans legislation. I have not copies of references of the house to former veterans affairs committees, but as I remember them I think this is probably the narrowest reference that we have had for a number of years. As a rule, references of the house to veterans affairs committees established in former years have been fairly broad. Under them we have been able to deal with practically all aspects of veterans legislation, and, in my opinion, in such a way as to result in betterment of the various acts and greater satisfaction to the veterans themselves. After all, what we are here for is to give reasonable satisfaction to the veterans who made sacrifices in war to preserve our liberties.

I do not think that the present scale of pensions is nearly sufficient. During the sessions of the last veterans affairs committee we suggested, as the hon. member for Royal has stated, an increase of 33⅓ per cent, and it was finally adjusted to 25 per cent. Since that time the cost of living has increased tremendously. We must not forget that the basis of veterans pensions in Canada is the wages of the ordinary working man. Since the Pension Act was originally written, those wages have increased from a base of 100 to a base of 218 today. On the other hand, pensions have increased by only 25 per cent. Therefore, having regard to the base under which the pensions were originally established, I feel that they are too low today, and that we should do something at this time to see that they are brought more in line with their original base.

I am very glad indeed that the minister mentioned something about the education of deceased veterans' children. I raised this subject in the last two veterans affairs committees. Many of these children are now coming to an age when they are going to need assistance. If their fathers had lived and had been able to return to Canada they would have been able to take care of some of these problems. Unfortunately they did not, and not only have these children been deprived of their fathers' care and advice, but the pension received by the mothers and children is not sufficient to meet the increased costs of living and to give the children an opportunity for a better education. I am sure all hon. members agree that one of the finest parts of our veterans legislation is that part which provides educational opportunities for our returned men. It is one of the parts which has been most appreciated. It seems to me that the country should be prepared to give the same educational opportunity to the children of deceased veterans as it was prepared to give to the veteran himself had he returned. That is the least that we can do. I am pleased to note that the minister has mentioned this, and I hope that when the suggestions of the government are brought before the committee they will be liberal suggestions in more than one sense, and that they will adequately take care of the education of the children of deceased veterans.

I should like to mention one other group that in my opinion should have something done for them; I refer to the group receiving a low pension rate, many of whom had pre-enlistment disabilities. I meet many veterans who are receiving a fifteen or twenty per cent disability pension, and who are classified as having a thirty or forty per cent pre-enlistment disability. As a result their pension is quite low. Because of that pre-enlistment disability, they are unable to do many forms of work. At this time it is not good for this country to have a number of veterans who are receiving a low pension rate and yet are unable to take a position which will enable them to obtain a good standard of living. There are a considerable number in that class. I believe that the committee should give some consideration to taking care of that group.

There are also those who are today receiving a war veterans allowance. I believe this committee will have missed the mark unless it does something about war veterans allowances, because certainly they are too low. Today the allowance is below the old age pension being paid in at least the four western provinces. I recall that last year or the year before the member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) cited an instance in his own constituency in which a man who had served in the army of our enemy in the first war was today receiving a higher old age pension than our own veteran who was living right beside him. Such a condition should not exist. The war veterans allowance should be increased sufficiently to take care of those ageing veterans because today most of the veterans from the first war are at such an age that their earning capacity is extremely low. Because of this, and the increased cost of living, their standard of living is definitely being reduced. I do not think there is a member in the house who can argue otherwise. With the world situation what it is today, and at a time when we are asking young men to volunteer, the fact that these veterans are allowed to live on a sub-standard scale is not good. I believe we shall have missed our objective if we do not do something about it.

The new cost of living index which was announced today now stands at 179·7. There has been a rise of 4·5 since the last figure was announced, and that is the greatest increase in our history in the cost of living index over a similar period of time. There is no indication that it is going to stop there. The wholesale index is still going up, and that rise in the wholesale index must inevitably be transferred into a higher cost of living in the months to come. I hope that the increase will not be as great as it has been in this last month. If it is, then I am afraid we shall have to do something about it very quickly or we shall have discontent in this country.

I say that something should be done about the war veterans allowance by this committee. It should be increased so that the veterans who may be able to qualify for the allowance may have a standard of living that will compare favourably with that of other working people in this country. The basis upon which the pension was originally established was to give the veteran an equal standard of living with the other wage earners in Canada. As a matter of fact the pension is based on the earnings of a man who works with his hands. Today, because of new plant equipment, new methods of operation and production in our factories, we have far more trained people who earn more than the common labourer. It seems to me that the pension should be based on a higher standard than the earnings of a common labourer.

The fact that there has been a rise in the cost of living index, the fact that there is a greater percentage of the working population today who are trained and who are receiving higher rates of pay than they were when the original Pension Act was brought into force, are arguments that the Pension Act itself should be revised. A much higher rate should be paid.

I am not going to discuss many of the other matters with which I could deal concerning pensions, but I would ask that the minister give serious consideration to the amendment moved by the member for Royal to broaden the basis of reference to the veterans affairs committee.

Mr. Speaker: Before the member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) speaks, perhaps I should bring to the attention of the house the question whether or not this amendment is in order. It seems to me that the amendment broadens the powers of the committee, and would give it wider powers than those which are set out in the notice. I believe it has been established in this house that the notice of motion setting up a committee cannot be amended to give the committee wider powers than those set out in the notice of motion. As I see this matter now, it occurs to me that the amendment is not in order.

May I refer hon. members to paragraph 546 of Beauchesne's third edition, which reads as follows:

When the house is considering a motion, of which notice has been given, for the appointment of a select committee, a member cannot move in amendment that the committee be given wider powers than those which were set down in the notice. On the 13th March, 1938, a minister moved that a special committee be appointed to study the question of redistribution of electoral districts and to inquire into the methods whereby the source of campaign funds may be traceable. Two amendments were moved: One proposed that the committee's powers be extended so as to investigate amounts of contributions over $100 for the past ten years; the other proposed to investigate the methods whereby lumbermen, fishermen, seamen and miners in British Columbia may be enabled to exercise their franchise.

The Speaker ruled both amendments out of order on the ground that they raised new questions not contemplated in the notice of motion and proposed to extend the committee's powers far beyond those set down in the notice, and also that the necessity of giving notice will be nullified if such notice is not used as a guidance for the decision of the house.

Mr. Knowles: Before you make a final ruling, Mr. Speaker, on the basis of citation 546, I wonder if a couple of points should not be given further consideration. I note that the Speaker on that occasion ruled both amendments out of order, not just on the ground that they widened the powers of the committee but more specifically on the ground that they raised new questions not contemplated in the notice of motion. It seems to me that the Speaker had grounds for that ruling, bearing in mind the general rule respecting amendments, namely that they must abide by the law of relevancy.

I have not here the Journals or the Hansard from which this citation was taken, but I find that I have looked it up on a former occasion and that I have a few pencilled notes in the margin of my copy of Beauchesne's third edition. In fact, I discover that the amendments in question were moved by members of this group, namely by Mr. Grant MacNeil and by the present hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis); but that after those two amendments were ruled out of order the leader of this group moved a motion of instruction which had the effect of broadening the powers of the committee but without bringing in any irrelevant subject matter, and that that other motion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was accepted and passed.

It seems to me that a line must be drawn by Your Honour between a simple motion which broadens the powers of the committee but stays within the law of relevancy and a motion which would introduce material that is brand new. It seems to me that there was a case against those amendments referred to in citation 546, on the ground that they introduced something quite new. As to the amendment moved today by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), surely it abides by the law of relevancy, for it deals with veterans' matters and spells out the general phrase that is in the resolution. I might say further, by way of notice being given, that this matter was dealt with in the speech from the throne. One of the paragraphs in the speech from the throne of this year reads as follows:

Legislation will be submitted respecting the application of the benefits of the veterans charter to members of the special force. Amendments will be introduced to legislation concerning pensions for veterans and their dependents to relieve difficulties being experienced by certain groups of pensioners provided for thereunder.

Many of the pensioners experiencing difficulties referred to in that sentence in the speech from the throne are pensioners, for example, who are on small disability pensions and also on the burnt-out pension. All of us felt, from the wording of that notice in the speech from the throne, that when the legislation forecast thereby was brought in an act like the War Veterans Allowance Act and the others referred to by the hon. member for Royal would be included.

I need not go further with the point, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that Your Honour should draw the line between the type of amendment that brings in something that is foreign to the subject matter of which notice has been given and an amendment which, it is true, broadens the powers of the committee but does it within the law of relevancy, within the subject matter covered—in general, at least—by the motion that is before us.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that to argue that an amendment must not be put forward because it broadens the terms of a motion is to overlook the fact that that is basically the purpose of an amendment. I could turn up the citation—but I believe it is as familiar to Your Honour as it is to me—that says that the purpose of an amendment is to make a motion more acceptable to members than it would be without the change or the addition proposed by that amendment. That is exactly the purpose of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Royal, namely to make this motion moved by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) more acceptable to the house by broadening these terms of reference, at the same time staying within the law of relevancy.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, may I point out that if you should rule this amendment out of order, then, for all practical purposes, it would be impossible to move an amendment to any notice of motion of this kind; because there could not be a case in which the amendment would be more relevant to the contents of the notice of motion than is this one.

The finding made, as reported in Beauchesne under paragraph 546, had to do with a committee which was set up to study the question of the redistribution of electoral districts. It was not a committee to consider the elections act but a committee to study redistribution. To that motion two amendments were moved. One had to do with an investigation of campaign funds and contributions, something which obviously had nothing whatever to do with the question of the redistribution of constituencies. The second amendment had to do with methods whereby lumbermen, fishermen, seamen and miners in British Columbia might be enabled to exercise their franchise. That second amendment obviously had to do with the elections act. It had nothing whatever to do with the question of redistribution.

May I therefore submit to Your Honour that this particular ruling, upon which you are now disposed to rule against the amendment moved by the hon. member for Royal, is not in point at all. There it was an obvious attempt to throw something in which had nothing to do with the original notice of motion. The present amendment, on the other hand, deals directly with the subject which is set out in the notice of motion.

I would repeat that if Your Honour rules that this particular amendment is out of order, then in effect it will be impossible in this house for a member to rise and move an amendment to a notice of motion such as that brought in by the Minister of Veterans Affairs today.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with attention to the arguments submitted by the two hon. members who have discussed the question you raised as to the conformity with the rules of the house of the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Royal. If we consider its terms, and compare those terms with the terms of the notice, we find at once that it changes entirely the purpose for which the notice provided for the setting up of a committee. The notice provided for the setting up of a committee—

> . . . to consider a bill to enact the Special Force Veterans Benefit Act; also proposed amendments to the Pension Act, the Veterans Insurance Act, the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act, the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act, and such other legislation as may be placed before it . . .

It is well known that such legislation involves the expenditure of public moneys and must be preceded by a resolution which is recommended to the house by His Excellency the Governor General. This notice is drawn in such a form as to set up a committee to consider legislation which will have been introduced in the house and referred to the committee. The amendment would change it entirely and make it a committee to consider the situation of veterans generally—

Mr. Green: That is what the minister said it was for this afternoon.

Mr. St. Laurent: —and the legislation relating to pensions, war veterans allowances, treatment and re-establishment of former members of His Majesty's armed forces and other persons who have been otherwise engaged in pursuits closely related to war. It makes it a different kind of a committee from the committee to which the notice applies. Of course the house has at all times the right to set up all the committees it sees fit to set up. But the rules of the house provide that notice must be given in advance of the intention to move that a committee for any specific purpose shall be set up.

The decision to which Your Honour referred does not at all affect the powers of the house. The house would have had on that occasion the right to set up a committee to consider the manner in which the lumbermen in British Columbia could exercise their franchise; but in order to do that it would have required that a notice be given of the intention to make such a motion. And I think that if we are to apply the rules of the house to the establishment of a committee with the wide scope envisaged by the amendment, there will have to be notice given in advance.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened to the representations that have been made by the members on the point of order which I have raised. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) stated that the motion which was before the house, and referred to in paragraph 546 of Beauchesne's parliamentary rules and forms, third edition, was one to study the question of redistribution of electoral districts; but I might also point out that it was to inquire into the methods whereby the source of campaign funds may be traceable. The amendment which was declared out of order suggested that the committee should be empowered to investigate the amounts of contributions over $100 for the past ten years. I think in that instance hon. members could have argued that the amendment was relevant to the powers set forth in the original notice of motion.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) stated that when the amendment referred to in paragraph 546 was ruled out of order the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) moved another amendment giving instructions to the committee. May I point out to the house that the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar at that time was moved by leave of the house.

I am afraid that if I allow this motion to stand I will find myself in difficulty every time a notice of motion is before the house for setting up a committee. I am bound by the rules of the house, and I feel satisfied that it has been established in this house that an amendment cannot be moved which would widen the scope of the powers of the committee as set forth in the notice of motion. In order to rule otherwise I would have to go directly against the opening words of paragraph 546 which says:

> When the house is considering a motion, of which notice has been given, for the appointment of a select committee, a member cannot move in amendment that the committee be given wider powers than those which were set down in the notice.

I feel I must rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Since you have ruled the amendment out of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a second one, which will I think perhaps narrow it, and which will come within the terms of reference. The terms of reference are these:

> Resolved, that a special committee composed of 31 members, to be named at a later date, be appointed to consider a bill to enact the Special Force Veterans Benefit Act; also proposed amendments to the Pension Act, the Veterans Insurance Act, the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act, the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act, and such other legislation as may be placed before it,...

—such as the War Veterans Allowance Act. Therefore I would move that the motion be amended by inserting therein immediately after the word "it", in line 6 thereof, the following words:

> such as the War Veterans Allowance Act.

This amendment is seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce). It quite clearly indicates in the notice of motion that there may be other legislation, and we are just indicating one piece of legislation which we believe should be considered under that reference to other legislation.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member for Acadia continues, it seems to me that this amendment does not add to or detract from the notice of motion which is before the house. I do not think it clarifies the notice of motion in any way. I think this amendment is also out of order. I would rule it out of order on the ground that it neither adds to nor detracts from the notice of motion, nor does it in any way clarify the notice of motion.

Mr. Knowles: Have you ruled?

Mr. Speaker: Yes, I have ruled. I did not know the hon. member wanted to speak.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Green: He has the right to speak.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I did not interrupt Your Honour; I was hoping you would give me an opportunity to speak before you ruled.

May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that we have had similar instances in this very session. I refer in particular to the amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne which was moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). It made reference to ways of dealing with the rising cost of living. From this group there was moved a sub-amendment which spelled out some of the ways to do what was referred to in the amendment, and I suggest that is precisely what the amendment now moved by my colleague from Melfort (Mr. Wright) proposes to do. It adds to a general phrase a specific reference. The general phrase is put in these words:

> and such other legislation as may be placed before it.

My colleague, the hon. member for Melfort, spells out one example of such other legislation by adding the words:

> such as the War Veterans Allowance Act.

The purpose that my colleague has in mind in presenting the amendment in this form is to meet the objection that Your Honour made to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks). This does not introduce anything new; this simply spells out something to which there was perhaps an implied reference in the original notice of motion.

Although Your Honour did not dwell upon it, objection to the previous amendment was made by the Prime Minister with regard to the necessity of any money measure being introduced by a minister of the crown. The amendment now proposed by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) does not make it necessary that proposed amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act be placed before the committee, in order for such proposed amendments to be discussed. It would merely give the committee power to deal with and to discuss the whole question of the War Veterans Allowance Act.

I submit, with all respect, that Your Honour should reconsider. We are trying to meet the objection raised to the previous amendment; and I submit that this amendment does spell out the meaning of the general phrase in the main motion, and that it should be allowed.

Mr. St. Laurent: If the hon. member is right in his last words that this amendment would allow the committee to consider the War Veterans Allowance Act, whether any amendment were put before it or not, then it certainly enlarges the terms of the notice of motion.

Mr. Knowles: Committees do it all the time.

Mr. St. Laurent: If they can do that, without this addition suggested by the hon. member, then the objection Your Honour urged a few moments ago to its validity is conclusive. If it adds nothing, if it clarifies nothing, then it is not an amendment that is in order. And if it has any effect whatsoever, its only effect can be to enlarge the scope for which provision is made in the notice of motion. The notice of motion provides that other legislation may be considered if it is placed before the committee. The hon. member says that with the amendment suggested the War Veterans Allowance Act and its implications and effect could be considered, whether legislation respecting it is placed before the committee or not. That clearly enlarges the scope of the committee.

Mr. Knowles: May I say to the Prime Minister that he is correct in saying that it enlarges the scope of the committee, to make it clear that it can deal with the War Veterans Allowance Act. I would point out to him that at the last session we had a special committee of the house dealing with old age security. There were no proposed amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act; but because the terms of reference of that committee covered the whole question of old age security we had the right in that committee to deal exhaustively with the Old Age Pensions Act.

Mr. St. Laurent: And that had been preceded by a resolution or by a notice which went to that extent.

Mr. Knowles: That just gets back to the original argument. Surely we are not to be denied the right to move amendments to all motions of this kind.

Mr. Speaker: I can assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that if he had convinced me that I was wrong when I made my ruling a few moments ago I would have reconsidered it, owing to the fact that I had not given him an opportunity to speak. I might point out that I thought I had given all hon. members an opportunity to speak to the point of order before I made my ruling.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said that this amendment spells out the terms of the notice of motion, and has referred to the fact that this is done when an amendment is moved to the motion for the adoption of the speech from the throne. But I would point out to him, as at times he has pointed out to me, that much more latitude is given in a motion for the adoption of the speech from the throne than is given in other cases.

For the reasons already given I must rule that the present amendment also is out of order.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, those of us in this group are glad the minister has seen fit to introduce a resolution to set up a special committee on veterans affairs. In the last session we said we thought it should have been set up at that time, because in the past it has been customary to set up a special committee on veterans affairs early in each parliament. Now we have reached the third session—

Mr. Knowles: The fourth session.

Mr. Quelch: —the fourth session of this parliament before action has been taken.

We have also said in the past that we would favour the committee of veterans affairs being made a permanent, standing committee, so that we could meet grievances as they arise, instead of waiting until a backlog of those grievances accumulates. In view of the fact that the last committee sat in 1948, I am pretty sure we will find that there is a heavy backlog of grievances with which we will have to deal.

I regret, too, that the terms of reference have been narrowed. I looked through the terms of reference of previous committees back to 1945, and I find that the terms under which this committee will operate are considerably narrower than those of other committees. I can well understand that the terms of reference now might be narrower than those in 1945 or 1946, immediately after the war. But these terms are considerably narrower than the terms of reference in 1948, which is the last year in which a committee was set up. The terms of reference in 1948 read:

> That a select committee be appointed to consider the legislation relating to pensions, treatment and re-establishment of former members of His Majesty's armed forces and of other persons who have been otherwise engaged in pursuits closely related to war, and to make recommendations from time to time in respect thereto.

In other words, those terms of reference covered practically all veterans legislation. It dealt with the re-establishment of veterans, and therefore dealt with the question of the War Veterans Allowance Act. In this instance however the resolution makes specific mention of bills with which the committee may deal, and then states further that it may be able to consider legislation the government may bring down. However there is no mention of the War Veterans Allowance Act or the Veterans Land Act.

I am satisfied there is going to be very strong pressure brought to bear on the committee to deal with the War Veterans Allowance Act at some stage of its deliberations, because I doubt if there is any piece of veterans legislation today with which there is more dissatisfaction. I am not blaming the act, because it is a good one. I am blaming the condition as it exists today, in the light of the cost of living having risen in the way it has risen. For this reason the amount of the allowance is altogether inadequate to meet the cost of living of a single or a married veteran.

The minister stated that veterans organizations would be allowed to submit briefs to the committee, as they have in the past. If the minister is going to dictate to the Legion and to the national council of veterans organizations as to what they can put in their briefs, then it will be the first time that has ever been done. I am satisfied he will cause a tremendous amount of hostility in both the Legion and the national council if he tries to tell them what they can put in their briefs.

I would suppose that in those briefs there would be reference to the War Veterans Allowance Act. If in the Legion's brief there is a recommendation with respect to war veterans allowances, is the minister going to say to the committee, "You cannot consider the recommendation of the Legion regarding war veterans allowances"? In the past we have always considered the briefs of these organizations when they have been submitted to the committee. Undoubtedly in the briefs presented this year there will be recommendations regarding war veterans allowances. Are we going to be debarred from considering those recommendations? Are we going to be debarred from making recommendations with regard to submissions made by the Legion in connection with war veterans allowances? I am not going to try to move another amendment as I am dissuaded from taking that action by what has already happened to those who have tried to move amendments.

I am going to ask the minister to give the house the assurance that when this committee sits it will be in position to give consideration to any matter of urgent importance so far as the veterans are concerned and to any matter that is mentioned in a brief presented by a veterans organization. If the minister will give that assurance I think a lot of the dissatisfaction that has been expressed will be met. I think the minister will agree that we will be in a most difficult position if we cannot give consideration to recommendations by the Legion and the National Council of Veterans Associations. If the minister will give that assurance we will be in position to consider briefs in full and the veterans organizations will be free to make submissions on any matter. That assurance would meet much of the dissatisfaction that has been expressed with regard to the terms of reference and I personally would have no further fear in that regard. As I expect to be a member of this committee I shall have plenty of opportunity to say what I want to say, so I shall say no more at this time.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, when the minister was making his statement this afternoon in moving the resolution I understood him to say that following the established practice in this house this special committee on veterans affairs would be dealing with veteran problems generally.

Mr. Lapointe: No.

Mr. Green: The minister used words to that effect, or in any event that was the understanding I got from his remarks.

Mr. Lapointe: My exact words were that this committee of the house would make a study of certain of our legislation.

Mr. Green: I am sure that if Hansard is checked it will be found that the minister said that following the established practice in this house this committee would deal with veteran problems generally.

Mr. Lapointe: I believe I have the statement to which my hon. friend refers. I referred to some eighteen odd committees that had been set up since the first war to deal with veteran matters. I mentioned that some of them had been given terms of reference to deal with specific matters, such as canteen funds, while others had dealt with veteran problems generally. That was where I used those words. I did not use them with reference to the committee which is the subject matter of this resolution.

Mr. Green: The minister certainly did not give the impression that this particular committee was to deal only with one or two special problems. Certainly the practice for many years with veterans affairs committees has been to have the committee deal with any veteran problem. That is the expectation of veterans across this country. I know I have been asked many times by veterans when something could be done about their problems and I have always answered that when we had a veterans affairs committee it would be possible to have these various matters discussed. Today the understanding of the veterans organizations from coast to coast is that when the special committee on veterans affairs is set up it will be able to deal with veteran problems generally.

Mr. Lapointe: I did not make that statement. I insist that I made no such statement at this time, or at any previous time when I was referring to this parliamentary committee.

Mr. Green: Is it the intention that this committee shall have restricted powers and be able to deal only with the specific matters set out in the resolution?

Mr. Lapointe: The committee will be called upon to deal with the matters set out in the terms of reference in this resolution. I want to point out that that is what I have said ever since I took over the portfolio of veterans affairs. My hon. friend has referred to what he understands is the belief of the veterans organizations as to the work of this committee. I have made it quite plain before the officers of these organizations on various occasions that this committee would be set up to consider legislation to be sent to it by the House of Commons or legislation to be introduced during the session. I have been most specific on this matter.

Mr. Green: I can only say that I greatly regret that is the decision of the minister because it is not in line with the stand taken by his predecessors. I remember the late Right Hon. Ian Mackenzie when he was minister of this department. As we all know, he did good work as minister of veterans affairs in setting up the veterans charter. He invariably took the position that a committee on veterans affairs must be able to deal with any question having to do with veterans. It was for that reason that he had such success. The members of the committees knew that they were being given the responsibility of reviewing the whole field of veterans legislation. It was considered to be a great honour and responsibility and they took it seriously.

We find that the committee to be set up in the present session is to be restricted to certain specific matters, to legislation which the government chooses to bring in. Unless there is an amendment to the War Veterans Allowance Act the committee will be precluded from making any recommendation in connection with that act. Apart from the Pension Act the only statutes mentioned are the Veterans Insurance Act, the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act and the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act. We all know that the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act applied only to veterans of the first war. Those are the only three acts out of a group of perhaps ten or twelve having to do with veterans which are open for discussion under this resolution. Of course there is such other legislation as the government sees fit to bring in, but the result is that there can be no broad discussion of veteran problems and no broad findings in connection with those problems.

I hope the minister will give further consideration to the suggestions which have been made this afternoon by members of the opposition. If he will come to the conclusion that it would be wise to trust the committee to review all veteran problems in a fair way I think he will obtain better results than he will by attempting to put a bridle on the committee and thereby hamper its work.

We are now in the fourth session of this parliament and it is most unlikely that there will be another committee on veterans affairs during the life of this parliament; there has been no such committee yet. Now this is the last chance to bring veterans legislation up to date during the life of this parliament. It is therefore important that this committee should be given wider powers than those given to a committee being set up year after year.

In his remarks the minister also gave some details of the proposed amendments to the Pension Act. He said that there was to be a new departure in pension legislation, what he called an unemployable disability pension; he also described it as an unemployability supplement. In the speech from the throne I find a little further explanation in the paragraph reading:

> Amendments will be introduced to legislation concerning pensions for veterans and their dependents to relieve difficulties being experienced by certain groups of pensioners provided for thereunder.

I was shocked last night to read in the April edition of The Legionary an article by the dominion first vice-president, Dr. C. B. Lumsden, entitled "Pensioners' Plight". In that article he set out that he believed it was the intention of the government not to grant a general increase in the pension rate but to establish a means test under the Pension Act and pay a supplement to those pensioners who were having the hardest time economically. Today we have the minister making a statement which appears to mean just that, that instead of raising the Canadian disability pension as it should be raised there is to be a handout by means of a means test to those pensioners who are having the hardest time to get along.

Of course that is the same thing that was done with the War Veterans Allowance Act two or three years ago. The rate of war veterans allowance should have been increased but instead of doing so there was a second means test provided under which, if the recipient of war veterans allowance could prove that he was very hard up, he could be given some additional payment. There has never been a means test attached to the Canadian Pension Act in the history of this country. The pensioners of this country are the men and women of this nation who of all people deserve the payments that are made to them. They are payments earned by the suffering of themselves or their loved ones who are gone. The Canadian people owe a greater debt to the war pensioners of Canada than to any other group in the nation.

It has been one of the tenets of war veterans organizations right from the start that the pension is not a handout, is not subject to a means test but is payable as of right, and that if a pensioner has been disabled to such an extent that he receives 100 per cent pension that does not interfere with his right to go out and work at a job which brings him $10,000 a year if he is able to do so in spite of his handicap. One of the fundamentals of pension legislation in Canada has been that the fact that a man has a good job must not be taken into consideration in arriving at his pension. In his article Dr. Lumsden sets out the story very clearly. He has the arguments here, and I do not believe they could be put any better. I warn the government that there will be trouble if they try to get away from their responsibility to give Canadian pensioners a proper pension by providing for some additional payment to a few pensioners based on a means test. It is not good enough for this nation to deal with war pensioners in that way.

As for the war veterans allowance, it has been pointed out by members who have spoken before me that in some provinces an old age pensioner gets considerably more than a recipient of war veterans allowance. That position is so intolerable that a year or two ago the minister's predecessor in office, who is now the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), said that he was considering the possibility of making the war veterans allowance larger in some provinces than in others in order that it would be as large as the old age pension.

Mr. Mutch: Where did he say that?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, I must correct my hon. friend. I have never made any such statement at any time at any place.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You should withdraw.

Mr. Gregg: The War Veterans Allowance Act being a federal statute, I have always contended that it should never under any circumstances discriminate between one province and another.

Mr. Green: I have not the reference here.

Mr. Gregg: You cannot find it anywhere.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You have got to take the hon. gentleman's word.

Mr. Green: If the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) will just stick to the business of running the house—

Mr. Mutch: You must take his word.

Mr. Green: —and not try to interrupt in this debate—

Mr. Mutch: That is business of the house.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Labour certainly dealt with that point and said words to the effect that it might be necessary, that it might be wise, to provide for a larger payment of war veterans allowance in some provinces than in others.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, it is very seldom that I rise to my feet in this house to interrupt an hon. member. It is very seldom that I rise to refute a statement as to what I have said, but I refute this statement and say without any question of doubt that I never made any such statement anywhere.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Withdraw.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Withdraw.

Mr. Lapointe: Withdraw.

Mr. Green: I am going to leave it to Hansard to prove what he did say.

Mr. Mutch: You must accept his word.

Mr. Green: I will not withdraw because I heard it with my own ears.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there is a certain rule in this house that you have got to accept what an hon. member says, and if he says that he did not say those words the hon. gentleman should withdraw. He knows the rule. He generally follows the rules quite closely except when he threatens the house or the government.

Mr. Green: You had better withdraw that.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You just threatened the government.

Mr. Green: I will withdraw until I bring Hansard and quote it to the minister. I think that will prove beyond any doubt exactly what he said.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You cannot qualify the withdrawal.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) should withdraw his statement. I think he must accept the statement made by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Green: I will accept the statement, Your Honour, and try to prove he was wrong later on. In any event the situation existing in Canada today is that the recipient of war veterans allowance is not getting as much in British Columbia, and several other provinces, as the old age pensioner. That is a condition which should be considered by this committee, and which I would hope would be remedied as a result.

There is one other question. In the references setting up the committees of 1945, 1946 and 1948 we find these words:

> . . . legislation relating to pensions, treatment and re-establishment of former members of His Majesty's armed forces and of other persons who have been otherwise engaged in pursuits closely related to war . . .

That enabled those committees to consider the plight of the men of the merchant navy and various other groups. I should like to ask the minister to explain whether or not it will be possible for the committee now being set up to consider these questions.

For many years the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), myself and many other members of the house, have been pointing out the unfairness to the men in Canada's merchant navy, by reason of the way in which they have been deprived of benefits which were given to the members of the three other fighting forces. It has been my belief that when a committee was set up it would be possible to consider this question of the merchant navy veterans. I should like to know whether, under the present terms of reference, it will be possible to consider that problem.

I hope the minister will not be too strict in ruling on these questions. Probably he will not be the chairman of the committee. I would expect the chairman to be the parliamentary assistant, so perhaps my appeal should be directed to him. He has been a member of all parliamentary committees on veterans affairs since his election in 1935. I am sure he will appreciate the advantages of trying to co-operate with the other members of the committee on these questions.

While the government have refused to accept this amendment this afternoon, I would appeal to them once again not to be too tough with this committee. I also appeal to the minister to give us some assurance this afternoon before the debate closes that it is his intention to allow a full and open discussion of all problems concerning the veterans of Canada.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a few observations to make on this resolution. Personally, I am disappointed with the resolution. I was not surprised when the Speaker ruled out of order the amendments that were proposed. As I read this resolution it is designed to do one thing, and that is not to set up a parliamentary committee on veterans affairs as we have understood it in the past with broad terms of reference for examination of all the machinery relating to veterans affairs; it is merely to bring the special forces into the present machinery without making any changes in any of the legislation. In my opinion that is all the resolution is designed to do. If you just read a few words of it, I think you will get that impression.

The resolution states that the committee is to consider a bill to enact the Special Force Veterans Benefit Act, and that is all it is designed to do. It is to bring in a new act that will relate the special forces to the present legislation. The resolution then goes on to define the different phases of legislation to which the special forces will be entitled, that is the Pension Act, the Veterans Insurance Act, the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act, and so on. I hope I am wrong, but if I am right in my interpretation of that resolution, there is no need to set up the committee at all. The terms of the resolution confine the activities of that committee to a scrutiny of the proposed act, and the opening of present legislation in order to bring the special forces within the scope of it. The parliamentary assistant can shake his head, but I am reading English and I am interpreting it as the chairman of the committee is going to interpret it.

Mr. Mutch: Oh no, you are not.

Mr. Gillis: The committee will be bound by the terms of reference, and those terms are quite specific, more specific than I have ever seen before. If that is all the committee is designed to do, then no purpose is served by setting up the committee. The government can pass that legislation without setting up the committee.

I want to say that I am glad the minister has proposed a committee. I am glad for this reason. It is going to give the minister an opportunity of meeting a representative group of ex-servicemen in this house. It is going to give that group an opportunity of meeting the minister. We are going to know him better, and he is going to know us better after we are through. In that way, it is going to be of benefit to both the committee and the minister. I sympathize with the minister. He is new, and perhaps the cabinet and treasury board take advantage of new ministers as they did the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) when they cut off the mail carriers, thus getting him into a lot of trouble. The minister has taken over a large department. There is a lot in it to study, and he has a lot to learn. I believe he has been unfortunate in the loss of a member of his staff who passed away in December. I should like to pay tribute in this house to the late Colonel Doug Macbeth. In the loss of that man to the department the minister has suffered a grievous blow. I worked a bit with him. He was not in the department long, but he was one of the most effective and dynamic workers it has been my privilege to meet. It will be difficult to replace him. The minister has suffered the loss of a very efficient servant who could have advised him on a lot of things. No doubt someone else has taken his place who is almost as efficient. I hope so.

The minister has a tough job ahead of him for the next few months. The Legion is up in arms. I happen to be a member of the Legion, and I have been since it was formed. Any time I am going through the country I visit the Legion branches. I have done that recently, and know what the members are talking about in terms of changes in the legislation. One of the strongest arguments I got at all the branches I visited within the last couple of months concerned the War Veterans Allowance Act. Everyone admits it is a good piece of legislation, but there are many weak spots in it today which have developed through force of circumstances. If the minister wants to keep on good terms with the Legion, as I think a man in his position has to do because the Legion looks upon the Department of Veterans Affairs as their department, he will study these problems. In the past the Legion has had a lot of confidence in the department and co-operation from it; that is the way we want it. The War Veterans Allowance Act should be included in the terms of reference of this committee, because the means test should be removed. It hurts in many ways. The federal and provincial governments are considering the abolition of the means test for old age pensions. The trend is towards getting away from the means test. Under the War Veterans Allowance Act the permissible earnings are too low. The maximum payment is too low. No one can exist on $40 per month.

There are many young veterans who could be earning something if the means test was not rigidly enforced. Today the Legion branches across the country are adamant on that point. They want that changed, and it should be changed. Another very sore spot is the matter of medical attention for the families of the recipients of war veterans allowance. Ten years ago medical costs in this country were not what they are now. Today many of the veterans on maximum pension have children. They have wives to maintain, and homes; and they are getting enough to eke out a bare existence. If a member of the family is taken ill, or if the wife requires hospitalization, that war veteran is in the position in which he cannot get any medical attention for his family in any way, shape or form, with the price of medicine and hospitalization as it is in this country today. That has been the subject of much discussion in the Legion over the last couple of years. It is a new angle that has crept in because of the rising costs of medical attention. That matter should be discussed at the sittings of this committee and some understanding should be arrived at on it.

Another sore spot is the treatment of the widow of a veteran of this war in the matter of war veterans allowance. There are many cases of veterans of this war whose widows should qualify for war veterans allowance under the widows' section. But when the investigation takes place, the first thing she is faced with is the fact that she is not old enough; she is not fifty-five years of age; she is not incapacitated, but she is living perhaps ten miles out of town in some rural community where there is no possibility of employment, with a family of three or four children on her hands to look after. There is no income but she cannot receive that war veterans allowance because she is not incapacitated and she is not fifty-five years of age. There is case after case like that. I have had cases brought to my attention where the man died in the permanent force, where his superannuation was passed back to the widow, and over $600 was deducted from it by way of income tax, a second deduction for tax purposes out of that amount of money. That is a recent case and it has been before the veterans affairs committee. I brought it to the attention of the committee on national defence. That widow is out there. She has no income. She has a family. She is tied to her home. But she cannot receive pension by way of disability pension and she cannot receive a pension under the War Veterans Allowance Act. That act should be changed so that, where there are extenuating circumstances such as those I have mentioned, the commission should have some administrative latitude in handling the case, instead of there being the rigid application of the act that there is today. It is not the commission's fault. That is the way the act is written. It should be softened up. I do not say that it should be opened up wide, but some administrative latitude should be given to the commission. That is another adjustment of the War Veterans Allowance Act that is necessary; and I am giving it to you, Mr. Speaker, as I got it from members of the branches of the Legion.

There is another spot where the act requires amendment. We amended the War Veterans Allowance Act to include imperial veterans who had residence of twenty years in Canada. That was all to the good. You find that many of those veterans had passed away when they were eighteen years here or sixteen years here, but their widows are here. We did not broaden the scope of the act to provide for the widow. It is applicable only if the veteran is alive and himself receives the veterans allowance. There are many veterans' widows across this country in that position, where the husband did not complete twenty years' residence here and the widow therefore is not entitled to the war veterans allowance. The act requires amendment there.

All of these things that I am talking about are sore spots. A change in the act to cure the sore spots would not cost a great deal of money. They are borderline cases in many instances. But that act requires amendment in these respects. There are other odds and ends that should be cleaned up also. If the War Veterans Allowance Act is excluded from the terms of reference of this committee, then we are not going to talk about it; and when the Legion finds that out, they are going to be quite sore about it.

Another act that is excluded from the terms of reference of the committee is the Veterans Land Act. That act requires amendment. I am going to refer to it as it pertains to my part of the country, and the hardship that it creates there for veterans. One of the best features of the Veterans Land Act was the small holdings section which enabled a veteran to get a home at a reasonable cost, provided he could get three acres of land in some instances, and down to two acres under certain circumstances. This is a problem that pertains to Nova Scotia and it may also pertain to Alberta and to some sections of British Columbia.

The Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation have all of the minerals of Nova Scotia leased for ninety-nine years. That means that everything under the ground—no matter where you may go in that province, where there are minerals—belongs to the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation. When a veteran makes application under the Veterans Land Act, it has been administered in this way. The coal company will not issue a warranty deed. The minister will remember this case because I brought it out. In the early days of applying the Veterans Land Act in that province, the director at that time counselled his advisers in the offices in the various communities that, where the building was erected on land that a veteran was taking over under the small holdings section, that type of deed would be all right to accept. The counsellors in the offices counselled the veteran along those lines. In many cases that type of deed was accepted. He also issued the declaration that no land for new construction should be purchased with that reservation in that deed.

I ran into this difficulty a few months ago in connection with several veterans who had taken over a nice property and made their application, had put their credits into it for the down payment and thought they were getting a nice home at a reasonable cost. All of a sudden they were notified by the veterans affairs department that they cannot accept that deed from the coal company with that reservation in it, despite the fact that in many cases deeds of that type were accepted under similar circumstances. I got in touch with the minister. The minister checked with his department, and I hope he is still carrying on an investigation into this matter. I also checked with the head of the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, and received much good advice and co-operation from him. He did what he could. It is a legal matter. It is a matter that is in the hands of his legal officials. The matter of subsidence of property all through the area is something that is widespread from the general standpoint, and he was reluctant to do much about it. The only hope is with the Department of Veterans Affairs.

In view of the fact that there are not many cases, and there will not be many cases, because the land is not available in those communities—they are quite large communities—in those few cases the department might accept that deed with that reservation in it relieving the company from the responsibility for subsidence. That sounds complicated but there is nothing to it. But under the present legislation the officials of the department are obliged to take that stand. If the Veterans Land Act was before the committee, we might be able to get an amendment in there to effect a softening up of it, and to provide for administrative latitude.

In all of this legislation I have always felt that the real test of its value is in the administration. If you are going to tie the hands completely of those who administer the legislation, to me it presupposes that you have not much confidence in the people you pick to administer it. Cases such as these cause all of the little irritations. The general application of the legislation is all right; there is not much wrong with the basic legislation. It is in connection with these borderline cases, where the administration has no latitude to make a decision but must be bound rigidly by the terms of the act, that most of the difficulty is caused. If this Veterans Land Act does not go before this committee, nothing is going to be done about it. If the War Veterans Allowance Act is not going before the committee, nothing is going to be done to remedy the points of irritation that I have mentioned.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) made a rather startling prediction a few moments ago. He said that in his opinion, and he would gather from the opinion expressed by Dr. Lumsden, the first vice-president of the Legion, it was the intention of the government to establish a means test in the disability pension. Before this discussion closes I hope that the minister will rise in his place in the house and say that that is not so. It has never been so. A disability pension is based on a disability assessed by medical authorities, and regardless of what you may earn on the side despite your handicap, it never interfered with the assessment of the disability from the medical point of view. If there is any intention or any suggestion on the part of the government to institute a means test in disability pensions when the general trend from one end of this country to the other is to eliminate means tests and free people so that they may contribute something to the pool of wealth by way of supplementary earnings, then I think it is a pretty bad attitude. I never suspected that. I read the article to which the hon. member referred but I did not get that impression.

I would not want the press of this country to carry a statement from this house that it was the intention of the government at this time to establish a means test in disability pensions. I am not going to say any more. There are many things I could say but I will reserve them for the committee. There is no use talking about them here. But I am going to say before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, that if the terms of reference of this committee, as I read them, are accurate, that it is the intention of the government only to open the present acts without any amendments to them other than to relate the special force to them, then we are wasting our time in setting up a committee, because that could very well be done in this house through the medium of the Canadian Forces Act and not waste a lot of time in committee arguing over things that we cannot do anything about.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a few words before the minister apparently concludes the debate on this resolution. I am one who is very pleased indeed that this resolution is before the house, and that the requests of the Legion and of many members of this house throughout recent years, and of a good percentage of the public, have been met by the introduction of this resolution to establish this committee.

I was a member of the special parliamentary committee on veterans affairs of 1945, 1946 and 1948, and as a member of those committees I fully appreciate the work that has been done and realize the work that can be done by this committee at this time in the interests of veterans of this country.

Before proceeding to the few questions I want to raise I do want at this time, Mr. Speaker, to pay a tribute to the memory of the Right Hon. Ian Mackenzie who throughout the years took a great interest in and worked for the interests of veterans across Canada. The culminating effort of his work was I think demonstrated in the final drafting of the veterans charter, which has meant so much to veterans across this country.

I quite agree with the comments of the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) who said that our veterans legislation on the whole compares favourably with any veterans legislation in the world. While the veterans charter, at the time it was drafted and completed, was generally satisfactory so far as veterans, veterans organizations and the members of this house were concerned, changing circumstances and changing conditions have made it necessary to review considerable portions of that legislation at this time.

I am quite in agreement with hon. members who have previously spoken, in their comments that the terms of this resolution are not wide enough. I wish it covered the legislation that was mentioned by previous speakers. I think, Mr. Speaker, that evidence of that is found in the excellent brief presented to the cabinet of this country on November 10 last by the representatives of the Canadian Legion. I think all hon. members will agree with me when I say that the Legion has always given thorough consideration to these questions, and its representations have always been of a practical, of a sound, and of a common-sense nature. I think a reading of this brief indicates that the Legion has continued that policy.

The brief presented urged generally a 33⅓ per cent increase in disability pensions, an increase in widows pensions, an extra provision for dependent children, and it also asked the government to give some consideration to the question of educational training for the dependent children of veterans. They also asked for an increase in the war veterans allowance to $50 per month for a single man and $100 a month for married men.

I am not going to deal with the details of these proposals or the arguments presented; we shall have ample opportunity to do that in the special committee; but I do think that the terms of the resolution should have been wider. Without question the position of the veterans of this country who are drawing the war veterans allowance at the present time demands that consideration be given to the Legion's proposals in this respect.

I believe the committee should have been instructed to review the Veterans Land Act, because the conditions that exist today are very different from the conditions that existed five years ago or even three years ago. Personally, from my experience and my close association with the Legion and the veterans of my constituency, I find a very general need for an increase in the basic loan for veterans intending to purchase farms or to build homes under the small holdings sections of the Veterans Land Act. I have come to that conclusion after giving quite close attention to the question. In my constituency that need is very urgent.

I have had resolutions from various branches of the Legion, and resolutions from the zone council, pointing out that $6,000 is not a sufficient amount for a person to build a house at the present time or to purchase property of any size, even under our conditions. In that connection I should like to read the resolution with respect to the particular demand in my constituency for the development of small holdings.

We have a large number of veterans working in the industrial plants of Kootenay West who so far, owing to the terms of the act and to the regulations associated with the act, have been denied the opportunity to build under small holdings. For the information of the minister I might say that the constituency I represent has had the highest per capita income in Canada. The only other constituency, according to the records I have perused, having a higher per capita income than Kootenay West is Westmount near Montreal for the year 1948.

Mr. Gibson: Unearned income.

Mr. Herridge: Earned income. Therefore there is no finer security existing in Canada for loans made to veterans employed by the big corporations in my constituency who desire to build houses and make their permanent residence there. Owing to the present regulations many of these veterans have been denied that opportunity. Veterans generally, and the Legion in my constituency, are very dissatisfied with the, shall I say, production today under the terms of the Veterans Land Act, particularly with regard to the development of possibilities for small holdings.

In that connection I want to read a resolution that I received just a few days ago from the zone council of the Canadian Legion in my constituency, endorsed by every branch present:

> Whereas we appreciate the value of the present settlement under the small holding section of the Veterans Land Act;
> And whereas, owing to the rapid industrial development in west Kootenay, and subsequent demand for small holdings;
> And whereas, the Kootenay climate, soil, rainfall, and topography, are different to the coast, Okanagan, and northern British Columbia;
> And whereas, the present system of administration from Kelowna causes very serious delay in servicing applications;
> And whereas, many potential sites are undeveloped, needing only a water system installed;
> And whereas, a smaller acreage than the present three acres would be more practical in some areas.
> Therefore be it resolved:
> (1) That the regional office be re-established at Nelson, B.C., for east and west Kootenay.
> (2) That a survey be made of potential developments, sub-divisions, and water system development where these would make additional land available.
> (3) That the acreage required for a small holding be reduced to suit the area.

That resolution was drafted after serious consideration of the whole situation by a special committee appointed to deal with it—not just a few men gathered together to air their grievances, without consideration of all the facts. These were men who were studying the question of local conditions and the needs of veterans concerned.

I point to that as one illustration of the need for a review of the Veterans Land Act, with a view to increasing the basic grant and changing the regulations in so far as the acreage of small holdings is concerned.

I wish the committee had been empowered and instructed to deal with the Legion's request for educational opportunities for dependent children. However, I shall not say any more about that at the present time. I do want to deal with one more question that has been brought to my attention in recent months, when I have come across many cases of older veterans who are not satisfactorily served by the legislation or who wish to continue working because they have obligations and responsibilities that cannot be met by accepting the war veterans allowance, or things of that kind.

The question of the employment of older veterans is a very serious one, and one which in my opinion should have been referred to the committee. Manpower requirements in Canada at the present time demand that we use the services of every person who is willing and able to work. I understand that the Department of Labour has a branch in which there are officials endeavouring to find employment, particularly for older people, including veterans. It would include, for instance, the age group between fifty and sixty-five.

The government of this country is spending money in that connection. It has in its employ people who are paying particular attention to that problem. When it comes to the civil service, we find that, in connection with the reductions proposed, the policy of the government is to pay particular attention to the older civil servants, to have regard for their needs and, if they have to be displaced, to find employment for them. The Department of Veterans Affairs has a special branch which has been trying to persuade employers to employ a greater number of veterans between the ages of fifty and sixty-five. These are older veterans who are willing and anxious to work.

What do we find? I shall take time to give only two illustrations. Right in this building there is an older veteran who has been employed for twenty-two years as a messenger. He had four years' service in the 72nd battalion, and served in the first world war in Canada, England, France and Belgium. His present age is seventy. This man is vigorous, active and anxious to work. He is retired on a superannuation allowance of $48 a month, and draws a disability of $17 a month, making a total income of $65 a month.

Out of that $65 he has to maintain his wife, who is ill, which costs him $35 a month. That leaves the veteran in question with a balance of $30 on which he must live. Here is a veteran, fit and anxious to work, but who cannot live on $30 a month. He cannot receive the war veterans allowance in view of the income he receives. That man has been turned out of this building, although he is quite capable of carrying on as a messenger and doing the work he would be required to do. He is tramping the streets of Ottawa looking for a job, at a time when in Canada we need manpower.

I bring that to the attention of the minister and the house. Then I would turn to a case in my own constituency. As the result of instructions given recently to all departments, the Department of Veterans Affairs, in common with other government departments, had to lower its staff. Throughout the country, wherever it was considered possible, there have been reductions in staff.

In the Kootenays we have had three field men representing the Veterans Land Act administration. They have been covering an area in which there are about 80,000 people. In the office at Nelson there were three excellent and capable veterans who had been servicing the whole area. The question of economy has arisen and, in its wisdom, the Veterans Land Act administration has decided that one of the three must go. With that in mind they have chosen the oldest veteran, a veteran of two world wars, and the senior man from point of service in the interior of British Columbia. He is a man with long residence in that interior section and one who has had excellent relations with the veterans he has served through the years. This man is well liked by the veterans; he has been a most efficient official, and has done a good job for the Veterans Land Act administration. The department has paid tribute to his ability.

Here we have the Department of Veterans Affairs urging employers to retain the services of older men, while at the same time the Veterans Land Act administration in this instance disposes of its oldest and most experienced man. They put him out at an age when it is most difficult for him to get back into civilian life or to find another job.

This situation is so unjust and is so in opposition to the governments major policy, and the policy of the veterans affairs administration, that every branch of the Legion in my constituency has protested to the director of the Veterans Land Act administration. They have also sent letters and telegrams to me. The veterans in my constituency are deeply concerned about this situation, because it seems so much in contradiction to the announced policy of the government.

In my view if the Veterans Land Act is reviewed, if some of its terms are changed and if the regulations were changed so as to lower the acreage for small holdings, the three men could not do all the work required in the Kootenays to provide small holdings and farms for the veterans requiring them. In the district surrounding Nelson and Trail, in that new mine being developed by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company at Riondel, all that is needed is a push in order to have a big development at all points. First of all there would have to be a change in the regulations, and then a little more push, and I am sure the three men we have there could do the job.

This older veteran has been dismissed. First of all he was asked to tender his resignation, but after his long service with the department he refused to do so. Finally he received a curt notice of dismissal from the office at Vancouver.

The result is that we are left with two men to cover the whole of the area of the Kootenays, with a total population of 80,000, and with the greatest demand for small holdings of any place in Canada, having in mind the population and the circumstances. The department has said that they will do what they can to see if they can get him a job somewhere else. He is in that age group where it is most difficult to get a job.

The Nelson office has been closed except that it is to be open on Saturdays. This means that in the whole area there will be a Veterans Land Act administration office open only for a few hours a week during which time veterans will be able to make applications and so on. This creates a most inconvenient situation because many veterans have to come 50, 60 or even 150 miles in order to see the person in charge of the office. These shorter hours will simply mean greater expense for the veterans who will have to fit their own time to the hours when the office is open.

I greatly appreciate the co-operation given by officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs. As I have said before, the minister, the parliamentary assistant and the officials have been most co-operative with members of the house and have done an excellent job. I am particularly concerned about the employment of older veterans, and particularly about the dismissal of this older veteran from the Nelson office of the Veterans Land Act administration. There is a great demand for small holdings in my district which is not being met today. I hope the minister, the parliamentary assistant and the officials concerned will really review that situation to see if something cannot be done to correct it. I know in saying this I have the unanimous support of every Legion branch in my constituency.

In conclusion, may I say that I look forward again to serving on this committee with comrades representing all the other parties. I trust that when the findings of the committee are presented to this house there will follow amendments to the legislation that will prove that the members of the veterans affairs committee have once again had an opportunity to serve the veterans of Canada.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, earlier in the debate I made a statement to the effect that the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) had stated in the house when he was Minister of Veterans Affairs that he would like to see the war veterans allowance in each province brought up to the amount of the old age pension paid in that province. The minister denied that he had made any such statement and I was eventually compelled to withdraw. I have here Hansard of Tuesday, June 6, 1950. At that time I had raised this very question, I believe on the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs, and the minister is reported on page 3294 as having said:

> When social security for the aged is worked out on behalf of all our people, then, whether it is five years or ten years, whatever it might be, I hope that the amount of the war veterans allowance going to the veteran in each of the provinces, in that period between 60 and 70 we shall say, will be the same as it would be for all the people after the age of 70. In other words, in my own province—

That is New Brunswick.

> —at the present time the war veterans allowance between 60 and 70 is almost exactly the same as the old age pension for the rest of the people from 70 until death. In my hon. friend's province,—

That would be British Columbia.

> —for 75 per cent of the recipients, the war veterans allowance has been augmented to bring it up to $50 per month as a sort of cost of living bonus.

Then follow the words to which I have particular reference:

> I should like to see the time when the veterans of the various provinces will receive the same as the residents of those provinces are receiving under the old age pension. Now, it is going to take a lot of planning to work that out, but in reality that is the real reason why I would rather see hardship overcome during these two years by this patchwork method, if you will, rather than by making an over-all increase from the eastern border of Saskatchewan to Newfoundland inclusive, which would bring the war veterans allowance, from 60 until death, ten dollars higher than the old age pension from 70 until death for the rest of the population.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I am grateful to my hon. friend for reading the extract, for there is nothing in it to indicate that I, as a former Minister of Veterans Affairs, stated that I hoped that the war veterans allowance might be payable, for instance, in New Brunswick, at the rate of $30 per month and in British Columbia at $50 per month. There is nothing in the statement to indicate that I wished that there should be any variation in the rate of war veterans allowances in one province as compared with another. It will be seen that the expression there was based upon a hope that if, say, $40 per month was paid from the federal treasury to all people throughout Canada over 70 years of age, then that an equal amount might be payable to veterans under the war veterans allowance in all provinces of Canada in exactly the same way.

Mr. Green: The statement speaks for itself.

Mr. Gregg: The statement speaks for itself.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention in closing the debate on this resolution to touch on all the points that have been raised by hon. members. I think it will be agreed that most of those matters will be dealt with more adequately, either in committee or when other legislation or the estimates are before the house.

Reference has been made to the necessity of having a standing committee on veterans affairs. If one goes over the history of veterans legislation enacted during the last 25 or 30 years it will be found that a veterans affairs committee has been constituted each time major changes have been made in the legislation, or when new legislation was introduced.

Reference has also been made during this debate to the terms of reference of the committee. I cannot subscribe to the statement that has been made that in the past the terms of reference setting up similar committees have always been much wider. In fact that is the case for the committees set up in 1945 and 1946. But in 1948 the terms of reference for the committee set up then were more restricted than in 1945 and 1946. My hon. friend who quoted the terms of reference in 1948 will notice that in that year there was no mention of the War Veterans Allowance Act. It will be found that in the past committees have been set up to consider only one specific act or amendment.

I think the house will agree that the years 1945 and 1946 were different. At that time we were bringing before the committee all the legislation which had been created during the war and immediately following the war in the form of orders in council. If I am not mistaken, I believe there were practically eighty-nine orders in council which were placed on the table of the committee to be considered, along with legislation which had been implemented since 1921.

That is not the case now. We are making the terms of reference wide enough to cover all legislation which is considered necessary at this time as well as any other legislation which the government may find it necessary to introduce before the end of this session.

I should like to touch upon one other point, the interpretation given by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) to the terms of reference. The hon. member said that he understood that the committee would be permitted to consider only legislation that affected the veterans of the special force. That is not the case, as one can readily see by reading the terms of reference. The hon. member, along with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), referred to the new unemployability supplement as being an introduction of a means test into the Pension Act. I tried to make it clear, although it is quite possible I did not, but if the hon. member will read Hansard he will find that it has nothing to do whatsoever with the Pension Act. It is not done under the authority of the Pension Act but under the authority of the Department of Veterans Affairs Act. There has never been and there is no intention now of introducing any means test in the Pension Act.

Motion agreed to.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

MODIFICATION OF APPLICATION AS TO LAST QUARTER OF 1950 AND EXTENSION IN MODIFIED FORM TO 1951

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to modify its application with reference to the last quarter of the year 1950 and to extend the application of the act in a modified form to the year 1951.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING

FRASERVIEW PROJECT, VANCOUVER—REPORT AS TO DISCONTINUANCE OF FEDERAL CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. In his absence possibly one of the other members of the cabinet might bring it to his attention. Press dispatches today indicate that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has decided to drop the Fraserview project in Vancouver, to stop any further construction, and also to dispose of some 200 lots which have been serviced with water, sewers and roadways but upon which no buildings have been erected. Could we have a statement tomorrow as to whether or not that is correct, and perhaps outlining the present position of the project?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly call the minister's attention to the question put by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I do not think the minister can make a statement tomorrow as I believe he will be out of town. Probably he could make it on Friday.

Mr. Green: As a matter of fact I spoke to him this morning and he promised to make a statement about it as soon as he could secure the information.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not know if my promise is good but I will transmit the question to the minister.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

ATHERLEY, ONT., POSTMASTERSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, six weeks ago I made a request for the production of certain papers from the Post Office Department. An order for return was passed the next day but no production has been made yet.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I will do my best to hasten the production of these papers.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO REVOCATION OF CITIZENSHIP, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the third reading of Bill No. 172, to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

YUKON ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE THE NUMBER OF MEMBERS OF THE TERRITORIAL COUNCIL

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (for the Minister of Resources and Development) moved the third reading of Bill No. 188, to amend the Yukon Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR ELECTED REPRESENTATION IN TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT AND APPOINTMENT OF JUDICIAL OFFICERS

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (for the Minister of Resources and Development) moved the third reading of Bill No. 189, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I announced that I would move to go into supply and call four different departments. I understand that some members wish to speak and I dare not make that motion at the present time. It would have no object and it would give them a chance to air their grievances for only two or three minutes. If I have the unanimous consent of the house that there will be no discussion I would move to go into supply. If there is not unanimous consent—

Mr. Hodgson: Go ahead and move it.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Six o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I move the adjournment of the house.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned until Thursday, April 5, at 5.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, April 5, 1951

The house met at five thirty o'clock.

THE PRESIDENT OF FRANCE

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS TO BE PRINTED IN HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I desire to move, seconded, I hope, by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew):

That the address of the President of the French republic, Mr. Vincent Auriol, delivered before the members of the Senate and of the House of Commons of Canada in the chamber of the House of Commons on April 5, 1951, together with the introductory and related speeches, be included in the House of Commons Debates and form part of the records of this parliament.

Motion agreed to.

(For text of address of the President of the French republic, with speeches of welcome and thanks, see appendix, pages 1663-8.)

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to lay before the house the first report of the joint committee of both houses on the library of parliament.

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved:

That the first report of the joint committee of both houses on the library of parliament, presented this day, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE IN ASKING LEAVE TO MOVE ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I desire to move the adjournment of the house —

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member is making a motion to adjourn the house under standing order 31, this is not the proper time to do so. Standing order 31 reads as follows:

Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (standing order 15) has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

The question of the proper time at which to make this motion was discussed briefly in the house on November 7, 1949. At that time I pointed out that in my opinion the proper time to make this motion was immediately before notices of motions or orders of the day. I have considered the matter since that time and am of the opinion that if it had been the intention of parliament when this rule was introduced that the motion should be made immediately after routine proceedings, the rule would have stopped there; that is to say, it would have read:

Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business.

But the rule parliament approved went further and added:

—and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

It is clear that the motion is made after the daily routine of business. In my opinion it is equally clear that it should be made immediately before notices of motions or orders of the day. I believe that the reason why the rule was drawn in this way was to make sure that all the business of the house which was not of a controversial nature would be duly attended to. Hon. members know that in the daily routine of business there is little that is debatable. Under questions, there is nothing that is debatable. Again, under notices of motions for the production of papers, there is nothing that is debatable. That is the kind of business that must be disposed of. I therefore rule that the motion to adjourn the house under standing order 31 must be made after the ordinary daily routine of business has been concluded and immediately before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I trust that the attempt to introduce the motion which you have declared to be irregular at that time will not in any way change the priority, in view of the fact that I have already indicated to you my intention of presenting a motion for the adjournment of the house at the proper time.

Mr. Speaker: I concur in what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said. The leader of the opposition has already sent me written notice that he proposes to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 31. I should probably add that an intimation was made to me by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the leader of his party, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), would also introduce a motion to this effect. Under the circumstances, I think I should decide now that when the time comes for making this motion, I will see the leader of the opposition.

(The ordinary daily routine of business having been concluded:)

COST OF LIVING

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the announcement yesterday of the greatest monthly increase in Canadian cost of living during the month of February to the disastrously high level of 179·7 points; and the urgent need for vigorous action by the government and the immediate adoption of such measures as will halt inflation, hold down the cost of living and restore confidence in the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty to decide whether this motion is in order and also whether it is of urgent public importance. The meaning of urgency as set forth in Beauchesne's third edition, citation 174, is as follows:

> "Urgency" within this rule does not apply to the matter itself, but it means "urgency of debate," when the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the house do not permit the subject to be brought on early enough . . .

Today being Thursday there can be no debate upon going into supply. Under standing order 28, when such an order is called on a Thursday or Friday, the Speaker leaves the chair without question put. If I thought there would be in the immediate future an opportunity to debate this matter, I would not consider it to be urgent within the meaning of the rules. However, I do not at the present time see that there will be an opportunity for discussing this matter in the immediate future.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the budget is being brought down next Tuesday and that a debate of this kind is of course appropriate under the budget. As to urgency, the figures referred to were with regard to the increase in the cost of living during the month of February, which is some five weeks ago. The fact that they were published only a day or two ago does not, I think, suggest that we should urgently deal with a matter that happened five weeks ago.

I would also point out that the matter of the increase in the cost of living has been discussed on two occasions during this session. Therefore it seems to me that the motion is out of order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, as I have introduced the motion and as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has expressed his view, I would ask your permission to offer my reasons for believing that this matter should be debated at this time. Under the practice of this house, there will not be an opportunity either today, tomorrow or on Monday to introduce a motion which would make it possible—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, if we move to go into supply, that will certainly be an opportune time to discuss any matter or any grievance against the government.

Mr. Graydon: Did you say "if"?

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) has indicated uncertainty with regard to Monday or Tuesday by the use of the word "if" which he has introduced into his remarks; because it is possible for the house to proceed to deal with the estimates of the departments already introduced without introducing a new motion to go into supply. Therfore there is no assurance that the house will be able to deal with this subject.

As to the question of urgency raised by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the fact that the figures published yesterday related to accumulated figures of five weeks ago, what he says is perfectly true. But this is the first occasion on which the house has had an opportunity to express its opinion with regard to such an important indication of the trend which affects every Canadian. I suggest that there is no single subject having regard to the domestic affairs of Canada today which so urgently calls for consideration by this house, and there is no subject upon which the members of this house should have an opportunity at an earlier date to express their opinion than upon this runaway inflation that is now evidenced by these figures that we have seen.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the motion before you seeks the opportunity for the members of this house to indicate at the earliest possible moment their own belief as to whether or not the situation disclosed by these figures, and the trend which they make apparent, should be dealt with in some way by the government at this time. In any event, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you with respect that if there is any question on this point you permit the members of this house to decide by their recorded vote.

Mr. Abbott: May I say just a word on the question of urgency, Mr. Speaker? As the house knows, on Tuesday evening I intend to move that the house go into committee of ways and means. In the course of my remarks preceding that motion I shall have a good deal to say on this world-wide phenomenon of inflation—it is not confined to Canada—and every hon. member will have an opportunity of voicing his views before the motion is put to the house.

I suggest that the question of urgency, which of course is for Your Honour to decide, is not such as to necessitate two debates on the same subject, on which we have already had two in this house, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has indicated.

Mr. Sinnott: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has the floor.

Mr. Coldwell: I should like to support the view expressed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). We intended to introduce a motion in terms almost identical with that suggested by the leader of the opposition. I should like to point this out. While it is perfectly true that the budget will be brought down on Tuesday evening, yet the debate on the budget is not a narrow one. We debate all matters regarding the Canadian economy and the Canadian financial system, taxation and all the rest of it. I submit that this is a matter of some urgency, Mr. Speaker.

It is true that the figures produced yesterday relate to a situation that developed some weeks ago, but since then we have had more of this runaway inflation and the house should be given an opportunity to discuss the matter now in order that the government may know now, before the vote on the budget is taken or the discussion on the budget has taken place, what the opinion of this house is in that connection.

And I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a matter of some urgency affecting the welfare of great masses of the Canadian people. Indeed, I heard over the radio yesterday that in one of our Canadian cities people living on fixed incomes, old age pensions and the like, are suffering from malnutrition. This house has no right to delay the discussion on this subject when people of this country are suffering from malnutrition because of the runaway inflation.

Mr. Sinnott: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Sinnott: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: I should probably point out to the hon. member for Springfield that it is irregular to raise a point of order on a point of order. However, it may be that the hon. member for Springfield is raising the question as to whether or not this matter is urgent. I will hear the hon. member for Springfield.

Mr. Sinnott: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, there are others in this house who are interested in what is going on in this country besides the leader of the opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. party. I quite agree with you when you rule that the—

Mr. Casselman: What is the point of order?

Mr. Sinnott: —leader of the opposition was out of order in discussing the fact that the cost of living had risen to 179 and some odd points.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have made no such ruling as the hon. member has suggested. I will hear the Minister of Public Works, unless the hon. member for Springfield wishes to state his point of order briefly.

Mr. Sinnott: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is this. According to Beauchesne's parliamentary rules and forms, third edition, 1943:

> The motion must not revive discussion on a matter which has been discussed in the same session.

My point of order is this. I do not wish to discuss anything which has already been discussed in the session. I merely wish to discuss the rising—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that your ruling will have to conform to citation 174 of Beauchesne, third edition, which reads:

> "Urgency" within this rule does not apply to the matter itself, but it means "urgency of debate," when the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the house do not permit the subject to be brought on early enough and public interest demands that discussion take place immediately.

Our difficulty in discussing this citation is that the decision and the ruling will be in your discretion, even though the leader of the opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. party will tell us that if we do not discuss this question immediately a catastrophe will occur in the country. It is so important that we should hear their voices right now, but if we do not hear their voices a calamity will take place in our country. That may be true. They believe that. They think that if they do not speak in this house today it will be too late for the salvation of the country. Well, if you agree with these two hon. gentlemen, any hon. member who is convinced that what is going on in the country is not right could use that same argument. And it has been used twice in this session with as much force and in as violent language by certain members of the opposition whom I have heard in the house. They have said, if we do not discuss the high cost of living, if we do not impose controls immediately our country will be out of luck. Now, Mr. Speaker will, in his mind—and I am trying to be fair—have to decide if it is so important that members of the opposition, or even members on the government side, have to tell us that the cost of living has gone up 4 points plus something. Everybody in the country knows that.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said: We have to tell the house and the country what is taking place. Well, they just learned it from the papers yesterday.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may we have a few minutes? I cannot come back at eight o'clock and argue the matter.

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the motion was not presented with the explanation that it was for the purpose of telling the government that their own figures were accurate. This is not so hilarious a subject as some hon. members seem to think. The purpose of the motion is to permit hon. members to say in this house that they think action should be taken now to deal with the situation disclosed by the figures.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I hope the hon. gentleman has something to add to what the leader of the opposition has said.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Is it a question of privilege?

Mr. Coldwell: —it is true I read in the newspapers what the hon. gentleman says. But if the government knew this before, then they have been derelict in their duty.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You see, it may have been urgent that the hon. member say that to the government right now. But we learned this, as the public learned it, when figures were brought out by the statistics branch. Now, my fear is that even after listening to what you gentlemen will say, it will not change the minds of the people.

An hon. Member: The government.

Mr. Coldwell: We want to change the mind of the government.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am speaking of the people we represent in this house. It would not change the minds of the people, because they have read the same thing you have read in the papers.

Mr. Drew: That does not follow.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You want to amplify in debate what you already saw in the press. I do not believe you have the right to do it; I think you are wrong in trying to do it. The question, Mr. Speaker, is if it is in your opinion for the good of the people of Canada that this evening we should—

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You are the only one who believes it. Is it your opinion that we should listen to these gentlemen during the evening, and that it will change the situation so that it will force the government tomorrow, which is Friday—we cannot do it on Saturday—

Mr. Drew: Does not the government act on Friday?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):—to introduce legislation which would not be carried tomorrow? Is it your opinion that this will help the situation in Canada? I do not know that it will.

Mr. Knowles: There is legislation now.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Even if we have, it is not by the speeches that you make that the government would take a decision it did not wish to take.

And, Mr. Speaker, after listening to the eloquent speeches these gentlemen will make, there will be no immediate change in the country. I suggest that on Monday, as a first order, I move that we go into supply. That is only Monday. At that time we could discuss the whole situation. We will have the whole thing before us to make a decision. However, if you try it before, I am not sure you will impress the members of the government, who have to attend certain functions, with which the opposition told us they were ready to help us.

We have taken these engagements. Probably I will have to sit here at eight o'clock and argue the whole thing out, because my colleagues want to attend the function. And immediately after you have made those speeches, the result will be the same. There will be no change, even in the minds of the people because I do not think you are convincing enough to make the people change their minds. And when you are through at eleven o'clock the subject will have been—

An hon. Member: Horsed around.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, the subject will have been spent, and the result will be more speeches on Hansard concerning the cost of living, speeches that could be made on Monday just as well.

I would ask the leader of the opposition in his kindly way to withdraw this motion.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): He would have the support of his colleagues if he were to do so, I suppose. I would ask that he withdraw this motion, and on Monday I will move to go into supply, when that subject may be considered.

If that is satisfactory, then Mr. Speaker would not have to make a ruling, which would be quite embarrassing because it might mean he does not believe that speeches by certain members are so urgent.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, in view of the request made I would point out that having regard to the subject I have raised I do not propose to withdraw the motion. I would suggest that in view of the fact that the Minister of Public Works has indicated that there are other matters of importance, the house might well agree in the belief that the minister perhaps is not exactly correct, and that you should make your ruling in regard to the motion.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter you will have to take the responsibility of deciding. I have listened to many discussions on points of order in this house in regard to this standing order, but I certainly have never heard anything suggested such as the Minister of Public Works has suggested today. Surely it has not reached the point where an opposition or a private member cannot make a motion of this kind, and cannot ask the government to act. Surely that is no reason for refusing the motion. That does not say that an emergency does not exist.

The motion we are discussing now is not on the general question of the cost of living, but rather a proposal to discuss the enormous increase in the cost of living announced yesterday, and the effect that will have on the people of Canada. And, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you that a question that is of great urgency, such as this one, cannot be left over until some convenient time when we could discuss it. Because if it could be left over it is no longer a question of urgency.

May I draw the attention of the house to standing order 31 (3), which says that the member moving the motion—

—then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to Mr. Speaker who, if he thinks it in order, and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house. If objection is taken, Mr. Speaker requests those members who support the motion to rise in their places and, if more than twenty members rise accordingly, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who has asked for leave.

Now, sir, the point is clear, that if in your opinion the question before us is not one of urgent public importance you will say so, and that ends it; but if you believe it is a question of urgent public importance you will ascertain the wish of the members of the house, and they will decide whether or not the question will be discussed.

Mr. Speaker: Order; I will hear the hon. member for Glengarry.

Mr. Major: As a producer of eggs, I am bewildered by this motion, because during the last war there was a ceiling of fifty cents a dozen on eggs, and I was receiving fifty cents a dozen during that time. I was home during Easter week, and we were receiving only forty-eight cents a dozen. If that is an increase in the cost of living, I cannot see it.

Mr. Speaker: I am placed in a rather difficult position, but I must make a ruling, in accordance with the established procedure in the house.

It was mentioned by one hon. member that there had been a previous debate on this subject, and that is correct. When a motion similar to this one was made shortly after that debate I raised the question as to whether it was in order. However, some considerable time has intervened, and I would not at this time rule the motion out of order merely because there had been a previous debate some time ago on a subject relating to the increase in the cost of living.

By not ruling the motion out of order on that ground I would not want it to be taken as a precedent so that every time there is a rise in the cost of living a motion like this would be considered in order. This matter is of some importance because the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has moved a motion, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has attempted to move a motion and the hon. member for Springfield has also attempted to move a motion. Accordingly it is a very important matter, and I think we all agree that that is so.

It was suggested that the budget will be brought down on Tuesday night after which time there will be an opportunity to discuss this question. I must however point out to the house that it is customary after the budget is brought down to adjourn the debate thereon for several days, sometimes for a week, in order that hon. members may familiarize themselves with the contents of the budget. So there is no assurance that hon. members will be given an opportunity to speak on this subject in the immediate future.

I may say that until the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) spoke I was firmly of the opinion that this motion came within the rules of urgency as set forth in Beauchesne's third edition, citation 174. The question is not how urgent the matter is so far as you and I and all the people of Canada are concerned, but how urgent it is having regard to the opportunity which will be given to hon. members of this house to debate the subject. If the Minister of Public Works had not risen and said that at the opening of the house on Monday he would move to go into committee of supply I would have ruled that this matter was one which was urgent within the rules of the house.

However, the Minister of Public Works, speaking on behalf of the government, has stated that on Monday he will move a motion to go into committee of supply as the first order of business. I might point out to hon. members that if I declared that this motion was one of urgency within the rules of the house the debate could go on just for the three hours this evening and that would be the end. After that time hon. members would not have an opportunity to discuss the matter because standing order 31 provides that such a motion must not revive discussion on a matter which has been discussed in the same session. That is to say, either tomorrow or on Monday an hon. member could not move the adjournment of the house for this purpose.

When the Minister of Public Works moves that the house go into committee of supply on Monday there will be at least six hours during which hon. members can discuss this matter. Added to that an hon. member will be able to move a motion with respect to the matter. At the present time an hon. member could not move such a motion. Since the Minister of Public Works, speaking for the government, has stated that he will move that the house go into supply on Monday I rule that this question is not one of urgency today. Hon. members will have an opportunity to discuss this matter on Monday in accordance with the assurance given by the Minister of Public Works.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, with the reason that has been given for not permitting a debate now, and without accepting that as having the finality that there would be if a vote were called, I simply would explain that I do not propose to ask for a vote on the ruling in view of what has been said about the debate on Monday. But I do give notice to you that I shall introduce an amendment at the time the motion is made to go into committee of supply.

Mr. Sinnott: Introduce your same motion.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION BY GOVERNMENT AS A RESULT OF STATEMENT BY GENERAL MACARTHUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): In the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on official business I should like to give notice of a question which he can answer on his return to the house. Is it the intention of the government to take any official action over the latest rebuke by General MacArthur to the elected representatives of the people?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question will be brought to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

REPORTED PURCHASE OF BUILDING IN LONDON, ONT., FOR USE OF INCOME TAX DIVISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue, but neither of them is here. Possibly the Minister of Public Works might have answered it but he is not here. My question arises out of an article in Tuesday's London Free Press regarding the sale of a building in London, Ontario, owned by Westmount Realties of Montreal, to the dominion government for the use of the income tax division. As a result of this transaction the city of London will lose $8,000 a year in taxes, and I should like to know whether any provision will be made for that loss of revenue. Second, the option was for a period of ten years and the period has not elapsed. The option price was $550,000 and $600,000 has been paid. In other words, the taxpayers are out $50,000.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member to state his question as briefly as possible.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Why not continue the lease for the ten-year period?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the hon. gentleman put his question on the order paper.

POTATOES

INQUIRY AS TO PRICE SUPPORT PAYMENT TO GROWERS OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I have waited a couple of days for the Minister of Agriculture to be here, and I am now going to put my question so that he will have notice of it. When will the guaranteed price support be paid to the potato growers of Prince Edward Island, and what price per bushel will the producers receive? Will the government of Prince Edward Island pay the total amount and then be reimbursed by the federal government?

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

471. Departmental administration, $1,199,818.

Mr. Green: Is the minister making a statement on this?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): On what?

Mr. Green: Is the minister making a statement?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not propose to make a statement. I propose to proceed in the usual manner, and if hon. members have certain matters they wish to raise I shall try to deal with them as well as I can.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, it is quite evident that we are going to have a quiet homey evening with only the best of us here. I should get unanimous support for that remark.

Mr. MacInnis: Including the best minister.

Mr. Green: However, I know that the other ministers and members are busy with very important duties helping to entertain the President of France. This is the first occasion on which the estimates of the Department of Transport for the present fiscal year have been under consideration. Before proceeding to deal with the department, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River on his appointment as parliamentary assistant to the minister. He has been a very conscientious member, and I am quite sure will fill this post with great benefit to the country and great honour to himself. I wish him good luck.

This year the most important business to be considered by the house under the estimates of the Department of Transport is the report of the royal commission on transportation. The whole problem of transportation has always been one of the main questions facing Canadian legislatures and the Canadian people. That is perfectly understandable of course because of the vast distances in this country and the scattered settlements from one coast to the other. There probably would have been no Canada as we know it today if special provision had not been made to link the maritimes with what was known as Upper Canada by the Intercolonial Railway, and also to link British Columbia with central Canada by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Today, just as in the days following confederation, transportation is of vital importance to the Canadian people. We are fortunate at this session in having had a report from the royal commission on transportation. The commissioners have gone into most of the aspects of our transportation problem, and I think have made a very important report. Whether or not one agrees with all the recommendations, the fact remains that the men who made this investigation are very distinguished Canadians, the Hon. W. F. A. Turgeon, who was chairman, Dr. H. F. Angus of British Columbia and Dr. H. A. Innis of Toronto. They brought to their work a great zeal to serve their country and displayed ability in conducting this investigation; I think this is one of the most important reports ever to have been placed before the Canadian parliament.

We have not had the report very long. It was tabled a few days before the house recessed for Easter, and probably very few members have had the opportunity to study it carefully. It is a lengthy report, and I must admit that I personally have not reviewed it as carefully as I propose to do. I hope the house will be given an opportunity to study it thoroughly, and for this purpose it might be possible to make use of one of the committees of the house. We have a very competent committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines; I cannot say anything else, because I am a member of that committee. I see no reason why that committee could not make a study of this report. From what the Prime Minister said when he tabled it, I take it some legislation will be placed before the house, and in any event I urge the minister to refer that legislation to this committee. In that way it will be possible to have such legislation given more careful consideration than if it goes through the house here in the ordinary way; it would also enable members of the committee to get a better understanding of at least some of Canada's transportation problems.

That is important, because from this report we have an opportunity to work out a national policy on transportation. Of course there would be differences of opinion on different aspects of such a policy, but it might be surprising how close to unanimity we could come on such a policy. You see, Mr. Chairman, transportation does not involve only the railways. It includes shipping, under which we have ocean-going shipping, coastal shipping, the traffic on the great lakes and the shipping through the canals, which is increasing in importance all the time and will continue to do so, particularly if the St. Lawrence seaway should be constructed. We have the airways, steadily becoming more important in Canada. They have been important from the start of flying and Canada has made great progress in aviation. Young Canadians seem to take to the air naturally; they make wonderful fliers. Aviation in our north country has always been far ahead of similar flying in any other country, and aviation generally is of great importance to our people.

Then some of the members have heard of pipe lines, which have become another aspect of the transportation problem facing this country. They would be included in a study such as I have mentioned.

Then there are the highways. There is quite an insistent demand that the federal government should step into the highway picture. I am not taking sides on that question tonight, and merely say that the commission expressed doubt as to just how far the dominion government could go in the matter of regulating highway traffic. In any event, the highways do enter into the transportation picture.

So here we have a series of recommendations which might very well be worked into a good transportation policy for Canada. It would be a great tragedy if we allowed this report to be treated as parliament treated the Rowell-Sirois report. That was a splendid report prepared after a great deal of work by exceptionally capable men. I believe Dr. Angus was also a member of that commission. Parliament did not have an opportunity to debate that report. I always thought it was a great tragedy that we did not thoroughly discuss and study the Rowell-Sirois report. I am sure that if we had done so there would have been beneficial results to Canada. Let us not have the same thing happen to this Turgeon report on transportation.

This evening I have no intention of going into the various recommendations at any length, but I would ask the minister to deal with at least some of the matters covered in the report. For instance, there is a very interesting proposal at page 253 in a chapter entitled "The rail link between east and west." It describes northern Ontario, the territory from Fort William to Sudbury, as a land bridge between eastern and western Canada, where practically no freight or passenger traffic originates. The commission finds this to be a sort of no man's land, and recommends that the government of Canada pay a subsidy to the railways to cover the cost of operating in that area. At page 253 of the report there is a very good summary of the attitude of the commission on this point:

> The overhead cost of linking east and west together has been a matter of national concern from the earliest days. It is the existence of this necessary link between Canada's two vast areas that must be recognized. It is called for, not only by the requirements of the exchange of goods for commercial purposes, but also by those of our national defence structure. The problem presented is that of maintaining this link so long at least as it does not provide sufficient revenue for its own maintenance. This problem concerns the whole country and not only its western portion, and the responsibility for its solution should be assumed by the nation as, for instance, in the case of the maintenance of our canal system.

As hon. members know, the canal system, which is largely in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, is maintained by the country without cost to the users of those canals. Then the commissioners, after referring to this link as a bridge, go on to recommend—

> . . . with the whole cost of maintaining the bridge over which the traffic between the two large areas must pass, just as the toll-free canals in central Canada are maintained at public expense for the passage of traffic through them.

The report states that the estimated amount of subsidy would be about $7 million annually. Those of us who come through that part of the country several times a year realize how accurate the picture is that is painted by the commissioners. I believe they have made out a splendid case for subsidization of this particular traffic. I hope that the government will accept that recommendation and will provide a subsidy during the present session. I would ask that the minister deal with this recommendation when he replies.

Another recommendation on which I should like to have his remarks is contained at page 122 of the report in a chapter entitled "Equalization". This chapter sets out that it now appears to be fairly generally accepted by the government and also by the railways that there should be a broad principle of equalization of rates throughout the country. The commissioners point out that in April of 1948 order in council P.C. 1487 was passed, which directed the board of transport commissioners to conduct a freight rate investigation—

. . . with a view to the establishment of a fair and reasonable rates structure, which will, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, be equal in its application to all persons and localities . . .

That was an order in council passed of course by the present government in April of 1948. The railways apparently have not quarrelled very violently with the suggestion that there should be a broad general principle of equalization of these rates. One suggestion that the commissioners make is that on the long hauls the rates should be based on greater distance than on the short hauls. To make myself clear, let me put it this way. For example, if it costs $100 to move freight one hundred miles on a short haul, on the long haul that charge should be $100 for two hundred miles. I think that explains one of the suggestions they had in mind, namely, that the rate should not be just on a basis of mile for mile, but where a long haul was involved, should be lower than where there was a short haul.

They say the objective should be to get a uniform rate structure. At page 127, paragraph 10, we find this statement. They have listed various items which could help to bring about this result and say:

The foregoing items point to a new departure in class rates and commodity mileage rates, and eventually, in so far as practicable, in special or specific rates for the Canadian portion of the North American continent. It appears that Canada has reached a stage in its development when former methods of making regional rates must give way to a uniform rate structure that, as far as may be possible, will treat all citizens, localities, districts and regions alike.

That of course has been the plea of seven of the provinces of Canada for many years; it has been the plea of all of the provinces except Ontario and Quebec which seem to be satisfied with the present rate structure. One can understand that, because in Ontario and Quebec there is competition by road and by water to a far greater extent than there is in any of the other seven provinces. The result is that the rates in Ontario and Quebec are not as high as they are in the other provinces, and certainly not as high as they are in western Canada. I am not mentioning the position in Newfoundland because I am not fully informed on that particular aspect of the subject. One reason I am pointing out this question of equalization to the minister is that the commission recommends that there be legislation. This improvement can only be made by an amendment to the Railway Act. In paragraph 12 on page 127 the commissioners recommend as follows:

Changes should be made in the "traffic, tolls and tariffs" sections of the Railway Act in order to empower the board to effect and maintain the uniformity in rates throughout Canada herein recommended.

If the government accepts that recommendation—and I hope it will—then let legislation be brought in at this session so that a start can be made on complying with the recommendation of the commission.

Another subject which is also of great importance and which likewise calls for an amendment to the Railway Act is that of transcontinental rates. They are dealt with at page 96 of the report, and I refer particularly to page 101 where it is stated:

The Railway Act should be amended to provide that when the competitive transcontinental tariffs are published by the railways, such tariffs shall contain a provision that the rates to or from intermediate territory shall not exceed the transcontinental rates by more than one-third.

As I understand it, the meaning of that recommendation is this. There are certain special transcontinental rates, for example, from Toronto and Montreal to Vancouver. They are only in effect because there is competition by sea and we benefit by those rates on the west coast. I presume there is also a similar benefit from transcontinental rates on the east coast. But the Canadians who live in the interior part of the country—for example, in interior British Columbia, in Alberta and, I suppose, in Saskatchewan as well—do not get any benefits from those transcontinental rates. They must pay a much higher rate. The commission has recommended that the higher rate that they pay in the interior portions of the country shall not be more than one-third higher than the transcontinental rates. I believe that that provision, if it became law, would be of great benefit to those Canadians who are not privileged to live at the seashore. I hope that the government will bring in an amendment to the Railway Act at this session to make that change possible as well.

Then there are in the report sections dealing with three subjects which I shall link together. First of all, there is the subject of Crowsnest pass rates. The reference to those rates will be found beginning at page 238. As hon. members know, those are the rates which enable wheat to be shipped to either coast at a freight rate lower than the ordinary one. The finding of the commissioners is that there should be no change in those Crowsnest rates.

Then there are the provisions under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. The report on these provisions is found at page 228, and there is a recommendation that there should be no change, that the benefits under the Maritime Freight Rates Act should not be cut down. They do recommend that there be some amendments to the act to bring it into line with the actual practice in the administration of the act.

The third subject which I wish to link with the other two is the question of amalgamation or unification of the railways. We find at pages 128 and 276 a very definite recommendation by the commission that there should be no unification of the railways and no amalgamation. I would like to know from the minister this evening the intention of the government on these three points: whether or not the recommendations of the commission on the Crowsnest rates, the Maritime Freight Rates Act and the question of amalgamation will be accepted. I may say that personally the recommendations seem to me to be very sound.

Another subject with which I suggest the minister should deal this evening is the recommendation by the commissioners that there should be only one board supervising railways, shipping, and aviation. Their findings on that question will be found at page 276 of the report under the heading "Co-ordination." They point out that at the present time the board of transport commissioners in reality has jurisdiction only over the railways and certain small portions of the shipping activities of the country. Then there is the air transport board, which has charge of aviation activities, and the Canadian maritime commission, which has most of the authority in connection with shipping in Canada.

Back in 1938, as the minister will remember, a bill was brought into the house and passed entitled "The Transport Act". It was declared to be an act to establish a board of transport commissioners for Canada with authority with respect to transport by railways, ships and aircraft. The new board was in effect simply the board of railway commissioners for Canada under a different name. In 1938 the intention was to put all these three activities under one board, but ever since then the government has followed a different policy. By degrees it has transferred the authority to other boards. For example, in 1944 the air transport board was set up, and against the objections of quite a few of the members of the house, including myself, that air transport board was given all jurisdiction over aviation; in addition it was set up not as an independent judicial body, such as the board of transport commissioners, but set up directly under a minister, and in effect subject to the orders of the minister. It was really just an administrative branch of a department. We protested bitterly at the time about that set-up. Now the commissioners have recommended that this control be taken away from the air transport board and given to the board of transport commissioners.

Then in 1947 the Canadian maritime commission was set up, and as I said a few moments ago was given jurisdiction over shipping. Now the board recommends that jurisdiction too be placed with the board of transport commissioners. Frankly, I have not been able to convince myself that that is a wise recommendation. It may be. I may change my mind on further study, but I believe that the Canadian maritime commission has a function to fulfil in keeping up the merchant fleet of this country and in making provisions for war vessels to be built; it has a function that can never be adequately fulfilled by the board of transport commissioners. However, such is the recommendation of the Turgeon commission.

> All this leads to the question whether the policy of close co-ordination and central control to which parliament seemed inclined to commit itself in the Transport Act of 1938, should not be invoked once again with the view to its extension rather than to its restriction which has been the trend of more recent enactments. If this policy of 1938 can be revised and made effective it should properly have its beginning in the establishment of a strong control organism capable of taking the task in hand.

They mean by that strengthening of the board of transport commissioners, I presume. Then the paragraph goes on:

> Today there are three separate bodies, each charged with the control (a more or less extensive control in each case) of a part of Canada's transportation system. They are the board of transport commissioners, the air transport board and the Canadian maritime commission. It must be difficult, with this dispersion of control, to apply to all of Canada's transportation agencies like principles of regulation for the accomplishment of a common purpose, namely, that of enabling each agency to perform its service advantageously and properly as part of a national transportation structure. The tendency of a separate independent body is to formulate policy affecting transportation without regard to the relationship of the various agencies to each other.
> This anomaly—

And here is the recommendation:

> —should give way to the constitution of a central authority which will be able to take in hand the major task of co-ordinated control, having at its disposal all the benefit acquired from the experience of the separate bodies in recent years.

The adoption of this policy would bring together the three above named bodies, reorganized and united and devoted henceforth to the pursuit of a well planned policy for the co-ordination and regulation of transportation.

That is a very definite finding, and I believe the House of Commons should be told what the attitude of the government is with regard to that recommendation.

Another subject dealt with at length by the commission is the refinancing of the Canadian National Railways. As the minister knows, I am no financial wizard; I shall leave that subject to the hon. member for Greenwood. But I believe we should know the attitude of the government toward recommendations made by the commission for the refinancing of the Canadian National Railways.

There is one other recommendation on which I should like to have the government's view, and that has to do with the expansion of railways. The recommendation is found at page 130 of the report, under the heading "Proposed railway expansion and matters incidental thereto." After dealing with the situation in the United States with regard to the expansion of railways, the report states:

In Canada the situation is somewhat different. There is still room for railway expansion where it is called for by the needs of settlers already established in productive areas or by the necessity of making available new areas possessing mineral and other natural resources attainable only by railway.

I point out the words "already established in productive areas." It continues:

It seems to be generally assumed that most, if not all, railway expansion in the foreseeable future will be carried on by the government of Canada or by the Canadian National Railways which the government owns. The day of ill-conceived and therefore excessive construction seems to have gone by, and our people can feel reasonably assured that from now on no railway ventures will be undertaken excepting after thorough investigation of each project and always with due regard to the financial commitments involved.

That sounds like a very reasonable recommendation. No doubt nearly everyone in the chamber this evening has nodded his head, and thought, "That is a good suggestion; that would be a good policy." I am not so sure that in adopting that attitude we are thinking in the year 1951. I am a little afraid that we are looking back to those days thirty years ago when we had a lot of railway trouble, to the days when the Canadian National Railways had to be set up and when everyone became thoroughly hostile to the spending of money for the laying down of further railways.

I think the commissioners have been bitten by that bug. I am not so sure that Canada should adopt such a reactionary policy with regard to the building of railways. For example, the commissioners say in this paragraph:

There is still room for railway expansion where it is called for by the needs of settlers already established in productive areas.

It is not so easy to get people to go into those areas when they have no chance of getting railway communication for many years. It just does not work out that way. We have one good example in Canada of the weakness of such a policy, and that is to be found in the Peace river country. There we have a great producing area, the citizens of which are among the outstanding pioneers of our generation. Yet they have never been able to get a railway outlet to the Pacific coast.

Every year since I came here there has been a plea in the house by members from all parties for the building of such a railway, but nothing has been done about it. That railway is no nearer being built today than it was twenty years ago, and if the policy set out at page 130 of the Turgeon commission report is followed in detail by the government there will not be much chance of a rail outlet to the Pacific coast from the Peace river area during the lifetime of the present government. I hope of course that that may not be very long. But, speaking seriously, I think we must be careful not to permit our thinking to get into a groove, and that we must not fail to realize that conditions are changing.

Great developments are going on in Canada today. There are great developments in northern Quebec, northern Ontario, northern Manitoba, northern Saskatchewan, northern Alberta, northern British Columbia, the Northwest Territories and in Labrador. For this country to adopt a policy whereby there would be no railways built until there are plenty of settlers up there who are able to produce, and to fail to supply the only possible way in which they can send out their products, would be unwise. I hope the government will not accede to this recommendation by the commission.

Those are the only points in the report about which I would ask the minister to make a statement this evening. I regret that the commission failed to deal with the St. Lawrence waterway. I realize it was not instructed to do so, and that it might have been difficult to reach any definite conclusion in the matter. However, if the St. Lawrence seaway is constructed there will be many far-reaching results to the transportation system of Canada, and certainly that of eastern Canada. I regret that no provision has been made for studying the effect on our transportation system of the construction of that seaway. If we had the results of such a study we would be much better able to bring good judgment to bear on the project than we are going to be able to do under present conditions.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt, but the hon. member has exhausted his time.

Mr. Green: I have just about finished.

The Chairman: With unanimous consent the hon. member could continue.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Green: I am afraid that a proposal will be put forward suggesting that we must have the St. Lawrence seaway, and that there will not be sufficient information in the house for hon. members to understand the whole picture. The result will probably not be as satisfactory as if we had had a detailed survey by a group such as the Turgeon commission. Perhaps provision could still be made to set up a commission to study just what the effect of that seaway will be on our transportation system.

Finally I would ask the minister to let us know what progress has been made with the general freight rates investigation being conducted by the board of transport commissioners. They were authorized, in 1948 I believe, to conduct a general freight rates investigation at the same time the royal commission was doing its work. It would be most helpful if we were told what progress has been made.

In conclusion, may I repeat that the time to review this report in detail and to debate it in this house is during this 1951 session. The time to get action on the report is during the present session. This is the time when we should have legislation to carry out at least some of the recommendations made in the report. Let us give as much of this work as possible to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. There was a time when that committee was perhaps the busiest committee of the house, and I believe that is why the railway committee room is so named. In my opinion the position today is as it was after the first world war when transportation was the most vital internal problem facing the Canadian people.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to pursue the subject raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, but I would like to discuss a matter which is familiar both to myself and to the Minister of Transport. I do not raise it at this time for the purpose of embarrassing or criticizing the minister or his department, but rather to obtain clarification.

I have been accused of being the chief Liberal spokesman for the federal government in Nova Scotia in connection with this particular project. I refer to the recommendations made to this house in 1949 by the Pratley commission which was appointed jointly by the federal and provincial governments for the purpose of resolving the engineering difficulties in connection with constructing a bridge across the strait of Canso.

Mr. Chevrier: May I interrupt the hon. member for a moment? I do not know whether there are other hon. members who would like to discuss the royal commission report, but before we get into a discussion of the Canso project I should like to have the opportunity of replying, in part at least, to the questions raised and representations made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I was hoping that all the speeches on the report would be made in the earlier part of the evening and therefore before the hon. member goes on I should like to reply.

Mr. Gillis: If the Minister of Transport is going to reply to all the points raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra he will not finish tonight. The hon. member raised every problem that was dealt with by the commission on transportation.

Mr. Green: Oh, no.

Mr. Gillis: You did not miss many.

Mr. Chevrier: He left out one.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to pursue this subject now. After the minister hears everyone he may be able to summarize the matters that have been raised and deal with them briefly. As I was saying when the minister so rudely interrupted me, this Pratley commission was appointed jointly by the provincial and federal governments. The recommendations of that commission were laid before this house. When the minister presented these recommendations he said that there was no engineering difficulty in bridging the strait of Canso. I was quite happy to hear him say that.

Since that report was brought down considerable controversy has developed as to why there should be delay in clearing out the recommendations of the Pratley commission. I should like to make it quite clear that the Canso bridge project has been in the slings for fifty years. Surveys were made many years ago by engineers as to the feasibility and practicability of bridging the strait of Canso.

It has always been an engineering problem. We had engineers before the committee on reconstruction in 1942, including the economic advisory director of the Canadian National Railways. They threw cold water on this project by saying that it was not feasible, that the cost would be too great and that the engineering difficulties were so and so.

Nevertheless the committee on reconstruction recommended the project as a post-war project. The engineering problem continued until the provincial and federal governments got together in an effort to get the top flight engineers in Canada to form a commission and make an independent survey. In the past the engineers who had disagreed were government engineers, Canadian National engineers, and in some cases engineers from industry, particularly in Nova Scotia.

The top flight men were selected. The federal government appointed two. Mr. Pratley, who headed the commission and is reckoned as one of the best men in the profession, was appointed by the provincial government of Nova Scotia. After a lot of study and work the commission made a very comprehensive report which was tabled in the house by the minister. I have read that report several times and in my opinion it is an excellent report. They examined the possibilities of a tunnel, of a causeway and of a low-level bridge. They decided on the low-level bridge as being the most practical and least costly.

In the past we were led to believe that the bridge would cost anywhere from $35 million up to as much as $56 million, but the Pratley commission estimated the cost at $13,500,000, quite a considerable difference. In my opinion the federal government have carried out their responsibilities, and this is where I got into difficulty with the premier of Nova Scotia. The federal government have spent $258,000 on this project up to date in the way of survey costs, the cost of the engineering commission, wages and so on. The federal government have put that amount into the project and it is not started yet.

I stated in November in Nova Scotia that in my opinion the federal government had carried out its responsibilities and obligations under the report. The first indication of delay, as far as I can figure it out, came when the premier of Nova Scotia notified the federal government that the bridge should be widened by two feet because it did not conform to the highway. I should like to know how many bridges in this country conform to the highways. If there are any, it is through accident. I have not travelled over very many that were exactly the width of the main highway. As I say, that was the first indication of delay.

The Minister of Transport did indicate in one brief statement that this might mean the redrafting of the plans. The delay continued, and when I raised the matter in Nova Scotia during the time the house was adjourned the premier of Nova Scotia made a long statement. He said that nobody knew what they were talking about except himself. According to a press dispatch I have here he claimed as late as February 28 of this year that the site of the bridge piers held up the Canso project, and he went on to make a statement. That was in the legislature. He gave me quite a going over for being the chief spokesman of the Liberal party in Nova Scotia from the point of view of defending them so far as the Canso project is concerned.

I like to be fair. I am not political in a matter of this kind. I want to see the bridge built, and I believe it will be built despite all obstacles that are put in the way. The Minister of Resources and Development was in Nova Scotia in October of 1950, and according to a press dispatch he stated in an interview with the press that so far as he was concerned there were no bottlenecks in Ottawa with respect to the construction of the bridge. That is what I say, and I was glad to see that he agreed with me. The thing I want to bring to the minister's attention is that while the provincial government selected Dr. Pratley as chairman of that commission and appointed him—

Mr. Chevrier: Dr. Ellis was the chairman.

Mr. Gillis: Why was it called the Pratley commission?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it was the Ellis commission.

Mr. Gillis: That is not the title he gets in most of the press dispatches that I have seen.

Mr. Chevrier: Those are the facts.

Mr. Gillis: They name him as chairman of the commission. However, that is immaterial. Pratley was appointed by the Nova Scotia government. In my opinion the controversy during the past couple of months is a reflection on the top flight engineers of Canada who were selected by both governments to make an independent survey of that project. I think their report clearly indicated that it is feasible both from an engineering standpoint and from the standpoint of costs. Not only that, they also recognized the necessity for that particular bridge. It is not a matter of building a political bridge across a river or something like that. It is more important than that. It is a very definite part of the Canadian National Railways system into the largest industrial section east of Montreal, a section that produces approximately one-third of Canada's basic steel and ships out about 95 per cent of it. About half the coal produced in Canada today is produced on the island of Cape Breton and shipped out. It is not a matter of just building a bridge, as some people might think. It is a matter of importance, of making necessary improvements in the Canadian National Railways transportation system.

It is recognized by most people who think and know geography as being essential in this day and age, and I want to see it built. The great majority of the people of Nova Scotia do not want to see a political football made of it. It has been that for a long time. I am not concerned about blaming anyone in particular for the delay but I am concerned in assessing the facts as I see them and understand them, and if there is someone putting obstacles in the way I am going to point out that person whether or not he likes it. According to a press dispatch I have in my hand from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, a couple of weeks ago Dr. Pratley was obliged to make a public statement because of statements appearing in the press by laymen who in my opinion knew very little about the project. I am going to read Dr. Pratley's statement into the record because I think it comes from a man who is an authority on the subject, a man who was a member of the commission, and a man who has a reputation to maintain in his profession. I do not blame him for having made use of the press to clarify an issue that has been made a political football.

I rose at this time merely to bring this matter to the attention of the minister in case he has not seen it, because the minister is a key figure in this controversy. I do not want to drag him into any provincial difficulties but I want him to know exactly what is going on because in the final analysis if the bridge is ever built I think it will be built because of pressure and honesty on the part of somebody in the federal government, and I think that somebody will probably be the Minister of Transport. The statement of Dr. Pratley is in answer to the many press statements about the engineering difficulties and so forth. The newspaper article reads as follows:

"The piers of the proposed Canso bridge would withstand the impact of a piece of ice 225 acres in area, 12 feet deep and moving at a speed of 6 feet per second," Dr. P. L. Pratley, consulting engineer, Montreal, told the largest audience ever to attend a meeting of the Halifax branch of the engineering institute of Canada in an address delivered at the Nova Scotian hotel last night.

"We must have safety factors beyond the bounds of common sense because of the psychology of fear which exists in relation to the Canso bridge project in the light of planned innovations which are perhaps unprecedented but not impossible," Dr. Pratley said.

"I could find no one who had actually seen a piece of ice 5 acres in area, though there were rumours of such 'pans.' Certainly no one has seen one with an area of 25 acres. We have planned the bridge to withstand the impact of a 225-acre piece of ice. There's certainly a factor of safety there."

The development of Intrusion-Prepakt concrete as used in the so-called Disney pier for bridges solved half the problem of erecting a bridge over the strait of Canso. The other half of the problem was deep water . . . deep salt water. Setting forth the "facts" of the Canso bridge plan, Dr. Pratley referred to stories carried in two Nova Scotia newspapers.

They are the ones to which I have just referred.

"These stories were not accurate," he said. "They refer to a second set of plans. There was no second set of plans, nor is there a second set of plans now. They say my plan was rejected. It was not. They say the Canso project was being reconsidered with a view to substituting a causeway for the bridge. Not so. They say a bridge design planned for the Canso strait fifty years ago was used in the construction of the Quebec bridge. That is not so. They say the "columns" of the bridge would rest on mud. They would in fact rest on rock. They say the bridge would have 14 feet clearance above water. It would have 26 feet. They say there would be 26 feet depth of water. In fact it would have at one point 175 feet depth. There are no icebergs in the strait of Canso despite popular belief," Dr. Pratley said. He showed slides of photographs of the "bergs," stating they were in reality pan ice, upended and crushed against rocks on the shore.

"We made a thorough study of navigation in the strait," he said. The lift span in the proposed Canso bridge would be similar to one now in operation in Vancouver harbour which lifts 7,500 times a year. That is far in excess of the number of ships navigating annually in the strait of Canso at the bridge site. "I still say my method is not the only one," Dr. Pratley said, "but in my opinion it is a good one."

I merely rose tonight, Mr. Chairman, to bring this whole matter to the attention of the minister because in the light of the controversy provincially, federally, and among the engineers I asked for the correspondence between the federal department and the provincial government, and a motion was passed in the house on the 26th of February. There is no law which prohibits members of this house getting correspondence of that nature. It is a matter of courtesy on the part of the minister in asking permission of the provincial government to bring down the correspondence, and I have no doubt that in due time the correspondence will be brought down.

There is another thing I want to bring forcefully to the attention of the minister. Most of the public works projects of this country have been put to one side because of the defence program. Perhaps many of them could be shelved, but this project has been shelved for the past fifty years. In the last war this was one of the worst transportation bottlenecks in eastern Canada. There was a time when the St. Lawrence was threatened with submarines, and we had to go to work and put in auxiliary coal dumping facilities which cost almost as much as it would cost to build a bridge across that strait. You could not take the coal from there on the railways owing to the bottleneck, so you had to ship it by water, and you had to establish these temporary facilities that cost almost as much as a permanent structure.

You may mention the shortage of steel. Why, we turn out steel on Cape Breton island, all kinds of it, so I do not take that as an answer. I consider that project to be part of our defence program. Now we have Newfoundland as the tenth province, with all the additional traffic back and forth and the large amount of business that has been diverted to Canada, which has to come across that strait. So I believe that project is a must at this time, and I do not accept the objection that it will cost $13 million, or that there may be a shortage of steel, or anything else. I believe the Americans are as interested in getting that bridge as we are. When this matter was under discussion in 1942 a Mr. W. J. Kemp was very much interested, and came to Ottawa in connection with it. His father made the first survey for that bridge away back in 1906 or 1911. Mr. Kemp brought with him the original plans and said his company was still interested. That was the Waddell-Hardesty engineering firm; and at that time he told me that if he could interest the federal government in going ahead with the project, his company would build the bridge. Better than that, he said he could get priority on steel for that project in the United States. Their forces were in Newfoundland at that time, shipping a great deal of material in and out, and they thought the bridge was necessary.

Then there is the question of cost, but that is something to which I do not pay very much attention. There was a time when $13 million would scare me, but not now. Of course there was a time when that was the total of our national income, but when I see billions thrown around now just by the stroke of a pen, the expenditure of $13 million to create a permanent structure and make necessary improvements in our railway system does not frighten me at all. That is no argument at all as to why this project should not be proceeded with. I know one thing, that as far as I am concerned it is not going to be used in the next election campaign as a political football, either provincially or federally. I have exonerated the federal government; I think they have done all they could up to date, but I think the time has come now when they should back up one of their engineers who has been fighting for the honour of his profession in regard to the accuracy of the reports he made. A great deal of money was put into the work of that commission, and I hope it is not going to be considered just another report.

Mr. Chevrier: I hope the hon. member will not consider me rude if I do not deal with his remarks immediately and answer some of the questions he has put to me. Before I deal with the representations made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, let me tell the hon. member for Cape Breton South that I fully agree that to attempt to reply to all the questions asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra would be difficult. I am sure the hon. member, sincere as he is, had no expectation that at this time I could dispose of all the subjects he raised. In any event, I feel that I should say something definite and concrete in reference to the royal commission on transportation.

The Turgeon report, as it has been called, is a very constructive document. Anyone reading it will come to the conclusion immediately that it is also a comprehensive document, the like of which I do not think has been tabled in this house previously. From reading the document it is clearly evident that the conclusions were reached after very careful consideration. In my analysis of the report I divided it in three parts: first, that part having to do with the rate structure of Canada, or equalization if you will; next, the recapitalization or refinancing of the Canadian National; third, co-ordination or a national transportation policy for Canada. The other matters dealt with in the report are of a general nature and incidental, I believe, to those three problems.

In those three divisions of the report, the commission poses the problem and suggests the solution. It analyses the complaints of the provinces by areas and by regions, deals with them at length, and submits its recommendations. With reference to the freight rate structure it states at length the contentions of the provinces. It refers to the complaints of the maritime provinces, to the effect the Maritime Freight Rates Act does not go nearly far enough and that the boundaries of the region should be extended as far west as Toronto or even Windsor and the subsidy increased from 20 per cent to 30 per cent. It deals at length with the complaints of the prairie provinces and refers particularly to the long haul, to which my hon. friend referred; to the disadvantages suffered by those extremities of the country because of the long haul, and also the aggravation of those disadvantages by the application of horizontal increases in freight rates. While dealing with the question of freight rates in western Canada the report refers to the fact that there is not the competition in that part of Canada that there is in the central provinces. It deals also with the complaints of British Columbia, respecting removal of the differential in passenger rates consequent upon the removal of the mountain differential which it obtained some short time ago. I believe it also deals at length with the complaints of the province of Newfoundland, and in effect states that the board of transport commissioners having heard the case for Newfoundland, for the time being at least that was not being dealt with in the report.

What I have said so far has to do with the representations listed in the report of the Turgeon commission. In other words it says there is the problem, and what should we do to remedy the situation? In the chapter entitled "Equalization" the commission is of the opinion that the time has arrived when there should be equalization of freight rates in Canada as far as that is possible. To say in a report that there should be equalization is one thing, and to put it into effect is another. There are many interpretations of equalization. There are any number of railway cases from which, if one were to read them, one would find different aspects as to equalization. But the royal commission has a formula. It suggests that the present standard mileage class rates be abolished and instead thereof there be established a new uniform class rate scale which, by virtue of the amendments referred to in part I, as I call it—the first part—of the report would have the effect of equalizing those rates across the country.

The complaints in effect boil down to the question of the rate structure. The complaints say that the board has not always done what it should have done, or again that the board did not have the power to do what we wanted it to do, or again that the board has no power to do some of the things that should be done to equalize the rates. In this report every complaint raised by the provinces was analysed critically and was investigated; and the commission came to the conclusion that the best way in which to deal with that problem was, first of all, to eliminate the class rates which exist in Canada at this time and to establish in lieu thereof a uniform normal class rate; next, to eliminate the variety of commodity rates and to establish uniform rate scales for each commodity; then, third, to equalize to the extent feasible specific commodity rates. That is a difficult job. That is a task which it will take time to deal with and to dispose of satisfactorily.

The report suggests some eighteen to twenty amendments to the Railway Act which would help to bring into effect this policy of equalization. But the commission makes it clear that these amendments to the Railway Act will not in themselves answer the purpose. The commission says that it will be for the board and the railways to carry out the suggestions and the recommendations which are referred to in the report.

Coupled of course with the question of equalization is the link between the east and the west, the bridge, or the maintenance of the roadbed of the two railways. The one I think goes with the other. Excepted by the commission from the recommendations on the subject of equalization are certain rates such as international rates, export and import rates, competitive rates, agreed charges, rates on railways other than the C.N.R. and the C.P.R., and the Crowsnest pass rates, all of which, of necessity, must be eliminated because amendments to the Railway Act could not deal with these specialized rates since they are influenced by other factors.

Then the commission suggests that the general freight rate investigation ordered by the government some time ago should be an efficient means of carrying out this recommendation. My hon. friend says: On this as well as on the other matters, what is the attitude of the government? What is the government going to do about it? I need hardly tell the committee that the report was handed to me less than five weeks ago. It had to be printed, translated and submitted to the government. The government gave it some study, but the government has not been able to give to all of it the study it deserves.

I have appointed in my department a committee to deal with amendments required to bring into effect the first part of this report, namely the equalization of freight rates. That committee is now working on legislation to implement, by way of amendment to the Railway Act, the recommendations of the report with regard to equalization. That is a difficult job—far more difficult that I had anticipated at the outset, because the work of the committee has now reached the point where it is necessary to analyse a multitude of sections of the Railway Act—and there are hundreds of them—to ascertain what effect these eighteen or twenty amendments would have on the rest of the sections. That in itself is a difficult task. How soon a draft will be prepared for submission by myself to the government, I am unable to say. All I can say is that, when the draft is prepared, I will submit it to my colleagues to ascertain whether or not it will be possible to present at this session legislation implementing the first part of this report.

The second part of the report deals with the financial structure of the Canadian National Railways, and I do not want to spend too much time on that aspect. The committee is familiar with the presentation made to the royal commission on transportation by the president of the Canadian National Railways and with the plan which he submitted to the commission. The commission decided not to adopt his plan. They had a plan of their own which I think accepts to a large extent, although not entirely, the representations of the Canadian National Railways. That plan can be found in the second part of the report. As to that plan, I can tell the committee that the government has not yet had time to give consideration to it.

The third part of the report, that having to do with the co-ordination of transportation facilities by the establishment of a board or commission or body or central authority which would co-ordinate the activities of the Canadian maritime commission, of the board of transport commissioners and of the air transport board, is one which I think should be of interest to the house.

The chapter dealing with the national transportation policy is I think one of the most interesting to read. In the first part of the chapter will be found in condensed form what has been the transportation policy up to date. It was prepared after a great deal of study, and should commend itself to all hon. members. I need hardly add that, so far as that part of the report is concerned, the government has been unable to give it any study whatsoever.

The other parts of the report that are of interest deal with the Crowsnest pass rates, where there is no change in the present position. The commission reports that these rates were partly established by the board of transport commissioners, partly by the railways and partly by act of parliament. In the case of statutory rates it would be for the government to present legislation amending the rates if that should be the feeling. So far as I know there is no such intention.

With regard to the Maritime Freight Rates Act, slight amendments are recommended. Then there are a number of amendments having to do with accounting and statistics. Others deal with the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, which will give the Canadian National Railways and the house an opportunity of seeing what remedies and what economies the railways are able to put into effect, by having the Canadian National Railways include a reference to this subject in their annual report, which can be studied by the railways and shipping committee.

The accounting and statistics chapter has to do with uniform accounting and I think that should commend itself to hon. members. On the whole the report is an excellent one, and should be of great help to the government and to parliament in the years to come.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra asked a number of specific questions, which I do not think I need answer in view of the general picture in so far as the first part of the report is concerned.

My hon. friend has suggested that we be given an opportunity to discuss this report. Well, I think that is one of the reasons why the estimates of the Department of Transport were called. They were called so that the house could be given an opportunity of discussing the report. My hon. friend has suggested that the report be submitted to a committee. I hardly think that he really wanted that because if the legislation, which I referred to a moment ago, is brought down, it might be referred to a committee. I think it would be duplication to refer the report to a committee, because we have referred the question to a commission and they have made those recommendations, and the government has now to decide whether it will adopt them in whole or in part.

Mr. Green: The minister means that any legislation brought in will be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Chevrier: What I mean is that legislation having to do with equalization, if it is approved of by the government, could, I think, be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, if it was the wish of the house.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South dealt with an important subject in so far as he is concerned, and in so far as several members on this side of the house are concerned, namely, the bridging of the strait of Canso. He said that was a matter which had been discussed for many many years. I was interested in the remarks which he had to make; in fact I was quite pleased with the attitude he adopted. I thought it was a fair attitude in so far as the Department of Transport is concerned. But I think he is mistaken honestly if he thinks that there has been any undue delay, or that there have been any obstacles placed in the way of the implementation of the report of the board of engineers.

Some months ago a board of engineers, established by the government and by the province of Nova Scotia, reported upon the question of transportation across the strait of Canso. After having considered four methods, namely, improved water transportation facilities, a tunnel, a causeway and a bridge, they favoured the construction of a low-level bridge. They recommended in favour of the construction of a low-level bridge at a cost of $13,500,000, and they recommended that after careful consideration. But they also suggested to the government that a contract be made immediately for the purpose of taking borings to ascertain whether there was any overburden. After the contract was given it was discovered that there was a substantial amount of overburden in the strait which I think had some effect upon the problem as a whole.

I am not an engineer, and of course cannot approach this from an engineering standpoint, but I should like to draw to the attention of the committee the fact that this is a difficult engineering problem because you have a very deep strait, in some places nearly 200 feet. You have currents and tides, and you have ice, all of which added together pose a difficult engineering problem, I am informed. In any event, the board of engineers recommended in favour of the low-level bridge, and we engaged a competent engineer, namely, Dr. Pratley, whose reputation is among the highest in his profession. Dr. Pratley prepared plans and specifications for the construction of a low-level bridge. Objection was taken to these plans and specifications by engineers of both the province of Nova Scotia and the Canadian National Railways. On the day the house adjourned in September of last year I had the advantage of listening in my office to the discussion that went on among all of these groups over these plans and specifications. After hearing the discussion I could come to no other conclusion than that the proper thing to do was to reconvene the board of engineers, the members of which were present, by the way, at this discussion and, in the light of those discussions, ask the board, "Have you anything further to recommend, in view of what you have already recommended? Have you anything further to tell the government, in view of the overburden that has been found there and in the light of the discussions that took place between these three various groups of engineers today?" The board has been reconvened. They have not yet handed down their report. When they will do so, I am not able to say definitely, but I trust it will be before the end of the session.

So that I can assure my hon. friend from Cape Breton South that there has been no undue delay, and there has been no obstacle placed in the way. I do hope that the reconvened board will report soon. What they will report I do not know. If I were an engineer I could deal more specifically with the points involved; but I hesitate to do so because I think I might be treading on rather dangerous ground.

I think I have dealt as fully as I can with the complaints of the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and I believe as completely as I can at this time with the suggestion and questions of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

Mr. Green: There was one further question, and that was as to the progress made in the general rate investigation by the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry to report that there has been little progress made. The reason for that is that when the board reconvened its sittings to deal with the general freight rates investigation early this year the provinces moved immediately for a stay of proceedings and a stay of the hearing until such time as the royal commission had handed down its report. The board agreed to that motion made by counsel for the provinces, and fixed a further date. When that date had been reached the report had not yet been tabled, and a further adjournment was granted.

In view of the recommendations of the commission now I think it would be in the interests of the country for the board of transport commissioners to get along with this investigation as quickly as possible. I can see no objection to the board's proceeding now with the investigation while we deal with the amendments that might be necessary in connection with the Railway Act. When its report is ready it may very well be that if we are ready with our amendments to the Railway Act they will be of some assistance to the board of transport commissioners. But in fairness to the board I must say that they cannot proceed with the investigation until such time as the provinces and railways are ready and willing to proceed.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, this is a very important discussion. We are under obligation to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra for his summary with respect to the report of the royal commission on transportation. It is a subject of wide concern, and I do not feel capable of discussing it as it should be discussed.

The minister has said that these estimates were called for the purpose of permitting a general discussion on this subject, as well as other transportation matters. That is hardly fair to hon. members. I, for one, did not know the estimates of this department were being called.

Mr. Chevrier: I said that was one of the reasons.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I do not think the minister knew they were being called, either.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I did.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I understood some other departments were to be called. I am sure there are some members who would have liked to be here to discuss this subject, had they known that this was the occasion upon which these matters were to be discussed. I know there are some who should be here, whether they want to be here or not, in order that they might speak for their constituencies.

The matter of transportation is very important to all the provinces, but to no provinces is it more important than to the maritimes. We would never have entered confederation had it not been for the fact that transportation was being dealt with. Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces, as well as the western provinces, have made representations before this royal commission. They have spent weeks—yes, months—in the study, and have engaged the services of experts.

Speaking for myself, until I have had the opportunity of learning the views of those who represented Nova Scotia at the hearings, I would not be in a position to state to the committee the viewpoint of that province in relation to the commission's findings. I know there is discontent in Nova Scotia and in the other maritime provinces in the matter of transportation as it affects those provinces. I know that steps should be taken to make it easier for the producers in the maritimes to market their products. I do not feel that I, as one of the representatives from the maritimes, am in a position tonight to deal adequately with the subject.

I do not fail to pay great respect to the commissioners as capable men who have given the matter of transportation thorough study. I am not saying their findings are correct, but I realize that we must pay them great respect. They are outstanding men, and I believe their service to Canada will be valued for many years to come.

They have dealt with some special matters, one of which is the maritime freight rates as proposed by the Duncan commission in 1927. Their recommendation is that it be accepted as a permanent feature in the freight rates structure of Canada. I believe that is considered essential by the people of the maritime provinces, but it is not enough to meet the requirements

They have made reference to the Chignecto canal. The commission in its report has turned thumbs down on that project. Whether they were qualified to do so, I have my doubts. I do not believe for instance they considered the matter from the standpoint of defence. In my view the building of the Chignecto canal is of great importance from the standpoint of the proper defence of North America, and I do not believe that phase was studied.

They referred to the Chignecto canal as a commercial undertaking that should pay its way. Certainly that is the effect of their finding and no other canal has been so treated. This project has been promised to that part of Canada since the days of confederation. Even if it will cost more than some people think it should, it should not be put on a paying commercial basis. The people of the maritime provinces feel that it should be built as a commitment on the part of Canada. No adverse report by this commission with respect to the building of this canal should be accepted as final.

Before I would be in a position to discuss their recommendation I should like to hear from the committee from the maritime provinces that gave months to a study of this project. They sent up the largest delegation that had ever come to Ottawa from the maritime provinces to urge the construction of this canal. The personnel of this committee gave much time and expended large sums to arrive at their conclusions and they will be dissatisfied with the adverse report by this commission, no matter how able it may be. From representations that have been made to me I know that there is great dissatisfaction with this report on the part of many people in the maritime provinces. I am not in position to discuss the report in detail and I do not think it was expected that it should be discussed at this time.

I should like to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton South with respect to the Canso bridge and say that I agree with much that he has said. There is great dissatisfaction in Nova Scotia that more headway has not been made in the construction of this bridge. The delay is simply one more disappointment as far as we are concerned, especially when a definite undertaking was given by the minister and by the government before and during the last election that the bridge would be constructed. The results up to now are practically nil.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The engineering difficulties are greater after an election.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): That appears to be it. The people of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia are not satisfied with the progress that has been made. I do not want to be too critical of the minister, but I do not think there is justification for the delay in the construction of the Canso bridge in view of the definite undertaking by the minister and the government.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member says that he agrees with the hon. member for Cape Breton South, but he is disagreeing with him now.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): If I am disagreeing with the hon. member, the people of Nova Scotia are agreeing with me. I do not think there is much more that I can say. The minister states, for the first time to my knowledge, that the engineers are again in consultation and I suppose they will bring in a further report before long.

Mr. Chevrier: I have made that statement three times already.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The minister has made it again tonight. All we can do is wait to see what their report is going to be and what steps will be taken to have the Canso bridge built. With the entry of Newfoundland into confederation and the importance of the steel and coal industries to our defence efforts it is more important than ever that the Canso bridge be built without further delay. Speaking for the people of Nova Scotia I can say that there is grave disappointment that more headway has not been made in the construction of the Canso bridge in view of the definite undertaking given more than two years ago to the people of Nova Scotia and all Canada by the minister and the government. We shall just have to wait and see what is to be done.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to make a few comments on this matter. I feel, like the hon. member for Cumberland, that we have rather unexpectedly been pressed into the consideration of a document which I consider to be of great importance. I hope the minister is listening to me because I am going to ask him to consider whether it might not be a good thing to allow this to stand while he and I and many other people here go to pay our respects to the president of the French republic.

I hope the minister will forgive me for saying that I am reminded of a remark made in the British house of commons by the Right Hon. Anthony Eden to a minister who had dealt with a certain subject. He said that the minister had taken an amiable gallop through the material. I think that is just what the Minister of Transport has done tonight because after all this report is packed full with a great deal of important material.

I think we will all agree with what has been said about the tremendous importance of transportation in the days that we are now facing. The other night we heard an interesting description of the development of the Northwest Territories to the point where a new form of government is being set up. Up to the present the development in this country has been a kind of ribbon development, but I believe we are on the verge of great expansion. If the urgency of the defence preparations continues, I suppose our north country may develop in a way we can hardly imagine.

I realize that we cannot ask the minister to get up and announce government policy in connection with the twelve or fifteen things that are in this report. Perhaps it might be argued that there is no point in spending many hours in debating this report. But the fact is that the report contains many things on which we need education and on which the public needs education. One which seems to me to bristle with difficulties and to be of great importance is the relationship between road and rail transport which is dealt with in the report.

There is another thing that I put to the minister as a matter which perhaps it would be reasonable to ask a statement on, and this was referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. At the top of page 131 of the report reference is made to possible railway development, and I quote from the report:

> It seems to be generally assumed that most, if not all, railway expansion in the foreseeable future will be carried on by the government of Canada or by the Canadian National Railways which the government owns.

Then it speaks about the ill-conceived and therefore excessive construction. None of us will deny that there have been ill-conceived and excessive railway developments in the past. We can look back to the first ten years of the century as being a most extravagant time, yet if you go further back and consider the earlier railroads, I suggest to the minister that things might have been different when the Canadian Pacific railway was built if they had applied the test contained in the second sentence on page 131 which reads:

> . . . no railway ventures will be undertaken excepting after thorough investigation of each project and always with due regard to the financial commitments involved.

To that I must add:

> . . . and unless it is needed by the settlers already established in productive areas.

On the one hand we do not want to indulge in foolish and harum-scarum development but on the other hand I imagine the minister will agree with me that if that test had been applied to the C.P.R. it never would have been built. It is the C.P.R. actually to which this country in its early decades of expansion after confederation owed such a lot. It did not wait to serve already existing settlements. It went ahead of settlements in many cases and enabled the country to be developed.

I am not going to dwell on that point. I am only raising it because there seems to be a statement here that something is generally assumed. I personally would not assume it at all. For instance, at the present time I suppose the most important railway development now under way is that going into the new iron mines of Labrador. If I am correct that is an entirely private enterprise. Would the minister say whether that is so?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it is.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would hope that there may be many others, and I would think that other people in this house who share my view as to the best way to expand the country's facilities would agree with me on that. Therefore, without wishing to make heavy weather about this or to stress it unduly, it seems to me that we might at some early time ask for a statement from the government as to whether a thing of that kind, which is stated as an almost self-evident fact, does or does not carry the approval of the government. I come back to what I said at the outset. Is there not some sensible way in which we can have this report considered by the house? I confess quite frankly that I have not read it. There seem to be a lot of things in it, and I happen to know there are other people who are not in the house tonight who would like to have a chance to discuss this very important report. I suggest to the minister that he might consider whether adequate time ought not to be provided to consider it. The minister has pointed out, and I think quite correctly, that we are now on the transport estimates and this is the natural time to discuss it, as we are in fact discussing it. However, we are doing it in a rather thin house and, as I say, rather by surprise and in the absence of a good many people, or several people at any rate, who would like to have their say. I would hope that the minister might consider that it would be a matter of importance that this report, which I suppose is the most important of its kind that we have ever had, might have adequate time for consideration.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I hope that in anything I have said I have not conveyed a wrong impression. The hon. member for Cumberland and the hon. member for Greenwood as well seem to be of the opinion that there will not be an opportunity to discuss the report, and that the house has been taken by surprise. I think it was in answer to a question by someone in the C.C.F. group that the Prime Minister announced that the report could be discussed when the estimates of the Department of Transport were up for consideration. I presume that this is not the only time that these estimates will be before the house, and I am sure that if anyone has been taken by surprise tonight he will not be tomorrow night, next week, or when these estimates are before the committee again. As the house knows, these estimates do not go through overnight. It has not been my experience at least that the house was so extraordinarily courteous to me that they put them through in a day, so I imagine we will have some discussion. My hon. friend, and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, referred to a statement made by the commission on page 131. Surely these two hon. members are not serious when they want me to get up and comment on it. You could pick out hundreds of statements made throughout the report and ask the same question: is the government of this view; is the government of that view?

The answer to these questions is that when the government decides to implement the recommendations of the commission, as I indicated a while ago, it will bring legislation forward for the consideration of parliament. In so far as this particular matter is concerned, I think we have had before the house at the last and previous sessions acts of parliament dealing with certain railway ventures. We had a private bill to construct a railway in Labrador. We had one concerning the Temiscouata.

Mr. Green: That was not new.

Mr. Chevrier: We had one concerning the P.G.E. We have had several of them. In accordance with custom the government deals with each project seriatim, and I do not think we will depart from that policy. I hope that is the answer that my hon. friend had in mind.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think it is reasonably clear that the minister does not make this assumption.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, thank you.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to support the request made by the hon. member for Greenwood. If the Minister of Transport feels that the argument was not as strong as it might be concerning the point that we were taken by surprise, might I underline the other point made by the hon. member for Greenwood. There are some members necessarily absent tonight who wish to speak on this matter, and the first item in the minister's department seems to be the place for it to be discussed. It would also seem desirable to have a continuous discussion. If the minister and the government insist that the best members of the house, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra styled us, sit here for the rest of the evening, we may find ourselves changing the subject but still remaining on the first item. I think consideration might be given to the suggestion that the house adjourn.

Mr. Chevrier: I did not refer to that before I sat down. I think it is a matter for the house to decide. If the house is of the view that we should adjourn at this hour I have no objection.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: The business for tomorrow will be the consideration of item No. 5, a resolution concerning emergency gold mining assistance; a motion to go into committee of supply for discussion of the estimates of the Department of Transport and Department of Agriculture, but not necessarily in that order.

Mr. Knowles: No motion is necessary.

Mr. Green: Could we not know whether it is the intention to continue with one department during the remainder of the day or whether both departments are to be considered?

Mr. Chevrier: I have not had an opportunity to discuss the matter with my colleague but if I could I should like to proceed tomorrow.

Mr. Green: Perhaps the minister could ask the Minister of Agriculture now.

Mr. Chevrier: I would rather leave it on that basis, transport and agriculture, either one or the other, but not necessarily in that order.

Mr. Knowles: Would it be possible for the various parties in the house to be informed tomorrow morning as to the order in which these departments will be called?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

APPENDIX

of

HIS EXCELLENCY VINCENT AURIOL
President of the French Republic to

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE GENERAL PUBLIC

in the

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

on

Thursday, April 5, 1951

The President of the French Republic was welcomed by the Right Honourable L. S. St. Laurent, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Elie Beauregard, Speaker of the Senate, and the Honourable W. Ross Macdonald, Speaker of the House of Commons.

(Translation):

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. President, in the lives of nations and of parliaments, as in the lives of men, there are significant and unforgettable moments. Your presence today, within this Canadian House of Commons, marks such an occasion in the life of our parliament and of our country as a whole.

(Text):

It is a great honour, Mr. President, to welcome you today in this House of Commons chamber on behalf of the members of both houses of the parliament of Canada. We are happy to be able at the same time to greet the charming first lady of France and the Foreign Minister of the French republic, His Excellency Mr. Robert Schuman. You may be assured, sir, that this assembly is fully representative of all the people of Canada in the warmth of our welcome.

(Translation):

This is the first time that we have had the honour of welcoming to our country the chief of the French government. We rejoice at your visit and we are happy also that you have made this a family occasion, as well as a political one, by bringing with you Madame Auriol, who so fittingly represents the domestic virtues, the charm and elegance of your country. We are happy also that you have brought with you Monsieur Robert Schuman, your Minister of Foreign Affairs, one of the great architects of European unity. Please allow me to associate, in the welcome we are extending to you, the names of Madame Auriol and Monsieur Schuman.

I extend this welcome on behalf of all of the people of Canada; first of all, on behalf of those of my race and yours, Mr. President, most of whom live in the great St. Lawrence valley, a valley where our common ancestors, in the belief that they were establishing a colony, founded a nation. I welcome you also on behalf of all Canadians, who, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, now make up a people bound by common national aspirations. Our people are proud of the honour of your friendship, a friendship of which I received such moving tokens from you and the people of Paris, only a few weeks ago.

It is fitting that this welcome should be given you in our parliament chamber where the whole country is represented. It is here indeed that the unity of our people daily finds expression. Here, in 1914 and in 1939, legislation was passed that brought Canadian soldiers to the defence of an ideal which we felt was so eminently upheld by your country.

Here, in 1949, was ratified the North Atlantic pact, which unites our two countries and ten others more intimately than ever before in time of peace. Here, measures are now being enacted that are considered necessary to deal with the new threat to our common civilization and heritage. Here, too, ways are being discussed to avoid a new conflict that neither France nor Canada is seeking but for which we mean to be ready if it should become unavoidable.

(Text):

You are visiting Canada, sir, at a difficult time in the history of our two countries—a difficult time in the life of free men all over the world. We had set high hopes on the United Nations organization as an instrument of peaceful co-operation among men and governments of good will; we still hope there are in the world enough men and women of good will to assure the ultimate triumph of those high purposes. Unfortunately, one of the great powers bent on extending the domination of its dictatorial masters has constantly worked to spread among its people, and among the peoples already under its domination, distrust, fear and unfriendliness toward their fellow men. This it is which has made it necessary for us to join together to build up our own military forces, not for aggressive purposes but to deter aggression by a firm demonstration of our capacity to overcome it if necessary.

You come to us, sir, after spending a few days in the United States of America. You cannot fail to have been impressed by the strength of that great country, and also by the sincerity of the peaceful aspirations of all its people. Here in Canada you will not fail to note the close, friendly relations which bind us to our southern neighbours, and also the untrammelled independence we enjoy in our own land. If our frontiers bordered on those of some grasping imperialistic neighbouring state, we might not have this opportunity of welcoming you in a free parliament as the distinguished and respected head of a free France. Canada is, I think, the best evidence, permanent and historic evidence, of the peaceful purposes of the United States.

These confident, friendly and co-operative international relations which we enjoy with our great southern neighbours we wish to share ultimately with the whole world, and in the meantime we expect to share them with all the nations of the north Atlantic community. We know we can count upon the people of France, and we wish to assure you the people of France can count upon the good will and effective co-operation of all the people of Canada.

I know that you share our convictions as to the means of warding off the danger which threatens us. This means is none other than the pooling of our forces in the face of any possibility of aggression and of any attempted domination or even intimidation.

As I have just pointed out, our generation has twice already seen Canadian soldiers fight as brothers-in-arms with French soldiers. Thousands of them rest side by side in the vast cemeteries of France.

It was not only your homeland that our Canadian soldiers went to defend, it was also their own, their physical as well as their spiritual homeland. Similarly, your own soldiers fought for an ideal greater than the defence of French territory. Neither you nor we could watch with indifference the fate of the glorious heritage which they preserved for us at the cost of their lives. Without a doubt, we wish to do everything possible to prevent a new disaster from sweeping down on our peoples, but we shall never give up the right to defend ourselves; we shall never try to escape the duty of helping to defend those who, like yourselves, are more immediately exposed than we.

Upon your return home, you may tell your compatriots that here in Canada you have met men of good will, a people anxious not only to prevent the iron curtain from falling on the shores of the Atlantic, but eager to ensure that the tricolour shall ever wave in the air of freedom, because the Canadian people realize that the free world would no longer be free if ever France or the Europe from which our ancestors came should lose their freedom.

Ladies and gentlemen, Monsieur Vincent Auriol, President of the French republic.

His Excellency Vincent Auriol (President of the French republic): Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, gentlemen: My heart is deeply touched with emotion and pride.

I realize the full significance for France of the warmth of your greetings, the acclamations of your people, the supreme honour you have done us in officially welcoming us in the imposing edifice of your parliament, and, finally, of the eloquence of the words just spoken.

I am fully aware of the value of this symbol: the President of the French republic bringing to Canada the affectionate message of France on this very hill at the boundary of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, the meeting place of forces, young and eager, English and French, the union of which has created your nation, which increases in strength and grandeur every day and constitutes an immense human treasure for the future.

Sons of the British isles, sons of France, what a magnificent example is given to the world, what a long path travelled together!

Great Britain and France—how long we struggled and fought! But in those hard and often long battles there never appeared the slightest divergence in our conceptions of life, in our forms of civilization. The reconciliation has been complete, and together we may admire today this vigorous Canadian nation which is the expression, diversified but united, of the genius of the two races.

The meeting of our spirits has begotten your spirit. And this spirit, illuminated with idealism, guides you toward a magnificent future. The two ancient peoples, their rivalries forgotten, are proud to recognize something of themselves in your common fidelity, and to find themselves rejuvenated and more closely united by your extraordinary ascent. They are moved to see Montaigne and Shakespeare preside over your debates in common respect for human dignity and common love of liberty.

Mr. Speaker of the Senate, I beg you to accept, as a Canadian of French origin, the message of friendship I am bringing to the faithful guardians of the French language and culture. They prove that in a solid national unity like yours you nevertheless cherish, as we do in France, the memory of your origins, and you perpetuate the Christian and human civilization that France was the first to bring to you. Your history, as a matter of fact, is in some ways our history. As Maurice Barrès has described it, "You have, as we did in France, reached the highway through bypaths, and you remain assembled beneath your banners". And those banners are always worthy of your love.

It is to you, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, that I address my message of friendship for the English-speaking Canadians, whose origin reminds us that Great Britain, also defender of the right, knew how to "beget consciences" and carry the flag of honour everywhere. A few months ago the world mourned the loss of a great Canadian statesman and a great democrat who, even in the darkest days, always affirmed his faith in the destiny of France. I pay respectful homage to the memory of William Lyon Mackenzie King, one of the principal artisans of the common victory of the allies. As our poet Rutebeuf has said, "He was not one of those friends that the wind carries away when it howls around the door".

I greet also the Prime Minister, whose visit to Paris permitted us to admire his fine spirit and generous heart. I greet his colleagues of the government, and also, if you will permit it to an old opponent, the parliamentary opposition.

And now, gentlemen, I take this occasion to tell you that at this very hour the whole of France joins with you and with me in paying homage to the sacred memory of thousands of Canadians who, in the course of two world wars, fought and fell for the liberty of the world; and to their families and to their surviving comrades I bring our affectionate greetings and grateful sympathy.

At Vimy, where a memorial reminds us of their legendary heroism, at Tilloy, at Dieppe, at Bretteville-sur-Laize, at Beny-sur-Mer and in so many other places which speak of their courage, France, whose heart beat faster when she saw them parade through her towns, now tenderly watches over their eternal rest.

Finally, to the people of Canada I express the enduring friendship of France, our gratitude for all they have done for our liberation, and also for that inexhaustible generosity which, under the impetus of national and private organizations, has been lavish in its help to relieve the misery of our people exhausted by war and a long and awful oppression.

In this world which becomes every day smaller and smaller, and where the interdependence of nations is a fact, you have understood that our destinies are just the same, and that there are not for man, whether in the midst of storm or the calm of peace, several conceptions of virtue and honour.

Of this vital solidarity I never heard a more concise definition than that which I heard on the radio in a small mountain chalet where I had taken refuge after my confinement in prison, when I fled from the oppressor before my departure for London. "World prosperity, like security, is indivisible". They were the words of Mackenzie King. They must always be our common motto.

France, being the first country on the road of invasions and battles, knows perhaps better than anyone that security is indivisible. If she had remained alone during the war she would have definitely succumbed. And with France enslaved, all Europe would have lost everything, even hope. If our old civilization were to disappear from Europe some day, what would become of the rest of the continents of the world in the face of an erupting Asia?

No nation, therefore, has the right to leave "to chance the smallest parcel of its security, its dignity or pride." Every nation has the duty to preserve the liberty of man against all those who would or could attempt, from their own autocratic will, to impose their fanatical ideology and thus unleash the most frightful of wars. Canada has understood this; for twice she has already given men, material and resources, an enormous and sacrificial contribution, to the victory of right and liberty.

Thus your determination has foiled the efforts of an enemy who hoped that, being far from Europe, you would not take any part in the conflict.

Certainly Great Britain could rely on your traditional loyalty, honour and courage. Certainly France could say she knew you were faithful to the motto of Quebec, "Je me souviens".

But the real truth is that the highest ideal inspired your action. You knew that liberty has no frontiers; that if anywhere in the world the light is extinguished, then the rest of the world is darker. You want to sustain the light and preserve for the nations the proud right to live in freedom and to flourish.

Thus you encounter France, because she has already experienced the horrors of war on her own soil, the sorrow of ruins because she knows what it is to endure, though temporarily, the oppression of foreign enslavement; because she experienced the mortal peril of solitude in the face of aggression she thought, like you, that our forces must be united in proper time for the founding of peace. With you, with Great Britain, with the United States, we had hoped that the charter of the United Nations, signed by all, would assure the protection of every nation by the organization of collective security, as well as the happiness of mankind by the co-operation of nations.

But the spirit of intolerance and the will to dominate has not permitted the materialization of this great hope. And the United Nations, partially paralysed, have not been able to save countries from losing their independence again or men their liberty. Once again, one after another as before the last war, the free democracies have been smothered. Vast countries are closed and hostile to the rest of the world. Violence has reappeared and menaces; it even strikes. And so the great democracies enjoying civil liberties had to organize into regional defence pacts. It was with great relief that we greeted the conclusion of the pact among the north Atlantic countries, due in great part to the clairvoyant initiative of Canadian statesmen—this pact which, ratified by the unanimous vote of your parliament, has established a powerful bond between Europe and America, a bond among the peoples united by the same civilization and by the same desire and anxiety to protect and defend it.

If the aggressors of 1914 and 1939 had known that France was not alone, that Europe was not alone, they would have retreated from the criminal folly of their enterprise. History is the witness: solidarity in defence is a token of peace.

France wants neither war nor servitude. Her sole aim is peace in justice and freedom.

It is for common defence, but also for common prosperity, that France strives to create a united Europe, to build a young and coherent federation.

In the military field, a European army that will be integrated into the Atlantic bloc is the first link of collective security.

In the economic and social field, the free association of productive forces, of which the Schuman plan is the first step, has to organize collective prosperity.

Eventually, in the political field, the European council of ministers and the assembly of Strasbourg is the beginning of federal unity to which we wish to give strength and efficiency.

For the success of this great design we have silenced our resentments toward the enemy of yesterday, who nevertheless was responsible for the death by torture of the best of our citizens. Our only condition has been and remains that he shall not forget his crimes and faults; that he shall renounce plans of domination and revenge; that he shall sincerely rally to the principles of democracy.

And so we want a democratic Europe, created not through the subordination of some nations to another, but through a fruitful harmony. And this free Europe, open to all the peoples who respect the liberty of others, will associate itself with the new world so that upon this international economic and political co-operation may be built enduring peace.

Whatever it may cost us, the victory of peace is the prize.

Let us not miss any possibility of agreement, even partial, and no occasion to dissipate misunderstandings; but so long as the United Nations have not the necessary armed forces to maintain international order, we must neglect nothing in the organization of our common regional defence.

Let us not cease to proclaim the right and the principles of an enduring peace, but let us judge the sincerity of our partners by their acts and by their actual contribution to the easing of international tension.

France is not giving herself up to any naïve neutralism, and whatever sacrifices our rearmament efforts add to our already crushing burdens for rehabilitation and re-equipment, we know that no sacrifice is as heavy as that of liberty.

There is no better testimony of our resolution than the heroism of our soldiers who are fighting in Korea in the service of the United Nations, and for more than four years have been fighting in Indo-China, where it is now recognized, after much injustice, that they defend no selfish interest but the independence that France has given to the young states of Viet Nam, Cambodia and Laos. They mount guard at the gates of southeast Asia.

France is thus faithful to her traditions and the ideal of our common civilization.

Momentarily exhausted by the wounds she received while the world was unorganized, she always knows that it is in the exaltation of the spirit that great things—the proud cathedrals and lofty monuments of right—are wrought.

With Great Britain, Canada and the United States, and the free world, France shares a common faith. And the visit of the President of the French republic to your country is not only the manifestation of the enduring affection of France, but the expression of our will to work together to achieve greater liberty, greater justice and greater fraternity.

Hon. Elie Beauregard (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. President of the Republic, the Canadian Senate joins with the Prime Minister in greeting you as the first citizen of France and in wishing you a most cordial welcome.

To your visit among us we owe the honour to pay our respects to Madame Auriol and the pleasure to renew acquaintance with some of the best builders of the alliance of nations and of world peace.

Even before your arrival we had heard of the message you bring to America, a message of co-operation and of solidarity. It will help strengthen the feeling of true democracy that Canada has inherited from its two mother countries.

The position of our country—a country in some respects so new—its abundant natural resources and its life ideals have caused it to occupy in the council of nations a place formerly held by nations of greater population.

Canada enters the scene at a time when western democracies must, more than ever before, maintain a social order mindful of the true scale of values, where money serves production, where production serves humanity and humanity itself serves an ideal that gives life its true meaning.

That objective has always been pursued by the civilizing power that is France. Today, the French people, who have witnessed, within thirty years, two invasions, two victories and, need I add, two post-war periods, remain the unconquered champions of human freedom. Not only have the French people fought alone for several years against Asiatic communism, but they remain the cornerstone of the fortress which western democracies must build in Europe.

Four million Canadians share with the French people an inalienable heritage based on a glorious past and a culture of universal significance. One of your historians was thinking of that past and culture when he said that England is an empire, Germany a country, and France a lady. May I be permitted to offer to that lady, the mother of letters, arts and arms, the tribute of our attachment and of our admiration.

(Text):

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. President, the Speaker of the Senate has expressed to you in the beautiful French language our appreciation of your eloquent and inspiring address. May I add an expression of appreciation in the English language. Canada is a bilingual country, and whether we speak in French or in English we speak the language of Canada.

The President of France

Canada over the years has been honoured by visits by the heads of state of several great countries, but never in its history by the President of France. Canada was discovered by a Frenchman in 1534. Our existence, therefore, has been known for 417 years, and although it could hardly be said that we have waited all those years for this visit, nevertheless I can assure you, Mr. President, that the warmth of our welcome is in direct ratio with the warmth of the 417 summers of our existence.

As we listened to your address this afternoon we recalled that when we go back to the birth of our nation we go back to France. It is interesting to note that when the first Frenchman arrived in Canada he sailed up those great waters which were to be known as the St. Lawrence or St. Laurent, and that when the first president of France to visit Canada arrived in our country he was greeted by a great prime minister bearing the same name, St. Laurent.

It was Jacques Cartier, a Frenchman from St. Malo, who first set foot in Canada and carried the cross and the fleur-de-lis to the island of Hochelaga. It was another Frenchman, Champlain, who established the first colony in Canada and founded the city of Quebec. It was a French Jesuit priest, Marquette, who first sailed in a frail canoe through the treacherous waters which led to the great lakes and on to the Mississippi. It was French civilization which was first implanted in Canada. Since that time we have added the customs, the traditions, the language and the literature of the British, and, in more recent years, of many other countries. In 417 years we have grown from a trading post, to a colony, to a nation. The progress which we have made would not have been possible had we not been blessed with peace. Throughout our history we have never had an extensive war within our boundaries. Geography, partly, has made that possible for us. We trust that in the future the good sense and the unselfish spirit of mankind will make that possible for France.

On behalf of the members of the House of Commons of Canada I would ask you to extend greetings to the members of the national assembly of France, and to assure them that your visit has made even stronger the ties which bind Canada and France together as friendly peace-loving nations. Vive la France! Vive le Canada! Vive le Roi! Vive le Président!

Friday, April 6, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

COINAGE

MINTING OF NEW FIVE-CENT PIECE OF STEEL IN CHROMIUM FINISH

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table two copies, in English and in French, of order in council No. 1608, dated April 4, 1951, under the Emergency Powers Act, authorizing the minting of a new coin of steel in chromium finish to the value of five cents to be issued on and after July 1, 1951, as a substitute for the further issue of the pure nickel coin.

Mr. Knowles: What will it be worth?

TELECOMMUNICATION

ANNUAL REPORT OF CANADIAN OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION CORPORATION FOR 1950, AND BUDGET FOR 1951

Mr. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I wish to table copies in French and English of the report on Canada's share in the work of the United Nations pertaining to food and agriculture during the year ended March 31, 1951.

PRIVATE BILL

INDUSTRIAL LOAN AND FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon):

That the petition of "Industrial Loan and Finance Corporation" for an act to change the name of that company to "Community Finance Corporation," presented on April 4, 1951, together with the report made thereon by the clerk of petitions on April 5, 1951, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for such recommendations as may be deemed advisable.

Motion agreed to.

ABOLITION OF GOVERNOR GENERAL'S FIAT

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 192, to amend the Petition of Right Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Garson: The main purpose of the amendments to the Petition of Right Act which are proposed in this bill is to provide for the abolition of the governor general's fiat which is now required before a petition of right can be proceeded with.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT

GENERAL REVISION—AUTHORITY FOR CLASSIFYING WEIGHING AND MEASURING DEVICES, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 193, respecting weights and measures.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the present Weights and Measures Act was passed, I believe, about 1873. The purpose of this bill is to bring the measures up to date, and particularly to bring the language of the act into conformity with the language used today. It is proposed that if and when the bill is given second reading it will be sent to a committee for detailed study.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE

QUESTION AS TO APPLICATION OF RECENT SALARY INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). Perhaps in his absence his parliamentary assistant could answer. Were the recent increases in civil service salaries awarded to all civil servants? If not, can the information be given as to what individuals, groups or classifications were not given the increase, and why?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that is a question that should appear on the order paper. I do not think the Minister of Finance or his assistant could be expected to have an immediate answer for that question.

Mr. Knowles: May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that I did send notice, and an indication was given to me by the parliamentary assistant that he was prepared to answer it.

Mr. Speaker: Under the rules of the house it is a question which should appear on the order paper.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INTERNATIONAL UNION OF MINE AND SMELTER WORKERS—ORGANIZING ACTIVITIES AT YELLOWKNIFE AND PORT RADIUM

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Has he any information as to the organizing activities reputedly being carried on by the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers at Yellowknife and Port Radium?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The department and the minister have some information on the matter, yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: I can understand the minister may not wish to give that information now, but may I have a copy of it?

Mr. Gregg: I assure the hon. member that I did not intend to be discourteous. We have information on the subject, and I shall be glad to provide any information I feel is pertinent to what my hon. friend desires. It will be done early next week.

POSTAL SERVICE

INCREASE OF RATES ON CIRCULARS, PRINTED MATTER, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General. Have certain postal rates been increased, and some of them doubled? If so, why has parliament not been notified or consulted? How does this fit in with the economy program announced by the department?

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): The hon. member for Selkirk was good enough to send me notice of his question about five minutes ago.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Bryce: On a point of order, I sent it at eleven o'clock this morning.

An hon. Member: By post?

Mr. Rinfret: Certain postal rates have been increased recently and have been duly announced in the Canada Gazette. The rates on circulars and printed matter have been increased. The old rate was one cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof. The increased rate is two cents for the first two ounces, and one cent for each additional two ounces or fraction thereof. This old rate had been in existence since 1904. The purpose of the increase has to do with the third question the hon. member asked, because it is part of the economy program of the department. First of all it is to be used to pay off the deficit that is being encountered at the present time by the department, to the extent of about $2,250,000 on the printed matter alone. It also has to do with the economy program, in that with this increased rate it is the estimate of the department that the amount of printed matter sent by mail will be decreased by approximately twenty-five per cent, and to that extent the letter carriers will be relieved of the loads they have to carry at the present time.

The second increase that has been made is in connection with parcel post rates. This is a quite complicated matter, and has already been announced in the Canada Gazette. The third increase that has been made recently is in registration fees. They have been increased from 10 cents to 20 cents on the first $25 indemnity, and a relative increase over that amount. The average cost of registration in Canada at the present time is 23 cents. We were losing money on each one of those registrations in the lower denominations.

The hon. member's second question was as to why parliament had not been notified or consulted. According to section 7(e) of the Post Office Act, the Postmaster General has the discretion to fix the rates on all mailable matter except first-class mail, newspapers, magazines and the like. The reason, I imagine, for this discretion being given to the Postmaster General is that in connection with first-class mail, newspapers and magazines the postal department has a complete monopoly, whereas in connection with other matters, such as circulars and registration fees, parcel post and the like, we are in competition with other companies doing a similar business, and we have to have authority to act quickly if a condition develops that requires speedy action.

Mr. Bryce: I should like to thank the minister for his answer, and to congratulate him upon the remarkably fine job he did in five minutes.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

REQUEST FOR COST OF LIVING BONUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) or some other member of the government, notice of which I have not previously given. Considering the rapid increase in the cost of living since the last budget was presented in 1950, would the government seriously take into consideration a proposal to grant a cost of living bonus to old age pensioners, in an endeavour to restore to them the purchasing power they had a few years ago?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The government can take notice of the question, but I do not think a reply should be given at this time.

PRICE CONTROL

REFERENCE TO REPORT IN WINNIPEG "FREE PRESS" OF STATEMENT OF MR. GARSON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have sent notice of a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). In his absence I would ask for an answer from the Minister of Justice. My question arises from a recent report in the Winnipeg Free Press in which the Minister of Justice is reported to have predicted ruthless remedies to deal with inflationary prices, similar to those used in the second world war. I would ask if this means that the government is considering price controls?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the report to which the hon. member refers was a not completely successful attempt on the part of the reporter to condense a longer statement I had made, and does not fully represent my views, which I shall have no hesitation in repeating on the proper occasion during the course of debates in the house.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

REPORTED PURCHASE OF BUILDING IN LONDON, ONT., FOR USE OF INCOME TAX DIVISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Public Works can answer the question which I asked yesterday, as reported on page 1646 of Hansard?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I read the hon. member's question before coming into the house. First, the hon. member wishes to know if the government will be purchasing a building in London for the use of the income tax division. The answer is yes. On March 21 parliament approved a vote to provide for this purchase. Next the hon. member states that the city of London will lose a certain amount of taxes because of this transaction, and he asks if the government will make provision to compensate the city. The city will be treated with the same generosity as other cities in Canada are treated which have government properties valued at more than four per cent of the total assessment value of the city or town.

The hon. member then went on to make a statement which is not according to the facts. The option to purchase is for $600,000, and the $550,000 which the hon. gentleman mentioned was for the building under construction to which we requested an extension to increase the space and on which we got an option of $600,000. Then the hon. member made another statement which was not correct. The option does not expire after ten years; it expires at the end of this year.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion that question should have appeared on the order paper. However, the question was allowed to stand and for that reason I have allowed the answer. When questions of this kind are to be asked I would ask hon. members to place them on the order paper.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

MODIFICATION OF APPLICATION AS TO LAST QUARTER OF 1950 AND EXTENSION IN MODIFIED FORM TO 1951

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to modify its application with reference to the last quarter of the year 1950 and to extend the application of the act in a modified form to the year 1951.

He said: Mr. Speaker, with your permission I should like to make a brief statement.

I hold that a healthy gold industry in Canada means a healthy mining industry as a whole. The search for commercial base metals and strategic minerals can most effectively and economically be carried on with the search for gold. In other words, gold mining is the stimulus which provides encouragement to search for new mineral wealth.

Much of Canada's future growth is bound up in the development and colonization of our northern country; and gold mining is the pioneer industry in opening northern Canada for development. The gold mines give employment to about 23,000 people, in addition to employees in dependent communities directly supported by them. They give further employment to large numbers in the cities and towns across Canada where mining machinery and supplies are manufactured. Our Canadian gold production provides a supply of ready foreign exchange with no marketing problem, and Canada is known among the trading nations of the world as one of the important producers of the precious metal. Gold mining is a truly Canadian venture and Canadian people control the majority of the mines.

All these facts were no doubt in the mind of the Canadian government when the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was first enacted in 1948. Its purpose was to assist the Canadian gold mine operators in restoring normal operations and in meeting the greatly increased costs of production while facing a fixed price for the industry's product. It was under these conditions that what has been termed the "cost-aid" program was commenced for a three-year period to cover the calendar years 1948, 1949 and 1950. This "cost-aid" program has definitely assisted the mines in meeting the increased costs of production and in restoring efficiency in their operations, which efficiency had been greatly impaired by the labour shortages and material restrictions of the war years.

However, throughout the years 1948, 1949 and 1950 the cost of production of gold continued to increase, and in the fall of 1950, following representations made by the gold mining industry, and after consultations with the international monetary fund, the government decided to recommend to parliament the continuance of the "cost-aid" program for another year.

The bill which it is now proposed to introduce in this house has a double purpose. The first is to provide for additional assistance covering gold produced and sold during the last quarter of 1950, to compensate for the decreased premium on the Canadian dollar. The second and most important purpose of the bill is to extend to the calendar year 1951, on a revised basis, the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

It is expected that the "cost-aid" to be distributed to the gold mines in 1951 by virtue of the amended act will amount to something between ten and eleven million dollars.

The hope is hereby expressed that the new program of assistance will help the gold mines to meet the continuing high costs of production, and that consequently these mines will not fail the northern communities which they have been instrumental in setting up and which now depend wholly or largely upon the mines for survival.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, if I am not mistaken, this is the first bill which the minister has introduced since he attained cabinet rank. May I take advantage of this occasion to say that I am sure there is no member of the government who commands a greater measure of good will among members in all parts of the house than the minister who has just introduced the resolution.

The resolution before the house impresses us at once with its limited nature. It reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to modify its application with reference to the last quarter of the year 1950 and to extend the application of the act in a modified form to the year 1951.

One cannot read those words without being impressed by the temporary nature of this measure which is re-emphasized by the resolution. The limited scope of the legislation is foreshadowed by the resolution. Apparently we are still thinking in terms of an emergency which is to be dealt with on a session-to-session basis.

I was glad to hear the minister stress the importance of the gold mining industry to innumerable communities in various parts of Canada. The minister stated that 23,000 persons are directly engaged in the gold mining industry, and I think it is fair to state that the number of persons who indirectly derive a livelihood from the operations of the gold mines is not less than 100,000.

In the days gone by also the gold mining industry has played a vital role in maintaining the economy of Canada. Those who remember the unhappy history of depression days will not have forgotten what the health of the gold mining industry in those days meant, not only to the communities adjacent to the mines, but also in providing employment in industrial areas and markets for agricultural producers in all parts of Canada.

It seems to me that there has not been in this house the recognition of the importance of this industry that it deserved. In July, 1949, Dr. Charles Camsell, the former deputy minister of mines and resources, had this to say about the Canadian gold mining industry in a notable speech he delivered at Oxford, England. I refer to a Canadian Press dispatch of his speech reporting him as saying:

> Many of Canada's legislators do not appreciate to what extent gold has been responsible for the development of Canada.

The report continues:

> "The influence of gold on our Canadian economy has been vastly greater than mere production statistics would indicate," Camsell said in the paper.
> A casual trip through the belt extending through northern Ontario and Quebec revealed the influence of gold deposits in developing the country and making it possible for permanent industry or agriculture to "live and thrive." Canada today needed strong mining industry more than ever before, particularly for strategic reasons. "Our production in 1948 was the greatest in our history."

I point out he is speaking of our total mineral production. He went on to conclude:

> I know of nothing that will take any considerable body of population into that country—

He is speaking there of the Northwest Territories.

> —except the lure of gold or some other mineral such as uranium.

Therefore I hope that in speaking on this subject this afternoon, and drawing attention to the importance of the gold mining industry and the importance to all of Canada and to people in all walks of life in Canada of the health of that industry, we shall not hear such flippant remarks as have been made sometimes in this house about serving the interests of the Toronto stock exchange and things of that kind. Let us be honest enough and realistic enough to recognize the vital importance of the gold mining industry in Canada for all Canadians.

It seems to me that the minister might have gone further and spoken of the difficulties which confront the gold mining industry today. I think it is not unfair to describe these difficulties in terms of the plight of that industry today. The minister of mines of the province of Ontario, the Hon. Welland Gemmell, said in the legislature of Ontario on February 26 of this year, as reported in the Globe and Mail of February 27:

> Unless the federal government takes a realistic attitude toward gold, communities such as Kirkland Lake, Timmins, Red Lake and Geraldton face a serious and precarious future, mines minister Gemmell, member for Sudbury, told the legislature yesterday.
> Without going into details as to what the dominion should do the minister said, "I fervently hope the near future will bring good news from the standpoint of the yellow metal."

The minister of mines of Ontario was looking forward there to an announcement from the federal government as to legislation that was to be introduced at the present session, and I am afraid that the legislation foreshadowed by the resolution now under discussion will be received with very great disappointment.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) had accurate words to describe the plight of the gold mining industry as he found it in June of 1949 during the election campaign, because in a speech at Timmins he described conditions in that gold mining community in these words: "The grim shadow of mine shutdowns that has been hanging over many gold mining properties". That was the way he described the condition. Then he went on to indicate what the present act, as it stood on the statute book in 1948, had accomplished by way of assistance to meet the situation; but he also admitted the inadequacy of the legislation because he then foreshadowed further assistance to gold, which, as hon. members will recall, was introduced in the fall of that year at the second session of 1949. Here are his further words from his speech at Timmins:

> Many gold mines in Canada now are just staggering along because they are being squeezed between the fixed price of gold, $35 an ounce, and the high cost of production per ounce of gold recovered.

These words of the Prime Minister in June, 1949, can be just as accurately applied to conditions today. The fundamental problem confronting gold production in Canada today is, as indicated by the Prime Minister in that last quotation, that while costs of production have been advancing with very great rapidity and unhappy results, the price at which producers may sell their product is fixed. It is set by the government. It is not simply set by the government; it is actually tied down by the government through international agreement.

Rising costs have affected every mine, regardless of the stage of production or development. Mine development costs, mine production costs, have risen with startling effect. I am sure I do not need to say to this house that very often the narrowest kind of margin between the cost of production on the one hand and the sale price of the product on the other means the difference between turning ore into useless rock or vice versa, turning otherwise useless rock into what may be valuable ore. The position is just as simple as that.

In the extract I read the Prime Minister mentioned that the fixed price of gold at that time was $35 per ounce. You will remember, sir, that was the price fixed by the United States. That was an established United States price which found its way into international agreement when various nations entered into the Bretton Woods agreement. After devaluation of the Canadian dollar on September 20, 1949, the price in terms of the Canadian dollar was advanced by 10 per cent to $38.50, and some little benefit was enjoyed by the gold mines in consequence. But then you will remember that it was only a few months later that the government decided to set the gold mines back exactly where they had been, by reducing by an equivalent amount, namely, $3.50 per ounce, the maximum assistance allowed under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. Therefore in that respect the mines were put back in the position they had been in prior to devaluation.

I should like to say a word about the history of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, and I wish to be quite fair about it. The bill was introduced first in 1948, to assist the gold mines to overcome difficulties which at that time had become almost insuperable. The government was slow to act. The threatening situation confronting gold production in Canada had been laid before the government repeatedly in previous sessions. They moved at last in 1948. I think it is fair to say that the measure never promised to do more than render some assistance. It was never looked upon by the government as anything more than emergency legislation to contribute for a very limited period, because the period has always been limited by statute. We have literally been extending on a year-to-year basis the kind of limited assistance which the act offered.

The report of the administration of this act for the fiscal period ended March 31, 1950, had this to say in general terms in its opening paragraph:

> The purpose of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was to assist Canadian gold mine operators in meeting the greatly increased costs of production of gold for which, unlike all other primary mine products, there had been no compensating increase in the price. It was designed primarily to assist the high-cost or marginal mines to continue in operation over a difficult period and also to enable such mines to continue to maintain their dependent communities.

I read that, Mr. Speaker, to emphasize that the purpose of this act was not simply to assist persons who might have had the fortune or misfortune to hold gold mining stocks. It was put forward to give some limited assistance to the industry because of the great benefits that industry brings to all Canada, and particularly to enable those gold mines to continue to maintain their dependent communities.

What has been accomplished under this act? Well, the accomplishments are limited. Assistance has been given; and to the extent of that assistance the act has been helpful. I make no attempt to deny that the legislation has been helpful as far as it has gone. With all its limitations, with all its imperfections, the act has been of assistance. For instance, in the first year of operation, 111 mines received assistance. It is perhaps significant that in the following year, 1949, the number of mines assisted dropped to 95. The report for the year ended March 31, 1951, has not yet been issued, so we do not know the total number of mines assisted in 1950. The minister did not give us that information this afternoon, but it would be interesting to learn whether that downward trend has continued or has been reversed.

In terms of amounts paid out under this act the situation is not dissimilar. In 1948 the amount of assistance provided under this act, in round figures, was $10 million. In 1949, again in round figures, it was between $12 and $13 million; and today the minister indicated that in 1950 the amount of assistance had dropped to between $10 and $11 million.

At this point I think it is fair to comment that the burden imposed on the public treasury in consequence of this act has not been very great. When you consider how readily parliament has been voting large sums of money to assist others, it seems to me that an average of $11 million over a three-year period is at most a very limited amount of assistance to an industry of such great importance to the economic welfare of all Canada.

The act has had this further drawback, that its operation has been tied to a very complicated formula. In its effect it has been quite artificial. I do not care how ingeniously the draftsmen of such legislation apply their intelligence in an endeavour to work out formulae that may be fair in their general application throughout the whole industry, I do not consider it possible for legislation of this kind to be fair to all types of mines and all types of properties under development.

In fairness to this act, let us recognize that the production of gold has increased during the period of its operation. The amount of gold produced in Canada from gold mines only, not including gold produced by base metal mines, in 1948 was 3,159,934 ounces, which represented a welcome increase over the previous year. In 1949 gold production in Canada increased to 3,673,971 ounces from gold mines alone, and 4,123,518 including gold produced by base metal mines; and in 1950, according to a recent bulletin issued by the dominion bureau of statistics, Canada's gold production from all mines amounted to 4,448,396 fine ounces, an increase of eight per cent over the previous year. We will all welcome those increases. We will all acknowledge that this act has played some part in bringing them about. That is not to say, however, that the act is perfect or that parliament should simply stop with the enactment of amendments to it in such limited terms as are foreshadowed in the resolution now under debate.

Now may I say a word directly about this proposed amendment. We observe that it proposes simply to continue the present act for a limited period. The amendment is to modify the application of the act for the last quarter of 1950 and extend its application in a modified form to the year 1951. We have had very little indication of what the modification is to be; but again, like its predecessors in the past three sessions, this must be considered simply stop-gap, temporary legislation. Having regard to the very serious difficulties confronting the gold mining industry today; having regard, as we must have regard, to the sacrifices that are being imposed upon the gold mining industry by deliberate government policy, I think we can only regard this measure as disappointing and inadequate. Obviously it intends to continue all the present artificiality and uncertainty of government policy with respect to this important industry. We have seen changes made from year to year in the method of application, the extent of assistance or the basis of that assistance under this act. Today no gold mining operator in Canada knows what government policy in this respect is going to be at the conclusion of this calendar year. How is the gold mining industry to build for the future; how is it to expand, if it is to be confronted with all the uncertainties as to government policy and future assistance attendant upon legislation so temporary in character as that now before the house?

Again we are being asked to look at this problem as simply a temporary emergency. Apparently it is the idea of the government that the needs of the industry should be met on a hand-to-mouth basis. Where long-term policies on the part of the government and parliament are needed today, we are simply offered short-term, hand-to-mouth, stop-gap legislation.

Gold Mining

In considering the position of gold and the industry, we must have regard to recent international events. Probably the most striking development in connection with gold in the past year has been the reversal in the movement of gold with respect to the United States. There has been a reversal of the trend which had been in effect for years when the United States was, year by year, a big net importer of gold. Within the past year the United States has been transferred into an exporter of gold. That is apparently largely the result of the improvement in the economies and trade of some of the nations abroad with whom the United States has been trading. It is due in no small measure to the policy of the United States government in stockpiling materials that can only be purchased abroad.

Another fact of very great consequence amongst international events during the past year has been the firm position taken by the government of South Africa to protect the gold mining industry in that great country. You will remember, sir, that last May the government of South Africa announced it was no longer going to be bound to sell its gold at the price fixed by the international monetary fund, the agency established for this purpose under the Bretton Woods agreement. The statement made in the parliament of South Africa by the minister of finance, Mr. Havenga, is reported by the Associated Press, in a dispatch from Capetown dated May 5, 1950, as follows:

> South Africa has reserved the right to sell its gold at the highest price it can get in the world's free markets contrary to the wishes of the international monetary fund.
> N. C. Havenga, finance minister in a strong statement to parliament tonight, expressed the nationalist government's dissatisfaction with the board of directors of the fund. Wednesday the board rejected a South African proposal that gold producers be permitted to sell half their output in free markets at the best price obtainable above the fixed monetary price of $35 an ounce.
> The United States strongly opposed the South African proposal to the monetary fund. Havenga in parliament said the United States was the most outstanding example of countries which had conformed to monetary fund policy when it suited its convenience.

Now, sir, the South African government has indicated it is no longer going to impose upon the producers of gold in that country the sacrifices which would be exacted of them by a continuation of the fixed price of gold at $35 an ounce, U.S., under the international monetary fund. Important consequences have followed from that firm action on the part of the government of South Africa. In the International Financial News Survey, the bulletin issued by the international monetary fund on February 9, 1951, we have a summary of an article appearing in the Times of London on January 29, which in this bulletin is dealt with as follows:

> The Times reports increased activity in international free gold markets. Over the past month premium sales to Middle and Far Eastern countries have been exceptionally heavy and, . . .

May I remind you, sir, that this is London speaking.

> . . . when allowance is made for gold which goes into hoards, for gold manufactured in Europe and producing countries, or for gold used in other ways which are not easily visible, there can have been very little net accretion to monetary gold stocks. The amount of newly-mined gold for monetary use is indeed still large, since it includes some sixty per cent of the South African output and virtually the whole output of Canada, Australia, British West Africa, and Southern Rhodesia; on the other hand, the Bank of France is reported to have sold gold fairly freely at open market prices, and a few other monetary authorities have supplied the market in a more limited way. The recent revival of demand has restored the open market price to about the level to which it had risen immediately after the invasion of South Korea; it is now about $42 per ounce.
> The South African Chamber of Mines is reported to be asking for a higher premium; revenue from premium sales, which was only about £100,000 in the second quarter of 1950, rose to over £500,000 in the third quarter and then to nearly £840,000 in the last quarter. The net premium collected in the last quarter appears to have been about five per cent after allowing for handling charges, which would not be considerable. There has, however, subsequently been a further increase in the premium price, which, if maintained, could mean an addition of up to about eight per cent to the gross revenue of the South African mines.

Sir, when the Canadian gold producer—and this applies to everyone who derives benefit from the health of that great industry—sees the benefits accruing to the producers in South Africa and to the whole economy of that country from the way in which producers in that country have been afforded an opportunity of selling at least a portion of their production on the free market, thereby gaining the benefit of what is called the premium price, one may fairly ask by what rule of justice and equity the Canadian gold producer is called upon to continue to bear sacrifices and to forgo the benefits that would accrue to him if he were not precluded by government policy, and were able to dispose of his product in a free market.

It is quite apparent to me that the time has come when parliament must review and re-examine this whole matter of Canadian government policy concerning the price of gold. When we in this parliament entered into the Bretton Woods agreement by chapter 11 of the statutes of the second session of 1945, we did so with high hopes. I am afraid that in a considerable measure those hopes have been dashed in the light of subsequent experience. We made certain basic postulates in entering into that agreement. May I just remind members of one of the fundamental articles to which all signatory nations committed themselves in 1945. Here is an extract from paragraph (iv), article 1, dealing with the purpose of the international monetary fund:

> To assist in the establishment of a multilateral system of payments in respect of current transactions between members and in the elimination of foreign restrictions which hamper the growth of world trade.

Measure that idealistic statement of purpose against the sombre background of the history of international exchange in these recent years, and you have a yardstick with which to measure the extent to which the basic postulates behind our ready assumption of the benefits and burdens of that agreement have proved erroneous. We thought then we could trust Russia. We had no reason to think that Russia was going to embark on a policy of bedevilling the efforts of the freedom and peace-loving people throughout the world to establish those basic and settled conditions under which international trade and exchange, and peace in consequence of international trade, might hope to flourish. I think also that we underestimated—and this goes for all nations as well as for those of us who sat in parliament in the fall of 1945—we underestimated the extent of the economic exhaustion of Europe at that time.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: I hope it will not be long, because I am worried about my time.

Mr. Blackmore: I do not suppose the hon. member has time to elaborate in answering this question. Does he honestly believe that if Russia had accepted the stipulation of the international monetary fund, conditions would have been any different from what they are?

Mr. Fleming: That question assumes something so radically different from the course of events that I do not believe any man could do more than say he might speculate as to what the results might have been had Russia's course been different. No one can speak with certainty on that subject. My opinion may be worth very little, but I shall give it to my hon. friend for what it is worth. If Russia had come in and played the game with the other nations of the world, fairly and honestly, in a spirit of co-operation and in an attempt to build international trade and settled international relations, I believe there would have been every good reason for hoping that an agreement of this kind could be expected to succeed. I will cling to that hope, even though my friends at the time held a different view.

Mr. Low: The triumph of hope over experience.

Mr. Fleming: I am prepared, in the light of subsequent experience, to say, whether my friends were right at the time or whether they were not, that the situation today is radically changed, one might fairly say almost fundamentally changed, from the conditions that we assumed in 1945 when we readily entered into this agreement.

Mr. Blackmore: "Assumed" is right.

Mr. Fleming: Well, we are acting on assumptions all the time. I think the people of Canada acted a bit on assumption in June, 1949, for instance.

Mr. Blackmore: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: Sir, I think in addition that we underestimated at that time the place, the high importance, the almost necessary position, of gold in facilitating the trade of the world; and we certainly had no expectation at that time that trading conditions would be bedevilled and defeated by the erection of this iron curtain, by aggression and machinations on the part of the tyrants in the Kremlin.

I wish to make one or two further brief observations, sir, about the way in which this agreement has worked out. It is not unfair, I think, to say that the policy of the international monetary fund has been largely dominated by the United States. It has been influenced to a considerable extent also by policy of the government of the United Kingdom. I do not believe any one of us can think that Canadian interests have played a very important part in the shaping of policy on the part of the international monetary fund. Canada is a producer. Its net position is overwhelmingly on the production side. The United States' net position has been, with the exception of the past year, that of an importer. Great Britain has been historically an importer of gold.

Now, how can you reconcile the fundamental divergence of interests of these nations under a scheme such as this? I think one result has been, sir, to shackle a very important arm of Canadian production. Another has been pressure on certain forms of the Canadian economy, and the introduction of further measures of artificiality in a situation that we had already made artificial by national and international policy in 1945.

I believe the time has come, sir, when parliament must re-examine the whole position of gold and the price of gold. I believe Canada must ask herself, and we in this House of Commons must ask ourselves: are we interested in obtaining a better price for our product?—because we are not obtaining for it today the value of it. We are selling it below the price that it would bring us if those shackles imposed by national and international policy were struck off.

In reviewing and re-examining Canada's interest in this issue, please do not misunderstand me; I am not taking a narrow view in measuring where our interest lies. I am not saying that simply because the price of gold in the free market of the world is considerably higher than the fixed price at which we are compelled to sell to the Royal Canadian Mint or for export, that alone must determine all the details of Canadian national policy. But I think we must give due weight to those facts.

Now, there are two further factors, which are deserving of consideration. I am always conscious of the fact, sir, as I am sure all members of this house are, that in any aspect of our economic life where we are brought into close contact with the United States, we must not take a narrow view of the particular issue. We must weigh it against the benefit of those broad measures of co-operation between this country and the United States which are not only the hope of this continent. but to a very large extent underwrite the hopes of the whole world; therefore, sir, I am not proposing that we proceed in any aggressive or shortsighted manner in this respect. But I do wish to be sure that Canadian interests in a matter of this kind, closely related as we are to the United States, and suffering as we are today by reason of the supremacy of the United States' interest in the administration of the international monetary fund—I want to be sure that sacrifices are not being imposed unfairly on some particular branch of Canadian production. It seems to me the case is unanswerable that unfair sacrifices are being imposed upon the Canadian gold mining industry; and when we are importing inflation from the United States, I wonder whether it would not be justifiable on our part to try to better our position by getting a better price for this important product of ours when it is sold to the big and friendly importer to the south of us.

Why should the Canadian gold mining industry be made to pay the price—and a heavy price it is—for national and international policy, particularly when, as it seems to me, sir, we must open our eyes and see that these policies are defeating their rightful purpose and must be re-examined and revised?

The other question is this. We must take into account in all fairness the possibility of inflation in Canada in consequence of an increase in the price of gold. Now, sir, there are many who associate the idea of an increase in the general price level with an increase in the price of gold. That idea probably dates back to the early 1930's, when President Roosevelt increased the price of gold as a means of trying to counteract the strong deflationary influences at work at that time in the United States. But, sir, who can stand in this house today and contend that to permit the Canadian gold production to earn more money for Canada is going to have an inflationary effect on the Canadian economy? I say, sir, that there is no one who can argue that proposition with any confidence. I do not believe there is proof available to anyone that an increase today in the price of Canadian gold would have an inflationary effect on the level of general commodity prices in Canada. On the other hand, I can think of a great deal of benefit that would result from an increase in the price of gold we export, and the way in which the consequent results can be applied to counteract the importation of inflation into this country from the United States.

Sir, I think the direction in which we must move in Canada today is toward greater freedom in trying to enable gold to yield its fair value in the markets of the world. Bear in mind that I am not for one minute saying —and I am trying to make this abundantly clear—that we should just cut loose from the international monetary fund, or that we should ignore our commitments there, or that we should proceed without due regard to the broad question of our relations with the United States or to other aspects of the effect of such measures on our economy. But, sir, I say that the case, on balance, is overwhelming for a substantial movement at the present time in the direction of a freer market for Canadian gold. And as long as we are going to have agreements such as the international monetary fund shackling an important wing of the Canadian economy it seems to me that the duty of this parliament is clear, namely, to face courageously and honestly the limitations, the drawbacks, the weaknesses, the handicaps of the international monetary fund, and address ourselves to seeking a correction and amendment of them.

I do not think for one moment that we can any longer submit to a mere continuation of the present structure and policy of the international monetary fund. Unless there is some change in the price of gold at which we may sell our production in the markets of the world, then it seems to me that we must pound on the doors of the international monetary fund, and of those responsible for its administration. And unless there is some change in their policy, then I think this parliament must be prepared to take action.

I hope the house will not fail to recognize the importance of gold both in our economy and as the means of exchange throughout the world. Gold is still what it has been for a long time, the universally accepted medium of international exchange. It is still sought by all the nations of the world today, and not least of all by Russia herself. There have been times in recent years when the United States dollar undertook to challenge gold as the accepted medium of international exchange. Sir, I think that time is past, when we see today the way in which inflation has weakened the value of the United States dollar, and the way in which gold has been moving in the net position away from the United States.

Let me say further that I think it is high time the foreign exchange control board re-examined its holdings in its reserves. I think it is high time that due regard should be had by the board for the fact that the United States dollar has not the value it had before, either in terms of its intrinsic purchasing power or in terms of the prestige and confidence attached to it in the world. I think the time has come when the reserves of the foreign exchange control board, to a degree far greater than has been the fact hitherto, should take the form of gold and not United States dollars. I think the time has come when, on the part of those administering the foreign exchange control board in this country, there has to be a recognition of the importance of building up those reserves in the form of gold rather than in United States dollars.

If we are going to cling to any hope of re-establishing the kind of world to which we looked forward in 1945, we must have regard to the place of gold as a means of assisting the convertibility of currencies, with all the attendant benefits that has for the trade of the world, and in particular for a country like Canada which has trading relations with the two great trading blocs in the world, the sterling bloc and the dollar bloc.

Lastly, I hope the government will not deny to the house the opportunity of reviewing the whole of our national policy with respect to gold. Those who sat in the committee on banking and commerce in the fall of 1945 will never forget the importance of those hearings, and the way in which members of parliament informed themselves, with, of course, considerable assistance from Mr. Louis Rasminsky, a very distinguished Canadian economist, whom we all respect. That was five and a half years ago: conditions have changed vastly since that time. I hope an opportunity will be afforded, through the medium of a committee like our committee on banking and commerce, to review the matter in detail, and with all the evidence that is required or relevant before us, so that we may review and re-examine the whole question of international and national policy with respect to gold.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has rendered a distinct service to the people of Canada and the House of Commons in his remarks this afternoon. So far as I know this is the first time since 1945, when the Canadian parliament in a fit of complete hysteria allowed itself to be precipitated into the Bretton Woods agreement, that any member of parliament, other than Social Credit "cranks", has undertaken to call in question the validity of the Bretton Woods agreement. The hon. member has not meant to call in question the validity of that agreement; he has simply undertaken to show the house and country how the agreement just cannot possibly work to the advantage of Canada, or any other nation in the world except the United States.

I should like to draw to the attention of the house and the people of Canada the absolutely preposterous position in which the Canadian parliament now finds itself. First I would read the innocent little resolution we are now debating:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to modify its application with reference to the last quarter of the year 1950 and to extend the application of the act in a modified form to the year 1951.

I would say in a general way that if parliament does not have complete authority to pass that resolution, then it has abdicated its power to be a sovereign parliament of a sovereign nation like Canada. That must be obvious, without further argument.

Yet the minister, when introducing the resolution, used these words, if my memory serves me correctly, "that after consultation with the international monetary fund the government decided to recommend to parliament a continuance of the cost-debt program for another year."

I take it that this means that the government would hardly dare introduce this measure without the consent of the international monetary fund. Hon. members may reflect upon these facts themselves. Take those facts in the light of the observations so ably expressed this afternoon by the hon. member for Eglinton, and then meditate upon the condition of affairs in which we find ourselves. I do not propose to speak in any extended fashion in the matter this afternoon. I shall merely make this observation, based upon the remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton and of the minister, that each of these hon. gentlemen has undertaken to say that the welfare of the whole mining industry of Canada is in large measure involved with the welfare of the gold mining industry.

What does that mean? It means that without the consent of the international monetary fund this country is unable to take measures designed to benefit the mining industry, which is one of the major industries of the nation.

May I say a word or two with reference to the question I asked the hon. member for Eglinton. Perhaps it was a mean question to ask a man who was speaking on the subject to which the hon. member was then directing his remarks. But I felt it was a question that ought to be asked of a gentleman as learned as the hon. member for Eglinton, and as able as he has shown himself to be during the years of his sojourn in parliament.

One of the assumptions the house adopted was that the international monetary fund and the bank for international settlements would somehow aid in the convertibility of currency in the world. To a person adequately informed regarding the fundamental principles of international trade and the international convertibility of currency; and likewise moderately informed concerning the restrictions and regulations in the Bretton Woods agreement, the assumption that that agreement could in any way, even in the remotest degree, aid in the international convertibility of currency, is utterly preposterous.

Members of this group laid down the fundamental principles time and again in December of 1945. I challenged any man in the Dominion of Canada, inside this house or out, to point to a single flaw in the fundamental reasoning of the Social Credit group on that occasion. Every principle was absolutely sound and in accordance with the best information concerning international trade and international convertibility of currencies. In effect we laid down this principle—I am going to illustrate it by citing an experience this country has had—that it is utterly impossible to make British pounds convertible into United States dollars unless the United States are prepared to accept a sufficient amount of British goods to render the moneys of the two countries equivalent in value. It is the acceptance of goods and the selling of goods that governs the value of world currencies.

As this group indicated, and as hon. members fully know, the United States is the most powerful factor in world economy today, largely because of her tremendous population, her tremendous productive potential and the near approach she is capable of to self-sufficiency. When a nation is self-sufficient or nearly so it does not need to take in foreign goods. All it needs to be concerned with is selling its own goods. We laid down the principle time and time again that the primary concern of the United States administration in seeking to obtain general acceptance of Bretton Woods was to enable the United States to sell her goods in the world markets. That fact remains incontrovertible today.

Will anyone tell us how in the world the acceptance of Bretton Woods can contribute in the slightest degree to the convertibility of British pounds into United States dollars? Where is the stipulation in Bretton Woods which would so operate? The world has been afflicted by what I would almost call a tragic shortage of United States dollars ever since the Bretton Woods agreement was accepted, and that alone is incontrovertible evidence of the truth of what I am saying.

I should like to say a brief word regarding inflation. Yesterday the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in that jaunty way of his made a remark to the effect that this inflation was a world phenomenon. Of course it is a world phenomenon. I believe I shall ask the Minister of Finance before we finish this session to show why there is a world phenomenon of inflation and to show to what extent the Bretton Woods agreement has contributed to that world phenomenon. In fact I may ask him to show where we should be wrong in assuming that the Bretton Woods agreement is a major factor in the production of world-wide inflation.

Before I close I should like to make this general comment on the remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). He was not in the chamber when I paid him a compliment a minute or two ago.

Mr. Fleming: I was listening from behind the curtains and I appreciate the hon. member's remarks very much. I do not get many compliments.

Mr. Blackmore: I told the hon. member for Eglinton at the time of the Bretton Woods debate, in the banking and commerce committee and in the corridors of this building, that he was capable of understanding these matters as a great many members of this house apparently were not, and that therefore there rested upon him a considerable measure of responsibility in taking the position which he should take on the question of Bretton Woods. His remarks this afternoon indicate that my estimate of him was justified. All he needs to do is to go forward and keep the fundamental principle in mind that it is impossible to have convertibility of currencies unless there is a free and adequate interchange of goods and services.

The United States absolutely will not accept any more goods than she needs. Any goods that come into that country and which compete with goods produced by the people of the United States will be shut out ultimately. When she is in position to almost completely support herself, except in time of war, what conceivable reason can there be for believing that she will accept enough goods to render English pounds convertible into United States dollars?

Turning now to the Bretton Woods agreement: Can the Bretton Woods agreement, or a carload of such agreements, contribute even in the slightest degree to causing the United States to accept more British goods, or more Canadian goods, or more French goods, or more goods of any other nation? To ask the question of intelligent members, such as those now sitting before me, is to have them answer it with a thunderous "no". The measure of the efficacy of Bretton Woods in contributing to the convertibility of currencies is just completely zero. It can cause trouble to nations, as the hon. member for Eglinton has shown, in connection with the production in Canada of gold; it can interfere with trade, as it already has done, and render the situation infinitely more complex for such struggling nations as Great Britain and France and Germany; it can bring about an inflation that nobody knows what to do with. But it cannot possibly contribute in the slightest degree to the well-being of the nations of the world. That statement goes on Hansard with an open invitation to anyone who thinks he can answer it to do so. I will be right here through the remainder of the debate and right to the end of the session, if it is the Lord's will.

I would go further than the hon. member for Eglinton has gone and say that until the world abandons the Bretton Woods agreement and the international monetary fund there will be no hope of a return to normalcy. Not only must the world abandon those measures, it must abandon the other iniquitous measures which have been entered into in the spirit which actuated Bretton Woods. As the hon. member for Peace River says, that was the agreement under which we sold a large part of our sovereignty. I think every hon. member realizes that, in the light of the situation presently confronting us.

I have been struggling to repress feelings which I think I should express. Yesterday we heard from the President of France a speech which we all enjoyed. We appreciate greatly the honour that was conferred upon us as a nation, as I believe he appreciated the honour we conferred upon his nation when he spoke before us. But there were things implicit in the speech that he delivered which are absolutely contrary to the well-being of the peoples of the world. They had to do in large measure with the general ideas that brought about the misconception to which the hon. member for Eglinton referred when he read that idealistic piece of nonsense from the Bretton Woods agreement.

It is interesting to recall that we had in December 1945 during the Bretton Woods debate a body of people across the floor belonging to the Liberal party who styled themselves as the "Little Chicago" group. These members just sat there and virtually bellowed and brayed at the Social Crediters to prevent them from putting the truth before the house and the country.

Mr. Riley: Don't look at us.

Mr. Blackmore: I realize that all members over there except one are new.

Mr. Low: There has been a real change since those days.

Mr. Riley: Don't cast reflections on us.

Mr. Blackmore: There is no reflection. The simple point is that if the members of that "Little Chicago" group were not appointed by the Liberal administration to try to silence this group of thirteen standing against the remaining members of the whole house, then all I can say is their performance on that occasion constituted one of the greatest disgraces in the history of the Canadian House of Commons. They helped also to stampede the country and parliament into the adoption of several genuinely iniquitous measures.

Mr. Riley: Did they influence you?

Mr. Blackmore: Not a bit, because we knew what it was all about; and if the hon. member is in any doubt he can ask us questions as the days go by and we will satisfy him on the matter.

I think the time has come when the house should contemplate seriously withdrawing from the Bretton Woods agreement and the international monetary fund. To that end I would invite the careful study of every member of the house and every person in the country. Until we can find a device whereby we can overcome the difficulty of the shortage of United States dollars we have not begun to see the light in the world with respect to convertibility of currency.

Is this parliament of this great nation, great already and far greater to be, to be trammelled to the extent that it cannot pass a simple innocent little measure like the one before us without going and pleading for the consent of the international monetary fund? Perhaps I had better not say what I think and know about the members of that organization for fear of doing them harm when they cannot answer in their own defence.

Mr. Sinclair: Our own minister is one of the governors, and Graham Towers.

Mr. Blackmore: If our own minister is one of the governors then we had better go right to work and educate him. Mr. Ilsley, who was minister of finance during the time when this measure was actually stampeded through the house—

Mr. Low: By threat of closure.

Mr. Blackmore: —by the veiled threat of closure on the part of the prime minister, went to Toronto the next year or two years later and gave a most glowing speech of hope for the future because we had accepted the Bretton Woods agreement! Let hon. members behold what a glowing future we have had.

Mr. Hansell: He has gone to his reward.

Mr. Blackmore: There is one other thing I think I had better say something about, the effect that Russia had in refusing to enter into the Bretton Woods agreement. I asked the hon. member for Eglinton if he believed that the entrance of Russia into the Bretton Woods agreement would have assisted in any way. I know I took him at an unfair disadvantage and I did not expect him to do anything except just what he did, and he did it very well. But let me say right now that if Russia had gone into the Bretton Woods agreement it would have made matters infinitely worse because you would have had this iniquitous international monster called the international monetary fund obtruding its offensive nose into the intimate affairs of every nation on the face of the earth, and with all the backing of the whole body of nations of the world.

The minister went and asked the monetary fund if he might introduce this resolution and pass the bill, and the monetary fund graciously consented that he might, because it really could not do much else. However, if the fund had the whole world behind it, including Russia, Australia and New Zealand, one can imagine the way it would be cracking the whip and pointing to the line that Canada would toe not only with respect to developing our gold mines but every other kind of mining in Canada, and every other kind of industry in this country. Let not hon. members or anybody else lay any blame on Russia, Australia or New Zealand for the catastrophic failure of the Bretton Woods agreement. It was foredoomed to failure because it was founded on worse than quicksand if it was proposed to be a measure to improve the welfare of the world.

I am not going to go into detail on the general thesis that Russia's entrance would have made matters much worse instead of better because I think it would probably be a little too far afield from the measure. However, I say once more to members of the house and the people of the country: Beware of Bretton Woods. Beware of the international monetary fund. The sooner these things are taken down from their high position, put away in mothballs and ultimately buried and forgotten, the better it will be for everyone in the world.

Mr. J. A. Bradette (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed to my main remarks, which are going to be fairly brief, may I say that I believe it is my duty and obligation to say a few words on this very important resolution, the primary reason being that for twenty-three years of my public life I have had the great honour of representing one of the greatest gold-producing regions of our country, the Porcupine section. In that occupation I have always pursued a middle course between producers and labour. I have always had the respect and attention of both parties, and from that experience I have an idea of the importance of gold mining to the national economy of Canada. I want to compliment the present Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) on the resolution, and also on his appointment as minister. I know he will follow in the footsteps of his predecessors of the Conservative and Liberal parties. Whoever they were they always made a point to come on the ground and study the situation that existed in the gold mining sections of Canada.

A few weeks prior to the appointment of the present minister we had the pleasure and the good fortune of having a visit from the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), who at that time also held the mines portfolio, to the northern section of the province of Quebec and the Kirkland Lake and Porcupine regions. As had been done on other occasions by previous ministers, he showed by the speeches he made, and at the meetings he had with management and labour and the public, that he was fully familiar with the existing situation and the dire necessity of maintaining some assistance so far as the gold mining industry of Canada was concerned. I listened very attentively to the speech of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). As usual he was eloquent; he presented some good arguments; I know he was sincere, and I compliment him on his remarks. I am not going to try to follow the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), who spoke almost entirely on the Bretton Woods agreement. All I want to say at this point is that the agreement did give us a yardstick based on gold standard; that is why gold is mentioned in the agreement.

I do not entirely agree with the statement of the hon. member for Eglinton that the present government has done almost everything possible to be disagreeable to the gold mining industry. After all, the situation confronting the gold mining industry in Canada was not created by the government. I remember vividly when Mr. Ilsley, then minister of finance, announced to parliament and the country that the Canadian dollar would be placed on a par with the United States dollar. I knew the gold mining industry of this country was going to be hit. That very night, while I was still listening to the minister of finance, I received phone calls from some people vitally interested in that industry. I told them there was no doubt they were going to be hit, but that personally I felt that in bringing the Canadian dollar to parity with the United States dollar the government was doing a good thing for the country as a whole and that some remedies would be found. I believe I was right in what I said at that time, and the Canadian people have agreed with me. That evening I also received three telephone calls from high officials of large newsprint and sulphite industries in my constituency, asking what was going to happen to them. I told them not to worry, because the prices of newsprint and sulphite were flexible and could go up or down as required, following world prices. I was much more worried about the gold mining industry, in which the price was standardized and is still standardized at $35 an ounce, than I was worried about the newsprint industry. As it has turned out I was absolutely right. We all know what happened to newsprint, pulp, sulphite, lumber and almost everything else. Lumber, for example, has gone up from 200 to 400 per cent since those days.

The Canadian parliament, and more particularly those hon. members in whose ridings gold mining was a very important factor, knew the situation was serious. I remember that my dear colleague from Timiskaming spoke to me the same night, saying, "Joe, what are we going to do?" I replied that there was only one thing to do; we would go back to our respective constituencies and tell them the exact situation. They were reasonable people; they were good Canadians, and they would understand the situation. If it was a good thing for Canada as a whole to bring the Canadian dollar to parity I was sure our people would accept it, though it might seriously affect the gold mining industry. That is what we did. Within two weeks we visited our section of the country and explained the situation. Our people understood, though naturally they expected that the matter would receive the attention it deserved from the federal treasury, and to a large degree these hopes have been fulfilled. I agree with the hon. member for Eglinton that we should not necessarily be completely satisfied with this legislation. We want more. We are something like the western farmers, the eastern industrialists and all the others; the more we get the better we are pleased, though at the same time we are very practical in our requests.

I believe this is a good measure. The hon. member for Eglinton asked for permanent legislation but I must say that at the present time it is absolutely impossible to have permanent legislation as far as gold production is concerned. The hon. member made another statement with which I do not agree when he said that government officials and perhaps other people in Canada thought that if we increased the price of gold here it would have an inflationary effect. I have never heard one Canadian express the opinion that a higher price for gold would be inflationary. That statement has always come from the United States.

Mr. Fleming: If the hon. member will permit me, I do not think he quite followed what I said. I was dealing with a possible argument, and I said I did not think anyone could establish the proposition that an increase in the price at which Canadian gold might be sold abroad would be inflationary on the Canadian market.

Mr. Bradette: I am glad to accept that statement, because I do not know of any Canadian who would argue that an increase in the price of gold in Canada would be inflationary. Three years ago I visited Washington where I had some discussion and argument with some high officials of the government. They told us very definitely that it was impossible for the United States to increase the price of gold. At the time we thought we might have a chance to get some $10 to $15 more an ounce. I argued until I was blue in the face trying to show them that an increase in the price could not possibly be inflationary. I tried to point out that the United States was the greatest holder of gold bullion in the world, and that if the price was increased by their own volition it would only be beneficial to that great country. However, that feeling still prevails among the higher officials of the United States, and I believe it is one of the things on which the president is absolutely convinced.

Now I am going to say a few words about the Bretton Woods agreement, because in several places it mentions the necessity for at least a 25 per cent gold backing for that fund. I do not entirely agree with the opinion of the hon. member for Lethbridge. In my opinion the Bretton Woods agreement was a wonderful thing, not only for Canada, but for the whole of the civilized world. When that agreement was drawn up mentioning gold it showed that there was a reason for that metal; it showed there was a need for such a yardstick for our own monetary system and that of practically every other country. That is the first point in favour of gold production. Then there is a demand for gold by artists and craftsmen, in dentistry, and for many other things for which people would gladly buy gold if it were available. For instance, I believe that if tomorrow our mint should issue say $50 million in $5 and $10 gold pieces, they would be distributed within two or three weeks at the most. People want something tangible in their monetary system which they feel they do not have at the present time. They are right, of course, in that feeling, but I am just giving the opinion of the people in my own constituency. Only last evening at the reception at the French embassy I was told by a Frenchman from North Africa that practically the only currency which was accepted during the war in North Africa, Spanish Morocco, Sicily and southern Italy was the $5 and $10 gold pieces carrying the United States eagle. He told me, and I believe it to be true, that those gold pieces had saved the lives of hundreds, yes thousands of young Americans, Canadians and allied troops.

So there is a meaning for gold in our monetary system; and if there is a meaning and acceptance of it there is no reason why it should not be dealt with at least to some extent as other mining like base metals and other production is dealt with. We all know what has happened to steel, copper, lead, zinc and all the other metals. Mind you, gold is one of the most difficult metals to extract from the entrails of the earth. There is no placer gold in northern Ontario. At the present time there is only a little placer gold in Yukon and the Northwest Territories. There is no placer gold in northern Quebec or the Kirkland Lake section. It comes from solid rock, and many of the mines are operating today only by the skin of their teeth. The Hollinger mine, for instance, has always been working some very low grade ore, on which they pay very small dividends indeed. It is only because of the ingenuity of the men running these mines, their good management and the fine miners working in them that they have been able to keep in operation. What has happened to the base metals? What has happened even to silver? What has happened to cobalt and to aluminum?

The prices of those products have increased by twenty per cent, forty per cent, sixty per cent and in some cases by three hundred per cent. Gold production has remained absolutely stationary. This is a situation which cannot be tolerated much longer because gold production looms large in our national economy, as the member for Eglinton said so well a few moments ago. It has its beneficial effect in all streams of our Canadian life. It affects, beneficially, the cities of Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, regardless of what the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) states. In our section we buy a lot of lumber from the hon. member's province, and we pay a great deal more for it than we used to pay. We are not complaining about that. The hon. member ought to realize what gold has meant to all sections of Canada, even the Yukon Territory, in the past, what it may mean in the future.

I have at least established this argument that gold is a metal which is not only being used as the yardstick for the monetary systems of most of the nations of the world, but it is a metal that the people generally throughout the world will accept, whether it be minted or in any other form. I recall that my grandfather had one of those heavy gold chains. I believe it was almost pure gold, twenty-four carat. It was an heirloom and he cherished it. If you try to buy one of those gold chains today, you will not be able to get it. Only a few days ago I was in one of the large jewelry shops in Ottawa. I was told by a responsible man in that shop that if they were allowed to buy gold and use it as they liked in jewelry they would buy hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of gold. There is a reason for gold; there is a necessity for gold; there is a demand for gold. If there is a demand, it should follow the trend of other metals.

[Mr. Bradette.]

If there is no necessity for that yardstick in our monetary system, if the people do not request it, let us close the mines and forget about it. Then, you will have an immediate reaction because gold will always be a metal that not only carries glamour but has general acceptability. To illustrate to the Canadian people what it is worth in international transactions, I shall read a few sections of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act. Article IV, par values of currencies, section 8 dealing with maintenance of gold value of the fund's assets, reads:

> The gold value of the fund's assets shall be maintained notwithstanding changes in the par or foreign exchange value of the currency of any member.

There, you see the thread of my argument. I am not speaking as a theorist because I participated in the discussion. A member of the Social Credit party was in attendance, and when that paragraph was mentioned it was agreed to by the member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). I always listen to him with attention because he is well versed in the monetary systems, not only of Canada but of the world. Then, subsection (b) reads:

> Whenever the par value of a member's currency is reduced, or the foreign exchange value of a member's currency has, in the opinion of the fund, depreciated to a significant extent within that member's territories, the member shall pay to the fund within a reasonable time an amount of its own currency equal to the reduction in the gold value of its currency held by the fund.

Again there is mention of gold there. It never disappears from that act.

Subsection (c) reads:

> Whenever the par value of a member's currency is increased, the fund shall return to such member within a reasonable time an amount in its currency equal to the increase in the gold value of its currency held by the fund.

I shall not read at length, but I should like to cite one other section to show how important gold is considered. Article V, transactions with the fund, section 6, page 9 of the act reads:

> Any member desiring to obtain, directly or indirectly, the currency of another member for gold shall, provided that it can do so with equal advantage, acquire it by the sale of gold to the fund.

Subsection (b) reads:

> Nothing in this section shall be deemed to preclude any member from selling in any market gold newly produced from mines located within its territories.

Now, the terms of this subsection might seem to be ambiguous, but at the same time there is a good reason for it. This is not the time or place to discuss the reasons. I believe that these sections will prove to parliament that there is a necessity for maintaining the solidarity of something so basic so far as the Bretton Woods fund is concerned, regardless of what some members say on that score. I agree with the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) when he says that in the world of today gold should at least be twenty-five per cent of the currency used. There is no reason in the world why we should be denied a good price for gold because of this act. We are in a very difficult position so far as gold is concerned. I am no prophet, but I believe that if gold mining played as important a part in the economy of the United States as it does in Canada, the price of gold would have been increased quite a few years ago. South Africa and Canada are to a large extent dependent on gold and the largest producers, excluding Russia—we have no access there at the present time, although they have found it possible to unload a very large amount in recent years on the money markets of the world.

It should be within the orbit of the government, and within the power of this parliament, to tell the Bretton Woods management that it is unfair to Canada so far as the price of gold is concerned to have it pegged at the present price. I am not going to argue that point at any greater length. I believe I have shown parliament the necessity of getting a good price for our gold. I do not like subsidies. I believe I was interrupted by a C.C.F. member a year or two ago when I said I have always been against subsidies. What else can one do under circumstances of this nature? You are dealing with a metal which is, in certain circumstances, a commodity. It is used as the yardstick for the monetary systems of the world, but the price of gold has remained stationary, it has remained pegged. What would the western farmers say today if the price of wheat were the same as during the depression years? What would the lumber operators say if the price were the same as it was sixteen years ago? I would be the first one to get on my feet, under those circumstances, and speak in favour of the lumber industry and the farmers. The gold mining section of Canada is not prejudiced; we always take a national viewpoint. When I was home during the Easter recess I heard no criticism of the bonus that was paid to the western farmers. In fact, some said that we should have given them a little more.

I am making this plea because I know this situation. No one wants to see fine centres of population like Timmins closed up. I know that a large number of members have visited that section of the country. No one wants to see centres like Schumacher and South Porcupine closed and many towns in northern Quebec. The gold mining industry has established them and has established schools, good hospitals, and all the up-to-date necessary utility services. These centres have a fine, healthy, prosperous population—not so prosperous today, but it has been, and hopes to be again.

Members may recall a few years ago there was a certain amount of colonization attempted in northern Quebec. When I was a young man going to school around 1900, I recall when the Canadian Pacific was built to North Bay. At that time it was thought that it was the extreme limit at which white people could live, according to the belief at that time. Today we are living four hundred miles from North Bay. In Hearst alone we have hundreds of people establishing themselves from year to year. You go into northern Quebec and you will find one of the finest colonization schemes. And how was it made possible? It was made possible not only because of the land and the forest, but because of the mines, copper and gold. No one wants to see that industry closed down. I know of the speeches that have been made here by the member for Lethbridge. Today the hon. member never said a word against gold, and I give him credit for that. He speaks as a Canadian. The leader of the party has been in our section, and he knows what a great factor gold mining is in our national economy. I also want to pay my compliments to the hon. member for Eglinton. I know that in his criticism he did not want to be unfair. He wanted to be constructive, because he also realizes the great importance that the gold mining industry is to Canada as a whole, and no one would want anything to happen to it. It is possible of solution. I do not believe in the open market.

No matter what we say, it is not only Bretton Woods that will stop us from selling on the open market. We must remember this. At the present time we may say that the United States is unfair to us; but when they increased the price of gold from $25 an ounce to $35 an ounce it was a marvellous thing for Canada. Every ounce of gold production was sent to the United States and paid for with United States dollars that we always needed. The same principle applies just as forcibly today. Every ounce of gold that is produced in Canada today finds its way to the United States, and there it helps us to balance Canadian dollars with United States dollars. Those are facts which we cannot forget in this country. To me it seems—I may be wrong—that you cannot bootleg against the United States treasury.

We hear a lot of talk about South Africa selling their gold. I have several articles saying that in some places they get $62 an ounce for it. I think it is said that they get $62 an ounce in Calcutta, and at Hong Kong they get as much as $43.75 an ounce, and that in some sections of Europe they are getting $42.75 an ounce, and at other places they get $40 an ounce. But is that a steady market? Is that a permanent market? What kind of money will you receive in payment for that gold bullion, and who will do the collecting?

If we had an open market for gold I would not want the government to assume the role of collector. They have enough to collect at the present time. Who would try to collect for that gold? All these are things that we must be very careful of when we mention an increased price for gold.

We do not kowtow to the United States but it is fortunate for us to be their neighbour. How fortunate it is for Canada to have as a neighbour that great big friendly nation to the south of us. They have their faults, the same as we have. I have no doubt in my mind that when we present our case logically and justly we shall have as always a good listening ear and they will listen to what we have to say. I have no doubt they are beginning to realize at the present time—I think it may come in the very near future—that the price of gold must of necessity be increased. But until that is performed by the United States treasury then it is the duty of parliament to pass some legislation that will allow that fine industry to survive. I use the word "survive" deliberately, because anyone with any business acumen will readily understand the precarious position that that industry finds itself in at the present time when all metal production and all other production, whether of the farm, of the soil or of the forest, has increased in price, and we are in agreement with it, while the price of gold has been stabilized. The thing of necessity must receive the attention of the government on that score alone.

I come again to the Bretton Woods agreement, and I agree with the hon. member for Eglinton, although I know that as a member of the United Nations and as a signatory to the Bretton Woods agreement we must give up in some instances some of our national sovereignty. But I do not believe it was ever meant that sovereignty would be conducive to this, that this agreement would compel the gold producers of Canada to accept an arbitrary price at the dictation of the Bretton Woods agreement.

Again I repeat, if an increase in gold is needed under that monetary fund, then gold, being a metal, of necessity must follow the prices, or the trends of other metals. If it were a thing that you could find by the pocketful in some creek or a thing of that kind it would be different. No doubt the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) will speak after me and will give the house some statistics as to the great efforts the gold mining industry this country has put forth, the inventiveness and the genius that they have employed to survive. We sometimes hear that we have some rich gold mines. There are some very high-grade gold mines in Canada. We have one or two of them in the Timmins section, like McIntyre, and there are one or two in the Kirkland Lake section. None of them is in the Quebec section, and none in the northwestern section of northern Ontario. The same applies to the Northwest Territories and to Canada as a whole. There is no bonanza anywhere so far as gold is concerned. They are able to exploit those mines now by ingenuity, by modern inventiveness, and by doing all that they possibly can they have been able to survive, hoping that they will have a better day, hoping that some day in the not too far distant future the nations will realize, the United States and no doubt the Bretton Woods agreement will realize, that if they want to maintain the fund as sound as they wish it to be they will have to increase the price of gold.

I should like some of the hon. members to visit some of the newer mines in northern Quebec, for instance, where they will see much machinery on the second floor of the buildings. They will hear its continual buzzing, purring and whirring, you may say. They will see those tremendous and great machines crushing enormous amounts of solid rock. They will ask themselves: Where is the manpower? They may see one, two, three men managing one whole floor. These mines have been able to survive because they have kept up to date; otherwise, they would have been buried under their own weight two or three years ago.

I have an appeal to make at the present time first of all to the national treasury, asking them to use all their influence to assist the gold mines, because the yardstick of gold must of necessity be maintained, and so that the Bretton Woods agreement will not have the right to dictate to our country what the price of gold should be.

Personally, I do not think that even in the United States an increase in the price of gold would be inflationary because my information is that the gold bullion that the United States had five, six or seven years ago is almost depleted at the present time, and there is no doubt also that they will continue to buy it owing to the necessity and the urgency of maintaining their supply.

Some people may ask, why does the Canadian government not buy gold at $35 or $40 or more an ounce and issue their own currency. I believed, and I still believe it, when Mr. Ilsley announced in the House of Commons that the Canadian dollar would be placed on a parity with the United States dollar, that the Canadian dollar was the belle of the ball; it was the soundest money in the world. Whether it is possible for the government to do that, I leave the question with the treasury benches. It has been possible for the United States during the last twenty or twenty-five years to buy all the gold bullion in the world and pay for it with paper money. I want hon. members to realize there is a small margin so far as Canadian gold production is concerned between the selling price and the cost price. There is a very small profit. The profits have never been very high; and if it was possible for the United States treasury to pay for the gold—because they are good businessmen; there are too many hard-headed businessmen there not to realize the full value of gold—they did that for many years at the cost of billions of dollars in the United States money. If they were able to do that perhaps it may be possible in the meantime for the Canadian treasury to try and make an experiment in buying gold at, we will say, $5 or $10 more an ounce, because we must experiment and try new solutions. As the hon. member for Eglinton said a few moments ago, the measure we have before us is filling a gap. It is not a permanent solution.

I know in my section, and I know that every member of parliament who is familiar with gold production realizes this, we hope against hope that next week or next month, or next year or two years from now we will hear that the United States treasury is paying $40 or $45 an ounce. If that happens immediately you will see the northern sections of Canada flourishing because it will bring other mining activities. They are not only developing that industry in the search for gold. In their search the fine prospectors of Canada have found not only gold, they have found copper, and other metals. The Rouyn-Noranda mining industry in northern Quebec was found by gold prospectors. They could hardly believe their eyes when they saw these great formations of copper—almost solid copper. In those days the sale of copper was so low that they built up great dumps of it. But we know what happened to copper in the last six or seven years, and we know what the copper industry has meant to the whole of Canada.

We would hope that within a reasonable period of time the price of gold might come into its own. We do not want an increase of 300 or 400 or even 100 per cent. We want only a reasonable increase in the price of gold. If that is done we will see those northern sections booming and coming into full fruition; there is no doubt about it. That will help every section of Canada. It will help the farmers in the west, the industrialists in the east, the lumber producers and industrialists in British Columbia. It will result in prosperity for all of Canada.

Let me again compliment those who have preceded me in the debate. There has been no acrimony. We all realize the seriousness of the situation in an industry which plays such a great role in the national economy of Canada.

Concluding my remarks, let me compliment again the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys as well as the Canadian government and the Canadian parliament upon their open-mindedness so far as the gold-mining country is concerned. And if at the moment I speak on a matter of this kind, it is not because I have any personal interest. I am not a stockholder; but I have been in my constituency for the last forty-five years, and I realize the great part the gold-mining industry is playing in our Canadian life, and the great role it will be called upon to play in the future.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the subject before us this afternoon has been discussed on a basis which is the proper one upon which a debate like this should proceed, namely the interest of the nation. I should like to be able to emulate those who have preceded me in the knowledge they have displayed of the international issues concerned, but even though I may be unable to do that I hope I shall be able to emulate them in the high plane on which they placed their remarks, and in keeping the debate free from acrimony.

Before coming to the particular points I wish to make this afternoon I should like to associate myself to the full with what was said by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) regarding the over-all view which should be taken respecting the position of the gold-mining industry in Canada, and particularly I would associate myself with that portion of his remarks in which he said he felt the time had come when we could no longer treat the gold-mining industry on a hand-to-mouth basis, but that its position in the national economy demands that its problems be regarded and dealt with on a long-term basis.

I am not going to enter into the controversy referred to this afternoon as to whether an increase in the price of gold would mean inflation or whether it would help in the restoration of convertibility of currencies and therefore in the restoration of international trade in the world. I think, on balance, the probabilities are that the restoration of a free market for gold would do more to help than to hinder the free interchange of goods and the convertibility of currency. On balance, the evidence indicates also that a free market for gold or an increased price for gold would have more of a deflationary than an inflationary tendency.

But those are only opinions. I do not put them forward as expert opinions, because I do not regard myself as qualified to enter fully into those discussions, nor do I propose to pursue my remarks along those lines at greater length. However, I do think it is fair and also important to say that the policy suggested—and only suggested—by the hon. member for Eglinton, namely, a move in the direction of a free market for gold, which is a policy of which I should like to see further consideration, would have the effect of solving permanently the problem of the gold-mining industry. It is to a permanent solution that, in my view, we must direct our minds. And it is particularly because I believe that the increasing of the price of gold or, if it should be found possible, the granting of a free market for gold, would provide a permanent solution of the problems of the gold-mining industry, that I support the investigation and the consideration of that question, which the hon. member urged the government should give at this time.

The position of the gold-mining industry was recognized by the minister this afternoon when he said that it was the search for gold which in large measure had resulted in the development of the great mining industry, covering many metals other than gold, which now occupies such an important place in the economy of our country.

Not only should the problem be approached from the point of view of the position of the gold-mining industry, but it is important to look at the position of the men who work in the mines. I do not approve of a policy of pleading special cases for special industries, because to make a special case of one industry or another generally creates more complications than it does benefits. The old adage is still true, that hard cases make bad law. But in respect of most industries—and I would not confine it to industries alone, but perhaps should include agriculture and every other type of occupation—in a normal and free economy it can be argued with justification that those engaged in any particular pursuit take their own chances. No one forces them into a certain line of endeavour, and if they wish to go into it then, other things being equal, they must stand or fall by their decision and are not entitled constantly to come forward asking for special considerations. But the gold-mining industry is one the actions and markets of which are not free, but which are closely circumscribed by governmental and international policy, which has set a definite price limit on the end product of those mines.

Gold is the only commodity which has not been decontrolled following the war. Never since the introduction of an official price for gold in recent years has that price been set free. True, it has been subject to adjustment; but the price of gold has never been decontrolled and it is the only commodity I can think of which has not at one time or another, following the end of the war in 1945, been decontrolled. So that the gold-mining industry is a special case. It is a case where the end product is controlled, but where all the articles entering into the cost of production are decontrolled. This industry is accordingly entitled to special consideration by the government and by parliament in virtue of its special position as a result of government policy. Whether that government policy be part of international policy or not, the result in so far as the gold mines of this country are concerned is the same.

We have an unusual situation here in that the men who are engaged in the industry, the men who are working in the mines, are asking for a higher price for the product of their industry. It is not very often that we find organized labour making a request for higher prices. Organized labour in the gold mines—as every other Canadian with average common sense must do—realizes that if the workers are to continue to receive a decent wage, a wage which compares with the wages in other industries not subject to this control, they must support the request that an adequate return to the industry in which they work be made possible so that their wages can be maintained at an adequate level and can compare favourably with the wages paid in other industry, particularly in other parts of the mining industry. We are therefore now in receipt of requests from the industry itself, from mining associations and from the men who work in the mines, through their unions, for a new policy with respect to gold.

I do not believe that the resolution stage on the bill is the time to enter into a discussion of the details of that policy. That might better be done when we are in committee on the resolution or perhaps best of all when we have the bill before us. But I am justified in laying these considerations before the minister at this time by the fact that I have received a number of requests that the policy, in so far as it has been revealed through press releases, with respect to gold mining assistance, requires alteration if it is to meet the needs of the industry.

I think our best chance of getting an alteration in the policy is on the resolution stage before the bill is actually introduced. It is only from that aspect that I shall refer to the type of policy which it is suggested will solve the problem of the gold mining industry. It is not necessary for me to enter into details because these have already been adequately covered by the remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). There are two alternatives that might be adopted in an effort to solve this problem, but one or other must be adopted in the interests of survival of the industry.

The first is a free market for gold. I believe that on balance the evidence which is before the house indicates that a free market for gold would have beneficial effects on international trade and the convertibility of currency. I realize, as do hon. members who have spoken, that there are many difficulties in the way of a free market for gold. Most of those difficulties revolve around the Bretton Woods agreement. But I believe that those difficulties can be faced, and if grasped can be dealt with and resolved satisfactorily. That is one possible solution to the problem of the gold mining industry.

But if that course is not adopted, then I believe that some further measures will be necessary beyond what are now contemplated by the government in the bill to be based on this resolution. A measure of further assistance will be necessary to enable the gold mines to continue to operate. I rest the justification for further assistance on the minister's own words in which he described the importance of the gold mining industry and the fact that the plight of this great industry has arisen as a result of governmental and international policy and not because of any action or lack of action by the industry itself.

In my constituency as it is now constituted is located the largest gold mine in British Columbia, the Bralorne mine, and also the Pioneer mine, another large operation. Those are the only two major producers in the constituency, but in the Bridge river valley in which they lie are a number of other mines. Some of these mines are virtually abandoned, but others are only temporarily closed and I understand would resume operations if the position of the industry were resolved favourably. There is thus a large gold mining industry, both actual and potential, in the constituency which I represent.

The mine unions, particularly the one at Bralorne, have made a number of requests and representations which I feel I should lay before the minister, asking that further assistance be given to the industry. They support the view that if it is not possible to resolve this problem by a free market for gold, then there should be a measure of assistance over and above what is now contemplated. I can assure you that the gold mining industry in British Columbia faces an acute problem and it is doubtful if it will be able to continue operations without a further measure of assistance.

The men who work in the mines are vitally affected by the continuance of operations. Their families and communities are at stake and they have asked that their requests be laid before the government. There has just come to my notice today a memorandum from the Mining Association of British Columbia with a covering letter dated April 2. I do not know whether the minister has seen this. They produce figures which seem to be accurate—there is a detailed tabulation attached to the memorandum—and which show that from the best reports available the program which the government intends to embody in the bill about to be presented will make less assistance available to the British Columbia gold mines than has been available in the past.

From the tabulation they present here it appears that the actual assistance received by the six leading mines in British Columbia under the gold mining assistance act during 1949 amounted to $907,000. It is estimated that under what is understood to be the proposed formula the assistance in 1951 will amount to $594,100, or a decrease of $313,300 in the assistance which these mines will receive. Then they go on to say as follows:

> Because of wage increases granted during the past two years as well as substantial increases in the cost of supplies, equipment, and services, it is quite evident that the gold mines in British Columbia would, under the proposed new assistance formula, be much worse off during the ensuing year than at any time since emergency gold mining assistance was granted. Not only are costs higher for wages and supplies. The gold mines are subjected to an increasing disadvantage in competition for labour because of the unavoidable and growing discrepancy in wage rates. Competing sections of the mining industry are paying from $1.50 to $2.75 per day more for labour than the gold mines. Under these circumstances it is apparent that the gold mines in British Columbia will not be able to maintain production during 1951 at even the rate achieved during 1950, and there will be a consequent further reduction in assistance received.

Then in conclusion they urge that:

. . . fullest consideration be given to this memorandum, and that the necessary steps be taken to provide for an immediate reconsideration of the proposed assistance formula.

I should say there that the reference to the position of the men who work in the mines and the wage rates paid in the gold mines of British Columbia is fully supported by the representations I have received from the Bralorne mine local concerning the position in which they find themselves not only with respect to meeting their own costs of living but particularly in comparison with wage rates received in other parts of the mining industry in the province and in the rest of Canada. I believe there are some 6,000 actual workers engaged in the gold mining industry throughout the province at the present time. The house will realize that 6,000 men actually working in the mines means a good many more than that directly concerned as the families of these men. There are probably 18,000 persons, as a very rough estimate, in families directly dependent on employment in the gold mines. In addition of course there are the communities and service industries which have grown up and which are dependent themselves on the maintenance of these mines in prosperous and active condition. I mention that merely to emphasize the importance of this problem to the province of British Columbia.

In amplification and verification of that fact I should like to lay before the house the text of a resolution passed by the legislature of British Columbia yesterday dealing with the question of assistance to the gold mining industry. The legislature of British Columbia unanimously passed the following resolution:

Whereas the restricted price of gold is making it difficult for the gold mining industry of British Columbia to continue in operation, and whereas the gold mining industry in this province employs about 6,000 men who are located in such places that other employment is not available and on the continued employment of whom the existence of whole communities depends, and whereas the skill and experience of these men do not in many cases qualify them to find employment in defence industries so that a shut-down in the gold mines would result in much unemployment and hardship; therefore be it resolved that this house urge upon the dominion government the pressing necessity of taking such steps as may be requisite to ensure a price of gold which would keep the gold mines of the province in continuous operation.

That would verify, Mr. Speaker, if such verification be necessary, what I have said. I am quite certain that my colleagues from British Columbia will bear me out as to the importance of the problem to the economy of the province. The fact that the legislature of the province took the time, when they are engaged—as members who read the press well know—in other very controversial issues, to pass a special resolution which received the unanimous support of all members of that house, indicates clearly to this house, the government and the minister concerned, the vital importance of the problem to our province.

Therefore on the basis of the representations received from the mine workers unions, the mining association, the communities affected, and lastly from the legislature of the province of British Columbia, I would urge that even before the proposed bill is introduced the government's program and proposed solution for this problem should be re-examined in the light of these submissions.

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, this is certainly a happy day for the gold mining industry because it has received praise from all sides of the house. I do not wish to impose on hon. members, and it is not my intention to upset the work of the house by taking too much time. However, I feel it is my duty to say a few words on the resolution before us this afternoon. I wish to congratulate the minister on his appointment to the cabinet and on the very able manner in which he explained the resolution before us and which is presented to parliament for the purpose of extending the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. I also wish at this point to congratulate the government on what it has done for the industry in the past, and on its desire to further that assistance during the present year.

Representations have been made to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and to other cabinet ministers by a delegation from the Canadian Metal Mining Association representing the industry, and also by another delegation representing the communities of northwestern Ontario and northwestern Quebec. These representations related to the difficulties encountered by the gold mines which have to face a steady rise in the cost of production and a fixed price for their product. These representations were well received by the government and culminated in a statement by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) not very long ago, and in the present resolution which is sponsored today by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham).

The minister has given many reasons why the government feels not only justified but obligated to assist the industry further. The very beginning of the minister's statement is the key to the whole situation. It is one of the many arguments in favour of such steps as those being taken in order to temporarily extend assistance to an industry which has meant so much to this country in the past, and on which Canada depends for opening up new areas and for bringing to light new mineral resources of all kinds.

I like to stress that point, because gold has always been an inducement to prospecting activities, as it still is today. All through history we find that the precious metal has been the inducement that brought most of the explorers. If we go back to the days of the discovery of America we learn of the first Canadian mining syndicate which was organized in 1497, a long time ago. The promoters of that syndicate were Henry VII of England and a sea captain named John Cabot. In forming this syndicate I think the king had the advantage, for it was understood that Cabot was to pay the cost of the exploration while the king was to retain an interest of 20 per cent. He commissioned Cabot to undertake a voyage of discovery in order to find gold. They were optimistic; they thought they would find gold on the eastern coast of Asia, which they expected to reach. In June, 1497, Cabot landed in Newfoundland. He did not find gold, but he noted that the natives wore copper earrings, and on his return to England reported that while he had not found gold he had found evidence of an abundance of copper. The king was quite disappointed, but bestowed upon Cabot the title of admiral just the same and made him the princely gift of £10. We read that in the little booklet on Newfoundland we received recently.

In 1654 Louis XIV granted a concession to Nicholas Denys to mine gold, silver and copper on Cape Breton island. Again they were disappointed and found no gold, but they found the famous coal mines of Nova Scotia. Just here I might interject that the first coal mined in Canada was mined in Nova Scotia. As we go through history we see that the lure of gold and adventure led to the discovery of the iron deposits of Baie St. Paul and those of the St. Maurice valley in the province of Quebec. In the early days of America other syndicates were organized. I am afraid some of them would not have qualified under the present regulations of the securities and exchange commission in the United States, or the labour code. Among them were the Frobisher and the Cortereal ventures. I am not going to tell you about those; but in spite of the limited success attained at the time it cannot be denied that the search for gold has brought America to what it is today.

Since then history has repeated itself many times. In British Columbia the search for gold led to the discovery of the biggest lead and zinc mine in the country, the Sullivan mine. In Ontario it was responsible for the discovery of the very important nickel and copper deposits at Sudbury. In Manitoba the first gold discovery dates back to 1881, and it led to the discovery of the valuable deposits of the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company, and the Sherritt Gordon mines. In my own province, had it not been for prospectors searching for gold there would be no Noranda, no Quemont, no East Sullivan, no Golden Manitou, no Waite Amulet, no Normetal, and many others would be missing including the base metal mines in the eastern townships, in the Gaspe peninsula and other parts of the province. The famous iron deposits of Quebec and Labrador and the Allard titanium ore body probably would be unknown.

More recently in northwestern Quebec a spectacular discovery of zinc and silver ore has come to light. It is described in Time magazine of this week as North America's biggest base metal find of the year. Diamond drilling on the original find has outlined over 17 million tons of ore within the space of three months, and that is only a small part of the ore body. All around this new discovery other mining companies have outlined other ore bodies. This new zinc deposit in Quebec is so important, it is my firm conviction that in the near future we may see the construction of a zinc smelter to service the eastern part of Canada. This would be of great advantage. It would greatly enlarge our zinc-producing capacity and would eventually cut the cost of production. Even more important, it would keep needed United States dollars in this country. The zinc producers of eastern Canada should be given every possible assistance in undertaking such a project. The construction of such a smelter in eastern Canada has been discussed many times previously but with the finding of these large bodies of ore I believe it is time we thought more seriously about it.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, the mineral resources of Quebec have been hardly touched, and this holds true for the whole of the Canadian shield. Many very large deposits are still unknown, awaiting discovery. In promoting gold mining, we encourage prospectors to seek the precious metal and in so doing we may count that important deposits of copper, zinc and many other minerals will be brought to light.

Gold Mining

I referred a few moments ago to a deposit found in northwestern Quebec. I am glad to say that this discovery was made by young Canadians from the constituency of my hon. friend from Chapleau (Mr. Gourd). In fact, the Leclerc brothers had gone to Barraute township looking for gold; but instead they found metals which are now of great importance to all of Canada.

So far, only a minute portion of that deposit has been explored, yet it has been proved to contain 17 million tons of commercial ore. A 5,000-ton mill will be built there very soon and this development will provide jobs for more than a thousand workers.

Are we to shut our eyes and imagine that this zinc was come upon through sheer luck? No, we must admit that this metal came tc light because of the hard work of the prospectors who found it in their feverish quest for gold.

Some people keep asking the government to shut down the gold mines. I believe those people do not realize all the hardships that might follow such a step.

What would happen if the government decided to shut down the gold mines? It is easy to say that gold miners could be put to work in other metal-bearing areas; but when we see towns organized mainly by mine-workers, I believe we would have to think twice before we could say that those people could be moved easily. But I do not want to labour the point. Canada is destined to become the principal world purveyor of a wide range of metals. Our mining industry has meant a lot to us in the past, and will mean even more in the future.

Another very important factor to keep in mind is that the metal-bearing mines of Canada give employment to more than 112,000 men, including 23,000 who work in gold mines, and have more than 500,000 dependents. Every year these people buy farm products to the substantial amount of $65 million. I have no ulterior motive in mentioning that particular figure, although it has been mentioned quite frequently of late. Every year our mining towns and villages buy $150 million worth of articles of clothing, blankets, furniture, et cetera. In considering that amount, we readily realize what it means for the manufacturing centres of the country.

(Text):

Now, Mr. Speaker, these substantial amounts which I have mentioned do not include other supplies such as lumber, machinery, electrical equipment and hundreds of similar products. Goods purchased in these categories during 1948 amounted to $151·5 millions. With your permission, sir, I should like to read into the record a list of those products and their value. The list is as follows: Tools and machinery, $16 million; mine cars and locomotives, $1·8 million; other iron and steel products, $16·7 million; reagents and chemicals, $5·2 million; coal and coke, $15·4 million; petroleum products, $4·4 million; rubber products, $1·3 million; building products, $3·2 million; lumber and timber, $8·8 million; electrical equipment, $7 million; air-operated equipment, $3·2 million; explosives, $6·8 million; hydroelectric power, $9·9 million; freight and express, $31 million; miscellaneous, $20·8 million. These figures are furnished by the Canadian Metal Mining Association. As I have already said, during the year 1948 Canadian mines bought products to the value of $151 million, which represents thirty cents out of every dollar of revenue. In addition to purchases in the communities which are closely related to the mines, Canadian mines bought in over five hundred other communities all across Canada.

The figures to which I have just referred do not include capital expenditure. Even if we consider only two of the new mines which were recently put into production, this represents a substantial amount. For instance, the capital expenditure for Campbell Red Lake before production amounted to $3 million and for East Sullivan mines amounted to $5·5 million. I believe we should stress that point. After hearing hon. members I realize that we shall not have too much trouble in putting our point to them this afternoon. Everyone seems to understand the difficult situation in which our mines find themselves today. If I make mention of the base metal mines, it is only because our gold mines are closely related to all other mines. The search for gold is responsible for the finding of many base metals.

In 1948 the Canadian government realized the difficulty in which the gold mines were, and they enacted the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. This act has been amended, and today we are called upon to amend it again in order to change the formula and so on. We all realize that the government knows this is not a true solution. I have taken note of what the minister has said, that we have certain responsibilities towards international agreements and we have to observe those agreements. I accept his word for that. We are taking the only way we can to accomplish our purpose. I realize it is not possible for the government to break abruptly from the monetary fund, but I do hope that the government will find it possible to break away from this monetary fund. I believe that the Canadian government would be justified in paying higher prices for gold. It may not be possible right now, but I think it should be possible in the near future. If the United States could buy gold at $35 fifteen years ago, I should think that today, realizing the rise in the price of all commodities and wages, the Canadian government should see its way clear to asking a higher price for the gold. I think that is the true solution. If we believe we should stop the hoarding of gold, then the free market is not the solution because then we would be partners to such hoarding. I believe that the Canadian government is the one who should try to sell our gold at as high a price as we can get for it.

We have this resolution before us. We know that this act has been of benefit to the industry since it was enacted in 1948. It has helped many communities, it has helped the employees and the mines. Naturally, we hope that it will continue to do so. I am afraid that with rising prices the mines will have difficulty in keeping their costs down to avoid getting in the red. I shall support this resolution. I am very happy that it has been presented to the house today. From what we have heard, I believe it has the support of the whole house.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Herridge: I had hoped to speak this afternoon, but to facilitate the passage of the resolution, I shall leave my remarks until second reading.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Drew: Six o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): At nine o'clock we will continue with this resolution and then take up the estimates of agriculture.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN-MONTANA PIPE LINE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 117, to incorporate Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company—Mr. Bennett—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a few questions in connection with the bill. I have no intention of holding up the progress of the bill at all; but pipe lines, particularly natural gas pipe lines, are of vital importance to Canada, and I am sure the sponsor of the bill would be glad to give me any information I should like to have concerning this company. For instance, I would expect him to explain to me tonight who is financing the company and what interests are behind it. I have no doubt they are reliable financial interests, that he can readily explain to me who they are and where they expect to get their financial backing.

It is only fair to the people of Canada that this information should be on the record. Therefore I would ask the sponsor to explain to me in detail who these individuals are. I have a series of questions to ask tonight, and if the hon. member would prefer he could answer when I have finished; or it might be easier for him to answer the questions individually. Perhaps the sponsor would express his preference in this connection, just so as to expedite matters.

Mr. Knowles: Where is he?

Mr. Cruickshank: Well, if he is not here, I suppose the bill will be held over so as to give him an opportunity to answer the questions I shall place on the record.

As I have said, I am very interested in who is financing the company, and whether they hope to raise their funds in Canada, in the United States or somewhere else. Surely we are entitled to that information. I am sure other hon. members will have other questions to ask—because, after all, we are dealing with one of our greatest natural resources and possibly giving part of it away for all time. Therefore I am sure other hon. members as well as myself will be asking questions.

What experience has this company had in the building of pipe lines? I would suppose that anyone undertaking construction of this kind would have had expert advice and vast experience. Perhaps the sponsor would explain that to me. For instance, has the company built any other lines in Canada or the United States—or even in Iran, which was mentioned the other night; and that was covering quite a bit of territory.

What arrangements have been made to get steel? I know of people in my riding who would be glad to learn that steel is readily available because there are some things we would like to do. I know of one lumber company that would like very much to expand. I am sure hon. members know that lumber mills in British Columbia are having great difficulty to get by because of low prices. It is impossible for them to make 102 per cent profit under present prices. But they have to get steel over on Vancouver island, for example, before they can expand.

I hold in my hand a newspaper article dated at Seattle, and headed "Pipe Line Firms Hunting Steel". This article states:

> The next thirty days will decide whether natural gas interests can get 190,000 tons of steel for a pipe line from Alberta to the Pacific Northwest, N. Henry Gellert, president of the Seattle gas company said Tuesday. He said in a speech that natural gas for the area is "inevitable."

If steel is as hard to get as that on the Pacific coast, I presume it is hard to get in Alberta as well, the point from where this company expects to take oil to Montana. I should like to know if they have an assured supply of steel, and if so where they are getting it from. Is it in Canada, the United States or Great Britain?

Unfortunately the sponsor of the bill is not here tonight, but before it passes I am sure he will give me this information. Assuming naturally that the information would be asked for, he is no doubt away securing it so that he may give it to me next Tuesday or Friday.

I should like to know what route it will take. I understand it is to go from a pocket in Alberta, to the Montana border, thence to connect up with another company. It is my understanding that it runs for about sixteen miles before it makes that connection, but I should like to be assured of that fact. Then, is it going in a direct route? We are asked to permit this company to be formed because it is needed by the Anaconda Copper Company in the production of war materials. Does the line connect directly with this American company, and run from there to the Anaconda Copper Company's smelter, or what route does it take?

Then, have they sufficient gas available? I do not know just how much is required to augment the present supply, and have they any assurance that they will get the amount they require? I do not wish to delay the passage of the bill, but I definitely want this information. I am sure other hon. members would like to have it, too, before the bill passes.

Mr. Green: There were some amendments moved to the bill when it was before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines and I wonder if the chairman could give us the details of those amendments?

The Chairman: There was an amendment to section 4, subsection 2, providing that the head office shall be within Canada. There was another amendment to section 6 providing for construction entirely within Canada.

Mr. MacInnis: This is an important bill and I think the hon. member for Fraser Valley is entitled to have answers to his questions, at least such questions as are legitimate and as far as I could hear they are all legitimate. The bill is sponsored by an hon. member of this house and if he is not here to give information when it is before the committee there should be someone else able and willing to do that. Otherwise, the bill should be laid over until hon. members can have the information they are asking for or some reason is given why that information cannot be given. If there is no one here to answer the questions asked by the hon. member for Fraser Valley then I suggest that you should report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I am quite sure that that would be the proper thing to do but if there are other hon. members who have questions to ask I think it might be desirable that they put their questions on record so that when the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill comes to answer he will be prepared to give all the necessary information.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): Mr. Chairman, I was a member of the committee but I do not have the report of the committee before me to refresh my memory. However, I think I can indicate what happened in committee. I believe the members of that committee paid a good deal of attention to the bill when it was before them. A question was asked as to whether the pipe was available. The McColl-Frontenac Oil Company is going to supply the gas to the pipe line which will run through Canada and it was stated that the company has purchased the pipe and it is now available for the construction of the pipe line.

Some amendments were made to the bill. One was that the head office would remain in Canada and another one was that the main transmission line of the Canadian part would be constructed within Canada. I was particularly impressed with what was said about the export of natural gas. It was pointed out by a witness that this gas had been requested by Mr. Wilson, chairman of the mobilization board of the United States, for use by an essential war industry, and it was to be delivered to that industry under a five-year agreement.

It was brought out that Mr. Wilson had resisted pressure from other concerns for gas, but the needs of the Anaconda Copper Company were considered to be so vital that he requested the premier of Alberta to permit them to have the gas and that is why this company has had this bill introduced to provide for its incorporation.

Mr. Applewhaite: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might take the responsibility of adding my views to those of the hon. member for Edmonton East. I have not the facts before me in writing, but I sat on that committee as did the hon. member and others who are here tonight. I think we all got the impression from the statements made to the committee on behalf of Mr. Wilson that this gas is vital to the defence efforts of this country and of the United States. I asked a question in committee as to when they expected to get the benefit provided the bill was passed and they said it was essential they should be in operation no later than the fall of this year. That would mean an early commencement of construction.

While I realize that the point raised by the hon. member for Fraser Valley and the hon. member for Vancouver East is a good one I would feel inclined to urge hon. members who are asking for information that they get that information from the printed report of the committee when it is distributed. I am sure they will get all the information they want and therefore they may perhaps be willing to waive their rights and let the bill go through.

I make this plea solely in the belief that this matter is in the interests of the country. I have no interest whatsoever in the bill or its sponsors.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, there was one fact brought out in the committee which I think should be placed before hon. members. While this company is planning to take gas to Montana for the Anaconda Copper Company there is a further project in mind. The Montana Power Company which is an affiliate has applied to the Alberta petroleum and natural gas conservation board for two permits. The first permit is of a temporary nature for five years and is intended to cover gas to be used solely by Anaconda Copper. I believe the Alberta board has signified its willingness to grant a permit in those terms.

In addition to serving the Anaconda Power Company, the Montana Power Company serves a large part of Montana, if not all of the state. The temporary permit would cover the total requirements of Anaconda Copper and the Montana Power Company would then use Montana gas to supply the civilian users. The request for the temporary permit was endorsed by Mr. Wilson. No objection was taken to help being given on a temporary basis, but the company has a further plan which I think should be watched very carefully by members representing constituencies on the prairies and in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec because the second application is for a permit to export gas generally for civilian use in Montana. Mind you, they are getting a temporary permit but in addition to that they have another application for a further permit which will be for the use of the gas from this field in southeastern Alberta for civilian purposes in the state of Montana. That may mean that Canadians will go short. As hon. members know, there has been a bill passed by the house granting a charter to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. That company proposes to pipe gas from Alberta through Saskatchewan and Manitoba serving centres in those provinces en route, then to Fort William and Port Arthur, through Ontario to Montreal and possibly the city of Quebec. One of the fields from which Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited plans to get gas is the same field which is now to be tapped by Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company.

Therefore the time may come when eastern Canada will be very much interested in whether or not this gas from southeastern Alberta goes down to serve people in the state of Montana on a permanent basis rather than on a five-year basis to help out Anaconda. Movements of that kind will have to be watched at all times if we are to have Canada served first by these companies. We may find that there will be an attempt by some other company to pipe gas down into Minneapolis and St. Paul rather than letting it go through to Winnipeg, Toronto, London, Montreal and various other eastern centres. There is always going to be that temptation for these people to shoot it off into the United States at the first opportunity.

The Montana affiliate of Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company certainly has that intention. Eventually they hope to be able to get at least a portion of their requirements for civilian users in the state of Montana from this southeastern Alberta field. The committee approved of the granting of the charter, but that was done, I think, on the basis that the gas is needed for a five-year period by Anaconda Copper. I point out the other feature about this plan to members of the house, particularly those from Ontario and Quebec, so that they may be on the lookout for attempts in the future to divert gas to the United States which will only mean that there will be that much less available in Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): As a member of the standing committee, I understood the committee was unanimous with respect to this matter on the basis of the appeal made for the defence of the United States. Anaconda Copper produce copper of course but they also produce chromium and manganese. They need the gas in connection with the production of chromium and manganese which, together with copper, are so essential for the defence effort. When Mr. Corette of the Anaconda people appeared before the committee I asked him if it really was a serious defence project, if it was for the purpose of making munitions and so on that they needed the gas, and he said yes. He quoted at length from Mr. Wilson, the top man in Washington, with respect to war industries and so forth. I said to him: Why do you not get a message from General MacArthur to put before the committee to doubly reassure some of our doubting Thomases on the committee that this is not a plot to steal gas from Canada and take it to the United States to warm some of their firesides? It is a defence project in Montana. They need the gas, and the situation in the Pacific may be a great deal more serious than we view it tonight.

We hear these little comments with respect to fear in the hearts of the Canadian people about robbing them of their birthright and so on, that it is to be stolen from us. Let me tell you that if the Red armies now opposing General MacArthur on the other side of the Pacific have their way we will not have any rights, any smelter, or any chromium or steel for Mr. Howe and the steel industries of Canada. That is the serious side of the question. I have no particular interest in the matter at all. It involves 26 miles of pipe line within Canada. The people of Alberta want to allow the Americans to have this gas for the purpose of making manganese, chromium and steel for the defence effort. I think it would be gracious of us to pass a bill and let them go ahead with the project.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I wish at the outset to point out that I am not opposing the bill. As a matter of fact, as hon. members know, for reasons beyond my control I have not been able to attend the sessions of the house as regularly as I would like. Consequently I am not as well informed on this bill as I should be. However, I do not think it is sufficient for members who have been on the standing committee and have heard the evidence concerning the bill to say that they are satisfied that everything is in order and that the bill should be passed, and at the same time to tell us that the bill is so tremendously important as a defence measure. If the bill is as important as a defence measure as the hon. member for Cariboo says it is, then it is important enough for the government of Canada to sponsor it and not leave it to a private member.

I listened to the hon. member for Skeena for whose reasonableness on most matters I have a great deal of regard. I do not think it is good policy to say: Pass the bill now and when you get the report of the committee I am satisfied you will be satisfied that everything is in order. Surely that is a travesty on parliamentary procedure. Members of the house are entitled to information before the bill is passed because once it is passed by the house it is beyond the control of members to get information. Incidentally, private members assume responsibility for it because it is a private member's bill and not a government measure.

The hon. member for Cariboo said something about General MacArthur and the urgent necessity for the bill to be passed in order to help him out, or some such statement as that. If there is anything I am particularly tired of it is General MacArthur. I wish he would have the good sense to keep his mouth shut and give all his attention to directing the United Nations forces under his command on the field of battle. He should leave political matters to the political leaders of the various countries that have armies in Korea, including Canada. They know more about political matters and they are anxious to leave military matters to those like General MacArthur who know something about them. So I suggest that unless the sponsor of the bill or some member of the committee will answer the questions that have been asked by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, and other questions that may be asked later, it is not proper for us to go on and pass this bill now.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The evidence heard by the committee is available, and I think it contains the answers to all the questions that have been asked this evening, except perhaps one. That is as to whether they have the steel available. I am not prepared to answer that, and as far as that goes I do not suppose it is a matter of moment as far as this bill is concerned. If the steel is not available they will not lay the pipe, that is all. Nevertheless I would suggest that we rise and report progress, though I do repeat that the minutes of the committee are available.

Mr. MacInnis: Available to whom, may I ask?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): All members of the house may get copies if they wish. As the hon. member has said, there was no opposition to the bill. Certain amendments were made, but all clauses as they now appear were eventually carried by the committee without opposition. Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, if there are any other questions about the bill that any hon. member feels he should ask, this is the time to ask them, so they will be on record and available next Tuesday.

Mr. Ferguson: Outside the iron curtain news travels freely, by newspaper and other methods, and we hear what General MacArthur is supposed to have said but never did say and all the rest of it. If General MacArthur could only read what has been said by people who do not know anything about war—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ferguson: I am glad he does not, because he might stop winning the Korean war if he read some of the things being said about him by people who do not know anything about war but who are always glad to accept the protection of an experienced soldier.

Mr. Herridge: I support the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East as to the fact that the sponsor of the bill is not in the house.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): If I may interrupt, my hon. friends who are making remarks of that kind perhaps would not do so if they know the reason for the absence of the hon. member sponsoring the bill. Perhaps it would be as well to leave it at that. If delay is required, I suggest that we rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

HORTENSE MARIE THERESE LOIESE NEVEU

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bill No. 164, for the relief of Hortense Marie Therese Loiese Neveu.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to say a word on this, and I am doing so because the people of my riding asked me to. Other hon. members may not believe in bringing before this house everything the people in their ridings ask them to bring, but I believe in doing that. Incidentally I just came back from a most successful visit to my riding which happens to be the most beautiful, most successful and, in all modesty, the best represented riding in this country.

I am very glad the hon. member sponsoring these bills is here to answer questions. Let me direct my remarks to the first bill, and if I cannot pronounce the name it is because I am not familiar with divorce cases. That is Bill No. 164, letter Z-5 of the Senate. I like to use that word "Senate" because I am entitled to do so in this case; otherwise I have to refer to it as the other place. This is an act for the relief of Hortense Marie Therese Loiese Neveu. I am sure the sponsor will be able to say whether there are any children, and if so how they are to be looked after in the future, and who is going to educate them. We hear a great deal about juvenile delinquency these days; that is one of the greatest problems we have to face. I believe if there were fewer divorces we would not have so much juvenile delinquency. So I would like the sponsor to explain to me who is going to be responsible for the bringing up of the children, if there are any. Coming from the prairie provinces as he does, I am sure he is vitally interested in that matter, just as I am interested in it coming from the far Pacific where we have probably greater natural advantages for bringing up children than anywhere else in Canada.

I do not like to speak about the Fraser valley any oftener than I am compelled to, but there we have the second consolidated school district to be formed in Canada. We could tie that in with some previous discussions in this house, because we were able to bring that about through the assistance of the Rockefeller foundation. That foundation resulted from the great development of gas and oil, and because of their generosity we were able to establish a consolidated school area in Fraser valley of which we are very proud. That, together with the very low divorce rate in Fraser Valley, has prevented juvenile delinquency from developing to any great extent.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Cruickshank: I will be glad to sit down if my hon. friend would like to take over. In the meantime I would suggest that some hon. members might acquire wisdom by emulating the performance of the little white dog in the famous copyright symbol of a certain phonograph company. Check it up and see what it was. As I was saying, we are vitally interested in the sanctity of marriage and many of us do not believe that the present divorce laws are adequate. Many of us do not believe that the divorce laws as they are now are sufficient. I am not against divorce. I am a little surprised, because you know I come from a rural riding, Mr. Speaker, at not hearing more about this particular type of bill from some of the rural ridings in the province of Quebec. I understand, sir, that the reason these bills come before us is that the people of Quebec have certain distinct ideas concerning divorce. Some of those ideas spring from religious convictions. One of the main reasons, however, as I understand it, that the people of the province of Quebec have such distinct ideas on divorce is due to the magnificent home life that they lead in that province. It is one of the oldest parts of Canada, and one of the finest settlements. In that province farms are handed down from family to family. The province of Quebec, as well as Ontario, has a great tradition of family life. I am indeed surprised that more has not been said by the members from Quebec about the looseness in the method of handing out divorces. Possibly their constituents do not desire them to talk about this matter in the house. On the other hand, my constituents do want me to bring it before you.

As an individual, I believe in divorce, but also as an individual I believe the present divorce laws are not adequate. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, if we are going to have divorce at all, I do not believe it should be handled by the members sitting in this chamber. I was not elected to be a judge in divorce cases, nor am I qualified to do so. I will not dispute the fact that there may be other members who can grasp the subject quicker than I can, merely by reading one of these lists.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to raise a point of order? I came to his assistance on another bill a moment ago, but I now wish to point out that the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) is out of order. We are not discussing the general principle of divorce, but a certain bill granting relief. The hon. member must confine his remarks to that bill.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. Green: There are five bills.

Mr. MacInnis: There may be all kinds of bills but the hon. member mentioned one, if I recall correctly Bill No. 164. He will have to deal with that one, and if he is going to talk about divorce he will have to talk about that particular bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the parts of this bill.

Mr. Green: We are apparently debating five or six bills at once. What is the ruling in a case like that?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If it is the desire of the house to deal with these bills separately, then the first is still Bill No. 164, and I would ask the member for Fraser Valley to confine himself to that bill.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am sorry that I was out of order. I believe, sir, you will appreciate the fact that it is most unusual for me to be out of order. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavour to be in order by discussing this case. I did not realize that by mentioning one bill I had to confine my remarks to it. I have heard them grouped from one to one hundred and forty-two and passed. I am not referring to the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), for whose judgment I have the greatest respect, next to yours, sir. No one in this house knows the rules better, other than yourself, sir, or is more fair. I have no objection, but I have heard a hundred and forty-two bills read as a group. I bow to your ruling, sir, and I shall confine myself to the one bill.

Perhaps I had better put on the record, sir, that I am confining my remarks to item 14 on the order paper which reads as follows:

Second reading of Bill No. 164 (Letter Z-5 of the Senate), intituled "An act for the relief of Hortense Marie Therese Loiese Neveu."—Mr. Winkler.—E.F.

Mr. Knowles: What does that mean?

Mr. Cruickshank: Incidentally, so the record will be quite clear, I am quoting from Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day of April 6, at page 13. That is a very good page, because I was born on the 13th. I should like to know from the sponsor of this bill, because there are—I shall not say more important matters coming before the house tonight than the possible wrecking of this family. Perhaps I had better keep to that family of Mrs. Neveu—I presume she was Mrs. I do not want to see this family wrecked. When I say there are other matters coming before us tonight, nothing could be more important nor more worthy of the time taken, Mr. Speaker, when we spend hours and hours debating whether we shall take up unnecessary gold. Surely, we can spend part of one hour debating whether a family is to be torn asunder. I believe even the members from Ontario and Quebec will agree to that.

We shall take this particular bill to which I must confine myself. I am interested, Mr. Speaker, in knowing whether Mrs. Hortense Marie Therese Loiese Neveu has any children. If the member who is sponsoring this bill would prefer to answer my questions one at a time or as a group, he can say so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe the time to ask questions is when the bill comes before the committee of the whole house.

Mr. Cruickshank: I bow to your judgment, Mr. Speaker. I would even bow to your ruling if you did not have the authority, sir. It seems strange to me, however, that I get so much advice that I must not discuss the sanctity of family life, especially when there are so many members from the great province of Ontario here. I might not be here when the bills come up next time. Am I not permitted to put on record, for the people of my riding, what great organizations in the province of British Columbia apparently think of this particular bill? I cannot see why I am not permitted to put on the record what a percentage at least of the people of the province of British Columbia think of this particular divorce bill. Surely, that must be in order. I bow to your ruling, sir, but for instance consider this and see if it does not apply. As a matter of fact, now that I look at it I believe this particular letter was written concerning the bill for relief of Hortense Marie Therese Loiese Neveu. It is dated February 21, and to show that this feeling is not limited to the people of my riding, this particular letter comes from 2548 Pandora street, Vancouver, B.C. There is some reference to Vancouver. I do not know which riding it is in, or why the lady wrote to me. The letter reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Cruickshank:

Is it not possible for you members of parliament to do something about reforming our divorce law? There is so much suffering and loneliness caused on account of our present law, surely we should have desertion and incurable insanity as grounds.

I can quite understand that if you bring in incurable insanity it would probably cover quite a bit of territory. I continue:

The way things are now there are a great many illicit unions that would be made legal, and a lot of illegitimate children that would have their rightful name if we had more humane divorce laws.

Then I have another one from Chilliwack. Chilliwack is entitled to a positive view on this particular case or any other one regarding the sanctity of the family. Chilliwack is the leading agricultural town in the Dominion of Canada, in the centre of the great Fraser valley. It is right in the midst of that valley, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to know what is out of order about referring to one's constituency. I think any hon. member should be proud to refer to his constituency, although it might work in reverse in so far as some constituencies are concerned. As I said, here is a letter from Chilliwack. I am sorry that the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) is not in the house because this writer knew that the hon. member for Spadina would unquestionably be interested in this particular bill, letter Z-5 of the Senate. This is what the letter says:

Recently Mr. Croll suggested a divorce reform. I was very disappointed to note he had no support. I hear this from many sources, also. Our divorce laws are antiquated and stupid, and not even human. I think our members of parliament should have supported this man's views and given us people who are supposed to be living in democracy a square deal. No one wants to go behind the fence and pay crooked lawyers—

Oh, that could not be true.

—big sums to get a divorce, but it's done all the time. Let's have a change.

This letter is right from the hub of the Fraser valley. I am absolutely confident that this particular bill, letter Z-5 of the Senate, an act for the relief of Hortense Marie Therese Loiese Neveu, is the one that the writer has in mind. I could go on, Mr. Speaker, because a great many people are interested. Probably some of my friends would like to take over from me. They can do so if they wish.

Mr. Weir: You have only five minutes.

Mr. Cruickshank: Then I have a letter from the divorce reform league of British Columbia, P.O. Box 276, Vancouver. It is dated January 31, 1951, and addressed to myself.

Mr. Hatfield: Potatoes.

Mr. Cruickshank: No, it has nothing to do with potatoes at all. It reads as follows:

George A. Cruickshank, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

The attached memorandum, outlining the aims and objects of the divorce reform league of British Columbia, is herewith forwarded for your perusal and kind consideration.

They knew very well, Mr. Speaker, that this particular case, letter Z-5 of the Senate, was coming up tonight. I continue:

In so far as the Canadian laws with respect to marriage and divorce are concerned, the divorce reform league of British Columbia wishes to go on record as advocating legislation closely patterned after that now in effect in Great Britain* and which the league feels to be more consistent with the needs of Canadians.

The league therefore earnestly requests that you give serious consideration to subscribing to an enabling act of parliament which would grant to each province now empowered to try its own divorce cases, the additional power to decide what constitutes grounds for divorce.

Judging by the attitude of some provinces, that may not be advisable. The letter continues:

The foregoing communication to you has been authorized by unanimous motion passed by the divorce reform league of British Columbia at a general meeting held in the Pender auditorium, 339 West Pender street, Vancouver, British Columbia, on Thursday, January 25, 1951.

Respectfully yours,
S. V. Boyce, Secretary.

*Ref. Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937
1 Edw. VIII, and Geo. VI, Ch. 57.

I am sure they were referring to this particular individual case, Mr. Speaker. This is the form of the declaration:

(4) A discretionary power in a judge in matrimonial causes to forbid or limit newspaper reports of such causes.

(5) Any other provision pertaining to matrimonial causes which the society may in general meeting adopt.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion? Carried, and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume the business that was interrupted at six o'clock.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, several members of the committee which considered the pipe line bill we were dealing with a few moments ago have drawn my attention to the fact that I did not correctly state the situation with respect to steel. It appears that in the evidence given before the committee it was stated that the pipe had been purchased in Canada and was on the ground ready for use.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

MODIFICATION OF APPLICATION AS TO LAST QUARTER OF 1950 AND EXTENSION IN MODIFIED FORM TO 1951

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Prudham—Mr. Dion in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to modify its application with reference to the last quarter of the year 1950 and to extend the application of the act in a modified form to the year 1951.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain how much money was spent under this act in each of the years, and how much it is expected will be required for the present fiscal year?

Mr. Prudham: The figures for the years previous to 1949 are all listed in the annual report. I have the figures up to date but I prefer to give them when the bill is before the house. I understand we are dealing with the principle now.

Mr. Green: Oh no. I understand this is the minister's first resolution. However, I think we are entitled to have those figures.

If he has not the figures with him tonight I shall not press the matter.

Mr. Prudham: I shall be glad to give them when the bill is before the house.

Mr. Green: The minister does not have them tonight?

Mr. Prudham: I have the annual reports here.

Mr. Green: Cannot the minister tell how much was spent in 1949 and 1950, and how much it is expected will be required in 1951?

Mr. Prudham: I have all that information but I hope to give it when the bill is up for second reading. I do not think it is required at this time.

Mr. Green: The minister is quite wrong in that. I have asked how much money was spent in 1949 and 1950. That is the information to which the committee is entitled. How much is it expected will be required in 1951?

The Chairman: We are discussing the principle of the resolution. The hon. member may ask his questions when the bill is before the committee of the whole.

Mr. Green: Perhaps I should say why it is important that these questions be answered. Members from British Columbia have received a memorandum from the mining association of that province in which it is set out that under the proposed plan the assistance to the gold mines in the province will be a great deal smaller than it was in 1950. We want the information to find out whether or not that statement is correct. Because if it is correct, then I for one wish to make submissions now, before the bill is brought down, in the hope that there will be changes made in the bill to meet the situation. It is not just a case of being on a fishing expedition. The minister has admitted he has the information, and I do not think there is any doubt that it should be given to us.

Mr. Prudham: Estimated payments on account of 1950 will be affected by the provisions of the bill, and I cannot say with accuracy what that will be until the bill is passed.

Mr. Green: No.

Mr. Prudham: I can say this, that we expect we will spend $3 million more under the new amendment than we did last year.

Mr. Green: What was spent in 1950?

Mr. Prudham: The payments for 1950 are not complete, because the last three months are affected by the amendment we are about to introduce.

Mr. Green: The minister has an estimate of what will have been spent in 1950—what is that estimate? He must have had some figure on which to base his estimate that there will be an increased expenditure of $3 million.

Mr. Prudham: Yes, we anticipate that about $9,200,000 will be paid on account of 1950.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): On the old basis, or is that importing the new basis for the last three months?

Mr. Prudham: That is an estimate of both.

Mr. Green: Then is it estimated that in 1951 the total expenditure will be $12,200,000?

Mr. Prudham: It is estimated that assistance payments to gold mines in the designated year 1950 will increase from approximately $7,200,000 to approximately $10,500,000 for the year 1951.

Mr. Green: Then the figure for 1950 is $7,200,000, and not $9,200,000.

Mr. Prudham: Yes, apparently it is—without considering the new amendment.

Mr. Green: And that figure for 1950 is including the increase for the last quarter?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Green: Apparently the mining association in British Columbia is quite correct when it says that there is to be an additional $3 million paid to the gold-mining industry?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Green: That being so, why is it that these gold mines in British Columbia are to be cut by at least one-third of the assistance they have had in previous years?

Mr. Prudham: I did not see the brief from the British Columbia association until a few minutes ago. I sent it up to my deputy in the gallery, to get his opinion upon it; but I am quite sure they are wrong in their calculations.

Mr. Green: Is it the intention of the legislation to increase payments generally in all parts of the country?

Mr. Prudham: The formula will apply differently in different parts of the country, depending upon the operations of the mine. We have no way of forecasting what the payment will be to any one mine. It depends upon production, costs, and so on. I do not think it is possible to estimate accurately what the payments would be in any one province.

Mr. Green: But the changes are obviously being made for the purpose of increasing the payment. What I find it hard to understand is that the gold mines in British Columbia, instead of getting larger payments, are to have their payments cut. If that is so, there must be some error in the method being used to arrive at the amount of the payments. Is that the intention of the legislation, or has a mistake been made in the case of British Columbia? If so will such mistake be rectified? Obviously it would mean that some different formula is being used.

Mr. Prudham: There is a different formula being used, one which is modified slightly. I can say that there is a slight shift being made in the rate to favour the higher cost mines. It is not a big difference, but that is the change that is anticipated; and it is also anticipated that the assistance will apply to a larger number of ounces produced.

Mr. Fulton: It is alleged that the fact that the formula is now being modified so that more assistance will be available to the high-cost mines has the effect of reducing the assistance to the lower cost mines. On the face of it that might seem to be justified if stated as a simple proposition. I think you must realize the fact that lower-cost mines, perhaps the more efficient producers, are now faced with increased costs notwithstanding their efficiency. Those costs have increased over what they were last year in virtue of increases in wages and increased cost of materials entering into their production. It will be seen that even though they are efficient producers and what are classified as low-cost operations, nevertheless they are being penalized or discriminated against in the amount of assistance made available. In spite of the fact that they have tried to cut down their costs, they find that their costs are still increasing. It will be seen that this will have a prejudicial effect on such operations as Bralorne and Pioneer. That is the result that they fear and are convinced they will be faced with.

Mr. Prudham: Is my hon. friend suggesting that the company that is making favourable profits should be subsidized?

Mr. Fulton: That statement does not seem to me to get to the root of the issue at all. I made it quite clear this afternoon that I felt that there was a solution which would permanently solve this question and remove from the gold mines the necessity of having to come here for assistance. I suggested that the solution was to give them a free market for gold. Apparently the government is not willing to introduce that set of circumstances which would enable the gold mines to stand on their own feet. The government is attempting to work out a formula for assistance and surely we are entitled to ask that that formula should not penalize the efficient operators and producers.

I am saying that they have a definite feeling that they are going to be penalized by the formula as they understand it. I think the reason is to be found in what the minister has just said, that this formula is designed to benefit the high-cost producer. Is the minister in a position to give us any definite assurance that this modified formula will not in effect penalize or have the effect of reducing the assistance to the large scale, low-cost producers?

Mr. Prudham: I am quite sure that when the bill is introduced hon. members will be satisfied that there is no discrimination against efficient producers. In my opinion there is an ample spread allowed for the most efficient mine to make plenty of money without being penalized. The rate of assistance starts at a figure which will give any mine whose costs are below that figure a chance to make a legitimate profit and meet present-day conditions.

Mrs. Fairclough: I must admit to being a little bit in the clouds on this issue. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has said that apparently there is quite a substantial increase, and the minister has given figures which indicate an increase from $7,200,000 to perhaps $10,500,000. That is an increase of $3,300,000, or approximately 50 per cent, over last year. And, as he said, that is not taking into consideration adjustments for the last three months of the preceding year. This is about a 46 per cent increase. The minister has referred to it as a slight shift, but it seems to me that it is more than a slight shift, it is a major operation. I cannot understand why with such an increase any group of producers could be penalized.

Mr. Prudham: I have a full statement containing all the statistics which I am prepared to give when the bill is introduced. I think I was right in the first place and we should stick to the principle of the resolution and not deal with the statistics at the present time.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I think it was shown this afternoon that all who have participated in this debate wished to be helpful and constructive. I think it is a mistake for the minister to withhold statistics until the bill is up for second reading or in the committee stage thereafter. It seems to me that the whole purpose of discussing a resolution in committee is that all information and details necessary for the proper understanding and debate of the bill on second reading can be made available.

I am not going to deal further with the point that has latterly been under discussion. I think that as long as you have an artificial basis of assistance to an industry, such as is embodied in this act, you are bound to have a situation that unquestionably will create discriminations. You cannot avoid them. I am not suggesting that those who drafted the bill have not done their best to avoid them; undoubtedly they have, but the whole method of assistance involved in this legislation is artificial in nature. It seems to me that so long as there is artificiality in our approach to this problem there are bound to be discriminations. Until we come to grips with the problem in an attempt to solve it at its roots we are bound to have these unfortunate discriminations.

A reference has been made, which I do not quite follow, to a 46 per cent increase in gold production this year.

Mr. Green: Payments, not gold production.

Mr. Fleming: If I followed the minister correctly this afternoon he stated that the payments for 1951 would be between $10 million and $11 million. That is actually a reduction as compared with 1949; it is not an increase at all. The report on the administration of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1950, shows at page nine that for 1949 the approved payments totalled $12,230,359.42. According to the report it is estimated that the total amount of assistance payable, including all commitments to be made in the next fiscal year in respect to obligations relating to the designated year of 1949, will amount to approximately $13 million.

Actually what happened is that there is a reduction in 1950 as compared with 1949 of about $2,500,000 or something like 20 per cent. Therefore we are not increasing the payments; the payments are showing a reduction. Can the minister give the number of producers who received benefits under the act in 1950? I think that would be interesting as showing the trend. I do not know whether the trend in 1950 as compared with 1949 was up or down, but it will be recalled that this afternoon I gave the figures for the first two years of the operation of this act. In 1948, 111 producers received benefits under the act, and in 1949 the number dropped to 95.

Mr. Prudham: My understanding of the purpose of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act is that it was to meet an emergent situation. The intention of the government at that time was that it would help the industry over an emergency and that eventually it would be able to stand on its own feet. It was expected that the rate of assistance would gradually taper off until the mines were self-sufficient. It has not worked out exactly that way because of inflation and other reasons. Although the mines have got back to efficient operation their costs have been rising. For that reason we propose to extend the provisions of the act for another year on a slightly modified scale.

The hon. member for Eglinton this afternoon criticized the proposal because it did not contain any long-term solution. It never was intended as a long-term solution. It is just an emergency measure. He referred to the international monetary fund and the Bretton Woods agreement. He spoke favourably of the way South Africa had broken with the fund, and how they were getting a premium for their gold on the world market. In my opinion if the whole world went on the free market the high price might not be maintained. It is my opinion that it is because of the restricted volume on the world market that these high premium prices are paid. I may be wrong in that assumption but I have talked to many mining men who are rather doubtful that the price would remain at that high level if we established a free market. However, that is just an opinion and no one really knows.

The fact remains that our country entered into the Bretton Woods agreement with other nations of the world. Canada is a signatory thereto, and as long as we intend to honour our international obligations we have to abide by the provisions of the agreement until they are changed in an orderly manner. I am not trying to defend the Bretton Woods agreement, but as long as Canada is a signatory to it we have to abide by its terms.

The hon. member for Lethbridge made sarcastic remarks about the government referring to the fund before introducing this amendment. Canada's action was just a matter of good international etiquette, if you will, honouring one of our international obligations. My colleague, the Minister of Finance, made a brief reference to that when he made his statement to the house. He said:

> All I need add at this moment is that this modification in our gold assistance formula has been discussed with the fund which has raised no objection.

Mr. Low: It could have.

Mr. Prudham: The amendment forecast by the resolution is not a radical change. It continues fairly closely the pattern that has been followed for the last three years. It makes a slight alteration in the rate and, as I said before, it is proposed that it will apply to a greater number of ounces and give encouragement to mines for greater production.

Mr. Fleming: I think I should enter a word of correction in the light of the statement just made by the minister. He attributed to me a statement that I had favourably—that was his expression—commented upon the action of the government of South Africa. I wish to correct that. I referred to the action of the government of South Africa in releasing a portion of the gold production of that country for sale on the free market. I did not comment on it either favourably or unfavourably. What I said was it was a fact of which account must be taken. When the world's greatest gold producer releases a large portion of the gold production of that country for sale on the free market it seems to me that Canada can no longer allow herself to be shackled in the way in which she is shackled today. I made it quite clear there must be no departure on our part from international obligations. That is not to say that we are to sit still with hands folded. The whole burden of my remarks was to the effect that in the face of this situation we must face up to the fact that the Bretton Woods agreement is working a very great hardship on the gold producers of this country.

There are ways in which that agreement can be changed. I think the time arrived some time ago,—it certainly has arrived now—when it is our duty as the parliament of the Canadian nation to undertake to initiate measures to bring about needed changes in the Bretton Woods agreement in order that justice may be won for the gold producers of Canada.

Having said that by way of correction of the interpretation put on my remarks by the minister, may I return now to ask him for the figure as to the number of producers who received assistance under the act during the year 1950.

Mr. Prudham: I am sorry; 75 have so far received assistance.

Mr. Fleming: That indicates what I feared, a very definite continuation of a downward trend in the number of producers receiving assistance under the act. Just note these figures: 1948, the first year, 111; 1949, the second year, 95; 1950, the third year, 75, a very drastic reduction. It simply comes down to this, that in view of the terms of the legislation, in view of the way in which it is being administered with this very artificial formula, the number of producers to whom the act brings any assistance has shown quite sharp reductions. In the face of the crippling problem confronting the gold mining industry today, with rapidly rising costs and a firm ceiling fixed on the price at which they may sell their product, it seems to me the figures given to the committee now by the minister emphasize more clearly than ever the utter insufficiency of this measure as an expedient to meet the needs of the Canadian gold producers.

Mr. Herridge: I understood the minister to say a few minutes ago that the assistance to be provided to gold mines requiring assistance under the act would be sufficient to pay present operating costs and leave a margin to pay a legitimate profit. If that is correct I should like to ask the minister this question. In using the phrase "to pay present operating costs" does he mean that under the terms of the act the gold miners working in the mines covered by the act will from this point on be paid wages equal to those of miners working in the base metal industry.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I am not in a position to answer that question. In order to make clear what I intended to say before, the formula that we propose to introduce will apply to those mines that need assistance rather than to those that do not, and the floor above which the assistance applies is low enough that all mines that can operate and produce at a cost below that floor will have ample opportunity to make a profit.

Mr. Herridge: The minister says he cannot answer my question. It is obvious that the minister intends that, regardless of the scale of wages paid, the mines will make a profit.

Mr. Gibson: He did not say that.

Mr. Prudham: I think these questions can all be answered much better when the bill is printed and before the house.

Mr. Fleming: May I in all friendliness suggest to the minister that this controversy might come to an end if he would put on the record now the table of statistics to which he has referred so that members may have the opportunity to see it in print and study it before we debate the bill on second reading. I think that will be helpful to the house and in the long run will probably greatly reduce the scope and length of debate.

Mr. Prudham: I am very anxious to please the opposition, and if I have your permission, Mr. Chairman, I will put this statement on record tonight.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Is it a statement, or does it contain figures?

Mr. Prudham: It is a complete statement.

Some hon. Members: Read it.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Blackmore: There seems to me to be some difference of opinion as to what may take place while the resolution is before the committee. Any member who desires any information at all pertaining to the matter under consideration is entitled to ask for that information and have the answer given. That is one of the safeguards we have, as the hon. member for Eglinton pointed out, to assure hon. members that they are not working in the dark. So I suggest that the minister give the details he thinks the committee requires so we may comprehend what he is aiming at in the bill.

Mr. Prudham: If I give this statement I do not want hon. members opposite to demand the bill so they can see whether or not I am right.

Mr. Fleming: We cannot get the bill until the resolution passes.

Mr. Prudham: This statement deals with proposals that will be set out in the amending bill when it is printed. We are probably getting a little ahead of ourselves, but I see no real objection to putting this statement on record now provided hon. members will bear with me until the bill is printed before offering too much criticism.

Hon. members will recall that the reason for introducing the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act in December, 1947, was to assist the primary gold producers in meeting the increased cost of production of gold. After experiencing a very difficult period during the last war, they faced a major reconstruction job including the recruitment of working forces, rehabilitation of mining and milling plant, development of new ore reserves and the restoration of efficient capacity operation. Wages and other costs of production had risen very substantially. It was hoped that at the end of the three year assistance period, that is at the end of 1950, more normal operating conditions and costs would be experienced by the gold operators. I would like to state that the payment of cost-aid has been of great assistance to the operators and has most satisfactorily served the purpose for which it was chiefly designed. The mines have been rehabilitated and restored to efficient operation. But for the assistance rendered by the government to the industry, many of the high cost mines would have been compelled to close. However, because of a certain amount of inflation which has occurred, the gold mining industry now experiences still higher costs of supplies, labour and other services for the production of gold, while the price of the product of the mines remains the same as in 1947. It is thus apparent that the gold mines now are more in need of assistance than they were formerly if the gold mining industry is to be kept alive.

In my statement earlier today I indicated the importance of the gold mining industry in the Canadian economy. I would like again to stress this important relationship. The gold mining industry has been a pioneer in the development of northern Canada. Owing to the fact that gold can be readily transported without the building of expensive railroads, gold mines have been established in the north country where few transportation facilities are available. In many cases the mining of gold has drawn attention to the areas in which the gold mines are situated with the resultant discovery of commercial base metal and strategic mineral deposits which are essential for maintaining a high industrial economy as well as for defence production. This is true in northwestern Quebec, British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario and the Northwest Territories. Base metal mines, however, cannot operate without adequate transportation facilities. Consequently further development has led to the building of railroads into the north country and the settling of communities around the mines in order to supply products, particularly those of the forest and agriculture, to the mining communities. Thus the growth of Canada's northern development has been dependent on the search for gold.

The gold mines now in operation give employment to about 23,000 people. In addition to employees and dependent communities directly supported by the gold mines, employment is sustained in cities and towns across Canada where machinery and supplies are manufactured and agricultural and forest products are grown. Many isolated centres are directly dependent upon one or two mines for existence. Assistance to the gold mining industry means an incentive to both the prospector and the financier who provides funds for development to bring the prospective mine to the production stage. The incentive to the prospector means that new mines, both gold and base metals, will be discovered. In view of the present fast rate of depletion of metal mines, owing to the great defence demands of the past eleven or twelve years, it is essential that old mines be replaced by new mines if the mining industry is to retain its position of providing a billion dollar yearly income for Canada and the necessary strategic metals for defence.

Gold Mining

Hon. members will also recall that in September, 1949, steps were taken by the government to devalue the Canadian dollar in relation to the United States dollar. This action resulted in a change in the Royal Canadian Mint price for gold from $35 to $38.50 a fine ounce, that is an increase in the gold price amounting to 10 per cent. As a result of this increase in the price the government introduced legislation to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act which provided that during the designated or calendar year 1950 the total amount of assistance payments paid to the operator of any mine would be reduced by an amount equal to the number of ounces of gold to which the rate of assistance is applied multiplied by three dollars and fifty cents. This act was approved by parliament and given the royal assent on December 10, 1949, and resulted in assistance payments for the designated year 1950 of approximately $7,200,000 on an approximate production of 3,850,000 ounces as compared with assistance payments for 1949 of $12,500,000 on a production of 3,614,000 ounces and assistance payments for 1948 of $10,500,000 on a production of 3,163,000 ounces.

On September 30, 1950, my colleague, the Minister of Finance, announced the abolition of the official fixed rates of exchange. The rates of exchange as of October 1, 1950, would be determined by conditions of supply and demand for foreign currencies in Canada. A direct result of this policy has been a reduction in the price paid by the mint to the gold producers from the $38.50 price established in September, 1949. My colleague the Minister of Finance also announced that the reduction of $3.50 in the assistance payment in respect of the designated year 1950 would not be applied in respect of gold produced and sold during the last quarter of 1950.

The necessary amendment to the act to implement this announcement is contained in section 1 of the bill to be placed before the house. The way in which this amendment will work can best be illustrated by giving examples of its application to an old mine and a new mine. With the consent of the house I will place on Hansard an example as appendix "A" showing the application of the present act and the proposed amendment in both cases. The effect of this will be to give increased assistance to the mines in respect of the production of the last three months of 1950. The appendix is as follows:

Appendix A

Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act

Examples Showing the Application of Section 3 (5) of the Present Act and of the Proposed Section 3 (5).

1. Old Mine

If the production of an old mine in the base year was 30,000 ounces and the production during the year 1950 was 40,000 ounces, (ie. production of 30,000 ounces during the first nine months and 10,000 ounces during the last three months) the amount of the assistance payment for 1950 assuming a cost per ounce of $30 would be as follows:

(a) Present Act

Assistance Payments = $\frac{1}{2}$($30.00—$18.00) (40,000—$\frac{3}{3}$ × 30,000)—(20,000 × $3.50)=$50,000.

(b) Proposed Amendment

(i) Assistance Payment for first nine months—$\frac{1}{2}$ ($30.00—$18.00) (30,000—$\frac{3}{3}$ × 30,000 × 273/365) —(15,041 × $3.50)=$37,602.50.

(ii) Assistance Payment for last three months =$\frac{1}{2}$ ($30.00—$18.00) (10,000—$\frac{3}{3}$ × 30,000 × 92/365) =$29,754.

∴ Total Assistance = $67,356.50.

2. New Mine

If a mine commenced its first year of production on January 1, 1950 and produced 40,000 ounces during the year 1950 (i.e. production of 30,000 ounces during the first nine months and 10,000 ounces during the last three months) the amount of the assistance payment for 1950 assuming a cost per ounce of $30 would be as follows:

(a) Present Act

Assistance Payment = $\frac{1}{2}$ ($30.00—$18.00) (40,000)—(40,000 × $3.50)=$100,000.

(b) Proposed Amendment

(i) Assistance Payment for first nine months—=$\frac{1}{2}$ ($30.00—$18.00) (30,000)—(30,000 × $3.50)=$75,000.

(ii) Assistance Payment for last three months—=$\frac{1}{2}$ ($30.00—$18.00) (10,000)=$60,000.

∴ Total Assistance = $135,000.

Hon. members may recall that on October 24 last my predecessor as minister of mines and technical surveys announced that legislation would be introduced at this session of parliament which would extend assistance payments beyond the three designated years 1948, 1949 and 1950 as now provided for in the act. This is accomplished by section 2 of the bill to be placed before the house which adds a new section to the act and provides for assistance payments in respect of gold produced from a mine and sold in the year 1951. This section also implements the announcement by my colleague the Minister of Finance made in the house on March 9.

It is proposed that the rate of assistance in 1951 will be one-half of the amount by which the average cost of production per ounce of gold produced from a mine and sold exceeds $22 with a maximum rate of assistance of $11.50. This maximum rate of assistance is applied when the cost of production of gold is $45 per ounce or over. The rate of assistance in 1951 will be applied in the case of an old mine to the number of ounces of gold by which the number of ounces produced from the mine and sold in the year 1951 exceeds one-half of the number of ounces produced in the new base year which is the calendar year 1949. Where a mine has been unable to increase its production in relation to its 1949 production, the rate of assistance will be applied to one-half of the number of ounces produced and sold during the calendar year or designated year 1951.

In the case of new mines coming into production on or after January 1, 1949, the base year means the first year of production as determined by the Department of National Revenue. The rate of assistance in 1951 will be applied to all the gold produced and sold from a new mine during that part of the designated year 1951 that is also part of its first year of production. With the consent of the house I will place on Hansard, as appendix "B", examples showing the application of the act in the designated year 1951.

It is estimated that section 1 of the bill will mean that the assistance payments to gold mines in respect of the designated year 1950 will increase from approximately $7,200,000 as now provided to approximately $9,200,000 and that section 2 of the bill will mean an expenditure of approximately $10,500,000 in respect of the designated year 1951.

In conclusion, I would like to state that the effects of this bill will be of encouragement and assistance to the industry in meeting the rising costs of gold production and maintaining their dependent communities.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Fleming: Do I understand the minister is placing these two appendices on Hansard with the consent of the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Prudham: Appendix B is as follows:

Appendix B

Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act

Examples Showing the Application of Assistance Formula in 1951

1. Old Mine

Assume a mine's production to be 30,000 ounces of gold in 1949, the base year, and that the production in 1951 is 40,000 ounces at a cost of $40 per ounce.

$\therefore$. Assistance Payment=$\frac{1}{2}$ (40.00 — $22.00) (40,000 —$\frac{1}{2}\times$30,000)=$225,000.00.

2. Old Mine

Assume a mine's production to be 30,000 ounces of gold in 1949, the base year, and that the production in 1951 is 20,000 at a cost of $50 per ounce.

The rate of assistance in this case will be the maximum of $11.50 which is used when the cost is $45 per ounce or over.

$\therefore$. Assistance Payment=11.50\times$(20,000$\times\frac{1}{2}$)=$115,000.00

3. Old Mine

Assume a mine's production to be 30,000 ounces of gold in 1949, the base year, and that the production in 1951 is 50,000 ounces at a cost of $22 per ounce.

$\therefore$. Assistance Payment= $\frac{1}{2}$ ($22.00—$22.00) (50,000 —$\frac{1}{2}\times$30,000)= nil.

4. New Mine

Assume that a mine commences its first year of production on January 1, 1951, and produces 30,000 ounces during 1951 at a cost of $50.

The maximum rate of assistance of $11.50 is used.

$\therefore$. Assistance Payment=11.50\times$30,000=$345,000.00.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Prudham thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 194, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service—

1. Departmental administration, $336,942.

Mr. Ross (Souris): If the minister wishes to make a statement, it is all right with me.

Mr. Gardiner: I should like to make a short statement. The item is departmental administration, and throughout all the years I have been here it has been customary to have a sort of general discussion on that item. I have no objection to that being done on this occasion. I should like to call attention to the fact that the total amount in the general estimates for 1951-52 is $53,131,838, and the total amount for last year showing in these estimates is $81,805,497. That is the total amount which was in the general estimates last year plus the amount of the supplementaries, so that there is not an actual decrease of $28,673,659—or at least there will not be by the time the supplementaries are included.

One of the largest items that make up the $28,673,659 is shown here on page 7, appropriations not required for 1951-52, and the amounts which are involved there are shown on page 118. At the bottom of the page there is shown "Appropriations not required for 1951-52", and there is an item for losses on the purchase, sale and export of agricultural products, $4,350,000. Last year we agreed to pay a subsidy on hogs sold by way of Wiltshire sides to Great Britain, and on cheese, and the amount voted was not all used. The vote here shows $4,350,000. The second amount is required to recoup the agricultural prices support account, $3,484,918. Then, there is assistance to apple growers, $2 million, and that is the apple growers of British Columbia. There is assistance to the apple growers of Nova Scotia, $500,000. Those four items make up a total of $10,334,918. Those items are not to be voted this year.

The second largest item is to be found in vote 39, freight assistance on western feed grains. Now, that is not properly designated a reduction because the amount quoted there is simply the amount to carry us through until the end of the crop year. The practice has been to bring in the supplementaries later to take in further payments which are to be made. The difference there is simply the difference between the amount which was voted last year in the general estimates, plus the amount put in the supplementaries. On this occasion we only have the original amount to deal with, as we had in the general estimates last year.

Those are the two big items which make up the greater part of the amount. A smaller item is one of $2,081,000 which covers the major irrigation and water conservation projects. Of that amount, $800,000 is due to the fact we are coming towards the completion of the St. Mary's project in Alberta and because we are near the end of the project we do not require as much this year as was voted a year ago. The amount is approximately $800,000 down. There are some other items from the over-all activities in connection with irrigation which account for the other $1,200,000. Those are the usual items that make up part of the reduction; but I may say we estimate that when the supplementaries are all in there will be a reduction, as compared with the actual expenditures, of about $12 million in the total estimate. That is all I think that I would care to say at the moment. As I said at the beginning, the discussions at this stage have usually been of a general nature, and we welcome discussions of that kind at this time.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have that statement from the minister because in these estimates for the year the reduction of $28,500,000 did seem a very heavy decrease. I had anticipated it would not be that much after the supplementary estimates had been tabled that the minister speaks of. But there is a matter that I should like to make reference to at this time because on another occasion many statements were made that agriculture, especially in western Canada, has had a period of five of the most prosperous years in the history of this country.

However, that discussion referred only to income. I never heard the Minister of Agriculture or any other minister say that these farmers had also gone through a period of five of the most expensive production years in the history of this country. I think that should be brought out.

The reason that I want to deal with this now in particular is that we had one of the minister's colleagues, the Minister of Justice, addressing several farm meetings throughout the province of Manitoba, in fact in Marquette, his own constituency. I thought probably he was briefed by the Minister of Agriculture. If not, certainly he had followed him very attentively on some occasions because his arguments were very difficult to follow through by anyone who was a farmer, at least.

He pointed out how well off the farmers had been through those five years and are today, the most prosperous period in the history of this country. But he never referred to the greatly increased production costs of those five years, and to the increase in cost right today.

I know the minister believes in the small family farm. I think most of us do. But those statements about this prosperous period are not true for the small family farm in this country. The large opertaor with modern equipment may be getting along, and may be having a prosperous time of it, but I hold in may hand the Economic Annalist, put out by the Department of Agriculture, dated December, 1950. At page 137 we find the following heading:

The Farm Business in the Gilbert Plains and Sifton Areas of Manitoba, 1949

It is a survey by J. G. MacKenzie and T. O. Riecken, and reads as follows:

The investigation of the farm business in the Gilbert Plains and Sifton areas is part of a comprehensive inquiry into economic and social problems associated with the utilization of land in Manitoba.

Farther on in the page it states:

The business year 1948-49. The period covered by the farm business record was June 1, 1948, to May 31, 1949. The 1948 crop year was a normal one for this area in which crop yields are fairly stable.

Then on page 138, dealing with the farm size and tenure it says:

The farms of the area are small; nearly half are farms of one-quarter section, slightly more than a third are half-section farms and the remainder are larger than a half-section. The average size was 300 acres in the Gilbert Plains area and 257 in the Sifton area.

These areas are in the federal constituency of Dauphin, bordering on Marquette, the riding represented by the Minister of Justice, who was making these speeches. It is right alongside that area. There are several pages of this, giving very useful detail.

Then on page 139 there is a table showing the average farm capital in the Gilbert Plains and Sifton areas for the years 1948 and 1949. It shows real estate, machinery and equipment, livestock, feeds and supplies and seed. In the Gilbert Plains area the average per farm was $15,837; the average in the Sifton area was $8,341.

Then it deals with the average livestock of various kinds per farm, and on page 140 it says:

The cost of operating and repairing all farm machinery and equipment averaged $498 in the Sifton area and $1,018 in the Gilbert Plains area. If the costs of depreciation and investment in machinery were added to the current operating costs, these figures would probably be increased about 40 per cent.

Then page 141 deals with the size of the farms and the labour income. Table 5 follows which shows that in the Gilbert Plains area this survey was conducted on 81 farms and in the Sifton area on 80 farms, which was a fair number for a detailed survey. On page 142 we find the following:

While the farms of the Gilbert Plains area are generally more productive than the farms of the Sifton area, the returns from the quarter-section farms in both areas are generally too low to provide sufficient surplus to provide for the living of the operator and his family. After allowing for an average expenditure for living expenses of $939 in the Gilbert Plains area and $916 in the Sifton area, the net income on these farms in the former area was minus $208, and in the latter area minus $240, which indicates that part of the cost of maintaining the family could not be paid out of current farm revenue. The half-section farms at Sifton had a net income of $160 and at Gilbert Plains the same size farm had a net income of $469 over living expenses.

That is a survey carried out by officials of the department itself, and I think it should be proof of how prosperous many of these farmers have been throughout those years, and are today.

May I say a word as to present conditions? We have had considerable alarm throughout the country with respect to the rapidly rising increase in the cost of living. It increased steadily month by month for the twelve months of 1950. It has been increasing much more rapidly since the first of this year. We had an increase announced just the other day, bringing the index up to 179·7—a terrific increase there. That is very burdensome on all the people of this nation. The statistical survey of the Bank of Canada for February, 1950, gives the farm prices of agricultural products. It is a very interesting chart, because while it shows the average through Canada for 1950 of 249·3, it gives the averages by provinces. If you take these figures and compare them with the final month of the year it will give you a picture of the trend throughout the various parts of this nation. I will give the provinces. For 1950 the average in Prince Edward Island was 188·3; for Nova Scotia, 206·2; for New Brunswick, 216; for Quebec, 260·6; for Ontario, 264·7; for Manitoba, 255·5; for Saskatchewan, 226·4; for Alberta, 253·9; for British Columbia, 243·8; and then the average that I spoke of for all Canada, 249·3.

Then for December of 1950, that month alone the provinces showed up as follows: Prince Edward Island, 181·6; Nova Scotia, 213·6; New Brunswick, 217·9; Quebec, 276·5; Ontario, 276·8; Manitoba, 238·6; Saskatchewan, 199·7; Alberta, 237·3; British Columbia, 259·3. The average for Canada for that month was 245·4. Now, then, in relationship the fact that the national income for agriculture decreased about 12 points last year is rather significant. In round figures it means that in the last month of 1950 the agricultural income of the province of Quebec increased 16 points while in the same month in Manitoba there was a decrease of 17 points, and in Saskatchewan a decrease of 26 points. So that it shows the trend throughout the nation. These are both government journals from which I have been quoting. One of them is produced by the Department of Agriculture—I am referring to the Economic Annalist—and the other by the Bank of Canada. I do not think anyone disputes those figures.

These figures are proof that agriculture is slipping in these last few years in the matter of income. The survey made in central Manitoba is proof that the small family farm operator is still up against a pretty tough proposition. All the statements which have been made in the house and on the hustings during the Easter recess are not borne out by the facts as set forth either by the Department of Agriculture itself or by the Bank of Canada. I thought this was the time and place to give those figures and to make the necessary correction, because when I was home at Easter I heard such a great amount of agitation among the people and, I will admit, a great deal of confused thinking and discussion. That is not to be wondered at. As I travelled on the trains and busses, and on the street cars in Winnipeg I found that people, whether they were farmers or not, were talking about a previous debate on a very important matter connected with agriculture that had taken place just before the Easter recess. Those people said they were entitled to be confused in their discussion, and they did not think it would be any worse than the discussion that took place in the house between the ministers and members of parliament for a couple of weeks before the Easter recess.

I want to tell the committee that, at least in the prairie provinces, there is great concern about the plight of the agriculturist, on the average. I am not denying the fact that some agricultural operators with modern equipment are getting by pretty well. But the great majority of the farmers, those on the small holdings, as is borne out by this booklet from the Department of Agriculture, are having a very tough time of it. Many of them are not able to provide a living for their families from their farms.

I wish to put those facts on the record. I know we will wait expectantly for a statement from the minister before these estimates are passed as to what agriculture may expect in the near future, in these most harrowing times with which many farmers are having to contend right now. I wished also to put this information on the record because there are many people who blame the high cost of living on the farmer and, in the majority of cases, that is not the situation. I wish to make it clear, if possible, that the farmer is not to blame in many instances for the greatly increased cost of living.

At another time I referred to an article which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune dealing with prices in Minneapolis and Winnipeg. I did not go into detail because I thought it would be out of order. I have not the chart before me now. However, one hon. member from Saskatchewan found fault with me for criticizing what the farmers were receiving in Winnipeg. The point borne out by the article was that there is something wrong in this country in connection with processing and cost to the consumer, as compared with what farm producers get.

For most of the commodities referred to in the article appearing in the Tribune the farm producer in the United States near Minneapolis was receiving more for his raw products than was the farmer in western Canada. Yet when the farm or urban wife over there went to purchase a processed article she was able to do so at a cheaper price in Minneapolis than it could be purchased in Winnipeg.

That is the point I am trying to make. I have repeated it in two or three years and given statistics to prove it—that there is something radically wrong in so far as the middleman in this country is concerned. While over there the farmer is much better paid for his raw materials; his wife—and the same applies to the urban wife—can purchase many of those articles for less than they can be bought in this country. That is a condition which should be rectified to some extent.

I hope that after some discussion the minister will give us some lead as to what agriculture may expect in the future. Let me say that agriculture can be depended upon to produce for this nation and to have a surplus of many goods for the underfed nations of other countries. It is most important at a time like this, when the production of essentials is so greatly needed.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I was sorry to see a reduction in the estimates for the Department of Agriculture. Even after the minister's explanation I was sorry to note a reduction of $12 million in the estimates for agriculture during the current year. I know that in view of our defence program every possible saving will have to be made in the various departments but I do think that a healthful agricultural industry, geared to full production, should and must be an important part of our defence program.

I do not think it is a service to agriculture to be cutting the estimates of the minister's department by about 15 per cent. I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Souris, that agriculture at this time faces many grave problems. While the prices for many agricultural products are high, nevertheless agricultural costs are increasing by leaps and bounds. Looking at our prospective markets for the future and our available markets today it does not seem at all certain that agricultural markets are in any sense guaranteed.

I am sorry that as a nation we have not been able to hold the British market for bacon or apples, or other important farm commodities. It is true that, so far, we are getting by through utilizing the Canadian and the American markets to a greater extent. But it does seem to me that the British market, which has been our best outlet in the past, is of great importance for the future, and every effort should be made to regain our position there.

One point I would emphasize, and which I feel is a real threat to Canadian agriculture both in the east and on the prairies, is the great difficulty western farmers are now having in marketing their grain. The eastern producer is interested in getting western oats, barley and wheat. The government is paying a considerable amount of money by way of freight assistance. But before this grain can be of value to agriculture in eastern Canada it has to be moved from the prairie provinces to the lakehead, and by boats to ports in Ontario and other markets in the world. At this time we are faced with the most severe box car shortage in our history; and unless something is done, and done soon, to solve the box car problem on the prairies, we are going to find millions and millions of bushels of grain rotting in the bins, because much of that grain is damp or tough.

It was promised by the Minister of Transport that this serious agricultural problem would be dealt with. The minister assured us that the railways were co-operating and that no stone would be left unturned to improve the situation, even if our Canadian box cars had to be sent back empty from the United States. That statement was made on February 19, and just three days before statistics were published indicating that 29,000 Canadian box cars were in the United States. Approximately a month after that statement was made, on March 15, the date of the last available statistics, there were 4,000 more Canadian box cars in the United States, or a total of 33,000. The net position of the excess of Canadian box cars in the United States increased within that one month period by 2,400 even when we were told that this serious situation was going to be corrected and dealt with.

The Saskatchewan wheat pool estimate that in order to move grain from the prairies to eastern Canada between now and the end of the crop year 1,200 box cars will be required daily. Last year there were only 600 box cars used daily, but this year it looks as though we are not going to have even 600 cars daily unless something is done about this serious situation. We need twice as many box cars as we had last year and we have not nearly as many cars as we had a year ago.

The Saskatchewan wheat pool has called upon the government to appoint a controller to handle the box car situation and to see that our Canadian box cars are returned from the United States. I remember a few years ago when the problem was the other way around and we were retaining United States box cars. If my memory serves me correctly a Mr. Eric Johnston was appointed controller and he placed an embargo on United States cars coming to Canada. The result was that United States cars in Canada were soon sent home. I think it is time the government appointed a controller and put an embargo on Canadian box cars going to the United States in order to bring about a return of Canadian box cars from that country.

The Minister of Agriculture is a man of considerable ability in a great many ways and I am sure that he would have some influence on the government in seeing that something was done about this matter. I am taking advantage of this first opportunity since the announcement made by the Saskatchewan wheat pool to ask the minister to use his influence with his colleagues in the cabinet in order to have this shortage of box cars corrected, and to ensure that we have sufficient box cars between now and July 31, the end of the crop year, to move all the grain off the farms to the head of the lakes, to the eastern feeders and to the export markets of the world so that this food, which is such a valuable commodity at this time, will not be allowed to spoil on our western farms.

I would hope that the Minister of Agriculture could give the committee some idea as to what the government is doing to remedy this situation. Another statement by the Minister of Transport, if it does no more good than his statement on February 19, will only result in a greater number of Canadian box cars going to the United States. That minister told us that the problem was going to be dealt with, that not a stone would be left unturned to see that we had sufficient box cars to handle the shipment of Canadian grain. Nothing has resulted from that statement except that the situation is much worse. Therefore I ask the Minister of Agriculture to tell us what the government is likely to do in order that grain on western farms may be brought to market and not be in danger of spoiling this spring.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, may I say that I very rarely have found the farmers in my constituency so gloomy and disposed to a sort of peculiar kind of despair as they are at the present time. Not only are they facing the difficulties which have been discussed already, but the income tax which is being levied on our farming population is becoming destructive of productive courage and initiative. I do not propose to discuss this matter at any great length at the present time, but if we are going to maintain our agricultural productive machine in working order we shall simply have to do a whole lot more than shrug our shoulders concerning some of these matters which are destroying the morale of the agricultural population of western Canada. I do not know whether the same thing is taking place in eastern Canada.

Having said that, may I turn to another matter about which I am sure the minister has heard. The farmers in my constituency are positive that it will be the merest kind of justice to them if between now and an early date in the spring there should be contributed by the dominion government another $48 million to the pool fund to be divided among the farmers as minimum compensation for the 30 cents per bushel subsidy that the Canadian wheat growers paid to the Canadian consumers in order to keep down the price of their bread. I support the farmers of my constituency in this contention.

On pages two and three of a pamphlet entitled, "The case for the western wheat grower", reprinted and distributed by the Alberta wheat pool, Calgary, under date of December 1, 1950, is set forth the statement that between March 1, 1945, and February 17, 1947, 160,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat were consumed by Canadians in Canada. If that 160,000,000 bushels of wheat had been sold to Britain the price would have been $1.55 per bushel. If it had been sold to any other nation than Canada it would have brought more than $1.55 per bushel. It was sold by the wheat board to Canadian millers at 77⅜ cents per bushel. The wheat board received from the Canadian government an additional 47⅝ cents per bushel, which constituted a direct government subsidy on all wheat going into Canadian bread.

Mr. Gardiner: On a point of order, I do not want to interfere with the discussion but this matter does not come under my estimates at all. The general discussion on the first item of the estimates of a department should be confined to what the estimates cover. The matter under discussion now is one which would be dealt with either under the estimates of the Department of Finance or under the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, certainly not in the estimates of this department.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, the minister himself said at the opening of his remarks that it was customary to allow a wide range of latitude on the first item.

Mr. Gardiner: On agricultural estimates, not on somebody else's.

Mr. Blackmore: This matter certainly applies directly to agriculture. Let no one ever question that for a minute.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I should like a ruling. The question that is being discussed does not come under these estimates in any way at all.

The Chairman: The point of order is well taken. The question has already been decided by the house, and there is nothing in the estimates concerning this matter.

Mr. Blackmore: There is plenty to talk about without going further, but I will just say that the result of the whole set-up has been that the wheat growers paid directly as a subsidy to the consumers of Canada 30 cents a bushel on every bushel of wheat that the Canadian consumers used throughout that period. There have been criticisms from eastern Canada and other parts. Therefore I urge every single member of the house to take into consideration that that fact actually occurred. We will leave that aspect of it. When you take 30 cents a bushel—and I am passing rapidly to bow to your decision—on 160 million bushels you have $48 million, and that is what all the farmers of western Canada believe ought to be given as the bare minimum remuneration for that most astonishing procedure.

There are five main considerations which I believe ought to be borne in mind in dealing with the problem of the farmers of western Canada. In the first place—and this again touches on the first point but it will be the last one that will touch on the question of the $48 million—the $65 million was only part payment of the amount of money which was absolutely stolen by the government from Canadian farmers raising wheat, and "stolen" is the word. No communist ever did any worse than to seize vast hundreds of millions of dollars from producers, and there is no question that it was done. The matter can be established and will be established just as soon as this question is in such order that the Minister of Agriculture cannot object.

Western wheat growers have paid huge sums in taxes. When we were discussing the $65 million item not very long ago you would have thought that every single dollar to pay that amount was coming out of Ontario.

Mr. Cardiff: A lot of it did, just about half.

Mr. Blackmore: Of course it did but you must understand that a lot of it came out of the west. In a few minutes I am going to give some facts which are just as strong as the ones the hon. member for Souris gave.

An hon. Member: How about Temiscouata?

Mr. Blackmore: We will come to Temiscouata in due time. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that what has happened out there is a matter that simply must be recognized. If we have got to stay here until next December to get everybody in the house to understand this matter we will stay here until we do, because we westerners simply cannot be kicked around the way we are being kicked around by people who do not understand our problem.

The next point developed by the hon. member for Souris was well taken. The farmers are not well off notwithstanding the propaganda that has been spread abroad throughout the country. The farmers once again, Mr. Chairman—and I presume this is completely in order—are being forced right now to subsidize the people of Canada, Great Britain and thirty-seven other countries right now to the extent of 37 cents a bushel on every bushel of wheat consumed in those countries.

The Canadian farmer is much worse off than the farmer in the United States, as the hon. member for Souris pointed out. I propose to give some facts to bear out the statements I have made which hon. members can read at their convenience. Perhaps I shall be out of order if I read the first one, Mr. Chairman. It is a statement by the Alberta wheat pool on March 16, 1951, bearing upon the question of the necessity of the $48 million being paid. If that is out of order I simply will not read it now but I will do so at a later time.

Let me come to the matter of taxation. I want to say that since I have been in this house I have never objected to any favour given to any part of the Dominion of Canada. I have always supported hon. members in their contentions. Dear me, if they are suffering losses in the production of their apples I would be the first one to support something to help them, and the same with fishing or any other product of the Dominion of Canada.

If the producers of the goods that make Canada what she is are suffering, and therefore unable to produce those goods, that fact is one of the most serious considerations for the whole of the Dominion of Canada whose wealth and well-being are directly related to the production of goods by every group of producers throughout the nation. When I speak directly to some members from other parts of the country—and I hope I do not have to—I trust they will remember that I have been here fifteen years and I have seen the Canadian parliament in operation for all of those fifteen years.

An hon. Member: Too long.

Mr. Blackmore: I realize it is too long for some hon. members. They would give a lot if they could get me out of here but my constituents have not felt that way. Here is an article written by Chester A. Bloom, and I imagine easterners will accept this man because he seems to be a quite popular and respected writer. The article is to be found in the Lethbridge Herald for March 24, and must have appeared in a great many other papers. The heading is "The Prairie Farmers Pay". The article reads:

> During the five-year wheat pool including the four-year Canada-U.K. wheat agreement, while selling their wheat to Britain at cut-rate prices, the prairie farmers paid 77 per cent of all the farm income taxes in Canada. During the four years of the U.K. wheat agreement, 1946-49 inclusive, the prairie farmers paid 81 per cent of all the farm income taxes paid in Canada.

These are the very men to whom you are giving $65 million now.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): May I ask a question? Who hires Chester A. Bloom?

Mr. Blackmore: You may ask all the questions you desire.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Who hires Chester A. Bloom?

Mr. Blackmore: You may ask all the questions you desire.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): That is a straight question. Who hires Chester A. Bloom?

Mr. Blackmore: How in the name of common sense do you imagine I know, or anybody else? The hon. member's question if it is anything at all is a direct insult to Chester A. Bloom. It presupposes that Chester A. Bloom will not tell the truth. The hon. member had better be careful to get his facts right before he challenges the figures that are given here. Meanwhile, may I tell the hon. member that is one of the cheapest questions I have ever been asked on the floor of the house, and especially coming from a man from the prairies.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): On a point of order, it is not a cheap question.

Mr. Blackmore: It is.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, it is in order for hon. members to raise points of order in this house. The hon. member is just making a speech for his constituents and I am getting rather tired of it.

Mr. Blackmore: You will get a lot more tired. Let us hear the point of order.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The point of order is that you cannot cast a reflection upon an hon. member.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member cast the reflection upon himself; I cannot do any better than he did. As I said a moment ago, the amount paid in those four years by the western wheat growers was $48,254,000 out of a total of $59,489,000 paid in farm income taxes from coast to coast in Canada. I continue quoting from Chester Bloom's article:

> The farmers of the three prairie provinces were getting gypped two ways—their wheat was sold at bargain prices while they carried more than three-quarters of the farm tax load in Canada.
> The answer is easy—their wheat was sold by a government board. The government tax collectors knew every cent of their income—not so with all the other farmers of Canada. No wonder governments like handling farm products through boards.

The 1950 farm tax returns are not yet available. But the prairie farmers have been paying an average of more than $12 million a year in farm income taxes. Their 1950 taxes will surely be up to the average so, during the five-year pool into which the government is making a $65 million final payment, the prairie farmers will have paid taxes in that period within $5 million of the $65 million.

It is quite obvious why the government did not use these figures to rebut some of the $65 million criticisms. It is one of the big national tax scandals of Canada.

Remember, this is an easterner talking, and he is talking so all easterners may hear him.

Here are some of the figures culled from a return furnished February 22 last by the Department of National Revenue answering a question asked in the house by H. R. Argue, M.P., Assiniboia:

In 1946, the total farm income taxes collected in Canada were $9,843,000 of which prairie farmers, largely wheat growers, paid $8,143,000 or 82·5 per cent.

1947—Total Canadian farm income taxes collected, $13,581,000; prairie farmers paid $10,567,000 or 77 per cent.

1948—Total Canadian farm income taxes collected, $18,095,000; three prairie provinces paid farm income taxes of $14,168,000 or 78 per cent.

Mr. Hatfield: We didn't make any money in the east.

Mr. Blackmore: Well, remember that this is not a sign that they were making money. After they paid their income taxes and looked after all the other details most of these people had no money left.

1949—Total Canadian farm income taxes collected $17,970,000; three prairie provinces farm taxes, $15,385,000 or 85 per cent.

The only provinces which came anywhere near approaching these prairie records of farm income taxes were the immensely wealthy farming province of Ontario whose farmers in 1949 paid $1,940,000 in farm income taxes while British Columbia farmers paid $544,000. Quebec farmers paid only $51,000. The smaller populated maritime provinces that year paid farm income taxes of: Prince Edward Island $4,000; Nova Scotia, $33,000; New Brunswick, $11,000; and Newfoundland, $2,000.

Even before the Canadian wheat board had records of prairie farmers' wheat receipts, however, the three prairie provinces were furnishing since 1941 more than 50 per cent of the total farm income taxes collected in Canada. Here are the records 1941 to 1945 inclusive:

1941—Total farm income taxes collected, $1,592,000; prairie payments, $860,000; 1942—total farm income taxes paid, $3,372,000; prairie payments, $2,045,000; 1943—total for Canada, $11,630,000; prairies paid $8,563,000; 1944—total for Canada, $20,482,000; prairies paid, $16,838,000; 1945—total for Canada, $13,392,000; prairies paid $8,047,000.

I guess the hon. member who wanted to ask me a question feels a little unnecessary now. I do not need any authority attached to those figures; they stand on their own feet.

There are other difficulties still, in addition to the points made by the hon. member for Souris. As I was saying, there exists a general idea that the western farmers are well off. The statement by the hon. member for Souris indicated that general impression. I would commend the admirable work of the Minister of Justice in giving those very speeches to which objection was taken, because he faced the whole situation honestly and straightforwardly and showed that Britain was not in any way responsible for the difficulties in which the prairie farmers find themselves. That is a great thing, because if we can find out just who is responsible we shall know upon whom to call to discharge the responsibility.

Now I should like to point out just how well off the farmers were with this $1.83 a bushel. The Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out—and this is not intended as any reflection on him—that $1.83 was probably the very best payment the farmers had received; and I think the Minister of Justice pointed this out also. Let us see. I am quoting from the Searle Grain Company letter—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: I hear a lot of silly cackling, but the Searle Grain Company can give accurate figures as well as anyone else. They interpret the figures in their own way and I have no sympathy with the way that company interprets the figures.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I am going to raise another point of order. You cannot read the Searle grain report in this house, because it changes every week, as every farmer knows. I am getting tired of these constant reports. If you agree with the Searle Grain Company, say so.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member must be quite ill tonight; he does not seem able to get things straight in his mind. I think he will be quite surprised when he reads his remarks in Hansard tomorrow.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I am raising the point of order.

The Chairman: The hon. member is quite in order.

Mr. Blackmore: I am reading now from the Searle Grain Company letter of March 28, 1951, on page 2:

Some people are saying that prairie wheat growers must be quite well off because they have received for five years an average price for their wheat of $1.83, which is a higher price, it is alleged, than has been registered in the history of grain marketing for any five years.

These speakers forget one important fact, that farmers do not live on price, but only on what price will buy, and that the Canadian dollar has suffered a serious depreciation in purchasing power in recent years, to the extent, according to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics publication entitled "Price Index Numbers of Commodities and Services Used by Farmers, Basis 1935-39," that $1.83 is worth today no more than approximately 86 cents, and that $1.83 has had on the five years average a purchasing power of only $1.03 in terms of the purchasing power in 1935-39. The 61 years of recorded official grain prices reveal that there have been only two periods of five years when the price farmers received averaged as low a purchasing power, on the 1935-39 basis, as the $1.83 has had for the past five years. For the majority of all the 61 years the price received by farmers has given them a purchasing power for a bushel of wheat considerably higher than the purchasing power for the last five years at the price of $1.83.

That puts an entirely different light on the $1.83 a bushel, does it not? Then I go on to one more paragraph:

The initial price of $1.60, which farmers are now receiving under the international wheat agreement has, on a 1935-39 basis, a purchasing power of only 75 cents. This is the real reason why farmers today are so gravely discontented, for they find they simply cannot pay their high-cost 1951 bills with this depreciated Canadian currency and with the present price of wheat.

Now, I am quite sure that even the member who has interrupted me twice will realize that his points were very poorly taken when he reads this.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The member who interrupted wants to ask again whether you believe these Searle grain reports that you have read.

Mr. Blackmore: Let me ask the hon. member, who is so foolishly irresponsible he is making himself silly—

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. No member in this house can say that another member makes himself silly. I have yet to watch a sillier member than the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Blackmore: If the word "silly" is too strong—

The Chairman: I wish to say that the discussion should relate to the item under consideration.

Mr. Blackmore: I was just going to answer the hon. member who raised the question, and whose information concerning this matter seems to be utterly deficient for a man representing a western constituency, and I am asking if he questions the figures which are given by the dominion bureau of statistics publication, "Price Index Numbers of Commodities and Services used by Farmers, basis 1935-39". I do not think he will, but if he does it will make him look foolish, which is just as bad as silly.

Now, the next important matter is one which was developed by the member for Souris, and that is the comparative prices which farmers received in Canada as related to the prices which farmers in the United States received.

I am reading again from the Searle Grain Company report of March 28, 1951, on the last page. Once more I believe we shall find these figures are authentic. It reads as follows:

According to the United States government publication, Agricultural Prices, dated February 28, 1951, on page 8, the farmers of North Dakota received on February 15 at their country elevators for the average quality of wheat they hauled $2.24 a bushel compared with the price received by Canadian farmers at their average country points and for the average grade they delivered of $1.20. The Canadian average price is based on initial payment of $1.60 Fort William and for the average grades between No. 4 and No. 5. This prairie wheat, however, is being sold by the wheat board at $1.88 for No. 1 northern . .

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, my hon. friend says that he is giving authentic figures. Every member from western Canada at least knows that the farmers have not been selling wheat for $1.20.

Mr. Blackmore: I did not say $1.20.

Mr. Argue: It is down to 83 cents.

Mr. Blackmore: I shall read the details again since some of them might have confused the minister. I shall read the whole thing.

According to the United States government publication, Agricultural Prices, . . .

If these people are wrong, all right. I have always found these people to be correct, although I do not agree with them as to—

Mr. Dewar: Then why call them to witness?

Mr. Blackmore: If you would just let me—

Some hon. Members: Order. Sit down.

Mr. Dewar: An hon. member cannot call someone to witness if he is not going to rely on him.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member will cool down by tomorrow. The fact is, I do not agree with the Searle grain people as to—

Mr. Dewar: Then do not call them to witness.

Mr. Blackmore: —their belief that we should sell our grain on the open market. I do not agree with them at all in that respect. However, I have never found their figures to be in error and I have been dealing with them for fifteen years.

Mr. Dewar: I have been dealing with them for twenty years.

Mr. Blackmore: If the hon. member would just let a person speak and say what he has to say, the hon. member would not make himself look foolish. The minister would like to hear this, so I shall read it again.

According to the United States government publication, Agricultural Prices, dated February 28, 1951, on page 8, the farmers of North Dakota received on February 15 at their country elevators for the average quality of wheat they hauled $2.24 a bushel compared with the price received by Canadian farmers at their average country points and for the average grade they delivered of $1.20.

Mr. Gardiner: Everyone knows that is not correct; that is the advance payment on wheat, it is not the price of the wheat delivered.

Mr. Argue: The minister is out of order.

Mr. Gardiner: It is only part of the price.

Mr. Blackmore: That is correct, but the advance payment is what the farmer has to live on.

Mr. Gardiner: That is not what the Searle report says, so what the Searle report says is not correct.

Mr. Blackmore: We will leave the minister to fight that out with them. This is based on the average grades, and when the minister examines the statement he will find he has not much to complain about.

The Canadian average price is based on initial payment of $1.60 Fort William and for the average grades between No. 4 and No. 5. This prairie wheat, however, is being sold by the wheat board at $1.88 for No. 1 northern, which might leave another 28 cents to come later as a final payment at the end of this crop year. Even so, however, Canadian farmers will still be receiving only $1.48 at country elevators, compared with the $2.24 being paid to North Dakota farmers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to go any further into this matter tonight, but certainly at a future time I intend to go into it. As I said the other day in response to a speech by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent, those farmers who went into that great Palliser Triangle area some sixty years ago, and who have struggled against adverse conditions of numerous types for more than half a century, in season and out of season, those men who by sheer courage and self-sacrifice have made from that desert area, which Captain Palliser declared was unfit for farming, one of the most productive areas in Canada, are deserving of credit and aid. As witness of that fact let me cite the figure of over 1,425 million bushels of grain from western Canada sold during the time of the British-Canada wheat agreement—and that is the area that Captain Palliser said would not be fit for human habitation!

The point I am endeavouring to establish is this. If we are wise in Canada we will lend these people a helping hand so that they can roll out to us again the hundreds of millions of bushels of grain. All they are asking at this time is that they be returned some of the hundreds of millions of dollars which have been deliberately stolen from them by government policy. Anyone who laughs about that just emphasizes his own ignorance, because it is true, as the hon. member for Battle River and the hon. member for Acadia has shown. As I say, I am closing my remarks tonight, but this is not the last I am going to say in advocacy of the proposition that the dominion government at an early date contribute $48 million more to the pool fund for the farmers of western Canada.

Mr. Hatfield: When the minister makes his statement, I should like him to tell the house why he allowed the potato growers of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island to sell their potatoes below the cost of production. They were sold at practically half the cost of production. During the fall and most of the winter months, up till yesterday, they were sold below the cost of production in spite of the Agricultural Prices Support Act that was passed in this house in 1944. In 1947 the minister stated in this house that during the transition period he did not intend to allow any agricultural product to go below the cost of production, and he was not going to ask any farmer to cut down his production.

The potato business in the Saint John river valley and in New Brunswick has been built up over a period of 45 years. During the last war we sold potatoes under a ceiling. The farmers of that section sold their potatoes from $2 to $2.50 a barrel, when they could have sold them at $5 and $6 a barrel; but they kept within the ceiling price.

When the Agricultural Prices Support Act was put in force in 1944 we were promised that we would be protected on account of selling at ceiling prices during the period from peace to war, or as long as that act was in force. That act is still in force, and yet this fall potatoes were sold at as low as 20 cents a bushel. Most of the farmers who sold potatoes at that low price were veterans who took up land under the Veterans Land Act, or young farmers just starting in to farm. There was no protection for them. They were forced to sell their potatoes for as low as 20 cents a bushel, which is one-third of the cost of production or less. No action was taken by the government, although there was a committee of the marketing board and a committee of the provincial government set up. We had delegations come to Ottawa and wait upon the Department of Agriculture no fewer than three times during that period. They never got any satisfaction or any relief whatever until they came here just before the Easter recess.

Then there was some plan worked out. No one knows yet what the plan is, only that the government has guaranteed on potatoes delivered to the starch factories a price of 22 cents a bushel, not over 22 cents a bushel. They do not guarantee that they will pay over that. They can pay under that. It will depend upon what the marketing boards of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick set as the price. If they set a price below 44 cents a bushel then the government will pay less than 22 cents a bushel, but the government through an arrangement with the provincial government, I believe, is going to pay the farmers if the marketing board price that the two provinces set is 44 cents a bushel. If it is that figure then they will pay 22 cents a bushel, or half of the 44 cents a bushel. Forty-four cents a bushel is the set price of the marketing board at the present time.

The farmer has to grade these potatoes, and they must be No. 1 potatoes. Twenty-five per cent of each load hauled to the starch factories can be No. 1 small. They do not get paid for the potatoes when they deliver them to the factory. The factory pays the 22 cents a bushel that they agreed to pay during the month of April, but the government gives them a participation certificate. I have heard a lot of talk in this house from the western members about participation certificates, but I never thought we would come to them in eastern Canada. I have heard discussions in this house about income tax. Our potato growers are not worrying this year about the income tax. They are worrying about the sheriff coming in and putting them out of doors and forcing them into bankruptcy.

Potato growers in New Brunswick want whatever the government is going to give them, or the provincial government, or whatever government it is going to be. Whatever plan was made between the two governments they want it now because the banks are forcing them—

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask a question? Are not the two starch factories in New Brunswick going to pay the farmers 60 cents a barrel? As I understand, that works out to 22 cents a bushel.

Mr. Hatfield: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: Why is my hon. friend giving the impression that the government is going to pay it? Why is he giving the impression that they are not going to be paid when the potatoes are delivered?

Mr. Hatfield: The starch factories pay their 22 cents a bushel when the potatoes are delivered, but the government's 22 cents a bushel, which they have agreed to pay, is not going to be paid. They receive only a certificate for their 22 cents a bushel until the end of the season. It may be paid before the provincial election in Prince Edward Island. I do not know. That is all they are getting today. The government part of the bargain is a 22-cent participation certificate, being 22 cents a bushel. That certificate is no earthly good to the farmer. The farmers cannot take them to the bank and pay their notes for last year's fertilizer, and they are being forced into bankruptcy every day in our province and in the potato district.

This potato industry was built up as a $20 million industry in the province of New Brunswick. It has been built up over a period of years. The government has done very little toward the building up of that industry. The farmers and the shippers have spent their own money building up that industry, and now it is gone. They have sold their potatoes not only this year but for three years now at less than the cost of production. According to the act and according to the letters I received from Dr. Shaw last spring that was not supposed to happen. He said that the Agricultural Prices Support Act was supposed to help the farmers. This is what he said:

> I would like to point out that the Agricultural Prices Support Act states: "That the board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture . . . and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns for agriculture and those from other occupations."

The Chairman: Order. It being eleven o'clock, shall I report progress?

Mr. Hatfield: I shall have something more to say about it later.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 9, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

S.S. "QUEBEC"

DESTRUCTION BY FIRE ON AUGUST 14, 1950—REPORT OF COURT OF INVESTIGATION

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table the report of the court of investigation into the circumstances of the destruction by fire of the S.S. Quebec off Tadoussac on August 14, 1950. Under the provisions of section 551 of the Canada Shipping Act, the Hon. Mr. Justice Fernand Choquette was appointed on August 18, 1950, as commissioner to investigate and report on the circumstances of the loss of the Quebec. He was assisted by two nautical assessors, Captain Antoine Fournier and Captain Jean-Charles Fraser, and by an engineering assessor, Mr. William Percival.

Counsel appeared for the Department of Transport, for Canada Steamship Lines, Limited, and their officers, and for one of the passengers. During the course of the nineteen hearings held in Quebec city, a total of fifty-two witnesses were heard by the court. Over one hundred exhibits were produced in support of the evidence.

Members will recall that on November 21, 1949, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in my absence tabled the report of the formal investigation into the destruction by fire of the S.S. Noronic. Recommendations contained in the Noronic report resulted in the passenger steamships fire protection regulations being made. When these regulations were promulgated I stated that they would be implemented as far as practicable before the opening of the navigation season of 1950. In the case of the Quebec a very earnest effort was made by the owners to comply with these regulations, and the report indicates that there was considerable new equipment installed. However, due to lack of time, it was not possible for the owners to complete certain fireproof bulkheads and sprinkler systems which were required.

A study of the report reveals that the investigation gave ample opportunity for all persons having knowledge of the disaster to give evidence, as well as the officers and crew, and officials of the board of steamship inspection. All relevant documents were submitted for the examination of the court and I think I may say without fear of contradiction that the investigation was searching, impartial, and thorough.

In his report the commissioner makes the following statement:

> In the circumstances as revealed by the evidence, we are of the opinion that the board of steamship inspection and the Minister of Transport gave reasonable interpretation to section 11 of the regulations of 1950 in authorizing, under prescribed conditions, the issue of the certificate of seaworthiness.

Section 111 of the report, entitled "Origin and Cause of Fire", is most enlightening. The owners, in their representations, claimed that the fire was of an incendiary nature, and made available to the court the opinion of a consulting chemist, Mr. Hazen. It was generally conceded that the fire had its origin in the linen closet.

Expert evidence established to the satisfaction of the court that, having regard to the contents of the linen closet, spontaneous combustion was not possible, nor was it possible that the fire could have been caused inadvertently. Counsel for the Department of Transport expressed the opinion that there was strong presumptive evidence that the fire had been voluntarily set, and the court, in concurring, summed up by saying:

> Mr. Hazen's evidence, considering the circumstances on which it is based and the circumstances in which the aero-electric fire alarm system did not function, does not leave us any alternative. Failing proof to the contrary, we have to hold that the fire on board the S.S. Quebec which occurred on August 14, 1950, off Tadoussac, was deliberately set by one or several individuals whose identity is not established.

The procedure followed in formal investigations of this kind is for the Department of Transport to propound certain questions for the opinion of the court. For the information of the house I quote two of the questions and answers which are recorded in the report:

> Question: What was the cause of the loss of the Quebec, and the loss of life?
> Answer: The Quebec was destroyed by fire, and, according to evidence which was not contradicted, fire was set deliberately by one or several persons whose identity has not been established, and the extinction of that fire was jeopardized by the fact that the aero-electric fire-alarm system was deliberately put out of order.
>
> The cause of the loss of lives was asphyxia by carbon monoxide resulting from inhalation of smoke, as well as secondary charring.
>
> Question: Were the loss of the Quebec and the loss of life caused or contributed to by the wrongful act or default of the owners, Canada Steamship

S.S. "Quebec"

Lines, Limited, Montreal; Captain Cyril Hunter Burch, the master, or by any other person or persons?

Answer: No. There were several individual faults and omissions on the part of members of the crew to go to stations which were assigned to them; moreover, the lack of fire-fighting qualifications and training of the crew is obvious; but, in view of the nature of the fire and the fact that the aero-electric fire-alarm system was put out of order, the evidence does not permit to say positively and beyond all doubt that these defaults, omissions and insufficiencies contributed to the destruction of the ship and the loss of lives.

The commissioner made some six recommendations, the first having reference to personnel and the others having reference to equipment. These recommendations will receive the immediate attention of the department.

With the full implementation of the passenger steamships fire protection regulations of 1950, which must be complied with before different types of ships are placed in commission for the season of 1951, the fire protection standards on Canadian vessels will be the highest required in any maritime nation, and the travelling public will be assured of the best possible protection.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of his statement with respect to the loss of S.S. Quebec. What progress has been made in establishing the identity of or apprehending the persons who are believed to have been guilty of the sabotage which he has just described?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): That is a matter for the court of justice in the province in which the investigation took place. As I stated a moment ago, the evidence indicated that the fire was of an incendiary nature, and I presume it would be up to the authorities in that area to prosecute the offenders. However, when there is no way of finding out who they are, as stated in the report, I am afraid that I cannot enlighten my hon. friend any further.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) if the board of transport commissioners has not gone beyond its authority in granting a navigation licence to the S.S. Quebec although the latter did not have proper fire-fighting equipment as recommended in the report of the investigation into the Noronic fire.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the board of transport commissioners does not grant navigation permits to any company. This privilege belongs to the Department of Transport. The department had authorized the Canada Steamship Lines to make use of this ship after the company had assured the department that it would implement the recommendations made by the Kellock commission in its report on the Noronic fire, since the company could not carry out all the alterations before the shipping season. Thus, we did grant them a licence and the commissioner, Judge Choquette, decided the department was perfectly right in doing so.

VETERANS LAND ADMINISTRATION—ROSELAND PROJECT, WINDSOR, ONT.

Mr. Brown (Essex West):

1. Did the government, through the Department of Veterans Affairs or otherwise, purchase property at Windsor, known as the Roseland project, veterans land administration?

2. Did the Department of Veterans Affairs or the veterans land administration subsequently build on the said lands a number of dwellings, and were these lands and dwellings subsequently sold to individual veterans of world war II?

3. At the time of any such purchase, were investigations made as to taxes or other levies which might form a charge against the said lands?

4. Were the veterans who purchased the lands and premises from the veterans land administration required to engage solicitors for their own protection, and if not, were they recommended not to engage such solicitors?

5. Have any claims been made by the municipality in which such lands are situated for any taxes or local improvement levies which were alleged to be owing at the time of the purchase of the said lands by the veterans land administration?

6. If so, does the government propose to dispute the said claim of the municipality?

7. Alternatively, has the government taken any action to assume such obligation?

Mr. Mutch:

1. Yes; the property was purchased by the director, the Veterans Land Act.

2. The veterans land administration did build a number of buildings on the said lands, and these have been sold to individual veterans pursuant to the terms of the Veterans Land Act, 1942.

3. Yes.

4. The director, the Veterans Land Act, has no authority to require veterans to obtain the services of solicitors for any purpose. The director has no knowledge of any recommendations made to veterans not to engage solicitors in connection with their purchases of lands under the Veterans Land Act, 1942.

5. Claims have been made by the municipality of the township of Sandwich West for alleged arrears of taxes dealt with by a plan for the adjustment and reorganization of the debenture and other indebtedness of the municipal corporation dated the 1st of December, 1946, purporting to be implemented by bylaw No. 1207 of the corporation passed on the 22nd of September, 1947, and approved by the department of municipal affairs for the province of Ontario on the 24th of September, 1947, and approved by the Ontario muncipal board on the 9th of July, 1947, which bylaw and plan and all levies purporting to be made thereunder for the years 1945, 1946, 1947 and 1948 were ratified and confirmed by an act of the province of Ontario known as Township of Sandwich West Act, 1949. The director, the Veterans Land Act, has made payments to the municipality equivalent to the taxes for the years 1945 to 1950, inclusive, that might have been levied on the lands concerned had such lands not been owned by the crown; the present claims relate to levies made pursuant to the above proceedings for the year 1948 and subsequent years in relation to lands sold during those years to veterans and others.

6. No, in view of facts recited in answer to No. 5.

7. See answers to Nos. 5 and 6.

RAILWAYS

ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS FOR MOVEMENT OF WESTERN GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Did the Minister of Agriculture bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport my remarks on Friday evening when I asked if the government would consider appointing a transport controller to allocate railway box cars in such manner as to ensure that western grain is moved off the farms by the end of the crop year?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Yes, the Minister of Agriculture did bring to my attention the remarks made by my hon. friend during the consideration of the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture on Friday. I took the trouble to read the statement made on that occasion by the hon. member, and I am sorry to have to say to him that the statement which he made was misleading and unfair, because the position is not at all as he states it.

When I made a statement in the house on February 19 I indicated that the United States railroads were doing everything in their power to return box cars of Canadian origin to Canada. I stated also on that occasion that no stone would be left unturned to remedy the situation, and that has been the position. Contrary to what my hon. friend said, the position has been bettering itself ever since I made that statement, because of two things: first, because of the action of the United States railroads and, second, because of a committee appointed by the Department of Transport composed of representatives of the lake carriers, the wheat board and the railways of Canada to find ways and means of getting box cars to western Canada as quickly as possible and to those parts of the country where they are most needed.

The facts are that on Friday, April 6, the unfavourable balance of Canadian box cars in the United States had been reduced from a peak of 18,000 to 10,000, a reduction of 8,000 by way of improvement. Further, on that day I saw a letter from the chairman of the wheat board indicating that the situation was bettering itself. To appoint a transport controller at this time would not in my opinion help the situation unless there existed an opposite number to him in the United States. My hon. friend concludes by saying that nothing resulted from the statement made by myself in the house, and that the situation is much worse, but that is a misleading statement. It is far better than it was on February 19. I think if my hon. friend is fair with himself he will take the first opportunity he can to make the necessary correction in Hansard.

Mr. Argue: I think I should have the right, Mr. Speaker, to reply to the minister, in a sentence. I telephoned the bureau of statistics —

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot allow a debate on this subject at this time, but I think the hon. member for Assiniboia should be allowed to make a statement. He said it would be about one sentence.

Mr. Argue: It is a question of privilege, and I will do it in one sentence. The minister has questioned my statement that things have become worse. I will tell him where I got my information. I got it from the transportation division of the bureau of statistics, and I asked them to give me the very latest available statistics. They told me the latest available statistics were for March 15. Those are the ones I quoted, and my statement stands on the basis of the information that I could obtain.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, what my hon. friend says is probably so, but he forgot one very important thing—that there are many United States box cars in Canada. That is what he forgot to put on Hansard. If he had put those figures on Hansard the house would then have had an accurate picture.

Mr. Argue: I was talking about the net position, and the net position was worse on March 15 than when the minister made the statement in February.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a supplementary question. If I may be pardoned for saying so, the record that I received indicated that there were in March 15,000 more Canadian freight cars in the United States than there were United States freight cars in Canada, or twice the ordinary adverse balance. In 1949 the situation was reversed; there were more United States freight cars in Canada. At that time the United States government made a direct appeal to the government of Canada, and action was taken by the government of Canada. I should like to ask the minister whether, having regard to the serious car shortage in western Canada for grain and lumber transport, consideration has been given by the government of Canada to communicating with the United States government for the purpose of having them do something to remedy a situation that is becoming most serious.

Mr. Chevrier: The situation to which my hon. friend refers is due to two main causes. The first is the switchmen's strike in the United States, which interrupted the movement of box cars into Canada. The second is the very serious blizzard that took place in western Canada some weeks ago. If it had not been for those two causes, I think I am safe in saying that the position would have been pretty much as it is each year.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has already taken action in conjunction with our department to ensure the movement of wheat by lake carriers from the head of the lakes down the St. Lawrence up until the 10th or 15th of May. So far as the box car position is concerned, the question of my hon. friend with respect to taking action through the Department of External Affairs is not one for me to dispose of, but it is one to which we have given consideration. Having regard to all the circumstances, we feel in our department that we have done everything we can at this time to deal with the situation. It may be that a transport controller will become necessary in the future. At the moment I say the position is bettering itself; at least that is what the chairman of the wheat board states. It has bettered itself in the last few days to the extent of 5,000 cars.

BUTTER AND EGGS

INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUPPORT PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister prepared to make a statement with respect to the decision of the cabinet as to what the support prices will be for butter and eggs? If not, when can we expect an announcement to be made?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The matter has not yet been discussed by council, the chief reason being that I have still to meet the representatives of the cheese producers of Ontario this week, and after I meet them there will be some discussion of the question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION BY GOVERNMENT AS A RESULT OF STATEMENT BY GENERAL MACARTHUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs in a position yet to answer the question I asked last Thursday, which was as follows:

Is it the intention of the government to take any official action over the latest rebuke by General MacArthur to the elected representatives of the people?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there may be some statements of General MacArthur which have been controversial in character, but I do not know of any particular statement of the general which could be considered a rebuke to the elected representatives of the people; therefore I am not able to deal with the question.

Mr. Coldwell: As a supplementary question, has the minister seen the letter that General MacArthur wrote to representative Martin regarding the Korean situation? If so, has he any comment to make on the proposals made by the general in that letter?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I have seen the letter, and have read it with considerable interest. Our views on the matters contained therein, and other relevant matters, have already been conveyed informally to the United States government, and I do not feel that I should say anything more at this time on the subject.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

WHEAT

QUESTION AS TO OFFER MADE BY CANADA TO INDIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, having to do with a matter of which I gave him notice last week. In view of the decision of the Indian government not to accept the offer of Canadian wheat with strings attached tying it up to the Colombo plan, will the government consider making an outright gift of low grade wheat to the Indian government?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the position with regard to this matter is as follows: the Canadian offer of wheat to India under the Colombo plan had no strings attached, nor has India refused our offer. The only wheat now available for export from Canada is of low grade, No. 5 and 6 Manitoba. As this quality is unsuitable for India, where wheat is used directly in the government rationing system, the Indian government has preferred to wait until our next crop year when a better grade may be available.

HOUSING

FRASERVIEW PROJECT, VANCOUVER—REPORT AS TO DISCONTINUANCE OF FEDERAL CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday last the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) asked about the curtailment of construction in the veterans rental housing project at Vancouver, known as Fraserview. The Fraserview project was planned to provide a total of 1,100 houses which were to be constructed in small groups beginning in 1949. Contracts have been awarded for the construction of 606 houses. When tenders were called for the 1951 construction, the prices tendered were substantially above the corporation's estimates and last year's costs. In view of these higher costs, necessitating correspondingly higher rentals, and in view of the increasing difficulty about an orderly flow of building materials, the corporation has postponed the awarding of contracts for the construction of the remaining houses in Fraserview.

Contracts which have been awarded for land services will be completed. Those areas in which the corporation will not now be proceeding with the construction of houses will be provided with land services to the extent required to give a reasonable level of services to owners of private houses already built in those areas.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Prime Minister if he is now in a position to indicate to the house when he expects to be able to table the report of the Massey royal commission on arts, letters and sciences?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I have not inquired within the last few days. The last information I had was that the printing was expected to be completed about April 20.

CANNED FISH

REPORTED REQUEST BY UNITED STATES DEFENCE DEPARTMENT FOR TENDERS FROM P.E.I.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether the United States defence department has called for tenders on $500,000 worth of canned fish from the province of Prince Edward Island.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have no information as to any such call for tenders, but I shall make inquiries in the department, and if we have any information I shall be glad to give it to my hon. friend tomorrow.

SUPPLY

COST OF LIVING—AMENDMENT, MR. DREW

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): As I indicated previously, Mr. Speaker, I propose to take advantage of this opportunity to discuss the very rapid rise in the cost of living and the evidence of that rapid rise as contained in the figures issued last week by the dominion bureau of statistics.

I need not enlarge upon the figures themselves; they are in the mind of everyone. The announcement last week of a record increase of 4·5 points in the monthly cost of living index for February, carrying the overall cost of living index to an all-time high of 179·7, simply served to emphasize what all Canadian housewives, and in fact Canadians generally, already know. This gave statistical evidence from official government sources of the runaway inflation which is threatening the standard of living of a very large proportion of our people, creating an extremely serious situation for pensioners and others living on small fixed incomes, undermining confidence in many of those long-established investments that are generally regarded by our people as the safest investments, and rendering more difficult the production of those military requirements so vitally needed without delay in our common effort to deal with the defence of freedom.

When this subject was discussed briefly last Thursday there was some tendency on the part of government spokesmen to minimize the necessity for discussion of the matter at this time, and to suggest that because the most recently published figures were for the month of February, and therefore five weeks old, there was no immediate necessity to discuss them. If that argument were followed, this subject would never be discussed; we would never have the figures showing the actual position as of a few days previously. The best we can do is to accept the evidence given us in the form of statistics, which supports what the people generally are finding all too evident in the daily purchase of their household requirements.

My purpose in bringing forward this subject at this time, the earliest moment possible, is not, as was suggested by more than one member on the government side, to repeat in this house figures already issued in the form of statistics. Rather it is to start a debate on this vitally important subject in an effort to impress upon the government the compelling need for immediate and vigorous action to deal with a situation which can have consequences extending far beyond the immediate hardship to many of our people caused by high prices, particularly the extremely high prices of food.

I was interested in the comment of one hon. member last Thursday. He pointed out that in his own area farmers were selling eggs today at a lower figure than six months ago. That may not be the position in every area or with every commodity, but what the hon. member said emphasizes the need for tackling this problem without further delay. The simple truth is that there have been no increases in prices to the farmers which would explain the very great increases in the cost of most of our basic food requirements. Certainly there have been increases, and substantial increases, in some lines. I think it can be clearly demonstrated, however, that the proportionate increase in retail prices has not kept step with the increases to the farmers themselves. The same is true of most other things which have risen so sharply in price in the last few months. There is nothing in the increased cost of most raw materials or of wages that would explain the very large proportionate increase in the cost of most of the basic requirements of our people in connection with manufactured goods of various kinds.

It is only natural that in the discussion of a subject of this kind there should be some tendency to oversimplify the issue and suggest that one particular remedy or another will solve the whole problem. At no time in this house or outside it have I ever suggested that this problem can be overcome by any one simple solution. On the contrary I have contended that there is no simple solution, that there are many aspects to this problem. What is more, I have said both inside and outside this house that the problem is not one for government alone, but that everyone must play some part in tackling what is the No. 1 domestic problem facing parliament and the people of Canada today.

I should like to refer to words that I used on February 27 last during a broadcast discussion of this subject. I repeat them because I think that the subjects I covered there generally cover the headings under which this problem must be tackled. I quote from what I said at that time:

> There are a number of things that we have urged the government to do:
> First, substantially reduce all non-defence expenditures by the government.
>
> Second, encourage the production of every line of civilian requirements so that increased production of these things may ease the strain and pressures which cause inflation.
>
> Third, encourage immigration which will bring to our country vigorous people with the skill and character which will make them useful members of the Canadian community.
>
> Fourth, remove all restrictions which will discourage the building of new houses urgently needed for the steady increase of population by our own normal growth and by immigration.
>
> Fifth, take effective steps to make sure we get full value for every dollar spent on defence.
>
> Sixth, restrain inflation through the control of currency by the Bank of Canada, and by other monetary controls available to the bank under the act which gives it its powers.
> Seventh, introduce emergency controls immediately to the extent that they are required to deal effectively with the cost of living and inflation.

Those words, Mr. Speaker, followed substantially earlier arguments I had made on this subject in this house and elsewhere. I would point out that we introduced a resolution in similar form to the one I will introduce before I sit down, dealing with this very subject when the house met in special session in August of last year. For that length of time we have been urging the government to take the steps which are available to it, under the powers it has assumed through legislation presented here, to deal with a problem that now causes serious concern, not only to the housewives in their daily purchases of food and other supplies for the home, but also to the government itself in its defence program because of the impact of inflation upon the cost of the defence requirements of this country in the months and years to come.

In the oversimplification to which I have already referred, I have seen some suggestions that I have rested my whole argument on price control. That is not so. I have advocated price controls, and I propose to advocate price controls today. I do, however, repeat what I said before, that the most important and effective way of tackling inflation in the long run is to increase production itself. In that way we will avoid artificial pressures which drive up the prices because of more dollars chasing fewer goods. If and when we can reach the point where we are producing all that we need for military purposes, and at the same time producing everything required to fill the normal demands of civilian needs, then price controls and subsidies, if they should be introduced, or any other devices which interfere with the normal movement of competition in prices, can be removed. But until some of these more normal methods can begin to operate—and that cannot happen overnight—some form of price control, and possibly subsidies on certain essential requirements, become necessary to protect our people against the sudden impact of the tremendous government purchases which military preparations have superimposed over and above the ordinary demands of civilian buying.

The proposition has been simply and cogently stated by one of the most vigorous Canadian opponents of controls of any kind, in these words:

> If we have decree from above in respect of production, that is in respect of supply, we must inevitably have decree from above in respect of demand.

That quotation is from an argument against all controls, but I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the logic is absolutely inescapable. The argument put forward in those words cannot be denied. If there is control of production which segregates a substantial proportion of the products of the soil, the factory, the mine or the water, then until there can be a readjustment of production to meet civilian demands through adequate supplies of civilian material, there must be some form of controls at the other end as well.

Mr. Warren: What would you do—make the farmers work harder?

Mr. Drew: If production and supply are under control, particularly when there has been a diversion of production and supply to military purposes as at present, then until production has been expanded to meet both military and civilian requirements, control of prices and other controls to deal with the results of that diversion and segregation must be introduced to such extent and until such time as production can catch up to money supply, so that normal price competition of a free market will again offer some remission to the overwhelming majority of Canadian consumers.

Mr. Warren: The hon. member did not answer my question.

Mr. Drew: I know, Mr. Speaker, that there is the contention that the best protection of the public—

Mr. Warren: Make the farmers work harder.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: —comes from that very play of prices which will offer to the consumer the opportunity of lower prices as well as higher prices. In normal times when producers are free to produce what they wish to produce, and to produce in such quantity as they believe is wise, then the consumer does benefit from price competition in a free market. That competition—

Mr. Warren: Not now.

Mr. Drew: You are right—not now. That competition, through improvement in design or quality, through better selling methods, has over and over again brought down the price of manufactured goods and commodities to the advantage of our people.

At the present time, Mr. Speaker, we are not going to see that free play of prices which will reduce the cost, except in unusual circumstances. There may be unusual circumstances which arise. It is possible that we may see that happen with regard to certain perishable commodities. Right now it looks as if some perishable commodities had been segregated from ordinary demand to a point where the very attempt to increase the price may result in a lower price. But over the broad field of commodities needed by the public, government spending at the present time is creating pressures to increase prices. Consequently I suggest that it is discussing this subject in terms of utter unreality to put forward the proposition that price competition will protect the public at a time like this.

Surely it is not necessary at this time to emphasize the seriousness of the present situation. It affects everyone. Most of all, however, it affects the large number of Canadians who are living on pensions or small fixed incomes established several years ago when the dollar was worth nearly twice what it is worth today. The inescapable truth is that a large number of Canadians already find themselves in a desperate situation. We are not talking about the future; we are talking about the present. Many people who are in receipt of pensions which were fixed years ago at what was regarded as the bare, decent, subsistence level, have been finding for some time that they cannot meet even their ordinary day to day food requirements after they have paid rent and met the cost of fuel and other necessities. Pensions and incomes regarded as adequate for the rest of their lives will not provide housing, clothing, heat and food at present prices. There is increasing evidence of actual undernourishment in various parts of Canada because of the inability of people to secure the kind of food they need after paying rent and buying clothing and other necessities.

One short statement in a letter from a veteran, who is no crank and no chronic malcontent, indicates the thoughts that are passing through the minds of many of our people. I should like to quote just one paragraph from that letter:

> A lot of us would like to die a natural death, or at least not one caused by hardship imposed by the government.

I know that the members of this government individually would be no more anxious than any other Canadian to impose hardship on any of the people. Any argument I put forward is not with the thought that individually any member of this government would disregard the hardship that might be imposed upon the people. I am arguing from the point of view of the people who believe that something should have been done a long time ago, and most certainly should be done now, to protect those who have no means of supplementing their present incomes.

The fact that I would most certainly accord to every member of the government those sentiments toward their fellow Canadians which each one of us shares does not dispose of the fact that people who have been so consistently urged by this government to give the government credit for whatever good times we have should now carry that argument to its present conclusion. If the people who are suffering from inflation blame this government for the plight in which many of them are placed today, it is the natural and inevitable consequence of the propaganda this government has put forward with the utmost vigour to convince the people of this country that every good thing was their direct responsibility as well. The statement I have quoted reflects an attitude in the minds of a great many people which can undermine confidence in government as an institution, no matter what that government may be, at a time when respect for government is part of the very struggle in which we are engaged.

As part of the struggle against communism I seek to impress upon the government, and those members who ordinarily support the government, the importance of continuing in the minds of our people confidence in that system which we seek to hold up as an infinitely better system than the communists are imposing upon so many people throughout the world. It is noticeable that in those countries where runaway inflation destroyed the savings of the people, wiped out the value of their insurance certificates—took away the savings which they had accumulated for their old age—there is today the highest support for the communist party, in those countries which are still free and still have democratic governments. One of the very reasons why in Italy and France, countries with great traditions of free government, there are so many people supporting the communist party is that so many of their people have lost what they thought was going to give them security; therefore they have lost confidence in a system of that kind, and those who live in the same houses, those brought up with them, their children and their grandchildren, have reason for concern about it.

It is not only the old people, the cripples, the blind and those who cannot earn money in the ordinary way who are affected by the effect of inflation upon pensions and fixed incomes. It is all the others who look ahead and ask themselves what their own future is under the system that we are doing so much to preserve. To people who feel that way it is no answer that they be told, as we were told by the Minister of Finance last Thursday, that what is happening here is simply part of a world-wide phenomenon. The hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are having the utmost difficulty in making ends meet are not greatly interested in whether or not it is a world-wide phenomenon. What they want to know is what is going to happen to them right here in Canada. What they want is action in Canada to deal with our own problems, and they want it now. That, Mr. Speaker, is the reason why I will move an amendment to the motion to go into supply.

After all, I suggest that the test of the effectiveness and humanity of any society is the security we offer to our people in their declining years; and most important to the future of our country is the education and opportunity we offer to our youth.

Let me for a few moments deal with that aspect of the problem in its present state. From all across Canada we are being told by educational leaders that education in this country is threatened by the inability of local school boards and educational institutions to pay teachers a sufficient salary to enable them to meet their daily requirements, in the meeting of which they are confronted by the greatly increased cost of living. We are told by these educational leaders that inflation is threatening our whole educational system, and particularly the opportunities to give that higher education upon which the development, expansion and prosperity of this great country must depend in the years ahead.

In varying degrees inflation already presents an extremely serious problem to every Canadian householder. I have already referred to the problem which confronts the pensioners and others on small fixed incomes. We must think also of the demands of the young men and women starting out in life and seeking to lay the foundation of all society, the home. Let us think of what inflation does to the cost of the house itself. Let us also think of what it means to the cost of furnishing that house; and let us not forget that usually young people who are considering marriage are not in high income brackets, and they must have some regard to the possibility of their being able to meet the special demands of early married life, after paying the prices that must be paid for all their basic requirements.

Young people who are already married or contemplating marriage will not be greatly impressed by new taxation as a method of controlling inflation, when they find the present taxation serious enough as it is. Now is the time to say, in no uncertain terms, that to a great many people increased taxation, far from being anti-inflationary, is going to be the most inflationary thing that could possibly happen. To a considerable part of our population, and particularly to the young people, where the impact of inflation is felt all along the line, added taxes can be just as inflationary as shortage of supplies. This point is very well put forward in the Observer, of Hartland, New Brunswick, in its issue of April 5. I quote this wise observation:

> A serious impediment to marriage nowadays is the increasing difficulty of supporting the government and a wife at the same time.

These words, Mr. Speaker, which reflect the wisdom of the hon. member of this house who has some responsibility for their publication, come directly to the serious problem that is confronting the young people of today who contemplate building a home. When they have to consider what they are going to pay in taxes, when they consider the rising cost of living, those who approach this extremely important matter with any measure of cool judgment must have some concern about their ability to establish what is really the basis of our society.

It is not necessary to enlarge upon all the difficulties caused by inflation. The consequences are being felt on all sides. It is true that it is a world-wide problem. I suggest, however, that it is not a phenomenon; it is in fact a perfectly simple result from a situation which has been analysed over and over again in the past. In varying degrees this same problem is being faced in all free countries which are now compelled to devote such a large part of their national income to defence production. There is nothing mysterious or unexpected about it. Once the urgent duty of any nation is suddenly to build up its defences and, for that purpose, to divert a considerable part of its resources and manpower, one danger above all others presents itself in the domestic field, and that is the danger of inflation.

No form of production and no diversion of human effort is so largely calculated to create demands beyond the limits of supply. On the one hand there is the withdrawal from active productive work of a substantial part of the national manpower, and on the other hand there is the diversion from normal production of a large part of the raw materials and other products which ordinarily would satisfy civilian demands. Resources and manpower segregated for this purpose are withdrawn from the normal economy, while the wages and prices required for them are added to the ordinary financial demands of our economy.

Those inflationary pressures here and in every other country are the inevitable result of a sudden demand for military preparation such as that with which Canada was confronted last year, and with which it is confronted on a higher level today. To that extent it is a world-wide problem, and not a phenomenon. A phenomenon implies something unusual; this is the usual and inescapable result of sudden defence expenditures of this kind. It is known to every man and woman in Canada who has the slightest understanding of simple economics.

The only phenomenon created in this situation is that, for some reason not yet explained, the Canadian government seems to think that it is the only government of any important industrial nation which can go through this period of adjustment without adopting price controls or other measures to remedy the situation.

Surely the United States, above every other nation in the world, has been put forward as the exponent of free enterprise. Its vast productive power today is a tribute to the energy of free peoples under a free competitive system. Nevertheless that country has adopted price controls. I submit that it is no answer to say that price controls have not yet proved satisfactory in the United States. They have been undertaken, and it is quite clear that the United States is going to make a determined effort to have effective price controls and to stabilize the economic conditions in that country.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Drew: Only last week Mr. Wilson, who certainly would be regarded as an exponent of free enterprise, made it clear that they were going to move forward with the utmost vigour to remedy the weaknesses already displayed in the earlier steps they have taken. I heard one hon. member say "When", when I mentioned that they were taking steps to control prices. One of the difficulties which have confronted the government of the United States is that they did not have a price control system or a price control organization set up to deal with this at the time price controls were started.

In discussions earlier in this house we contended that this government should set up a skeleton price control system even if it was not ready to go ahead with this at an earlier date. That has been advocated by leading economists across this country. After all, as I remember, members of this government have stated over and over again that we showed the whole world how price controls can work. If that is so, surely we are the ones who can best say how they can work, and we do not need to look to somebody else to find out what we should do.

I suggest that it is worthy of note that all the great industrial countries with which we are associated in this enterprise have deemed it necessary to adopt some form of price controls at this particular time. It is my hope that price controls may become unnecessary at the earliest possible date. No matter how closely our arguments may follow the same line today, I certainly am not joining those who advocate over-all controls as part of the normal economic system within our country. May I say in fairness that I have not heard those arguments put forward in the debates that have taken place in this house this year.

I am advocating the introduction of controls because of the inescapable fact that if you have control of production you must have control of distribution and sale and price until such time as the production of the country can create that ordinary price competition which offers protection to the purchaser in a free economy. I am convinced that the sooner price controls are put into effect, the more effective they are and the more effective all controls are that are necessary at this time, the sooner we will have freedom from all controls which hinder the ordinary free operation of a free economy.

In presenting the arguments that I am putting forward I present them in the belief that no other country in the world today is capable of meeting the demands of the vast struggle in which the free nations are now engaged with so little dislocation to its normal life and with such bright prospects for the years ahead. I am not saying that as any loose expression of optimism. Production is the answer. In the end production will determine how free our economy can be. With a country with resources so much greater than those possessed by any similar number of people in the world, we Canadians have it within our power to expand our production in such a way that in most lines we will meet all our military demands and at the same time carry our civilian production to ever-higher levels. Before that fortunate position can be reached however there must be an intervening period when production cannot possibly avoid disastrous inflation because of the sudden pressures created by those military demands.

When it is argued that there should be price controls to deal with this situation, that there should be rent controls and such other controls as will meet these abnormal pressures constantly imposed upon our economy, there are those who immediately jump to the conclusion that we are recommending the full imposition of every control found necessary during the war. That is not so. I have sought to make it clear on earlier occasions in this house that much more moderate controls, much more flexible controls would be sufficient to deal with the situation which has arisen until such time as we have built up our production to the point where we can take care of both civilian and military demands in most lines of production

We are told that controls would hamper production. In fact I am under the impression that speaking in Toronto not very long ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) suggested that controls would interfere with our efforts at this time. For that reason I should like to read what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said in this house on March 27, 1947, as reported on page 1813 of Hansard. He said:

> The primary question that was asked of me was whether controls had hampered production. I can conscientiously say that since I have been associated with controls, which is from their inception, controls have never been permitted to hamper production. In fact, controls at the moment are greatly stimulating production in several important lines.

Mr. Howe: I did not say anything different in Toronto.

Mr. Drew: In Toronto the Minister of Trade and Commerce left the impression that he was most anxious not to see controls introduced because he believed that the circumstances did not indicate that we would be able to carry forward our activities as effectively as we could under the system we now have.

Mr. Howe: That was neither the statement nor the implication. I know because I made the speech.

Mr. Drew: Naturally I will let the speech stand by itself. I am prepared to accept without any balancing the statement I have just quoted as to the effect of price controls. The minister has now indicated that his view has not changed. He nods his head in approval so we can take the minister's statement on March 27, 1947, as his statement today and as to his views in regard to price controls, that is that he can conscientiously say that price controls have never hampered production.

Mr. Howe: Correct.

Mr. Drew: The minister says "correct". The minister now brings his statement up to date. I am pointing out that the real issue before the house is not whether there should be price controls, but when. The government has made it clear, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce indicates that his views are still the same, that price controls at some point become desirable and necessary. Therefore the question with which we are mainly concerned today is not the form, is not the details, but when.

Mr. Howe: Now you are going away beyond the statement you just read.

Mr. Drew: No. I shall read other statements which indicate how far the government has gone in that respect. I find it most difficult, in view of some of these statements, to understand the government's reluctance to deal with this situation today, unless it does not believe that inflation is serious in this country. I believe it is. I believe that unless something is done right away, no matter how long ago it should have been done and it should have been done a long time ago, there are going to be increasing pressures which we have not even seen yet that will make the rise continue at an accelerated pace which will create great dangers to our whole economy in the months ahead. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was not alone in comments of that nature. On April 1, 1947, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), just a few days later than the Minister of Trade and Commerce, had this to say, as recorded at page 1938 of Hansard:

> During the war our policy was to prevent inflation and to provide and enforce a fair distribution of goods which were in short supply. Prices were held under a pretty rigid price ceiling; but that policy worked. We are more than ever convinced that this over-all price ceiling policy was the only policy which could have worked successfully.

Granted that we are not yet in a struggle imposing the demands upon us which were imposed at that time, even though the degree may be different the effect is the same, and we see today what can happen if these pressures are allowed to continue unchecked. In 1945 the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who was not then prime minister, had this to say on November 23 when he was arguing in favour of the retention of controls, but his argument for the retention of those controls applied to circumstances similar to those with which we are confronted today. In part this is what he said, as reported at page 2451 of Hansard for that session:

> . . . it is my view that if all remaining controls were removed today the consequences would be immediate, drastic and far-reaching. Prices would rise sharply; the cost of living would move steeply upward: existing shortages in food, housing accommodation and clothing, which are the three most important items in living costs, are such that sharp price advances would appear to be inevitable. The immediate price increases resulting from the hungry market and the removal of subsidies on such key commodities as milk, bread, butter, cotton textiles would accumulate rapidly as workers sought to protect themselves through wage increases, as producers raised their prices in response to rising wages and material costs, as buyers scrambled for goods and shelter to protect their individual needs, and as the speculative tendency gained momentum.

May I repeat those words, "and as the speculative tendency gained momentum."

> It would be difficult to say how high the cost of living would go before the inevitable collapse. At first, higher prices in the United States and in other countries would stimulate increases here. Later perhaps price levels of the United States, if that country maintained some measure of control, might provide a ceiling. Nevertheless it seems to me clear that the increase in the Canadian cost of living before the recession set in would be very substantial, and the consequences of this would appear to be serious. The weaker producer groups in the community would be unable to increase their incomes to compensate for the higher cost of living. Savings of the whole Canadian people would depreciate. The returned service man would get poor value for his gratuity and re-establishment grant. Dependents of those fighting men who, unfortunately, did not return, would face serious privations. Pensioners and others who have made provision for their old age, through life insurance or other means, would find that that provision would be imperilled and their security materially lessened.

I have read at this length from the statement of the present Prime Minister because these words accurately describe the situation with which we are confronted today. These words clearly indicate that as far back as 1945 the present Prime Minister was fully possessed of all the information which would indicate to him why pressures of this kind would create a situation that could only be dealt with by price controls and by other appropriate controls, no matter how temporary they might be. It is for that very reason that I suggest that the government has itself brought about a considerable part of this inflation.

The government in the election of 1945 at the end of the war conducted its campaign very largely on what it had accomplished in keeping down the cost of living by controls. It put forward the proposition that no country in the world had so effectively dealt with this situation without imperilling production or the ordinary living conditions of our people. Canadians had reason to remember that. Canadians had reason to believe that a government with such firm convictions expressed at that time would be likely to reassert those convictions in relation to precisely the same factors, even if those factors might be on a different scale.

Then I recall the words of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce when he raised the question as to whether the people of this country would be prepared to assume the burden of a huge bureaucracy to deal with this subject. Again I point out that the people of this country probably remembered how strongly the government had supported this position and some of the reasons it had given for accepting their arguments in this respect. I find that Mr. Ilsley, whose efforts as minister of finance have been extolled on many occasions by present members of the government, had this to say on April 1, 1947, as reported at page 1926 of Hansard for that year:

> From these estimates it is possible to see that the cost of the control program was under $200 million a year, while the savings to the consumer purchasers and government as a buyer were on this hypothesis possibly $2,500 million a year. The figures are tentative, but do give some idea of the relative magnitude of the cost of and the savings effected by the government price control program.

If Mr. Ilsley's figures are correct, then relating the cost of the organization to its results we certainly would not be in a position to challenge, as contrary to economy, steps which would show an advantage to the Canadian people on any such proportionate basis. If that is so, then some of the arguments that have been made against setting up a vast bureaucracy to handle this matter would not apply in the same way that they would to a vast bureaucracy dealing with other things which would not produce any direct benefits to the people of Canada.

The people of Canada undoubtedly remember all these arguments that were put forward. Then there is another reason why we have inflation that goes beyond ordinary pressures. I have said before, and I repeat, that there are pressures today that are not to be measured in terms of the increased cost of our basic resources and the increased wages in this country. There is not one of us who does not know that prices have risen by a much higher figure. When the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) pointed out that one of the ways to tackle inflation was to stop the marking up of prices unnecessarily in this country he undoubtedly was putting his finger on one of the difficulties with which we are confronted today.

Nevertheless I am not going to suggest for one moment that we are confronted with widespread profiteering such as is sometimes suggested. Every Canadian is a human being, and human beings are inclined to act in similar ways under certain forms of encouragement. In this country we have not only had inflation as a result of the ordinary inflationary pressures of huge government purchases and the indication of more to come. We have not only had inflation because the people of Canada must have remembered the belief expressed by this government in the effect of price and other controls. We have also had definite inflation by invitation. Hon. members will recall that when the emergency measure was introduced in this house last fall to give the government wide powers to establish priority control, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) indicated at that time that under this act he could deal with the pressures that would result from government purchasing of this kind. He recognized the effect of that when he said in this house that one of the difficulties in establishing price control now was that they had not acted in the way they did before when they controlled production; that they had let the adjustment of prices take place on a broad scale or, to use his own words, "in other words they are all set." If they are all set, with prices high enough to escape any effective price controls, which was the implication his words carried, then that somewhat cynical remark implied that those responsible for the price level in this country had in many cases accepted the invitation to get set for price controls when those should be introduced.

We can come to a later date when the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is responsible for matters of this kind, again extended an invitation to get ready for controls of one kind or another. On March 5 the minister was asked by a reporter whether the government planned anything in the way of checking this rise. The minister replied:

> We are studying that very carefully. We cannot announce plans so far in advance, but I think we will have something to propose before many weeks go by.

In that way the minister undoubtedly gave the suggestion that something was going to be done, because it would not be necessary for any announcement to be made if nothing at all was going to be done. I do not know how many weeks he had in mind, but that statement was made five weeks ago today, and it constituted another invitation to get ready for the imposition of controls of this nature.

Prices may have reached a point far beyond what the government would like to see in introducing price controls, but that is no argument for not introducing whatever appropriate controls may be regarded as effective at this time. The minister has indicated that this would not be done by legislation brought before the house, but would be done under the wide powers of the emergency legislation passed a short time ago, which gave the minister and the government such sweeping authority.

When it is advocated that price controls and if necessary subsidies, to the extent they may be required, and other controls be introduced to balance the effect of controls over supply of resources and production, it is sometimes said, "You must be specific as to how those controls will be carried out." The government does not permit us to know what controls it is going to put in over supply and production. The government insists upon retaining complete control, without giving any details. Therefore it would be utterly futile to attempt to deal step by step with each measure the government should take when we do not know what steps the government is going to take in regard to production and supply.

The government has contended that no nation in the world did a better job on price and other controls than Canada did during the last war. In that effort they were assisted by very able economists. The experience of those men and women is available today. The government can take advantage of that experience and with the knowledge they possess, knowledge we do not possess as to what controls they are going to impose on production and supply, they can design price and other controls appropriate to meet the situation which will result from their action at the production and supply level. I would point out that I am not alone in suggesting that we need controls of a less severe type than were imposed during the war, and that we can have flexible controls. Some of those most prominently associated with price controls have made that very statement. They have set forth that broad proposition, without going into detail. In fact they have made it clear that the detail must be the responsibility of the government. I would refer to Mr. Donald Gordon, who was chairman of that board. Mr. Donald Gordon has expressed his own belief that we would be better without price controls; but he has also said without reservation that price controls are infinitely better than runaway inflation. I believe we have runaway inflation, and we have the statement of Mr. Donald Gordon that the situation we now have demands price and the other controls that go with it. I would refer to another Mr. Gordon, not related but one of the most brilliant younger economists in this country; that is Mr. Walter Gordon of Toronto. He went much further and said that with the introduction of price and other controls in the United States a demand for price and similar controls in Canada was inevitable. Then he went on to use the very words that I have used, that what we would need in this country would be a flexible system of controls, and he then went on to make the recommendation which I and other hon. members have made in this house.

The situation is such that we cannot disregard the likelihood of having to introduce controls of some kind. That being so, and recognizing that it would take months to set up effective machinery to deal with this, before now a price control organization should have been set up that would be able to introduce in this country the most efficient, most flexible and most easily adjusted price control system that could be devised on the basis of our extensive experience during the last war and in the years following. Certainly all hon. members are prepared to concede that we had working for us in this country unselfish, brilliant, efficient Canadians who gave of their best to make this system effective. Most of them have pointed out weaknesses they would not like to see repeated. Most of them are in a position to suggest many improvements. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, with the evidence now before us of the need for action, that there be no further delay in setting up some such machinery with the expert assistance available to us, and that we immediately proceed to have such appropriate controls as would deal effectively with the situation we face.

As I indicated before, all the things that have been done by the government not only invite price increases by those who establish the prices at the retail level, but they also encourage panic buying. Everyone is in some way a part of this great problem. It is not the government alone, although I believe the government has a heavy responsibility to give an example by reducing all non-defence expenditures on a level that they have not attempted in any way to do. The consumer who hoards goods and goes in for panic buying, the producer who cynically exploits that panic, the manufacturer who tries to get the largest profit he can out of the demand for scarce supplies, are all germ carriers of the dangerous disease of inflation. This is something for which our citizens generally are responsible as well as the government. The response of the citizen to the demand that he co-operate will however be much more positive, and much more effective, if the government itself gives positive and convincing evidence that it is doing everything within its power to give the sort of lead that is necessary and adequate to do this job. That is one reason why I think that the time is not only overdue, but long overdue, for positive and vigorous action to deal with this problem.

There is one other consideration of the most vital importance, and that is the cost of defence production. It is only a few days ago that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), speaking in New York on March 30, emphasized one of the dangers in our defence preparations. I quote from the text of his speech on that occasion:

> The armed forces and industry combined must make a frontal attack on the cost of defence equipment. This has become so costly that neither we nor our allies can get what we know we need without going on an all-out war economy.

If we need an all-out war economy to get the things we need, then the Minister of National Defence has put forward the most powerful argument to indicate our need for price controls, rent controls and similar controls without any further delay. He has also warned us of a great danger. Every time the cost of living index goes up we are going to have much more difficulty purchasing the things that we need. The people of Russia, Poland and Czechoslovakia, with their great armament plants, have not a similar problem. They have no inflation there. They have other ways of tackling this problem. We do not want those methods ever to become necessary in Canada. It is to avoid methods of that kind that, in terms of reality and of a practical appreciation of the situation with which we are confronted, we say that, because we do believe in a free economy, because we do believe in the free play of prices in a free economy in normal times, we want to see that economy protected against the spiralling inflation. We want to see the people of this country given the assurance that their investments in bonds, in insurance and other investments of that kind will not lose their value and deprive the people of the protection they expected in their old age.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that no one in this chamber will again suggest it is not appropriate we should point out that danger. I would remind members of this house that it was in 1945 the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), in the words I have already quoted, pointed out that very danger, that insurance, bank deposits and other investments of that kind, including victory bonds and such securities which are regarded as the safest of all, would lose their value and deprive our people of the security which they believed they had the right to expect. I believe this is the most vital issue now facing the people of Canada. The steps, inadequate though they may be in some respects, to deal with national defence, are under way on a large scale. This is a subject that does call for action at the earliest possible date.

Before sitting down, I should like to read further words of the minister charged with the responsibility for the administration of the act under which those controls would come. This is the text of the speech made to the Empire and Canadian clubs in Toronto on February 26 of this year, to which I have already referred:

> The Canadian government has never been opposed to price controls as such. In fact, legislation is now under discussion in parliament which would give the government power to impose economic controls of all kinds as the need may arise.
> We will not impose any system of price controls, however, unless and until we are satisfied that those controls will serve a helpful and not a harmful purpose in combating inflation. It may seem strange to speak about price controls as having a harmful effect in the fight against inflation but that can easily happen. Price controls would be harmful if they did not have overwhelming public support. They would be harmful if they were relied upon as a substitute for more fundamental measures such as taxes and credit controls. They would be harmful if they were not accompanied by adequate wage controls.
>
> Nor do I think it would be wise, even if it were theoretically possible, to move into price controls until there is reasonable assurance of price stability in the United States.

[Mr. Drew.]

The minister who would be responsible for the administration of those controls under the emergency legislation passed in this house has indicated that the government is not opposed to price controls as such. He has indicated they are considering this subject. He has indicated they are ready to act if and when they believe action should be taken. The question is whether the circumstances justify the demand that it should be done. Right across this country today there are people who are not only in a desperate position because of the necessity of buying food and other vital needs with a dollar that represents about half of what it did, and in the case of food less than half of what it did a few years ago. There are young people who do not know how they are going to own and equip a home in which to start their married life. There are many people across this country today who are looking to the future with concern because they do not know where this is going to stop. In addition to all the reasons I have put forward, Mr. Speaker, with all the earnestness I possess I urge the government to act now, no matter what steps should have been taken earlier, to give the people of Canada confidence that no matter what may happen in other countries the cost of living is going to be brought under some measure of control so that they can look forward to the years ahead with that confidence which we should have in a land with such vast possibilities as we possess today in Canada.

Before sitting down, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon):

> That all the words after "That" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "this house is of the opinion that in view of the announcement made on Wednesday last of the greatest monthly increase in Canadian cost of living during the month of February to the disastrously high level of 179·7 points, immediate consideration should be given to the adoption of appropriate measures to hold down the cost of living and halt inflation."

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my first word is that I have been extremely interested this afternoon to hear the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) repeat so many of the arguments that we have made in our pleas for price controls over the last several years and, indeed, to put once again on the records of this house many of the quotations which we have put on the record on previous occasions—in fact, quotations which I had intended to put on the record this afternoon, but I shall not do so now because they are already there. I am glad, however, to see the official opposition taking the attitude it is now taking. I want to say to the leader of the opposition that I am not going to discuss the problem of controls from any doctrinaire standpoint today. As a matter of fact, over the last few years the rising cost of living has meant that the problem became not one of doctrinaire argument but one of practical consideration. The day may come again when we can discuss this matter from the point of view of fundamental principles of political difference, from the point of view of the necessity of relating prices and the earnings of various groups of people to one another under an intelligent economic national plan. But that is not the problem before us today.

The problem before this house at the moment has been stated clearly, I think, by the leader of the opposition this afternoon. The problem is that of protecting the Canadian people against the effect of the runaway inflation from which they are suffering at the present time. I want to add this thought. While they may be suffering from runaway inflation at the present time, the prospects in the near future are such that we may expect further inflation, since the huge expenditures which we are making, and are about to make, for defence preparedness create, first, a shortage of basic supplies and materials; second, a shortage of labour; and third, a general shortage of consumer goods. If that situation develops, as it must develop over the next few months, the present inflation will become intensified.

While I agree, as everyone in this house must, that in normal times increased production is the real cure for rising prices, increased production today will not take care of the demand for consumer goods when we have such keen competition from the government in the production of supplies for our armed forces and for our allies overseas. Indeed, in our arguments ever since 1946, when inflation began to develop, when we saw demand for Canadian goods becoming great in Europe, through Marshall aid, and through our desire to rehabilitate the countries that have been devastated, we resisted the removal of beneficial controls and subsidies because we of the C.C.F. saw that year by year the cost of living must increase and the difficulties of the Canadian people become greater as the days went by.

If we look at the statistics of this situation —and, may I say, the statistics not compiled by any person or group of persons perhaps of my economic and political viewpoint but by the dominion bureau of statistics and quoted by the Bank of Canada in its statistical summary of February, 1951—we see the extent of this inflationary process. Incidentally, all the basic figures I am going to use are taken from the bureau of statistics and from the February report of the Bank of Canada.

If we look first of all at 1946 we find in that year, according to the Bank of Canada, that total personal incomes amounted to $9,671 million. In that year the population was 12,307,000. The per capita income is given as $786. The cost of living index—1935-39 being 100—was 123·6. That meant that the per capita income stated in dollar purchasing power, in terms of 1935-39, amounted to $636.

In 1947 the total personal income had risen to $10,342 million. The population had risen to 12,582,000. The per capita income had risen to $822 but the cost of living index had risen to 135·5. Therefore the result was that the actual purchasing power per capita, in terms of 1935-39, was $607.

In the following year, 1948, we have total personal income totalling $11,842 million; population 12,883,000; per capita personal income, again in dollars of that year, $919. The cost of living index had gone up to 155. Consequently the actual purchasing power per capita, again in terms of the 1935-39 level, was $593.

In 1949, total personal income, $12,674 million; population, 13,549,000; per capita income, in dollars of that year, $935; cost of living index, 160·8. Therefore the per capita income, again in dollar values of 1935-39, $582.

In 1950, total personal income, $13,320 million; population 13,845,000; per capita income in that year's dollars, $962; cost of living index, 166·5; per capita personal income went down to $578 in terms of 1935-39 dollars. And if we look at the recent change—and permit me to say that I shall consider the per capita personal income on March 1 as the same as the average for 1950; there may have been a little difference, but not much—the cost of living index having risen to 179·7, in 1935-39 dollars the actual purchasing power of Canadian income on the same basis as in former years would be $535, or a drop of $101 annually in per capita real purchasing power between 1946 and March 1, 1951.

This has been going on year after year, and no attempt has been made by the government to apply any remedy. Indeed the only hon. members who have drawn this to the attention of the house over and over again, and who have moved at every session of parliament that we should reintroduce beneficial controls and subsidies in order to protect the Canadian people against this sharp drop in per capita income purchasing power, is the party with which I am associated.

I believe that if Joseph Stalin has a secret weapon, that secret weapon is not a fifth column; that secret weapon is inflation. It was inflation that Lenin used following the revolution in 1917 to destroy the basis of the Russian economy of that day, and to bring about the permanent imposition of the bolshevik dictatorship which took power at that time and retained it subsequently. It was inflation that was used in Germany to destroy the German economy. It was inflation that was used in every country in Europe to undermine and to destroy the basis of the economies and the governments of several countries. And while some of those governments and some of those economies should have been removed and should have been changed by other means, I am pointing out that one weapon which has been used since 1917 by the bolsheviks in their world-wide campaign has been the weapon of inflation.

Consequently I say that if Stalin has a secret weapon today, it is inflation. And I would add this for the information of the house, that some of us get resolutions from various labour organizations across the country. I think it is very significant that we have recently received resolutions from local unions that we know are under communist control, and those resolutions oppose price controls. All of a sudden, in opposition to the major labour organizations of this country that are asking for price controls, one finds here and there a local union that is either known to be associated with a major union under communist control or is under communist control itself, opposing price controls. That, I suggest, has some significance in this context.

So I say that inflation is one of the secret weapons that may be used to undermine our economy and our institutions and, indeed, to circumvent or even to destroy the effectiveness of our defence effort. Because, after all, every time there is inflation, the dollar the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) takes out of the pocket of a Canadian citizen for expenditures in defence will buy less in the way of preparedness; it will buy fewer tanks, fewer guns, less ammunition and fewer soldiers' uniforms.

Consequently I say that this is a very effective secret weapon. And the tragedy is that the people who should be standing against inflation have in some instances, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) indicated this afternoon, promoted this inflation because of their own selfish interests.

There are many pieces of evidence indicating the suffering being caused the people of Canada by this runaway inflation. And, you know, I think it adds insult to injury when a government department sends out the kind of literature I hold in my hand to fathers and mothers whose children are on family allowances. The copy I have went out with the February cheques to parents receiving family allowances. What does it say? It says:

> Your food dollar can be stretched. Here are some tips on how to get the best value for your food dollar! Plan meals ahead to be sure to have—

What, in the diet for your children?

> —milk, fruits, vegetables, cereals, meat, fish, eggs or cheese, plus four hundred international units of vitamin D for every child every day.

Mr. Low: And be sure to boil the turnip tops!

Mr. Coldwell: How on earth, with prices of those goods what they are today, can the parents of these children buy a sufficient quantity of milk, a sufficient quantity of meat, a sufficient quantity of fish, a sufficient quantity of fruit, to say nothing of cod liver oil or vitamins, to give these children the standard of nutrition the government's own department says they should be getting?

Then they instruct parents to keep these commodities fresh and in a cool place. So I suppose the parents need refrigeration as well as, incidentally, a home in which to place a refrigerator, as well as the children who are to live on the contents of the refrigerator. Then it says:

> Children need good food. Family allowances are for your children.

Yes, family allowances are for your children. And ever since family allowances came into effect, as I have shown by the figures I placed on record this afternoon, the beneficial effect of the family allowance has been whittled away by the tremendous increase in the cost of these basic foods, which are necessary for the health of the children of this country.

Mr. Knowles: The food index has gone up a hundred points since family allowances were introduced.

Mr. Ferrie: May I ask a question?

Mr. Wylie: Make it sensible.

Mr. Ferrie: You stated about all those prices—

Mr. Wylie: Why don't you make a speech?

Mr. Ferrie: Mind your own business. You made this statement with reference to the rise in costs. Where did those costs come from? They are rising prices to the farmers you represent. Why should you condemn those costs?

Mr. Coldwell: I am not condemning the farmers for asking higher prices for their products; because I want to tell the hon. member—and he should know it, since he is a farmer himself—that if you take the cost of the machines and supplies used in the production of these foods on the farms you will find that they have increased to an even greater extent than the farm prices of the foods to which I have referred. But let me say to my hon. friend—

Mr. Ferrie: What about the cost of wages?

Mr. Coldwell: All right, yes, wages are a factor in the cost of production; but wages generally have not kept pace with the increased costs of living and of production on the farm.

Mr. Ferrie: They have gone over it.

Mr. Coldwell: I wish my hon. friend from Mackenzie would just take a little time to study some of these questions, and then get up and make a speech about them, instead of interrupting someone who has given a good deal of time and study to the problem before coming to the house to make a speech. In other words, he might pay a compliment to the House of Commons by assuming that it expects to hear intelligent remarks in this house.

I am pointing out that this situation is imposing great hardship on many classes of people in this country. I mention the children particularly. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) mentioned the young people who are getting married.

Mr. Fraser: They are hard hit.

Mr. Coldwell: They are hard hit. When I hear young people discussing how they are going to manage to get a house, how they are going to pay for the necessary equipment for the house, how they are going to burden themselves with an impossible debt in order to get the things they need, I sometimes contrast the manner in which some of us began our first homes even though at that time we thought we were undertaking heavy obligations. The fact is that we did not undertake obligations in any way comparable to what these young people are called upon to undertake today.

But apart from the youngsters, the children, the young people, what about the aged? A few days ago the Hamilton Spectator contained a report of some surveys that had been made in that city of the condition of old age pensioners and families. We are told that in the group of old age pensioners aged from 70 to 80 years, 135 cases were surveyed and the financial picture was the same in each case—it was bad.

The need for more nursing, the rising cost of living and the loss of family support had brought more suffering to these old folk. In the cases surveyed it was found that there were 67 persons who were considered to be receiving inadequate nutrition. The reasons given were the high cost of living, insufficient income, no one to prepare, plan and shop and, in some cases, poor management. But the main factor was of necessity the high cost of living. We have a group of Canadians in this one city who are suffering from malnutrition or slow starvation, in their declining years. That is not only a reflection on this country, it offers great encouragement to communist propagandists to come forward with their propaganda in an effort to undermine our institutions.

I could give several other instances of unnecessary suffering from the same survey. During the month of March twelve families known to the family bureau of that city had met with consistent refusal when applying for the rental of rooms. Each family had children. There were other families which had scraped together enough money for a down payment on a wartime house but who had been either ineligible or without sufficient points to establish a priority.

I should like to put on record the details of one family. The father had served in the air force for seven years fighting for freedom, fighting for democracy, fighting to prevent our being placed under a nazi dictatorship at that time. Probably he would fight again to prevent our being placed under a bolshevik dictatorship. During the last week because of unusual circumstances this family found themselves with their furniture on the street. Their three children had to be placed with friends. Even now they are living in temporary quarters and are still searching for permanent living accommodation.

All this after the grand promises that were made to our Canadian service men and women during the war, after all the grand promises that were made to all the Canadian people during the war. Remember what the late Mr. Mackenzie King, then prime minister, said. He said that unless we were prepared now to improve social conditions immediately after the war, we shall prepare in vain. We did not prepare. We had a wonderful white paper suggesting worthwhile post-war plans, which was tabled in the house, I believe by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), but which has been filed away and largely forgotten.

I am referring to conditions in Hamilton as an illustration because it is the most recent report on a city that I have seen. The report says further that the increased cost of living is going to hit persons such as those in one family with seven children the father of which earns $42.50 per week and whose food costs are $40. That father earning $42.50 a week earns more than some of the more lowly paid people in the city of Ottawa, and I am thinking of family men at that.

According to Miss McTaggart, executive secretary of the Hamilton family service bureau, that family gets three quarts of milk a day, three loaves of bread a day and has almost eliminated meat from their diet. A family of that size should get seven quarts of milk a day. The family sublets rooms in their house and uses the family allowance cheques to buy clothing for the children.

The father of another family reported on earns $82 every two weeks with which to support five children. Every month $86 is spent for food, and according to the food schedule they should buy $105 worth of food during that period. It was found that medical bills, glasses and paying off debts took $40. That gives some idea of the situation faced by many families in Canada.

Where is the opposition to controls coming from? It is not coming from the farmers. It is not coming from labour. It is not coming from the co-operatives. It is not coming from any people's organization that I know of. I have before me statements by some of these organizations. For example, there is the statement by Mr. Hannam, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, who had this to say last January:

> At the last meeting of the directors of the CFA the following resolution was passed:
> That the government be asked to name a competent body immediately to undertake a continuous study of the position of the various economic groups in the nation, and to make recommendations looking towards the most equitable basis possible upon which to impose controls if and when such are needed.

And then again:

> Moreover, organized agriculture believes that no imposition of general price controls should be entertained without making them effective clear across the board on all prices, profits, fees, salaries, and wages. To exempt the economic returns from any one of these groups would be to grant a privilege which cannot be justified. To do so would discriminate unfairly against the other groups.

We agree with that, and so does labour agree with that. Labour and the farmers are of one mind in that regard. What does labour say? In a brief presented to the government on February 20 this year labour had this to say:

> The labour movement recognizes that wages could go up fast enough and far enough to break a price ceiling, though it sees no immediate danger of anything of the sort. It believes that the proper way to deal with this question is a government-labour-management conference to work out methods of wage stabilization. This offers a prospect of a wage policy which will do two things, both essential: (a) preserve the spirit, the principle, of collective bargaining, and (b) bring the experience of labour and management into the defence effort. If our government institutes a general policy of price and production controls, labour is ready to take part in a joint government-labour-management conference to consider wage stabilization.

Just before I came down to the house I was fortunate enough to get a copy of a brief presented this morning, I believe, to the federal government by the prairie farm unions. It is the brief presented to the federal cabinet at Ottawa today by Jacob Schulz, president of the Manitoba farmers union, J. L. Phelps, president of the Saskatchewan farmers union, and Henry Young, president of the farmers union of Alberta. They were accompanied by some other officials of the unions named and a representative of the British Columbia bloc. I imagine that means the Peace river bloc, the prairie bloc of British Columbia. What do they say? In part the brief reads as follows:

> This leads us to repeat a previous request that the federal government implement price control immediately. We wish it to be clearly understood that in making this request we do not desire nor will we agree to a "price freeze" that would mean fixing prices at present inequitable levels.

In other words, they are saying exactly what labour has said. Labour does not want a wage freeze freezing certain wages at inequitable levels and the farmers do not want a price freeze freezing some farm prices at inequitable levels. They suggest something similar to what labour has suggested, namely:

> What we definitely seek, and shall insist upon, is an adjustment of prices on a basis of parity. We further request that in the establishment of boards to ascertain the basis of these prices, as well as subsequent boards for administration on the policy level, the agricultural industry be given adequate representation thereon.

In other words, there should be a national organization, a national committee, or a national commission on which the farmers are adequately represented, on which labour is adequately represented, on which the consumer is adequately represented, on which management is adequately represented, in order to bring about a reasonable and proper relationship between farm and other prices, wages and so on, within the economy. Of course that means a considerable measure of economic and social planning in order to get parity among economic groups.

The co-operative union of Canada, which I think may be said to represent a very large segment of the consuming public of this country as well as certain producers organizations, wrote a letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on September 15, 1950, some time ago, before the present heavy impact was felt by the bulk of the Canadian people. They referred to the interim budget and said:

The action of your government in presenting its interim budget on September 7 was most welcome. In so far as it will serve to reduce excessive spending power, where such may exist, the legislation will tend to hold inflation in check. However, in our view, its provisions are not sufficiently far-reaching in their scope. It is apparent to us, and we would strongly urge upon you, sir, that additional and more specific controls must be introduced. The statements of various organizations representing the consuming public indicate a willingness to submit to these necessary restrictions in the interest of the national welfare.

Then they went on to say:

This belief in the effectiveness of a well administered control structure is substantiated by our experience during world war II.

Therefore you have the great labour unions of this country, the great farm organizations and the great consumers organizations, including co-operative societies, saying to the government or through the person of the Prime Minister: We think this country is entitled to protection against this runaway inflation. We therefore ask you to introduce a system of controls that will not perhaps be as arbitrary as they were during the war, and perhaps will not need to include some of the lesser things that were included during the war but which will give the Canadian people protection in their standards of living. We add to that and say that by means of subsidies we should endeavour to roll back prices to some extent, that by means of subsidies we should be able to provide the children of this country with such basic things as milk and so on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What would be the roll-back? How far back?

Mr. Coldwell: I would not care to say offhand.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am just interested in knowing how far.

Mr. Coldwell: I think prices have to be rolled back somewhat. I would say, however, that we should not ask the farmers to subsidize the milk of the people. The western farmer subsidized the bread of the people from February 1, 1945, to March 1, 1947, to the extent of $48 million.

Mr. Fair: That is only a drop in the bucket.

Mr. Coldwell: That was an unfair imposition upon one group of Canadian producers, and at the very least I think western farmers are entitled today to the additional reimbursement for the $48 million which they contributed to maintain the price of the Canadian loaf during the two years that I have mentioned. I am not going beyond that but I will say that if we are going to ask any producers to do something in the interest of the whole country then the whole country must bear the cost of what those producers are going to do in the interests of the entire country. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are supporting the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). If he had not moved such an amendment I would have moved one. I am not happy that the situation has brought the leader of the opposition to the point where he has introduced a proposal of this description. I am not happy about that but I am happy that the opposition is combining. I hope that the opposition will combine, and I hope that certain members of the Liberal party will join with us.

An hon. Member: What a hope.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say that a remark like that, "what a hope"—and I am not rebuking the hon. member—should not be significant in a democratic institution because in a democratic institution members should act democratically, and on vital matters of this description should not be controlled by the government whip. Let them rise in their places on this occasion and vote as their constituents would expect them to vote. The Gallup poll a few months ago showed 75 per cent but I am convinced that 80 per cent of the people of the country are groaning under this inflation.

An hon. Member: Make it 90.

Mr. Coldwell: Well, I should be quite satisfied to make it 90. I always like to be conservative—with a small "c"—in my judgment, though usually I am liberal—with a small "l"—in my views. So may I say I hope that in this house we may have a vote which will reflect the real opinions of the members and the real desires of the people of this country. We had such a vote once before, again when the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was doing as he is doing today, leading the house. He suggested that we have a free vote on the milk subsidy. We did, and as a result the government was instructed to continue the subsidy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Which they did not do.

Mr. Coldwell: Which they did not do. Six weeks later they passed an order in council discontinuing the subsidy. I am a little more optimistic this time. I suggest to hon. members opposite that if they vote with us and we have a good majority that may perhaps not compel but impel the government to introduce controls. In the past the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has warmly defended controls, and I thought the leader of the opposition brought that defence very well up to date today, so we may expect the government to take some action provided the house authorizes it to do so.

I do not intend to say more. I have spoken more or less of the economic impact of the inflationary situation. I could join the leader of the opposition in speaking of the effect it has had on our educational institutions, on the cultural activities of many of our people, and so on. I know the buying of books has been cut down in some places where people are not so close to libraries where they can get new and desirable books; and the effect has been felt in many other ways. I believe every consideration warrants this house voting in favour of this amendment. Indeed I would go a step further and say that the arguments that have been and will be advanced should persuade the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the government to rise and simply say, "There is no need to press this to a division. We accept the point of view and we are going to introduce beneficial controls and subsidies immediately."

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that we too are very happy to be able to support the amendment introduced by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said, we are not happy because the situation has developed to the point where that amendment has become necessary, but because it gives us a chance to speak what we think is in the minds and hearts of people across this country.

Before I launch into the things I would like to say in support of the amendment which I have already announced we are going to support, I want to place on record a few facts. These facts are basic to what I shall have to say, and are found in the Canadian Statistical Review for February, 1951. The first fact is that during 1950 the gross national production of the country increased by 8 per cent. Of that, 4 per cent represents write-up in prices, so only the remaining 4 per cent would be an increase in volume. The second point is that during 1950 the gross national expenditure of the people of Canada increased by 7 per cent. Of the total 4 per cent represents a write-up in prices and only 3 per cent an increase in volume or an actual increase in purchases by the Canadian people. The third fact is that during 1950 the personal incomes of the Canadian people increased by 5 per cent, but during the same year their personal expenditures increased by 7 per cent. The next important point is that during 1950 retail prices rose by 10.6 points. The next important fact is that the general cost of living index rose to 179·7 in February of this year, a rise of 4·5 points, and that in the first two months of 1951 the index rose by 7·2 points. One other very important thing I think should be placed on record as basic to this whole discussion is that the net farm income declined by 6 per cent between 1949 and 1950. This supports the claim made by both previous speakers that the high cost of food products in Canada today has not resulted from the fact that the farmers are demanding and getting unreasonably high prices for their products.

With these things in mind, Mr. Speaker, for a little while I should like to deal with some important causes of the present dilemma. I am in agreement with the previous speakers when they say the most important problem facing the people of Canada today is that of runaway inflationary prices. The high cost of living is a problem which must be tackled. It must be given the most intensive thought and work it is possible to give. I do not mean to suggest, of course, that the government can do it all. The general run of the Canadian people will have to take their share of responsibility for seeing to it that scientific means are adopted which will give the people of Canada relief from this terrible burden of living costs. It seems to me we ought to be giving, and in fact we ought to have been giving long ago, a great deal more thought to the causes of present high prices than we have given thus far. Because we have been derelict in giving that careful thought and attention to the causes, it seems to me that now we must get down to basic principles and find out what has given rise to the inflationary situation we face today. The present government is reaping what it has sown, but unfortunately it is not only the government that is reaping. It is a tragic thing that the poor people of this country, who had nothing whatever to do with bringing about the present situation, are also doing the reaping and suffering the real hardships.

The present inflationary situation had its roots, to some extent at least, in the way the government financed the war. Early in world war II the minister of finance declared that he intended to follow what was then called a pay-as-you-go policy. But it did not take him very long to abandon that policy, if he ever started it, and go back to the old system of debt financing under which the national debt was run up from $3·5 billion to $16 billion in the course of less than six years. That was not a pay-as-you-go policy, in spite of the government's earlier declaration that they would follow a pay-as-you-go policy. Some very foolish things were done in the course of the attempts made to finance during the war years. Some very foolish things were done in the bond drives. Early in the war the government attempted a bond drive throughout the country to induce individual Canadians to buy bonds, not so much because the government needed the money to pay for the war but, as they openly declared, the major reason was to get out of the hands of the potential consumers in this country their purchasing power so as not to create inflation. The government was to use it as an anti-inflationary measure.

Let us examine one simple example of what happened after they made that declaration to the Canadian people that this was largely an anti-inflationary measure. Under whatever regulation the government may have been operating, the chartered banks of this country were allowed to finance bond purchases on the part of individual Canadians. An individual Canadian could subscribe to a certain amount of bond purchases, and he could go to the bank for a loan to meet ninety per cent of the cost of the bond. A credit entry in the amount of the bond purchase was created on the books of the bank, which simply meant new purchasing power being injected into the bloodstream of this country. A large amount of that sort of purchasing power was injected into the bloodstream of Canada, and what happened? A great many of those people could not possibly pay for those bonds. They bought them for patriotic reasons or because pressure had been placed upon them. Eventually the bank took over the bond and simply repaid the person the amount of the cash equity he had in the bond.

What was the net result? Instead of being an anti-inflationary measure it became the worst possible kind of inflation because, while through that method individual Canadians were enabled to buy bonds, what happened was that a large amount of new purchasing power was injected into our economy without a corresponding increase in the production of goods and services. The banks' holding of dominion securities increased. Now, that is the kind of anti-inflationary policy that was followed. It is only one example of the sort of foolish thing that was done during attempts to finance the war on what Mr. Ilsley said was going to be a pay-as-you-go policy.

The second important thing we have to keep in our mind is the way the government refused to shoulder the responsibility of a specific policy for regulating the money supply of our country. This was another thing that contributed during wartime to the setting of the roots of inflation. The government shifted the responsibility to the chartered banks a good many years ago. During wartime they simply left the regulation of the money supply to the chartered banks of the country, and that was during one of the most dangerous times in Canada's history. The result was that the money supply became totally unrelated to goods and services available for purchase.

Another point, Mr. Speaker, is that since 1945 the government definitely discouraged production by their taxation policy. There are some, of course, who deny that is true. If the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) were in his seat, I imagine he would be one of the first to say that was not true. The facts show that it is true. At the end of the war what we needed more than anything else was abundant production of all kinds of goods and services, but the government failed. The high rates of income tax and the low exemptions they initiated, and a most fiendish tax enforcement policy, discouraged the farmers from all-out production. The iniquitous system of net worth which was introduced did more harm to the farmers of western Canada than anything else of which I know. If anyone takes the trouble to examine into the true facts of the situation, he will see that in the province of Alberta our cattle population in 1939 was 1,230,000. By 1945, owing to the almost superhuman effort of the farmers, the cattle population was lifted to 1,860,000, and in the meantime they had marketed a great many thousands to help the war effort. By 1949 the cattle population had shrunk to 1,465,000, nearly 400,000 less. This decrease was largely as a result of the foolish taxation and other restrictive measures adopted by the government.

If the government was aware of what was happening, they did not seem to care. Proper policies at that time certainly would have induced an increase of production of the very things that were needed. If the government had, during that period between 1945 and 1950, kept its word and established stabilized prices on farm produce in this country, there is no end to the productive effort those people would have made. The amount of productive effort they made during the war, which has drawn tributes from thinking men the world over, would have been continued.

High income tax rates and the excess profits tax also did much to discourage production in the industrial field. Those high rates of tax that were continued for some time after the war caused a shift to plant expansion or to needless modernization of machinery in the plant, and the installation of new machinery long before the old machinery became obsolescent. Everyone knows that these things, in themselves, are inflationary because money so spent in the expansion of plant and in putting in new machinery produced no consumer goods. The balance of purchasing power was disturbed, so we find inflation.

Cost of Living

The government's tax policy also tended to push prices up, as has already been said. The tendency all along has been to increase hidden taxes. It will be recalled that in 1947, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) followed the most unusual practice of announcing to the people over the airways that he was introducing certain excise taxes, a number of things were included, some of which were essential. Everyone could see this excise tax. Everyone recalls, however, that it was not long until it was converted into a sales tax at the manufacturer's level. It did as much as anything to force prices up and bring on the present state of inflation.

Mr. Speaker, one could go on multiplying these examples all evening to indicate that the government certainly was derelict in its duty, and by its neglect, or by its deliberate policies, contributed to the present situation of inflation. The government created a most unusual situation wherein the economic law of supply and demand simply could not work. The whole population of Canada was adversely affected by these policies. Before I leave the farmers, may I say that the government put ceiling prices on many of the products that came from the farm, but allowed the prices of the commodities the farmers had to buy to go up to whatever level the manufacturers wanted to push them. Machinery, repairs, clothing, as well as various other things were allowed to go up, and as a result the spirit of get all you can while you can became the spirit that activated the people. There was the spirit of gouge to which I have referred before on a number of occasions. Primary producers therefore were discouraged about prospects for the years to come. Right from the end of world war II the Liberal government advised and pleaded with the people of this country to go slowly in making purchases. "Do not buy now," they said, "but wait a while until prices come down. Everything will be hunky-dory then." A good many people took the government at its word, and they tried to co-operate with the government in their attempt to control the rising prices and the inflationary situation. The tragic part of it, Mr. Speaker, is that prices did not come down. These very people who did everything they possibly could to co-operate with the government, on the government's assurance that prices would come down before they had to buy, today find that they have been dreadfully penalized. They are having to pay greatly increased prices now for the things that they cannot defer buying.

I know of people who were planning to build houses two or three years ago. They were inclined to take the government at its word and they said, "Well, I think we had better not go into the market and compete for the materials to build these houses; the government has assured us that everything will be all right and that prices will come down." One man told me today that simply because the home builder that he knew waited for a year, on the strength of the promise of the government that everything would be all right, he now finds that he will have to pay $800 more for the same materials to build the house that he wanted to build last year. It looks to me, Mr. Speaker, as though that situation alone is sufficient reason for the fast-waning support that the Liberal party enjoys in this country today.

In the past few months this government also has issued what amounted to invitations to merchants and others to boost their prices; and those people did boost their prices. On several occasions the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe)—and I have his words here in Hansard; if it becomes necessary I can easily put them on the record—made about controls statements which were clear invitations to the people of this country to boost their prices as far as they possibly could—"controls if necessary, but not necessarily controls." It sounds a good deal like the old Mackenzie King cry, does it not? That is what has happened.

On those occasions when we on this side of the house have brought up for discussion the high cost of living and especially when direct controls were advocated by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in speaking to that motion, made the statement that it was not anticipated that direct government controls would be introduced but, he said: "If it becomes necessary later, certainly we will give it most thorough consideration." We all know what has happened. The spirit of gouge has spread over the whole country; and that seems to be the spirit that is activating a good many of the people today.

An hon. Member: And they have got set.

Mr. Low: Yes, and they have got set. There is no question about that. They increased their prices to a point where there would not be any danger to them if price controls were found to be necessary.

Right from the time of the ending of world war II the Liberal government began to become party to international arrangements like the United Nations, Bretton Woods and other things, under which it became necessary for them to drain off a certain amount of Canadian production to send to other nations. We also followed the policy of making available to other nations vast quantities of supplies, in the form of outright gifts or in the form of long-term loans; and so the drawing-off of the top portion of our production in Canada to be sent to other countries became a serious contributor to the present inflationary situation.

The potential inflationary condition of 1945 therefore developed into a real one as decontrol took place and as the government did nothing else to prevent the situation from becoming as serious as it now is. We have now become parties to NATO and to Colombo, under which international arrangements a good many billions of dollars' worth of our Canadian production is to be sent to other countries. The money generated in this production will be left behind to be spent here in competition for the goods that are left. What is the result? The government says: "It is necessary for us now to put before the House of Commons a huge budget". That budget provides for the expenditure this year of $3,586,915,657. That is exclusive of certain supplementary estimates that have been introduced to cover expenditures for the last fiscal year and perhaps some more for this year. That huge amount of money during the next fiscal year will go out to be spent in competition with the purchasing power of nearly fourteen million individual Canadians; and they will be competing for goods that are now, in many branches, in short supply. What is going to be the situation?

I should like to be able to put on the record some figures, Mr. Speaker, in the way of an analysis or a break-down of the present estimates that were tabled in this house about two weeks ago, in order to show hon. members and the people of the country just exactly what that budget is going to do to the Canadian people; but it being six o'clock, I presume it would be wise to hold this matter over until we resume at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I mentioned that I had been very much interested in an analysis of the estimates placed before the house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) something over two weeks ago. I have taken those estimated expenditures for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1952, and I have placed in tabular form the various departmental expenditures. I have shown them in the first table as percentages of the gross national product and, in the second, as percentages of the national income, assuming in each case that the fiscal year 1951-52 will show approximately the same gross national production in Canada and approximately the same national income as did 1950-51.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to place these two short tables on the record, because they show in tabular form those relationships which I believe the people of the country would like to have.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Low: They are as follows:

When one takes a look at the estimated expenditure of more than three and a half billion dollars for the ensuing fiscal year, and realizes that those dollars will go out and compete with the expenditures of 13,870,000 individual Canadians, one begins to wonder just exactly what is going to happen to prices unless something very effective is done, and that very soon, to prevent any further inflationary rise.

On the present basis, with the cost of living index at 179·7, according to the return for the month of February—and I think it will be much higher when the March figures are made known—what does this huge sum in the estimates do to our people? Here is what I think it will do. The budget estimates of $3,586,915,657, recently tabled by the Minister of Finance, have a total purchasing power today of only $1,996,061,172, in terms of the dollar in the base period 1935-39.

That means that the purchasing power lost to the Canadian people through runaway prices will be no less than $1,590,854,485, on the estimates of the Minister of Finance alone. This means that every man, woman and child in Canada will be deprived of $114.69 in purchasing power through inflation of prices on the cost of living index of 179·7, on the government estimated expenditures alone. And of course in addition to that we will have to calculate what the loss in purchasing power for each individual in Canada would be on the expenditures of provincial governments, and on their own behalf when they attempt to buy food, eggs, meat, cheese, pay the rent, buy replacements, make repairs, buy clothing and all that sort of thing.

When all those things are calculated, then I would ask the house what kind of future for the Canadian people those figures presage. That is the question which every serious-minded person in Canada will have to ask himself. Is it going to be possible for the Canadian economy to right itself, or is it going to be necessary to have government action to bring prices under control and to stabilize our Canadian economy?

Evidently the government has had faith in the ability of our economy to right itself, but I say to you that government policy has failed. Even fiscal measures the government took as anti-inflationary measures have failed, as witness the recent heavy jump of over four points in the cost of living, within one month. It must be kept in mind that the present situation has arisen only partly as a result of economic affairs. I was talking during the dinner hour with a member of the house who expressed a thought with which I can agree. He does not happen to be a member of the opposition, but that does not make any difference; he is right, just the same. He says, and I agree with him, that to a certain extent the present situation has arisen because of psychological factors. That is perfectly true. So that we have to keep in mind economic factors, some of which I have stated, as well as a number of psychological factors, which have placed a terrific pressure upon prices.

When I refer to psychological factors I have in mind the fear of war, which is one, and the fear of shortages, which is another. Those fears have compelled men throughout the country to do much more buying and much more hoarding perhaps than they should be doing. I believe that situation can be well illustrated by looking around and asking oneself how many 1951 automobiles people own today. It might be interesting to note that the statistical review published a short time ago indicates that there was an increase in motor car purchases in Canada between 1949 and 1950 to the extent of 60 per cent. What does this mean? It simply means that the people of Canada who can get hold of the money to buy cars are trying to get under the wire so as to have the latest possible model. They fear they will not be able to get new cars for a long time.

That is one of the psychological factors we have to keep in mind. No one knows how long the present condition of cold war will last. But if it should last for a number of years, then it is conceivable that our economy could be shot to pieces by runaway prices—unless of course proper remedial action is taken at once. That is exactly what Stalin wants. At one time he and his communist pals throughout the world predicted that the free economies would fall into devastating depression and ruin themselves that way. World circumstances prevented that. Now it is very likely that those same enemies firmly believe that they can make inflation do for them what depression failed to do, or what they failed to get depression to do.

International communism will do its utmost to wage for many years, just as long as it is possible for them to wage, a war of economic attrition which will revolve around the continual shrinkage in the value of our currency and the currencies of all the democracies. Stalin knows that our economy and the economies of the free democracies can be wrecked just as effectively that way as by an all-out shooting war. It is likely that he will follow the cold war method just as long as he can, feeling that we have not the brains nor the will to make the necessary financial and economic changes to ward off disastrous economic break-down.

If we allow ourselves to be further weakened economically the chances of our ultimate victory over communist imperialism certainly will become quite uncertain.

It is obvious that something will have to be done immediately to bring runaway prices under control. The question is what? That is the big question. We believe that in normal times when economic laws are allowed to operate a free economy is the best economy. We do not advocate a system of direct government controls as a permanent part of the type of economy that we would like to see, but we are not now living in normal times. I must emphasize that. Therefore we will have to adopt policies designed to meet the present difficult conditions and to get us out of these present difficult conditions.

On one or two occasions since the session opened in January the Social Credit group have put on the record what we consider to be the necessary short-time requirements to stabilize the Canadian economy in these times and to make certain that we are not destroyed economically. I shall take just one or two brief moments to review the outstanding phases of the proposal which we have put forward. We think that it will be necessary for the government suddenly, overnight—it should not be done in a long drawn out way, a matter of invitation, such as has been suggested in the past—to impose over-all price and wage controls. That does not mean the freezing of prices by any means. When you have applied over-all controls overnight, then of course you have to set about an adjustment of prices to provide a fair profit and an adjustment of wages perhaps to conform with the adjusted price levels about which I have spoken.

If we make this effective and complete I am satisfied that it will be possible to hasten the time when our economy can be free again to operate according to well defined fundamental economic laws. Farm prices will have to be adjusted to provide for a parity with the adjusted price levels. This may require a certain amount of subsidizing. We advocate that that be done wherever necessary in the interests of parity for the farming population of our country.

The next thing is to see that every possible encouragement is given to increase the production of the required goods and services in our country. I do not think we can stress this point too strongly. The best cure for inflation, the best remedy for rising prices, is the production of the necessary volume of goods and services. We believe that it may be necessary to use producer's subsidies and various other kinds of inducements to get this all-out productive effort. If it is necessary, let us get it done because there is no better way of meeting the situation than through an all-out productive effort.

The third important step is to maintain the purchasing power of the low income groups in our country to enable them to buy the necessities of life. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Drew) have pointed out the tragic circumstances of a good many of the low income groups in Canada as a result of runaway inflation and runaway prices. We feel that it might be necessary—if it is necessary we will certainly support the government in doing it—to introduce consumer subsidies on certain selected items, perhaps on quite a number of items that go into the everyday cost of living.

If commodities do become scarce then we feel it may even be necessary to introduce rationing in order to see that there is an equitable distribution and therefore some sort of equality of sacrifice in whatever effort we have to make. As a larger percentage of the production of the nation is diverted to war purposes, thereby intensifying inflationary prices; as increasing government expenditures compete with individual expenditures, then we may have to adopt a number of other important fiscal policies to meet the situation.

In brief, that is what we are proposing as a short-term policy. That does not say by any means that we believe that this is all that will be required. But we do think that if that policy is adopted it will go far toward bringing the present dangerous situation under control.

In times past when the Social Credit group in this house have placed before hon. members proposals for scientific financial and economic reform we were often met with derisive shouts of, "Oh, yes, those are Social Credit rubber dollars" and the like. I should like to introduce the members of this house to a perfect example of a rubber dollar. This is an anaemic, emaciated entity that one might call a shivering skeleton of a Liberal dollar that has a hard time today to buy fifty cents' worth of anything.

An hon. Member: Throw it over.

An hon. Member: Pass it over.

An hon. Member: Send a million over.

Mr. Low: We all want to get hold of more of them. We have to if we are going to survive. This has plenty of rubber in it. It has stretched considerably. When the pressure was let go it bounced back and is only half what it was at one time. I cannot think of anything more rubbery than that. There is a rumour abroad that the Liberal government is going to ask the Canadian Bank Note Company to run off another bill, a two dollar bill to commemorate this marvellous new age, this brave new situation into which we have got ourselves. This new two dollar bill is to be called the St. Laurent dollar.

Mr. Gibson: How about the Aberhart dollar?

Mr. Low: The Aberhart dollar was never like that. These people who have talked of rubber and stretching in the past had better just turn the spotlight on themselves for a little while in order to see what is happening. As I see it, the best evidence in the world is this shivering skeleton, the thing we call a dollar, which is having such a hard time today to buy more than fifty cents' worth of anything.

To be serious, and in conclusion, the government simply must set about putting "sense" back into the dollar that they have allowed to depreciate so seriously, and you can spell that "cents" or "sense", whichever way you prefer. We are asking on behalf of the people of Canada for lower living costs. We ask also that whatever controls are found necessary to accomplish that result be accompanied with safeguards so that the individual freedom of the Canadian people can be preserved.

Mr. J. A. Bradette (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I am taking this opportunity to present in these precincts some of the reactions that I received from my constituents during the Easter recess. Every member of parliament, no doubt every senator, and certainly the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and every member of the cabinet are fully aware of the high cost of living at the present time. They have felt it themselves and they were told by their constituents. Everyone now listening to me no doubt has received since the beginning of the session a nice white square card on which there are words to the effect that members of parliament should see to it that the cost of living is drastically reduced. I am going to speak my mind openly as I always have, and I believe I will be expressing the sentiments of the people whom I have the honour to represent. However, even a member of parliament has to be guarded at times, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) this afternoon, and also the leader of the C.C.F. party and the leader of the Social Credit party, were guarded to some extent in the statements they made on this very important subject.

I qualify my remarks by stating that during the last war I was a member and vice-chairman of the war expenditures committee. At one of its sittings—and I knew that goods were being rationed and there was control on the commodities of life—very innocently I had the audacity to state that I thought there was too much advertising in the press of the country, not only of the commodities of life but also of some of the luxuries. I also mentioned the fact that large catalogues of hundreds of pages were still being issued, and the housewife would only get an average of about one article out of six when she ordered. You should have seen the kind of press I received and the kind of unfavourable publicity my remarks gained for me in every section of Canada.

I do not know why it should not be possible for a member of parliament to try to represent his riding sincerely and honestly and to speak the truth as he sees it. Before I proceed any further I must make one point very clear. There are three newsprint and sulphite industries in my constituency and I know that the government is now going to carry out some kind of control on the export price of that production. If we are going to have controls on commodities we must have control of wages also. You cannot separate the one from the other. Any man who knows anything about elementary mathematics should realize that two and two make four and nothing else, no matter what some leaders may say.

I was astonished this afternoon when the leader of the C.C.F. party, for whom I have a high personal regard and respect, kept away from that situation. Again let me make the situation very clear to parliament and to the people whom I represent at the moment. You cannot have price control unless you also have wage control. I make that statement very deliberately indeed because there is no other way to deal in a practical and logical manner with the problem that is agitating the minds of the people of Canada at the moment. The leader of the C.C.F. party made a special appeal at the end of his speech to the Liberal representatives in the house. I am going to vote against the amendment. I am going to vote with my party, and I am not ashamed of doing so. I am proud of it.

I must tell the leader of the C.C.F. party that there must be very rigid controls so far as their whip is concerned. I have been a member of parliament for many years, and I have not heard a single word from any of the Liberal whips who have served over those many years as to the way that I should vote. I was never told how to vote on any question.

Mr. McIvor: Nor I.

Mr. Bradette: I am sure the whip will follow the same course on this occasion. We are here as free people and as members of a national party. We will vote according to our conscience and according to what we believe is best for the Canadian people as a whole and the people of our own constituencies. We enjoy the benefits of a free democracy in this country. Under such a way of living no doubt we reap wonderful benefits but at the same time there are also weaknesses in the system that must of necessity be overcome not only by the effort of the government, but also by every citizen. No government would be strong enough to overcome a situation like the present one by itself unless it has full co-operation by all. Every citizen of the country who is worthy of the name must make the necessary sacrifices in order that the system we cherish, our freedom and democracy, our parliamentary system, our right to free expression, may be preserved.

That does not mean regimentation. It means the free will of a free people to do things according to their conscience. It means the freedom of a member of parliament to vote according to his own conscience in the best interests of his friends, his constituency and the country as a whole. The easiest way for the government to settle the question of the high cost of living would be to impose controls all across the board. That would be the easiest way, but would it be a really democratic way? Would it really be a solution? Under the present circumstances will the Canadian people be ready and willing to accept such a method of governing the country and regulating the actions of our people at the present time? Personally I would say absolutely no, that it would not be acceptable to the Canadian people.

It is true that during time of stress, time of war, when our young men and women are willing and ready to make the greatest sacrifice that human beings are called upon to make, to give their lives for their country because of certain ideals, then the citizens as a whole are willing to make certain sacrifices, and controls will then work. However, some people must have short memories when they clamour for controls such as we had during the last war. How many times have I seen newspapers and periodicals cursing controls and criticizing Donald Gordon! How many times have I had private conversations with representatives of industry and others who were maligning the name of the man who administered controls and his personnel, although he made a marvellous job of it and was a fine Canadian. It was not always pleasant for him. How many times have I heard my own family, relatives and friends in my own constituency abusing the system and the government of the time although they were doing a magnificent job!

When we speak of controls let us be careful about it. Does anyone in the house want control now all across the board on all commodities, control that will affect our exports and imports? Certainly people are not ready for such a situation. I notice that the amendment moved this afternoon by the leader of the opposition is well guarded in its language. You heard it, and I will read it again. It is as follows:

> This house is of the opinion that in view of the announcement made on Wednesday last of the greatest monthly increase in Canadian cost of living during the month of February to the disastrously high level of 179·7, immediate consideration should be given to the adoption of appropriate measures to hold down the cost of living and halt inflation.

There is no mention of control there. I can only see one primary reason why control is not mentioned. I refer to what the leader of the opposition said in the House of Commons on February 21, 1949. I will read his words in French because at the moment I only have the French copy of the speech that he made. He said:

(Translation):

Mechanism of a dictatorship:

I do again urge members, and particularly those on the government side, to read carefully these arbitrary powers, these orders in council carried forward by statutory enactment, and which we are asked again now, in 1949, four years after the termination of hostilities, to renew. There you will see the mechanism of dictatorship. There you will see power to exercise almost unlimited authority over agriculture, over industry and over the economy of our country. Wider powers could hardly be imagined. And those pokers are exercised, not under the direct authority of parliament, but under the executive power of the government itself, without any clear definition of their limitations or purpose.

I remember perfectly that during the last federal elections, my Conservative opponent went around my riding saying that the leader of the opposition . . .

(Text):

During the last election the leader of the opposition was saying that controls should be abolished immediately. I do not know how the leader of the C.C.F. party could interpret the amendment moved this afternoon as involving absolute controls so far as Canada is concerned. It certainly is not there. If the amendment carried, there would be no implication of such a scheme. If you read the amendment you will see that the word "control" is not even mentioned.

In this country the cost of living is affected in two different ways. We are a great exporting country, I believe the fifth in the world, and for that reason our national economy of necessity must be very sensitive to the export trade. We have to buy raw rubber from the United States, for instance. In January, 1950, rubber stood at 44; in December of 1950 it was 164. We have to buy raw wool from the United States, Australia and Britain.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): We can still send some to Poland, though.

Mr. Bradette: I did not get that. Wool stood at 157 in January of 1950. In December of 1950 it was 304. In the past we often heard our good friends of the C.C.F. party say that if only there were socialist governments in Europe and Britain there would be no possibility of any profiteering as far as production was concerned. Well, we have had socialist governments for the last four years or more in Australia, New Zealand and Great Britain, and we have seen those three governments corner the wool market of the world. Did they do that for the benefit of the rest of the commonwealth or for the good of the rest of the world? No; they did it to make a profit out of the sale of that wool. When the Canadian people buy wool, they have absolutely nothing to say as far as the price is concerned; they must pay what is asked for it.

These matters we must keep in mind in a discussion of this kind. Take cotton yarn and thread. In January, 1950, they were 164; in December they were 169. Take iron and steel billets, partly imported; they went from 187 to 207. Certainly we have no control over those prices. No matter what the Canadian government might do, no matter how hard we might try to get these things from Great Britain or the United States for less money, we have no power to bring about a reduction of any kind. Let us take some other items that enter into the cost of living. Who would dare to say we should stop Canadian farmers selling their beef in the United States market? I well remember the agitation some three years ago when the farmers wanted access to that market, and rightly so. That is one of the principal reasons for the high cost of beef at the present time, but who would dare to say the government should tell the farmers we are going to put an embargo on the export of beef? We all know what would be the reaction of farmers in this country from coast to coast.

These are things we must have in mind in discussing this question. Look at lumber. What would happen if we put an embargo on the export of lumber, and took away from our producers the markets they have in the United States and Britain? There would be a great hue and cry on the part of the lumber operators of this country, and rightly so. In my own constituency we have two newsprint mills and one sulphite mill, and every pound of that production goes to the United States. We all know what has happened to the price of newsprint in the last three years. It has increased by at least 200 per cent. Would it be practical or feasible for the government to say that the price of newsprint must be reduced to what it was three years ago? These are some of the things that we as parliamentarians must thoroughly consider if we are to deal with these matters logically, for these things make one realize how difficult it is for the government to please everyone.

We export many other things. Most of the copper from Noranda and from the big smelters in British Columbia goes to the United States market. We also export to that market zinc, some lead and other metals, and we are glad to have such a market. Is there anything we could do about those prices? Then there is nickel, one of the biggest, yes the biggest, mining industries in Canada, employing thousands of people and adding so much to our national economy. All that production goes to the United States. Are we going to lower these prices even though our neighbours are willing and ready to pay them? I just bring these points to the attention of the house to help every hon. member realize how difficult it is to deal with a question of this kind at the present time and satisfy everyone.

I spoke to my own people only a few days ago and told them there were many ways in which the Canadian people could help. I am going to enumerate some of those ways. It is surprising that the cost of living should have increased so much during the month of February, but in large part that was due to the fact that during the course of last fall most of the raw material that had to be bought by the United States and Canada had increased in price tremendously. Now the cost of production of the finished article has almost caught up. In the United States, for example, the average price of goods at retail increased only 10 per cent in the nine months between March, 1950, and January, 1951. This is a small increase when compared with the increase in the cost of raw materials. But it is not likely that the gap will last much longer. As the raw materials which were bought at the higher prices get into the finished products, the cost of those products will go up also.

This is not a pleasant situation to face, but we must be realists and study it from all angles. Wishful thinking will not settle the problem. Obviously as long as the countries of the world are bidding against each other for basic raw materials such as wool, cotton, rubber, lumber and lumber products including newsprint, sulphite, wood pulp and so on, and base metals and farm products, Canada has to go along with them or do without. Are we going to do without cotton or without wool? Are we going to do without rubber? I just leave that thought with hon. members to answer for themselves and their constituents. That is why the United States, Britain and France are trying to get the main producing and consuming countries outside the Russian orbit together to devise ways of distributing scarce materials they all want. The whole world wants those scarce materials.

After the last war all nations shared the fear of a depression. They were afraid that what happened only a few years after world war I would recur with all the other disturbing factors that such an economic calamity brings with it. So government policies were formulated, with well prepared blueprints properly drawn, designed to bring about full industrial activity, fair prices for our agricultural production, almost full employment and plenty of production to meet the requirements of the consuming public. Under that planning it was hoped that there would be no inflationary or deflationary extremes. Of course practically all those high hopes were built upon the premise that after the complete defeat of the axis powers upon the battlefield we had every reason to expect that the whole world was going to enjoy a very long, if not a permanent, period of peace which would allow it to recover from the terrific loss of life, the tremendous destruction, the misery and despair which followed that war. We must carry that thought in our mind as well, because in part at least the present situation has resulted from the policies of Hitler and Mussolini from 1939 to 1945, and indeed from world war I. We are still feeling the effects of some legacies of both wars.

The organization of the united nations in San Francisco enhanced those hopes, which unfortunately did not come to fruition. Instead of unity and understanding among the nations the world found itself divided into two camps, in fact into two worlds. In the other camp was Soviet Russia with all her might, her advantageous position, the well organized and ruthless tentacles of Moscow communism spreading into every part of the world and the so-called cold war. The destruction of human lives and material resources has had a devastating effect upon us. Most of the high cost of living of the present time must be traced to Joe Stalin, with his expansionist policies and the threats of war he is making all over the world. At the present time we know that pressure is being brought upon parliament to apply price controls at once. This measure could easily be passed by the government, but would it be the real solution? Will the Canadian people accept drastic controls under the conditions existing? They worked relatively well during the last war, but they were also highly criticized as I said a few moments ago. The people do not like to be pushed around by too many governmental restrictions, at least not the Canadian people, unless there is a national emergency.

I have no doubt there are many measures that could be applied which are within the power of our people, if they are willing to put them into practice. I know I shall be criticized for some of the statements I am going to make now, but I am speaking my mind sincerely and honestly as a Canadian citizen. There are certain measures which people may be willing to practise under dire circumstances which will perhaps prove to be a deterrent to the high cost of living. If labour, for instance, were willing to increase the length of the work week by ten per cent from forty to forty-four or forty-eight hours, and I say that deliberately, it would increase the national output by eight or twelve per cent. No matter what one may say about shorter hours with the same take-home pay, that does not increase national production.

Mention was made this afternoon of the high cost of farm implements. These implements do have a high cost but the farmer also has to pay about three times what he used to pay for hired help. Even during the haying season or the crop season most of the men who used to work on the farm will not work there unless they get the forty hour week. They will not work in the rain—I do not altogether blame them for that, but they will not work any more than eight hours no matter what the condition of the hay may be. They will not work after six o'clock either. All this has increased the farmers' cost of production. The labour unions would do well to think about this principle, too. Three years ago I was at a party in the home of one of our national labour leaders. It was mooted at the time that they might have a strike in the General Motors plant at Oshawa. Two prominent leaders were advancing an argument that even if the men did get an increase of fifteen per cent in their wages that would not increase the cost of production of those automobiles. I told them that I did not want to enter into a discussion, but even a labour leader could not make me believe that when wages are increased in an industry like the automotive industry or on the farm or in any other industry by fifteen per cent, the cost of production will not increase by that amount. You cannot get away from that simple principle of mathematics.

I am not against what labour has done. During the last war labour and its leaders did a magnificent job. We do not want to see the old days return. In my youth while working in the lumber camps in the province of Quebec I suffered from poor labour conditions. I do not want that to happen to my young brethren in the northern part of the province today. At the same time every citizen of Canada, including the labour union leaders, the farmers and the professional men, all have some duties to perform under present conditions. We need more consumer goods to absorb the increased purchasing power. Of course, economically speaking, the best results will be obtained from the workers producing more by working harder and more efficiently. They did that during the war, and they do that most of the time without any increase in pay. All the extra people, all the extra hours that we can get to increase our productivity are going to help reduce the high cost of living; that applies to every citizen in this country. There are certain conditions which attach to this principle, the first being that the extra wages should not go straight into the spending stream. I could give some lists as to how we are spending at the present time. It is true that they have a right to do it, but so far as our economy is concerned it is not the principle our forefathers were practising. For instance, there is the attendance at movies. I go there myself, and I have no regret on that score. Take the man who is spending money on liquor or consider the amount that is being spent on tobacco. I just mention those facts so that the house will realize that, as the leader of the opposition and the other party leaders said this afternoon, those who are living on a pension or with set incomes are no doubt badly hit, but generally speaking our citizens are reasonably prosperous.

I was speaking to some lumbermen in my section during the Easter recess. During last winter some of them earned from $12 to $16 per day. They are spending money and they have the money to spend. Take the men who are working in the big mills in Kapuskasing. I believe they earn something like $2 per hour. They are not feeling the effects of the high cost of living to the same extent. We are not all in that fortunate position, and to that extent I agree with what has been said. The leader of the C.C.F. party mentioned one or two particular cases in which some people were in dire circumstances. When the leader of a party takes the trouble of citing one instance in which the family is suffering—I admit that should not be tolerated—I believe he is not being fair when he does not give the other side of the picture. I can give that picture. Since the last war many of the people in my constituency have started little grocery stores or restaurants, small enterprises like garages, et cetera, with small amounts of capital. Today they are out of the red and some of them are worth $10,000 or $20,000. This picture can be repeated from coast to coast. We realize that, as the leader of the C.C.F. party said this afternoon, there is some suffering. I could cite some very bad cases myself, but it is not the general situation. Perhaps it is not the fault of the father or the mother, but in some cases it may be the fault of one or the other. Generally speaking, people who are healthy and who have a good occupation are not feeling the pinch as they did in the period 1930-35, and they certainly do not want to go back to those times.

We want to increase the supply of goods so that production will increase more than the demand. Taxes will play a part in this, but they cannot be a cure-all and it is not a real remedy. Our good Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has received a lot of publicity during the last few months about the terrible budget he is going to give this house tomorrow night. He is responsible for the finances of this country. Since I do not know that I shall have another opportunity, I am taking this occasion to compliment him for the good job he has done as Minister of Finance, a very difficult responsibility indeed.

It is recognized that there are drastic ways of curbing inflation, and that they are effective. There is practically no inflation in Russia, but do we want our government to copy the Russian method of deterring inflation? I well recall that only about three years ago we heard of an order given by the Russian government which meant a loss of forty to fifty per cent to the citizens in that country of all the bonds that they had bought during the war. We do not want that to happen in Canada. In Russia all the goods are rationed. They have very little butter. They have practically no meat, but they have many guns and aeroplanes. We know that, and we have to make some sacrifices to meet that threat. Surely, we do not want this parliament to copy the attitude or attempt the methods that Russia has adopted to deter inflation. Surely, we do not want that to happen here. What a marvellous gesture it would be for example—I speak only for myself in this case—if I forgot the interest on my bonds during the next four or five years. I hope I have the courage to do it, and if it was generalized no doubt it would be helpful in aiding in solving inflation.

What about management? Up to the present time our people have had confidence in the Liberal party because we believe in the free play of supply and demand. In the election of 1945 there were no faux-fuyants so far as our policies were concerned. We went to the Canadian people and told them we would gradually remove controls once the war was over. We have done that and the people voted for us in 1945. They voted for us again in 1949 because they had confidence in the principles of Liberalism. But at the same time, did all the manufacturers, did all the wholesalers or the retailers play fair with the government, or our present system and way of living? No doubt there have been some cases where there have been exorbitant profits that have not been warranted, that were unfair to their customers; and unless they mend their ways the government must of necessity to some extent step in and stop those activities and some of those excessive profits.

What about the wholesalers? If tomorrow they will say we will accept 10 per cent less gross profits, that would be a marvellous and helpful gesture. What about the retailers in the same way accepting 5 per cent or 10 per cent less, always having regard to the losses they may have in collection and general expense. These are matters we could explain, the same as I did in my own section, to make the people realize that they cannot expect the government to settle alone by itself the high cost of living at the present time but that we must all put our shoulders to the load. Even in peacetime we cannot completely rule out controls. There are limits to fiscal and monetary policy, and no democratic government can do more than is warranted by the active support of its people.

I was in my home town a few days ago and I saw one man buying twenty cases of sweet biscuits. That was hoarding. I know that some people bought sugar at the beginning of the war around 1940 and still have some left. That also was hoarding. I was told by a storekeeper in the drygoods business, an excellent and alert businessman, that at the present time the retail trade is buying as much as they can because they are afraid the price of men's clothing and of women's clothing will go up after this coming budget. You read in the newspapers a few days ago—I do not know how true it is; I read it myself; that is all I can say about it—that in British Columbia some clubs there bought some liquor to the tune of hundreds of thousands of dollars because they feared that as a result of the budget tomorrow there would be an increase in the excise tax on liquor. These are examples of things that the Canadian people do not want to see done generally at the present time or in fact at any time. It is not playing the game with our country. It is not playing the game with themselves either.

This is no time for any businessman to think that he should get all he can while the getting is good. It is no time for the labour union leader to think his union should get all that it can while the getting is good. In that leadership there are good men who realize the seriousness of the situation. I do not want to believe some of the headlines that I saw on Friday and Saturday when information came out from the bureau of statistics to the effect that the cost of living had increased by 4 points or more. They said that we were going to have some labour trouble in Canada. That is not the kind of leadership they have given us during the last seven or eight years. It was better leadership than that. If they have grievances, they should present them to the Canadian people, through their government, in a practical way, in order to be listened to by Canada as a whole.

This is no time for the man with money to think that he has the right to hoard and to bid for scarce goods, letting the devil take the hindmost. In doing so, they are all inviting inflation, inviting controls and, perhaps, unwittingly working for the communists. Again I repeat what I said before. There is no doubt that the high cost of living that we have at the present time is to some extent playing into the hands of Joe Stalin and into the hands of international communism, because they can point out what are faults in the economy of the capitalistic system and if unchecked may be conducive to bankruptcy. Again I repeat that the remedy lies with the government and also with every one of our citizens. We all have serious obligations to discharge on that score.

Our people are made of better fibre than that and, as in all times of crisis, they will rise as before to the occasion; and by the help and co-operation of all, they will surmount this difficulty in the same manner and in the same spirit as that they so readily demonstrated during the last two great wars, which gained for us the admiration of all the nations that were in a position to know of our accomplishments.

Again I repeat that we should always remember this. A country like Canada, which of necessity needs world markets for our great exports, cannot entirely control the cost of living. How many pounds of tea do we produce here in Canada? Tea is high in price at the present time, but we have nothing to do with the price of tea over the counter at the moment. How many pounds of coffee do we produce here in this country? Not a single pound. We have to buy it from South America and the South Americans will not accept dictation from Canadians with regard to the price of coffee, no matter how much they like us; we have to accept their quotations. These are matters of supply and demand, of interchange between countries of the world in which one trader cannot dictate to the other in the matter of prices. The same thing applies as forcibly as I mentioned a few minutes ago to the sales that we make to all the nations of the world, for which we get much higher prices than we did six, seven or eight years ago. We cannot and will not put embargoes on our exports at the present time. We still need United States dollars. We want the export markets to be wide open to us. We need to keep our balance of trade. These are necessities, and the leaders of this country must recognize them, and to interfere with them would prove disastrous.

[Mr. Bradette.]

I appreciate this opportunity which has been given to me to make these statements. I made them sincerely and I spoke from the heart. I know that in some sections what I have said will not be popular, but I believe it is my implicit duty to give expression to these thoughts, which I believe are shared by the people I represent at the moment.

I always very much admired the great artistry—I believe that is the proper expression—of the Canadian parliamentary system which is based almost entirely upon the British parliamentary system, with all its common sense and safeguards. Today, on the motion to go into committee of supply, opportunity was given to hon. members to speak on an important problem on which no doubt we shall spend quite a few hours. But I believe this is the time and place to compliment the previous speakers—the leader of the opposition and the leaders of the other parties—for expressing their opinions in a clear-cut and forceful way, although you could tell that they all realized the seriousness of the situation. The leader of the opposition was not entirely drastic in his request for controls. He did not make any such plea. We do not want absolute controls that will cut all across the economy. He does not want that because he knows it is not practical. From 1930 to 1935 I sat on the opposition benches and I saw from there the efforts of a fine man, the late Lord Bennett, who was caught in a situation that no human being no matter how gifted he might be, no parliament or no nation could have solved. I refer to the depression. For five solid years that man must have worked an average of sixteen hours a day. He did the best he could under the circumstances. But sometimes there are certain problems that are outside, bigger and beyond the orbit of a parliament or of a nation.

Today I do not believe that many Canadian people think that we can, as the leader of the C.C.F. said, roll back the high cost of living. You cannot roll back the high cost of living at the present time as you roll back a 20-foot log. You cannot do it in that way, unless you take some drastic measures which the Canadian people will resent for the next decades to come. You must use the system that you have at the present time, try to comprehend the mentality of the Canadian people and in close co-operation with them try to do what is best for them and the nation as a whole. We all realize that unchecked inflation would be calamitous for this country. It is a dangerous issue. The leader of the C.C.F. party made it quite clear from the history of what happened to Germany and what happened to other nations.

We do not want that to happen to Canada. We must always remember this. The government does not deserve to be criticized if they are looking closely at what is happening in the United States, and at their experience with control, under present conditions. Perhaps it is not working as they would like to see it work, but I have no doubt it is doing some good. Already the government, through the good offices of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), has looked after some control of commodities in short supply. He has done a good job on that score. Let us take, for example, the buying of automobiles: there are some restrictions today; you have to pay 50 per cent of the purchase price. That is also a step in the right direction. With all these matters up for discussion in the house, I believe it is our implicit duty to tell every one of our constituents that parliament is fully alive to this situation but that it is also fully aware of the legacy which has been imposed upon us and which we are not asking for and which is certainly not of our own making. If the great hopes we had in San Francisco had been fulfilled, if at the present time there were no two worlds, if we had communication as we have between businessmen and had friendly diplomatic relations with Soviet Russia and her satellites, how different the situation would be at the present time—undoubtedly fruitful it would be to all.

In offering amendments to the motion to go into supply I sometimes think that hon. members go too far. I believe it was only two years ago that the leader of the C.C.F. party offered an amendment to the motion for supply in which he deplored the unemployment situation at that time. We realize that there were signs of unemployment, but most of it was of a seasonal nature. At the same time the discussion was a good one. Hon. members will recall the dire calamities the hon. member suggested would fall upon the Canadian people. He talked blue ruin at the time. In my view that was not the proper way to discuss unemployment.

I must say that this afternoon the discussion was somewhat more elevating. Hon. members who spoke seemed to be trying to suggest ways and means whereby a solution would be found—because it must be kept in mind that no party, no matter what it happens to be, could take the credit to itself for getting a solution which would be reasonably satisfactory in settling to a certain extent the condition of inflation and the high cost of living now prevailing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; the hon. member's time is exhausted.

Mr. Bradette: I was going to refer to another resolution that was moved four or five years ago by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). He is a good agriculturist and a good member of parliament. Upon that occasion he moved an amendment to the motion for committee of supply in which he said that, in view of the high cost of farm implements, farmers could not afford to buy them, and that they were not receiving a sufficient amount for their crops. Most of his fears expressed at that time did not materialize.

Let me say to the leader of the C.C.F. party that those of us in the Liberal party are free to vote according to our conscience. We have good reason to follow our leader because at the time of the last election I maintain he received a national vote throughout the length and breadth of this country. Again, with the country facing difficult conditions, the people realized that the future of Canada for the next three or four years is in good hands. So far as I am concerned, I will do all I possibly can to help everyone, and to help the government to see that the proper measures are taken whereby justice and fair play will be given to every member of our population.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, when speaking in this house on February 8 last, as recorded on page 209 of Hansard, I said that the spending of $5 billion on our defence program would cause an inflation which could only be kept in check by applying very stringent measures. The control measures I proposed were:

(1) Over-all price, wage and rent controls;

(2) Fiscal and monetary measures;

(3) Control of distribution and allocation of materials.

I made those recommendations only after a very thorough study of the report of the commission on prices, which had been set up by the present government after the last war to examine the causes of inflationary pressure, and the means by which those inflationary pressures could be controlled.

The measures I advocated are the same measures which this present government has never ceased to claim operated with such tremendous success during the last war. They are the same measures which Mr. Ilsley claimed, when speaking in the house, had saved the taxpayers of this country $12.50 for every dollar expended in operating the controls.

Therefore I find it difficult to understand the government's reluctance to bring in the measures which it claims it operated with such success during a similar period of inflation, at the time of the last war, and which it claims saved the taxpayers such a tremendous amount of money.

While speaking on February 8 I pointed out that if controls were not imposed right away, the cost of living would increase at an ever-increasing rate. The increase in the cost of living during the past two months has more than borne out that prediction.

Before the present session opened I talked with a man who had held a very important position in the wartime prices and trade board. I asked him what, in his opinion, would be the time required to set up the machinery, and to assemble the personnel, that would be necessary to handle price and other controls. He replied that it would require between three and four months.

For that reason, while speaking in the house on February 8, I strongly urged the government to set up the machinery that would be needed to handle price and other controls immediately, so that our defence program could proceed without undue hardship to the people of the country. I pointed out that prices had already risen considerably, in anticipation of controls, because there had been intimations from the government at various times that controls were on the way. I pointed out, further, that every day the imposition of controls was delayed, prices would continue to rise.

The government disregarded completely all the suggestions made at that time to set up the machinery that would be required to handle price and other controls, with the result that we have lost a vital two months. During that time, the cost of living has risen a phenomenal 7 points, with an increase of 4·5 points having taken place in the last month.

During that two-month period, producers have continued to boost their prices in anticipation of the application of controls; and each month from now on they will continue to boost their prices still more, to make sure that, if a roll-back of prices should be applied, they will be "all set", as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has so aptly described what he knows is going on from one end of this country to the other.

Owing to the unwillingness of the government to act, we are still a minimum of from three to four months away from having the machinery that will be needed to handle price and other controls. This refusal on the part of the government to take steps to stop this runaway inflation is causing tremendous hardship to pensioners, and people in the low income groups. I say it is a callous disregard of the needs of the people.

Therefore once again I strongly urge the government to set up the machinery that will be needed to handle price and other controls now, so that the cost of living can be kept within reasonable bounds. Even if that decision were taken today, we must remember that we would still be from three to four months away from having the machinery we will need to handle price control, without which we cannot hope to control prices and keep the cost of living within reasonable bounds. The government therefore must act now.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable that this debate should have taken place the day before the budget for I am sure that my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), will in the course of his budget speech deal at length with the problems of rising prices and inflation. Since you have permitted the debate to take place there are a few comments that I feel should be made.

The government is just as concerned about rising prices and inflation as are the members of the opposition who have spoken. There is perhaps no problem before the democratic countries today more important than inflation, for inflation can undermine the very foundation of society. It is the duty of every government to take such measures as lie within its power to prevent the forces of inflation from gaining the upper hand. Moreover, the Canadian government has a positive policy to control inflation. I suggest indeed that no government is doing more of a constructive nature to relieve inflationary pressures than the Canadian government. Why then has the cost of living been rising?

Let us look at the facts. Prior to the outbreak of hostilities in Korea the cost of living had been declining. Between August 1949 and January 1950 the index dropped from 162·8 to 161. Between January and May 1950 the index rose by as much as it had declined and a bit more. In May 1950 it stood at 164. Then came the Korean episode and a steady rise which in ten months has resulted in an increase of nearly 16 points or about 10 per cent in the cost of living index.

In order to understand what has been taking place it is useful to break down the index into its component parts. First is food. The cost of food accounts for no less than 57 per cent of the increase which has taken place in the cost of living index since last May. Now then which of the food items account for most of the increase? Again the answer is pretty clear. A large part, although of course not all, of the rise is accounted for by beef and butter.

Those are important facts because what the opposition members are really urging when they suggest that price controls should have been in effect is that the prices of these food products should have been under control. To be specific, one of the things they are really suggesting is that the export of cattle to the United States should have been restricted. That is the only practical way I know of of preventing the price of beef in Canada from following the price in the United States. Are members of the opposition really prepared to advocate that the government restrict the movement of Canadian cattle to the United States to markets which Canadian farmers have built up and fostered for so many years? Would it be in the best interests of this country to take such action with all its implications in connection with our trade relations with the United States and our foreign exchange position?

I next take fresh vegetables which accounted for a substantial part of the rise in the cost of living.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What percentage?

Mr. Howe: I shall tell you in just a few minutes. During the last war we did very little about fresh vegetables because the prices varied so much from season to season. I doubt whether the price control of fresh vegetables is a practical proposition. I could go further down the list of foods, but I think I have said enough to illustrate my point. In general it would have been impossible to prevent a substantial rise in the price of food and consequently in the cost of living without taking measures which would have been either impractical or necessitated drastic interference with traditional markets for farm produce, or which would have required large subsidies.

I now come to the next group in the cost of living index—clothing. This group accounts for some 12 per cent of the recent rise in the index. The largest clothing increase is to be found in the prices of two chief textiles, cotton and wool. The price of wool has more than doubled since Korea and the price of cotton has risen by nearly 50 per cent. These are prices upon which Canadians have virtually no influence. They are established in the markets of the world by world forces of demand and supply. The simple fact is that the demands for cotton and wool throughout the world have risen more quickly than the supply. In one way or another the demand had to be cut down and prices were bound to rise. Fortunately the supplies of synthetic fibres have been rising rapidly, both in Canada and elsewhere, or otherwise the clothing situation would have been much worse. We shall certainly have to depend more in the future than in the past upon these new types of fibres in order to meet increased world demand for clothing.

The rent component in the index accounts for six per cent of the rise in the index. Since May the average increase in rent has been substantial, but not as great as some people thought would be the case. Rents were held down very tightly during the war and it was inevitable that in the post-war period there should be a substantial increase. The federal government could not have justified a policy of holding rents at their pre-war levels indefinitely.

Perhaps I might conclude this brief analysis of some of the main causes of the recent increase in the cost of living index by examining the 4·5 point increase that took place in February and that precipitated this debate and forms the basis for the opposition amendment. Of that increase, 66 per cent was accounted for by food, 10 per cent by clothing, five per cent by rents and 19 per cent by other items. Again food was the principal item. In fact 50 per cent of the whole increase in the cost of living index during February was accounted for by meat, butter, fresh vegetables and eggs.

The food increase is not an indication of runaway inflation, as has been suggested by opposition speakers. A preliminary survey of March prices indicates that the index will hold about even during March, or at the worst show an increase for that month of not more than one-half of one per cent. I am not suggesting that farm prices are too high or that recent increases in farm prices are unjustified or that all of the increase in the cost of food is due to higher farm prices. As a matter of fact it has been suggested in this debate that there is a wide discrepancy between farm prices and retail prices, but the statistics do not indicate that result.

Comparing price increases for the period March 1950 to March 1951 we find that the retail prices of fresh meats have risen by 24·8 per cent whereas the wholesale prices of the same meats have risen by 31 per cent. In other words, the wholesale price has risen to a greater extent than the retail price. The retail price of beef steers has risen 31·5 per cent whereas the wholesale price has risen 39·2 per cent. In the case of fresh pork the retail price has risen 21 per cent whereas the wholesale price has risen 22·8 per cent.

In the case of eggs, in that period the retail price has risen by 32·7 per cent whereas the wholesale price has risen by 30·2 per cent. In the case of milk the retail price has risen 6·1 per cent and the wholesale price has risen 3·2 per cent. Therefore in general the rise in the wholesale price has been somewhat greater than the rise in the retail price for the items that I have mentioned. All I am suggesting is that to keep the cost of living from rising it would have been necessary to put firm controls on farm prices.

These are the facts, Mr. Speaker, about the recent increases in the cost of living index. They illustrate some of the implications of price controls which are being so ardently advocated by both the official opposition and the C.C.F. party. As a result of its experience with price controls during the last war, the government knows what is involved in price controls. It knows how much people have to be regimented and pushed around if price controls are to work successfully. I find it interesting that I have met no one who had administrative experience with controls during the last war who believes that the same type of controls would be effective or desirable in the present situation. If anyone else knows of anyone who has a different view I would be very interested in knowing his name.

The opposition of course is very vague about the kind of controls it would put into effect. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) put it, they must be moderate and flexible controls. They must be fair to everybody and hurt nobody. The plain fact is that no such controls would be worth the paper they were written on. The government is not going to put into effect controls which do more harm than good. I have said this before and I say it again. We are not going to put widespread controls into effect just to give the appearance of doing something. We are not going to put widespread controls into effect unless they can be made to work, can be enforced and mean something.

The leader of the opposition quoted a statement or two that I made a year or two ago. Perhaps I might quote a statement that he made on November 24, 1949, as recorded at page 2158 of Hansard. I do so because I believe it is a good thing to keep in mind at this time. I am sorry that he has changed his viewpoint. He said:

> I was interested . . . to hear a reference to competition and the necessity for competition to keep prices down. That is what we believe in. When we talk about a free economy and free enterprise, we are asserting our belief that the individual man or woman in his or her home in this country benefits most from a system which by competition itself will improve quality and lower prices. That has been the advantage of this system; and it is because of that system that we have on this continent today the highest standard to be found anywhere in the world.

He was referring to the standard of living.

Mr. Fraser: Well stated.

Mr. Howe: Well stated, and just as true today as it was at the time it was made.

Mr. Hees: A different kind of economy.

Mr. Howe: It is a great pity that my hon. friend changes his policies so often.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I would remind the minister who is speaking, if this actually is of his own preparation, that there was not an actual defence program in force at that time. The defence program had not started.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend can never be a gentleman. That is quite apparent.

Mr. Drew: What I said was that the defence program had not started then. If the minister had been listening to the argument he would have heard me put forward exactly the same argument today, and I then pointed out that the defence program had completely changed the picture so far as the necessity for dealing with this situation is concerned.

Mr. Howe: That reminds me, Mr. Speaker, that in 1945, when the war was still on and inflationary pressures were at their worst, the leader of the opposition party demanded that all controls be abolished immediately.

An hon. Member: You were not here then, George.

Mr. Fulton: Can you give us the quotation on that one?

Mr. Howe: I would be glad to. I have the clipping. It was made by Mr. Bracken in a speech at Toronto. The leader of the C.C.F. party has a solution. He says that before freezing farm prices we should call together the leaders of the farm movement and work out parity prices. I think his idea of parity prices is considerably higher than the present prices except in the case of meat. He also suggests that we should call together the labour leaders and work out a system of wages. I understood again that the wages that would be worked out would be higher than the present wages. If that is the path towards keeping the cost of living down I will leave it to the leader of the C.C.F. party. I do not believe that conferences of that kind, and attempts to adjust prices and wages before instituting effective controls, would be a constructive method of approach to the subject of control.

Every country about which I know has had to accept some increase in the cost of living in recent months. In the United Kingdom, where controls have been more extensive than in perhaps any other country, the cost of living has been rising faster than in Canada. The United Kingdom government found that it could not go on paying higher and higher subsidies indefinitely. I believe that, whereas the cost of all retail prices in Canada rose by 15 per cent in the year 1950, the increase in the cost of all retail prices in England was 23 per cent, and I believe in Australia it was still higher. I know that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) intends to give a good deal of data along that line in his budget speech and I will not undertake to anticipate the statement he will make.

In the United States, where price controls were put into effect a few weeks ago, the cost of living has continued to rise. In fact, as I understand the United States price control system, virtually all increases in costs are to be passed on to the consumer by a system of margin or mark-up controls. Of course, as hon. members are aware, most food items in the cost of living are not yet under effective control in the United States.

I do not wish to leave the impression, however, that the Canadian government has a defeatist attitude towards inflation and rising prices. On the contrary, we are fighting those dangerous and disrupting tendencies where we think the fight can be carried on most successfully, namely, in the field of fiscal and monetary policy and credit control, supplemented by certain direct action about which I shall have something to say later.

But Canada cannot insulate herself completely from a world-wide inflationary movement in prices. In fact Canada is less able to do so than most countries because of our dependence upon external trade. As I listened to this debate today, I wondered how the official opposition could reconcile its demands for controls with its attitude to the extension of the Export and Import Permits Act. I can assure the house that general price controls are not possible without very extensive and arbitrary controls on exports and imports.

It has been suggested that we could keep the cost of living from rising by paying subsidies. Perhaps that is so, but I suggest that the payment of subsidies is in itself not anti-inflationary. In fact, unless the subsidy bill is paid in full out of taxes on the great mass of the people, subsidies are inflationary. They add to public spending. I do not think that the people of Canada want to be faced indefinitely with taxes of hundreds of millions of dollars a year to pay subsidies. If we were at war and had good reason to believe that the situation was of a very temporary character, subsidies might be a useful device as part of the over-all system of price control. I suggest subsidies are less appropriate under present circumstances.

Before concluding I should like to make a few comments about the supply position, for it seems to me that there has been a good deal of unnecessary concern about coming shortages, which has led in turn to unnecessary price increases.

There are no real shortages of civilian goods. Now and again there have been rumours of shortages, and when these resulted in a scramble to buy beyond immediate needs normal commercial stocks have been reduced below a safe operating level in some localities. Members will recall the run on supplies of sugar last August. Nails have given us trouble. Recently the same process began with diapers but fortunately was quickly stopped. In these cases what was lacking was not supplies but confidence in the future availability of supply.

Every time a run on available supply occurs it tends to create abnormal buying back through all stages of distribution and production, right to the raw material. This sort of thing pushes prices up. Confidence in future supply is so important that it seems timely to explain what steps have been taken to forestall the sudden appearance of any real scarcity of goods at the retail level.

Early last autumn it was apparent to us that meeting defence demands for nylon could make difficulties for the hosiery industry and other users. With the co-operation of the producers, nylon yarn was quietly and immediately put under allocation and a reserve was built up before defence contracts were placed. Production under these contracts has reached full stride without creating any additional demand on supplies available for civilian uses. There have been no queues at stocking counters and no panic buying as a result.

We are in constant consultation with industry and the distributive trades to discover any threat of future shortage far enough in advance to permit its correction. For instance, we have had to adjust contracts for certain fabrics to forestall a scarcity of work-clothing materials, and have assured a supply of steel for the fastenings. Now there is no reason for retailers to press for larger and quicker deliveries and so apparently create a scarcity of work clothing. The makers are maintaining their output at a high level. We have to take action quickly in order to kill such rumours.

In other cases we have resorted to export control to protect the flow of material going into Canadian production, as in the case of waste paper, rags, scrap metals, benzol and glycerine. An exchange of quotas with the United States has been arranged in hides and skins to maintain our normal production of leathers. In other cases we have assisted expansion of Canadian productive capacity, as in the case of rubber.

We cannot escape having to pay the going world prices for imported raw materials but we can at times arrange for greater supplies of cheaper substitute materials. Wool prices are very high but rayon can be used in a considerable degree to blend with wool without sacrificing quality. The rayon sells for around 43 cents a pound, while fine worsted tops sell for around $4 a pound. We are giving every assistance possible to increase our production of rayon and our foreign suppliers have also been helpful. As a result, in filling our defence needs for worsted fabrics we shall not give reason for any panic buying by the public. The housewife who searches a little further and buys a little better will not by any means feel the full effect of high wool prices.

Supply of steel is our most serious problem and every move to expand Canadian production of raw materials or to ensure adequate services, such as power supply and transportation, involves steel. Here we have to plan our moves in collaboration with our friends in the United States, which country supplies a large part of our requirements, particularly for special mill forms. We are now planning to program steel necessary to maintain production of agricultural machinery just as previously we have programmed steel for freight cars, locomotives and lake shipping.

Generally speaking our problems with steel are not reflected at the retail level, but we are in consultation with industry regarding simplification of the construction of durable consumer goods such as washing machines, refrigerators, hardware and plumbing supplies. The purpose of simplification is to maintain production while saving scarce materials. The objective is to have a manufacturer who has been making perhaps three dozen lines now concentrate on one-third of that number and still meet all the real needs of the market. It is conceivable that by doing so he may also save costs since he will gain a higher volume of output in any one line. There is no better brake on prices than adequacy of supply. Even this will not work over a short term, however, if manufacturers, distributors, and the public are panicked into buying out of fear of future shortages.

[Mr. Howe.]

In fact, there are no serious shortages of ordinary consumer goods in sight. Defence expenditures are substantial and will be substantial but they do not represent nearly as large a drain upon manpower and materials as an all-out war. I am sure that we can get along quite comfortably as consumers and still engage in a substantial defence effort. A few things may in the course of time become unavailable or relatively scarce, but standards of living will remain high. Unless all-out war comes, Canadians can continue to live well.

The greatest contribution any Canadian can make to stop inflation is to avoid panicky buying and to produce as much as possible. All of us should be thinking in terms of working harder; of working longer hours, rather than shorter hours. There is too much of a tendency, it seems to me, for people to look to government for solutions to their problems. Governments can help and should help in dealing with inflation; but consumers, labour unions, farm organizations, and businessmen can do much by their own efforts to reduce the pressures that lead to higher prices.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew) and the speech just completed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). One feature about those speeches was striking, and must be a bit confusing to the country. It is the complete exchange of positions on the subject that has been made both by the leader of the opposition and the spokesman for the government. One would think the Progressive Conservatives had now become Liberals and the Liberals had become Conservatives following the old Conservative line. The speech by the leader of the opposition reminded me of some of my early religious training. The church to which I belonged strongly believed in sudden conversion, and even condoned deathbed conversion. I am sure that those of us who are interested in this problem, those of us who have been advocating price controls, will welcome the conversion of the Conservatives, even though that may be a deathbed conversion. What appears to me, and to most of the people of the country, as the gravity of the situation, has already been set forth in this house. From the minister's speech it is quite evident that the government does not share the opinion of the people in this country that the inflationary situation is serious. I think I could do no better in emphasizing the seriousness of the situation than to put on the record a statement issued on April 4 by the president of the Trades and Labour Congress, Mr. Bengough, and the president of the Canadian Congress of Labour, Mr. Mosher, when the last price increases were first published. They say:

The latest rise in the cost of living index, 4·5 points in a single month, is by far the biggest for any month since the war. It is the fourth increase in a row, and each one has been bigger than the one before. The inflationary snowball is rolling faster and faster, and getting larger and larger. The index is now 16 points above last year, and over 60 points above 1945.

Every one of the sub-indexes went up during the month.

While it is true, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out, the highest increases were in food products, nevertheless every one of the sub-indexes went up during the month.

Food, the most important of the whole lot, went up by just over 9 or 9·5 points. Food is now almost 30 points above last year, and 100 points above 1945. It is rather interesting in this connection to note that in the past those Liberal speakers who have defended the present rise in prices, and who have opposed any measures of price control, have been inclined to blame the wages demanded and received by industrial workers for the higher cost of living. A new line was taken by the Minister of Trade and Commerce tonight when he indicated that the sudden rise in the price of food is due to the prices which the farmers have been receiving for the cattle they have been exporting. Labour cannot be blamed for the phenomenal rise during the month of February, since there were certainly no increases granted in the month of February that would account in any way for the rise which took place. These leaders say there is no use blaming it on wage increases.

There were no increases in February which could begin to account for a 4·5 point rise in the index; on the contrary, there is not the slightest doubt that wage increases during the month wholly failed to keep pace with the rise in living costs. Workers' standards of living are being drastically cut, and the position of pensioners and others on small fixed incomes is even worse.

That is the situation as seen by the labour leaders. In his closing remarks the minister appealed to Canadians to assist in curbing the rising cost of living. He called upon them to refrain from panic buying. He called upon industrial workers to work longer hours, to work harder and to produce more goods. I think what is true is what the minister quite clearly indicated, that today there is no real shortage of civilian goods. The minister himself made that statement. Some people with whom I have been discussing this subject, and who are in close contact with what is actually happening, tell me that the warehouses in this country are filled with consumer goods today to an extent that they have never been filled before in history. They are bulging with consumer goods that are being stockpiled, because the buyers have been hearing the government indicate from time to time that price controls, in some form or another, are likely.

As has already been pointed out tonight, every day that the government delays taking some effective measures to check the rising cost of living is simply adding to that rising cost. Mention was made in the passage I put on the record of the effect upon the workers' standards, pensioners and others on small fixed incomes. In my opening remarks I called attention to the reversal of position which is taken today by the Liberal government as compared with that taken in 1941 when we were faced with a similar situation. I should like to call the attention of those Liberal members who are refusing to take any effective measures that have had any degree of success in stopping the rising cost of living, to a few words of the late prime minister in his famous broadcast of 1941. Speaking of the conditions which faced the country then, and they were similar to those which face us today, he said:

Rising prices unless controlled will make it more costly and therefore more difficult to finance the war.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to the fact we are not now at war, and implied that controls could not, in his opinion, be effectively introduced. I believe what is true is that our defence program this year will cost this country just about the same as our war expenditures in 1941 when Mr. King made this statement. He went on to say:

Rising prices, unchecked, will spread confusion and uncertainty in industry and trade.

It is doing that today. No sooner was this increase announced on April 4 than trade union leaders all across this country were indicating that their unions were being called together to present new, increased demands to their employers. Unless the government can take some effective steps, we are now heading for a whole series of increased demands from industry right across this country. I continue to quote:

They will hinder—

That is, rising prices.

—production and the proper distribution of supplies. They will make the cost of living rise more rapidly than wages and salaries.

They have been doing that. They will continue to do it. There just is no point whatever in the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) appealing to the industrial workers of this country to work longer hours, to work harder and to produce more, so long as rising prices and profits go unchecked by the government, so long as the industrial workers of this country see that the government is taking no steps whatever to curb rising prices and the spread between the producer price and the wholesale price. The Minister of Trade and Commerce did not give us those spreads. He showed us that the retail price corresponded closely with the wholesale price of most food products. But unless the government can take some measures to see that both wholesale and retail prices bear a closer relation to producer prices in this country, some measure to curb the profits that are being accumulated today, his appeal for voluntary assistance, without any leadership from the government, will go unheeded. I continue to quote from this famous broadcast:

> The value of savings will be materially lessened. The result would be hardship to nearly everyone, and hardship in very unequal measure.

This is the effective part of the broadcast that I want Liberal members to hear:

> Rising prices—a rising cost of living—do not have the same effect on all households. The smaller the family income and the larger the family, the more serious the hardship imposed. For those with small incomes, rising prices of clothing, food and other necessaries may mean serious hardship, while for those with larger incomes only luxuries and small comforts may have to be given up.
> Rising prices thus serve to aggravate the inequalities in society, and to throw the heaviest burdens on those least able to bear them.

There is nothing today from any Liberal speaker from the opposite side of the house that corresponds in any way with the statement made by their erstwhile leader in 1941. It makes one wonder what has happened inside the Liberal party since 1941. Where are the men who supported the then prime minister in the sentiments that were there expressed, in their feeling for the common people of this country? Are there still no members of that cabinet who imbibed that philosophy in 1941 and helped to make it effective? Are there no supporters of the Mackenzie King doctrine still occupying cabinet benches for the Liberal party? What has happened to the men who gave leadership in the application of controls during the war? From the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who had more to do with the imposition of those controls than any other single cabinet minister, we hear that they do not want, for some reason or other, to impose those controls today; that they cannot be effectively carried out; that we are not in a national emergency; that they will not have public support. One wonders at the reluctance on the part of some cabinet ministers who so effectively administered those controls during the war and who taught the Canadian people to believe in the efficacy of those controls. If today the Canadian people believe in controls to the extent that at least 75 per cent of them are calling for the reimposition of those controls, then no one is to blame but those same cabinet ministers who administered those controls during the war and who preached controls across this country. The people of Canada came to accept those theories which were expounded by the men who in those days administered the controls but who today are afraid of something or afraid of someone; they are afraid to impose controls. They are fearful that they will not have the support of the Canadian people or the backing of the Canadian people in the administration of those controls.

I have already stated that the delay on the part of the government in showing some leadership in checking the rising cost of living is contributing to that rising cost of living every single day that that delay continues. We in this group have consistently advocated the reimposition of necessary controls. I realize that the government now is in a bit of a dilemma. They have dilly-dallied with this subject for at least a year since the necessity for controls became quite evident. During that year prices have risen to a point where to freeze and control prices at this time would assure the continuance of high and exorbitant profits for many of those who have taken advantage of the situation. To roll back prices would be still more difficult.

No one questions the fact that the government today is facing a serious situation with regard to prices. They are facing it chiefly because of their continued delay for at least the past twelve months in doing anything about it. The longer they delay, the worse the situation will become unless they want to see that balloon, inflation—which we have seen rising constantly and getting bigger and bigger—burst of its own accord. Such a situation might well cause a catastrophe in the economic life of this country. I do not think any of us want to see that happen. The only alternative is for someone on that side of the house to adopt the mantle of their former leader, Mr. Mackenzie King, for someone on that side of the house to pay some attention to the crying needs of the people of this country, for someone in the cabinet to return to the doctrine and philosophy of the Liberal party, and give up some of their conservatism.

We do not maintain that price control is the one and only measure that needs to be adopted to stop inflation. What we do insist on is that it is one of the measures that certainly now become essential. There is really no need in this country for us, because of military needs, to have shortages of civilian goods. Unless our military needs become much greater than they are at the present time, we can in Canada produce sufficient to meet both military and civilian requirements. There may be—apparently there are—countries today which cannot have guns and butter at one and the same time. There is no good reason why in this country, if we are given some leadership by the government which was elected to give that leadership, we should not be able to have guns, as well as other necessary military equipment, and butter.

What is true, and what has proved to be true over the past, is that we cannot have guns, butter and exorbitant profits at one and the same time. When the Liberal government is prepared to do something to check rising prices and to listen to the needs of the common people, and to return, as I said before, to the doctrines which they preached across this country for years, then we can get on with the job of producing.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate I would refer first of all to the Montreal Gazette of this morning, particularly to the report of Mr. Arthur Blakely where, in the second paragraph, under the heading "Signal", he says:

> As soon as the dominion bureau of statistics disclosed that the cost of living index had risen a record 4·5 points in February, Progressive Conservatives, C.C.F'ers and Liberals raced for the privilege of initiating a commons debate on the inflationary spiral. The reason for the race isn't hard to find. The theory held here is that the public will feel that the party which initiates the debate is the one most genuinely concerned over rising living costs. Hence the feverish haste. C.C.F. leader M. J. Coldwell and the redoubtable John Sinnott (L. Springfield)—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sinnott: I must repeat that.

> —the redoubtable John Sinnott (L. Springfield) lost the contest. They will take part in Monday's debate. But Speaker Ross Macdonald has assured Opposition Leader Drew that he will have the floor first to lead off the discussion.

Then, in looking over a discussion of business of the house in April 5 Hansard, where there was reference to procedure in asking leave to move the adjournment, under standing order 31, it will be noted that J. S. Sinnott, the member for Springfield, was first on his feet. And it is only now, after waiting for five or six days, that I have the opportunity of having the floor, and sharing in the glory with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), although he had the floor first today.

Just to show that the leader of the opposition made sure that he was going to have that privilege, I would refer hon. members to page 1641 of Hansard where they will see that he did not even give Mr. Speaker a chance to finish his remarks, before he was on his feet to say:

> Mr. Speaker, I trust that the attempt to introduce the motion which you have declared to be irregular at that time will not in any way change the priority, in view of the fact that I have already indicated to you my intention of presenting a motion for the adjournment of the house at the proper time.

While there was a race for it, nevertheless the hon. member for Springfield was on his feet first.

Mr. Fraser: Out on his feet.

Mr. Sinnott: I was amused today to hear the leader of the opposition make reference first to the high cost of food. I never heard him say, though, that the farmers were getting too much money. Then he said that the proportion of increase in retail prices had not kept pace with the increased prices to the farmers themselves. I think that is an indication that he would like retailers to have a bigger profit than they now have.

I want to make it clear that I am not falling for any bait or any attempt by the opposition to lead me to vote against the government in this debate. I want to make clear to the government my opinion in this matter, and I think that, taking a cross section of the country, I can say I represent what would be pretty close to the average individual in Canada. I am sure all hon. members will agree that it is necessary to curb the ever-soaring and rising prices.

In looking over the current review of agriculture, with particular reference to records in Canada, we find a larger population with a greater working force earning a higher income than in any previous record in Canada's history. As a result there is now a much greater demand for farm products, especially livestock and livestock products. We find that the volume of exports of farm products has now declined for the first time since 1940, and that there is no longer a Canada-United Kingdom food agreement.

Nevertheless production does not meet with the increased consumption which is taking place in Canada today. This is partly due to the small output of some farm produce, and partly due to the international currency situation. And, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has rightly said, it is partly due to the export of cattle to the United States.

In spite of the conditions I have described, the demand for agricultural products still continues, and the wholesale prices of farm products at the major domestic markets have continued to rise since the end of 1950. Prices to the farmers have improved somewhat, as in the case of cattle but receipts on Canadian markets are not unduly heavy. During 1950 Canadian farmers have realized a cash income of $2,169·3 million. Comparing this with 1949, the income for 1950 is down by 11·7 per cent for the farmers. Parliament was called on January 29, 1959.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sinnott: He who laughs last laughs best —1951. Since that time a number of policies have been decided upon to strengthen Canada's defence resources and measures to combat inflation have been announced. The policy of the government is to prevent war, but in spite of this the danger is still great and ever present. On February 12 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) had this to say:

> Let me hasten to say at once, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure I am not revealing any budgetary secrets, that I do not think we have reached the practical limits of taxation. I intend to budget this year for a fully balanced budget which I think will be the fundamental attack on the problem of inflation.

Referring to the general economic controls at the present time, the minister stated on the same day in the House of Commons:

> I do not believe that a system of over-all price control would be either desirable or effective at this time. Make no mistake about it, one cannot go into this thing for any length of time in a piecemeal manner. Controls on any wide scale will mean control of prices, wages, allocations, and the rest.

He then went on to say:

> We know how controls work, we know what their limitations are and we will use them to the full extent that we believe they will be necessary.

With this I go along with the Minister of Finance. It is a sound policy, as is also the part of the program dealing with credit restrictions and instalment buying. The government of the day has increased the down payment on many articles and in my opinion it is for the good of the country as a little more thought will be given by the people in their purchases, thus eliminating wild spending. That had plenty to do with the trend of things, but I notice the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) have had something to say about this. I give the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar credit for being fair in his remarks. He skated around the all-important matter of prices and wages until he was called to time by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie). However, taxes as taxes go are not an answer to the problem of bringing down the cost of living. Taxing is a policy which is very harsh and in my opinion is one of the cruelest devices to be used by a government on its people to curb inflation. What we need in this country at the present time are subsidies on the actual necessities of life such as milk, meat and bread until such time as production catches up with consumption.

I should like to show how prices have risen during the period 1944 to 1950, and I wish to refer to the Canadian Statistical Review in order to give the house some idea of the labour trend between 1944 and 1950. On page 34 of the Canadian Statistical Review will be found the average basic wage for different industries in 1944 and 1950, as follows:

	1944	1950
	cents	cents
Durable goods	77·9	116·4
Non-durable goods	60·4	99
Meat products	66·2	117·7
Leather products	70	112·2
Saw and planing mills	62·5	106·1
Furniture	58·4	92·1
Plant products—edible	52·9	83·4
Pulp and paper	72	125·5
Leather products	79	112·2
Thread, yarn and cloth	48·4	91·9
Hosiery and knitted goods	46·1	79·4
Garments and furnishings	52·4	78·5
Tobacco	47·4	100
Electrical apparatus	68·6	117·8
Steel and iron products	82·1	122·2
Crude, rolled and forged products	76·4	129·1

It might be noted that tobacco products are not essential to the people of Canada, but nevertheless the increases in that industry indicate the labour trend. There is no one in this house who can deny that wages have gone up considerably. They say that liars can figure, but figures cannot lie. I should like to give a few comparisons in regard to canned goods which will give the house some idea of what prices were in 1944 and in 1950. Taking 1939 as indicating 100 we have the following prices:

	1946	1950
Tomatoes	136·6	209·8
Peas	119·7	149
Corn	138·3	183·1
Pears	104	149

Those figures show that possibly labour has had something to do with the increases which have occurred. Since 1944 wages have increased 38 per cent while the cost of living has increased 35 per cent, according to the latest information we have from the bureau of statistics. Possibly I might say that at this time when there seems to be a shortage of production on the farm it would be proper to try to instil in the minds of many industrial workers the knowledge that the man who works on the farm, especially in the feeding of hogs and looking after livestock, does not have an eight hour day. It might be a good idea if they were to have it instilled in their minds that, in order to bring the cost of living down, by working an hour longer each day and therefore receiving a bigger pay cheque possibly it would induce the farm boys to stay on the farms a little longer. However, in spite of the fact that most of our C.C.F. friends are always complaining about the cost of living, there is one who actually told the truth here.

Mr. Gibson: Name, name.

Mr. Sinnott: I will have to give the hon. gentleman credit. He happens to come from the constituency of Melfort, and at page 1623 of Hansard he had this to say:

. . . those wages have increased from a base of 100 to a base of 218 today.

Then on the next page he says:

The new cost of living index which was announced today now stands at 179·7.

He said that the cost of living index had risen to 179·7 and that wages had increased to 218. Therefore, according to his information, the cost of living has a long way to go yet before the labour unions will have to call meetings for the purpose of increasing wages to catch up with the cost of living. I should like to read a newspaper clipping concerning a policy that the United States government is putting into effect. The heading is, "Truman Signs Long Range Farm Legislation". The article reads:

President Truman Monday signed long range farm legislation which permits the United States government to support prices of most farm products at or near wartime levels. The measure, passed by the present Democratic congress, replaces most major provisions of the so-called Aiken law enacted by the Republican 80th congress. The Aiken law permitted somewhat lower supports for major crops.

That is all I will read of the article.

Mr. Fleming: That is enough.

Mr. Sinnott: Here is something from a man with whom the leader of the opposition was quite familiar not too long ago. I refer to the Ontario minister of agriculture, Mr. Kennedy. This is what he has to say:

The retailer and distributor get anywhere up to 78 per cent of the price the consumer pays for fruit and vegetables . . .

Bear in mind that the retailer and distributor get anywhere up to 78 per cent of what the consumer pays.

—while the farmer who raised the food gets the short half of what it brings, Hon. T. L. Kennedy, Ontario minister of agriculture, disclosed yesterday. "We are determined to bring into proper proportion the ratio between what the farmer receives for his product and what he has to pay for non-agricultural products," Mr. Kennedy declared. Some change may be made when the Ontario food terminal market in Etobicoke is opened, he hinted. He said an investigation made at his request in Toronto, November 2, showed certain farmers received 59 per cent of the retail price of their cabbages, 42 per cent on carrots, 22 per cent on celery and 42-59 per cent on potatoes.

That goes to show that a large portion of what is received for the farmer's produce goes to the middleman. The government should make some effort to see that the consumer is not robbed in this regard. I have several clippings along the same line. They all indicate that the spread between the producer and the consumer is far too much. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said, many of these boys have been all set for a long time. No wonder it is hard to get farm help after reviewing these reports. Farm boys and girls by the thousand are lured away from the farms to labour in other fields.

I am given to understand that the labour force on the farms at the present time in the whole of Canada is only 18·7 per cent while 26 per cent are in manufacturing and the balance in basic industries. This will give an idea of how difficult it is for farmers to secure competent help. Eighty-two per cent of the labour force over the period of years have demanded more and more wages with the net result that the rise in the cost of living is what it is today. The house which labour has built is now falling around their very own heads. I am very sympathetic to labour and had to work hard myself before coming to this house. Back in 1926—and this is not a laughing matter—I cut pulpwood for $1.85 a cord, built my own camp, cut spruce boughs for my bed, dug my well, hauled in all my supplies seven miles from a railroad on a toboggan I constructed myself, did my own cooking and lived on 50 cents a day. That should be enough to indicate that I have had something to do with hard work. I also recall the days of the 1930's when we milked cows, shipped cream to the city of Winnipeg and received $1.65 for five gallons of cream testing 38 per cent butterfat.

Mr. MacInnis: What were wages in those days?

Mr. Sinnott: I do not wish to go back to those days but it is an indication of what some of us had to go through. However, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that labour itself is the cause of present-day conditions. The situation has arisen because of their leaders who, in order to save their own hides and positions, are constantly seeking some scheme to keep their members' interest aroused in labour unions. I do not despise legitimate pay for legitimate work but labour must be told the naked truth that 18 per cent of the population in Canada cannot and will not work twice as many hours on the farms without three weeks' holidays with pay, without Sundays off and the many other advantages and conveniences which are to be found in the cities. Therefore I say to labour in the most sympathetic way that justice must prevail, and that it is to a large extent because of high labour costs that the cost of living is what it is today. I think I have made that plain enough. Eighteen per cent of the population will not remain on the farms and work under those conditions for the amount of wages they receive when their fellow citizens in industries in the cities are receiving far more. That is why living costs have risen to what they are.

Mr. Johnston: That is plain enough.

Mr. Sinnott: In order to press a point with respect to the curbing of inflation, I must refer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I see him in his seat now, and I would not do this if he were not here. I will give him full marks for making an honest effort to have the house follow strictly the rules of Beauchesne. He has been a very aggressive worker in this regard, and I admire him for his careful and studious efforts. However, Mr. Speaker, he seems to have lost track completely of Canada's national aspect, or at least the building of Canada, and has concentrated his efforts on giving everything away instead of building up the country's assets. I am sorry to have to reveal that in my opinion he is public enemy No. 1 as far as the cost of living is concerned. Any time there was something to be given away, any time there was any labour dispute, the hon. member has been Johnny on the spot.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I see that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is in his seat. He has not objected to the remark, but I do not think the words "public enemy" should be applied to a member of this house.

Mr. Sinnott: Then with your permission I will withdraw those words and say he would be contributor No. 1. I feel that justice is long overdue, and I am sure the minds and hearts of many Canadians would be filled with appreciation by a quick move on the part of the government to curb this terrible inflationary trend.

I believe that just criticism is always welcome, but when one criticizes he should be able to contribute to a solution of whatever he may be criticizing. I am sure nothing would be more satisfying to Joe Stalin and the communists in this country than to have the present trend continue. While we are not actually at war today, nevertheless our position is exactly the same as when subsidies were introduced during the last war. The very fact that a bill has been introduced at the present time to subsidize gold mining in Canada is evidence of that. Gold mining is an industry very essential to Canada's progress, and the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) ably presented his views in support of that bill. In the same way it is necessary at the present time to give essential foodstuffs some substantial support. I followed the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) very carefully this evening. He did not disclose that he was opposed to subsidies, and I believe he was quite impressed that something had to be done in order to keep down the rising cost of food. I believe subsidies on the essential articles we require to keep our families alive must be provided immediately.

I know the government must be careful in the matter of subsidies; yet the mothers of large families, the wives of men in the lower income brackets, earning under $3,000 a year, need some assistance in making ends meet. Those with incomes of more than $3,000 a year can very well look after themselves. Things are very difficult also for those living on fixed incomes, and we need not go very far to find them. I could take any member of this cabinet to many places in the city of Ottawa where people are finding it very difficult to feed their families. In my opinion subsidies must be provided for milk, bread, meat and the other bare essentials of life until such time as production catches up with consumption. There must also be control of the legitimate profits between the producer and the consumer, since many men in business today have been all set for over-all price control. While I am not in favour of such over-all price control I believe subsidies on a few commodities such as I mentioned a moment ago are essential at the present time.

I have given what I think is the major reason for this inflationary trend. In conclusion I repeat that some way must be found to assure the farmers of this country that farm labour will be encouraged to remain on the land. Under our immigration policy of the past few years many immigrants have come into this country as farm labour. I do not think that policy has been rigidly followed up, because many of those immigrants remain on the farms only for a year or so and leave. It is not particularly nice to have an unwilling worker on the farm; still when a man comes here under a contract, I believe he should be kept to that contract. Many of those who have come here under this immigration policy have remained on the farm for only four or five months. Then they visit friends in the city, find out the wages they are making, and as a result leave the farms.

In my opinion subsidies on the essentials of food would be one of the finest security measures this government could take at the present time. I have presented my views, and I hope the government will take heed. I do not intend to vote against them, because I believe they appreciate that there is unrest throughout the country because of the rising cost of living, and will take steps immediately to provide some relief.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the hon. member who preceded me, but I am still somewhat at a loss to appreciate just what was the urgent matter on which he wished to adjourn the house the other day. In the course of his remarks the hon. member referred to the adage, he who laughs last. While I think every hon. member of this house appreciates to the full the brand of humour to which the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) treats us on occasion, I should like to return to a more serious vein and say that this is no laughing matter to the housewives of this nation. Less than a month ago, speaking on approximately the same subject, I made this remark at page 1156 of Hansard for March 12:

> May I draw to the attention of the house the fact that the heaviest single monthly increases in 1950 were in the months of March and July. We are already well into March; and while I am well aware that the figures that are reported are for the preceding month, I predict that the March report will follow the 1950 pattern, and probably the April one also.

I am now convinced that the April report is going to follow the same pattern. To arrive at that opinion it is only necessary to read the advertisements in the daily newspapers, notably those appearing on Thursdays when a great many retail houses run their full page ads to entice purchasers into their premises. Some of these prices, instead of attracting purchasers, would very nearly frighten them away. The most trying problem of this day for the average worker in this country is this very high cost of living. To those on the government side of the house charged with the responsibility of giving this country the leadership they were elected to provide, I would say that this matter cannot be cured by taking away the credit of the consumer. Nor can it be cured by taking away a still greater portion of his income through taxation, either direct or indirect, because already he has too little with which to purchase the necessities of life. These actions merely aggravate an already complicated situation which has become a nightmare for the little man and his family.

Cost of Living

Apart from those who have some means of sustenance and perhaps the hope of augmenting their regular income through added employment there are those who have no such hope at all, including pensioners of many kinds. There are the old age pensioners, the blind, the veterans and their dependents, those trying to raise families on the mother's allowance, those trying to raise families on the proceeds of workmen's compensation where the breadwinner of the family has been lost. In every mail I receive letters from all over this country, from Victoria, from Saint John, New Brunswick, from Toronto, from the city of Ottawa and many from Hamilton. There is one from Beamsville. I picked out a few of these, and I should like to read just a sentence from the various letters, because I believe they will express to this house more eloquently than I can possibly do the feelings of the people in this country on this very serious situation. Here is one referring to the old people:

> These men and women who, through self-denial, have saved what some years ago would be enough for their needs in old age now find themselves facing poverty through wars and economical conditions beyond their control—people with small fixed incomes, shelter and necessities rising, many of them are worried sick to know what to do.

Here is another one.

> Is it possible to obtain a cost of living bonus for the old age pensioners . . .

Eloquent, is it not? Here is another:

> May I bring to your attention the helplessness of our aged people? There is no union to help them as have the workers; the aged cannot go on strike. You know that $40 will not pay for rent, heat, clothing, food, etc.

Still another:

> Old folks here agree that the present $40 is now not quite so good as the $20 we started with. The cost of food has more than doubled and rents have been raised three times. But it is a long time since pensions have been raised.

Here is another:

> After spending a lifetime in the service of the C.N.R. got pensioned off with $25 a month to keep my wife and self.

Further in the same letter:

> After thirty-three years' service, we have about 50 cents a week to live on after paying taxes, buying coal, electric and gas bills, with nothing left for clothes.

Here is another one:

> How about those who are over eighty and cannot, like myself, do any work, must we starve? My wife was ill for seven years, the last four nearly blind and I could not do any work; had to look after her. From July 1, 1949, to August, 1950, when she died her expenses came to nearly $1,200.

Down further in the same letter:

> I also had to sell all furniture and go into a boarding house and I pay $50 a month. I have $300 left from furniture which I hope to save for my funeral (but I cannot do so). I have $450 to take me from now till November.

That was written on March 12, 1951. Here is another one:

Try as I might I cannot manage on what I am getting.

I am just picking out a sentence here and there which I think is pertinent, Mr. Speaker, to this discussion. Another one reads:

We are both up in years, in fact one over the eighty mark. Have had a lot of sickness and have a little left but cannot pay rent and have necessary food.

Here is still another:

We have been greatly concerned about so many refined old people who would never let the world know of their plight and yet they are living almost over the edge all the time.

Further in the same letter:

Old people who had enough to see them through life until costs became so outrageous . . .

I believe the leader of the opposition, in presenting his amendment today, referred to those who are too proud to ask for help, but who are suffering from malnutrition. There are many of them. I recall reading in the paper not long where an aged couple were found who had died from malnutrition.

Here is another letter:

My husband has been in business for sixty years. Has had to give up on account of health. We have had to spend thousands on doctors all our life. We have a little but can't pay rent and live.

Here is another:

I would be so pleased if you could help me in any way, and it would ease my mind about the near future, for even bare necessities run high by the end of the year these days. Fuel and taxes take the rent, and the little that is left goes on urgent repairs, and the home is getting old too, like myself.

Another one reads:

We do not ask for luxuries, but as prices are now how does the government think an aged person can get even the necessities of life out of $40 per month? Take room rent out, and what is left to live on for a month?

Mr. Speaker, I think those few—I may say I have probably twenty times as many in my office—excerpts from letters describe, more eloquently than any words anyone in this house could use, the plight of those who are on fixed incomes. Prices are still rising. The next index will undoubtedly show a still further increase. Where will it stop? We have listened tonight, Mr. Speaker, to theory; we have listened to explanations, and I think we have listened to excuses. I should like to leave this one word with this house. In the eyes of the women of Canada, those who are charged with feeding their families and clothing their children, excuses will not feed those families nor will explanations clothe their children.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a few brief remarks in connection with this most important subject. I must say it is always a pleasure for me to follow the member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott). I love to listen to his pedestrian eloquence and his unusual philosophy. I thought this evening, Mr. Speaker, he made a masterly defence of continuing profits and static wages. I was much interested in his new economic philosophy—I think it was an economic philosophy which he advanced tonight. It concerned the question of subsidies being applied without increasing taxes. I wonder if the hon. member realizes that the moment you begin to apply subsidies you must have some control over the price of the product. At least I must give the member for Springfield credit for starting a new economic movement in Canada this evening. I was much interested, Mr. Speaker, while I sat here to listen to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) congratulating the member for Springfield on the excellent speech he had delivered this evening.

Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest this evening to the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I was glad to note that the government was concerned about the question of the rising cost of living. I believe it is the first time those remarks have been used by a government speaker in recent weeks in replying to questions posed by the increased cost of living. I believe, Mr. Speaker, we can safely conclude from the minister's remarks that the government is now getting seriously concerned about the increasing cost of living.

I listened to the Minister of Trade and Commerce with great interest because, as a matter of fact, he is one member of the cabinet who I believe speaks his mind, speaks bluntly and flatly. He said the government recognized the fact that inflation could undermine the foundations of society. I believe that is further evidence, Mr. Speaker, that the government is growing quite conscious of the demand of the Canadian people for some form of price control and subsidies, and of the increasing need for some form of price control and subsidies. The minister also mentioned that prices had increased ten per cent in the last ten months. That is an average increase of one per cent per month. If that continues for many more months, Mr. Speaker, we will certainly be approaching runaway inflation. I do not think anyone would deny that it is because of the serious nature of the situation today, because of the crying demand of the Canadian people for some action, that the opposition parties have taken the opportunity presented by the motion to go into supply to raise this question at this time.

Regardless of the statements made in the last two months by the Minister of Finance and by other spokesmen representing the government, as to the use of fiscal and monetary measures to combat inflation and as to the use of credit restrictions, it is obvious that those measures are insufficient. Like previous speakers, I would not for one moment suggest that price control is the complete answer to an extremely complicated and complex situation. But with prices rising as they are at the present time and the ineffectiveness to date of the government's methods, I think there is an indication that some further measure must be taken to regulate and control inflation of this economy.

To counter the arguments presented by government speakers, I think we cannot produce better evidence than the statements of members of the government themselves throughout the years in situations similar to this one. First of all, I am going to requote a statement that was mentioned this afternoon by the leader of the opposition and which I understood the Minister of Trade and Commerce to say that he concurred in today after the leader of the opposition had read it. On March 27, 1947, as reported at page 1813 of Hansard, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

> The primary question that was asked of me was whether controls had hampered production. I can conscientiously say that since I have been associated with controls, which is from their inception, controls have never been permitted to hamper production.

There is a definite argument on the part of the minister against the suggestion that the imposition of controls would hamper production. The minister continued:

> In fact, controls at the moment are greatly stimulating production in several important lines. In my opinion the over-all production today would not be improved by the immediate removal of controls. If the control of lumber were removed today —and lumber shows the greatest discrepancy between export and domestic prices of any commodity —I doubt if one additional tree would be cut. If the control of steel were removed, the over-all production of steel today would drop by at least twenty per cent. The reason is that under control we are able to take the surplus primary production from Sault Ste. Marie and move it to the finishing mills at Hamilton, Toronto and Montreal. We are able to bring billets from Sydney, Nova Scotia, something that is never done under ordinary conditions, and move them to Montreal and Hamilton and convert them into finished steel. Were this not possible, the over-all production of steel in this country would be at least twenty per cent less than it is at this moment.

I think the minister was extremely correct in that statement, and I think conditions that prevailed after that statement was made proved it to be correct.

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, I remember that on March 19, 1947 the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew), then parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries, made a radio broadcast—and I may say it was an excellent radio broadcast—which I quite well remember listening to. The minister took practically the whole period of that broadcast to indicate the beneficial effect that controls had had on the Canadian economy. The whole tenor of his remarks at that time was in support of the principle of controls and the benefits that the Canadian people had received from price control, subsidies and certain regulations that were necessary during that period.

I want also to refer to a statement by the former minister of finance, Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, in the debate in March, 1947, on the emergency powers bill. I am just going to quote briefly what he said, as reported at page 1585 of Hansard of that year. During that debate the minister said:

> One can readily imagine how an abrupt and substantial rise in living costs would contribute to an unsettled state of industrial relations and to delays and interruption in the production of goods which are so eagerly demanded. It is not difficult to appreciate the hardship and the reduction in living standards that would result for the many families whose incomes are relatively fixed—wage-earners, school teachers, white-collar workers, pensioners, and so on.

Those are the very classes of people that the opposition have been concerned about today and whose plight they have been presenting to the government.

> That there would be profiteering and speculation in the necessities of life can be taken for granted. And it is an absolute certainty that many prices, after rising suddenly, would fluctuate widely, and later on decline perhaps as abruptly as they went up. To remove all controls now would be to ask for a sudden and disruptive jump in our prices and living costs at the very time when we can begin to see ahead of us the completion of the job of orderly readjustment. We would be throwing away many of the advantages of the policy which Canada has successfully followed when, with a little more persistence and a little more patience, we could pilot ourselves through the difficult period of readjustment without the dislocation and economic disorder which usually follows war.

If the government had only exercised a little more patience and had carried on those policies for a little longer period, in our opinion—that is, the opinion of the group to which I belong—we would not have entered the present condition of instability and insecurity.

On motion of Mr. Herridge the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we wish to proceed with those two government notices of motions setting up the committees mentioned by them. I understand that some members are anxious that those committees should start their studies. Then we shall move to go into supply, or continue debate on this motion we have been discussing all day, with the amendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), hoping that we will get a vote before six o'clock. At eight o'clock the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will present his budget. Then the debate on the budget will be adjourned, I understand, for some time. We could then take up Bills No. 191 and No. 192 that are on the order paper.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

STATEMENT AS TO TABLING OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the question yesterday of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) about the date of bringing down the report of the royal commission on arts, letters and sciences, may I say that I had a communication this morning from the secretary stating that April 20 was the date on which they had hoped to have it ready, but that in spite of their best efforts they have experienced some delays in the printing and it would be too optimistic to expect it on that date. He has promised to make every effort to expedite the printing, and as soon as it is prepared I shall be glad to place it before the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION FOR THIS DAY'S SITTING OF STANDING ORDER 15 IN RELATION TO PRIVATE AND PUBLIC BILLS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): In view of the applause which greeted the announcement made by the Minister of Finance that he would bring down his budget tonight at eight o'clock, I trust I shall have unanimous consent of the house when I move:

That standing order 15 in relation to the consideration of private and public bills on Tuesdays be suspended for the sitting of Tuesday, April 10, 1951, so that the order for the house to resolve itself into committee of ways and means (budget) may be proceeded with at eight o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INTERNATIONAL UNION OF MINE AND SMELTER WORKERS—ORGANIZING ACTIVITIES AT YELLOWKNIFE AND PORT RADIUM

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) asked me a question, which is reported at page 1670 of Hansard, as to the organizing activities reputedly being carried on by the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers at Yellowknife and Port Radium in the Northwest Territories.

The union in question is known as the Yellowknife district miners union, local No. 802, of the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers, an organization which has carried on as an independent international union since its expulsion by both the Canadian Congress of Labour and the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the United States.

There have been contractual relations for some time between this union and the two principal mining companies in the Yellowknife area. One of these companies is Giant Yellowknife Gold Mines Limited, the management of which recently renewed its agreement with the union for the period from April 1, 1951, to March 31, 1952, through the process of direct negotiations. The other is the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada, which has contractual relations with the union covering employees at its "Con" and "Rycon" properties, expiring in June, 1951.

Smaller mining operations are carried out in the Yellowknife area by Negus Mines Limited and Discovery Yellowknife Gold Mines Limited. These companies do not have collective agreements with any trade union, and the Department of Labour has no information as to any union organizing activities being carried on at their properties.

At Port Radium, much farther north, the only employer is the crown company, Eldorado Mining and Refining (1944) Limited, which carried out uranium mining and concentrating operations at La Bine bay on the east shore of Great Bear lake. In 1946 an attempt to organize the employees of this company was made, and an application for certification as bargaining agents was filed with the national war labour board by officers of the so-called Eldorado section of the Yellowknife district miners union, local No. 802. After conducting a vote, the board rejected the application for the reason that it was not supported by a majority of the employees affected. The Department of Labour has received no information that would indicate that there has been any union organizing activity at Port Radium since 1946, and there is no collective agreement with any trade union covering employees of the company's operations in the Northwest Territories.

Collective bargaining does take place, however, in connection with the refinery operations of Eldorado Mining and Refining (1944) Limited at Port Hope, Ontario. There the production employees are covered by a collective agreement between the crown company and the chemicals division of the United Mine Workers of America.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the name of Mr. Harkness be substituted for that of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood) on the standing committee on public accounts.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS AND ESTIMATES OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED TRANSPORTATION LINES

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved:

That a sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government be appointed to consider the accounts and estimates and bills relating thereto of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and Trans-Canada Air Lines, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys; and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers, and records and to report from time to time, and that notwithstanding standing order 65, in relation to the limitation of the number of members, the said committee consist of Messrs: Benidickson, Bourget, Carter, Cavers, Clark, Follwell, Fraser, Fulton, George, Gillis, Gosselin, Hatfield, Healy, Helme, James, Knight, Macdonald (Edmonton East), Macdonnell (Greenwood), McCulloch, McLure, Mott, Mutch, Picard, Pouliot, Thomas.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the usual motion to appoint the committee on railways and shipping to which are assigned for consideration and study the annual reports of Canadian National Railways, Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, the Canadian National securities trust, the auditor's report, and the annual report of Trans-Canada Air Lines, together with certain of the estimates of the committee of supply which are withdrawn from the house and referred to the committee on railways and shipping for consideration.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before the motion carries, there are a few words that I should like to say. I heartily support the motion to set up the committee once again. Indeed it is rather an institution, and is almost a standing committee of the house by now. I should like to urge, however, that the committee in its study of the affairs of the Canadian National Railways this year give particular consideration to the position of pensioners of that railway, and indeed the position of employees of the railway who hope that some day they may enjoy the pension benefits they deserve.

My remarks will be brief; indeed, most of what I might wish to adduce by way of evidence can be found in Hansard of March 12 of this year at pages 1129, 1130 and 1131. On those three pages will be found quite a number of questions which I had placed on the order paper concerning Canadian National pension matters, together with the answers given by the Department of Transport.

I shall not take time to give all the minute details contained in those answers, but I should like to point out that there are 3,256 retired employees of the Canadian National Railways whose pension is only $25 per month. In addition, there is a small group of twenty-four pensioners whose pension was earned under a prior plan, and is an amount less than $25 per month. If one takes the answers to the various sets of questions contained on these three pages and does a little arithmetic, one will discover that there are 7,269 pensioners of the Canadian National Railways whose pensions amount to less than $40 per month. I will not give the results of the rest of the arithmetic I might have presented on the basis of the answers to these questions. I submit, however, that the time has come for an overhaul of the set-up of Canadian National pensions. That applies with respect to those now on pension; for, as with many others on fixed incomes, their position has become a very difficult one. It applies likewise to those still employed and contributing to various pension plans.

I know what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) says when we plead the cause of such people, the cause of superannuated civil servants and others, but I notice that in Votes and Proceedings for yesterday, the 9th of April, there is notice of a motion to adjust the pension position of a certain other group of employees of the federal government—namely, that of judges—and of judges' widows. No doubt the increased cost of living will be presented as a factor in that situation. If that is the case with respect to one group it is the case with respect to all groups. I plead in particular, because of the motion now before us, the case of pensioners and prospective pensioners of Canadian National Railways. It is not often that I quote the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as a good example, but I must point out that although it is a very small adjustment that the Canadian Pacific has made, that private company has recently made certain changes in its pension plan which have the effect of boosting by stages the amounts of pension that retired employees of that railway may enjoy.

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has also made provision for a supplement—it is a very small one—of $5 per month which it awards to pensioners whose pensions are in the lower brackets, until such time as they reach an age entitling them to receive the old age pension. My compliment to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is not unlimited, because, as I have already indicated, I do not feel that it has gone nearly as far as it might have, but at least it has recognized the fact that modern conditions call for improvement in the pension plans affecting its employees. I submit that this applies also to the employees of the Canadian National Railways. I have argued from time to time, and it is still my view, that what we need in this country is a set-up similar to that in the United States. I have in mind the railroad retirement act in that country. I will not take time to give all the details, because I have done that on previous occasions, and have indicated the many ways in which that federal legislation in the United States provides much better pension arrangements than those accorded to railway employees in Canada. I still hope the day will come when our railway employees will have the benefits of a pension plan of that kind.

In the meantime—and I say that advisedly because we know how long it takes governments to move in these matters—it is grossly unfair that pensioners of the Canadian National Railways, numbering 3,256, should be drawing only the basic pension of $25 a month; and it is manifestly unfair that there should be 7,269 former employees drawing pensions of less than $40 per month. My questions put the bracket at $39.99, so that is the number of pensioners drawing less than $40.

I submit that in the light of present-day conditions; in the light of the fact that this is our own government-owned railway and that government institutions should be model employers and should be leading the way, the time has come when this whole situation should be overhauled, and there should be an immediate improvement in the pensions paid those already retired, particularly those in the lower brackets. There should be a change in the whole plan in order to improve the position of those who in future will become pensioners of the Canadian National Railways. I strongly urge that this committee go into this matter this session, and I would hope the result might be a report to the house that something should be done without delay.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I want to add just a word to what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said. On several occasions in previous years I brought up this matter with a view to removing the evident injustice that is being done so many of these former employees who receive only $25 a month. I suggest to the minister, as I have done on previous occasions, that the regulations under which this fund is administered contain many anomalies and injustices. I think of employees who, having worked on the railway for fifteen, eighteen or twenty years, are unable to carry on because of illness, and are denied any pensions. I think of the recent example of a man in Saskatchewan who after twenty-five years of service as a sectionman had to retire because of illness. He has nothing to show for those twenty-five years.

The pension regulations should be substantially changed and brought up to date. As I remember it, the basic pension of $25 a month came into effect some twenty-two years ago. At that time $25 had a far greater purchasing power than it has today. It was inadequate then; it is more than inadequate now. If I were a member of this committee I would endeavour to have this matter considered, with a view to doing something on behalf of these public employees. After all, the employees of the Canadian National Railways, a government enterprise, should be shown the consideration that is expected from private enterprise; and certainly $25 a month cannot be justified by any stretch of the imagination. When it is realized that more than three thousand employees are in that category it is hard to understand the attitude of those in authority in failing to revamp the act and the regulations in order to do justice in many cases where today injustice is being done.

I am not going into the matter at length today; I have done so on previous occasions. I have also dealt with the United States retirement act. I realize there would be difficulties in applying that act to Canada, but there can be no justification for the continuance of this system of pensions for men who give thirty and forty years to the public service, men in the lower income brackets, sectionmen, porters and so on, whose salaries do not permit them to make provision for their later years. With salaries of $150 and $175 a month it is impossible for these people to provide their own pensions. They give of the best years of their lives; and, even having regard to the economy we all wish to practise at this time, I am sure there could be no criticism if the injustices now being done these men were corrected.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the minister whether it is his intention to bring before the committee this session the question of the debt structure of the national railways?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I want to bring just one matter to the attention of the minister. I am very proud to be a member of this committee, and I hope the resolution carries, but I would like to ask the minister when the committee will meet. I hope it will not meet during the week of April 23-28, because in the interests of true democracy I should be down in my province at that time, since there is an election coming up. I would ask the minister to see that this committee does not meet during that week.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): It is not within my province to say when the committee shall meet, but if I have anything to do with it I can assure my hon. friend that it will not meet during the week he has to attend to important democratic business in his constituency. As the house knows, the committee is master of its own procedure, and when the organization meeting takes place it decides the time of sittings.

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) asked if it was the intention of the government to submit to the committee the question of the capital structure of Canadian National Railways. I hesitate to repeat what I said on this subject during consideration of my estimates on Friday of last week, because the statement was lengthy and I am sure the house would not want to hear it again. I would say, however—and this applies to the remarks and representations made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), as well as those of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) —that members of the committee are free to bring up any questions in which they are interested. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is not a member of the committee. He could become a member if he so desired; he is the whip of his party, and I presume would have something to say about who goes on a committee or who does not. But even if he is not a member of the committee, the members of the committee representing his party, as well as those representing the official opposition, may bring up any questions that are of particular interest to them.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

To deal more specifically with the question of the hon. member for Peel I said the other evening that until such time as I was able to bring before my colleagues draft legislation dealing with the equalization of freight rates, and the government was able to approve that draft legislation for implementation at this session of parliament, I hope, I did not think it was possible to submit to my colleagues for their consideration the question of the capital structure of Canadian National Railways. However, if the members want to examine the president of the Canadian National or myself on the implementation of the plan, we shall be glad to give what information we can.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

TAKING OF PICTURES IN CONNECTION WITH VISIT TO CANADA OF PRESIDENT OF FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Will the Minister of Resources and Development say who gave exclusive picture rights to the national film board in connection with President Auriol's visit to Canada? Did those exclusive rights include the visits to the cities of Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): To the best of my knowledge the national film board did not have over-all exclusive rights to the taking of pictures during the visit of President Auriol to Canada.

Mr. Fraser: Will the minister say whether the newspaper reports are wrong? They say that the newspapers were refused the right to take pictures.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS IN REACHING AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister now received replies from all ten provinces to his letter of February 28 concerning the form of a constitutional amendment to make possible the implementation of the old age pension plan recommended by the parliamentary committee last year? What progress is being made in reaching agreement on this matter?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The last communication which I had from the provinces reached me in the early afternoon of April 2. Later that same afternoon

I dictated the first draft of my letter to the provincial premiers arising out of the replies which I had received from all of them. In that letter I forwarded a further, and I hope final, redraft of the old age pensions amendment to the British North America Act, and also of the proposed provincial retail sales tax amendment. In those redrafts I endeavoured to incorporate the views of all the provincial governments so that the amendments would be acceptable to all provincial governments.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister whether, today or tomorrow, he could table this correspondence to appear as an appendix to Hansard? After all, this would be supplementary to previous correspondence on the same matter.

Mr. Garson: I assume that these are going to be tabled in due course. So far as I was concerned, I had rather planned to wait until we got some replies and then table them all together.

CRIMINAL CODE

CHEMICAL TESTS IN DRUNKEN DRIVING CHARGES —QUESTION AS TO AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice in connection with a matter that came up last session, having to do with increasing the powers of enforcement in cases of alleged offences by drunken drivers. At that time he said he was going to communicate with the provinces. Has he communicated with the attorneys general, and if so, will he table their replies? Is it his intention to introduce at the present session legislation concerning drunken driving, and also to permit the use of chemical tests in the determination of intoxication?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The subject matter to which the hon. member refers is one which, if it were dealt with, would be included in the Criminal Code amendments. The Criminal Code amendments which we have this year are an unusually large crop, and are more extensive than we have had for some years. In the department we have been conferring on them for some weeks. Just this afternoon I signed the final submission to be included on the cabinet agenda for its next meeting. Until cabinet considers these amendments I am unfortunately not in a position to answer the hon. member's question as to whether or not there will be legislation covering the subject matter of drunken driving. If and when such legislation is brought down, we shall comply with the other requests of the hon. member. If it is not brought down, the hon. member will have an opportunity to criticize us for not bringing it down when the estimates of my department are before the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister say he will not table the correspondence unless legislation is brought down?

Mr. Garson: I do not think there would be any objection to tabling the correspondence. What I would suggest, though, is that I show it to my hon. friend, and then if he wants me to table it I shall be glad to do so.

POTATOES

INQUIRY AS TO PRICE SUPPORT PAYMENTS TO GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): On April 5 I directed a question to the Minister of Agriculture. He was not present that day, nor was his parliamentary assistant. I thought that I might get an answer from him today, if he has looked at the question, which appears on page 1647 of Hansard for that day.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): That concerns the arrangements for marketing potatoes?

Mr. McLure: Yes, about potatoes.

Mr. Gardiner: I read the question, Mr. Speaker, and I am sorry that I did not answer it before. My memory is that the question related to what arrangements had been made with regard to marketing potatoes in the two provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. The arrangement made is that marketing boards have been set up in the two provinces to market some 2,000 cars of potatoes that remain in surplus. It is suggested that they be marketed in two ways, first as table potatoes, and second to the starch factories.

So far as the starch factories are concerned, my understanding is that they have agreed to take delivery of potatoes at 60 cents a barrel, which works out at about 22 cents a bushel. They make a payment of that amount at the time the potatoes are delivered. Then there has been an arrangement to issue participation certificates upon which payment can be made at a later date. In other words it is a co-operative organization set up under the act of 1939, and we have guaranteed that the 60 cents a barrel can be advanced. We have also suggested to the provinces that we are prepared to make a further payment into the pool at a later date. This further payment will be limited to a certain amount which will permit a higher payment than the 60 cents to be made, but at the moment we are not in a position to say what that will work out at.

The boards will proceed to sell the potatoes at the best price they can obtain for them. Any amount which is obtained over and above the sale price to the starch plant and for table use, together with the amount that is paid in from the treasury here, will be distributed to the farmers who delivered potatoes.

Mr. Hatfield: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Will the marketing board plan be carried out for the 1951 crop?

Mr. Gardiner: I think, Mr. Speaker, the hope is that it will be, but that will depend, I suppose, somewhat upon the success the boards have in marketing the 2,000 cars in question.

TARIFFS AND TRADE

TORQUAY CONFERENCE—QUESTION AS TO MAINTENANCE OF PREFERENTIAL TARIFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce under what instructions from the government the Canadian delegates to the Torquay conference are working now with reference to the maintenance of imperial preference?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Perhaps I may answer that question. The head of the Canadian delegation is the chairman of the tariff board, Mr. Hector McKinnon. My information is that it is expected agreements will be signed with sixteen countries, and Canada will have a satisfactory agreement with the United States. Other than that, I am not in a position to make any statement at this time.

SUPPLY

COST OF LIVING—AMENDMENT, MR. DREW

The house resumed, from Monday, April 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes I had at my disposal last evening I read one or two extracts from Hansard in an effort to indicate the opinions of certain members of the government with respect to the value of price controls, subsidies and rationing under what we would term abnormal and emergency circumstances and conditions. Before proceeding, I just want to read one more extract as further proof and thus further substantiate our continuing argument in connection with this most important question.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has been greatly interested in this question since the period of decontrol commenced in 1946. He placed a question on the order paper of February 25, 1947. I will read the question. It is as follows:

February 25—Mr. Knowles—Order of the house—For a return showing (a) the total cost of the government's price control program during the entire period thereof since the outbreak of world war II, together with a break-down of said total in such a manner as may be readily available, and (b) the amount saved by Canadian consumers as a result of this program, together with a break-down of this figure and an indication as to the basis used in computing the same.

For a considerable period, the hon. member did not receive a reply to that question on the order paper. From time to time he asked for information in the house as to when the question would be answered, and he persistently pressed Mr. Ilsley, then minister of finance, for a statement in connection with the question which had been on the order paper for so long, until finally Mr. Ilsley made in the house one of the most interesting statements that had ever been made by a minister of finance on such an important question. I wish to read briefly from the statement made by Mr. Ilsley on April 1, 1947, as reported at pages 1926 and 1927 of Hansard:

Mr. Ilsley: . . . the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr Knowles) put a question and pressed me to answer it, and I will do this as best I can, although it is almost impossible to give an answer to the question He asked for an estimate of the benefits to the citizens of Canada as a result of the price control policies; that is to say, the saving in prices to the consumer—the amount by which consumer prices were made lower than they otherwise would have been.

The following estimate gives some indication of the strain and difficulty which would have developed in the Canadian economy without price control. It is based on the assumption that in the absence of price control prices would have risen in recent years to the same extent that they rose in world war I and its aftermath. Nobody knows whether they would or would not, or would have risen higher.

Mr. Case: It is an impractical question.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: To the hon. member who has just said "hear, hear", I might say that when the next election comes along the same thing may happen to him as happened to Mr. Case. I continue the quotation:

Mr. Ilsley: I wish to point out that we never devoted more than fifteen per cent of our resources to the war in any year of world war I, whereas in world war II, in some years, we devoted approximately fifty per cent of the production of the country to the war. And economists have always told me that that is the main factor in driving prices up—the proportion of output that you shoot away and send away, leaving in the country the purchasing power that was paid out to produce it, and nothing to spend it on. That is a powerful inflationary influence. It must be remembered that in many countries where there existed no effective control, prices were going up 100, 200 and 300 per cent, and I am not talking of wild inflations such as occurred in China and other places. But if we assume that prices would have risen, and the inflationary factors were more powerful in the last few years than in the years between 1914 and 1920, much more powerful—if we assume, I say, that prices would have risen, without control, just to the same extent proportionately, year by year, as they did in the period from 1914 to 1919, then these are the results you get: the consumers would have had to spend an average of nearly $8 billion between 1942 and 1946.

Mr. MacNicol: How many millions?

Mr. Ilsley: I said nearly $8 billion a year between 1942 and 1946, to buy goods and services, which in fact cost them on the average not quite $6·5 billion a year. If hon. gentlemen want to know how that is arrived at they can procure table 11, gross national expenditure at market prices, 1938 to 1946, issued by the bureau of statistics, which shows the personal expenditure on consumer goods and services for each of the years from 1938 to 1946; and if the amount spent had increased proportionately to the increase in prices in the first great war, the amount spent would have averaged $8 billion in those years instead of the $6½ billion which the consumers actually did spend.

Mr. Quelch: Does that take into consideration the higher taxation?

Mr. Ilsley: No; it does not take that into account. Taxation was part of the stabilization policy.

We in this group recognize that.

High income taxes were probably the most powerful factor in the anti-inflation policy. In short, if prices had risen as they did in the last war and its aftermath, the consumers would have had to spend $1½ billion more than they actually did.

It should also be noted that the general stabilization program held down the cost of munitions and other military expenses, thereby saving a further large addition to the already heavy national debt.

I am sure that sentence will appeal to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), in view of the statement which I understand he made at some public gathering quite recently. I continue:

It is estimated that government expenditures averaged $4 billion a year between 1942 and 1946. Without price control this cost might have been at the very least twenty-five per cent higher. I think that twenty-five per cent is based upon the other figures which I have given with regard to the additional percentage which the consumers would have been obliged to pay; and the stabilization program has thus meant a saving of another billion dollars a year. From these estimates it is possible to see that the cost of the control program was under $200 million a year, while the savings to the consumer purchasers and government as a buyer were on this hypothesis possibly $2½ billion a year. The figures are tentative but do give some idea of the relative magnitude of the cost of and the savings effected by the government price control program.

Here we have, Mr. Speaker, from the highest authority—the minister of finance of the day, who had the portfolio during the greater part of the war period—proof as to the value of price control and subsidies in savings to the government and people, and definite proof as to the cost of those price controls and subsidies to the Canadian people. We have that on the highest authority. Yet, Mr. Speaker, in reading the Canadian papers recently, I note that one Liberal member of parliament gives as his reason for opposing the policy of price control and subsidies, and for supporting the government's policy in that connection, that price ceilings would be more costly than inflation to the Canadian people. I just wish to read from the Nelson Daily News of March 31, which reports a meeting of the East Kootenay Liberal Association at Cranbrook on March 29. It has this to say in part, in reporting the speech of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne):

He supported the government in its stand against price controls establishment and its alternate policy of credit control to reduce buying power on the grounds that enforcement of resulting rationing and price ceilings would be more costly to the public than present inflation.

I presume that report is correct, because I read the same sort of report, in almost identical words, in the Cranbrook Courier of March 29. When the hon. member made that statement, I think he was unaware of the statement of the former minister of finance with regard to the relative cost of price controls and subsidies, and the savings effected for the Canadian people. For every dollar spent on price control and subsidies, according to the statement of the highest authority, the saving to the average Canadian consumer was between $12 and $13. Surely it is time the government acted in this situation.

As I said before, I certainly am aware of its difficulties, its ramifications and the complications attending it under this system. But the government could act in the sphere of food, clothing and shelter, these three things that so seriously affect the lives of the people who have the lower incomes in this country. I am not personally concerned about the price of liquor, or the price of luxuries, or things of that sort. But I do think that this government should act in the field of food, clothing and shelter, and act now. If we are to protect the living standards of the families of this country, particularly of people raising families at this time, something must be done to protect those who are in receipt of fixed incomes, because they are in a very difficult position. I realize it is difficult to remedy the situation, and, shall I say, place them in a satisfactory position in relation to other groups in the community. We will have to roll back prices where possible after investigation. Those who are living on small pensions and fixed incomes find themselves in very difficult circumstances. Then there are those who are anxious to build houses. I believe the very foundations of democracy are built and maintained by people who own or desire to own their own houses. In my personal experience from dealing with people I have noticed that a change in the attitude of some men toward life takes place when they are able to build or own their own homes and have a little plot of ground around them to cultivate. These three things—food, clothing, shelter—should be given very serious consideration and action should be taken by the government now.

I realize that the present inflation is not all the government's fault. I think every fair-minded person realizes that. Some of it has been the result of human nature and of human greed. I know of many storekeepers who are very much perturbed by the constant rise in prices. They have shown me their invoices and have explained to me how much concerned they are about the situation. They know of its effect on their customers. But I know of other storekeepers who are storing supplies in their basements and are working havoc with prices just because they can take advantage of the Canadian people's circumstances at this time. Some manufacturers are raising prices unduly. There is no question about that.

Some manufacturers in this country have an excellent reputation, and are willing to accept a reasonable standard of profit. We realize that under this profit system a reasonable standard of profit is necessary if the system is to continue to function; but I know personally of individuals who have taken an exceptional advantage of present circumstances and shortages.

I come finally to the question of lumber. Lumber is a very important thing in this country in connection with the building of houses. There are lumber manufacturers in this country who have done their best to maintain a reasonable price throughout the difficult years; but owing to the competition for lumber from the United States, lumber prices have risen almost dramatically in the last two or three years, and to such an extent that at the present time there are thousands of Canadians who even a year ago were considering building a house, but owing to the increased cost of lumber, the increased cost of hardware and other things, are denied that opportunity and privilege at this time. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the government could well make certain that the Canadian requirements are met by a quota on the export of lumber, and establishment of price control on the lumber sold in the domestic markets. The return from lumber sold to the export market is quite sufficient to secure for any lumber company an adequate profit in relation to the lumber they would have to sell on the domestic market. I think control of lumber is a very necessary step at this time.

I have made some investigation of the prices of lumber in this part of Ontario. I have heard references made to the prices charged by the lumber industry in British Columbia. I can say this in all truthfulness, and I am sure in this I shall be supported by other British Columbia members, that the prices that are charged for lumber in the city of Ottawa are simply out of this world as compared with the prices being charged for comparable grades in my own district of British Columbia.

I want to bring another thing to the attention of the minister. I know a little about lumber grades. I have an interest in a little tinpot mill, and we grade very strictly. Everything that goes out of the mills in our district for export is good quality lumber and timber. I think that is generally the practice throughout British Columbia.

Mr. Gibson: Like our apples.

Mr. Herridge: The same as our apples. I think that all products sent from British Columbia are of good grade. But, Mr. Speaker, I was in Calgary last year and met a man driving a truckload of lumber. He was coming out of a lumber yard. I said: "What grade of lumber have you on there?" He said: "This is a load of No. 1 common." It was not a load of No. 1 common at all. It was a load of lower grades of lumber being sold as No. 1.

I think the government should do something to protect the lumber purchasers on the prairies, because in my opinion this overgrading has occurred out there in recent years. There is a dilution of lumber grades, when it reaches the prairie market, by a few wholesalers, jobbers, retailers, and so on. I should like to see the government give democracy an opportunity to function.

As I have said over and over again, this is a most difficult question. There is no overnight solution to it; but we in this group believe that if the government takes into its confidence organized labour of this country, the organized farmers, the representatives of the co-operative movement, the representatives of the consumers movement and some representative women, and these people are permitted to get around a table with representatives of the federal government, a great deal can be done under the leadership of the government, in co-operation with the people's representatives and organizations to stabilize prices and improve this very unsatisfactory situation.

The cost of living index on March 1—not April 10—was 179·7. When the Canadian people read that in the papers it appalled many of them. Without doubt some minister's statements in previous months were an invitation to greedy people to raise prices, and without doubt some greedy people have taken advantage of the situation. The fiscal policies of the government and its credit restriction policy are not sufficient. That is evidenced by what has happened.

There are certain interests in this country who are against price control. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce has been consistently against price control, I think because it is not in favour of any restriction or controls that appear to interfere with the operation of free enterprise. The Canadian Manufacturers Association has been against price control consistently, and some of the lumber organizations throughout Canada have been against price control. I remember in March, 1947, the Western Retail Lumbermen's Association made representations by letter urging the dropping of price controls immediately, when this government was following a policy of limited decontrol. In that letter they said something to this effect: If only price controls would be discontinued production would increase and the cost of lumber would drop. As a matter of fact production has increased greatly since that time, but owing to conditions in the external market and the demand for lumber internally, instead of prices dropping, they have constantly increased.

For price control, or should I say a form of profit control, we have a majority of Canadians as indicated by public opinion polls. We have organized labour. Organized labour as a whole does not want wage freezing, but organized labour is in favour of price controls and subsidies and is willing to co-operate with the government in order to do something to bring about a satisfactory relationship between wages and prices on the basis of negotiations and the practice of the principles of collective bargaining.

The organized farmers are in favour of price controls, necessary subsidies and regulations of that type. They do not want price freezing, but they are willing to work in co-operation with the government in the best interests of the country and in co-operation with labour to bring about a satisfactory relationship between prices and wages and so on. We have the co-operative movement leaders expressing themselves as being firmly in favour of price controls, subsidies and necessary regulations, and indicating their willingness to co-operate with the government. We have the veterans organizations. The British Columbia command of the Canadian Legion has taken a firm stand on this question, as have other veteran organizations. They are ready to co-operate. Then there are women's organizations and a large number of civil servants who are looking forward to the day when the government will take action.

If this government will only let democracy function and give the people the opportunity to participate, we can expect results. I know from experience that when a challenge faces the people they are ready to meet it. Things do not necessarily have to be smooth or easy. The government should give the people something to live for, and a worth-while purpose. This government can give the Canadian people something to live for by asking them to co-operate in developing a stabilized price structure in this country and a system of subsidies which will help to equalize the cost of living, help to equalize the burden now on the backs of the lower income groups by bringing about a more satisfactory relationship between wages and prices.

(Translation):

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, when I hear the opposition blame the government for the rising cost of living, I wonder if it could not be said instead that the Liberal government has so well run the country that we are enjoying an era of prosperity without precedent in history. Due to the markets the government has been able to find abroad for our products, the purchasing power of our people has increased substantially. This results in increased demand and, therefore, brings us higher prices for our products, higher wages, et cetera.

I would be tempted to twit the opposition about it, especially the official opposition; indeed, from 1930 to 1935, they showed so little capacity for running the country that they caused part of the people to go bankrupt. In fact the country was then swarming with unemployed, wages ran from 10 cents to 60 cents an hour, whereas today our workers are getting 60 cents to $2.50 an hour. Farm products were selling at ridiculous prices. Most farmers even lost the savings that had been put away for two or three generations while their income was barely sufficient to feed their families and pay their taxes.

Cost of Living

I have a few suggestions to help the government check inflation and lower the cost of living. It could be done by lowering the price of a wide variety of goods. My suggestions will not be welcomed and I trust that, if they are accepted, those who will suffer from them will not bear me too much ill will, for I make them sincerely.

In the first place, I believe that industrialists and businessmen should not be allowed to spend more than 25 per cent of the cost of a product for advertising purposes. I suggest that legislation to that effect would lower the cost of goods by something between 5 and 25 per cent, for the cost of advertising is really borne by the consumer.

I think an excess profits tax similar to the tax we had during the last war should be levied against all individuals, industrialists or others who, in the past four years, have had a taxable income of $5,000 or more, so that a 100 per cent tax might be levied on all incomes over and above the computed average for those years, and that they should be granted a reimbursement of 20 or 25 per cent in 1955 or 1956. Such taxation would curtail profiteering, force prices down, and bring substantial revenues to the government.

I believe we could also ask all our people, especially during 1951 and 1952—or as long as the world crisis prevails—to work from two to eight hours more a week. This would bring about a surplus of goods and consequently a lowering of prices which would benefit our working class and people of restricted means.

I am sure the government will take the best available means—and there are many—in order to fight inflation, which is disheartening to people of smaller means.

The new budget will be brought down tonight. I am sure the government has made the necessary provision for a sound administration of the country and that whatever regulations are made will prove satisfactory to all our people.

Unlike many hon. members of the opposition, I do not wish to put an end to prosperity in Canada. Our workers have more money and live in better homes than ever before. Farm buildings are in better condition than ever and the situation keeps on improving; we see new structures going up as well as community recreational centres, not to mention an ever-increasing number of new cars and new tractors driven by well fed and well dressed people.

I realize that, from time to time, the government must curb the ambitions of some people and bring them back to reason, but nothing should be done to jeopardize the prosperity which, thanks to the present administration, our people have enjoyed since 1935. I therefore urge my leaders not to make the mistake of acting on the advice of those who, from 1930 to 1935, handicapped the development of Canada.

[Mr. Gour (Russell).]

(Text):

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be natural, having regard to the speech delivered last evening by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), that I begin my remarks by referring to what the minister said. I must confess that in part the speech was a great surprise to me. I listened with much interest to the minister's account of various proceedings which are being carried out by his department, but when he came to the end of his speech he used words which I imagine were a surprise to a large number of people in Canada who think they are suffering at the present time. The minister said, as reported on page 1762 of Hansard:

> I am sure that we can get along quite comfortably as consumers and still engage in a substantial defence effort.

And a little later:

> Unless all-out war comes, Canadians can continue to live well.

Now, I listened to that and I said to myself: What are we talking about? Is there really any rise in prices at all? Yes, the minister indicated that there was a rise. At page 1758 of Hansard he said that prices had gone up about 16 points or 10 per cent, and I think that is roughly within a year. When I read this I could not help wondering what would be the feelings of the people of whom the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) spoke last night. Incidentally, I think the hon. member for Hamilton West can speak with a particularly strong title for the housewives of Canada as she herself is not only an efficient member of parliament but also an efficient housewife. When we heard what she had to say it was certainly most difficult indeed to square it with the words of the minister which I read. Indeed it seems that when the minister speaks about this matter he is able to maintain an attitude of detachment, almost as if he were an onlooker.

I leave that and come back now to what I think is the feeling of the great mass of the ordinary people, the people who really believe that they are suffering seriously. I think these people, and indeed a very large number of the population of the whole country, having regard particularly to what happened in the month of February, believe that we have an inflation which is at any rate giving a very good imitation of being a runaway inflation. I was pleased to hear the minister say that the month of March had apparently flattened out but we must not take too much comfort from that because, after all, it is not as if at the present stage of costs we should be content to go on as we are. There has got to be something much better or people are going to continue to suffer in a way which is extremely hard for them to bear.

The thought of inflation and what it does reminds one of a remark of Lenin which I believe Stalin is in the habit of quoting often, that the way to destroy a capitalist country is to debauch its currency. When those in Moscow watch what is going on here at the moment, and what has been going on for some months, it seems to me that they will be chuckling a bit and saying: Well, these people are trying to get ready to meet us in the field but if they go on as they are now, managing their affairs as badly as they are now, it may be that they will destroy themselves, or at any rate weaken themselves to the point where their defence effort will be utterly blunted. It is interesting to note that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) in a speech he made in New York the other day was uttering what almost sounded like a signal of distress by reason of the fact that high prices were indeed blunting his defence production by increasing costs so enormously.

One would have reason to worry about this matter much less if we were in the full swing of our defence expenditure, but we are told that we have only made a good beginning. I did not see this in print but I was told the other day that Mr. Harris, the steel controller, speaking from where he sits, said that we really would not be under a full head of expenditure for about a year. The minister will correct me if I am wrong on that, but that was reported to me, and it makes me feel that the present situation gives cause for just that much more anxiety. It makes one feel that, even if March has flattened out, the pressures still to come make the whole situation full of danger.

Why are we in this trouble if defence expenditures are still at a comparatively early stage? I want to ask also whether it could have been averted. I think a good deal of it could have been averted, and I shall try to say why. I suppose there are two main reasons why we are in this difficulty now. The first is, as the minister said last night, that we have had bad public psychology. People have been running to cover, people have been hoarding. Anticipating higher prices a great many people have bought goods, I am afraid, speculating for a rise. The minister is somewhat tired of hearing his own remarks quoted on that point, but he made it very clear when he said that people were "governing themselves accordingly". What he said was that people, anticipating and fearing that some kind of controls might be put on, were "governing themselves accordingly"—in other words, buying up commodities.

Human psychology is one reason, and there I think we are fully entitled to blame the government. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), who has just spoken, called for a lead from the government. I thought some of his remarks were quite sound, and that we do need a lead. I feel ever so strongly that the government has not taken the lead.

When we met in this chamber last September the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and others pressed very strongly that the government should say whether or not there was an emergency. The government hesitated to do so, and I think that people have hesitated to believe that the situation is as serious as the actual figures show it to be. I think that remark also applies to the situation in Korea. It is quite astonishing how we have dissociated ourselves from the happenings there, which are tremendous, even though at the present time they seem to be in a lull.

The next cause, and a very active material cause for what has happened, is that there has been what I call a gross failure on the part of the government to use the financial controls that are available to it, particularly through the Bank of Canada. The Bank of Canada was set up for the very purpose of giving the government an effective agency to control credit. I shall try to show the house in the course of the next few minutes that in this respect there has been a grievous and inexcusable failure. I think it is desirable that the public should know the causes of the present situation. As a matter of fact if people know the causes there will be some occasion for them to take heart and say: Well, if those causes are met we may have a better hope for the future.

As the leader of the opposition said some weeks ago in the house, there is a terrible feeling of insecurity abroad. I would say that this insecurity has invaded the minds of all but the well-to-do—and perhaps even the minds of many of them. Second, those who have wage contracts with automatic cost of living escalator clauses may feel that they can escape, and third, those who are so well organized that they feel they can have their wages keep pace with the cost of living. These three classes might to some extent escape the prevailing sense of insecurity although I suggest that as things are going now none of them will feel secure because they surely will realize that if this thing goes on and is not checked it will undermine, as the minister said last night, the very foundations of our society.

This situation demands qualities which are hard to summon up in peacetime. There is no doubt in the world that it demands energy, activity and all that kind of thing, but it also demands a certain forbearance. It also demands that people should not try to tread down other elements in the community regardless, and think only of their own welfare, because if that prevails in the end they will be dragged down also. It is easy to describe the disease. It has been described so often we are tired of hearing about it. It is the case of "too much money chasing too few goods". It is easy to describe the cure—"more production and less consumption". That is easily said, but I have here an epigrammatic statement made by a competent economist from which I propose to read because I think it puts in simple words very pertinent advice which we should all bear in mind, and which could have a very practical influence on the situation if we would really bear it in mind. He said:

> If when I get a larger income in dollars for myself I produce at the same time correspondingly more than I produced before, this will not raise my neighbour's cost of living.
> But as often as I get a larger income without at the same time producing correspondingly more than I produced before, my success in getting more income for myself must raise my neighbour's cost of living.
>
> And in parallel with this, whenever my neighbour gets a larger income in dollars for himself and at the same time enlarges his own output correspondingly, he will not raise my cost of living.
> But as often as he gets a larger income without at the same time producing correspondingly more than he produced before, his own success in getting more income for himself must raise my cost of living.

I suggest that there is a lot of practical common sense in that, and if by some magic we were all able to realize the force of that statement and practise it, that in itself would go a long way towards solving the problem. I suggest also that governments, by wise instruction and wise leadership, could do a great deal to make that view prevail.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the hon. gentleman say who wrote that?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes; Gilbert Jackson, who I think is one of the most earnest students of economics. I think we can also say, and I imagine everyone will agree with this, that civilian demands must be reduced through economy of expenditure by governments, businesses and individuals.

We must have higher taxes; we must have credit restraints; we must have control of scarce commodities. As a matter of fact the minister referred to this very thing last autumn. I should like to read just a sentence from what he said when he actually spoke of controlling prices. Apparently there are some people who feel that even to suggest such a thing is hardly done in respectable circles, so I want to read to the minister part of what he had to say at page 458 of Hansard for last September. Speaking on the Essential Materials (Defence) Act he said:

> The purpose of the measure is to try to see that war buying is not permitted to be a factor in increasing prices. In other words, if for war purposes we shorten the supply of materials and the remainder is insufficient for domestic supply, we then take the right to fix prices on the materials for domestic use, and arrange distribution.

To me that seems sensible. That seems to recognize what is actually happening, that purchases by governments have upset and are upsetting the ordinary operations of the market. The other day we read that the United States, which had been stockpiling tin, brought down the price of tin by a very substantial amount in one day by ceasing its operations. That shows the effect actions by governments are having day by day on the markets.

Of course it is commonplace to say what we all agree with, that production is all important. I suppose we could easily have a calculation made to show that if by some comparatively small percentage, probably less than 5 per cent and perhaps only 2 or 3 per cent, we could increase our production each day, our problems would largely disappear. Unfortunately that realization will never get abroad while we are utterly unconscious of the fact that we are living under stress, that there is a real emergency, that we are in real danger, the kind of danger which in wartime made us all prepared to do for our country more than we would ordinarily do. I believe enough in human nature to feel that if the people could be made to realize the urgency of the situation, much could be done in that way. But as we listened last evening to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), interesting as he was; as we have listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent); as we have listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott)—and of course we shall hear more from him tonight on this subject—one gets the impression of people who are onlookers. One almost gets the impression that the government has become so complacent and so pleased with itself that it really feels that nothing very much can be wrong as long as it is in power. That is a very pleasant belief, but it does not just cover everything. I would say also that these signs of complacency have existed even since last September, even since the time when I think it became perfectly clear that we were in an emergency and should have acted accordingly.

I think we saw that attitude exhibited in this house the other evening when this debate was suggested. When the figures for February were quoted the Minister of Trade and Commerce said after all they were five weeks old, and for that reason there was no urgency about debating them. I could not understand what the minister meant, unless he felt that people had been so numbed by those figures for February that they really had no power of feeling left. Then we heard from the genial Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) who told us there was no use having a debate because nobody would pay any attention to what we said. Those were not his exact words—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would not interrupt when the hon. member was speaking.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would not for the world say anything unfair about the minister, but I think I can get fairly close to his words. He said, "What is the use of talking about this, because you will not have any influence on the government."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): At that time.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me finish and later you may correct me; that it would not have any influence on the government, or at any rate not in time. I had a feeling the minister was doing a good deal, perhaps unintentionally—though he is a good fellow, so it may have been intentionally—to underline what we have said here time and again, that the government does not consider parliament as seriously as we would like it to. As a matter of fact the minister's words created a very curious effect in one quarter. His rather contemptuous reference to the power of debate—though I did not take it in any personal way, and I do not think he meant us in the opposition to take it in that way, since I understood he was just speaking in general—prompted somebody to say, "What does the Minister of Public Works want the opposition to do; put on a floor show?"

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That would be a change.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will not give the Minister of Trade and Commerce a chance to say that is what we are doing. Then of course we had the Minister of Finance, who did not want this debate to take place either. I can sympathize with him, too, because in a way we are muddying the water for him tonight. This is like a kind of trial trip for his speech this evening. He has already given us a little preview of what may come by using that interesting phrase "world-wide phenomenon of inflation". I take it we can infer from those words that the minister's line this evening is going to be: yes, there is a little inflation, but it is all over the world. It is a phenomenon; that is, it is a kind of act of God, and no man has anything to do with it. Then no doubt he will go on and tell us how bad things are in the United Kingdom; and they are having troubles there. He will tell us how bad they are in France. Then he will go to the United States, and when he is through we will have the good old ending that really things in Canada are so good we ought to be thankful to this all-wise government for protecting us from all the evils from which the rest of the world is suffering.

Mr. Knowles: The government treats all problems as either provincial or international.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think we should admit at once that foreign events do have some influence, but I want to stress the fact that we have far more power over ourselves than foreign events have over us. I would remind the members of the government who are here how often in past years we have been told of the wonderful lead we have given other countries, how the United States had to come and sit at the feet of this government to learn how to do this, that and the other. But now the talk seems to be all in the other direction. I propose to show as clearly as I can what I regard as the most damaging, devastating negligence on the part of the government, particularly the finance department, in respect of financial controls especially since last September. But I must give them credit for one thing. The propaganda machine is already at work. I read this statement, which I assume to be inspired. It was not marked "paid advertisement". There was nothing to indicate that it was, but I inferred it was inspired. It reads:

> Canada is now leading the world in a unique program aimed at getting to the roots of the age-old problem of inflationary cycles.

Upon reading this article further, you find that somewhat grandiloquent expression really means that after months and months of delay the finance department and the Bank of Canada pulled themselves together, and they have suggested to the banks—"suggest" is not a strong enough word, but that is used because they do not like to use the word "power", and they have plenty of power—that there should be a curb put on lending. I believe it is desirable that there should be a curb put on lending.

Cost of Living

Lest I forget later, I should like to point out that some of this lending to which I am going to refer assisted a good deal in that very process which the minister described some weeks ago when he was telling us how difficult it was to do anything in the matter of controls, because really the horse had got out and it was too late. I refer again to the people who are "governing themselves accordingly", and one of the things that helped them to buy was the fact that loans were being rapidly increased by the banks. Many times in this house we have talked about the effect of the supply of money on prices. I am not going to weary the house with long lists of figures. The figure which has often been used is that in the last twelve years the amount of money has gone up roughly four times, and the amount of goods has gone up roughly twice. I am not suggesting that means that you do a little sum in arithmetic, and say therefore prices have doubled. It is not as simple as that. On the other hand no one who has seriously thought about this matter doubts that the quantity of money which is in existence has a great effect on prices.

I wish in some way I had the capacity to make the ordinary taxpayer feel that this interests him; that this is not just a matter of millions and tens of millions of dollars, which are figures put in bank books and discussed by ministers of finance. I wish I could convince him that what happens when newly-created money comes into existence is that that money competes—I am almost quoting now from the budget speech of 1939 made in this house—with the existing money. I shall give the figures in a moment as to what happened last autumn. I do want to get this across, that when hundreds of millions of dollars of new money come into existence they compete with the old money. New dollars, however, look just like the old dollars. In the old days when they debased the currency they did it rather more honestly by clipping bits off the coins. You could see what was happening. The coins did not look right. Today we make new dollars that look like the old dollars. While we are diluting and debasing the currency, it is difficult for an ordinary person to observe it.

I want to say something else about this huge increase in money which happened last autumn. I want to make it clear that any banker who is in business must make loans to credit-worthy borrowers. It is not for him to say that, as a matter of general policy, there has to be credit restriction; that is a matter for the government. I believe that was the prime reason, or one of the prime reasons, for the creation of the Bank of Canada.

I should like to go back for a moment to last September; because last September we in the opposition did our best—the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) says we do not have much effect—to create a sense of urgency. Indeed, we liked to think we did have some effect, because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) used words which sounded all right. We had no reason to think he was not going to do anything about it. He said that what we require is a "prompt and effective anti-inflationary program." Now, that sounds all right. I could not improve upon those words, and I doubt if anyone could. They express exactly what should have been done. What did he do? I would say that, as near as makes no difference, he did nothing until February.

Mr. Graydon: He unhitched the horse and let it run away.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I shall accept what the hon. member for Peel said. Let us look at what began to happen last September. Let us take bank loans. Members will be familiar with the fact that current loans in banks can be made and new money is created; that is quite proper provided that the banks ratio of cash is maintained. What did we do in September? Bank loans were $2,294 million then, and by the end of the year they were $2,651 million, a rise of $350 million. Then they went up roughly another $50 million by the end of January. You had, therefore, something in the nature of 400 million new dollars coming into operation and competing with the old dollars. During that time, let me remind you, we had a rise in the cost of living; while that $400 million of new money was coming into circulation, the cost of living went up. First of all it went from 170 to 172, then in January from 172 to 175. As I have already pointed out, that is not the whole story, because that new money facilitated the process which the minister described as governing themselves accordingly.

I must say, though the Minister of Trade and Commerce will know how much I dislike criticizing him, that the words he used when he explained that people had been governing themselves accordingly, disclosed the facts. As was said yesterday, I think that was almost an invitation to inflation. At any rate, I cannot see how else it could have operated except to make people say: We better keep on just the way we have been operating; the minister says we are governing ourselves accordingly and he seems to think that what we are doing is the natural reaction to the circumstances, so perhaps we had better continue.

This monetary policy of the government did not begin last September. Oh, no; it began long before that. I shall say just a word about it. I have said it before, so I shall make it very brief. During the war, of course, there had to be inflation. I have never hesitated to say that I think the finance department did many good things during the war. But when we came to the peace in 1945, they produced a memorandum which was to take care of the depression, which I must admit most people feared at that time. I think that memorandum in 1945 was a proper memorandum and a useful memorandum. The only complaint I have is that they used that technique, which is designed for a depression, year after year for what in any man's language was a boom. The Winnipeg Free Press, which is often quite favourable to the government, referred to it as a big blunder. What they meant by the word "blunder" was the fact that the tool which was designed for one purpose was used for exactly the opposite purpose.

As I say, that was continued year after year. We tried, in our simple way, to bring attention to that, and suggested it was not sound. We suggested it was creating an artificial stimulus and was driving prices up, even at a time when we were not in fear of war although perhaps we should have been.

Even if last September, when the pressure was on, the government had acted, we would have been inclined to forgive them. But it seems as if they were steeped in what I can only call this expansion mentality, this control mentality, in the belief that somehow or other we had plunged into a new world where the finance department were going to control us in any way they liked. Nothing was done. I quote from the Free Press of September 9, which says:

> The weakest aspect of the budget is undoubtedly the measures proposed to counteract inflation.

Instead of having used the phrase I quoted a little while ago, the minister took it rather lightly. He insisted on calling the inflation incipient, although the cost of living then had quite recently risen—within recent months—about eight points.

I think in retrospect I can see exactly what happened. When we were here in September we were anxious about the fighting in Korea; but hon. members will recall that immediately after that the military situation greatly improved and indeed the fighting lulled and almost died away. I am just as sure as I am of the fact that I stand here that what happened is that the government, which had been extremely doubtful as to whether there was a real emergency in September, had decided by October that there was not any emergency, that they were off the hook and that they did not really need to take any great action.

The best proof of that is that things jogged along and on February 8, just about two months ago, I asked the Minister of Finance about what was happening with regard to credit controls, whether anything was being done to curb credit. The minister then treated me rather jocularly. I say "jocularly", because I am quite sure the minister was aware of his powers; but the language he used was strange. He asked me if what I was proposing was that the Bank of Canada should scrutinize the loans of individual banks. I said no, that I was not referring to that. Later on, in a speech which the minister made, he referred to this matter again jocularly, as something which was really an absurd suggestion. I was then able to read to him from the evidence of the governor of the Bank of Canada given before the prices committee in 1948, indicating that in 1948 the bank, as the government instrument—very tentatively, I must admit, and very temporarily, I must admit—had done this very thing. In other words, it suggested to the chartered banks that loans should be to some extent discontinued. Oh, yes, they had to be discontinued for capital purposes at that time, or at any rate there was to be retrenchment.

Then again, some days later, I pointed out to the minister that there had been a report that the governor of the bank had called together the general managers of the chartered banks for this purpose. Again the minister treated the matter in what I thought was a rather curious way. He really brushed it off by saying yes, it was true that the governor of the bank had had a routine meeting with some of the general managers of the chartered banks; but as a matter of fact, when he referred to the meeting as routine, he was not quite doing it justice because actually what they discussed at that time, as reported by the governor of the bank itself, was this. They concluded that "what was now required was a definitely restrictive approach to the whole question of credit expansion." It will be seen that in effect, perhaps under our urging—at any rate, after we had raised the question—this point was taken up and dealt with in a practical manner. But all those months were lost. Incidentally, when the minister talks this evening, I hope he will not suggest that these are matters which are international or world-wide phenomena. I hope he will not try to suggest that a great error and a deplorable piece of neglect was not practised at that time.

There is another matter which is another of the chickens that are coming home to roost; because, Mr. Speaker, the results of this policy have been long averted, long delayed, but they were always inevitable and they have come at last. Let us look for a moment at the question of bond prices. Tens of thousands of people—yes, I suppose hundreds of thousands—in this country are now greatly outraged because they find that the bonds which they bought probably at 102 or 103 are now selling perhaps at 97 or 98. They are inclined to blame the government, and in one way I think they are quite entitled to do so; because when these low rates—which were then not so familiar and not so acceptable—were offered, as a kind of sweetener—the inducement—it is hard now to find out exactly who said it—was undoubtedly held out: "Yes, the rate is low, but at any rate you will always be able to get par for your bonds." Of course those abnormally low rates penalized thrift. They made it extremely hard for people who were trying to provide their own security, the very people who ought to be encouraged.

But at any rate, I come back now to the question of this assurance or alleged assurance which got around. The extent of this belief was incredible. I remember that in January, 1948, when there was a temporary flurry in the price of these bonds, I ran into a rather senior and well-informed investment dealer—I should say that he had been in Ottawa for a time during the war and perhaps had absorbed a little of the control mind. I said to him, "I see some sign of the bond market finding its own level." He said, "Well, of course it can never go below par." I said, "Why not?" "Well," he said, "the reason it could not go below par is that the Minister of Finance said so." He meant Mr. Ilsley. I do not believe that Mr. Ilsley ever did say such a thing; but I believe that that assurance was in the air; that it was allowed to become widespread, indeed universal; and that nothing was ever done to disabuse people's minds of it. Indeed I go further and say that I am much afraid that in those days there was a feeling that somehow or other interest rates could be controlled in such a way that bonds at any rate would not go below par.

One other form of credit control I want to mention is control of instalment buying. We passed a measure with regard to that matter last autumn; but anything that was done at that time was a mere gesture, a mere token. I have not been able to find anyone who thought it has been the least bit effective; and the best proof that it was not effective is that within recent weeks we have had new buying controls, with much more effective teeth put in them.

There is another control which might have been effective, and that is the government's own control of its expenditures. Again, so that there is no danger of my being unfair, I will read what the Free Press says about this aspect. The Free Press of March 16 said:

> The federal government's estimate of expenditure in the next fiscal year shows clearly that economy as a weapon against inflation has failed. The government has sharply reduced its expenditures in various departments, but these savings are almost entirely counterbalanced by increases elsewhere. Thus, apart from defence, the government's total expenditure in the next year will show a reduction of only $35 million . . . Rising demand for goods and services will soon exercise a new and powerful inflationary influence.

I now come to the question of commodity control. I have already made reference to what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said about it last autumn. My feeling is that he too, like the Minister of Finance, suffered from the Korean malady, that he thought they were off the hook, and that he did precious little about it. He gave us last night some instances of things they had done; but they did very little indeed to alter the situation.

I suggest that it would ameliorate the situation if the government were prepared to confess their mistakes and to promise to do better, in order to give people more hope. But I have great doubt whether any such practice will be followed by the Minister of Finance this evening. Indeed, I have already indicated that I have no doubt we shall have the full explanation that everything possible has been done by the government.

I now want to say just a word or two in closing, Mr. Speaker, to review the remedies which I have already mentioned, and I want to say this. In what I have said and what I shall say I do not feel that I have changed my principles in any way. I have just as strong a feeling that free enterprise should be allowed to govern, but I think that in a world where governments have stepped in, as they have stepped in, to suggest that we can carry on as if none of these things have happened is to suggest something doctrinaire.

I have already instanced the case of government stockpiling. I have mentioned the example of tin, but there are many others. I refer again to what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said on September 8 last, namely, that in the case of commodities which were being bought in large supply by the government for defence purposes he would control both price and allocation.

I refer again to the measures which should be used, namely, higher taxes, economy on expenditure by government, credit restraint and control over scarce materials. On this last I want to say a further word. I want to quote from two quite different authorities who mentioned this as one of the measures which could be used. My leader has said, and I wish to reiterate, that we are not suggesting any rigid return to methods of the past. Indeed we believe that government should have learned something in those last years. What we want is something flexible and sensible. Those two authorities follow in a way the general lines indicated by the minister himself last September. The first person I wish to quote from is Mr. Rhys M. Sale, president of the Ford Motor Company of Canada, who is now, I believe, assisting the government on some committee. He said this:

> As was apparent in the second world war and has already been indicated in the United States in this crisis, the easiest way to ensure adequate supplies of a critical material for military purposes is to deny its use for civilian consumption. By far the better way is to apply every means to create more of the critical material so there will be enough for both military and essential civilian use.

My next authority is an American by the name of Slichter who has a practical and sensible article on the subject of inflation in the April issue of the Atlantic Monthly. He makes a remark pretty well along the same lines. He said:

> An effective way of discouraging the demand for consumer goods and thereby limiting inflation is to prevent industry from making the kind and quality of goods that consumers desire to buy. Price ceilings as I have pointed out do this to a certain extent, though that is not their purpose. A more effective restraint on consumer demands, however, comes from restrictions on the use of scarce materials.

I have just one further point I want to make—in this I find myself agreeing with the minister—and that is that we should not leave everything to the government. I agree with him that consumers, labour unions, farm organizations, businessmen, everybody should be prepared to carry some responsibility. But they have got to have a lead, and up to the present there has been no lead at all. I would say absolutely none but a few amiable admonitions in the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) last autumn and an occasional amiable admonition from this or that minister as he goes about the country. That is no good. The government has done nothing to convince the people that they are serious about all this. They will have to convince themselves that they are very serious before they can carry the conviction to the ordinary citizen. They ought to be able to convince them. Surely, it is not for want of propaganda machines that they cannot do it. If all the propaganda machinery which spends its time lauding the government were turned in on an intelligent plan to try to organize the citizens up and down the country, to make clear to them how they can co-operate, to make clear, perhaps to the housewives, better methods of buying when this or that commodity is scarce, all these things would help, and none of these things has been done.

How much better it would be if the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), instead of sending out circulars telling us what we should take with us on picnics, were to put out his circulars advising people how to conduct themselves in this world situation—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I have fifteen seconds?

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Go ahead.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I just want to ask this question. Is it an accident that apparently we are the only civilized country which is not trying to take steps in these circumstances? I cannot believe it is. And although my expectations for what is to be said tonight by the Minister of Finance were a good deal chilled by what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said last night, nevertheless I am going to allow myself to hope until eight o'clock that we may have some indication that after all the hesitation, that after all the delays which have cost us so much, finally the government will act.

Mr. W. J. Major (Glengarry): Mr. Speaker, may I offer a few figures on prices as I find them on my records and which are actual? Knowing that the farmers are struggling hard to keep up production, I want to offer a few facts at this time. I could use any of the branches of mixed farming to illustrate my point, but as I had the opportunity of taking figures from my records during the week end I will deal with a commodity upon which I have the most data at this time.

To show my point, I have prepared tables covering from 1942 to 1951 showing the relation between prices received during that period as well as some of the costs.

First let me give the price per dozen of grade A large eggs received by the producer at the farm, and I will quote the highest and lowest price received during the year, striking the average which relates very closely to the actual average, depending on quantities:

	High	Low	Average
1942	·49	·31	·40
1943	·50	·35	·42
1944	·46	·33	·39
1945	·48	·31	·39
1946	·45	·31	·38
1947	·48	·34	·41
1948	·62	·41	·51
1949	·48	·37	·42
1950	·62	·21	·41
1951 January	·41	·35	·38
February	·57	·41	·49
March	·52	·48	·50

The average for the first three months of 1951 was 46 cents. You will note, Mr. Speaker, that the average price paid the producer in January, February and March of 1951 is really 10 per cent lower than the 1948 average. You will also note the disproportionately low price to which eggs declined in 1950, namely, a low of 21 cents a dozen.

I remember that about that time I was coming home from Toronto and I had a meal on the train consisting of an omelette and other things. When I reached home I found that I had paid out the equivalent of nine dozen eggs for that meal.

Let us make a comparison of some of the costs as related to the figures quoted in order to find the basic feed cost to the producer in the same period. I should like to indicate the cost of feed wheat per hundred pounds to the producer from 1942 to 1951. The figures which follow indicate the high, the low and the average and they are:

	High	Low	Average
1942	$1.95	$1.65	$1.80
1943	1.90	1.75	1.82
1944	1.80	1.75	1.77
1945	1.90	1.80	1.85
1946	1.90	1.80	1.85
1947	2.95	1.90	2.42
1948	3.80	3.00	3.40
1949	3.75	3.35	3.05
1950	3.60	3.20	3.40
1951 (first three months)	3.65	3.35	3.50

In 1942 laying mash to the producer was $2.40 per hundred pounds, whereas in 1951, it is $5.25 and over. It will be noted that during the period 1943 to 1951 the price received for grade A large eggs by the producer increased only by 9·5 per cent, while the cost of feed wheat increased 92 per cent and the cost of laying mash by over 100 per cent. There is another fixed cost which is overlooked. I refer to the electricity supplied by the hydro at cost. The hydro commission have had to increase their rates. I have a class F contract under which I was supplied power in 1944 at the graded monthly rate of 80 kilowatt hours at 4 cents, 240 kilowatt hours at 1·6 cents and the balance at ¾ of a cent. In 1947 the graded rate was changed to 260 kilowatt hours at 3·5 cents, 780 kilowatt hours at 1·6 cents and the balance at ¾ cent. In 1950 there was a further change to 260 kilowatt hours at 4·4 cents, 780 kilowatt hours at 2·1 cents and the balance at 1·1 cent.

For the purpose of calculation let us use the same figure, and for easy computation let us put it at 2,000 kilowatt hours per month. Under the 1944 rate the cost would be $19.64; under the 1947 rate it would be $28.78, and under the 1950 rate it would be $38.38. Thus it can be seen that the cost was increased by 46 per cent in 1947, and by a further increase of 33 per cent in 1950 over 1947, or a total increase of 95 per cent in 1950 as compared with 1944.

After reading the table dealing with egg prices from 1942 to 1951 it will be noted that the producer is not receiving as much of the price paid by the consumer as one might be led to think by reports released on the cost of living index. To the price received by the producer for his eggs must be added some 15 to 18 cents per dozen to cover the cost of and profit to the grading station, the wholesale dealer and the grocer who sells them over the counter.

Before a decision is reached to establish price controls of necessity the prices of farm produce would have to be stabilized and all other prices and wages controlled accordingly if you did not want a further reduction in farm food production. If most farm products are in low supply it is because prices are not sufficient to warrant the employment of extra labour at prevailing wages. Farm wages and other costs have increased disproportionately to the selling price of farm products in the last few years with the result that the farmer cannot produce the extra quantity required to overcome the shortage.

If the prices of farm products were to be controlled at the present level, instead of benefiting the consumer I am afraid you would create a much worse condition through a further aggravation and decrease in the already low production. In the past the farmer's wife, and his sons and daughters, have been giving long hours of free labour which contributed to food being placed on the market at a cheap price. As the farmer cannot compensate his family for their free labour, his sons and daughters are leaving for the city where they can enjoy the pleasure of a 40 hour week with a 48 hour take-home pay.

Did it ever occur to hon. members that this 40 hour week with a 48 hour take-home pay would result in the consumer finding that her dozen consisted of only ten units and her pound of only 13 ounces should the producer make the necessary reduction in order to offset increased costs caused by the 40-48 build-up?

If prices to the consumer are really too high I suggest that restrictions be placed on credit for the purchase of non-essentials, and possibly a direct subsidy given to the consumer, to be applied toward his essentials if need be. I feel that the real remedy at this time is not price control, with all its coupons and regulations, but rather the necessity of a keen sense on the part of everyone of giving back to the dollar what they draw from it. If we insist on giving a lesser service for the service we expect in return I am afraid that all the controls imaginable will be of no avail, will be useless and inapplicable.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take only five minutes in this debate to make one particular point. We have listened for the past several days to a rather contentious discussion of the cost of living. The position of the party to which I belong is well known, and I am not going to labour it at this time. For many years I have listened to the government tell the country that the cost of living index is affected by certain external factors. Last night I heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) state that fact. In this instance I am inclined to agree with the government and therefore I propose to discuss briefly this afternoon a specific external factor which I shall contend has a definite relationship to the Canadian cost of living. I refer to the words and actions of the United Nations commander in Korea, General Douglas MacArthur.

Every time this general, who commands Canadian troops, makes one of his inflammatory speeches or political pronouncements he stirs up war fears which cannot help but affect the cost of living in Canada and elsewhere. The Korean war started the rampage of rising prices. I do not think any hon. member would deny that. Therefore I suggest that what the commander in that theatre says affects Canadian prices. There are few members in the house who would deny that General MacArthur has many good qualities. There are few members who would deny that the free world owes a debt to this American. Nevertheless I am sure that most hon. members, regardless of their party, are alarmed and concerned at the general's repeated and stubborn insistence upon intervening dangerously in political matters and international policies beyond his responsibility.

Most Canadians have an inherent distrust of the general in a political way. They simply cannot understand why the United States government permits his continued meddling in political matters. Since his appointment as the United Nations commander, the general has consistently refused to leave political matters to the leaders of the various nations engaged in Korea. He refuses to stick to purely military matters. Time and again he has recklessly intervened in matters outside his authority, and by so doing he has created much ill will and confusion among the allies.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On a point of order, is the hon. member in order in discussing the situation in Korea?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe he is out of order.

Mr. Thatcher: Speaking to the point of order, I would suggest that the very rapid increase in the cost of living was caused by the Korean war. I also suggest that some of the pronouncements that the general is making are having a considerable effect upon our cost of living index. I am sure that the hon. member who has objected would not suggest that external factors as well as internal have not something to do with the situation, and I propose to proceed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would suggest that the hon. member relate his remarks strictly to the amendment.

Mr. Thatcher: That is what I am talking about, price control, the high cost of living. General MacArthur, supposedly working under instructions of the United Nations—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Thatcher: —theoretically has only limited powers, and yet our own government—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Thatcher: This is quite in order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), on the point of order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I raised a point of order a few moments ago. Your Honour ruled that he was out of order, and he is still going on.

Mr. Thatcher: He did not.

An hon. Member: Oh, yes, he did.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Speaker, the point I am trying to make is that our nation has troops in Korea, and surely parliament should have some say as to how, where, and in what method these troops are going to be used.

An hon. Member: Not on this question.

Mr. Thatcher: I ask my good friends to the south of us in the United States whether they want the Korean campaign to be a one-man show, or do they want—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Thatcher: —it to be a team affair. If they want it to be a team effort, then they should have General MacArthur resign.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When the hon. member speaks of General MacArthur he is out of order. I would ask him to confine his remarks to the cost of living.

Mr. Thatcher: Thank you. I shall proceed. With few exceptions, as I said a moment ago, Canadians are convinced of the justice of our cause in Korea. We are well aware of the great sacrifices that are being made, particularly by the Americans, in Korea. Nevertheless we cling to the fervent hope that this limited war may by statesmanship be prevented from spreading to a general war. Many of us are very much afraid that General MacArthur, with some of his ill-advised pronouncements, may embroil us in a third world war, which I do not think anyone in Canada wants. On December 5 most of us felt reassured that the general's sabre-rattling speeches were going to end, because on that date the United States government ordered the general—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is ignoring your ruling. I must ask that your ruling be enforced.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the cost of living.

Mr. Thatcher: That is what I am doing.

Mr. Fraser: The cost of living in Korea, not here.

Mr. Thatcher: I am talking about the Korean affair and how the supreme commander there is affecting our cost of living.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Thatcher: General MacArthur fell in line with the pronouncement of his government for a while. However, in tonight's Ottawa Journal there is an article with the subheading "Stands Pat in Two-Hour Conference". In part the article reads:

> General MacArthur made it plain to his superiors today that he intends to keep right on fighting for a freer hand in the Korean war.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If the hon. member is allowed to discuss that subject, I think other hon. members should be allowed to discuss it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am very sorry, but I must rule the hon. member out of order in discussing General MacArthur's conduct in the Korean campaign.

Mr. Thatcher: If Your Honour makes that ruling, I will have to bow to it.

An hon. Member: He has made it three times.

Mr. Thatcher: But I hope that in the very near future, in order to lower our cost of living, the Canadian government will demand the resignation of this man before the United Nations.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fraser: No, no.

Mr. Thatcher: I think that if our government does not demand his resignation—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Thatcher: —we are going to have much higher prices, and the cost of living is going up even more. Therefore I say that this trigger-happy prima donna, as I am going to call him, should be recalled at once.

Mr. Fraser: Order. That is uncalled for.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take part in this debate for a few moments. I assure you I would not do so if it were not for the fact that I believe this is the most important question facing the people of Canada today. I know that I am in agreement with perhaps all hon. members of the house in making that statement. The question of inflation or rising prices is not a new one. It is one that has plagued us in Canada since controls were removed following the end of world war II. I have a vivid recollection that at about this time in the session of 1948 we were debating the setting up of a parliamentary committee to examine into the reasons for rising prices. The average cost of living index for the year 1948, according to the figure I have before me, was 155, and at that time we thought that looked pretty bad.

Today we find that the cost of living index is about 180, that is, 25 points higher than it was in 1948. What makes this situation really desperate is that there are large numbers of people who have not increased their incomes at all since 1948, and because they have not done so they have taken a very drastic drop in their standard of living.

Speaking in the debate last evening the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had this to say, at page 1758 of Hansard:

> The government is just as concerned about rising prices and inflation as are the members of the opposition who have spoken.

He then referred to the situation in almost the same words as I did when I rose to speak:

> There is perhaps no problem before the democratic countries today more important than inflation, for inflation can undermine the very foundation of society.

He then went on to say the government is taking positive measures to control inflation. I would like to know what those positive measures are. Not only that; I would like to know what effect they are having in reducing prices, because being positive measures they should be effective. Are they helping bring down the cost of living? The minister drew attention to the fact that between August, 1949, and January, 1950, the cost of living index dropped from 162·8 to 161. That was a drop of 1·8 in five months, and I assume that drop took place before the government undertook their fiscal and monetary policies to stem inflation. But since January, 1950, the cost of living has risen from 161 to 179·7 as at February 28, 1951. I want to tell the members of this house that inflation never cured itself. It has brought ruin to every country in which the government did not have the backbone to take action to curb it, and the same thing will happen in this country.

I am rather amazed at some of the reasons put forward by speakers, especially on the government side, for the high cost of living. Last evening the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) said we could not have price control unless we also had wage control. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) speaking a little later blamed the trade unions for high prices. As usual, because it is not safe to be too hard on large numbers of people who have votes, he laid particular blame on the leaders of the trade union movement as those responsible for the high cost of living. Just a moment ago the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Major) spoke of the difficulties of the farmers under the present system, with industrial prices rising faster than farm prices.

What amuses me, or would amuse me if it were not so tragic, is that all of these hon. members believe in the free enterprise system. What is that system? Fundamentally the free enterprise system is based on the principle that everyone is entitled to take for himself everything he can get. If he can get a great deal so as to enrich himself beyond his fellows, then he is looked up to by the whole community. I am afraid these hon. members do not understand that free enterprise does not apply any more. There is scarcely any industry outside of farming where free enterprise operates unhampered or where today the law of supply and demand is working. I could draw attention to cases now before our courts of alleged monopolies to control prices, so that every time you light a match you are adding to the wealth of a small group of people. Every time you buy a loaf of bread you are adding to the wealth of another small group of people who not only set their prices but police those prices. I could enlarge on that and discuss the investigation into dental supplies, where one might say they make you pay through the nose for your false teeth.

All these things indicate that free enterprise no longer operates; and because it does not operate, those who control the economy are in a position to hold up the community to ransom, and do so. Until we are prepared to tackle that question realistically we are not going to deal very effectively with the question of the cost of living. I might read a small item that was clipped from the Manitoba Co-operator of March 9, 1950. It is the report of a speech by Mr. James H. Gray, editor of the Farm and Ranch Review, at the Marlborough Hotel in Winnipeg to students of field crops who were taking a short course. He traced the history of the law of supply and demand as propounded by Adam Smith, and the report has this to say:

> At this point Mr. Gray emphasized there has never been a time in world history when the greatest food surplus in existence was anything but a minute marginal surplus compared to the amount that was consumed. But because agriculture was the only important industry in which the law of supply and demand was permitted to operate, these fractional surpluses were ruinous to the producers.

Then he said, and this is in quotation marks:

> They will continue to be ruinous as long as we allow ourselves to be mesmerized by a so-called principle that has no existence in the real world.

That is the principle of free enterprise, the principle of the operation of the law of supply and demand; a principle, let me tell you, that no longer applies. And we are fooling ourselves if we go on the assumption that it does.

Let me reply to the hon. member for Cochrane and the hon. member for Springfield as to the position of the trade unions. At no time has the trade union movement said that it will not accept wage controls. As I have pointed out in this house on numerous occasions, wages are controlled now. No trade union, no matter how powerful it is, can boost its own wages without going through the legal procedure that is laid down by the laws of this parliament or by the laws of the legislatures of the various provinces. When it does get an increase, it gets an increase that has been adjudged proper in the circumstances by a board that has heard the evidence as to the cost of living and that sort of thing which enters into wages. Not only that, but trade unions today are not only allowing or adopting the control of wages, but they are also to a certain extent accepting the freezing of wages. I refer to the escalator clauses that are now in agreements by means of which wages are tied to the cost of living index. When the cost of living index goes up several points, then, in accordance with the formula contained in the agreement, wages will go up a certain number of cents. If the cost of living falls a number of points, then wages will go down a number of cents. Surely nothing could be more reasonable than that.

There is another question which I am going to ask my friends who would control wages and who would insist that wages be controlled in the same way as any commodity. My question to them is this. Do you take the position that labour is a commodity? If you take the position that labour is a commodity, labour has just as much right to form a monopoly to sell its commodity as any other industry or group of industries. Ordinarily, people do not like to hear labour referred to as a commodity, and really it is not. What a worker sells is not his labour but his labour power, which is something different. When we take the position that we are going to put the energy of human beings, men and women, into the same category as cabbages, hides, steers, plows and harrows and all that sort of thing, then I believe we had better adjust our thinking. That type of thinking is going to get us into trouble.

I was interested in reading in today's Gazette a report of a speech by Dr. W. H. Garrett, O.B.E., of the Monsanto Chemical Limited of Great Britain. He was speaking to an audience at the Windsor hotel in Montreal. I want those who would blame the trade unions to note this, because the speaker is an employer of labour. He said:

> The day when labour could be considered as a commodity or raw material for industry has gone, and some new concept of the role played by labour in industry must take its place.

If we do not arrive at that concept, the trade union movement will arrive at that concept because they are not going to put themselves in the position of being bartered as a commodity or a raw material that is bought and sold for the benefit of industry. They are human beings. While those who may own industry put their money in it, those men and women put their lives in industry. They are surely entitled to something more than the mere cost of food, clothes and shelter to enable them to produce from day to day and leave their kind after them to continue the process. That day is gone. I would suggest to those hon. members of the house who think that they can put the blame for rising prices on the trade union movement that they ought to think again.

I noticed that neither the hon. member for Springfield nor the hon. member for Cochrane referred to the profits that were being made by industry during the past few years; those profits have something to do with rising prices. But no, they were not concerned with profits but with wages, and the way the trade union movement was exploiting the people of Canada.

When speaking yesterday afternoon, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), as reported at 1761 of Hansard, said this:

> Every country about which I know has had to accept some increase in the cost of living in recent months. In the United Kingdom, where controls have been more extensive than in perhaps any other country, the cost of living has been rising faster than in Canada. The United Kingdom government found that it could not go on paying higher and higher subsidies indefinitely. I believe that, whereas the cost of all retail prices in Canada rose by fifteen per cent in the year 1950, the increase in the cost of all retail prices in England was twenty-three per cent, and I believe in Australia it was still higher.

I have the Labour Gazette for March, 1951, in my hand. At page 434, there is a table giving the index numbers for the cost of living in Canada and other countries. I find that for Canada the cost of living index in January, 1950, stood at 161·5 and in December 171·1. The increase for the year was 9·6 points. I do not know what that would really work out to in percentage, but it would be between 6 and 7 per cent. Looking at the index for the United Kingdom, I find that in January, 1950, the index stood at 113; it was 116 in December, 1950, or an increase of 3 points. I believe that would be a little over 2 per cent. I am taking the figures as the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave them in the house, and I am giving the figures as they are produced in the Labour Gazette for March of this year.

Mr. Dickey: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacInnis: Yes.

Mr. Dickey: Was not that statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), that all retail prices in the two countries had risen by different percentages, and not the cost of living index?

Mr. MacInnis: That is quite possible. My hon. friend will note that when I was reading the minister's statement I emphasized the word "all".

Mr. Dickey: That is right.

Mr. MacInnis: But in the table the column for Canada is headed: "Cost of Living—Dominion Bureau of Statistics." For the United Kingdom, it is headed: "Interim Index of Retail Prices, Ministry of Labour." I do not know whether it would make any difference if all retail prices were taken or whether the cost of living index were taken, which in a general way pretty well includes all prices, because what is not included in the special items is included in the miscellaneous item. I have been careful to point that out, and I am sorry that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had occasion to leave the chamber after I began speaking.

Another point made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as reported at page 1759 of Hansard is as follows:

> Perhaps I might conclude this brief analysis of some of the main causes of the recent increase in the cost of living index by examining the 4·5 point increase that took place in February and that precipitated this debate and forms the basis for the opposition amendment. Of that increase, 66 per cent was accounted for by food, 10 per cent by clothing, 5 per cent by rents and 19 per cent by other items.

I do not know whether or not the Minister of Trade and Commerce was putting these figures forward as a sort of mitigation of the amount of the increase. But if so, from my point of view they only make the increase all the more disturbing, because the lower the income of the individual or the family, the larger the share of it that is spent on food and the other essentials of life. With that increase, nearly all of it in food, clothing and shelter, those people now find, as they must, that the burden of living has been increased for them considerably.

Let me draw attention to another factor, namely that the consumption of essential foods in this country is decreasing despite the fact that the population is increasing. The day before I left my home town to come here after the Easter recess, I saw in the Vancouver Daily Province an article with the headline "Canadians Eat Meat Despite Climbing Prices." When one began to read the article, one would think that the people of Canada were eating more meat than ever. But before one got to the end of it, this is what one found:

> While business was at a new high, the total volume output slipped. Meat production declined to 1,444,000,000 pounds down from 1,484,000,000 in 1949.
> Broken down, this showed beef output at 617,400,000 pounds, down 10·3 per cent; veal, 90,200,000 pounds, down 3·8 per cent; mutton and lamb, 23,100,000, down 19 per cent. Pork was the only item to climb, moving up to 713,300,000 pounds, an increase of 6 per cent from 1949.

Here in this country, where we are told that we have the highest standard of living in the world, we find that the standard of living is falling because, with increased prices, the poorer people are not able to buy those foods that are essential for health. They must confine themselves to the cheaper foods. In my opinion the reason that the government has failed and is failing to do anything effective with regard to price control is that they have lost touch with the common people of this country. They meet only top civil servants and business executives, and those people do not have to curtail their expenditures on food. Towards the end of his speech, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, as reported at page 1762 of Hansard:

> The greatest contribution any Canadian can make to stop inflation is to avoid panicky buying and to produce as much as possible. All of us should be thinking in terms of working harder; of working longer hours, rather than shorter hours.
> There is too much of a tendency,—

This is a gem, Mr. Speaker. I did not notice it until just now, although I read it several times.

> —it seems to me, for people to look to government for solutions to their problems.

Imagine a government that made so many promises two short years ago—they seem long to the people who are always hungry, of course—coming to this house and saying now that people have a tendency to look to government for solutions to their problems. What did the government tell the people of Canada in 1949? They said, "Elect us and we will solve your problems. You will not have any". Unfortunately, the people took them at their word. Now the government are saying, "we will not solve your problems." That is what they are saying, because the greatest problem facing the people of Canada, on their own say-so, is the high cost of living. The government do not intend to do anything about it. Oh, they will increase the down payment on instalment buying, but that is only a curb on the person who has not the full price to pay for what he is buying. As to the person who has the price with which to pay as much as he or she cares to pay, there is no curb whatsoever on him or her. It is class legislation. The manager of a department store called me up just before I left home and drew attention to the increases in the amount of down payment on instalment purchases and the reduction in the time for the payment of the balance. He tells me that a person, if he has the requisite credit standing, can go and borrow money without any time limit whatsoever and pay cash for what he buys. There is no restriction on his purchases and there is no restriction on his financing. It seems to me that is hardly good enough.

However, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) did say:

> Governments can help and should help in dealing with inflation.

Well, now, if they can help and should help, I wish to God they would help. That is the only thing that remains to be done. The only thing that is required now is the will, because they admit that they should help and they could help. Now, will you help? The minister goes on:

> But consumers, labour unions, farm organizations, and businessmen can do much by their own efforts to reduce the pressures that lead to higher prices.

Last Sunday I listened, as I always do when I have the opportunity, to "Capital Report". The Canadian commentator had a more effective solution than the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the problem of rising prices. His solution, or the way to stop rising prices, is: If you haven't the price, don't buy. That is a wonderful motto provided that it is the question of a mink coat, a bottle of Scotch or a gold ring.

An hon. Member: Or an automobile.

Mr. MacInnis: Or, as my hon. friend says, an automobile.

Mr. Hatfield: Or champagne.

Mr. MacInnis: Or champagne, or anything of that kind. But the people with whom I am concerned are not the people who have a choice in the matter of buying or not buying. The people with whom I am concerned are the people who must buy or go hungry, or go without the things that they need. If members of the government would only go to the chain stores once in a while and mingle with the crowd, who in many instances are looking hungrily at the things they would like to have and cannot purchase, they would do something more about the cost of living than they are doing.

There is another point I wish to make before I sit down. Perhaps I might say that all this reminds me of a famous queen. Was it Marie Antoinette who said, if the people cannot eat bread why don't they eat cake? We say, if you can't buy, go without.

There is another factor in this rising cost of living. It is not only affecting the food of the people, it is also affecting the ability of the people to shelter themselves. Not only is it affecting the ability of the people to shelter themselves, but it has also pretty well put a stop to what the government was doing to build houses for people who could not build houses for themselves. I hold in my hand a copy of a letter which was addressed to the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) by Mrs. Rex Eaton, chairman of the Vancouver housing association. The letter is dated February 14. It drew to the attention of the minister the question that was raised in this house the other day by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), namely, the cessation of work on the Fraserview veterans housing project. I shall read the first paragraph of the letter to show the house the serious situation that has been brought about in my city by the rising cost of living. The paragraph reads:

> Dear Mr. Minister:
> This association is much concerned over press reports that the Fraserview veterans housing project in Vancouver may not be completed, owing to high building costs. With a population increase for the city of Vancouver alone of over 20,000 in the last two years, the housing situation remains as acute as ever, and the most urgent need is for moderate rental housing such as that provided in the Fraserview project.

But the government's solution for that sort of thing is to stop even the small amount of building they were doing. They admit today that they cannot build houses to rent at the price that they hoped to rent them at a few years ago. And because they cannot build houses that will rent at a price that the people can pay they will not build houses at all. Where are the people to get the shelter?

I see that it is getting near six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and since I do not want to keep you away from your dinner I will conclude by saying that I know that to put effective price control into operation is not an easy task; I know that many people would try to evade controls; I know also that it would be irksome to many others. But, Mr. Speaker, there is in my opinion a case for price control. That case is the deplorable economic condition of thousands in Canada who are trying to eke out a living on incomes which are wholly inadequate. What is the government, what is the country, going to do with the old age pensioner, with the person on a small disability pension, with the recipient of a war veterans allowance, with thousands on small superannuation and retiring allowances, with those on social assistance, with the unorganized workers on low incomes, with the small businessman and with the marginal farmer? The welfare of these income groups, in my opinion, is as important to us today in the world in which we are living as is the defence of this country through military effort, because if we do not make secure the lives of our people while we have the means to make them secure, we cannot defend ourselves from those evils that have overtaken all governments who refused to look after the welfare of their people.

On motion of Mr. Dickey the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

In the twelve months which have elapsed since I brought down the last annual budget disquieting changes have occurred in the state of the world, and in Canada's place in it. The prospect is still far from clear. Great issues are still in the balance.

Last June the international tension crystallized in Korea. In September, parliament wholeheartedly supported the government's policy of participation in repelling this aggression. It was our hope then that the action in Korea would soon be brought to a successful conclusion. But later events took a graver turn when the Chinese communist government supported the North Korean aggressors in force. An end to the war in Korea is not yet in sight; indeed, there are indications that the United Nations forces may shortly be facing a most severe test of strength.

The Korean situation is significant of even greater dangers. It indicates that Russia is prepared to take steps involving the risk of a general war. While the strength of the west is increasing, so also is Russian strength. In the months that lie ahead, perhaps indeed for several years, we shall face a test of nerves, of our readiness to sacrifice immediate interests for future security. This is the background against which the budget must be viewed.

Without minimizing our anxieties, we are, however, entitled to take encouragement from certain of the developments during 1950. Since I shall of necessity have to speak at greater length this evening about matters that will be less pleasant and less welcome to us as individuals, I feel I should call attention now to some elements that favour us. We have serious tasks before us, but that is all the more reason why we should clearly understand that some of the changes that have occurred are on the asset side of the balance sheet, and if we are given time and if we take full advantage of that time, they will outweigh our present dangers.

The first great asset we have acquired—and it is perhaps immeasurable—is that the free world has realized its dangers, and has shown a capacity to agree upon courses of action and to act effectively. For this great event of 1950 we owe much to the vigorous leadership of the United States and the experienced partnership of the United Kingdom. Let us never forget that upon the continued enlightened and cordial partnership of the United States and the United Kingdom the peace and prosperity of the whole world heavily depend.

Nor should we fail to appreciate the response to the crisis made by the peoples of free Europe, and especially by our associates in the North Atlantic treaty. With all these peoples we have ties of race and kinship, and now we are joined by the still stronger bond of common ideals and common purpose. The visit with which the President of France has just honoured us has strengthened the links which history and culture forged long ago between our two countries.

This unity in action on the part of the free world is the first great and incalculable change for the better during the past year. If this unity should weaken, or if it should disintegrate, the outlook would be dark indeed. That is why it must be a fundamental object of our policy to promote and strengthen this unity of purpose and policy. We do well to take pride in the imperishable record of 1940 and 1941 when the commonwealth stood alone, but we should also take care that we are not called upon a second time to face such perils alone.

Another asset we have acquired during the past year is the very considerable continued improvement and expansion in the productive capacity of the western world. During 1950 industrial production in western Europe advanced by 20 per cent and is now operating at a rate about 35 per cent above pre-war. In the United States industrial production during 1949 experienced a sharp decline. In 1950 it recovered rapidly and is now running at a rate about 115 per cent above pre-war. Canada's industrial production was almost unaffected by the 1949 decline in the United States; in 1950 it increased still further and is now about 110 per cent above pre-war.

The recovery of European capacity to export has also been most encouraging. In 1946 the volume of European exports was only one-half of the pre-war average; by 1949 it had recovered to pre-war levels, and is now running 25 per cent higher. Much of this improvement has been the result of the realignment of exchange rates to more realistic levels which took place in September, 1949. As a result of these improved conditions the dollar problem has receded into the background, at least for the time being. It still exists, however, and the rearmament program may revise it to some extent, but it no longer dominates the economic scene as it did two or three years ago.

A third great asset we should take full note of is that here in Canada, unlike so many countries, our people are not split and divided by fundamental cleavages of opinion. My task this evening is made easier because I sense that there are no great issues of principle dividing us. Individuals and parties in this house will differ on particular proposals, and in the course of debate on this motion it will be right and proper that those who differ should criticize. There may be differences of view with respect to degree and timing, but I am confident that on the major questions of policy underlying my proposals we are all fundamentally agreed.

The tasks before us will not be easy. We shall have to forgo some of the prospects of individual economic improvement that seemed to be our right. We shall have to yield for the time being a part of our economic gains of the recent past. But we must address ourselves to these tasks, and pay whatever price may be necessary to preserve peace and assure freedom.

CANADIAN ECONOMIC TRENDS

I turn now to a review of Canadian economic developments during the past year and to a projection of these trends into the year that lies ahead. As usual I am tabling a white paper which presents the more important economic and financial statistics in a convenient form, together with some brief explanatory notes and comments. The white paper also includes the usual preliminary details of our public accounts for the year ended March 31, 1951. I commend these budget papers to the careful study of all hon. members, and with the consent of the house I ask that they be printed as an appendix to today's debates.

NATIONAL PRODUCTION AND NATIONAL INCOME

Almost every significant economic indicator in Canada established new records in 1950. Gross national production in 1950 was close to $18 billion, net national income was about $14 billion, and personal expenditures on consumer goods and services were not far short of $12 billion. Gross capital investment was about $4 billion, and wages and other labour income nearly $8½ billion. Most of these figures are seven or eight per cent above 1949. A little less than half these increases represents increase in physical terms, and the rest is a reflection of higher prices.

The statistics of net farm cash income indicate an apparent decline of $90 million, but this is due to lower initial and participating payments on western grains during the past calendar year. In 1949 western farmers received payments from the wheat board amounting to $100 million more than the value of the grain delivered, and in 1950, $60 million less than the value of their deliveries. Agricultural production in Canada in 1950 was higher in both volume and value than in 1949, and farmers' cash income, excluding the variations in wheat board disbursements, was five per cent greater in 1950 than in the year before.

Investment and miscellaneous income in 1950 reached a new peak of $2·9 billion, a reflection of the very heavy new capital investment of recent years as well as the rising prices and high business activity of 1950. In the years 1946 to 1950 more than $9 billion of new plant and equipment has been installed by Canadian industry. Accurate figures of total capital investment in our industries have never been compiled, but I think it is a safe statement that during the past five years it has increased by not less than 40 per cent. Our industrial labour force during the same five years has increased by 12 per cent, and our agricultural labour force has declined 10 per cent.

Forecasting the future is always difficult, and in Canada is perhaps particularly difficult, partly due to our heavy dependence on the harvests of the land and sea, neither of which can be confidently predicted, and partly due to our dependence on foreign markets. This year it is made still more difficult by reason of uncertainties respecting steel and other materials and the shortages of special classes of skilled manpower. Every minister of finance, however, must adopt a view of the future, and I am basing my budgetary proposals on an assumption that the gross national product in 1951 will reach about $20 billion. That is an increase of about 12 per cent over 1950.

EMPLOYMENT, WAGES AND MANPOWER

The latest available statistics covering non-agricultural employment in Canada indicate that there are about 130,000 more persons employed than at the same time a year ago, and that there are about 115,000 fewer persons seeking work.

Monthly labour income at the end of 1950 was 11 per cent higher than a year earlier. For the eight leading industries regularly reported upon by the dominion bureau of statistics employment increased by five per cent during the year, weekly wages by seven per cent and total payrolls by twelve per cent. Average number of hours worked declined by a small fraction to a point just under 43 hours a week. Compared with the beginning of 1946 average weekly earnings adjusted by the cost of living index showed an increase in "real" earnings of nine per cent. Compared with a year ago the increase was about two per cent.

A manpower problem is likely to develop during the coming year. It is not likely to take the form of a serious over-all labour shortage, but there is already a scarcity developing in certain types of skilled labour, and it seems probable that these shortages of particular kinds of skill will become more widespread as defence production gathers momentum. As hon. members know, the government has recently appointed a national advisory committee on manpower to study and advise upon these matters.

CONSUMPTION AND PERSONAL SAVINGS

Personal spending on consumer goods and services in 1950 was about seven per cent higher than in 1949. A large part of this increase was concentrated in the second half of the year, and the increase was most conspicuous in consumer durables. The number of new passenger cars sold in 1950 was double the 1948 figure and 60 per cent greater than in 1949. Sales of electric refrigerators were three times as great as in 1948 and more than double the 1949 figure. And these rates of increase have probably accelerated during the first three months of this year.

Personal spending increased more than personal incomes, resulting in a decline in net personal savings out of current income. This decline in new savings amounted to about $270 million, or a drop of about 30 per cent.

EXTERNAL TRADE, THE BALANCE OF PAYMENTS AND EXCHANGE RATES

During 1950 there were a number of important changes in the pattern of our foreign trade. Exports from Canada increased by about four per cent to a peacetime record of $3,157 million. Since the price of our exports averaged about five per cent higher than in 1949 there was probably no increase in the volume of goods sold abroad. Imports, on the other hand, increased sharply in both volume and value. The total value of all merchandise imports in 1950 was $3,174 million, or an increase of 15 per cent over 1949. It will be seen from these figures that we imported $17 million more than we exported. This, however, does not take account of our exports of $162 million of gold which are not included in our regular merchandise trade statistics.

Changes in the direction of our trade were also significant. Our imports from the United Kingdom increased 32 per cent; from all other overseas countries by 27 per cent; and from the United States by 9 per cent. On the other hand, our exports to the United States increased 34 per cent, while our exports to the United Kingdom declined by 33 per cent, and to all other countries by 20 per cent. As a result of these shifts in trade our regional trade became much better balanced. In 1949 our exports to the United States paid for only 78 per cent of our imports; in 1950 they paid for 96 per cent. In 1949 United Kingdom exports to Canada covered only 43 per cent of her imports from us; in 1950 this figure rose to 85 per cent. For all other countries our imports in 1949 covered 64 per cent of our exports to them, and in 1950 this trade was almost exactly balanced.

Estimates of our balance of payments for 1950 indicate that we had a deficit on current account of about $300 million and a surplus on capital account of about $900 million, yielding a net increase of about $600 million in our gold and U.S. dollar reserves.

I think all hon. members are familiar with the facts of our extraordinary, I might even say embarrassing, increase in U.S. dollar reserves last summer when they increased by more than $500 million in ten weeks. After reaching a peak of $1,827 million at the end of October, 1950, our reserves have declined moderately and at March 31, 1951, stood at $1,653 million. At March 31, 1950, our reserves stood at $1,192 million.

One welcome consequence of the improvement in our exchange position was that we were able to withdraw all the emergency exchange conservation restrictions which we had to impose in November, 1947. After a steady series of relaxations during 1949 and 1950 the last of these restrictions disappeared on December 31, and the act itself was revoked by proclamation on January 15, 1951. The application of such restrictions is an irritating and a thankless task, and I should like to take this occasion to pay tribute to all Canadians, both consumers and businessmen, for the co-operative and understanding way in which they bore the complexities and the annoyances of this period. The demise of this act was unwept and unsung, but I trust not without honour.

Another consequence of our improved trade and general economic position was our action with respect to exchange rates last September. During the month of June an inflow of speculative capital from the United States became noticeable and it gathered momentum through July and August, reaching almost flood proportions in September. This inflow of funds, this tribute by New York to the essential soundness of the Canadian economy and its prospects, was rather sudden and not a little embarrassing. Much of it was looking for a quick ten per cent profit in the expectation that the Canadian dollar would be moved back to parity with the United States dollar. The inflow created difficulties for us not only from a banking point of view, but also in the sharp inflationary stimulus it applied to our money supply. The Bank of Canada took energetic measures to sterilize this inflow by heavy selling from its portfolio of government securities, and the government was in the fortunate position of having a cash surplus enabling it to finance part of the inflow which would otherwise have required further borrowing.

After careful review of all the relevant factors, and after consultation with the international monetary fund, we came to the conclusion that the wise policy to follow was to withdraw the official rates on the United States dollar and allow the exchange rate to find its appropriate level in response to the normal supply and demand forces operating in the market from time to time. As hon. members know, this operation was carried out smoothly, and during recent months the American dollar has been fluctuating narrowly and quite normally at premiums varying between 4½ and 5½ per cent.

THE CONTROL OF INFLATION

Two great issues, Mr. Speaker, face the world today. They are the pursuit of peace and the control of inflation. Neither of these is peculiarly Canadian. Both are matters of great concern to every decent country in the world. In respect of neither of them are we fully masters of our own destiny, for we live in a highly interdependent world. But both of them have had a large part in framing the policies of expenditure and revenue which are joined in my budget tonight.

Of our policy of seeking an enduring and expanding peace I need not speak at any length. It is clear and it is unambiguous. Its financial aspects are found in our defence estimates, in our provision for aid through various United Nations agencies both for relief and for other constructive purposes, and in the estimates which will be tabled later in this session for our co-operation in the Colombo plan.

I must, however, speak rather more fully about ways and means of restraining inflation. As I said a moment ago, this is not just a Canadian problem; it is a world-wide trend. Indeed, price increases in Canada during the past year have been more moderate than in other comparable countries. During 1950 wholesale market prices in Canada advanced 15 per cent; in the United States they advanced 19 per cent; in Australia 22 per cent; in the United Kingdom 23 per cent, and in most of the western European countries between 20 and 25 per cent. There is some satisfaction, though perhaps not much, in being not quite so badly off as one's friends and neighbours.

We must face the fact, however, that a considerable measure of inflation is abroad in the world. The continued increase in the various price indexes during the past three months is evidence of that. As the London Economist put it a few weeks ago, "the virus of inflation has got into the economic blood stream." Even if strong and effective measures are taken in all major countries it cannot be cured overnight. But it is the duty of each country, having regard to its own circumstances, to take all the practical and sensible measures available to it to bring this virus under control.

We in Canada have already done a great deal. As I have said on previous occasions, this is not a matter in which government policies alone can provide a complete solution. It is a matter which requires the fullest co-operation of all sections and groups, in which every person has a part to play. But governments can and should do a great deal. The government can exercise careful control over its own expenditures; we can follow a fully pay-as-we-go policy; we can restrain the expansion of credit; and we can apply direct controls either to particular conditions or, if necessary, more generally. In Canada we have done all of these and we shall continue to develop and apply these policies.

The essential principle in preventing inflation is to restrict the total of all expenditure, public and private, to an amount which can be met from our production and imports. The necessities of defence now require that our expenditure for all other purposes should be reduced—making due allowance for the increase in prices that has already occurred.

This requires us all to reappraise the priorities of our expenditures for various purposes and projects. Immediately following the Korean crisis last summer the government reviewed its own expenditure programs, and many projects that had been planned and for which parliament had voted funds were deferred. Since that time the numbers in many units in the public service have been reduced or held below the figures for which parliament had appropriated salaries. Hon. members and others have already seen tangible effects of this policy. The detail pages of the estimates show many instances where expenditure in the past year has been considerably below what was authorized and planned, despite the increase in wages, salaries, and prices.

For this new fiscal year we have applied a similar but more severe test of need. For non-defence purposes we have reversed the upward trend in expenditures. The estimates placed before parliament for this year show a reduction of $35 million below last year, despite an increase of more than ten per cent in salary and wage levels, despite higher materials and construction costs, and despite an increase of nearly $40 million in old age pensions, family allowances, tax rental agreements with provinces, and similar payments that rise automatically with increases in population and the value of production. The numbers of employees engaged in normal government administration are being reduced, and parliament is being asked to appropriate salaries or wages for about five per cent fewer employees than last year, apart from defence and related services. This reduction is made possible in part by an increase in normal office working hours, and by the elimination of certain services and activities.

We have paid particular regard to our expenditures on construction, because it is in this field where we anticipate the greatest competition between the defence program and other public and private expenditures. Examination of the estimates for the departments of public works, transport, agriculture, and resources and development—our major non-defence spending departments in this field—reveals very large reductions in their construction programs, notwithstanding urgent needs for expenditure of this kind, following twenty years during which works have been postponed, first for lack of funds, then for war, and finally, in recent years because of shortages of materials and labour.

It is hard to set a figure upon the reduction in expenditures that we have made because of the necessity of diverting resources to defence. I think, however, it would be fair to say that if we had not gone beyond the careful and prudent planning applicable to a growing Canada in a peaceful world, our non-defence expenditures might well have increased by more than $100 million instead of being $35 million less. I should like to thank all my colleagues and their senior officers for their co-operation in the difficult task of contracting their programs and expenditures.

It is in one sense misleading to talk of a special "economy drive" in regard to government expenditures. The duties of a minister of finance consist largely of a continuous search for economies. A more accurate way of expressing it is that priorities of expenditures shift and change from time to time, but given a program agreed upon for a particular year, the effort to achieve economy and efficiency is never relaxed.

Our second anti-inflationary policy is to balance the budget fully. If I may anticipate a later section of my speech I can say now that I estimate our budgetary surplus for the year just ended to be $203 million. As will also be seen from the resolutions I shall refer to later, we propose to follow a strict pay-as-we-go policy for the coming year.

Hon. members are also aware of the measures that have been taken to restrain the expansion of credit. In the field of direct action by government, regulations affecting consumer credit were put into effect last November, and revised on a more restrictive basis in March of this year. We have also begun to curtail the use of government funds by way of mortgage credit for housing and the extension of government guarantees of bank loans for farm improvements.

In the field of monetary policy, the Bank of Canada has for some time been exercising its influence to restrict the cash reserves of the banking system so as to discourage monetary expansion and, last October, raised its rediscount rate as a signal of warning. In February the bank expressed the view to the chartered banks that further increase in the total volume of bank credit would be undesirable. The banks agreed that restraint in bank lending under present conditions was in the general public interest, and adopted certain measures suggested by the Bank of Canada and described in a public statement issued by the bank. In addition to specific policies in respect to certain types of loans, it was announced that lending practices would be tightened wherever possible in all fields of bank lending in order to achieve the desired objective of avoiding further increase in the aggregate volume of the banks' loans and holdings of non-government securities. Hon. members will understand that these monetary and bank credit measures depend upon voluntary co-operation rather than government regulation, but the objective towards which they are directed is, I believe, very much in the public interest.

There is, I think, a growing realization throughout the country that at a time of full employment the level of investment cannot exceed the current level of new saving by the community without having an inflationary influence. In such circumstances extension of credit requires particularly careful scrutiny. One symptom of the very large demand for credit in recent months has been the establishment of higher interest rates in Canada, as in the United States and other countries. One would like to see more restraint in the demand for loans, and larger annual savings out of income. It is now widely recognized also that, within the limits imposed by aggregate new saving, lending institutions and individuals alike can make a constructive contribution by directing their investment policy so as to give preference to projects assisting the defence program and essential productive enterprise.

These tighter credit policies strike at the root causes of inflation by cutting down what business and consumers can spend in excess of their incomes. They take some months to show their effects on excessive purchasing and the rise of prices, but already one begins to see evidence of their influence. Along with similar action in the United States they will have a growing importance in holding prices down.

We have now had five successive years of unprecedented capital investment. A year ago I did not think that the 1950 rate of expansion would exceed the record of 1949, but in fact it was 14 per cent higher in value and about 7 per cent greater in physical volume. Preliminary reports for 1951 indicated that the business and industrial world was planning for another 15 per cent increase in capital investment above 1950. I am led to believe, however, that quite a few businessmen and other operators are revising their plans to more moderate dimensions in the light of steel shortages and tighter bank credit. But the indications are that the plans for capital expansion still being pushed forward are greater than the capacity to fulfil them. Unless there is a much sharper increase in per capita output than we have ever had in the past it will be literally impossible for all groups in the country to accomplish what they want or what they are planning to do: the government to double its defence expenditures, consumers to raise their levels of consumption, and business to increase its rate of capital expansion.

We cannot allow the defence program to suffer, nor would we wish to see a reduction in the levels of ordinary personal consumption. It is, therefore, largely in the field of capital investment and consumer durables that room will have to be made for the defence program. This is the more necessary since it is in this sector of the economy—the construction, metal using and machinery trades—that most of the defence production will be inserted.

Finally there is the question of direct controls. The government, through my colleague the Minister of Defence Production, is already applying direct controls in the allocation and use of steel and certain other essential materials, and he has powers which he is prepared to use to extend these controls when that appears to be necessary and desirable. The government's views on this general problem of direct controls have already been fully stated by the Prime Minister and by others earlier this session. The government's attitude toward direct controls is not based on theoretical or academic or ideological grounds; it is based on a completely practical appreciation of prevailing conditions and upon the estimated effectiveness of any proposed form of control in the given circumstances. I shall not repeat our views which are well known and well understood. If we reach a point where we believe a much wider range of direct controls would be in the national interest we shall use them, but we are not prepared to embark upon a premature program which under present conditions would in our judgment create more confusion than stability.

At the risk of some repetition, however, I would like to re-emphasize the extent to which higher prices are transmitted to Canada from abroad. More than one-fifth of everything we produce is exported, and about the same proportion of everything we consume is imported. In other words a large part of our price structure, certainly more than half its components, is directly determined by what others outside Canada charge us or will pay us. As my colleague the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) said last night, it would be possible to reduce substantially the price of meat in Canada, but only by placing an embargo on all cattle and meat exports. But if we want to retain the American market for our cattle—and in the long run it is essential—we in Canada must be prepared to pay as good a price for them as the Americans. We could reduce the price of clothing in Canada, but only by paying extremely heavy subsidies on imports of raw cotton and wool, on textile yarns and textile fabrics. As my colleague said last night, raw cotton has gone up fifty per cent in price during the past nine months, and raw wool prices have doubled.

Under conditions of total mobilization our people and producers would, I am sure, accept if necessary the loss of markets, the detailed regimentation of their businesses and the denial of their normal freedom to bargain and to make free contracts. We are not in that position now. We hope, and we still have reason to believe, that the policies of peace and security that we are following in association with other free nations will prevent the development of such conditions.

I have said something about what the federal government can and should do in these matters. It is equally important that provincial and municipal governments should follow comparable policies in their own spheres. Provincial and municipal expenditures, and the important public services which they sustain, are assuming increasing importance in the Canadian economy. In 1945 their net expenditures—that is, the expenditures of the provinces and the municipalities—totalled about $700 million, and in 1950 they exceeded $1,500 million. Total non-defence governmental expenditures in Canada at all three levels of government, excluding all intergovernmental transfer payments, have increased by about $1,000 million since 1945. In round figures $180 million of this increase has been at the federal level, $530 million at the provincial level, and $290 million has been in the municipalities. Both the provinces and the municipalities have highly essential functions to perform which require them to undertake a great deal of both small and large scale construction work. Having regard to the impact of defence on construction materials and skills I must again urge the provinces and municipalities to review particularly their capital and construction programs in the light of the general public interest.

Of the public at large, consumers and producers, farmers and merchants, businessmen and labour, I ask for restraint and good sense in all economic matters. I come back again to the fundamental importance of increasing efficiency and output. Statistics and charts in the white paper I have tabled indicate that there has been no measurable increase in per capita productivity during the past five years. This can be explained by the larger proportion of children and old people in our population. But if we are to carry greatly increased defence costs without having a definite fall in our standards of consumption we shall have to do better than this—we shall all have to work harder and longer.

Greater output, however, is not just a matter of each of us working harder or longer. Productivity is also a reflection of efficient business management, and it calls for mutual confidence and the best possible working relationships between management and labour.

There is also urgent need for a higher volume of new saving, to cover the increase in capital investment which is in prospect, and to restrain the rising trend in consumer spending. This is certainly one of the best ways of reducing the intensity of competition for the use of labour and materials, and so reducing the upward pressure on prices. It is to the interest of every Canadian to make the maximum effort to save, or to increase the level of his saving, as a direct contribution to the avoidance of inflation and the successful prosecution of the defence program. The money saved can be used to buy Canada savings bonds, or to pay off the mortgage on his house or farm more rapidly, or to speed up the repayment of other debts, or to increase his savings in any other form that suits his individual circumstances. The important thing is to achieve an increase in aggregate saving up to a level at least equal to the new capital investment which we shall have to make this year.

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS, 1950-51

Turning now to a brief review of the government's accounts, may I again call the attention of hon. members to the detailed statements relating to these accounts in the white paper to which I have already referred. Of course it will be some time before the final figures for the year just ended will be available, and the figures I shall be using must, therefore, be regarded as preliminary and subject to revision.

In my statement to the house last September, I estimated our expenditure at $2,654 million and our revenue at $2,669 million. It now appears that our actual revenues for 1950-51 were about $3,105 million, our expenditures about $2,902 million, and as a consequence our budgetary surplus about $203 million.

The most notable feature of our financial operations has been the extraordinary buoyancy of our revenues, which reached an all-time peak and exceeded our estimates by $436 million. Our revenue, as hon. members are aware, is highly sensitive to variations in our production, trade, incomes and prices, and the unprecedented collections for the fiscal year are essentially a reflection of the high rate of economic activity generally during 1950, which began to accelerate in April and May, and moved upward, much more rapidly after the outbreak of hostilities in Korea.

Direct taxes, which include personal and corporate income taxes and succession duties, yielded $257 million more than a year ago and account for half our total revenues. Indirect taxes, which include all customs and excise, have also shown a marked increase, yielding $201 million more than in 1949-50, and 40 per cent of the total.

The greater yield from direct taxes is primarily the result, on the one hand, of increased employment and higher incomes, and, on the other, of higher corporate profits earned during 1950. The record yield of $800 million from corporation income tax reflects in part the increase in corporate profits I have already discussed, in part the higher rates of tax imposed last September, and in part the provision introduced last year whereby private companies were allowed to capitalize their undistributed income on hand at the end of the 1949 taxation year upon payment of a tax of 15 per cent. As I said in my budget speech of March 28, 1950, it was impossible to predict what revenue would accrue from this 15 per cent tax, as no one could tell how many companies would take advantage of the new provision in the fiscal year. In fact, more than $90 million of tax has been paid by private companies under this provision.

The increased yield from indirect taxes is due, for the most part, to a larger volume of sales of consumer goods and services at higher prices, and, in lesser degree, to the impact of the additional commodity taxes introduced last September.

Our higher revenues are also the result of constantly improving efficiency in the Department of National Revenue. During the past two or three years a particularly good job has been done in streamlining procedures, speeding up assessments, and cleaning up arrears, as well as taking prompt and salutary action against fraudulent tax evaders. For this good work I should like to tender my particular thanks to my colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) and his staff of senior officials.

I will not go into details of non-tax revenues or special receipts except to report on one item. Post office revenues have risen, but operating costs have also increased, with the result that on the usual basis, without adjusting for certain services rendered free or below cost to other departments and certain services or accommodation received without charge to it, the post office showed an operating deficit for the year. Details of all other items of non-tax revenues and special receipts which amount to $234 million will be found in the white paper.

Apart from the following three items, our estimates of expenditure have proved to be fairly close to the actual results for the fiscal year.

The house will recall that in my budget statement of September 7 I set a figure of $100 million for our estimated expenditures under the $300 million vote for the supply of military equipment and related services for our own use and for the use of our north Atlantic allies. I indicated at that time that this sum might be exceeded, and that indeed our aim would be to expedite this program by all possible means. We now expect that when the accounts for the year are closed they will show that we have made defence equipment, valued at $195 million, available to our north Atlantic friends, and consequently $95 million of the excess of our expenditures over our forecast may be attributed to this factor. Almost the whole of the remaining difference is accounted for by the two special items included in the further supplementary estimates for 1950-51 which were not foreseen last September, namely, the $65 million payment authorized to be made to the Canadian wheat board, and the special contribution of $75 million to offset in part the reported deficit in the superannuation account.

The most significant single feature of our expenditure has been the increase in national defence. Expenditures for the services and for defence research increased by about $190 million, and in addition, as I have already noted, supplies valued at $195 million were made available to our partners under the north Atlantic treaty. In all, our defence expenditures increased by $388 million to a total of $773 million. This amount is more than double the total defence outlay for the preceding year, and represents more than a quarter of all our expenditures for 1950-51.

In addition to the increases already mentioned, there was an increase of $22 million in payments for family allowances, old age pensions and pensions to the blind, and an increase of $20 million in the various payments to the provinces; but these were more than offset by reductions and savings in other items.

For example, there were significant reductions in expenditures for interest on the public debt, veterans benefits and government-owned enterprises. The saving of over $14 million in interest on public debt was due to the successive reductions in the debt which we have been able to achieve during the last five years. That of almost $19 million in veterans benefits is attributable to decreases in payments of rehabilitation benefits, war service gratuities and re-establishment credits. The reduction of $44 million in the charges for government-owned enterprises is due primarily to the sharp decrease in the deficits of the Canadian National Railways. Further decreases were due to the absence of any item comparable to the charges in the 1949-50 accounts for the assumption by Canada of part of the Newfoundland debt or for the write-down of certain of our active assets to non-active account. There were also other savings, and for particulars of some of these I would refer hon. members to the comparative tables of expenditures given in the white paper.

Following the practice of recent years, I have again provided for an addition of $75 million to the reserve for possible losses on our active assets. At March 31 loans, investments and other assets amounting in the aggregate to over $5,890 million were carried on the books as active assets. The reserve held against these amounted to $396 million, representing approximately 7 per cent of the total. This I believe is a not unreasonable provision.

In summary, our revenues for the year just ended were $525 million more than for the preceding year, and while our expenditures also increased by $453 million we were nevertheless able to achieve a surplus of $203 million or $72 million larger than that of the year 1949-50. This surplus has involved a corresponding reduction in the net debt of Canada, and brings to $1,980 million the amount by which the government has been able to reduce the net debt during the past five fiscal years. I am sure it must be gratifying to hon. members, as it is to me, that we have been able to reduce our net debt by this substantial amount—an amount which is approximately equal to the increase in our debt during the first three and a half years following the outbreak of war in 1939.

I should also like to direct the attention of the house to that part of our financial operations which lies outside the budget proper. Cash receipts from and cash payments to the public are more significant factors than budgetary revenues and expenditures in appraising the full effects of governmental financial transactions upon the Canadian economy. With this in mind I would like to refer briefly to those items in our budgetary revenue and expenditure accounts that do not involve the receipt or payment of cash, and also to those other cash receipts and disbursements which are outside the budgetary accounts but which must be taken into account in order to appraise our over-all cash position.

In addition to the provision for our general reserve and the usual interest credits and government contributions to annuity, pension and similar accounts, we have had the transfer to revenue of the excess provision for the refundable portion of the excess profits tax, the special government contribution to the civil service superannuation account, and the revaluation of our sterling and United States dollar assets and liabilities. Moreover, the transfer of existing stocks of equipment to our north Atlantic allies under the Defence Appropriation Act has not involved immediate cash disbursements. While during 1950-51 equipment valued at $195 million was transferred, disbursements for replacements amounted to only $20 million. When we take account of the above items and other cash receipts which do not constitute revenue in the budgetary sense, we find that a total of $792 million in cash was available during the fiscal year. Against this we must take into account the substantial disbursements we have to make during the year which are not budgetary expenditures. The largest and most significant of these were the advances to the foreign exchange control board to acquire gold or United States dollars. These amounted to $475 million. We have also made substantial loans to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and to veterans under the Veterans Land Act for housing and settlement purposes. In the aggregate cash payments amounting to $612 million for loans and investments and other non-budgetary purposes which would otherwise have required additional borrowing were made out of available cash resources. This left an over-all cash surplus of $181 million. By using this amount and by letting our cash balances run down by $25 million, securities amounting to $90 million were acquired for the unemployment insurance fund and certain investment portfolios of the government, and in addition we were able to retire outstanding funded debt to a total amount of $116 million.

I shall not take the time of the house to discuss the balance sheet of Canada or explain the principal changes in our asset and liability accounts. Perhaps I should say, however, that the net debt of Canada at March 31, 1951, as presently estimated, was $11,441 million, that our total unmatured funded debt at the same date was $15,027 million of which less than 3 per cent is payable in London or New York, that the average coupon rate on this funded debt was unchanged at 2·60 per cent, and that our total public debt charges for the year 1950-51 amounted to $439 million, a decrease of about $12 million from the previous year.

FINANCING OPERATIONS

Financial operations during the fiscal year included the redemption or refinancing of a heavy volume of matured or called bond issues in addition to the normal refunding of various issues of short-term securities.

In regard to our funded debt payable in Canada, the amount of our obligations, including refundable taxes, which matured or were called during the year, was no less than $3,771 million. We met $3,245 million of this amount by refunding or conversion into new issues, and $467 million by new borrowing in the form of Canada savings bonds and deposit certificates. The remaining cash required, $59 million, came from our cash surplus. After taking into account $22 million arising out of certain non-cash transactions, funded debt payable in Canadian dollars was reduced by $81 million during the fiscal year.

Our funded debt payable in United States dollars decreased by $74 million during the year. Of this amount $55 million resulted from the redemption on October 1, 1950, of an issue of 4 per cent bonds outstanding in the amount of $100 million (U.S.), which was refinanced in part by the issue of 2¾ per cent twenty-five year bonds in the amount of $50 million. This issue which was sold at par established a new low record for the cost of borrowing in the United States market by any foreign government. In addition, there was a reduction of $19 million in our United States dollar debt reflecting the change in the exchange rate resulting from the freeing of the Canadian dollar in September, 1950.

Our funded debt payable in sterling decreased by $5·7 million. This was in part due to the redemption of $2·9 million registered stock on May 1, 1950, and in part reflected the change in the exchange rate.

Thus, the over-all reduction in our funded debt during the year was $161 million, of which cash payments accounted for $116 million and exchange revaluations and adjustments for the balance.

FORECAST OF REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE, 1951-52

I now come to a consideration of our revenue and expenditure prospects for the new fiscal year, 1951-52. The main estimates which I laid before the house on March 12 provided for expenditures of $3,587 million. Of this amount $1,664 million is for defence, or approximately $893 million more than the estimated outlay for defence during the year just ended. The total estimate for our non-defence programs for the new fiscal year is $1,923 million. However, there will as usual be supplementary estimates. On the other hand there will be offsets to these supplementary estimates. We shall spare no effort to achieve the maximum possible economies. Inevitably in any program of this magnitude there will be shortfalls in expenditures as compared with the estimates. The total amount of these savings is most difficult to forecast, particularly in a time of rising costs and prices, but I am confident that it will be fairly substantial. Taking all relevant factors into consideration, my best estimate is that our total expenditure during the present fiscal year will be of the order of $3,700 million, and I propose to budget on that basis.

On the revenue side, I base my forecast on the expectation I have noted earlier—that our gross national product will reach $20 billion. Should production and incomes continue to rise beyond that level—as well they might—I should expect my forecast to be more than realized. Should they go not quite that high, our revenues could fall short of the estimates I am now submitting.

However, on the basis of these assumptions I would expect that if we were to make no changes in our present tax laws, our total revenue would rise to about $3,325 million during the fiscal year. I have had the usual table prepared showing a comparison of the revenue forecast for 1951-52 with the preliminary figures for the year just closed, and for the convenience of hon. members and others, I ask the consent of the house to have this table printed in Hansard.

With estimated expenditures of $3,700 million and prospective revenues of $3,325 million it would appear that in the absence of any tax changes we would have a budgetary deficit of $375 million in 1951-52. However, before dealing with the tax changes which I shall recommend, I would like to refer to our prospective cash position and those extra budgetary cash receipts and disbursements which are so important from the economic standpoint in their impact upon our economy and in appraising the real significance of our financial operations for the year.

To this prospective budgetary deficit of $375 million we must add our probable cash disbursements for other than budgetary expenditures. In the replacement fund set up under the Defence Appropriation Act there is a balance of $175 million which is now available to the Department of National Defence for cash expenditures for the purpose of replacing existing stocks of defence equipment transferred to our north Atlantic allies during the fiscal year just ended. During the new year additional transfers to our allies are expected, but substantial cash disbursements for replacements will also be made, and these disbursements are likely to exceed the transfers to the replacement fund, although the actual amount of the excess is difficult to forecast. In addition, we shall in all probability require about $60 million for housing loans, possibly $15 or $20 million for Veterans Land Act advances, and there will undoubtedly be other loans and investments. Offsetting these will be the cash receipts in the annuity and pension funds and in the various trust and other accounts, including repayments of loans and advances made in previous years. All in all, I expect that our total non-budgetary cash disbursements will somewhat exceed our total non-budgetary cash receipts. This is apart from any transactions in our own securities, and possible advances to or repayments by the foreign exchange control board resulting from changes in the size of our exchange reserves. It is, of course, not possible to forecast with any degree of assurance the extent of any change in these exchange reserves and I shall not attempt that hazardous exercise. From what has been said, however, it seems apparent that unless the repayment of advances by the foreign exchange control board equals the net excess of non-budgetary cash disbursements over non-budgetary receipts, our over-all cash deficit, assuming no changes in our present tax structure, would exceed the estimate of our budgetary deficit I have already given.

TAX POLICY

I said a moment ago that we face a prospective deficit of $375 million. The first question is, what shall we do about it? In my mind, and I think in the mind of every hon. member, the answer is clear and must be unequivocal. No person with any sense of financial responsibility and having a clear view of our circumstances and our prospects could do other than conclude that we must increase our revenues by at least the amount of the deficit, that we must balance the budget, that we must follow a strict pay-as-we-go policy.

There is, of course, a certain arbitrary element about budget statistics. We do our budget arithmetic in terms of separate periods of time—the fiscal year. In reality the stream of income and the stream of expenditure are continuous though always changing. In some months the inflow exceeds the outflow, in others the process is reversed. Since the summer of 1950 the volume of flow in both streams has been steadily rising, though at varying rates. A year ago our total expenditures were $2·4 billion, in the year just closed they were $2·9 billion, this year they will be $3·7 billion. It will be clear that during the last few months of the past year the flow of expenditure was at a rate considerably above $2·9 billion a year, and during the last half of this fiscal year it will probably be running at a rate of about $3·9 billion a year.

It is my duty, therefore, to seek new revenues which will produce actual additional receipts of about $400 million in this fiscal year, but which will be yielding at a rate of about $600 million a year during the last six months of the year.

The next question is one of ways and means. It is generally agreed, I think, that we have an excellent basic tax structure. We arrived at this basic structure through a series of changes completed in 1948 and 1949. It consists of a well balanced blend of personal income taxes, corporation income taxes, succession duties and commodity taxes. The commodity taxes in turn comprise customs duties, the so-called general sales tax and the special excise taxes. This structure was designed to be simple and flexible, one that could be readily adapted by moderate changes in rates or in coverage to meet any reasonable scale of peacetime requirements.

I am reluctant to believe that we must inevitably face budgets of $4 billion or more for any considerable succession of years. There is still a possibility that reasonable solutions of the present international tensions may be developed. In another year's time we should have a clear view of the prospects. I have, therefore, decided not to recommend any major reconstruction of our tax system this year but instead to meet our current requirements by a series of simple but adequate surcharges on several existing taxes and also to widen the coverage of our special excise taxes. I think that over the shorter run this method of defence surcharges will produce the necessary revenue with the least difficulty and inconvenience. If our optimistic hopes are realized it will be easy to reduce these surcharges or to drop them entirely, but I want to add that if it becomes clear that we are in for a long pull at these high levels of expenditure some major changes in the existing tax structure may have to be devised. My tax proposals, therefore, must be regarded as an interim policy for the period of the current year.

In proposing tax changes in times like these we must give consideration to the effects of the inflationary forces at work. Our principal economic objectives at this time must be greater efficiency, greater output, less non-essential capital investment, moderation in consumer spending, and an increase in personal savings. At the same time we would all wish to retain as free and as flexible an economic system as possible. Taxes operate on the economic system by diverting part of the income stream and by altering price relationships, and they have the effect of varying the intensity of incentives to produce and to spend or save. Any tax change will have some effect on incentives, or on spending, or on saving. Our problem is to get a good balance between taxes on earnings and taxes on spending. Taxes on spending, that is, taxes on commodities, do not adversely affect incentives to produce. In the case of taxes on commodities, government revenue is obtained not by reducing private income, but by placing a surcharge on private expenditure of certain kinds. This type of taxation has the advantage that it does not adversely affect the incentive to earn income, that is, to produce, and it does offer the consumer some choice as to whether he will spend, and pay the tax, or whether he will save and to that extent avoid the tax.

As I said earlier, the three principal inflationary forces presently at work in Canada are the rising prices outside Canada, the domestic capital investment boom which shows no signs of abating, and the fact that consumer spending power is outrunning the flow and production of consumer goods and services. There is little we can do about rising external prices, but we can do a good deal about the two domestic pressures and we have already done a good deal.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Consumer expenditures are being restrained by consumer credit regulations, as well as by the higher taxes introduced last September, and will be further affected by the higher taxes I shall be proposing a little later this evening. Taken together we think that these measures are adequate to the circumstances.

Heavy capital expenditures, on the other hand, are providing the most severe internal pressure and all signs point to increasing pressure from this source. In 1950 they were much more than double 1946 and 50 per cent above 1947. The reported capital expenditure plans for 1951 indicate intentions to increase them by a further 15 per cent over 1950, but it may be doubted whether such an increase is physically possible.

Capital expenditures are much more difficult to hold within bounds. Monetary and credit policies are having a restraining effect, but a large proportion of business corporations still have a highly liquid position and to that extent are less affected by these financial controls. The increases in corporation income taxes which I shall be proposing will drain off substantial amounts of corporate profits but the total volume of profits remaining in corporate hands will still be sufficient to maintain and, in some cases, to increase the capacity of corporations to plan additional capital investment without recourse to borrowed funds. Ordinarily this is a good thing both for the corporations and for the country, but under present conditions all expenditures of this sort that are not essential should be postponed.

Steel and related controls will place considerable restraints on less essential capital expansion, but they will not directly affect certain kinds of investment. In fact they could have the result of intensifying competition for such other materials and labour as are available. To embark upon all-out direct construction control would be an almost impossible task, as the experience of 1944-45 indicated.

What we need is a stiff financial deterrent that will affect particularly the businessman who is considering the kind of investment which is attractive, not because of its long-term soundness, but because it can be written off out of the expected high profits of the next few years at a time when he expects the rate of corporate income tax to be abnormally high.

To provide this deterrent it is proposed to defer for a period of four years the right to charge depreciation on all capital assets acquired after April 10, 1951, excepting certain classes of assets defined in the regulations and certain additional kinds of assets when certified as eligible by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The principal classes of assets which will still be eligible for current depreciation without a certificate will be those acquired

(a) for the production and distribution of electricity, gas and water; the provision of telegraph and telephone services; pipe lines, gas and oil well equipment; lumbering equipment; patents and franchises.

(b) for use by individuals in farming, fishing, or a professional service.

The principal kinds of assets in respect of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be authorized, in his discretion, to issue certificates of eligibility for current depreciation will be those necessarily acquired for

(a) defence purposes;

(b) the production and distribution of primary products in the farming, fishing, mining, petroleum, lumber and pulp and paper industries;

(c) direct use in a transportation or communication business.

Under the proposal, the right to charge depreciation as an expense is deferred, not cancelled or even diminished. For example, $10,000 of ineligible assets acquired after April 10, 1951, will earn no depreciation for tax purposes during the next four years; but in 1955 it can be transferred to the depreciable asset account at its full original cost. If it is a type of asset that can be written off in, say, 10 years, it will be written off in 1955-64 instead of in 1951-60.

The deterrent will particularly affect the businessman whose decision to make a capital expenditure is strongly influenced by the expectation that he can write off a large fraction of his cost at a time when both profits and tax rates are abnormally high, particularly if it is a kind of investment with uncertain profit-making possibilities six or eight years hence. In other words it will compel the businessman to give primary attention to the long-term prospects of proposed capital expenditures and if outside financial participation is required lenders will also take this view.

There will, therefore, be a stiff deterrent on projects of uncertain long-run value and also on capital expenditures on frills, gadgets and generally "dressing up" offices, stores and buildings. This deterrent should reduce the competitive scramble for scarce materials and equipment and thus place less strain on direct controls. Such materials and equipment will tend to go to those who can make the best long-term use of them. Bidders who are anticipating short-run quick profits will tend to withdraw from the market. One further advantage is that the government will not be telling anyone that he cannot do this or that. What will happen is that a financial penalty will be put, in the short run, on those who go ahead with less essential expenditures.

These revised depreciation regulations will go into effect immediately and will apply to all capital assets acquired after April 10, 1951. A copy of the regulations which have been approved by the governor in council will be tabled at the close of my address and my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, will be issuing an explanatory statement within a day or two.

I turn now to my proposals for tax changes for this year.

The field of the corporation income tax is a difficult one, and one which I have to approach with a particularly keen sense of responsibility for the real national interest, because the general public does not, I am afraid, fully understand the implication of these taxes. It would be only too easy to take a superficially popular line and increase these taxes to a point which while yielding large immediate revenues would do grave damage in the longer run to the economy as a whole.

I shall not repeat what I said about the excess profits tax last September. I still believe that it is not a sound tax except under very special circumstances, and I do not believe we have reached that point. A part of what I said about the excess profits tax, namely, that it blunts the goad to efficiency and that it invites waste, applies also to high rates of corporation income tax. It is, of course, a question of degree. I say quite frankly, however, that I am not happy about corporation tax rates when they go over 50 per cent. I think it is bad psychology to permit people to say that more than half of any income earned, or any savings made, will go to the government.

There is also the point that corporation taxes involve double taxation; we tax the corporation on its profits, and then we tax the shareholder again on his dividends. Moreover, we have always relied on undistributed corporation profits to provide a large fraction of the capital required for expansion of our industries. At this juncture in our affairs, with heavy capital investment contributing to inflationary pressure, I shall not be too much concerned if higher tax rates leave less for reinvestment, but in the long run it is a good thing for the country that business should grow out of reinvested profits.

Having weighed all these factors I have come to the conclusion that the right policy at this time is to impose a defence surcharge of 20 per cent on all corporation income tax payments in respect of income earned after January 1, 1951, in addition to the 5 per cent higher tax rate imposed last September. This 20 per cent surcharge will apply only to profits now taxed at the 38 per cent rate. It will not apply to the rate of 15 per cent which applies to the first $10,000 of profits.

I am conscious of the fact, however, that this 20 per cent surcharge will weigh very heavily on those kinds of companies which for a variety of reasons, public control of rates or otherwise, are never able to earn more than a very modest rate on their capital. To such companies the next few years can offer little expectation of increased profits, yet many of them are engaged in activities which will require them to raise very large sums of additional capital for essential expansion. If we are not to cripple their borrowing capacity we must not cripple their capacity to earn their normal profits after tax. For these reasons I propose that the 20 per cent defence surcharge shall not operate so as to reduce the net income after federal tax, but before any provincial income taxes, of any company to a point below a 5 per cent return on capital employed.

Apart from this abatement the effect of the 20 per cent defence surcharge is to raise the rate of tax on all profits over $10,000 from 38 per cent to 45·6 per cent. It must be remembered that there are also provincial corporate income taxes. In the eight provinces with tax rental agreements it is 5 per cent, and in Ontario and Quebec it is 7 per cent. This means that the marginal rate of combined tax will be just over 50 per cent in eight provinces, 52·6 per cent in Ontario and Quebec.

If this 20 per cent defence surcharge were applied to all profits its yield would be about $115 million in this fiscal year, and about $170 million in a full year. The abatement I have mentioned will cause some reduction in this yield. On the other hand, we shall pick up some additional current revenue incidental to the policy I have announced regarding deferred depreciation. What this amount will be cannot be more than an informed guess. I am inclined to the view that this increased revenue will be rather more than the loss from the abatement of the surcharge and I have, therefore, put down $116 million this year and $175 million in a full year as my increased revenue from the corporation income tax.

There will in addition be a number of technical changes in the law covering corporation taxes, but none of these will have any significant economic or budgetary implications.

I turn now to the personal income tax. In line with my earlier statement that I wish to upset the present tax structure as little as possible this year, I am proposing to leave the exemptions and the percentage rate structure unchanged and rely upon a straight defence surcharge for the revenues we require. This surcharge will be 20 per cent on the amount of tax payable under the present rate structure and will take effect as from July 1, 1951. This means that the tax payable for the whole calendar year of 1951 will be increased by ten per cent, but commencing July 1 all payroll deductions will be one-fifth greater than in the present deduction tables and all other pay-as-you-earn instalments will be increased by one-fifth. With the permission of the house I shall insert in Hansard at this point the usual tables illustrating the effects of this surcharge.

Note: (1) The above figures show the actual income tax liability of a taxpayer with family allowance children but in order to arrive at his true net position the amount of family allowances received for his children must be offset against his tax liability.

(2) In calculating the above taxes it has been assumed that all incomes up to $30,000 are entirely earned incomes, and that incomes of more than $30,000 include income of that amount and additional investment income to make up the total. No account has been taken of the 10 per cent tax credit for dividends from Canadian corporations.

When hon. members have an opportunity to study these tables they will find, for example, that the married man with no children earning $2,500 will have his tax increased by something less than 30 cents a week. The $5,000 a year man will pay an additional $8.50 a month; the $10,000 a year man will pay an additional $28 a month, and so on. Starting July 1 every taxpayer will pay a rate one-fifth higher than he has been paying. This 20 per cent defence surcharge on personal incomes should yield $85 million this year, and $158 million in a full year.

There will be a number of other amendments to the Income Tax Act.

Authority will be requested for a simplified income tax system for members of the armed forces under which their full income tax liability in respect of service pay may be met by appropriate deductions from their monthly pay.

Expenditure on certain drugs will be allowed in computing deductible medical expenses.

Provision will be made for the deduction, in computing income from wages and salaries, of professional membership dues and certain other cost items where the professional status is required to be maintained by the terms of the employment or where such costs are required by the contract of employment to be assumed by the employees. Similarly, provision will be made for the deduction of union dues.

The 15 per cent tax on undistributed income of private companies will be made available to all companies, but the right of controlled companies to pay in respect of surpluses accumulated from 1950 onward will be withdrawn.

The right of corporations to file consolidated returns will be withdrawn in respect of taxation years ending after December 31, 1950.

The special provisions regarding exploration expenses incurred by mining and oil companies will be extended for a further year.

Minor adjustments will be made in respect of lump sum accumulations of income received in a year, investment counsel fees, charitable foundations, farm losses and "related companies".

A few other technical amendments will be contained in the bill but I need not refer to them at this time. As hon. members will note, some of the above amendments will increase revenue and others will decrease it. On balance I estimate a net increase in revenue from all these items of about $10 million.

I turn now to our third broad field of taxation, that of commodity taxes.

We propose to make no changes in the present scale of taxes on alcoholic beverages. Last September we increased these taxes by $22 million a year. The rates are now high, and I am aware that whenever we change these taxes we impose a good deal of inconvenience and some confusion upon the provincial authorities.

We propose, however, to increase the taxes on cigarettes and on manufactured tobacco. The cigarette tax is now $10 per thousand, and I am recommending an increase of $1.50 or a total of $11.50 per thousand, effective midnight tonight. This change will yield us $21 million this year and $26 million in a full year.

For some years now we have had a tax on cigarette papers and cigarette tubes which are used by those who "roll their own". This tax has become difficult to administer. I propose to repeal this tax and substitute for it a higher tax on manufactured tobacco. To keep a reasonable proportion between the traditional relationship between the taxes on cigarettes and tobacco I am recommending an increase of 48 cents a pound on manufactured tobacco. A proportionate increase is also proposed with respect to the tax on raw leaf tobacco. I estimate that these changes will give us an additional $8 million this year and $9 million in a full year over and above the loss of revenue on cigarette papers and tubes.

Next I come to what we call the special excise tax, that is the tax now imposed at a rate of 15 per cent on such things as motorcars, radios, household electric appliances, cameras, jewelry, cosmetics and so on. We propose that this tax be increased to a rate of 25 per rent.

The house will also recall that last September we deliberately decided not to place this special tax on refrigerators, stoves and washing machines. I regret that we can no longer afford to leave these entirely free of extra tax, and I am recommending that a tax at 15 per cent be levied on all mechanically operated domestic refrigerators and washing machines and on all domestic cooking stoves except those designed to use coal or wood only.

In September a tax of 30 per cent was imposed on all candy, confectionery and chewing gum. Experience has shown that this rate has been too severe, and its effects upon the industry have been out of proportion in comparison with other taxed industries. We propose, therefore, to reduce this rate to 15 per cent.

These, like all other commodity tax changes, will be effective at midnight tonight.

As usual I must give public notice that no claims for refund arising out of tax reductions in respect of goods on which tax has been paid will be entertained by my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue.

I estimate the increase from 15 per cent to 25 per cent in existing taxes after taking account of the reduction in the tax on candy will yield an extra $44 million this year and $54 million in a full year. The new items to be taxed at 15 per cent should produce about $16 million this year and $21 million in a full year.

Finally I have given very careful thought to the so-called general sales tax. I say "so-called general sales tax" because it is really very far from being such. Our present sales tax has a very long list of exemptions. About ninety-five per cent of all foods are free of sales tax. All fuels and all building materials are exempt. I think it is safe to say that two-thirds of the average Canadian family's total spending is not touched by the sales tax. Contrary to the frequent assertion, the sales tax does not strike a higher proportion of the expenditures of the low income group. Calculations based on recent family budget studies made by the dominion bureau of statistics indicate that in the lowest income groups only about one-quarter of total income is spent on goods subject to sales tax; at the $3,000 a year level about one-third of the family income is spent on goods subject to this tax. This 33 per cent of income spent on taxed commodities extends to beyond the $6,000 a year level. Only when incomes exceed $7,000 or $8,000 a year does the proportion of income spent on goods subject to sales tax start to decline, and this is just about the point where our income tax starts to become sharply progressive. To say that our sales tax is a harsh regressive tax simply is not true.

If hon. members have succeeded in following my estimates of additional tax yields they will realize that my proposals so far leave me about $100 million short of my necessary objective of $400 million to balance this year's budget. My range of choice to secure this remaining $100 million is really limited to more than doubling the increase I have already proposed in the personal income tax, which could only be achieved by a sharp lowering of exemption levels, or an increase in the sales tax. I do not say that we have reached the practicable limits of the income tax. Of course we have not. The new rates we are proposing are much below the peak rates of 1943 and 1944. But experience has shown that you cannot increase income taxes by too much in any one year without creating serious embarrassment to large numbers of people in all income groups, and without seriously affecting economic incentives.

I have therefore come to the conclusion that the sound thing to do from the economic point of view, and the fair thing at this time, is to increase the sales tax. I believe also that this is the choice that will be preferred by the great majority of our people. We are not recommending any change whatever in the coverage of the sales tax, but we are proposing that its rate be increased from 8 per cent to 10 per cent, effective immediately. I estimate that this will yield additional revenue of $105 million this year and $125 million in a full year.

Finally, I have certain tariff changes to propose. The tariff negotiations which have been taking place at Torquay during the past six months have just been concluded. The purpose of these negotiations was to extend the Geneva and Annecy agreements for another three-year period, to increase the scope of these agreements by including more countries and a wider range of commodities, and further, to arrange for additional reciprocal concessions on products previously negotiated. The Canadian delegation has concluded negotiations, providing for further reciprocal concessions, with sixteen countries including the United States. It has been arranged between the countries represented at Torquay that the details of the agreements resulting from the negotiations will be announced by the participating governments on May 9. Consequently I am not in a position to review the results at this time.

The budget resolutions relating to the customs tariff which I am tabling contain proposals to carry out certain recommendations of the tariff board and to provide for reductions in a number of duties which would lower costs of production in our great primary industries of agriculture, mining and fishing. Other changes proposed would achieve improvements in the wording and classification of several items so as to remove anomalies and to facilitate administration.

Two years ago I referred the plastics and synthetic resin items in the tariff to the tariff board for inquiry and report. These items were last examined by the board in 1937. In view of the rapid technical changes which have been taking place in this new and expanding industry, it is not surprising that the existing items in the tariff have become obsolete. Because of the highly technical factors involved and the complexity of the problem I felt it particularly desirable to have a thoroughgoing inquiry by the tariff board before recommending any action. The exhaustive examination which the board has undertaken is not yet completed, but the board is of the opinion that there are certain special and pressing difficulties which should be dealt with at this time. Consequently the board has submitted an interim report in which it recommends the insertion of certain items into the tariff prior to submission of its full conclusions covering the whole of the synthetic resins and plastics field. I have included these recommendations in the changes which I am proposing in the budget resolutions. The board's recommendations are designed to achieve up-to-date provisions respecting both classification and rates. The rates recommended involve some increases and some decreases in existing rates of duty. The reasons which led the board to recommend these readjustments are fully set out in its interim report which I am tabling with the budget resolutions.

The other tariff proposals include changes which would widen the application of certain items pertaining to farm equipment. They would provide for the free entry of such things as grain or hay driers, individual sprinkler irrigation systems and several items of dairy equipment when for use on the farm. Most of these were recommended to the government in the brief submitted by the federation of agriculture. The free entry of these items would be of considerable assistance to our farmers and is in accord with the government's policy, stated by my predecessor, Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley in his budget speech of 1944, regarding the free entry of farm implements and machinery.

In respect of the fishing industry two changes are proposed. One would permit the free entry of diesel engines for installation in boats used exclusively for commercial fishing operations and the other would widen the provision for free entry of nets and lines to include nets and lines made of any material. Both my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, and I have received many representations that these changes would be of significant assistance to the fishing industry. In view of the heavy dependence of the industry upon export markets it is in the general interest to reduce, wherever practical, tariff barriers which add to costs.

The changes proposed in the customs tariff affecting equipment used in the mining industry would widen the existing provisions to permit the entry of unfinished parts of the equipment specified, at the same reduced rates as are now granted to the fully finished parts. In a number of cases the provisions would be extended to cover additional items of equipment used in mining operations.

An amendment is proposed to the tariff item dealing with settlers' effects. A number of countries from which we seek to obtain immigrants find it necessary, owing to the shortage of exchange, to apply restrictions on the transfer of emigrants' capital. These restrictions have operated as a deterrent to the movement of desirable immigrants into Canada. The new subsection which I am proposing to add would, in these cases, permit the free entry of settlers' effects during a period of three years from the time of the settler's first arrival. This would enable the settler to use his frozen capital to purchase and bring in from his country of origin such things as household effects, wearing apparel, tools of trade and agricultural equipment, after the settler has been here and has had an opportunity to decide what he and his family need most urgently. This new provision should make it possible for many desirable immigrants to establish themselves more rapidly in productive activity in this country.

Finally, I am proposing an amendment to tariff item 708. This would remove obsolete language and would enable the government to carry out reciprocal customs arrangements regarding certain matters with other signatories of the North Atlantic treaty. These would apply to supplies for defence establishments located in one another's territory in accordance with jointly agreed plans for our common defence.

The net effect of all these tariff changes on the total of all customs revenues will not be significant.

I think it will be convenient to hon. members if I insert at this point a table summarizing the revenue effect of all these tax changes.

Effect on Revenue of Proposed Tax Changes

	In Fiscal Year 1951-52	In a Full Year
	$ (millions)	$
Personal income tax
20 per cent surtax	85·0	158·0

Increase in tobacco tax	14·0	17·0
Repeal of tax on cigarette papers	–6·0	–8·0
Net increase	8·0	9·0

It will be noted that in a full year I expect to get an additional $185 million from corporation taxes, $158 million from personal income taxes and $235 million from commodity taxes. In this fiscal year, largely because of the three-month lag in income taxes, I expect to get $126 million from corporations, $85 million from personal income tax and $194 million from commodity taxes.

As usual at this point I should like to insert another table showing a revised estimate of total revenues for 1951-52 after giving effect to the proposed tax changes.

Revised Forecast of Revenue for Fiscal Year 1951-52 Taking Account of Tax Changes

	Forecast of revenue from existing taxes	Increase in revenue in fiscal year 1951-52 from budget proposals	Revised forecast of revenue for 1951-52

Special receipts	50·0	....	50·0
Total receipts	3,325·0	405·0	3,730·0

This table shows estimated revenues at $3,730 million. Earlier in my speech I forecast our total expenditures at $3,700 million. I am therefore budgeting for a surplus of $30 million.

[Mr. Abbott.]

I should repeat, Mr. Speaker, that all these estimates assume a high level of employment throughout the country, at least average agricultural crops, and a basic price level not very much higher than that which now prevails.

These then are the proposals which we recommend to the house in order to meet our financial requirements. None of us can tell what the future has in store. The taxes we have proposed should yield total revenues of about $3,900 million in a full year. It would be too bold to hope that conditions a year hence will permit any reductions in these rates of tax. There can be some hope, but certainly no assurance, that tax rates next year may not have to go higher.

It is an inexorable rule of life that we can never really get something for nothing. Nothing is really free. Everything worth while has its costs. Tonight is the annual occasion when we count up the cost of our policies in terms of money. That cost is high, but failure to achieve our objectives of peace, security and financial integrity would involve infinitely greater and more painful cost.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to table the various resolutions which I shall move when the house is in committee.

INCOME TAX ACT

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, amongst other things:

1. That, in respect of income earned after the commencement of the 1951 calendar year, a corporation shall pay a defence surtax for the year equal to 20 per cent of that portion of its ordinary income tax for the year that is computed at the 38 per cent rate, or the 33 per cent rate if applicable, (before allowance is made for tax credits) subject to a right to a refund of such tax to the extent that it would reduce the corporation's taxable income after payment of ordinary income tax to an amount less than 5 per cent of its capital employed.

2. That an individual shall pay a defence surtax equal to

(a) for the 1951 taxation year, 10 per cent and

(b) for each subsequent taxation year, 20 per cent of his ordinary income tax (including investment surtax) for the year before allowance is made for tax credits.

3. That, for the purpose of computing income from an office or employment for the 1951 or a subsequent taxation year, there may be deducted certain amounts paid in respect of

(a) travelling expenses that the officer or employee was required by the contract of employment to incur,

(b) professional membership dues where the officer or employee was required by the contract of employment to maintain his professional status,

(c) office rent or salary to an assistant or substitute required by the contract of employment to be paid by the officer or employee,

(d) supplies consumed directly in the course of the employment for which the officer or employee was required by the contract of employment to pay, or

(e) Union dues.

4. That the governor in council be authorized to make regulations under which the income tax of members of the armed forces on their service income will be paid in full in respect of the pay and allowances of each pay period by a deduction therefrom in accordance with a special table subject to the right of any member to file a return on an annual basis.

5. That the right to elect to pay the 15 per cent tax on its undistributed income now enjoyed by a private company

(a) be extended to all other corporations, and

(b) be withdrawn, effective April 10, 1951, from a corporation that is controlled by another corporation except in respect of its undistributed income on hand at the end of the 1949 taxation year.

6. That for the 1951 and subsequent taxation years the provision under which the 15 per cent tax rate on the first $10,000 of income of a corporation applies to only one of several related corporations be amended so as not to include in the class of related corporations those controlled by persons not dealing at arms length unless such persons own shares in the capital stock of both corporations.

7. That for the 1951 and subsequent taxation years, payments made for insulin, cortisone, adrenocorticotrophin (ACTH), liver extract injectible for pernicious anaemia and vitamin B12 for pernicious anaemia purchased under a physician's prescription may be included in the medical expenses for which a deduction from income may be made for the purpose of computing taxable income.

8. That special deductions from income to taxpayers whose principal business is the production, refining or marketing of petroleum or petroleum products or the exploring or drilling for oil or natural gas or mining or exploring for minerals, be allowed for expenses incurred in the 1954 operations on the same basis as for expenses incurred in the operations in the years 1951 to 1953.

9. That special deductions from income and taxes to taxpayers whose principal business is production, refining or marketing of petroleum or drilling for petroleum be allowed for expenses incurred in respect of deep-test oil wells in 1952 operations on the same basis as for similar expenses in 1950 and 1951 operations.

10. That the exemption of the income from a metalliferous or industrial mineral mine for the first three years of production now applicable to mines that came into production during the years 1946 to 1952 be extended to mines coming into production in the years 1953 and 1954.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide:

1. That the rate of the general sales tax be increased from eight to ten per cent and that the rate of sales tax on those articles at present subject to four per cent be increased to five per cent.

2. That the excise tax on goods mentioned in schedule I of the act, and on furs, that are at present subject to the rate of fifteen per cent be increased to twenty-five per cent.

3. That the excise tax on candy, chocolate, chewing gum and confectionery that may be classed as candy or a substitute for candy, be reduced from thirty to fifteen per cent.

4. That there be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of fifteen per cent on the following goods when adapted to household or apartment use:

(a) stoves, hot plates, grills and other appliances when adapted wholly or in part for cooking and when designed for using other than solid fuels;

(b) washing machines operated by electric or other power;

(c) electric, gas or kerosene refrigerators and freezing equipment and complete parts therefor including coils, condensing or compressor units, motors, cabinets, boxes, evaporators and expansion valves.

5. That the excise tax on cigarette papers and cigarette paper tubes be repealed.

6. That the excise tax on the following goods be increased by the amounts shown:

(a) for each five cigarettes or fraction of five cigarettes contained in any package..... three-quarters of one cent;

(b) for each ounce or fraction of an ounce of manufactured tobacco, including snuff but not including cigars and cigarettes, contained in any package.....three cents;

(c) for each ounce or fraction of an ounce of Canadian raw leaf tobacco when sold for consumption in Canada.....three-quarters of one cent.

7. That the sales tax on the following goods be repealed:—

(a) cortisone;

(b) adrenocorticotrophin (ACTH).

8. That any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to have come into force on the eleventh day of April nineteen hundred and fifty-one.

(See also Budget Papers, pages 1837 to 1910.)

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the minister must be pleased and perhaps a trifle surprised to find how popular his new taxes are; and perhaps it is just as well that he did not get the applause before he made his speech or he might have made them even higher. Whatever our differences with the minister are, I am sure I can say that we all recognize the heavy burden which he carries and that we appreciate the manner in which he discharges his heavy duties.

I do not propose tonight to enter into the details of the taxes which the minister has propounded. These can be gone into as we continue this debate. There are not many surprises, after all. The known taxes are there, and there are not many places for him to go when he wants substantial amounts of money.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, when the minister was speaking of millions and tens of millions of dollars, I was thinking most of the time of the people to whom millions and tens of millions are rather meaningless and whose financial calculations are limited to figuring whether or not they are going to be able to get by this week with prices as they stand now. We know how many of these people there are among us; and not all the glowing figures we have, showing the wonderful progress that we have made, alter the fact that we have among us tens of thousands of people to whom these figures mean nothing. Indeed, it is a bitter irony that we are not able to manage our affairs well enough so that these people can be relieved of the necessitous situation in which they find themselves.

Having said this, I would say to the minister that it is a great disappointment to find that there is no indication tonight—none so far as I can see—that the minister is prepared to consider further measures to deal with this situation. Notwithstanding the fact that apparently we are the only civilized country, if we can call it that, which is not trying to deal with this matter, he goes on persisting in a blank negation. I confess that after what the minister told us the other day I had hoped—although he did not, I must admit, put it in so many words—that we should have something different from this blank negation.

But I must admit the minister was surprisingly optimistic. He found a satisfaction which I am not able to share in various aspects of what he had to bring forward. He compared us with other countries and admonished us that we should be extremely thankful to be as well off as we are. My answer to that is this. What other country has the natural advantages that we have? What other country has it in its power to manage its affairs so that these hardships—which undoubtedly exist here—need not exist and should be done away with.

Then the minister went on to tell us as to what the government had done. First of all, they balanced the budget. I appreciate the balancing of the budget; but of course when the minister takes nearly $4 billion of our money, it is quite easy to balance the budget. I suppose if he had taken $500 million more, we would have had a $500 million larger surplus. When the minister takes satisfaction out of the great buoyancy of revenue, I must say that to me there is a certain amount of irony in that. I do not think he gave us the figures to show how much of that buoyancy was caused wholly by high prices. I think he mentioned high prices—

Mr. Abbott: About half.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It would be a very substantial amount indeed, and there is precious little happiness to be got out of that realization. The minister told us about the economies, and all I wish to do on that score is to read a short extract from the Winnipeg Free Press which, I understand, is not usually regarded as particularly hostile to the government.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Just certain sections of it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What the Winnipeg Free Press of March 16 last said is this:

> The federal government's estimate of expenditure in the next fiscal year shows clearly that economy as a weapon against inflation has failed. The government has sharply reduced its expenditures in various departments, but these savings are almost entirely counterbalanced by increases elsewhere.

Then they mention the $35 million and say that in a non-defence budget of $1,922 million that is not big enough to be any good.

Then the minister mentioned consumer credit, and I will deal with that subject briefly. We passed legislation here last September. Having tried our best to create the impression in the minds of the government that there was a real emergency, we passed legislation with regard to consumer credit. The minister tells us, and correctly, that certain restrictive measures were put into effect in November and that more restrictive measures were put into effect in March of this year. But those put into effect last November were just a token. You might as well have waved a wand, for all the effect they had. I will say that those in March were better. But up to the present—and I wish to make this point, Mr. Speaker—none of these measures has had really any substantial effect at all.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Then we come to what the minister calls exercising influence on credit. Actually, I would remind the minister that the Bank of Canada was established for the purpose of regulating credit and currency, and I do not think anyone who knows the relationship between the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks doubts for one moment that when the Bank of Canada speaks the chartered banks listen.

Now, what is the situation with regard to our monetary policy? In a word, Mr. Speaker, I would remind you that for years, and in spite of all that could be said from this side of the house, we have had what is called an easy money policy. It was devised in 1945 when depression was expected, and it was used all through the successive years in spite of the fact that we were in a boom. The Winnipeg Free Press, if I may quote that friendly organ again, calls it the big blunder. Last September we urged—and the minister seemed to indicate he was going to take it seriously—that there should be a real attempt to curb credit. What was the result? What happened after that? During the autumn months, from September to November, there were $400 million of new bank loans. Approximately we created $400 million in addition to what there had been before. In other words, Mr. Speaker, this new money comes into competition with the wages, salaries and other earnings of the people of Canada and helps to sky-high the prices.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Graydon: Get those high cost of living people out of the back.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to ask this question, Mr. Speaker. What hope have we had held out tonight? My answer is that so far as dealing with these high prices is concerned we have had nothing but a blank negation. I repeat what I said a moment ago. Apparently we are alone in this. All other nations are prepared to act, and we are not prepared to act. We have to wait and see. We have to hope that something will turn up.

Let me make clear, Mr. Speaker, that I am not asking for rabbits out of a hat, I am not asking for a rigid system of over-all controls. What I am asking for is something flexible, something sensible. I want to say that the most responsible and reputable authorities do agree that in these emergent days emergent measures may be taken. I refer to such well known organs as the London Economist and to a well known American economist called Slichter, and to a very responsible and conservative organ produced each month by the National City Bank. All of these speak of measures which may be taken temporarily and in an emergency, such as most of us in this house, most of us at any rate in this party, believe in, and I think if they could vote freely most of the people in this house have the same feeling.

In conclusion I wish, so far as my voice can carry, to let the people of Canada know that this emergency has been created in substantial measure by government neglects and defaults. I repudiate entirely the idea that this has just happened, that it is just a phenomenon, to use the word that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) used the other day, a sort of act of God; that we have nothing to do with it. I repudiate that entirely. But I go on to say that in spite of these mistakes and neglects the government have the temerity to return a virtual negative to everything that we can ask.

The government is always telling us of their great majority, but I would venture to ask them: In the light of what is happening now, how long do they think they can turn their backs on the people and still say that they have the people at their backs?

On motion of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood) the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

COST OF LIVING—AMENDMENT, MR. DREW

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): I have no desire to detain the house very long this evening after the very masterly budget that we have heard presented by the Minister of Finance. However, I do want to deal very briefly with two or three points which have arisen, or which have presented themselves to my mind during this debate on the amendment of the leader of the opposition.

The question that is raised by this amendment, Mr. Speaker, is a very difficult one to deal with briefly, and I will not presume even to attempt to deal with it, but I have one or two observations that I feel should be made.

I think this debate exemplifies something that the Minister of Finance said in delivering his budget, namely, that there are no great divisions of fundamental policy in Canada on questions of this kind. I think it is clear that we are all agreed on the seriousness of the threat of inflation, and the necessity of having taken effective action to meet it.

The differences between us, Mr. Speaker, are purely on the details of how this problem should be met and what action should be taken to meet the rising cost of living, which is one of the symptoms of inflation. It has been said by a number of speakers that the people of Canada are disturbed by the effect upon their living of the rising cost of almost everything that Canadians have to buy. I think it is true. I know it is true that the Canadian people are disturbed about this and other effects of inflation.

While I was home during the Easter recess I discussed this problem with a number of people. In one particular instance, representatives of the railway brotherhood waited upon me to express to me the views of their membership. They expressed to me their belief that the government should institute price and rental control, and they asked me to place their views on this question before parliament, which I am doing this evening. I found myself unable to agree with the opinion expressed by that delegation, and I tried as best I could to explain to them the reason for which I held somewhat different views, and the reasons why I had a different idea of the proper approach to this problem.

Many of these reasons have been dealt with in the speeches of members who have preceded me in this debate. I do not propose to go over the ground that has already been thoroughly covered. I should like to state briefly some of the reasons why I believe that the decisions taken so far by the government on these questions have been a correct policy for this country to follow.

First, in my view price or rental controls are only one part of the attack on inflation, and they are a part of that attack which cannot stand alone. Our friends in the C.C.F. used to tell us a great deal about the controls and the wonderful experiences they were having in England with the maintenance of controls. We do not hear so much about the English experience these days. This afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) questioned a statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that at the present time the inflationary trends in Great Britain were stronger than they were in Canada. Perhaps a year or so ago the hon. member would have questioned that statement most violently, but today he contented himself with questioning its absolute accuracy and tried to leave the impression that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had somewhat exaggerated the inflation being experienced in England.

However that may be, I think the English experience not only proves that price control alone will not contain inflation but it proves that a rigid over-all system of controls on prices, on rents, on wages, on manpower and the whole panoply of direct controls cannot indefinitely answer this problem. While under this system the English people for the past few years have been protected to some extent from paying the price of inflation through a rising cost of living, all that time they have been paying that price through the creeping paralysis of austerity and now a situation has developed where even these controls will not keep the cost of living down and in addition they are going to have to pay the price in a rising cost of living.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the hon. member the same question he asked the hon. member for Vancouver East? The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the cost of retail prices had gone up 15 per cent in Canada and about 21 or 23 per cent in the United Kingdom, but that the cost of living index had not gone up very much in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Gibson: It costs more to live over there than it does here.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): You do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. Gibson: Certainly I do.

Mr. Dickey: The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) has a strange idea of what is a question, but that is exactly the point I raised with the hon. member for Vancouver East. The point is that if the over-all index of retail prices as opposed to the cost of living has gone up 23 per cent in Great Britain it is simply because the rises so far have been in items that are not heavily weighted in the cost of living index. When these rises in prices become effective in items that are heavily weighted in the cost of living index then the inflationary pressures which are at work will become apparent in the index. The only thing that differentiates the British situation from ours is the fact that these effects have not become apparent in the cost of living index, but they will.

The headline in the Ottawa Journal today reads:

> Britons get "Black Budget"
> Hardly a person escapes tougher austerity orders.

That indicates the situation which the British public unfortunately faces at the present time. They have been paying the price of inflation in austerity and are now beginning to pay it as well in a rising cost of living.

The second point I should like to outline briefly is the obvious inability of Canada or any other country to deal with extraordinary advances in the cost of basic imports coming from other countries. This is an element in the cost of living which we cannot possibly control with price or any other control within the country.

Third, I do not believe that the Canadian people should be called upon to accept or are ready to accept over-all controls that would be required if we are to embark immediately upon a system of price and other controls. With price control we would have to foresee the inevitability, either immediately or within a short time, of wage and salary controls. With wage and salary controls being applied we would have to foresee almost immediately some form of selective service. When we get to that stage, or perhaps even before, we would have to foresee some form of widespread allocation of materials and the imposition of severe export controls as well. In the background of the whole picture is the question of substantial subsidies, either at the manufacturing or at the consumer level.

I think that anyone in this house who advocates the imposition of price or any other control of a general nature must be prepared to take the responsibility of stating that he believes that we should consider an economic procedure of taking gradually, or perhaps in a short space of time, all these controls into the Canadian economy. I was struck by one paragraph in the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), who moved this amendment the other day. At page 1736 of Hansard of April 9 he is reported as saying:

> The government has contended that no nation in the world did a better job of price and other controls than Canada did during the last war.

I do not think the hon. gentleman will find anyone who will dispute the truth of that statement. He then went on to say:

> In that effort they were assisted by very able economists. The experience of those men and women is available today. The government can take advantage of that experience and with the knowledge they possess, knowledge we do not possess as to what controls they are going to impose on production and supply, they can design price and other controls appropriate to meet the situation which will result from their action at the production and supply level.

I presume that those are the same gentlemen who were characterized a year or eighteen months ago as being Marxists and dangerous to the Canadian nation. The fact is, as was pointed out last evening by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the government is doing exactly what the leader of the opposition urged them to do in the paragraph I have quoted. The experience is that all these gentlemen who are referred to as having assisted and advised the government in the operation of the control procedures of the last war are advising the government unanimously that in the present circumstances such controls simply will not work. On that basis I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the government is taking very good advice from these gentlemen, and is doing exactly what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has suggested that they should do.

I should simply like to say that I regard the amendment as an invitation to the house to register a false decision that we do not have confidence in the present government, and the basis for that false decision would be that our lack of confidence arises out of the government's refusal to embark on the kind of direct controls being advocated by the hon. gentleman opposite. My opinion is that the government is being well advised, is being wise, and, because of the anti-inflationary policies which it is following and will continue to follow, far from deserving a vote from us expressing lack of confidence it deserves our faith, wholehearted confidence and support.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the last paragraph of his speech the last speaker actually said all that I intended to say tonight. I really wanted to explain why I could not possibly vote for the amendment. In the first place it is a motion of lack of confidence. Is there anyone else in this house in whom anybody could hope to have confidence to replace the government now in authority? Naturally I have to vote against the amendment. Personally I think that controls are inevitable sooner or later but I do not want controls that, when put into effect, will start at the level of the farmers as they did last time. I think the finest education for anyone who is going to institute controls, or who is going to have anything to do with their operation, would be to spend a month on a dairy farm as an active worker, not merely as an onlooker like so many of those in high places who tell us that they were brought up on a dairy farm and took good care to get out when they were young.

A neighbour of mine with a very important position has a nineteen year old son who worked in the lumber business for six months and then was promoted. He gets $15 a day. Of course I am speaking of the province of British Columbia where we pay proper wages, not some of the more backward provinces. This boy receives $15 a day for an eight hour day. His father, who holds a very responsible position corresponding almost to that of a deputy minister at Ottawa, gets $250 a month, and no travelling expenses. His uncle across the road, with a $25,000 investment, milks cows 365 days a year and makes $12 a day. That is one reason why I do not think we are ready for controls yet. I am too much afraid that they will be put on at the farmers level.

There can be no question that the cost of living has gone up. We had an example of it tonight. I was more fortunate than some, as you can see. I borrowed $10 from the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) and bought every cigarette I could possibly lay my hands on, after the new tax was announced. I had no compunction in doing that. I am not a hoarder but I did that tonight. I want to express the opinion that I think it is utter—I cannot use the language I should like to, and I am not ashamed to say that I have used a little of it in my time—nonsense not to tax alcohol and to tax cigarettes. I do not think that meets with the approval of even ten per cent of the people of Canada. I will have more to say about that at the right time and will make many forty-minute speeches when the resolutions are before the house. That is one thing that I should like to impress on the government to the best of my ability.

As I said, I will certainly vote against the amendment because it is a straight vote of confidence in the government, and I have every confidence that the government will work out a solution. I think they are a bit backward so far as the people I particularly want to deal with tonight are concerned, the burnt-out veterans and those on soldiers pensions. I do not know just how it is possible to expedite the matter but I would suggest a bonus. It has been pointed out to me that we are providing a 20 per cent pay increase for judges. I listened the other night to a discussion about a subsidy to take useless gold out of the ground. I have not heard anything about a subsidy for the man who is milking cows 365 days of the year. I have a local paper here that concerns the people of my community, and there is a headline reading, "Low Bond Quote Jeopardizes District School Building Plans." The school bonds had to be sold at 92·75, and it is one of the wealthiest municipalities in the province of British Columbia. The municipality of Burnaby—I venture this statement—is one of the largest in population and assessment in the Dominion of Canada, and they could not get an offer on their school bonds at all. That is a pretty serious state of affairs.

Cost of Living

I want to emphasize that if controls are instituted—and personally I think that eventually they will be in some form or other—they must not be put into effect at the producers level. We hear all sorts of talk about milk when it goes up a cent. I did not hear anybody in the house, and very few outside, complain when beer went up four cents, or whatever it did go up, but as soon as milk goes up we hear about it. I have heard members of the house with incomes of over $25,000 a year complaining about the price of butter, but they would not know which end or which side of a cow to start milking, let alone do it for 365 days in a year.

An hon. Member: Which side is it?

Mr. Cruickshank: I can tell you because I am a practical farmer and not a graduate of a university of agriculture. That will hold you.

An hon. Member: Not for long.

Mr. Cruickshank: We have set up a veterans affairs committee, and I understand that I am a member of it. I hope that the first thing they will take up will be the question of finding some means or other of urging upon the government the plight of these veterans. I know that every member of the government and of the house, including the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), is just as sympathetic to the veterans as I am. I think every member wants to see that no one suffers but anyone who has travelled around Canada at all—I was going to use the words "lower level" but that is not correct—and visited the ordinary rank and file in the dominion knows that there is suffering at the present time. He must know and appreciate that there is tremendous suffering amongst those on fixed incomes, particularly those on old age pensions, veterans pensions or any other kind of pension.

Naturally I am particularly interested in veterans pensions because I am closely associated with the veterans. There are veterans widows suffering from arthritis who are receiving the magnificent sum of $40 a month on which they are expected to live. As I see it, that is not good enough. I do not care what steps the government takes to bring justice to these people. That is a matter for some of the experts and economic authorities who abound in Ottawa. The only things we have more of in Ottawa than economic authorities are the lobbyists at the Chateau Laurier. I hope the government will take steps very soon so far as those on pensions and other fixed incomes are concerned. I should like to urge upon the government strongly that, if and when controls are instituted, they should not be based on the producer level entirely as they were the last time, remembering at all times that the farmer is not only a producer but a consumer as well.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, coming from a part of the country which feels the effects of rising prices more than any other, where we rely on imports for such a large proportion of our food and clothing, I feel that I must take part in this debate and support the amendment which has been proposed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I believe that amendment is supported also by the great majority of the people of this country today.

What we have heard from the members and supporters of the government are technical objections rather than arguments in principle against the imposition of controls to prevent prices rising. I do not believe any question is agitating the minds of the people of this country at the present time so much as the rise in the cost of living. Other hon. members have referred to various groups who are affected. Let us begin with the civil servants, the people working for the government, the very people upon whom they depend to carry out this magnificent program we have heard about. What do they think about the cost of living? Here is an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of April 5 under the heading, "Civil service asks further raise or living cost bonus. Swiftly rising tide of prices alarms government staff". It says:

> Mr. Whitehouse stressed that the main reason for the soaring of the index was due to marked increases in the price of food. The public service had recently received a salary revision but the increases are still 10 per cent behind living costs. The increases covered costs as of last September, he said. There are indications they are not going to stop unless controls are clamped on immediately.

That is the view of the people working for the government, a large class of people in this country. I do not know whom the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) was referring to when he said the government was depending upon the experts who carried out the price control policy during the last war. That must be a very select few at the top, not the great majority of civil servants.

Then take the next class of people who have been referred to, the civil service pensioners. How do they feel about the effect of rising costs of living? Only the other day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) told the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that he was tired answering this point. He did not bother going into details at the time, but he told me afterwards that the civil servant buys his pension, and if he does not buy enough pension that is his own lookout and nothing can be done for him. When the cost of living goes up 15 or 16 points in a year the civil service pensioner who gets $50 or $100 a month finds that the value of his pension has decreased appreciably, and he and his wife are under stress and anxiety while the government appears to be cynical about it.

Take another group of persons, the old age pensioners, who prior to the election of 1949 were promised $40 a month. How much has the cost of living gone up since 1949, and how much is that $40 worth today? The cost of food, which is a major item, was estimated at 203 in 1949. It is now estimated at 220, an increase of 17 points. The cost of living in 1949 was 160. Now it is almost 180, an increase of 20 points. In other words money has depreciated by 14 per cent in that time. A great many persons who have become entitled to pensions within the last five or ten years are terribly affected by the rise in the cost of living since 1945, when we began to remove the controls. There are also the veterans and people living on fixed incomes, such as widows and orphans, and people who get their income from government bonds. All these people are affected; so are the workers and the farmers. Only today we had a delegation here interviewing the government asking that price controls be put on. I think I can speak for the fishermen who had to take at least 50 per cent less for their catch last fall. How can anyone expect them to make a living with rising costs? It would also be interesting to point out that the value of the indemnity paid members of parliament has declined by about 12 per cent. We would need $4,750 to equal what the member of parliament received two years ago. But the judges are being given special consideration.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Are you in favour of an increase in the indemnity?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am sure the minister has much more influence than I have and he should see that justice is done. I see it is going to be done to the judges. There is a resolution on the order paper in the name of the Minister of Justice to increase the salaries of judges, to increase the number of judges and to provide certain adjustments as to the pensions of judges and widows of judges. I wonder if that is to make allowance for the increase in the cost of living. If it is, we shall hear more about it when that matter is debated, because they are not the only people affected, and they are better able to bear it than the classes I have referred to.

This attitude on the part of the government reminds me of the attitude of the commission government in Newfoundland during the war. As president of the civil service association I had occasion to head many a delegation to interview that government asking for either price controls or a cost of living bonus for the civil service. On each occasion we were told, "Oh, it is impossible for us to put on controls. We have to import so much of our goods; we depend on outside sources, and we cannot do anything about it." But what happened? After the cost of living had gone up about 60 points they put on controls, and then they started talking about a cost of living bonus. It seems to me that is what this government is doing now. It is ashamed to admit that it is last in the field, that the opposition has brought up this matter which is so vital to the great majority of the people of this country. The government do not want to admit they have been wrong.

I can appreciate that there are certain difficulties about introducing controls, and that the government is reluctant to set up elaborate machinery such as we had during the last war. Despite the success of the control policy and the reputation the Canadian government gained through its operation from 1941 to 1945, last evening the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said he had not met anyone who had administrative experience in controls during the last war who was in favour of putting on the same type of controls again. Everyone who speaks of this talks about the same type of controls, and no one explains what he means by it. We have to control prices; the people who have had experience with rising prices are very anxious to see them stop soaring, and we have all met people like that. The government is well aware of the inflation that exists at the present time. During the past day or so the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) wrote a letter to the Ottawa branch of the Canadian consumers' association, which appeared in the Citizen of this morning. In it he said:

> As you are aware, the government has attempted to mitigate inflationary pressures by attacking the problem at its roots.

Today we heard a very interesting lecture by one Hans Selye, a Czech doctor, who told us there were two kinds of treatment practised by doctors. One was the causative treatment, getting at the roots and eradicating the disease, like cutting out a cancer. The other one was the symptomatic treatment to relieve the symptoms. The symptom we want relieved at the present time is the increase in prices. The government does not have to solve all the economic problems, but can stop the rise in the price of necessities which the people of this country are facing today. The public is clamouring for these controls. What if the public is right and the government is wrong? What if the opposition is right and the government is wrong?

There are certain people, sir, who are protected by the fact that in making agreements they have taken the precaution of having an escalator clause inserted, which is attached to the cost of living index. From the Ottawa Journal I have an item which states that the people working for the municipality of Ottawa will get a monthly cost of living bonus of about $10,000, because in the agreement they made with the city of Ottawa there was a provision that when the cost of living went up they were to be recompensed. The 1,400 employees will be paid, but the Ottawa firemen who recently signed a similar cost of living bonus agreement will not benefit from the most recent jump in the index. The firemen's bonus does not become effective until the April cost of living figure. The Ottawa municipal service association members will be paid 35 cents per head per week for every point increase in the index since June, 1950. That amounts to about 13 points, and multiplied by 35 cents it equals $4.50 per week for each one of those 1,400 employees. The article reads:

> Finance commissioner Gordon told city council at the last meeting the city would have to pay bonuses amounting to $260,000 on point increases to the end of January, 1951.

It can be seen from that there are certain people who will not be affected to the same extent as those who have no protection. The government seems to be indifferent to those who have no protection.

Tonight, sir, we heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) deliver his budget. Anyone who heard him must be filled with admiration for this remarkable country that has such enormous wealth, and has such a capacity to meet tremendous expenditures of the kind indicated here this evening; a budget of nearly $4 billion expenditure can be met by the imposition of an extra billion dollars in taxes during the coming year. I think it is a marvellous feat for the Minister of Finance to attempt, but for him to say at the same time that this will not result in an increase in the cost of living is palpably absurd. Those people who are going to have increased corporation taxes are going to raise their profits. It has been stated here that the profits of companies during the past year have risen. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion they have risen out of all bounds.

Anyone who looks at the Financial Times report on companies operating in this country, a special edition of which was issued a short time ago, will see that the value of stocks went up and profits went up. Some of the companies made very many millions in profits, and had hundreds of millions of dollars increase in the valuation of their shares during the past year. Is the government indifferent to the remarkable amount of money that these companies have made during the past year? From the statement of the Minister of Finance it seems that they are indifferent. Certainly, they are more friendly disposed towards corporations than they are towards that class of person who is dependent upon government action to help him achieve a decent standard of living. I cannot see anything in the budget that is going to reduce the cost of living. I cannot see anything in it except what will increase the cost of living. The minister mentioned a few things he was doing, but most of them are already in effect and they are not doing what he expected they would do. Last September he introduced measures that he thought were going to put down inflation. A month ago he introduced a measure to control credit. These measures have produced no results up to now, and I doubt very much whether they are going to show any results. I do not see anything that he has mentioned here tonight that is going to reduce the cost of living. The things in which the majority of the people in this country are interested are food, clothing and rent. I see nothing in the budget that is going to bring down the cost of those items.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) recommended that we avoid panic buying. I cannot imagine that the old age pensioners or the veterans or the civil servants —I do not know what they are like in this part of the continent but I know that in Newfoundland most of them were in debt nearly all their lives because salaries could never catch up with the cost of living—are going to engage in panic buying. There may be certain classes of people who will do so. Anyone who analyses the income tax reports will see that it is a comparatively small proportion of the population who have incomes of over $5,000 a year, and that is the class to whom the minister was referring.

We know that one of the causes of the increased cost of living is the decline in farm production. People are leaving the farms and going to the factories. I do not know what the government can do to encourage people to work on farms, but there is no doubt that we need to have more food produced if we want to have a sounder economy. It seems to me that the government is altogether too complacent about this situation. They are talking in a technical language which is over the heads of the people. The people cannot understand what they are talking about. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), generally so genial, seems to be unperturbed about this situation.

There are two kinds of inflation. There is the open inflation that we are watching, and there is inflation that might take place if you have controls such as they now have in the United States. Mr. Donald Gordon, who was the head of the price control system during the war, says it is better to have control than inflation. I submit, Mr. Speaker, it is better. I cannot understand the hesitancy of the government, in the face of the critical conditions under which a large proportion of the people are living. Why are they so indifferent? I appeal to them not to be worried about losing face because they have to accept an amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). Let the government remember that the amendment is supported by the majority of the people of this country. If we had a secret ballot in this chamber tonight, I believe that the majority of the hon. members supporting the government would vote in favour of that amendment because they know that every class of person, farmer, fisherman and workers of all kinds, is in favour of controls to curb the rising cost of living.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, like most of the hon. members of this house I have been overwhelmed by my constituents requesting me to take part in this debate and place before you some of the problems with which they are faced. I agree with the previous speaker that the amendment now before us offers a solution to the spiralling cost of living. Those of my constituents who have taken the trouble to write are pressing for some form of price control or any other formula the government might possess that will effectively curb the rising cost of living.

I am not going to repeat the arguments made during the last three years on this subject. I merely point out to the government that the representations that have been made in this house on this subject during the last three years have produced several excellent suggestions which, if put into operation, would effectively curb rising costs. I believe that applies to this debate as well. The major suggestions are as applicable today as they were when made. I am going to take a little time this evening to place on the record the plight of a large group of Canadian citizens—and I say Canadian citizens—who have contributed as much as anyone to the growth and progress of our dominion over the past thirty years. I refer to those men who served in the imperial forces and who are now receiving imperial pensions. These pensions, while generous in Great Britain for the pensioners residing there, are not so generous when transferred to Canada and exchanged for Canadian dollars, especially with our high cost of living and the loss in exchange. On their behalf I should like to outline briefly what a veteran of the imperial forces living in Canada gets in the form of pension. I will give it to you in shillings or in dollars, but probably best in dollars.

A 100 per cent pensioner—that is, a totally disabled pensioner—gets a basic pension of $27.30 per month or 45 shillings a week, an allowance for his wife of $6.07, or a total for a married couple of $33.37. If he has children, there is an allowance for three children of $13.68 a month, making a total for husband, wife and three children of $47.05. That is the allowance that that family is expected to live on because he is a 100 per cent pensioner and presumably unable to carry on any employment. But on a protest being made to the British government, this condition was taken care of to a certain extent and I now find that the pensioner can have an additional sum of $21.84 if he is totally unemployable, and that includes a supplement for his wife as well. In other words, the total for a 100 per cent pensioner—that is, a private—unemployable, with three children, would be $68.89. One other thing that is now granted is a clothing allowance of $1.17 to $1.87 per month per family. On top of that the British government have certain discretionary powers to grant scholarships to children up to an amount not exceeding £80 per annum.

These men came out in good faith, feeling that the bonds that tied us to the commonwealth were strong enough to influence our economic ties as well, at least in relation to our pound and dollar exchange in payment for any pension or allowance that could be made to them. These veterans in many cases came to Canada when the pound was worth $4.86. These same veterans are now in an extremely sorry plight, with the pound hovering around $2.90. Not only has the pound been devalued in relation to the Canadian dollar, but the value of the Canadian dollar itself, when purchased with the pound, has already been cut almost in half. It is worth approximately sixty cents, and that is owing to the rising cost of living. Many of these veterans are really suffering today. Some of them with a little capital are pulling up stakes and leaving this country for a soft currency country in order to be able to live on their pound pension. I refer to some of these veterans, and I could give you their names, who have been good citizens of Canada for from ten to thirty years; and only by their having served in the imperial forces during the war do they differ from any other Canadians. They have contributed as much as any other Canadian to build up this country in those ten to thirty years. If, as has been indicated so far, government action is not to take place beyond what has been suggested by the budget to curb the rising cost of living, which curbing would give these men a reasonable hope that the worst is over, that hope has been denied them tonight.

I suggest that, failing direct action of price control, the government should seriously consider making up to these men the difference between the pound and the dollar, by fixing a higher rate of exchange for the pound paid in the form of imperial pensions. I do not mean to have that procedure apply to every small pension that is paid but rather to those who are in receipt of, I would suggest, a pension of 60 per cent to 100 per cent or are totally disabled. Many of these people could qualify for the old age pension, but the government does not have to pay it because they are getting a British pension. They could quite easily qualify for the old age pension in Canada if they did not receive this pension. I therefore do not see that the government would lose a great deal by subsidizing them or making up the difference in exchange in order to give these people a self-supporting pension that would keep them off public relief or from applying for the old age pension.

The same pressing argument could be advanced for all pensioners in the lower bracket of pensions, such as the blind and the old age pensioners and that vast number of men and women who are classified as incurable, whose total income depends on the generosity of friends or relatives. I do not need to enlarge upon the pitiful plight of these people. Hon. members are all aware of it and of the conditions under which the old people live, and how they try to maintain even a semblance of a standard of living, naturally receiving a periodical shock that we all receive when the cost of living spirals up a few more points. Even before the bureau of statistics informs us of this spiralling increase, these old people are fully conscious of it. They have already been to their grocer or to their butcher and have found that prices have gone up and that they have had to pay that much more for their needs. It does not take an index to bring home to any individual, particularly those in the lower brackets, the fact that the cost of living has gone up. If for no other reason than to protect the living standards of these people whom I have mentioned, I think the government should take immediate action to prevent any further rise in the cost of living and that it should lay plans for a roll-back of prices.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) has on the order paper a resolution, and I hope it comes before the house, asking for an increase in the allowable income of old age pensioners. In case an opportunity is not given to bring it before the house I would certainly make that plea now on behalf of old age pensioners. If the cost of living is not to be curbed at the present level, at least grant to them an allowable income at an increased rate.

There is one other group to which I would like to refer, one in my own particular riding, namely the workers in the fruit industry. The main industry of our valley is fruit production, packing, shipping and so on. Naturally, by the very nature of the industry, we have a great number of part-time workers whose total income for the year is not high, although their income for one month, two months or three months while they are working may be quite decent. These people have given a great deal of thought to the spiralling cost of living. I should like to read part of a letter which I received from the Okanagan district trades and labour council early this year. It reads in part as follows:

Dear Sir:

The continuing upward spiral in the cost of living, which is the cause of considerable and growing apprehension among all Canadians, was the subject of close study at the last regular monthly meeting of the Okanagan district trades and labor council, held in Kelowna on Sunday, January 7 last.

As a result of the discussion, I was instructed to write to you, in your capacity as member of parliament for the Yale constituency, requesting your support in the next session of parliament for the enactment of price control legislation as outlined in the joint statement issued under recent date by the four major trade union centres, a copy of which I enclose for your information.

In order that there may be no mistake as to the attitude of the trade unions on this matter, and particularly the trade union that took the trouble to write to me, which is a very flourishing union operating largely in the Okanagan, I would like to read what they refer to as the views expressed by the four major unions of Canada. I am quoting from their brief in part:

The four trade union centres at the end of the war urged that price controls be maintained and at no time since have we retired from that position. We have always been unanimous in saying that the immediate result of the removal of controls would be the sky-rocketing of prices making it more difficult for average Canadian families to meet their household requirements and maintain themselves in decency and dignity. We were repeatedly told by spokesmen for the government, however, that once price controls were removed prices would level off and automatically adjust themselves.

Our warnings went unheeded. The ill-timed removal of price controls led to an alarming increase in the price of all commodities, an increase which is still continuing. The effectiveness of control measures is well illustrated by the government's own figures. During the war under controls the cost of living index rose only 5.0 points between December, 1941, and April, 1946. Since April, 1946, when controls were removed, the cost of living index has shot up 50 points from 120.8 to 170.7 on November 1, 1950.

Statements to the effect that wage increases are the cause of higher prices are misleading. Since the removal of controls, prices have been free to rise at the will of the employer. Wages, on the other hand, can only be adjusted by negotiation, conciliation or even arbitration.

In connection with the wages of this particular group, they have an escalator clause, which works in a different way from the ordinary escalator clause. It is closely tied in with fruit prices. If the fruit prices go up the wages go up. If the fruit prices go down, the wages go down. In that way the worker in this industry has played his part in trying to keep prices down.

Finally, I would appeal particularly on behalf of the imperial veterans, that the government give serious consideration to the fact that these people are doubly penalized, first, by having to accept a drop of from $3.80 to $2.90 in the pound, and second, they have a converted dollar worth only 60 cents. If consideration is given to them it should be given immediately, and should be made effective at once.

Cost of Living

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I have only a minute or two at my disposal. It is hardly worth while my opening my main theme. I have been sitting here this evening listening to some of the remarks, and listening to the budget speech, and they made me think of a little nursery rhyme that I knew in my childhood. I remember that I had a book, I think it was called "Nonsense Rhymes." There was in it an ode addressed by humans to the world rolling in space, and it went something like this, although I will not take any responsibility for the correctness of my quotation. Yet I hardly think that any hon. member will mind very much if I am wrong in it. It went something like this:

> Roll on, thou ball, roll on!
> What tho' I suffer numerous ills
> What tho' I swallow countless pills
> What tho' I cannot pay my bills?
> Never you mind, ball, roll on.

When I think of that little nursery rhyme in relation to the demand for price control I think of this government as that ball which rolls on unheeding of the poor fellow who addressed it.

On motion of Mr. Knight the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue with this debate, and always hoping that we will get into supply and call four departments. Then we will take up Bills No. 191 and No. 192.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ECONOMIC INDICATORS

REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS, 1950-51

BUDGET PAPERS

presented by Honourable D. C. Abbott, M.P., for the information of Parliament on the occasion of the Budget of 1951-52

FOREWORD

The purpose of these Papers is twofold:

(1) to make available in one place and in convenient form, as a supplement to the Budget, some of the more comprehensive indicators of economic conditions prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and other Government agencies, together with brief comments;

(2) to present a preliminary review of the Government accounts for the fiscal year ending on March 31, 1951.

PART I

ECONOMIC INDICATORS

1. The National Accounts
   - National Income, Product and Expenditure
   - Personal Income and its Disposition
   - Source and Disposition of Saving
   - Investment
   - Public and Private Capital Expenditure
   - Revenue and Expenditure of All Governments
2. Employment and Wages
3. Balance of International Payments
4. Trend of Prices

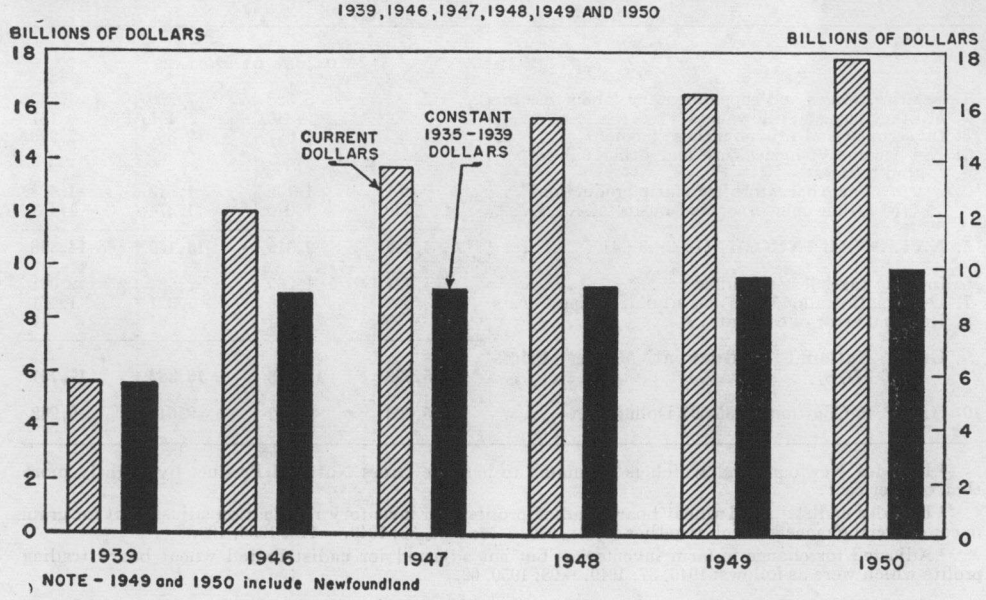
The tables in this Budget Paper are based upon estimates provided by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and other Government Departments. Some of the figures appear for the first time; others have been published elsewhere. All 1950 estimates are preliminary and subject to revision.

Figures for Canada include Newfoundland for 1949 and 1950.

THE NATIONAL ACCOUNTS

National Income, Product and Expenditure

National Income is the total of the annual earnings of Canadian residents from the production of goods and services. As such it includes salaries, wages and other forms of employee earnings in cash or in kind, as well as military pay and allowances. It includes corporation profits, interest, net rent, and the net income of farmers and others who are in business on their own account.



Gross National Product is the value at market prices of all the goods and services produced in a year by the labour, capital, and enterprise of Canadian residents. It is measured by adding together the costs of production. Part of these costs of production are the factor costs or, more simply, the earnings of the factors of production, labour, capital and enterprise; and the total of these factor costs is National Income. Indirect taxes and other costs such as depreciation allowances also enter into the cost of goods and services although they do not form part of the income of Canadians. They are, therefore, added to National Income to obtain Gross National Product. Subsidies on the other hand may be regarded as offsets to costs of production and are therefore deducted.

Gross National Expenditure measures the same aggregate as Gross National Product but in a different way. The goods and services produced in a year are either sold at home or abroad or added to inventories. Thus Gross National Expenditure is obtained by adding together all sales and adjusting them for imports and changes in inventories. While Canadian expenditure on imported goods and services is included in the total sales to consumers, to governments, and to business for capital account, it is not part of the disposition of Canadian production and is therefore deducted. But since foreign expenditures on Canadian goods and services, i.e., exports, form part of the earnings of Canadians in the Gross National Product, they are included in Gross National Expenditure.

GROSS NATIONAL EXPENDITURE

IN CURRENT AND CONSTANT(1935-39) DOLLARS

1939, 1946, 1947, 1948, 1949 AND 1950

National Income and Product

Gross National Product was 8·6 per cent higher in 1950 than in 1949. After eliminating the upward price change it is estimated that the real increase was of the order of three to four per cent. This is much the most substantial increase recorded in the post-war years.

While the present estimates of changes in real product are not precise enough to be used without reservation, they probably give a good indication of trends and general magnitudes. From 1939 to 1946 the Gross National Product increased by more than 60 per cent in constant dollars. This rapid expansion of output was only possible through the fuller utilization of resources which were unemployed or under-employed at the beginning of the period. Starting from a position of relatively full utilization of resources in 1946, gains in real product have naturally been much less spectacular in the post-war period. Recent estimates indicate a real increase of something approaching 11 per cent for the period 1946 to 1950, excluding the effect of Union with Newfoundland. For the first three years of this period the gains in real product appear to have been just about enough to keep step with population increases. For the year 1950, however, real product per capita increased by something more than one per cent. This larger rate of increase is substantiated in some measure by the rise of 7·6 per cent in the index of industrial production from 1949 to 1950. Part of this gain could be explained by the very heavy post-war investment in new plant and equipment.

Income received in the form of wages and salaries was 6·4 per cent higher in 1950 than in 1949 but the rate of increase was much higher in the latter part of the year, November, 1950, being nearly 11 per cent above November, 1949. Farm income, which is based for the most part on cash receipts, was lower in 1950 than in 1949 although the volume and value of agricultural production were both higher. This is very largely the result of the lower initial payment price for wheat and the lower equalization and adjustment payments in 1950. In 1949 for example, wheat board disbursements to producers were almost $100 million greater than the value of grain received, whereas in 1950 they were about $60 million less. If adjustment were made for this variation in wheat board disbursements, farm income would show an increase of about 5 per cent from 1949 to 1950.

Investment income, excluding technical adjustment for inventory revaluation and undistributed wheat board trading profits, increased by 16 per cent between 1949 and 1950. More than 90 per cent of this increase was due to the estimated 20 per cent increase in corporate profits before taxes. Corporate profits which actually declined in 1949 have been much more sensitive to business activity than has labour income which showed increases of 7·6 per cent in 1949 and 6·4 per cent in 1950. It is impossible to determine how much of the improvement in corporate earnings is attributable to improved business conditions and how much to the heavy post-war investment in new plant and equipment.

National Expenditure

During 1950 Canadians produced goods and services three to four per cent greater in real terms than in 1949. The full amount of this additional output was absorbed at home as well as a further amount represented by the more than $300 million excess of imports of goods and services over exports.

Personal expenditure on consumer goods and services increased by $724 million or 6·5 per cent. If account is taken of price and population increases the gain in real consumption per capita was less than one per cent.

[2] Minor adjustments have been made to the figures of current receipts and payments shown in Table 12 and in "The Canadian Balance of International Payments, 1926 to 1949", Dominion Bureau of Statistics, to achieve consistency with the other component series.

Investment in plant, equipment and housing again constituted about 18 per cent of Gross National Expenditure although some slight decline in volume is indicated. Investment in inventories showed a very sharp increase of $805 million. It is very difficult to separate the volume and price components of inventory change but present estimates suggest that the volume increase may not be much more than half the above amount.

Government expenditure on goods and services increased by approximately 13 per cent, exclusive of changes in government held inventories. Defence needs accounted for more than three-quarters of the federal increase whereas higher operating costs and expanding capital programs were the major factors in increases at the provincial and municipal levels.

Personal Income and Its Disposition

For purposes of relating the saving and spending of Canadians to their incomes, personal income is a much more useful concept than National Income.

Personal Income differs from National Income in a number of ways. It is defined as the sum of current receipts of income regardless of whether these receipts are earnings from production. Thus it includes only that part of corporation profits which is actually received by Canadian persons as dividends. Similarly deductions must also be made from employees' total earnings for unemployment insurance contributions or pension contributions which, although forming part of the compensation for services performed, are not actually received by the employee within the year. On the other hand, transfer payments such as family allowances, old age pensions, veterans' benefits and charitable contributions of corporations, are part of personal income although they are not payments for services and therefore do not form part of National Income.

Personal income rose by $616 million or 4·8 per cent in 1950 compared with an increase of $1,139 million or 8·6 per cent in National Income. The much more rapid increase in National Income is largely due to the fact that only part of the increase in corporation profits was reflected in increased dividend payments and hence in personal income. Salaries and wages, net of employer and employee contributions to social insurance and government pension funds, accounted for $470 million or 76 per cent of the increase in personal income between 1949 and 1950. Net income of unincorporated business was almost unchanged, the decline in farm income largely as a result of lower wheat board disbursements to producers, being offset by a gain in the incomes of other unincorporated businesses.

Government transfer payments were about 7 per cent higher than in 1949. Substantial increases totalling $69 million for family allowances, old age pensions and unemployment insurance benefits were partially offset by a decline of $17 million in payments to veterans.

While personal income increased by $616 million between 1949 and 1950, disposable income increased by a greater amount because of the decline of $46 million in personal direct taxes paid. Thus, after payment of direct taxes, Canadians had $662 million additional income in 1950, which they could either save or spend. Actually they spent $724 million more on consumer goods and services in 1950 than in 1949 so that personal saving from current income declined.

Consumer spending on durable goods such as automobiles and household appliances increased by the greatest percentage—25·2 per cent by value and 21·4 per cent by volume. Expenditure on perishable goods such as food, tobacco and beverages increased more moderately, 4·6 per cent by value and 1·4 per cent by volume. The estimates indicate an actual decline in both the value and volume of spending on semi-durable goods such as clothing and house furnishings. Consumer spending on services which includes items like rents, household operation and medical care increased by 7·3 per cent in value and 1·2 per cent in volume. The price increase for the services group as a whole was larger than for any of the main categories of goods.

Total real consumption per capita was less than one per cent higher than in 1949. The whole of this per capita increase was concentrated in the durable goods category.

Source and Disposition of Saving

Saving may be regarded as the source from which investment expenditure is financed. Income arising out of production may either be spent or saved. At the same time production will be absorbed either by consumption expenditure, or by investment expenditure at home for new plant, equipment, housing, or additions to inventory, or by investment abroad. Saving must therefore equal investment. It is therefore possible to construct tables which show on the one hand, the sources of saving and on the other, the use of these savings to finance gross investment at home or investment abroad.

In addition to personal saving which was mentioned above there can be government saving and business saving. If, for example, the government has a surplus of revenue over expenditure this surplus constitutes part of the Nation's saving. If there is a government deficit it is an offset to the total of private saving by individuals and businesses.

Personal saving declined from $838 million in 1949 to $776 million in 1950 despite the substantial increase of $616 million in personal income and the even larger increase of $662 million in disposable income. Saving excluding saving in farm inventories, which is to some extent involuntary, declined from $911 million to $645 million or from 7·2 per cent to 4·8 per cent of personal income. Greatly increased buying of consumer durables was an important factor in the decline in the rate of personal saving.

As in 1949 slightly more than 15 per cent of the Nation's saving was made up of the combined surplus of federal, provincial and municipal governments. In both years the calendar year surplus of the federal government was partially offset by the deficits of provincial and municipal governments.

Variation in wheat board disbursements to producers accounted for a substantial change in the composition of private saving. In 1949 disbursements exceeded the value of grain received so that a negative amount appears in the savings table under the heading Undistributed Wheat Board Trading Profits. In 1950, however, disbursements were less than the value of grain received so that a saving or accumulation of income is recorded.

The pace of economic activity during 1950 is reflected in the increase in corporate profits before tax which are presently estimated to be about 20 per cent

INVESTMENT

Investment in plant, equipment and housing continued to make large demands on saving. But the largest single increase in investment appears to have been in net addition to inventories. In total, gross home investment increased by almost $900 million, or about $430 million more than the increase in private and public saving. At the same time, however, there was a very significant decline in Canada's net investment abroad from $174 million in 1949 to −$309 million in 1950. (For more detailed discussion of net foreign investment see section on Balance of International Payments).

Public and Private Capital Expenditure

Table 9 brings together business capital expenditures, which are included in Table 8 above, and public capital outlays included under government expenditure in Table 2. The total of public and private capital expenditure increased by $300 million or 8·6 per cent between 1949 and 1950. Capital expenditure in manufacturing showed the only decline in value. Capital expenditure by government departments showed the largest increase, 17·9 per cent and accounted for almost one-quarter of the total value increase from 1949 to 1950. The larger part of the increase in public capital expenditure came from provincial and municipal rather than federal spending.

The forecast for 1951 is for a further large increase in capital expenditure, amounting to 14·2 per cent by value and 6 per cent by volume. Largest elements in this are the forecast increases for manufacturing industries and government departments both of which are associated with expanding defence requirements.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE CAPITAL EXPENDITURE

Revenue and Expenditure of all Governments

In Table 10, "Government Transactions Related to the National Accounts", an attempt is made to bring together in one statement and under uniform headings, the activities of all governments in Canada on a calendar year basis.

The table is designed to include only those transactions which have relevance for the National Accounts, and consequently the surpluses or deficits shown here do not agree with those shown in the various public accounts. It has been necessary to adjust the conventional accounting statements of fiscal year revenue and expenditure to exclude purely bookkeeping transactions as well as the purchase and sale of existing capital assets. Extra-budgetary funds such as unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation and pension funds have been added, and surpluses or deficits of Government enterprises are likewise included. In the federal accounts some of the more substantial adjustments are as follows: elimination of reserve for possible losses on active assets, elimination of reserves for veterans' conditional benefits, elimination of expenditures charged with respect to assumption of Newfoundland debt, elimination of expenditures charged with respect to shipment of World War II military equipment to Europe under the North Atlantic Treaty, elimination of write down of active assets to non-active account, allocation of war refunds to prior years, adjustment of corporate taxes to an accrual basis, and elimination of sales of war assets to business. In addition the federal figures have been adjusted to a calendar year basis by using the monthly figures published by the Comptroller of the Treasury. Government loans to foreign countries or accumulation of gold or foreign exchange are not included with government expenditure.

For purpose of analysis, expenditures by governments may be divided into two main categories: expenditures for the purchase of goods and services, and so-called transfer payments, i.e., family allowances, old age pensions, veterans' benefits, the greater part of the interest on the public debt, etc., which do not arise from current production of goods and services. The first category represents the demands which governments place on the annual output of the nation. Transfer payments, on the other hand, simply add to the sums available for spending or saving by the recipient.

The federal surplus was larger in the calendar year 1950 than in 1949 although expenditures were rising. This was largely the result of increased revenues from indirect taxes and taxes on corporations. Federal government expenditure on goods and services increased less in 1950 than provincial and municipal expenditure despite the fact that more than three quarters of the federal increase was accounted for by expanding defence needs.

EMPLOYMENT AND WAGES

Canada's civilian labour force was estimated to be approximately the same size at the time of the November 1950 labour force survey as it had been at the same date a year earlier. On November 4, 1950, the labour force was estimated at 5,201,000 compared with 5,200,000 on October 29, 1949. The agricultural labour force, however, showed a substantial decline from 1,058,000 to 974,000. This decrease was almost exactly offset by an increase of 85,000 in the size of the non-agricultural labour force, from 4,142,000 to 4,227,000.

Although the labour force was practically unchanged, the number of persons employed on November 4, 1950 was 5,084,000 or 31,000 above the figure for the previous year. Unemployment, defined as those without jobs and looking for work, after reaching a post-war peak in March, 1950, fell to 117,000 on November 4, little more than 2 per cent of the labour force and well below the 147,000 registered on a similar date in 1949.

The following table presents a picture of the civilian labour force on comparable dates for the years 1946–1950. The data for 1949 and 1950 include Newfoundland.

An indication of the more recent trend in unemployment may be gathered from data on persons who have applied for jobs at National Employment Service offices. The average figures for January and February 1951 were 272,899 and 302,021 respectively. The comparable figures for January and February 1950 were 332,068 and 377,331. This is the period of highest seasonal unemployment but the figures indicate a considerable improvement over the same period a year earlier. Caution must be used in interpreting the figures as a measure of unemployment since they include some persons who had a job and exclude some unemployed persons who did not register. The figures for 1951 are probably higher than they should be for strict comparability with 1950 because of the legislation which came into force March, 1950, regarding supplementary unemployment insurance benefits. The figures for January and February 1951 will include some unemployed persons who were in insurable employment and had exhausted their benefits whereas similar persons would not have been eligible in 1950 and therefore might not have registered.

Labour income during 1950 was estimated at $8,300 million, 6·4 per cent higher than last year. The increase in income was particularly marked during the second half of the year, and was due both to higher employment levels in the non-agricultural industries and to higher weekly earnings. Per capita weekly earnings, in nine leading industries averaged $46·59 at December 1, 1950 compared to $43·71 at December 1, 1949. Average per capita weekly earnings for 1950 were estimated at $44·84 and for 1949 at $42·96.

Changes in hours worked per week did not materially affect the size of labour income. In manufacturing, hours worked per week averaged 42·3, the same as the previous year.

BALANCE OF INTERNATIONAL PAYMENTS

When goods are exported, unless thay are given away they give rise to payments or debts in favour of Canada. Similarly, when goods are imported they give rise to payments or debts in favour of the rest of the world. Other transactions such as interest and dividend payments, the tourist trade, freight and shipping charges, also give rise to similar payments or debts in either direction. The difference between the debits and credits arising from these current transactions is referred to as the net balance of international payments on current account. When total credits exceed total debits within a year, the rest of the world has gone into debt to Canada or Canada has paid off some of her debt to the rest of the world. When total debits exceed total credits, the net position is, of course, reversed.

Canada's deficit on current account of $316 million in 1950 represents an increase in net debits from 1949 of about $500 million. Although exports increased by $150 million, imports rose sharply in the last half of the year and total imports were $433 million higher than in 1949. As a result, Canada's merchandise trade in 1950 was in approximate balance, compared with the substantial surplus achieved in 1949. The largest single change in other current transactions was the increase of over 20 per cent in interest and dividend payments. Net tourist receipts also declined and freight and shipping showed a net debit compared with a credit in 1949.

During the year a significant shift occurred in the geographical pattern of Canadian trade. Exports to the United States rose by over $500 million, an increase of 34 per cent. At the same time there was a very sharp decline in exports to the United Kingdom and other sterling area countries, from approximately $1,000 million in 1949 to less than $700 million in 1950. Canadian imports from the sterling area increased by $150 million during the same period. These marked changes have brought Canada more nearly into balance with the principal trading areas as shown in Table 12.

Compared with 1949 Canadian exports of goods and services in 1950 rose by about 4 per cent in value although the volume is estimated to be approximately the same. Imports on the other hand increased by 17 per cent in value and 9 per cent in volume.

Notwithstanding the current account deficit, the official reserves of gold and United States dollars rose by $625 million in 1950. This increase was due primarily to the very heavy inflow of capital from the United States, a large part of it in the third quarter of the year. The available details of the transactions on capital account in 1950 are compared in the following table with similar transactions in 1949:

PRICE TRENDS

The general level of prices in Canada showed very little change between the summer of 1948 and the spring of 1950, but since May, 1950, there has been a sharp increase of about 17 per cent in wholesale prices and 9 per cent in the cost of living index. These recent price increases have not been peculiar to the Canadian scene but are very much in evidence elsewhere in the world.

For the year 1950, wholesale prices averaged more than 6½ per cent above 1949 and in December, 1950, were approximately 14 per cent above December, 1949. The more rapid price increase in the latter part of 1950 has been continued in 1951 with the wholesale price index for February, 20 per cent above a year ago and 6 per cent above December, 1950. Prices of fully and chiefly manufactured goods moved in a manner similar to the total index with the greatest increase in the latter part of 1950 and early 1951. The index of Canadian farm products unlike the total wholesale index, showed a more rapid increase in the first part of 1950 and reached a post-war high in July at a point more than 11 per cent above that of the beginning of the year. The index then declined in the last half of 1950 so that during December it was about 5 per cent above the previous year. However, there has again been a strong advance in farm prices and the index for February 1951, is more than 8 per cent above December, 1950.

The slight downward movement indicated in the cost of living index toward the end of 1949 was reversed in the spring of 1950 and the index moved steadily upward during the rest of the year. For the year as a whole the index averaged 3½ per cent above 1949 but at December 1, 1950, it was 5·9 per cent above December, 1949. A large part of the increase in the cost of living index is accounted for by the rise of 8 to 9 per cent in food and rents which together constitute half the weight in the cost of living budget. As with wholesale prices the increase has accelerated in recent months with the March 1, 1951, cost of living index 9·8 per cent above March 1, 1950, and 5·0 per cent above December, 1950.

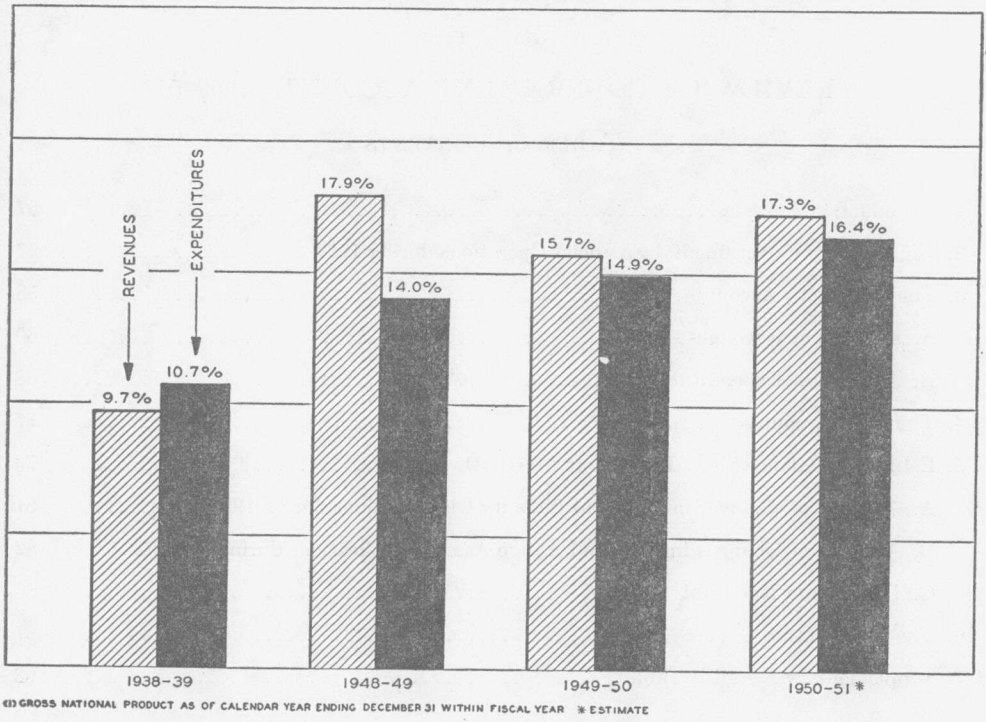
PART II



REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS 1950–51

1. INTRODUCTION

1. Although the Government's fiscal year ended on March 31st, the books must remain open for several weeks after that date in order to record various adjusting entries and to take into account all payments up to and including April 30th made on account of expenditures originating in, and properly chargeable to, the fiscal year 1950–51. Consequently, as final figures for that year will not be available for some considerable time, the figures appearing in this Part must be regarded as preliminary and subject to revision.

2. HIGHLIGHTS OF GOVERNMENTAL FINANCIAL OPERATIONS DURING 1950–51

2. The revenues of the Government for the year ended March 31, 1951 are now estimated at $3,105 million, the largest total yet recorded. As expenditures for the year are estimated at $2,902 million, the fiscal year 1950–51 is the fifth successive year the financial operations of the Government will result in a budgetary surplus. On the basis of these figures it would appear that the Government's budgetary surplus will probably total something in the neighbourhood of $203 million compared with $131 million for the year ended March 31, 1950. As a result the Government's net debt (the excess of total liabilities over total active assets) will be reduced by an equivalent amount. This will bring to a total of $1,980 million the amount by which the Government has reduced its net debt during the past five fiscal years. This reduction is approximately equivalent to the amount by which the Government's net debt increased during the first three and one half years after the outbreak of war in 1939.

3. While the budgetary surplus for 1950–51 is estimated at $203 million, the Government has been able to make loans and advances and other non-budgetary disbursements of more than $600 million and at the same time to purchase or retire outstanding funded debt to the extent of over $200 million. The manner in which this has been achieved may best be understood by taking an over-all view of the Government's cash transactions for the year. As explained in greater detail in the section on "The Cash Accounts", all the Government's cash receipts and disbursements are not reflected in the budgetary accounts, nor do all budgetary transactions result in the inflow or outgo of cash. Substantial amounts are received and paid out for extra-budgetary purposes (such as the loans and advances which the Government is required to make and the transactions in connection with the many superannuation, insurance, pension, annuity and deposit and trust accounts which it has undertaken to hold or administer.) On the other hand a substantial part of the budgetary revenues and expenditures are merely of an accounting or bookkeeping nature and do not result in the receipt or disbursement of cash.

4. While the Government's budgetary surplus for the fiscal year was $203 million this does not reflect the full economic impact of Government operations upon the economy. When the budgetary surplus is adjusted for non-cash transactions, there remains an amount of about $642 million. This sum, together with $150 million from repayments of loans, investments and working capital advances, net insurance, pensions and annuity contributions, and other non-budgetary cash receipts made $792 million cash available for making necessary loans and investments and other extra-budgetary outlay. During the fiscal year cash payments amounting to $612 million for loans and investments and for other non-budgetary purposes which would otherwise have required additional borrowing, were made out of available cash resources. As a result of all these transactions, the cash surplus for the fiscal year was $181 million. By using this amount and by allowing the Government's cash balances to be reduced by $25 million, funded debt amounting to $116 million was retired and securities amounting to $90 million were acquired for the Government's investment portfolios (mainly the Unemployment Insurance Fund).

3. THE BUDGETARY ACCOUNTS

5. The table which follows gives a summarized statement of revenues and expenditures for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1951, with the comparable figures for the four preceding fiscal years. More detailed tables in comparative form may be found at the end of this Part.

7. Ordinary revenues are estimated at $3,013 million, an increase of $484 million over the total for the previous year. The total of $92 million for special receipts and credits represents an increase of $41 million over the total of $51 million received in 1949–50.

8. On the expenditure side, the total of ordinary expenditures for 1950–51 shows an increase of $511 million over the combined total of ordinary and demobilization and reconversion expenditures for the previous year (from $2,170 million in 1949–50 to $2,681 million in 1950–51). The increase was attributable chiefly to increases of $388 million in National Defence expenditures, $76 million in the Government's contribution to the Civil Service Superannuation Fund, and $20 million in subsidies and compensation to provinces. An increase of $76 million in special expenditures (attributable largely to additional payments to the Canadian Wheat Board and emergency grants and payments in connection with flood and fire disasters) was offset by decreases of $6 million in capital expenditure, $44 million in government owned enterprises (reflecting a substantial decrease in the deficit of Canadian National Railways for the calendar year 1950) and $83 million in other charges (due largely to the absence in the year under review of any item comparable to the charge of $62 million in 1949–50 in connection with the assumption by Canada of part of the Newfoundland debt in accordance with the Terms of Union).

A. Analysis of Revenues

9. Estimated revenues for the year 1950–51, classified according to major categories are presented in the following table, along with corresponding figures for the previous fiscal year.

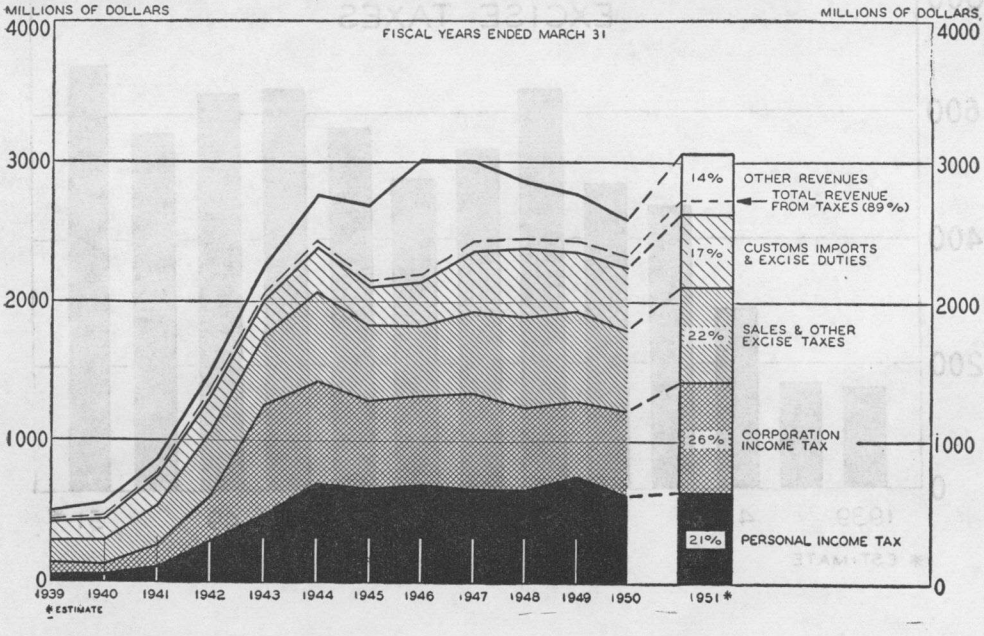
NOTE: Due to rounding off, columns may not add exactly to totals shown.

10. It will be noted that 50·2 per cent of grand total revenues for the year was derived from direct taxes, 39·4 per cent was obtained from indirect taxes, and the remaining 10·4 per cent was attributable to non-tax revenues and special receipts and credits.

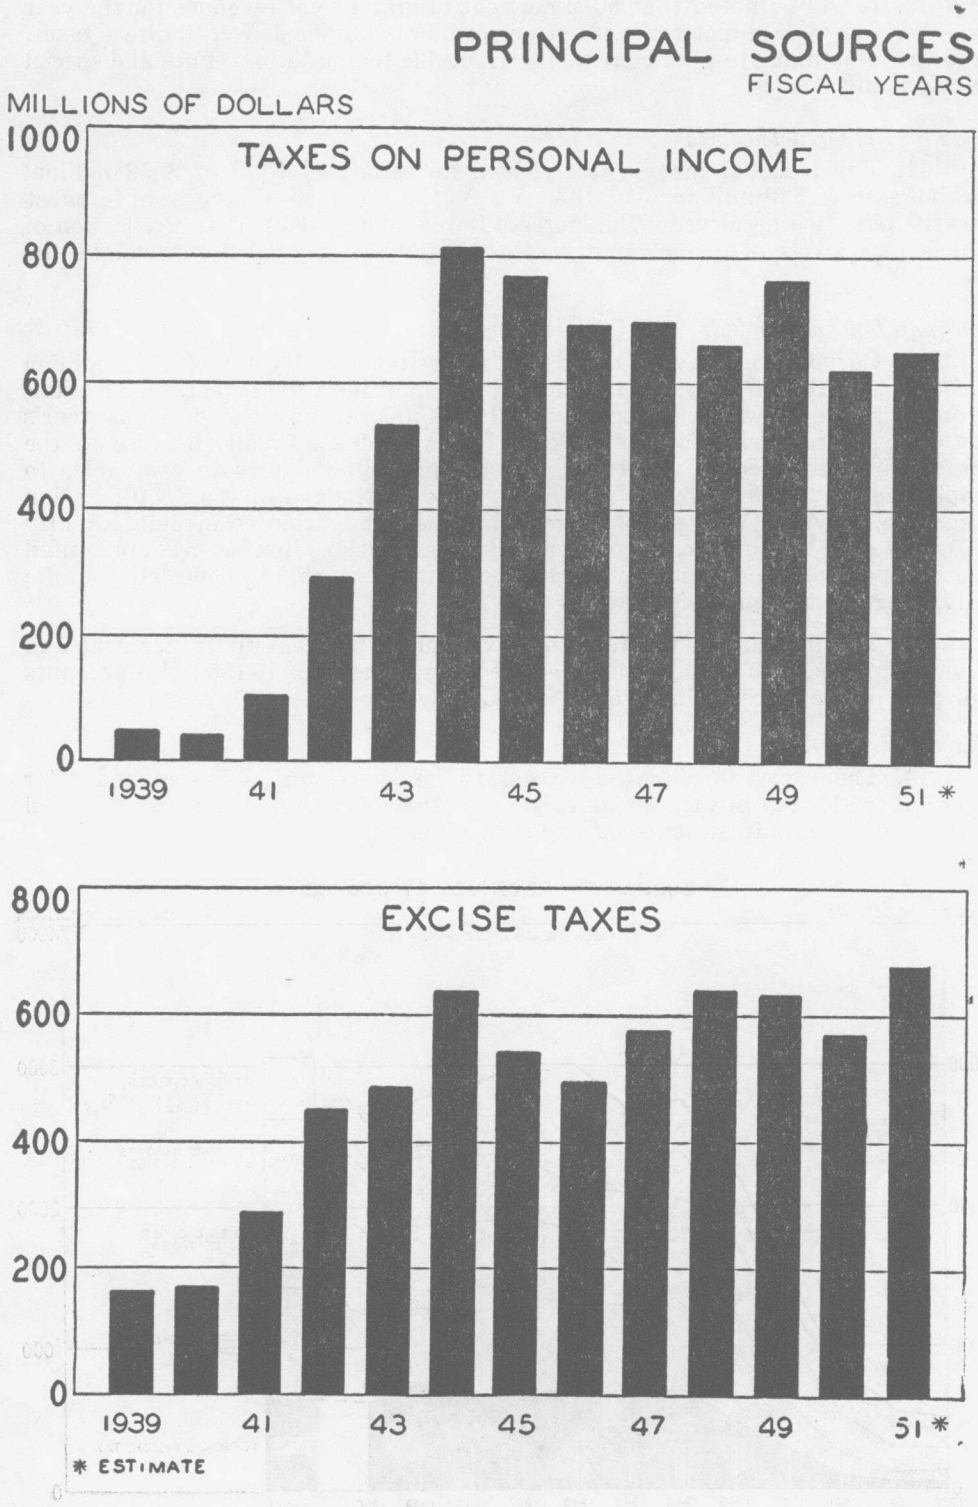
Tax on Personal Incomes

11. The personal income tax yielded an estimated total of $652 million, an increase of $30 million over 1949–50. As the same rates have been in effect for the past two fiscal years the increase in revenue in 1950–51 is a reflection of the higher levels of income and employment which prevailed throughout the year.

Corporation Income Tax



12. Corporation income taxes yielded an estimated total of $800 million making this the largest single source of revenue during the year. Collections from this tax showed an increase of $196·8 million over the previous year's total. This increase is attributable to higher profits in 1950 and also to the provision introduced in the 1950 budget which allowed private companies to capitalize their undistributed income on hand at the end of the 1949 taxation year upon payment of a tax of 15 per cent of the undistributed income. Nearly $91 million of the total taxes collected from corporations in 1950–51 represented the 15 per cent tax paid by private companies which have elected to take advantage of this provision.



13. The increase in the rates of tax from 10 per cent to 15 per cent and from 33 per cent to 38 per cent effective from September 1, 1950 also accounts for part of the increase in revenue in 1950–51.

Excess Profits Tax

14. The excess profits tax ceased to be levied on profits earned after December 31, 1947 but the clean-up payments received during the year exceeded the refunds and adjustments by about $10 million.

OF TAX REVENUES

ENDED MARCH 31

Taxes on Interest, Dividends, Rents and Royalties

15. Revenues under this heading come from withholding taxes on certain payments made to non-residents. The total of $62 million collected in 1950–51 is $14·5 million greater than in the previous year, an increase largely due to a higher level of dividend payments during 1950.

Succession Duties

16. Revenue from succession duties is estimated at $34 million for 1950–51, an increase of $4·1 million over the previous year.

Customs Duties

17. Net revenue from customs duties for the year is estimated at $298 million, an increase of $72·1 million over the total for 1949–50. This increase reflects the increased level of imports at higher prices during the year.

Excise Duties

18. Excise duties are levied exclusively on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products. The estimated total revenue from this source for the year is $245 million. This is an increase of $24·4 million over 1949–50 due mainly to the higher rates of tax on malt and spirits levied in September, 1950. Gross receipts from these duties, before deducting refunds, are divided as follows: $132 million from alcoholic beverages ($107 million in 1949–50) and $116 million from tobacco products ($116 million in 1949–50).

Excise Taxes

19. Excise taxes are levied on a variety of items under the Excise Tax Act. Total net collections for the year are estimated at $675 million, an increase of $103·5 million over 1949–50. This increase is due to higher levels of production and increased prices during the year and to the tax changes introduced in September 1950. At that time the rate of tax on all those items which had previously been subject to tax at 10 per cent was raised to 15 per cent and a number of items not previously taxed were made taxable at 15 per cent. In addition a tax of 30 per cent was levied on candy, chewing gum, and soft drinks.

20. The most important tax under the Excise Tax Act from the point of view of revenue is the sales tax, which yielded an estimated gross revenue of $471·1 million, an increase of $55·9 million over the previous year.

21. The second largest revenue source among the excise taxes is the tax on tobacco products which yielded approximately $83·2 million, slightly less than in the previous year.

22. Almost all tax sources showed an increase in revenue over the previous year. The tax on automobiles and rubber tires and tubes, which yielded an estimated total of $63 million during the year, showed the largest increase amounting to $24·8 million over the previous year.

23. The tax sources showing the largest increases, and the amount of the increase in each case, are given below.

—	Estimated increase over 1949–50
Automobiles, rubber tires and tubes	$24,807,000
Candy and chewing gum	9,370,000
Beverages	5,773,000
Jewellery, ornaments, etc	2,523,000
Electric and gas appliances	2,300,000
Phonographs, radios and tubes	2,099,000
Furs	1,363,000

Other Indirect Taxes

24. Small amounts of tax revenue were derived from the tax on the net premium income of insurance companies; from a tax on the export of electric energy from Canada; and from a tax on the export of furs from the Northwest Territories. Total revenue from all these sources in 1950–51 is estimated at $4·9 million, an increase of $0·5 million over the previous year.

Non-Tax Revenues

25. Non-tax revenues for 1950–51 are estimated at $231·8 million, an increase of $26·2 million over the 1949–50 total. The following table presents a comparative summary of revenues under this heading for the past two years:

—	Fiscal year ended Mar. 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1951 (Estimated)	1950
	(In millions of dollars)
Post Office	90·0	84·5	5·5
Return on investments	89·1	91·5	−2·4
Premium, discount and exchange	18·0	—	18·0
Bullion and coinage	4·8	4·5	0·3
Privileges, licences and permits	8·7	7·6	1·1

Services and service fees	12·7	11·2	1·5
Refunds of previous years' expenditures	2·0	1·5	0·5
Miscellaneous	2·3	1·9	0·4
Total non-tax revenue	231·8	205·6	26·2

26. Post Office receipts are estimated at $90 million, an increase of $5·5 million over the total for the preceding year. As the total costs of operating the Post Office during the year are estimated at $92·1 million, it is expected that operating costs will exceed receipts by approximately $2·1 million. In making the comparison, however, it should be borne in mind that the total shown for Post Office receipts does not reflect the value of services rendered free of charge to other departments, nor does the total shown for operating expenses reflect any charges for premises owned by the Government and occupied by the Post Office Department or for certain accounting and miscellaneous services provided by other departments.

27. Return on investments is expected to show a small decrease of $2·4 million from the total received in 1949–50. The larger items entering into the estimated total of $89·1 million for 1950-51 are: Interest on advances to the Canadian National Railways, $21·8 million; Bank of Canada profits and dividends, $19·9 million; interest on loans to, and operating profits of, the Foreign Exchange Control Board, $14·8 million; interest on loans to foreign governments under Part II of The Export Credits Insurance Act, $15·5 million; interest on Central Mortgage and Housing debentures, $5·5 million; and interest on advances under the Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Acts, $3·7 million.

28. The estimated total of $18 million credited as premium discount and exchange revenue during 1950–51 may be compared with the charge of $19·7 million included in expenditures in 1949–50. This revenue arises chiefly from the revaluation of sterling and United States' dollar assets and liabilities reflecting the new exchange rates consequent upon the Government's announcement on September 30, 1950, that it did not propose to establish a fixed parity for the Canadian dollar or to prescribe official fixed rates of exchange. The net revenue of $18 million during 1950–51 is due mainly to bookkeeping adjustments totalling $20·7 million reflecting decreases of $18·8 million in net indebtedness payable in United States dollars (consisting of an exchange credit of $29·1 million on matured and unmatured funded debt less a debit of $10·3 million on cash held in New York) and $1·9 million in net indebtedness payable in sterling (consisting of an exchange credit of $2·9 million on unmatured funded debt less a debit of $1 million on cash and securities held in London). The total revenue of $20·7 million due to currency revaluations was offset by disbursements totalling $2·7 million representing exchange losses due to the purchases and sales of gold, sterling and United States dollars.

Special Receipts and Credits

29. The total of special receipts and credits for the fiscal year 1950–51 is estimated at $92·6 million as compared with total receipts of $51·4 million for the preceding year. The following table presents a comparative summary of the principal sources of special receipts and other credits for the last two years:

—	Fiscal year ended March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1951 (Estimated)	1950
	(In millions of dollars)
War and demobilization receipts	45·2	34·8	10·4
Sale of surplus Crown assets	20·4	16·3	4·1
Refundable portion of excess profits tax—transfer to revenue of excess reserve set up in previous years	25·0	—	25·0
Repayment by Canadian Pacific Railway of loan made under Relief Acts (classified as non-active)	1·4	—	1·4
Sundry special receipts and credits	0·6	0·3	0·3
	92·6	51·4	41·2

30. War and demobilization receipts constituted the largest source of special revenues, the estimated total of $45·2 million received during 1950–51 being $10·4 million more than the total for the preceding year. The following summary gives an estimate of the principal receipts under this heading during 1950-51:

	(In millions of dollars)
Refunds in connection with cost audits and re-negotiation of war contracts	$3·7
Amount received from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation representing surplus funds in excess of $5 million reserve established by the Corporation and proceeds of sale of Wartime Housing properties	7·4
Receipts from foreign governments in respect of military relief claims and currency credits arising from war settlements	9·1
Balance of Canadian Sugar Stabilization Corporation's price stabilization contingency reserve transferred to revenue	18·7
Estimated surplus of Canadian Arsenals Limited	1·7
Miscellaneous receipts	4·6

31. The amount of $20·4 million realized from the disposal of surplus Crown assets represents the estimated receipts during the fiscal year from Crown Assets Disposal Corporation after allowing for transfers to active assets of amounts applicable to "Balances receivable under agreements of sale of Crown assets". It does not include the residual cash balances or the value of accounts receivable carried by the corporation as at March 31, 1951.

32. The amount of $25 million represents a transfer to revenue of the amount by which the reserve set up in previous years in respect of the refundable portion of excess profits tax is now estimated to be in excess of requirements.

Comparison of Actual Revenue with Budget Forecast

33. The total revenues now estimated for the year 1950–51 will be about $436 million more than the forecast of revenues made in the budget speech of September 7, 1950.

34. The revenues from customs import duties, the sales tax, and other excise taxes, proved much more buoyant than expected last September as prices continued to rise here and in the United States and the level of production in many lines reached new records.

35. The steadily rising level of salaries and wages and continued full employment brought the revenue from the personal income tax well above anything which could be foreseen seven months ago.

36. Rising prices, production at almost full capacity, and the coming into operation of new plant and equipment reflecting the large capital investment during recent years brought total corporation profits to a new high in Canada with consequent increases in the revenue from the corporation income tax. In addition the number of private companies which elected to pay the 15 per cent tax and capitalize their undistributed surplus greatly exceeded that expected in September with the result that revenue from this source exceeded that anticipated at the time of the budget in September by a substantial amount.

37. Higher dividend payments as a result of increased profits, a relaxation in November, 1950, of the Foreign Exchange Control Board requirements governing the payment of dividends by controlled subsidiaries in Canada to parent companies abroad, and an apparent desire on the part of parent companies in the United States to get profits home before United States tax rates increased resulted in the tax on "Interest, dividends, rents and royalties" yielding $14 million more than was expected last September.

38. The excess of non-tax revenue receipts over the budget forecast is due largely to the amount of $18 million for "Premium, discount and exchange" arising out of the revaluation of the Government's assets and liabilities payable in sterling and United States dollars consequent upon the freeing of the exchange rate for the Canadian dollar on September 30, 1950.

39. Special receipts and credits, which are always difficult to estimate in advance, were increased by the amount of $25 million transferred to revenue during the year which represented an excess provision in prior years for the reserve for refundable excess profits tax. This transfer was not anticipated when the budget was prepared in September.

B. Analysis of Expenditures

40. It has been customary to present in summary form a comparison of expenditures by major classifications for the current fiscal year with those of the previous fiscal year. However, due to the elimination of the category "demobilization and reconversion expenditures" in 1950–51, many payments, which were included under this heading in 1949–50, have been classed as "ordinary expenditures" in the year under review. Consequently, to compare satisfactorily the expenditures of the several departments as between the two years, it is necessary to consider the combined total of "ordinary" and "demobilization and reconversion" expenditures for 1949–50 in relation to the estimated "ordinary" total for 1950–51. The table which follows presents a comparative summary of the expenditures for the past two years on this basis:

National Defence

41. National defence expenditures, which are estimated at $772·9 million for 1950–51 constitute the largest class of government expenditures, representing 26·6 per cent of the over-all total for the fiscal year. This total, representing an increase of $388·0 million, is more than double the total of $384·9 million spent on national defence in 1949–50. The following table shows a comparative summary of the expenditures on national defence for the last two years:

—	Fiscal Year Ended March 31		Increase or Decrease (—)
	1951 (Estimated)	1950
	(In millions of dollars)
Army, Navy and Air Services	536·3	348·0	188·3

Government's contribution to the Permanent Forces Pension Fund	12·0	9·0	3·0
Sundry Services	0·3	0·5	—0·2
	772·9	384·9	388·0

42. Expenditures for Army, Navy and Air Services are expected to show an increase of $188·3 million, the total for 1950–51 being estimated at $536·3 million. Of this total, $47·8 million represents payments to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for housing accommodation for married quarters for service personnel, etc., taken over by the department during the year. A like item of $0·6 million is included in the total of $23·9 million for defence research and development. The amount of $195·4 million shown under "Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, sec. 3," represents the value of defence equipment and supplies transferred to parties to the North Atlantic Treaty. Under the provisions of this section, an amount equal to the estimated present value of the equipment and supplies so transferred was paid into a special account, to be available subsequently for the purchase of equipment or supplies for the naval, army or air services of the Canadian Forces.

Public Debt Charges

43. Public debt charges constituted the second largest single item of government expenditure in 1950–51 comprising 15·1 per cent of the over-all total, but due to a substantial decrease in interest on public debt the total of $439 million was $11·8 million less than the corresponding amount for the previous year. Interest on public debt amounted to $425·2 million, the decrease of $14·6 million from the total for 1949–50 being attributable primarily to a reduction in the outstanding unmatured funded debt. A reduction of $18·7 million in the payment of interest on the outstanding funded debt, of which $16·3 million was on debt payable in Canada, was offset by an increase of $4·1 million in interest paid or credited to various annuity, insurance, superannuation, deposit and trust accounts.

44. Other public debt charges including the annual charges for the amortization of loan discounts, premiums and commissions, the costs of new loan flotations (not amortized), and certain miscellaneous charges for debt servicing amounted to $13·8 million as compared with $11 million for the previous year and brought the total of all debt charges for the year to $439 million.

45. The following table presents a summary of public debt charges for 1950–51 and the corresponding figures for the preceding year.

Subsidies and Tax Rental Payments to Provinces

46. Payments to provinces during 1950–51 for statutory subsidies, the transitional grant to Newfoundland, rentals under the Tax Rental Agreements, and the transfer of certain public utility tax receipts, amounted to $123·9 million as compared with $103·9 million in 1949–50. A comparative summary of the payments for the two years is given in the following table:

Transfer of certain public utility tax receipts (sec. 7, Chap. 58, Statutes of Canada, 1947)	4·6	1·4	3·2
	123·9	103·9	20·0

47. The net increase of $20 million was the result of several factors. The estimated increase of $17·2 million in payments under the tax rental agreements was due in part to an increase of $14·3 million reflecting the appropriate adjustment in the relevant ratios of population and estimates of gross national product on which the payments are based. Under the provisions of the Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act the Government of Canada collects provincial 5 per cent corporation taxes for the seven provinces participating in the 1947 agreements. Although levied by the provinces, these taxes are administered and collected by the Government of Canada and the proceeds thereof, when finally assessed, are paid to the provinces in lieu of an equivalent (or approximately equivalent) portion of the stipulated tax rental. As payments during 1950–51 were $2·9 million less than those during 1949–50, tax rentals payments were increased by a corresponding amount. There was also an increase of $3·2 million in payments of public utility tax receipts. Section 7 of the Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act authorizes the payment to the provinces of a portion of the taxes collected from corporations, whose main business was the distribution to, or the generation for the distribution to, the public of electrical energy, gas or steam.

48. A summary of payments, by provinces, during 1950–51 is given in the following table:

—	Statutory Subsidies	Rentals under Tax Rental Agreements	Transfer of certain public utility tax receipts	Transitional Grant	Total

Family Allowances, Old Age Pensions and Pensions to Blind Persons

49. Payments for family allowances are estimated at $309·5 million for 1950–51, representing approximately 10·7 per cent of the total expenditures for the fiscal year. The estimated increase of $12 million over the preceding year is attributable to the natural increase in population in the eligible age groups.

50. Expenditures for old age pensions are expected to total $99·3 million. The increase of approximately $9·6 million over the total for the previous year is due in part to an increase in the numbers receiving aid and in part to the increase from $30 to $40 per month in the basic rate of pension provided by legislation enacted in April, 1949, the full effects of which were not reflected in the payments for 1949–50. Pensions to the blind are expected to amount to $3·9 million in 1950–51, an increase of $0·4 million over the payments for the previous year.

51. The estimated distribution of these payments, by provinces, is shown in the following table:

—	Family Allowances	Federal Contributions to
		Old Age Pensions	Pensions to the Blind

Unemployment Insurance Act Administration and Government's Contribution

52. Expenditures in connection with the Unemployment Insurance Act (excluding the Government's payments as employer) are estimated at $53·5 million for the fiscal year, an increase of $8·4 million over the total of $45·1 million for 1949–50. Unemployment Insurance benefit payments are not charged directly to budgetary expenditures, but to the Unemployment Insurance Fund, which is financed by contributions from employers and employees, by interest earned on investments, and by the Government's contribution of an amount equal to one-fifth of the combined employer-employee payments. In addition, the Government assumes the costs of administration and pursuant to the Terms of Union with Newfoundland, the cost of unemployment benefits to certain residents of that province. It also reimburses the Fund for certain supplementary benefits paid under section 87F (1) of the Act. The Government's contribution during 1950–51 is estimated at $26·1 million, an increase of $5·0 million over that for the previous year and costs of administration are estimated at $22·4 million, as compared with $20·4 million in 1949–50. Payments of unemployment benefits to residents of Newfoundland are expected to amount to $3·2 million, a decrease of $0·4 million as compared with the total of $3·6 million paid in 1949–50. Supplementary benefits under section 87F (1) of the Act are estimated at $1·8 million for the fiscal year.

Government Contributions to the Civil Service Superannuation Account

53. An amount of $75 million was transferred to the Civil Service Superannuation Account during the fiscal year as a special Government contribution of a portion of the amount by which the liabilities as estimated by the actuaries exceed the balance in the account. This special contribution is in respect of a substantial deficiency which has accumulated in the account over many years due for the most part to increases in the general level of salaries and to the practice heretofore followed of not matching employees' prior service contributions with an equal Government contribution. It is in addition to the transfer to the account of $6·9 million representing the Government's annual contribution of an amount equal to the estimated current payments of individual contributors in the previous fiscal year.

Veterans Affairs

54. Ordinary expenditures of the Department of Veterans Affairs are estimated at $209·7 million for 1950–51, a decrease of $18·6 million as compared with the combined total of $228·3 million for "ordinary" and "demobilization and reconversion" expenditures for the previous fiscal year. The table which follows presents a comparative summary of the expenditures for the last two years:

—	Fiscal year ended March 31		Increase or Decrease (—)
	1951 (Estimated)	1950
	(In millions of dollars)
Pensions (World Wars I and II and Northwest Rebellion 1885)..	96·3	96·1	0·2

Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Acts.....	6·4	7·4	—1·0
Hospital accommodation and facilities.....	2·7	3·8	—1·1
Departmental administration and sundry.....	2·1	3·6	—1·5
	209·7	228·3	—18·6

55. The net decrease of $18·6 million is attributable chiefly to decreases of $12·2 million in post-discharge rehabilitation benefit payments and $6·5 million in war service gratuities and re-establishment credits. An estimated increase of $3·3 million in treatment and after care of soldiers and allowances to dependents is offset by approximately equivalent reductions in expenditures under the Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Acts, and for hospital accommodation and facilities, departmental administration and sundry services.

CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

56. Expenditures charged to capital account are estimated at $16·5 million for the fiscal year as compared with a total of $22·9 million for the previous fiscal year. The principal items in this category are the costs of constructing and improving civil airways and airports, the costs of dredging the St. Lawrence ship channel, and expenditures for the enlargement of dock and terminal facilities at North Sydney, N.S., and for the reconditioning, outfitting and transporting to their operating base of vessels for Pacific Ocean weather station service.

SPECIAL EXPENDITURES

57. Special expenditures are estimated at $113·7 million for the fiscal year, an increase of $75·8 million compared with the total of $37·9 million for 1949–50. There were increases of $63 million in payments to the Canadian Wheat Board, $12·1 million in emergency grants and expenditures in connection with flood and fire disasters, $9·6 million in expenditures on agricultural and other projects, and $0·9 million in payments to certain Crown Corporations for reimbursement of the costs of services rendered by them in purchasing materials and procuring the construction of defence projects for the Department of National Defence. These increases, however, were partially offset by a decrease of $9·9 million in advances to the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

58. The following table presents a comparative summary of special expenditures for the last two years.

59. The amount of $65 million represents the amount authorized to be paid to the Canadian Wheat Board to be added to the amount available for distribution in settlement of the 1945–50 wheat pool to holders of participation certificates.

GOVERNMENT OWNED ENTERPRISES

60. Expenditures under this heading consist of the operating deficits of and non-active loans to certain wholly owned governmental enterprises which were established prior to World War II. The following table presents a comparative summary of the expenditures under this category for the last two years:

—	Fiscal Year Ended March 31		Increase or Decrease (—)
	1951 (Estimated)	1950
	(In millions of dollars)
Net Income Deficits—
Canadian National Railways	3·3	42·0	—38·7
Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Ltd	1·0	0·5	0·5
Prince Edward Island Car Ferry and Terminals	1·3	1·2	0·1
Trans-Canada Airlines	1·3	4·3	—3·0

	7·1	48·1	—41·0
Loans and Advances, Non-Active—
National Harbours Board	1·4	4·2	—2·8
Total Government Owned Enterprises	8·4	52·4	—44·0

61. The decrease of $44 million as compared with the previous year is accounted for largely by a decrease of $38·7 million in the deficit of the Canadian National Railways from $42 million for the calendar year 1949 to $3·3 million for the year 1950. The overall C.N.R. deficit includes all interest charges paid on government advances. It should be noted, therefore, that although the charges to the government's expenditures for the fiscal year reflect the absorption of the C.N.R.'s total deficit of $3·3 million, the government's revenues for the year also include under "Return on Investments" an amount of $21·8 million received from the railways for interest on advances.

62. Other items contributing to the overall reduction include decreases of $3 million in the deficit of Trans-Canada Airlines for the calendar year 1950 as compared with that for 1949, and of $2·8 million in non-active advances to the National Harbours Board.

OTHER CHARGES, INCLUDING THE WRITE-DOWN OF ASSETS

63. The total expenditures for the fiscal year in this category are estimated at $82·3 million, a decrease of $83·2 million, as compared with the corresponding total of $165·5 million for 1949–50. The decrease is attributable to the absence in the accounts for the year under review of any items comparable to the charges in 1949–50 of $62·3 million in connection with the assumption by Canada of part of the Newfoundland debt in accordance with the Terms of Union, and of $21·7 million in connection with the write-down of certain active assets to non-active accounts.

64. The principal item is again an amount of $75 million transferred to the general reserve for possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets. This reserve was originally established in 1940–41 and the sum of $25 million was set aside annually from that time up to and including the fiscal year 1946–47. In 1947–48, 1948–49, 1949–50 and again this year the annual provision has been $75 million—the larger amount being deemed advisable to offset the charges that have been made to the reserve during the recent years and to establish the reserve at a level more commensurate with the magnitude of the Government's active assets. The reserve now stands at $395·9 million and is equivalent to approximately 7 per cent of the aggregate active assets.

65. Also included under this classification is the reserve provision of $7·3 million for conditional benefits under the Veterans' Land Act.

4. THE CASH ACCOUNTS

66. The full effects of the Government's financial operations are not reflected in the budgetary accounts; cash receipts from and cash payments to the public and the consequent cash surplus or deficit are more significant factors in determining the Government's borrowing program and in assessing the impact of the Government's transactions upon the other sectors of the Canadian economy. However, before proceeding to analyze the cash transactions, two preliminary comments should be made.

67. In the first place, it should be noted that some of the revenues and expenditures, which are included in the determination of the Government's budgetary surplus or deficit, are merely bookkeeping or accounting entries which do not involve the current receipt or outlay of cash. In the second place, it should be pointed out that the financial operations of the Government are not confined to the collection of revenues or the making of expenditures in the strict or narrow accounting or budgetary meaning of those terms. Large amounts of cash are received and disbursed in connection with extra-budgetary transactions and these receipts and disbursements must be taken into account when measuring the impact of the Government's financial operations upon the economy.

68. Examples of non-cash budgetary expenditures are the annual provision for the reserve for possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets, the write-off of a loan or advance where the debt has been cancelled or is no longer collectable, government contributions and interest transferred to deposit and trust and insurance, pension and guaranty accounts, interest accruals on War Savings Certificates, and the amortization of cash outlays made in previous years applicable to the current year (such as payments for premiums, discounts and commissions on loans). Examples of non-cash budgetary revenues are interest accruals added to principal on the consolidation of loans and the transfer to revenue of balances held in deferred credits, deposit or reserve accounts.

69. The extra-budgetary receipts and disbursements relate to transactions which result in increases or decreases in the Government's assets and liabilities, and they do not, therefore, appear in the Government's "Income" account nor do they enter into the calculation of the annual budgetary surplus or deficit. On the assets side, the transactions relate, for the most part, to advances and repayments of loans and investments to government agencies, foreign, provincial and municipal governments and other borrowers, and to a lesser extent to outlays for the acquisition of inventories of materials which will be used in the future, and for services rendered in one year but applicable to the accounts of subsequent years. On the liabilities side, the transactions relate primarily to the issue and redemption of securities representing the funded debt of Canada, and to receipts and payments in connection with the numerous deposit and trust, and annuity, insurance and pension funds held or administered by the Government.

70. As explained in the section "Highlights of Governmental Financial Operations During 1950–51", when the Government's budgetary surplus of $203·5 million for the fiscal year was adjusted for non-cash transactions, an amount of approximately $642·3 million remained. This sum, together with $150·2 million received from the repayment of loans, investments and working capital advances, net insurance, pension and annuity account contributions and other non-budgetary cash receipts, made $792·5 million available for making loans and investments and other non-budgetary outlay. Necessary loans and investments and other non-budgetary cash disbursements totalling $611·7 million which would otherwise have had to be financed by additional borrowing, were made during the fiscal year out of available cash resources, leaving a cash surplus of $180·8 million available for the reduction of outstanding funded debt.

71. The following summary, supported by a more detailed statement in the Supplementary Tables appended to this Part, shows an estimate of these non-income transactions, their relationship to the budgetary accounts, and their effect upon the government's net cash position.

		(In millions of dollars)

Deduct: Non-cash revenues		44·0

CASH DISBURSEMENTS (EXCLUDING DEBT TRANSACTIONS)				3,030·7

72. The figures indicate that after adjusting the budgetary revenues for non-budgetary receipts, a total of $3,211·5 million was available to the Government during the fiscal year. Out of this, budgetary cash expenditures of $2,419·0 million and non-budgetary disbursements of $611·7 million were made, leaving a cash surplus of $180·8 million available for debt reduction or increase in cash balances. The total of non-budgetary receipts is estimated at $150·2 million, made up of $82·7 million for net annuity, insurance and liability account receipts and $67·5 million for repayments of sundry loans and investments, of which $43·8 million was from the United Kingdom and other governments. Non-budgetary disbursements, which amounted to $611·7 million, consisted of $475 million for advances to the Foreign Exchange Control Board, $78·5 million for advances to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for housing constructions and housing loans, $19·9 million for advances to the Canadian National Railways, $20·6 million for miscellaneous loans or investments and working capital advances (including $15·1 million for loans to veterans), $10 million for discounts and commissions on loan flotations and $7·7 million for net payments from sundry suspense accounts.

73. As a result of total cash receipts exceeding total disbursements by $180·8 million and by letting cash balances run down by $25·4 million, the Government was able to acquire or retire funded debt outstanding in the hands of the public by a net amount of $206·2 million. A reconciliation of the cash surplus of $180·8 million, the reduction in outstanding funded debt, and the net change in the Government's cash position is shown below.

(In millions of dollars)

Cash surplus—or excess of total receipts over disbursements		$180·8

5. ESTIMATED BALANCE SHEET POSITION AT MARCH 31, 1951

74. The following table presents, in summary form, the Government's estimated balance sheet position at March 31, 1951, with the comparable figures for March 31, 1950.

NET DEBT (Excess of liabilities over net active assets)	11,441·1	11,644·6	−203·5

75. The aggregate liabilities of the Government as at March 31, 1951 are estimated at $16,935·2 million, an increase of $184·5 million over the corresponding total at the end of the previous year. Unmatured funded debt outstanding, including bonds, treasury bills, deposit certificates and the estimated refundable portion of excess profits taxes accounts for $15,027·3 million or approximately 89 per cent of all liabilities. Of the total unmatured funded debt now outstanding, only $419·9 million or approximately 2·8 per cent is payable in foreign currencies—$363·7 million payable in United States dollars and $56·2 million in pounds sterling. A complete statement in tabular form of the Government's unmatured funded debt at March 31, 1951, with details of interest rates, dates of maturity, annual interest charges, and amounts of principal outstanding for each loan may be found at the end of this Part.

76. Floating debt, consisting of outstanding cheques and interest, matured funded debt and similar demand liabilities is estimated at $498·1 million. Amounts at the credit of annuity, insurance, pension and guaranty accounts are expected to total $986·4 million.

77. The other principal items on the liabilities side of the balance sheet are: sundry suspense accounts (where some uncertainty as to disposition exists), $254·7 million; deposit and trust accounts (consisting of moneys deposited with or held in trust by the Receiver General for various purposes), $118 million; reserve for conditional benefits under the Veterans' Land Act, $27 million; province debt accounts (representing settlements arising out of agreements at the time of confederation), $11·9 million; and deferred credits (consisting of balances whose ultimate accounting treatment is known, but which are held until certain conditions are fulfilled), $11·8 million.

78. Offsetting these liabilities, and in a measure explaining their existence —as a substantial portion of the total debt is attributable to them—are the Government's active assets. Essentially, these consist of assets that yield interest, profits, or dividends, together with very liquid assets such as cash and departmental working capital funds and certain prepaid expenditures and sundry suspense accounts.

79. Although some of the items are very difficult to forecast, it is expected that the active assets will aggregate $5,890 million at March 31, 1951. The totals of the principal active asset categories at that date are estimated at: cash and other current assets, $1,893·7 million; loans to, and investments in, Crown agencies, $1,256 million; other loans and investments, (including loans to provincial, municipal, United Kingdom and other governments, subscriptions to international organizations, and a number of miscellaneous advances to veterans and others), $2,676·7 million; deferred charges (discounts and commissions on loan flotations in the process of being amortized over the life of the loans), $60 million; province debt accounts, $2·3 million; and sundry suspense accounts, $1·3 million.

80. The reserve for possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets which now stands on the books at $395·9 million is shown on the balance sheet as a deduction from the total of the active assets, bringing the net active asset total to $5,494·1 million.

A. Analysis of Changes in Principal Liability Classifications During 1950-51

81. It is estimated that there will be an increase of $184·5 million in the total liabilities during the fiscal year. The two most important increases are $175·5 million in the insurance, pension and guarantee accounts (attributable principally to increases of $66·3 million in the Government Annuities Account, and $85·3 million in the Civil Service Superannuation Account) and $183·9 million in sundry suspense account (due mainly to the undisbursed balance of $175·4 million in the accounts established pursuant to section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, to record the value of defence materials and supplies transferred to members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization).

82. The most significant reduction in the liabilities was the substantial decrease in the outstanding unmatured funded debt of the Government from $15,188·1 million at March 31, 1950 to an estimated amount of $15,027·3 million at March 31, 1951. This net reduction of $160·8 million compares with similar reductions of $396·9 million in 1949-50, $372·3 million in 1948-49, and $584·5 million in 1947-48.

Floating Debt

83. Floating debt shows an estimated decrease of $7·4 million in 1950-51. Decreases of $16·1 million in the Government's liability for matured funded debt payable in Canada and of $2·3 million in interest due and outstanding payable in Canada are offset partially by increases of $6·2 million in outstanding matured funded debt payable in New York and of $4·7 million in the Government's estimated liability for outstanding cheques.

Deposit and Trust Accounts

84. It is estimated that there will be a decrease of $14·7 million in deposit and trust accounts. A decrease of $17·5 million due to the elimination of the contra account for the Canadian Sugar Stabilization Corporation's price stabilization contingency reserve is offset in part by increases of $2 million in contractors securities cash deposits and of $2 million in the National Capital Fund.

Insurance, Pension and Guaranty Accounts

85. Insurance, pension and guaranty accounts show an estimated increase of $175·5 million during the fiscal year. Of this total $66·3 million is due to an increase in the Government Annuities Account; $85·3 million to an increase in the Civil Service Superannuation Account (of which $75 million is attributable to the Government's special contribution of a portion of the amount by which the estimated liabilities exceed the balance in the account); $18·3 million to an increase in the Permanent Services Pension Account; and the remainder to lesser increases in various miscellaneous insurance, guaranty, pension and retirement accounts.

Deferred Credits

86. Deferred credits are expected to show a small increase of $0·8 million during the fiscal year, one of the more important factors contributing to this net increase being additional receipts in connection with military relief and currency settlements.

Sundry Suspense Accounts

87. Sundry suspense accounts are expected to record an increase of $183·9 million during the fiscal year. Of this total $175·4 million represents the undisbursed balance of the credits under section 3 of The Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, representing the value of defence materials and supplies transferred to members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Under the terms of The Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, this amount may be used to purchase equipment or supplies for the naval, army or air services of the Canadian Forces. Also recorded under this heading is the Government's liability for collections of provincial 5 per cent corporation income taxes under The Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act. As collections during 1950–51 were higher than during the preceding year, and assessments and payments to the provinces were somewhat less, the estimated amount of $63·7 million at March 31, 1951 was approximately $13 million more than the corresponding amount at March 31, 1950.

Province Debt Accounts

88. There was no increase or decrease during the fiscal year in the Government's liability in respect of the province debt accounts. These amounts have remained unchanged for many years.

Reserve for Certain Contingent Liabilities

89. The reserve for certain contingent liabilities is expected to show an increase of $7·2 million during the fiscal year reflecting an additional provision for conditional benefits which may accrue to veteran borrowers under the Veterans' Land Act.

Funded Debt

90. It is estimated that there will be a net decrease in unmatured funded debt from $15,188·1 million at March 31, 1950 to $15,027·3 million at March 31, 1951. The over-all reduction of $160·8 million reflects decreases of $81 million in debt payable in Canada, $74·1 million in debt payable in New York, and $5·7 million in debt payable in London. The various loan redemptions, flotations and adjustments which resulted in the net decrease are described in greater detail in the section on "The Public Debt".

B. Analysis of Changes in Principal Active Asset Classifications During 1950–51

91. It is estimated that there will be an increase of $463·0 million in the total of the active assets during the fiscal year under review. However, with the provision of an additional $75 million for the reserve for possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets, net active assets are expected to show an increase of $388 million when the books are closed. Estimated increases of $415·1 million in cash and other current assets, and $101 million in loans to, and investments in, Crown agencies are offset by decreases of approximately $34·3 million in other loans and investments, $16·3 million in sundry suspense accounts, and $2·5 million in deferred charges.

92. The two most significant increases of $475 million in the advances to the Foreign Exchange Control Board, and $78·5 million in the net advances to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, were offset in part by the reduction of $43·8 million in loans to the United Kingdom and other governments, and the decrease of $46·8 million in cash in current and special deposits.

Cash and Other Current Assets

93. Cash and other current assets increased by approximately $415·1 million during the fiscal year as shown in the following table which summarizes the changes in the various accounts in this category:

CASH AND OTHER CURRENT ASSETS AS AT MARCH 31, 1951 AND MARCH 31, 1950

(In millions of dollars)

Departmental	22·0	41·7	−19·7
Crown corporations	17·8	16·8	1·0
	1,893·7	1,478·6	415·1

94. The two principal changes were an increase of $475 million in the advances to the Foreign Exchange Control Board and a decrease of $46·8 million in cash in current and special deposits. The increase of $475 million in advances to the Foreign Exchange Control Board represents additional cash advances during the year to finance the purchase of gold and foreign exchange. Other significant changes were a decrease of $19·7 million in departmental working capital advances (attributable largely to a decrease in advances to the Agricultural Prices Support Account), and an increase of $5·2 million in the bond holdings in the Securities Investment Account.

Loans to, and Investments' n, Crown Agencies.

95. Loans to, and investments in, Crown agencies increased by $101 million during 1950–51 from $1,155 million at March 31, 1950, to an estimated amount of $1,256 million at March 31, 1951. The changes during the fiscal year in this category of assets are summarized in the following table:

LOANS TO, AND INVESTMENTS IN, CROWN AGENCIES AS AT MARCH 31, 1951 AND MARCH 31, 1950

(In millions of dollars)

Other Crown Agencies	26·9	25·6	1·3
	1,256·0	1,155·0	101·0

96. Loans to railways and steamship companies represent in the main advances by the Government to the Canadian National Railways for capital expenditures (including the purchase of railway equipment), for retirement of maturing debt, and for the temporary financing of current operations. The increase of $20·2 million reflects net advances during the year of $19·9 million to the Canadian National Railways; the remaining $0·3 million represents an advance for working capital to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited.

97. The amount of $106·6 million shown for the National Harbours Board represents the net outstanding advances in connection with harbour developments at Montreal and Vancouver. These are the only advances to the National Harbours Board which are classified as active assets in the Government's accounts.

98. The Government's investment in Polymer Corporation Limited, a Crown corporation engaged in the manufacture of synthetic rubber, was reduced by $1·9 million during the fiscal year, the balance at March 31, 1951, being estimated at $41 million.

99. The amount of $26·9 million shown for other Crown agencies, represents subscriptions to the capital stock of, or advances to, sundry government agencies for capital, construction and other purposes. The total includes loans to, or investments in, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation ($8·4 million); Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation ($0·6 million); Eldorado Mining and Refining (1944) Limited ($8·2 million); Export Credits Insurance Corporation ($5 million); and Northwest Territories Power Commission ($4·7 million).

Other Loans and Investments.

100. This group of assets includes loans to the United Kingdom and various foreign governments, the Government's subscriptions to the capital of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, loans to provincial and municipal governments, and a number of miscellaneous loans and investments, the chief of which are the loans to veterans under the Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Acts. Details of the loans and investments in this category and changes during the fiscal year are shown in the following table:

OTHER LOANS AND INVESTMENTS AS AT MARCH 31, 1951, AND MARCH 31, 1950

Miscellaneous Loans and Investments	15·1	16·4	−1·3
	2,676·7	2,711·0	−34·3

101. The loans to the United Kingdom and other governments consist of loans to the Government of the United Kingdom under the authority of The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, and The United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, loans to other countries under Part II of the Export Credits Insurance Act, and miscellaneous foreign loans. A summary of the changes in each of these categories is shown in the following table:

	1,984·6	2,028·4	−43·8

102. It is estimated that during 1950–51 the Government of the United Kingdom will have repaid $40·5 million of the $700 million interest-free loan granted under the provisions of The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, reducing the balance outstanding of this loan to $251·5 million at March 31, 1951. During the year, however, additional advances of $20 million were made to the United Kingdom Government as part of the $1,250 million loan authorized by The United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act of 1946. On February 20, 1951, the United Kingdom Government announced that no further drawings would be made under the agreement. The total amount advanced now stands at $1,185 million.

103. The advances under Part II of The Export Credits Insurance Act represent loans made to certain foreign countries to assist them in purchasing goods and services in Canada. It is estimated that the total of outstanding advances under this Act will be $500·6 million at March 31, 1951, representing a net decrease of $23 million from the total of $523·6 million outstanding at the end of the previous year. A classification of these advances by recipient governments, showing the repayments during the year, is given in the following table:

ADVANCES TO FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS UNDER PART II OF THE EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

(In millions of dollars)

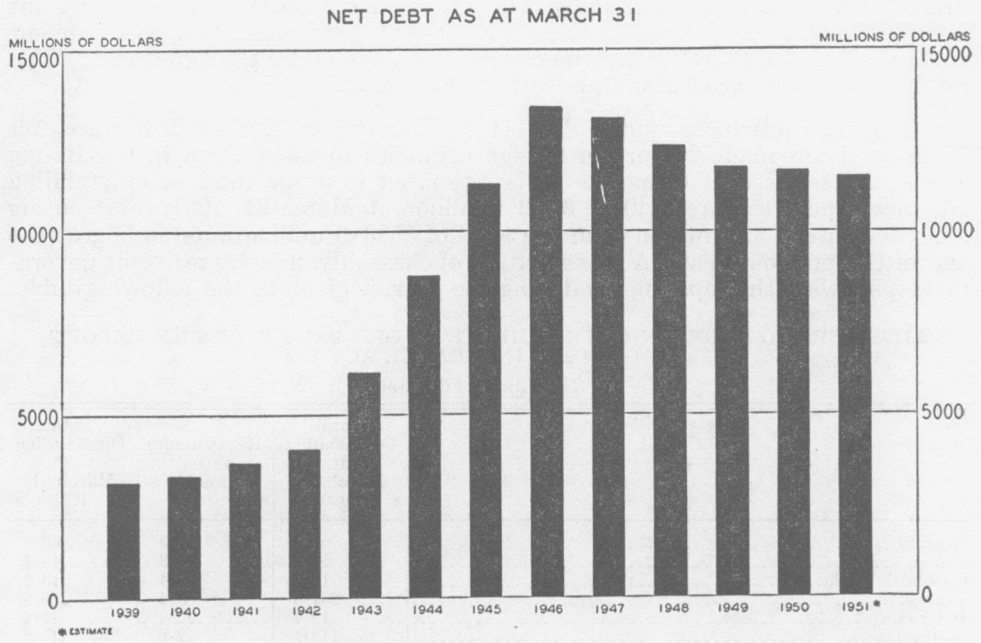
Deferred Charges.

104. It is estimated that unamortized discounts, premiums, redemption bonuses, and commissions on loans will be reduced by approximately $2·5 million during 1950–51. Discounts and commissions of $10 million on new loans are more than offset by the annual amortization of $12·5 million applicable to 1950-51 and charged to the year's expenditures.

Sundry Suspense Accounts.



105. The decrease of $16·3 million in this asset classification is due mainly to the elimination of the price stabilization contingency reserve of Canadian Sugar Stabilization Corporation Limited which was transferred to revenue during the fiscal year.

Reserve for Possible Losses on Ultimate Realization of Active Assets.

106. For the fourth successive year $75 million was added to this reserve with a corresponding amount being shown as an expenditure in the Government's accounts. There was no charge or write-off to the reserve during the fiscal year, the balance at March 31, 1951, being $395·9 million.

C. Decrease in Net Debt

107. The estimated surplus of $203·5 million for the fiscal year will result in a corresponding decrease in the net debt of Canada, reducing it from $11,644·6 million at March 31, 1950, to $11,441·1 million at March 31, 1951.

6. THE PUBLIC DEBT

Gross and Net Debt

108. The unmatured funded debt of Canada was reduced by $160·8 million during the fiscal year, of which $116·4 million represented cash retirements and $44·4 million revaluations and adjustments. However, due to increases of $345·3 million in other liabilities—principally in insurance, pension and guaranty and sundry suspense accounts—the gross public debt of Canada increased by $184·5 million from $16,750·7 million at March 31, 1950 to an estimated total of $16,935·2 million at March 31, 1951. During the same period, the net active assets increased by $388 million, with the result that the net debt—which is the gross debt less the active or revenue producing assets—was reduced by $203·5 million.

109. The following table shows the amount of net debt as at March 31, 1939 to March 31, 1951 inclusive, with the amount of annual increase or decrease.

1950	11,644·6	−131·5
1951	11,441·1	−203·5

Unmatured Funded Debt

110. The estimated total unmatured funded debt of Canada outstanding at March 31, 1951 was $15,027·3 million. This was $160·8 million less than at the end of the previous year and $1,779·9 million less than that at March 31, 1946.

Summary of Security Issues and Redemptions During the Year

111. Funded debt payable in Canada was reduced by $81 million from $14,688·5 million at March 31, 1950 to $14,607·4 million at March 31, 1951. Government obligations payable in Canadian dollars matured or were called for redemption during the fiscal year in the amount of $3,770·8 million. The financing of these retirements was effected as follows:

	(In millions of dollars)
By refunding or conversion into new issues	$ 3,245·0
By proceeds of new borrowings:
Sale of Canada Savings Bonds Series V (net)	267·2
Sale of Deposit Certificates (part)	200·0
From available cash	58·6
	$ 3,770·8

112. The retirement of $58·6 million out of available cash and the transfer of $25 million to revenue of the excess provision for the reserve for the refundable portion of excess profits tax, less $2·6 million of accrued interest which was added to the principal of War Savings Certificates during the fiscal year, accounts for the net reduction of $81 million in funded debt payable in Canadian dollars.

113. Funded debt payable in United States funds decreased by $74·1 million in the fiscal year. Of this amount, $55 million ($50 million U.S.) resulted from the redemption on October 1, 1950, of $100 million (U.S.) 4 per cent bonds which were refunded in part by an issue of $50 million (U.S.) twenty-five year 2¾ per cent bonds dated September 15, 1950. This issue was sold in New York at a cost of 2¾ per cent to the Government. In addition, the Canadian dollar value of funded debt payable in United States dollars was reduced by $19·1 million due to the change in the exchange rate resulting from the freeing of the Canadian dollar in September, 1950.

114. Funded debt payable in pounds sterling decreased during the fiscal year by $5·7 million. This was due to the redemption of $2·9 million registered stock on May 1, 1950 and $2·8 million arising out of the reduction in the Government's liability expressed in Canadian dollars for outstanding sterling issues consequent upon the change in the exchange rate following the freeing of the Canadian dollar in September 1950.

AVERAGE INTEREST RATE ON FUNDED DEBT

115. From the above analysis it will be seen that the over-all reduction of $160·8 million in the Government's outstanding debt arose from cash payments of $116·4 million and of revaluations and adjustments totalling $44·4 million.

116. The average coupon rate on the Government's outstanding funded debt at the close of the current fiscal year is estimated at 2·60 per cent unchanged from the previous fiscal year end.

117. More complete details of redemptions and new issues of securities during the fiscal year are set out in the following tables.

Indirect or Contingent Liabilities

118. It should be noted that the Government has assumed certain indirect or contingent liabilities which are in addition to the direct debt set out in the balance sheet. Included under this heading, for example, are the Government's guarantees of certain securities issued by various Government owned enterprises such as the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, and the Saint John Harbour Commission; the guarantee of deposits maintained by the chartered banks in the Bank of Canada; guarantees of certain loans made by chartered banks to veterans or farmers for certain authorized purposes; guarantees under the Export Credits Insurance Act; and certain commitments under housing legislation.

119. The following table gives details of the bonds and debenture stocks guaranteed by the Government, and also indicates the nature and approximate extent of the Government's other guarantees and contingent liabilities.

120. It will be noted that the total of guaranteed bonds and debentures outstanding at March 31, 1951, is estimated at $576·5 million, an increase of approximately $6 million over the amount outstanding at March 31, 1950. This increase resulted from an issue of $6 million Canadian National Railway Company 2¾ per cent twenty-five year bonds dated June 15, 1950, guaranteed by the Government of Canada.

LAURIER HOUSE

PROVISION FOR ADMINISTRATION OF THE MACKENZIE KING TRUST ACCOUNT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the administration of Laurier House, in the city of Ottawa, and of an account to be set up in the consolidated revenue fund to be known as the Mackenzie King trust account to which shall be credited the sum of $225,000 given by the will of the late the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, P.C., O.M., to the government of Canada, to be expended for the purposes of such administration.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

Proposed Legislation

KINGSMERE PARK

ADMINISTRATION OF BEQUEST TO GOVERNMENT OF CANADA UNDER THE WILL OF THE LATE MR. MACKENZIE KING

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the administration of Kingsmere park by the federal district commission and the management and control of the buildings in the park and the yards, orchards and appurtenances thereto by the Minister of Public Works in accordance with the will of the late the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, P.C., O.M., with authority in the governor in council to set aside any part of the park as a country home for the holder of the office of prime minister, such park to be deemed included in the properties described in the schedule to the Prime Minister's Residence Act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES ACT

INCREASE IN SALARIES AND NUMBERS OF JUDGES—ADJUSTMENTS IN PENSIONS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Judges Act, 1946, to increase the salaries of judges, other than the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada; to increase the number of judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario and of the Superior Court of Quebec; and to provide certain adjustments as to pensions of judges and widows of judges.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order in connection with the wording of this resolution. I feel that I should raise the point of order now lest I be told at a later stage of the debate that I should have raised it at this time. I am quite prepared that my point of order should be considered and ruled upon at a later stage, but I would like Your Honour to consider citations 433, 436, 439 and others in Beauchesne, third edition, which have to do with a resolution preceding a money bill.

It seems to me quite clear from these citations that while the resolution preceding a money bill does not need to disclose all the details in the bill, it should set a limit on the amount of money being asked for by the crown. Those citations and others indicate that the debate at the resolution stage is on a certain expenditure asked for by the crown. There is one exception indicated, which suggests that if no ceiling is placed on the amount, private members may move to increase it when the house is in committee of the whole on the bill. Certainly that is not my purpose in connection with this resolution, but it does seem to me that the government is getting a bit careless in connection with these resolutions and is bringing in too many of them without fixing the maximum amount that may be included in the bill.

Through the years I have made quite a study of this matter, and I have gone over it again in the last day or so. As one goes back through the years it appears that the practice was very well established, until about four or five years ago, that every resolution preceding a money bill spelled out the total amount of money that would be required under that bill. The resolution introduced by the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he was minister of justice, changing the provisions with regard to the pensions of judges so that they could award a portion of their pensions to their widows, spelled out those provisions. So it has been with old age pensions and family allowances. This morning in the library I went back to the records of 1867, 1872 and so on, and down through the years the practice has been very definite. I submit that the government is getting away from the practice of the house and the spirit of the citations to which I have referred when resolutions are brought down in this way.

On a point of privilege I might also express my regret that while the resolution does not tell us the maximum amount involved in this bill, the press seems to have that information. That is another point about which I shall not say more now, but I should like to suggest that by the time this matter reaches another stage we might have consideration by Your Honour as to whether resolutions in this blank cheque form are regular.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take into consideration what has been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). As he has stated, resolutions in a form similar to this have been allowed to stand in the past, and in this case I shall allow this resolution to stand. However, as I stated above, I shall give consideration to what he has said. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt this motion?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

BUTTER IN STORAGE AND SALES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture when he expects to table a return, concerning butter in storage, to an order of the house, passed on March 5?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I should say to the hon. member that there has been some delay because of the fact that there are several hundred of these persons or companies across Canada, from Vancouver to Halifax, to whom butter has been delivered; and the return was completed only today. I signed it a few minutes ago, and I should think it will be tabled tomorrow.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED REQUEST OF HOLLINGER COMPANY FOR PERMISSION TO EMPLOY DISPLACED PERSONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Maltais (Charlevoix): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour or his parliamentary assistant, of which I gave notice before coming into the chamber.

(Translation):

My question arises from a news item in Le Soleil of Quebec, of April 7 last, stating that the Hollinger North Shore Company, which is developing the north shore district, intends to seek authority from the government to bring refugees to Canada and put them to work in Ungava and on the north shore. I would like to know if there is any truth in that report.

If it is true, would the representative of the Department of Labour tell me whether the usual steps have been taken to inform the unemployed—especially in adjacent counties on the north shore and in Charlevoix-Montmorency county, through the unemployment insurance commission's offices at La Malbaie and Montmorency—that work is available in that district?

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. However, in the few moments that have elapsed since I received his memorandum, I have procured only preliminary information which does not enable me to give him the answer he has a right to expect. But I can promise him more complete information later this afternoon or tomorrow at the latest.

KOREA

QUESTION AS TO RECALL OF GENERAL MACARTHUR FROM COMMAND OF UNITED NATIONS TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): I should like to ask the minister of external affairs a question which he may see fit to answer today or at some other time. There seems to be some confusion as to the recall of General MacArthur, arising out of the presidential authority to recall him, in view of the fact that General MacArthur has been the commander of the United Nations forces and we are one of the nations supplying those forces. The question arises whether or not Canada should have been consulted. Would the minister care to make a statement now, or perhaps tomorrow?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire at this time, or even tomorrow, to comment on the nature of the action taken by the President of the United States in this matter. I can, however, for the benefit of the hon. member and the house, briefly outline the procedure under which that action was taken.

When the security council, by its resolution of July 7, 1950, established a unified command to conduct the military operations in Korea, it requested the United States to designate the commander of the United Nations forces there. In response to this request of the security council, President Truman the following day designated General MacArthur as the commanding general of the military forces placed by the members of the United Nations under the unified command. I understand that the President of the United States has now decided that the conduct of the military operations in Korea should be entrusted to other hands, and, acting under the mandate given to him by the security council resolution to which I have referred, has appointed General Ridgway as the United Nations commander in place of General MacArthur. This decision is clearly one which falls within the sphere of authority which has been given to the President of the United States by the United Nations itself.

CANDY

QUESTION AS TO REDUCTION OF PRICE AS A RESULT OF BUDGET PROVISIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure to which minister I should address this question, but perhaps the Minister of Justice will take notice of it. It has to do with the announcement last night in the budget address that there would be a decrease in the taxation on candy. According to the newspapers the manufacturers are not going to decrease the price of candy. Will the minister see that justice is done in this respect?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I shall be glad to take my hon. friend's question as notice and see what can be done along the lines he suggests.

SUPPLY

COST OF LIVING—AMENDMENT, MR. DREW

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, in asking for some measure of price control at this time, there is no need for me to speak at any length, and I shall not do so. The arguments have been presented, the figures have been placed on the record, and almost everything has been said that can be said on behalf of our party. I particularly endorse what has been said concerning the stand of my party on the matter. I might read two or three clauses that were adopted at the convention of the party in Vancouver in 1950. They are:

1. The reimposition of price controls on the necessities of life, with an adequate subsidy program where necessary;
2. The prevention of any further general increase in rents;
3. Effective action to halt price fixing and other restrictive practices by monopolies and combines.

We had an unfortunate experience some time previously with the actions of these monopolies and combines. All I wish to do here is to endorse that stand, as I have done on every opportunity which has arisen.

So much for the record outside the house. Inside the house we have, since 1946, consistently followed this same policy, in that we have opposed every move of this government to abandon price and rent controls, subsidies and the excess profits tax. Since the abandonment of these measures, we have continued to press for their reimposition. I think it will be acknowledged by all parties that in that early struggle we stood alone. We are glad that the situation has changed now. We welcome the support which we are receiving from other quarters. Personally, I did not expect that the leader of the Conservative opposition would ever move the amendment which he did the other day. It is true that he moved it with some reservations, but he did move it, as he said, in consideration of the important crisis which had arisen.

The hardships due to the high cost of living have increased progressively through the years with the constant rise in the price of commodities. The whole country has now become price conscious, and well it might—because people have had a good deal of experience with high costs, and no little difficulty—when we have a price index as of March 1 of 179·7. I do not know to what extent it has increased since, but that was an increase of 4½ points over the corresponding date of the month before.

The demand for action to call a halt in this progressive rise of prices has become articulate—nay, has become almost vociferous throughout the whole country. Organizations of the people everywhere have joined their voices to the chorus: the farmer, labour, the consumer, and individuals in their thousands. What then, you might ask, are we waiting for? Just for this government, which knows so much better, which is so much wiser than the millions of people whom it represents.

The price rise is at the moment the most unsettling factor in our whole economy. It has prepared the way for another round of demands for wage and salary rises, for increased pensions and the like. It strikes hardest at those who are least able to cope with it. Among those one might mention the unorganized workers, old age pensioners, and those on small fixed incomes, such as retired civil servants.

While the high cost of living ruins the individual, its partner and twin, inflation, is ruining the nation. Inflation in the domestic field is confiscation of a real sort: confiscation in the matter of bonds, insurance, and cash. In its effect upon the defence program, it is the great saboteur. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is taking certain measures in an effort to curb it. Let us hope they will be successful. They may be in certain directions, but in others I think the minister's announcements will, on balance, increase inflation, or, where there is any deflation as a result, it will be at the expense of a lower standard of living on the part of the people.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) told us the other day, in his speech in this debate, that there was not a shortage of civilian goods. There is of course a shortage of many materials that go into supplies for defence preparations. I wonder if the minister, in making his statement, had thought of newsprint, or had included the matter of newsprint. There seems to be a shortage of that commodity. I saw some report to the effect that the President of France had talked that matter over with some of the Canadian authorities, saying that his country would be glad to get some newsprint from Canada. Strange to say, I had thought of this point in connection with the matter of price control. I had thought of it in the matter of our potential shortage not only of defence goods but of civilian goods. In discussing these potential shortages, or the rising of prices, or the need for economy, I would draw attention to a form of price rise that I think has not been previously mentioned in this house. I refer to an absurd situation which arose often during the last war, when large advertisers continued advertising products which were in short supply and when none or very few of them were available to the public. Many advertisements made no claim even to having any of the goods in stock, but, no doubt at great expense, they filled up our national magazines with what I would call phony and futile advertising. I say "futile" so far as the public is concerned, because there was certainly some method in the madness, or the apparent madness, of the people who were doing the advertising.

These corporations and manufacturers were by that method evading heavy payment of income tax and wasting some of our much-needed natural resources. They contributed to the spoliation of our forests for unnecessary purposes, and restricted the supply of paper which might have been used for a more genuine activity. Surely it should not be impossible to evolve an amendment to the income tax law which would limit the percentage of costs which these firms may charge to advertising as an exemption. I should have asked the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) about this, but it is possible that there are some such restrictions now. If so, I think they should be tightened in that respect so that these people may not go on fooling the public in this particular manner. It might put an end to this present situation, which virtually means that the public is, in a manner, subsidizing the operations of these corporations. As the price of paper goes up, the price of advertising must of necessity go up correspondingly. Since the cost of advertising ultimately must be added to the cost of the goods, I submit that this is a place where price control as such might be employed. When the goods are scarce, or when there are virtually no goods to which this extra cost can be applied, how much greater must be the added cost under those circumstances. I urge the government to give some consideration to this matter, to put an end to this phony advertising, to make it unprofitable, and at the same time to bring down, even if only a little, the prices of the goods which are so advertised.

There is a kindred matter which I think I should mention here, because it is relevant to the same subject about which I have been talking, namely dishonest advertising. I refer to the liquor advertising which one finds in our magazines and periodicals. The last time —and the only other time—that I brought this matter up I was told that it was entirely within provincial jurisdiction. I do not here enter this argument on a moral basis. I am not for the moment discussing the question whether or not liquor should be advertised. I am, however, stating that under the laws of certain of the provinces, liquor advertising as such is forbidden. Yet in our magazines we find some more of this phony advertising, as I call it—phony, but perhaps in this case not futile from the manufacturers' point of view, because the advertising, as we all know, is cleverly done. You pick up your paper and you do not see any direct advertising of any particular brand of liquor; for that is specifically forbidden. But you find a pretty picture; you find the name of a prominent brewer or distiller. You find a picture which appeals to sportsmen and to youth—a pretty scene around a lake, a baseball game being played, a pair of mallard ducks in the sights of a shotgun. It is all appealing to young people, and they read it; but so far as I am concerned, it is a bit of hypocrisy. If it is the law that liquor can be advertised, all right; I am not making any objection. Let them advertise liquor. On the other hand, if it is not legal to advertise liquor in this province then let them stick not only to the letter but to the spirit of such legislation. I do not know that that has any particular bearing on the matter of prices, but there it is, as having some relevancy to my previous argument.

In conclusion, sir, if I may revert to the matter of price control and to the little nursery rhyme with which I opened my remarks last night, perhaps I might address these gentlemen in the guise of a consumer, and say to them:

> What tho' I suffer countless ills?
> What tho' I cannot pay my bills?
> Never you mind, ball, roll on.

And so the government rolls on its course, in spite of the pleas of the people.

The Minister of Finance has announced that his government has no immediate plans for the control of prices. He has no intention to curb prices. In all conscience, to be fair, I cannot accuse the government of complete apathy, or indifference, or worse, but I can at least state my own opinion: I believe that in that decision the government is wrong, and that the history of this day will prove it. Micawber-like, the government looks to the future for the solution, in the hope that the grinding wheels of history may evolve some betterment, and apparently it is prepared to accept as inevitable the fact that many people will be pinched in the grinding process. I do not view inflation or high prices as things over which this government is unable to exert any control. I ask the government to take some action on the high cost of living, and to take it now.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, one of the cleverest moves of the session was the one by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) to move such an amendment as this: The house is of the opinion that in view of the announcement made on Wednesday last of the greatest monthly increase in the Canadian cost of living during the month of February to the disastrously high level of 179·9 points, immediate consideration should be given to the adoption of appropriate measures to hold down the cost of living and halt inflation.

This was very clever and very smart, because it was done just on the eve of the budget speech to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance and of the government to the high cost of living in Canada. The leader of the opposition must have real satisfaction in realizing that the minister took into consideration what he said in giving the final touch to his budget speech.

It is evident that the cost of living is high, and that was evident even before the leader of the opposition made his speech and other hon. members spoke in the house about the amendment. It was realized by all of us and by our families that the cost of living is pretty high. But may I be permitted, sir, to go back a few years to the time when international monetary and economic agreements were signed by many countries with a view to improving living conditions and decreasing the cost of living. What is the result? The result is that we have inflation, not only in Canada, but throughout the world. It is worse in the United States than it is in Canada, as everybody knows. And what about England? Inflation is so high there that they cannot even give decent meat rations to the good people of the British isles. It is a general calamity.

While I will not discuss the budget speech, I will refer to it incidentally and say that the minister has taken into consideration the earning power of the individual, and the increase in taxation is graduated. Those who have small incomes pay little, and those who have higher incomes pay more. The taxation will be in proportion to the income of the people, which is fair. But if we go back to the cause of taxation, what do we find? I repeat to my colleagues what I said to them about the gift loans made during the war. War expenditure is the cause of high taxation, which is admitted by everybody. When I protested against the expedition to Korea I was alone in the house. Some hon. members looked at me over their shoulders, and they had a queer expression in their eyes. I was nearly alone. But the war expenditure is the cause of high taxation. Remove the cause and you remove the effect. It is a matter to be considered.

I am not blaming anyone for the views he has expressed or the vote he has given. We are in a free country, and I respect that freedom much more than some of the hon. gentlemen who speak so much about it. But now we have to face the condition which prevails here, and we have to take into consideration not only the effect but the cause. That being said, the government are doing the best they can to improve conditions.

In the debate that we have had for two days, with only the interlude of the budget speech, interesting speeches were made by every hon. member who addressed the Chair. Information was given about the cost of living in this country. I agree that the picture which has been painted of living conditions in Canada is accurate. I do not deny it. But what struck me during the debate was that all the hon. gentlemen who had spoken offered no constructive criticism whatever except the imposition of controls. Well, sir, I see some of my hon. friends opposite, some of whom I admire. I admire their genius, their gift of speech and all the qualities that a good parliamentarian should have. I wonder what constructive suggestions they have made, and what constructive suggestions they will make. They will say, "Let us have controls". Controls—when the prices are at the highest peak? It means that if prices are controlled when they are at their highest, the government will have to pay the difference and impose additional taxation to cover the amount of money that will have to be paid by the country to reduce prices artificially. That is my understanding of it. If the price of any commodity is 150 and someone suggests that it should be brought down to 100, who will bring it down, and who will pay for it? According to these people the government will bring it down to 100 and will pay the 50 from the pockets of the taxpayers.

An hon. Member: And rations.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, and rations. This means that the taxpayers will not be any the richer for it. They will have to open their purses and put their hands in their pockets to pay the additional taxation. That is what happens—and I leave it to any hon. member to suggest any other plan.

The plan offered for the setting up of controls is an absurd one. What is the government doing? It is trying to bring the attention of the people to the abnormal situation existing today. I hope that this year the people of Canada will be more reasonable in their purchases, that they will think of the future, and that they will not spend at once, as they do so often, all the money they earn, but rather that they will think of the future and will be more thrifty.

What I am about to say may be commonplace and may not add much to the debate, but there is an expression found in the bible which I suggest is appropriate. It has been true from the time it was written, and it is still true: desolatione desolata est omnis terra, quia nullus est qui recogitet corde. I am not speaking Armenian; I am speaking Latin which may be interpreted in this way: The land is desolate because there is no one who thinks from the bottom of his heart. I may not have recited accurately the text from the King James bible or the Catholic bible, but it is the idea conveyed by holy writ. It was true when it was written centuries ago, just as it is true today.

Each one of us, each taxpayer in Canada, knows that inflation exists, inflation that was fought for such a long time by so many artificial means. We know it exists in this country, just as it exists elsewhere throughout the world, except perhaps in the south sea islands where there is no established government. I deplore the fact that there are men in the bureau of statistics who are paid to make calculations about the high cost of living, and that they give that information to the radio stations to be broadcast throughout the country. If they gave us knowledge we did not already have, I would be all for it; but no one knows better than the Canadian taxpayer himself the cost of purchasing commodities. I do not see why so many men are employed, at good salaries and at the expense of the taxpayer, to repeat information we already know—that the cost of living is high in Canada, and that the index is at a certain level. It is an American invention with which I do not agree.

It is precisely because of these advertisements as to the cost of living index, advertisements appearing in the press and over the radio, that there has been so much difficulty among labour unions and with many individuals in Canada. They have been taking advantage of the figures given by the bureau of statistics with respect to the cost of living to ask for proportionate increases in wages and salaries; and there is no end to it.

I will not say that the figure 179·7 mentioned by the leader of the opposition is an accurate one. I know very well that for many commodities it is not accurate, because the cost of living is higher in respect of those commodities. But whatever the figure may be, no one in Canada can be better informed than the man who looks after his business or goes to the store to buy clothing or food, or makes any of the other normal living expenditures.

I am not preaching obscurantism; I want my fellow citizens to be as well informed as any member of the Social Credit group would want them to be. But I do not see the use of maintaining, at high cost, a group of men to prepare statistics on the cost of living which, whether or not they are erroneous, create disturbance in the country, arouse the feelings of the people and cause them to worry about conditions in Canada. It does not do anything to help the Canadian people —and in due course I shall ask how many are working on this assignment, and how much they are paid.

I shall not speak longer, because there is other legislation on the order paper, and we are about to have a budget debate, at which time all the questions that have been under discussion for two days as a result of the amendment of the leader of the opposition may be the subject of discourse or suggestion by any hon. member.

I will add just one further word. Under the previous regime we heard suggestions from the opposition as to new leadership. We hear no more about it now, because the country is satisfied with the leadership given by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his colleagues; and that is why I shall not vote in favour of the amendment, which amounts to a motion of want of confidence. I am satisfied with the government. They are not perfect, but they do all they can, and they do as well as anyone else would in their stead. If there are hon. members of the opposition who are going to speak after me, they will be welcome, but I should like them to tell the house what they would do if they were in power now to control an inflation which is world-wide.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have sat here through the debate waiting to hear the answer to the question that the Canadian people are asking: what is the government going to do about the high cost of living? What is going to be done about inflation? What measures are to be taken? For two days this discussion has proceeded, and as yet there is no suggestion that anything effective is to be done to meet a situation that affects every home in the country. No proof is needed that inflation today is terrible in its incidence and effect. No one expects the government to do everything, but at least the people as a whole have the right to expect that the government will do something at this time.

As I have listened to the debate I have wondered whether we in this house realize the situation in the country today. The people are asking us for leadership. They are asking us for hope. They are asking for suggestions as to what can be done. They need no proof that the dollar today has a purchasing value of only fifty-eight cents. Those who have saved money over the years, pensioners and those in the lower income groups, need no proof that prices have got out of bounds. All they ask is that the government in power, with the ability to act in this matter of prices, should do something effective, and do it now.

I remember the days of Mr. Bennett when he was blamed for everything in this country. He was blamed for conditions with respect to prices and unemployment. In those days my hon. friends opposite did not admit at any time that world conditions had anything to do with it, but today they blame world conditions. They are taking no action. They have made no serious retrenchment in controllable expenditures. It is true that they have removed a few mail carriers. These people move throughout the various communities in which they live, and will afford evidence that something is being done; but other than that, where is the retrenchment, where the indication on the part of the government that they are taking the lead in reducing expenditures?

Some say that price controls will not work; others say they will. Those who sold the concept of price control as an effective deterrent to high costs were members now sitting on the government side. For five, six, seven long years they sold the Canadian people on the concept that all you have to do is put a ceiling on prices and the consequence would be that the cost of living will be kept on an even keel. That was not our view; it was the view of the government. It was the view they expounded throughout the country over and over again in 1945, and in election advertising which is still available. Their campaign in 1945 was based on the idea that they had kept costs down. They said: We did it where no other country could do it; with our magnificent system we gave a lead to every other country in the world; we led the United States; their prices went up; we established a control system that was effective. That was the story over and over again.

In the House of Commons as late as 1947 the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) was asked a question by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said:

> I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a question. Is he in a position to confirm or comment on a report credited to a government financial expert that every dollar spent on price control has saved the consumer at least $55?

The Minister of Finance replied:

> I do not know who the government financial expert is, and I cannot vouch for the accuracy of the figure of $55, but I can say that I am sure the money spent on price control has saved the Canadian consumer very considerable sums.

And so it was with various other members of the cabinet. They held up their ideas and knowledge of economics as superior to that of any other government in the world. They said it could be done. They sold the idea. What a change! Were the promises of 1945 sincerely made? Was the statement correct that through the years over $2 billion had been saved as a result of price control, or were these statements merely window-dressing? Today they have an opportunity, but what do they say? They offer alibis, make excuses, refer to world conditions, and say that the farmer is getting a large portion of the price paid by the consumer. That has been said repeatedly of late; it was said the other night by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). That statement is designed for one purpose—in order to induce farmers in the country to believe that anything that is done to meet inflation will hurt their earning power.

I think it should be realized that the price paid by consumers in Canada for farm products is not the price the farmer receives. The time has come to investigate the spread between the price the farmer receives and the price that is being paid by consumers. There is a tremendous spread, and I ask any farmer in the house if that is not so. The government say that we pay a high price for beef because of the United States market. Look at the spread between the price the farmer receives for beef and the price the Canadian consumer pays. What is being done by the government to investigate that situation? The Liberal party used to contend that the Conservative party was the ally of the big interests. The big interests in this country have not been shown that the government is in any way inimicable to any injustices perpetrated. Why is there not an investigation? What does the farmer get of the consumer's dollar? Statistics show that the spread is very great between farmers' and consumer prices. Now instead of acting with resolution, instead of carrying out the promises of yesteryear, the ministers go across Canada and say in effect, "We can do nothing. We are helpless. We are hopeless."

Mr. Stick: They do not say that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They say the people should act for themselves and save themselves from inflation. During one of his recent junkets the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was in Saskatoon, where he delivered a speech which he said some might regard as the "unctuous counsel of perfection". That was his own label. In that speech he set out what could be done, and mentioned various things. No longer is price control the solution, he said. In fact price control did not keep down prices, according to the minister, who had this to say:

> Controls never eradicate inflation. They merely postpone and conceal its effects.

What a change that is from a few years ago, when we were told of the hundreds of millions of dollars that had been saved as a result of price control. We were not of that view, but that was what the government contended. Today, faced with a situation which they realize is serious, they say price control is not effective and indeed never was effective. The Minister of Justice stated the businessmen of this country must accept responsibility regarding keeping down rising prices and the producers must produce more. In other words everyone else is to be responsible for the condition that exists, rather than the government of the day. The minister spoke of "psychological intangibles so important in this emergency period." He spoke of measures that will be taken; he mentioned the need of economy, and then he used these potent words, with which I agree: "This government will not shrink from the task of imposing taxes."

A psychological intangible? That is to be the final solution. We must rely on the courage of a government that will not shrink from something it certainly has not shrunk from doing in the last few years. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) wants to know what can be done, at a time when inflation is sapping the vitals of this country. I cannot refer to what is in the budget which was brought down last evening, but one of the ways that used to be put forward by some hon. members to meet inflation and reduce the cost of living was to remove the sales tax on necessities required by people on low incomes. What a story the sales tax makes over the years. It was imposed in 1921, and was then 1 per cent. By 1935 it was 6 per cent. The Liberal party in the election of 1935, claimed the sales tax was wrong and unjust, that it should be removed on necessities. Then in May, 1936, after the election was won, it was raised to 8 per cent, where it has remained through the years. It is an attractive tax for the government purpose because it conceals from the people what they are paying. As I recall this government has not been above concealment as it did a flour milling report for quite a period. The sales tax is a cover up, and at a time when the people are asking for relief taxation is to be increased on such necessities as clothing, furniture and other things required in our homes. Is increasing the sales tax a way to meet inflation? Will it operate to deter the people from buying, when they do not know they are paying it? Surely the people of this country have a right to expect something more than a tax which Mr. Ilsley himself condemned in 1941, at page 2353 of Hansard. Referring to the sales tax he said:

> This tax, while comparatively easy of administration and collection and extremely productive, has marked defects as a fiscal instrument. After extended consideration, we decided on balance against any increase. In coming to this decision, we were not forgetful of the problems of agriculture, which would have been intensified had the sales tax been raised.

Does anyone suggest that raising the sales tax and hiding it from the people is going to meet the problem of inflation and raise the standard of living in this country? The Minister of Justice was quite right when he said the government would not shrink from taxation. Not only that, but steps are now being considered with a view to bringing in an amendment to the constitution to provide for a turnover tax of 3 per cent by the provinces. While incomes shrink by inflation the government does not shrink from adding two per cent to the sales tax, and at the same time permitting the provinces to impose an indirect tax of 3 per cent. Surely the government is not so devoid of ideas that it can think of no other way to meet inflation but through the medium of additional taxation hidden from the people.

The turnover tax is one of the most dangerous things that could be brought into being in this country. It is a denial of the spirit of confederation which removed tariffs as between provinces. It is a denial of the concept upon which confederation was built. The ministers ask what can be done. Surely the government is not so bereft of capacity that it can think of nothing but to put the responsibility back upon the people as a whole. The ministers go around the country and admit inflation is bad, but if only the people will act for themselves things will get better. They say they cannot do anything, but that if only the people of Canada will exercise that fine fortitude and discrimination which the ministers ask them to exercise all will be well and inflation will be met. Why no positive action?

Why not remove the sales tax as far as necessities are concerned? Why not investigate the spread between what the farmer receives for the raw material and the price at which food is sold?

You know, Mr. Speaker, the safest offence a person can commit in Canada now is a breach of the combines act; that is one thing you can do with impunity. A few years ago parliament put teeth in the combines act. They have done mighty little biting since 1947. Under the combines act,

> "Combine" means among other things a combination having relation to any commodity which may be the subject of trade or commerce, of two or more persons by way of actual or tacit contract, agreement or arrangement, having or designed to have the effect of . . .

—enchancing the price, rental or cost of an article, storage or transportation; prevent or lessen competition. Is it not a strange thing, Mr. Speaker, that without agreement amongst the various manufacturers their prices go up at the same time? That is more than financial telepathy. It cannot be accounted for by coincidence alone. How many prosecutions have there been in the last year? How many investigations have taken place under the provisions of this act? How many have taken place during the last year? Mr. Speaker, the flour milling report was lost or covered up.

Mr. Howe: That was during the time of R. B. Bennett.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, Mr. Bennett was not in power in 1949 when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), in co-operation with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), interfered with the law of this country and protected the wrongdoers. There have been no recent prosecutions except one, which is now before the courts.

I suggest that the combines act could be used, not for the purpose of interfering with lawful and legitimate business; not for the purpose of preventing fair and reasonable profits, but only in the cases where there is wrongdoing under the combines act or Criminal Code. You cannot tell me that prices are being increased from day to day by operation of the laws of supply and demand alone. You cannot tell me that day after day the same increase takes place by one company in the maritimes and by another company in the prairies, and that in such cases there is no combine. The people of Canada are asking that action be taken where there is wrongdoing, or where as the Minister of Trade and Commerce said certain business interests were all set to take advantage of the people by the exaction of unjust monopoly prices. What the minister meant, I take it, is that there were manufacturers and industrialists who were raising their prices by agreement without regard to the costs of production but because they feared a ceiling would be placed on prices. If that was done, then offences against the combines act were committed—an offence against the people of Canada. The time has come to ask for the enforcement of the law. Legitimate business has nothing to fear under the law.

Sir, no one need fear the combines act who lives within the law. No one need fear prosecution unless an offence has been committed. Can good business practices justify some of the accelerated increases, in the last fifteen to eighteen months, in the prices of various commodities and manufactured goods. It is not a question of production, although the Minister of Trade and Commerce quite properly says that production might ultimately meet the situation. The Minister of Justice said in his speech to which I previously referred, that there "are too many dollars chasing too few goods." I say there are too many members of the cabinet, including the Minister of Justice, who are allowing wrongdoers, whose objective is too many profiteering dollars for themselves at the expense of too many consumers, to continue to raise prices unjustly and arbitrarily.

This is one of the most serious problems facing our country. Our defence depends on the dollar securing the largest possible return. Our people demand that, and our people have a right to expect that the government will not abdicate its responsibility to them. That is something it very seldom does, but in this case wherever ministers discuss the subject they blame an alleged world-wide situation, and that the people can remedy inflation if they will only act in concert. There is no doubt that production would help. There is no doubt that there are far too many dollars in circulation, having regard to the needs and exigencies of finance. There is no doubt that a greater help would be if the government would say to those who are taking advantage, "The time has come for you to realize that injustice, exploitation and profiteering will not be condoned but will be punished by us." Such a stand would start a recession in price levels in this country, without any detriment to the producer but with benefit to the consumer. What have those who want to benefit themselves through exploitation of the people to worry about under the law as now enforced? According to the Minister of Trade and Commerce some business interests were set to take advantage several months ago. They have not been set since, some have actually been in full operation.

If the government wanted to act, it could do so by serving stern notice that price spreads are going to be investigated unless there is a lessening of this accelerated increase in prices; and that where there are obvious unlawful and arbitrary increases in prices, the combines act will be used. So far as the consumer in Canada today is concerned, it is open season. We have the laws and they could be enforced. In my opinion the lack of enforcement of the law is an inducement and encouragement to wrongdoers who wish to exploit the people of our country.

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I shall repeat what has been said by nearly everyone who has taken part in this debate, that I am going to be brief. There are a few things I believe I should say. It makes it a little difficult for me to follow such an eloquent speaker as the one who has just preceded me. However, I am going to endeavour to say a few things about controls.

I believe we all realize what inflation is, and the high cost of commodities in our country. It is essential that we realize the cause if we are going to discuss the subject. To me inflation is the opposite of deflation and low prices. I believe the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) would agree with me when I say that we in the province of Saskatchewan are better off with inflation and high prices than low prices and deflation. Once before in this house I made the statement that it did not matter too much to the ordinary Joe whether or not the dollar was worth only fifty cents, provided he had two or three of them.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) went back to days gone by. I would ask him and his colleagues to go back with me and the people of Canada just three hundred and sixty-five days, when we are talking about inflation and the high cost of living and possibly are ready to blame the government for that. Three hundred and sixty-five days ago, as I think the records will show, the debate in this house was not with regard to the high cost of living or at least with regard to inflation but rather we were discussing the possibility of lower prices and deflation.

The government believe that they can do something about this matter. Some hon. members say they are doing nothing. Being a supporter of the government it will be interesting and encouraging for me—and I think it should be encouraging for most Canadians—if they succeed in taking care of the inflation we have today through various financial measures. I believe they will succeed to some extent. The interesting part is that if you can do it on that side, you can also do it when we have deflation.

I am not going to dwell long on this matter. The budget debate will be coming on. But I thought it did not make any difference whether I spoke now or on the budget. Those of us that blow off steam now will have less to blow off on the budget.

As to this inflation we have, many people are disappointed and they are at a disadvantage with it. There are, however, some people who have had advantages from this inflation. I hear some groans, but I will point out to those from whom they emanate that in Canada today we have many people who, because of inflation, have been able to pay their debts much more easily than if we had not had it. Those hon. members to whom I referred may groan on that for a while.

We hear talk about buying, and I am speaking now of high costs and inflation. Before I came to Ottawa for the special session last summer I had to build a house in the little town in which I live, close to my farm, because I had a man on the farm; and I had to buy almost everything—fixtures and furniture, including a refrigerator and a stove. When I came through Winnipeg for the special session, I was supposed to have bought the last refrigerator in Winnipeg. I suggested to various stores I went into that I would get it on my way back. They said, "Oh no, you cannot do that. There will not be any." It was the same picture as to electric stoves. Since then I have been in Winnipeg a few times, including the time when I came back after Easter, and I found far more stoves and refrigerators than there were at that time. The cry went out across Canada: "Buy now or you will not get it." I think most people bought for the reason that they felt they might not be able to get things later. After the Korean war started, there was supposed to be a shortage. I do not know of a shortage of anything in this country other than of heavy machinery and things of that kind which are made of steel. I think possibly we are at the peak with regard to those hoarders, if I may use that word, who have been hoarding things; for the reason that when they find that there are no shortages, and that there are not apt to be any in the immediate future, they are going to have to take from their basements and put on display those things to be sold.

Cost of Living

If I may, I should now like to refer to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). He said yesterday that the government had lost contact with the common people. That statement I cannot accept. I happen to be a supporter of the government, and I am in contact with the people. He may be able to sell that one to the people in his constituency, but I am going to assure him and all other hon. members of the House of Commons that he would have a hard time selling that argument to the people of Moose Mountain.

What I really wanted to say was this as to controls. I stated that I was hopeful that this inflation would be dealt with. But who is getting hurt today by this inflation? It is the people on fixed incomes. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) the other evening read various letters she had received with regard to the old people, and stating their plight under this inflation. I do not think there is any member in the House of Commons, sitting on either side, who would deny the fact that many of our pensioners, and more particularly the old age pensioners, are in difficulty because of the high cost of living. What shall we do for them? Shall we just bang on immediate controls, as the amendment suggests? I can see no way in which that would help these old folks. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said that most members who spoke offered no solution. I am going to offer one for those people. I do not know how it could be carried out. Possibly the British North America Act will not allow it to be done. However, in my opinion, if it would not, then the British North America Act is as out of date as the Roman empire.

What shall we do? Let us get down to the bottom and do something for the class of people that is most severely hurt. Speaking of the budget, I think it was not too tough. If by necessity—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member may not refer to the budget.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Very well, Mr. Speaker. But having regard to what I wanted to say, my suggestion will call for a little money. However, we shall get along without referring to the budget. It would not take a great deal of money, in my opinion, to look after these aged people and really do something for the people who are getting hurt most. What would I suggest? I would suggest doing it this way. First of all, I would make it the responsibility of municipal governments to say who should have a further cost of living bonus, let us call it. You may move it up and down with this cost of living index—I do not follow it much—which the hon. member for Temiscouata has not much use for. But anyway, we could use that. I think the provincial governments should be partly responsible for this cost of living bonus and also the federal government. What amount? I would not suggest the details other than to say possibly 25 per cent by the municipal governments—

An hon. Member: Oh.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Here is that "oh" again. Just a minute until I get through. I said I was not working out the details. I leave it to my hon. friend who utters the "oh". Twenty-five per cent by the provincial governments, and 50 per cent by the federal government; if that is too much, let us get it down to 12½ per cent by the municipal governments, 12½ per cent by the provincial governments and 75 per cent by the federal government.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Why the municipal governments?

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): My hon. friend asks, Why the municipal governments? I am a little surprised that a man who has been in the municipal set-up for as long as he has been asks me that question.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is why I want to know.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Because I think they are the ones who should have some responsibility. I think that is the way in which it should be worked, unless we are just talking for the sake of hearing ourselves talk. I am suggesting that we do something for these aged people.

I was a reeve of a municipality before coming here. A municipal council is much the same as this house, with the exception of the reeve. I can picture no other group, if we are going to do a job for these aged people, who can do it better than the municipalities and the municipal councils, with the reeve sitting down with them. I can just picture them now doing a splendid job in suggesting who needs help in the municipalities. They could even take in those people who are too humble to come forward and ask for further assistance. I think the hon. member for Souris will agree with me there.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I will not agree that they should do it.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): We have all been through that mill. Because of the seat in which the hon. member for Souris sits possibly that is the reason why he suggests that the federal government should do it all under such a scheme. If I were the reeve, or on that council and that were the case,

I think I might suggest that all pensioners in my municipality should have this federal dole. However, I think it might be abused, and that is why I think it should be in part a municipal responsibility.

I have nothing more to say other than I wish to put that thought before the house. I call upon hon. members on all sides of the house, if they are sincere, and I think they are, about doing something, for the needy when this amendment now before the house is defeated, and I think it will be; I certainly intend to help defeat it. When the budget debate comes up we will hear about those who are getting hurt by inflation and the high cost of living. I think the old and the aged are the ones who are hurt the most. I do not think we shall have very much trouble selling this to the government. I have not spoken to any members of the government, but I do not think we shall have too much trouble selling it, providing that we all get out and try to sell this plan or something else. Perhaps I can go along with those who think they have something better to suggest. I now invite members of the opposition and my colleagues to let us try to sell this idea to the government. If we try to sell it to the provincial governments and the municipal governments I do not think we shall have any difficulty, and at least we shall be starting to do a job that should be done.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment which is now before the house, which asks for appropriate measures to combat the rising cost of living. There is no doubt in my mind that the meaning of the amendment is clear. It calls for the reimposition of price controls and the payment of subsidies where necessary.

I am satisfied from the speech that was made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), when he introduced the amendment, that if it had not been for the fact that earlier in this session there was another amendment moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), which called specifically for price controls and subsidies, the leader of the opposition would have used those words in his amendment. I have no doubt that he was afraid to use those words again, lest such an amendment be out of order. He felt that it was better to draft the kind of amendment which would be in order in this house. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I support the amendment on the understanding that it does call for the reimposition of price controls and the payment of necessary subsidies to protect the health and living standards of the Canadian people.

I was interested in the remarks that have just been made by the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Smith). I was glad to note the question that he asked on the orders of the day at three o'clock today. He noted that certain candy manufacturers had indicated that, despite the decrease in taxation which they are to enjoy, it was not their intention to reduce the price of candy bars. I hope that the hon. member for Moose Mountain will pursue that matter, for it does seem to me that it is certainly out of keeping with the will of the government and of parliament.

I noticed just now, however, what the hon. member for Moose Mountain had to say about old age pensioners. I share to the full his feeling that the old age pensioners are a group of people who are hit particularly hard by inflation; and I think he is to be complimented on the sentiments he has, which have led him to feel that if his government will not do something about the over-all problem of inflation, at least something should be done for this particular group of people. I want to say to him that that really is not the way to deal with the kind of government that we have at the present time, to give them an out so far as the major problem is concerned. If you want to get even a little improvement you have to hit hard for what is really needed in the country at the present time. But I would point out to him two things: first, that serious as is the plight of old age pensioners, with the value of the $40 shrunk in terms of 1935-39 dollars values to $22.25, serious as is their plight, many other groups in the community are likewise suffering because of the high cost of living which now obtains. I am satisfied that while we must have—and I am in there fighting for it—improvements so far as old age pensions are concerned, and I hope we will get some improvements at this session, yet in addition to that we need an over-all attack on this problem of inflation, the perils of which might well be ruinous to the people of this country.

As for the specific suggestion made by the hon. member for Moose Mountain—and this is the other thing I wanted to say to him—I do think he should consider it more carefully before he puts it forth on the floor of the House of Commons. In essence what he proposes is a supplement to the old age pension on another means test basis. The hon. member is going in reverse. It has taken a long while to get across the idea that the means test should be abolished altogether. But at least we have before parliament now recommendations made by a special committee last June to the effect that the means test should be abolished for those seventy and over. I regret very much that the suggestion has been made in the house this afternoon that the government should travel in the other direction and should consider a supplement based on a second means test.

It was quite clear in the hon. member's remarks that a means test would be involved in his suggestion because he wanted the municipal council to determine who needed this supplement, regardless of the basis upon which the amount of that supplement might be worked out. As I say, I am all with the hon. member for Moose Mountain in pressing the plight of the old age pensioners, and I shall continue to do so myself, but I suggest to him that that is not the way to meet their problems. An old age pension should be a pension as a matter of right. I suggest to him further that there is an over-all problem here with which we must deal, namely the effect on all the people of Canada of the inflation we now have, the effect of the new high cost of living index, which stands at 179·7.

I have no doubt some members of the government may wonder at our persistence in this matter; they may wonder why we continue to argue about it and call for action, despite repeated refusals by the government to meet our requests. I think perhaps I might be pardoned for pointing out that sometimes persistence pays off in the House of Commons. I have been here for nine years, twelve sessions; and if I wanted to take the time I could give the house a fair list of issues concerning which I, myself, have fought, issues which in the first instance were rejected by the government but which, in due course, were granted.

The latest of these victories was won last night. It is less than two months since I last raised in the house the question of making trade union dues deductible for income tax purposes. It is a matter I have raised for five or six sessions. Persistence has been my motto, and last night persistence paid off. The government has accepted that proposal, and I welcome it most heartily.

Mr. McCann: You do not take full credit, do you?

Mr. Knowles: I shall leave that to the public. The point I make is that persistence pays off. The Minister of National Revenue has put in his usual kind of interjection at this point. The fact of the matter is that his department denied to trade unionists the right to deduct their trade union dues for income tax purposes during the years when the law gave them that permission.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member should not refer to the budget debate.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: I was not referring to the budget debate; I was referring to what was done in 1945, 1946 and 1947 by the Department of National Revenue. But, even so, I shall let the matter drop.

My only point in referring to last night's announcement was to point out that there are frequent examples of the maxim that persistence pays; and it is on that basis, feeling that the issue of the high cost of living is so pressing, that we persist in making our case clear to the government, in the hope that even yet we will get the action needed. The action needed is a program of price controls and subsidies.

The people of Canada are still being left in a very uncertain state so far as this question is concerned. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) took part in this debate he indicated that at least at the present time there was no intention of going into an over-all program of price controls. Press reports on his speech were even stronger; they indicated that on behalf of the government he had rejected the demand for price controls which had been presented to the government by the entire opposition in this house. That was the night before last.

Yesterday the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada appeared before the government with its annual brief on matters of concern to the workers of this country. One of their requests was for a program of price controls and necessary subsidies. According to press reports the Prime Minister's answer to the delegation representing the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada was to the effect that the government was not prepared to bring in any price controls until such time as it was convinced that such a program would work. In other words a few days ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce seemed to close the door finally; yesterday at noon the Prime Minister indicated that, while the crack in the doorway is very narrow, the door itself is not closed.

This means that the people of Canada are left in a state of uncertainty as to whether or not we are going to get action on this important matter. We feel that that uncertainty should be resolved, but we feel very strongly that it should be resolved in the right manner.

When the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke the other night he used as an argument against a program of price controls and subsidies the contention that he did not know of any administrative people who would care to take on a program of price control. He said that those who had had anything to do with price controls during the last war were now of the opinion that such a program would not work at this time.

I have not been present at any discussion the minister may have had with any of those administrative people, any economists who might take on such a program, but I do know he is a man of considerable power and influence in this country, and that he very often gets his way. I can quite imagine that if he said to some of the administrative officers who had to do with price controls in the past something like this: a program of price controls would not work now, would it?—they would agree with him that it wouldn't. But I am equally satisfied that if the government were to change its mind and the Minister of Trade and Commerce were to go to those same people, those who worked on controls during the last war, and say to them: say, you fellows could do a job on price controls, could you not?—they would say yes. That is the power the Minister of Trade and Commerce has; and I hope we can persuade the government to change its attitude and to haul in the people who have had experience in the matter and give them the job, in the name of the people of Canada, of saving the economy of the country from running completely wild.

Although I have said it before, because it is my motto that persistence pays, I think a few words should be said now about the effect of the new cost of living index on various groups of people. I pointed out before, but I shall repeat that during the years of the war, from 1941 to 1945, the years when price controls were completely in effect, the total increase in the cost of living index was only eight points—eight points in four years. During the last twelve months we have had an increase of over sixteen points. From 1945 to the latest figure the increase in the general cost of living index has been over sixty points.

I would point out further—and I shall refer to it in another connection in a few moments—that the food index stood at 133 at the end of the war, and that it is now 233·9. That is an increase since 1945 of more than 100 points.

As I have already said, the result of the index reaching 179·7 is that the $40 being paid to old age pensioners is only $22.25 in terms of 1935-39 dollar value. That means that all the fighting we have done to get a better deal for the old age pensioner in terms of the amount of the pension has been wiped out by the inflation that has been permitted to take place. It seems to me the government should be deeply concerned about what inflation has done to the legislation of which it boasts, and that it should take steps to protect the old age pensioners against this denial to them of the supposedly increased value of their old age pensions.

Let me say a word about another piece of legislation the government introduced and which, incidentally, had the unanimous support of the house—and by "unanimous" I mean a recorded vote. I am referring to family allowances. Family allowances were made law in 1944 and became effective in 1945. As I said a moment ago, in 1945 the food index stood at 133·0. The food index as at March 1, 1951, the latest figure we have, stands at 233·9. Most of us know that the major use of family allowances, when they first became effective, was for the purchase of additional food. As we have pointed out in previous debates, the increased purchase of milk in the cities of this country was directly proportionate to the extra money that parents had to provide for a slightly better life for their children. Therefore I think it is fair to say that a good deal of the money that was provided by way of family allowance benefits went into food at the start. Some of it also may have gone into clothing for children. In some cases people have been able to put it by and save it for their children's education, but in the main I submit it went for food.

What has happened to the cost of food since family allowances came into effect? The cost of living index is based on an expenditure of $1,453 in a year by a so-called average family in the period 1935-39. It is based on the basket of goods and services that the average family was able to buy in the base years for the sum of $1,453. That original basket of goods and services was 31 per cent food. In other words, in that figure of $1,453, $450 of it per year was spent on food. That was the amount in the base period 1935-39. If one does a little simple arithmetic he finds that in 1945, the year family allowances became effective, that basket of food had increased in cost from $450 to $598. I am taking these amounts in even dollars and leaving out the cents. That figure is based on a food index at that stage of 133·0.

All right, let us start from there. In 1945, when family allowances first became effective, the cost of food to the average family portrayed in the cost of living index was $598, but the food index has gone up to 233·9, and the food that cost $598 in 1945 now costs $1,048, an increase of $450. It is dangerous to talk about the average family because they have a decimal figure so far as the number of children is concerned, but it runs around two or three. Therefore the average family receives a family allowance of $144 a year if they have two children each in the $6 per month bracket. They get $216 a year if they have one child in the $7 bracket, one in the $6 bracket and one in the $5 bracket. I will take the second figure, which I think is being unnecessarily fair for the purpose of the point I am making. In other words, that average family gets, because of family allowances, $216 a year more than it was getting in 1945 but it has to pay for food alone $450 more than it paid in 1945.

In other words, the advantage of the family allowance, in better nutrition and better food for the children of the country, has been wiped out at least twice by the inflation that has taken place since the Family Allowances Act came into effect. One might go on with all the other groups in the community on fixed incomes. It applies likewise to those who are on wages because, as we have pointed out so often, while wages have risen through the years they have continually lagged behind the rise in the cost of living. In reply to that some hon. members point at times to the argument that the cost of living index figure does not seem to have risen as high as the wage index figure issued by the Department of Labour, and which can be found in the occasional publication of the Labour Gazette. The point that hon. members have to bear in mind is that the wage index is based on a different base year. In addition, it is based on the actual absolute number of dollars and cents received by the workers.

So far as the cost of living index is concerned, it is based on a basket of goods and services that a so-called average family could buy for $1,453 in the years 1935 to 1939, and there has been no adjustment in that basket of goods and services for rising standards of living which surely have taken place in this country in the last twelve or fifteen years. Incidentally, I had a question on the order paper earlier in this session as to whether any consideration had been given to adjusting the cost of living index to take into account protective foods now regarded as essential by the Department of National Health and Welfare. The answer was that no such consideration had been given, that there had not been any change in the way in which the cost of living index is worked out to take any account of these changes in our patterns or standards of living.

Therefore I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the two indexes, one put out by the dominion bureau of statistics on the cost of living, and one put out by the Department of Labour on wages, are not comparable, and that the proof of that is well known to any worker, and to any worker's wife, trying desperately to make both ends meet. I have said it before, and I am saying it again today, that no less a person than Mr. Justice Kellock of the Supreme Court of Canada, when he made his award to the railway workers who were involved in the dispute of last fall, said that in order for those railway workers to have as at September 1, 1950, the same relationship between their wages and the cost of living that obtained in June, 1948, they should have had an increase in their wages of 10·2 cents an hour. He made it clear that the reason he gave them only 7 cents an hour was that this parliament, on the basis of the bill introduced by the government, had frozen the increase at the ceiling of 7 cents an hour.

Let me make it clear that this is not a so-called street corner labour agitator. This is Mr. Justice Kellock of the Supreme Court of Canada saying that, when he gave the railway workers 7 cents an hour effective September 1, 1950, he was giving them an increase that was already 3·2 cents an hour short of what they should have had to maintain the relationship between their wages and the cost of living that obtained in June, 1948. That is what Mr. Justice Kellock says about the award given to the railway workers and effective September 1, 1950. But at that date the cost of living index stood at 169·8, and it has now risen to 179·7, or practically ten full points. In other words, so far as the railway workers are concerned, the wage increase they got last fall, was—because of the ceiling effected by an act of this parliament—already wiped out when they got it, and it has been wiped out again by the increase in the cost of living index that has taken place since the award was made. What holds for railway workers holds for wage earners right across the board. They know it and their wives know it, as they try to make both ends meet at today's prices on the incomes they are getting.

In this connection there is something I would like to say. In the remarks that were made last night I noted that one of the virtues of this country is that we have a minimum amount of division, that we are a united people as far as our aims in general are concerned. I think those sentiments were well put by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). So it is that I deplore the fact that at times people get up in this house and try to divide city workers from farm workers when it comes to the plight they are both in. I think of some speeches that have been made by hon. members on the other side of the house, one of whom I am looking at now, who seem to think that in order to present the case of the farmers they have to run down the city workers. Nothing could do a greater disservice to the well-being of the people of this country. It is perfectly true that every time it is necessary to plead the cause of the workers of the constituency I represent, or the workers of Canada, I am Johnny on the spot, and I hope I may continue to be; but I have never pleaded, and will never, as long as I am here, plead the case of city workers against the plight in which workers in the country, the farmers of Canada, also find themselves.

Mr. Sinnott: I rise on a question of privilege. I want to inform the hon. member that I never ran down any city workers. I stated what wages were in 1944 and 1950, and that was all.

Mr. Knowles: I did not mention the hon. member; he must have a guilty conscience. I have listened with interest and enthusiastic support to speeches by my deskmate the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce), the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), and others of this group pleading the case of the farmers of this country, and I have never heard them suggest that in order to improve the position of the farmers somehow or other the workers in the cities had to learn what hard work was out on the farms. That does not apply only to this group. I am looking at the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) who is a hard fighter for a better deal for the farmers of Canada. He speaks time and again in this connection, as did the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) today. I cannot remember hearing either of those hon. members put the position of the farmers against that of the workers. I submit we must get away from this suggestion, even by innuendo or inference—

Mr. Sinnott: On a question of privilege, I want the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to retract the statement that I ran down the city people.

An hon. Member: He did not make it.

Mr. Sinnott: Yes, he did, and Hansard will prove it.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest that the hon. member has no point of privilege, since I have not named him at all. If his conscience hurts him when I speak of people who by innuendo seek to stir up division between workers and farmers, he will have to deal with his own conscience.

Mr. Sinnott: Whom were you looking at?

Mr. Knowles: I am addressing my remarks to Mr. Speaker. But if the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) wants me to quote statements from Hansard in which by inference he has said that the trouble with city people is that they do not know what hard work is out on the farm, I can produce them.

Mr. Sinnott: And I will repeat them.

Mr. Knowles: That is the hon. member's privilege; but do not get up on a point of privilege and claim you did not make the statement when you are ready now to repeat it. The fact of the matter is that what is needed in this country is a realization of the fact that workers in city and country alike are in the same plight. When I plead for price controls and subsidies, when I plead for steps to be taken to bring down the cost of living and give the people of this country a better break, I am asking for that better break for people in city and country.

Mr. Sinnott: Nonsense.

Mr. Knowles: In addition to pleading the cause of the railway workers and others in the cities of this country, when there was a motion before the house for a better break for the wheat farmers of Canada I was in my place and voted for it. I suggest that the hon. member for Springfield answer that one.

Mr. Sinnott: Don't try to camouflage the issue.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member knows that when there was a vote in this house on a better price for the wheat farmers of western Canada, he was in the building but not in his place to cast his vote. Later on when there was a vote on another amendment which had the same effect but did not name an amount, he was here but voted against it.

Mr. Sinnott: I have never been led around by the C.C.F.

Mr. Knowles: So the hon. member talks one way and votes another, as so often happens in this house.

Mr. Sinnott: Just a bunch of nonsense.

Mr. Knowles: I want to make it perfectly clear, having in mind some of the things the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said the other evening, that when we ask for price controls we are not asking for price freezing. We are asking for a proper relationship between the wages city workers receive and their cost of living, and likewise a proper relationship between the prices farmers receive for their products and the cost of the things which they have to buy. What is that? It is just plain law and order. The trouble with this country today is that we have economic anarchy. We have a government which, as the hon. member for Lake Centre says, will not shrink from imposing taxes but shrinks from trying to sort these things out and bring in the rule of law with respect to economic forces. Indeed, that is the whole position of the socialist movement to which I belong, that democracy means control by the people of the things that affect the lives of the people. It is not enough to have that control exercised by legislative bodies with respect to a few academic matters, for the thing that affects the lives of the people most of all is what they get for the work they do, whether in the city or in the country, and the amount they have to pay in order to enjoy the standard of living that is their right because of the work that they do.

So I plead for an end to this suggestion that we want no changes at all in prices or wages. We want control, and that means regulation; it means adjustments upward in some cases and downward in others, so there will be a proper relationship between what people get for their work, whether on the farm or in the city, and what they have to pay for the things necessary to a decent standard of life. In other words it is the phrase "parity prices" that the farmers use. We want the same thing for the city people. We want some reasonable parity between what they receive for their work and what it costs them to live decently.

Incidentally, that decent standard of living should not be the standard suggested by the 1935-39 cost of living index. That is the reason that figure of 179·7 is away out. It is based upon a basket of goods and services which was acceptable in 1935-39, but no such basket of goods and services is acceptable today. Today's real cost of living is actually much higher. Someone may ask where the difference is to come from. I suggest that there have been tremendous increases in corporation profits in the last few years. Figures that were furnished us last night show that whereas in 1939 corporation profits before taxes were $618 million, in 1950 they were $2,270 million. Even after taxes they were $406 million in 1939 and $1,402 million in 1950.

So, Mr. Speaker, the room is there to make an adjustment so that there will be a proper relationship between the amount that people receive for their work and what it costs for a proper standard of living in 1951. I urge that there be no more of this talk to the effect that the government should not interfere, and that the government should leave the people with all those "psychological intangibles" to somehow buy less and produce more to put an end to the inflation. It is the job of the government to represent the people, and to do in the name of the people the things that the people require to be done; the things that will make sure there is the rule of law with respect to matters that affect the well-being of all our people. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that my time may be running out. I had planned—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Hon. members need not say "Hear, hear", because if my time runs out on this occasion there will be other occasions. It is not unknown for me to take advantage of the opportunities that are afforded in this place to speak in the name of the people I represent.

I want to suggest to hon. members that this notion that is so often thrown out that high wages are the cause of high prices is dealt with effectively in a rather long and academic but well documented article which appears in the January, 1948, issue of the Typographical Journal, the official organ of the International Typographical Union. It is an article entitled "High Wages do not Cause High Prices", by Clark B. Hicks. In the main it is based on studies that had been carried out in the United States by a division of the department of commerce at Washington, the results of which were put forth in a report entitled "Productivity and Unit Labour Costs in Selected Manufacturing Industries, 1919-1940." The results of this survey show that, despite increases in the rates of wages, not just from one year to the next but across the years, the actual unit cost of production in terms of wages goes down.

Upon examining the data in detail, it will be found that the hourly earnings rose 33·1 per cent in the twenty-one year period which was reviewed. Instead of causing a like increase in wage costs a great reduction in unit labour costs took place. The index of unit labour cost fell from 145·4 in 1919 to 81·2 in 1940, a drop of 44·2 per cent. The point is that wage rates went up over the twenty-one year period by 33·1 per cent, but the unit cost of production went down 44·2 per cent, due largely to technological improvements and the increased productivity of labour.

Mr. Hicks in this article gives several examples. I shall not take the time to read them in full, but I should like to indicate two of them which set out the point very well. He points out that President Hoffman of the Studebaker Corporation has indicated that back in 1870 wages in the Studebaker plant were $9.60 per week for a week of sixty hours. In 1947 the wages had increased to $60 for a week of forty hours.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; the hon. member has now exhausted his time.

Mr. Knowles: May I just finish this one example? In other words, there has been this tremendous increase in wage rates, but President Hoffman of the Studebaker organization said that if they had to produce modern Studebaker cars at the wage rate of 1870, and with other conditions obtaining at that time, it would cost $50,000 to produce one car. That makes clear the point that an increase in wages actually results across the years in a lower per unit cost. I submit that that applies to both city workers and farm workers, and that wages are not the cause of inflation. These huge corporation profits are the cause, and it is time for the rule of law. It is time for price controls.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I had not planned to speak in this debate—

Mr. Sinnott: With the permission of the member for Souris (Mr. Ross), I should like to ask the member for Winnipeg North Centre a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, the member for Quebec-Montmorency.

Mr. Sinnott: Did I understand the hon. member to say he was in favour of over-all price controls, including wage controls?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I have dealt with that so often—

Mr. Sinnott: Just give me a direct answer, yes or no.

Mr. Knowles: I have asked for the rule of law in connection with these matters, for a proper relationship between prices and wages. Hon. members know that I have dealt with that very fully, and on other occasions I have read extracts from representations by the four major labour groups of this country. Their position and mine is very clear.

Mr. Sinnott: I should like to read to the house a telegram—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, the member for Quebec-Montmorency.

(Translation):

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is fitting that in such an important debate someone should speak in French.

Since I have recently stated my position on the matter under discussion and since I have pointed out my attitude in this respect I will be brief.

I am convinced that steps must be taken at the earliest possible opportunity to stabilize the cost of living and to stem inflation. As a matter of fact, I am afraid it is already too late.

The purchasing power of our dollar has dropped to about 56 cents, and I am convinced that this follows the exorbitant profits taken by middlemen, who operate between the producer and the consumer.

Today, more than ever before in the history of our country, big monopolies control, to a large extent, the purchasing power and the distribution of essential goods. Because of their purchasing power, they are in a position to accumulate enormous stocks and control distribution at such times as they feel it will bring them larger profits. Our legislation has enabled those trusts to come into being.

Anyone who takes the trouble to compare the spread between prices paid to producers and those paid by consumers is amazed at the enormous profits made by middlemen.

How can we expect lower costs of production, in poultry farming for instance, when farmers have to pay excessive prices for feed as a result of the operations of the milling trust, exposed in the McGregor report?

During the last war, the government put an embargo on cattle exports to the United States in order to help the British people feed themselves at a reasonable price. To my knowledge, no one objected at the time or claimed that the step might hamper our trade relations with the United States. As controls were also in effect, our people were then able to buy steak, for instance, at a reasonable price.

It is admitted that the higher salaries paid in the United States enable Americans to carry off from our market a large share of the cattle that would normally be sold to Canadian consumers.

During the last war and even afterwards, the government did not hesitate to place an embargo on cattle exports to the United States in order to help feed the British. May I now, sir, request the government to re-establish this embargo or at least to authorize the export of only part of our Canadian cattle. Thus the government would show the Canadian consumers the same consideration it has shown to the British before the embargo was removed and would allow our citizens to make both ends meet.

I realize that this will not please the trusts who, in Canada, control the buying and distributing in this field, but it will surely tend to prevent soulless capitalists from taking advantage of our people.

Cost of Living

I realize that the capitalists who control warehousing in Canada are interested in sustaining the gigantic struggle they are now waging in order to delay as much as possible the setting up of controls, because in the meantime they will be able to store a larger quantity of goods which they will sell at astronomical prices without any danger, since, when the last budget was drafted, it was not deemed advisable to reimpose taxation on surplus profits. Should we always bow to the edicts of higher finance?

For the reasons I have just given and having carefully gone over the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), which reads as follows:

This house is of the opinion that in view of the announcement made on Wednesday last of the greatest monthly increase in Canadian cost of living during the month of February to the disastrously high level of 179·7 points, immediate consideration should be given to the adoption of appropriate measures to hold down the cost of living and halt inflation.

—I have come to the conclusion that I am duty-bound to vote in favour of it, not because I am convinced of the sincerity of the Progressive Conservative party, which has often given proof to this house that it went hand in glove with cartels, but because the amendment, such as it stands, is a true reflection of my opinion and also because I know that the Liberal party respects the opinion of its followers, even though they might occasionally not share the government's own views.

(Text):

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in the debate until the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) interjected some remarks about the high cost of food. The basis of my remarks is taken from yesterday's London Free Press. This quotation that I am going to give you is to point out what a good many people in the country do not realize is going on. Just to be brief, I might say that these figures are taken from the United States department of agriculture's bureau of agricultural economics. The quotation reads as follows:

Like this for example . . . Using last December's prices . . . If the farmer gave away the wool in a $50 suit of men's clothing, the suit would still sell for $40.50 . . . If he'd give away the wheat in a 16-cent loaf of bread, the loaf would still cost the consumer 13·4 cents . . . If the farmer gave away the beans in a 16-cent can of pork and beans, the can would still cost you 14 cents at the grocery store . . . For cigarette smokers . . .

These are American prices.

. . . If the tobacco grower gave away the tobacco in a 20-cent pack of cigarettes, the girl behind the counter would still ask you for 17 cents to pay for that purchase.

The impression was left that food prices were too high. That seems to be where everybody wants to bear down with regard to this high cost of living. It is the food prices that they complain about. As I said once before in this house this session, if the people want to eat, they want to be careful what they do when they go to control the prices of various products. The impression has gone abroad that if any controls are put on, the farmer will be the first one to suffer. I think we shall have to decide whether we want to eat anything else besides wheat. We have an abundance of that. But apparently many of the other food products are not going to be in too abundant supply.

I just rose to impress on the house the realization that this forever bearing down on the price of foods and up on other things—and advocating shorter hours—is going to have a final result that we are going to be short of food.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this amendment until I listened to some of the discussion this afternoon. Needless to say, I am going to support this amendment. My chief difficulty, on behalf of many people in this country, is a lack of a parity basis. Certainly we have a runaway inflation to contend with right now. Despite that fact we have some system of controls in this country yet. We have one class of people who have been controlled for some years. We have today a government contract which controls as yet the wheat farmers of this country.

I am not taking any issue with my colleague who has just taken his seat. I agree with everything he has said. I am in hearty agreement with the statement that if we are not careful about this matter there will be a shortage of necessary foodstuffs in this country. I quite agree with all that the hon. member has said. But, Mr. Speaker, under the international wheat agreement we have an extremely unfair set-up. When that agreement was entered into some time ago, it looked as though there might be decreasing wheat values throughout the world as well as in this country. Nobody could foresee the future. The wheat farmers of this country are definitely controlled. They have not any option as to where they may sell their products. The price is set there. Right today the wheat farmer of the prairie provinces is subsidizing the consumers of Canada to the extent of 35 cents a bushel on every bushel of wheat he delivers and sells. There is there a form of control that the wheat farmer cannot get out from under.

Under this compulsory legislation he is forced to sell his wheat through this government monopoly or set-up we have, and it is not sold on the same basis as it is sold by the Americans to the south. Our American neighbour just across the border gets the full value for his wheat. It is true enough—and I want to be fair—that they, by virtue of their great population, can handle their wheat situation much more easily than we can handle our great surplus in this country. But over there, while their quota is delivered under the international agreement, the farmer selling the wheat receives the full value for it, the difference between the prevailing value and the price set under the international agreement. The point I want to make is that there was lack of foresight in drawing up that international wheat agreement. There should have been an escalator clause in there whereby—

Mr. Studer: Why did you not have it put in?

Mr. Ross (Souris): I am not a member of the government.

Mr. Studer: You were here and did not advocate it at the time.

Mr. Ross (Souris): On another occasion I shall be glad to hear from my hon. friend. I have said that I should like to hear my good friend the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) with regard to this matter. He is one of the best speakers in this House of Commons. I would gladly sit and listen to him expound further on this matter on behalf of the people who sent him here. But I want to say that I think there should be an escalator clause in that international wheat agreement because since it was brought into being farm implements of some types have risen in cost to the farmer by over 60 per cent. Freight rates have increased several times. All this adds to the cost to the farmer producer. While on another occasion I intend to deal much more fully with this international wheat agreement and the hardship that it is going to impose on these wheat producers, I did want to make that point right now, because you do have that matter of control at the present time which, under the present agreement, is going to be the means of creating one of the greatest trimmings that the wheat farmers of the prairie provinces have ever received. You have heard lengthy discussions on other contracts with this country, but I want to make this very clear at this time. The wheat farmer right today, according to the market price, is subsidizing the consumers of Canada to the extent of 35 cents a bushel. That is the unfair part of this whole set-up of the government of the day.

I want wholeheartedly to support what was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). He said that we have a Combines Investigation Act. That is the law of this country, under which the present government refused to act. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), to whom we have given such great powers in another measure, was the man responsible for pushing the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) around in regard to the investigation of the flour milling industry of this country. That was distinctly costly both to the wheat farmers of this country and to every man, woman and child who consumes bread in Canada. Despite that fact, the Minister of Trade and Commerce was able to push the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Justice around. The law of the land was then flouted. It was absolutely disregarded by the Minister of Justice who, I think, should have had the intestinal fortitude to stand up to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to the Prime Minister and to his other colleagues and said: Gentlemen, this is my province. I have taken my oath to be responsible for the law of this land, and if I do not carry that out I will be forced to offer you my resignation. I am sorry that the Minister of Justice did not take that attitude. I think he certainly missed the boat to make himself a great national figure in this country, especially when it was just on the eve of a general election. I think it is entirely too bad, and therefore I want wholeheartedly to endorse all that was said by the hon. member for Lake Centre this afternoon. You have certainly a sorry picture in this country when certain businessmen in the east are raising their prices and some branches of the same businesses in the west increase their prices exactly the same amount.

I come back to a point that has been proven in other sessions, namely, that there is something wrong with the processing of many of the farmers' raw materials in this country. The profits to the middlemen are out of all comparison with what the farmer receives for many of his raw materials, and with what the housewife, either of the farmer or of the urban resident, has to pay for the goods she buys. Comparisons have been made year after year along these lines between such places as Minneapolis and Winnipeg, two comparable points. In many instances the farmer in the Minneapolis area will receive more for his product than the farmer in the Winnipeg area. But when they go out to buy the processed article the housewife in the Minneapolis area can buy it cheaper than can the housewife in the Winnipeg area. Something very faulty is going on in this country and it should be thoroughly investigated. We have an act, if our dictator, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, would allow it to operate, to take care of that sort of thing. We have a vicious set-up to contend with, and the government refuses to take action under this measure today.

There is another point that this brings me to, and that is the suggestion made by my very good friend and neighbour, the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Smith). Like myself, he has been the reeve of a municipality. I am not sure about the provincial acts in Saskatchewan, but he made a suggestion to the government as to how they might assist old age pensioners. I take second place to no hon. member in this house in regard to old age pensioners. My good friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has had more to say on behalf of the old age pensioners than any other two or three members in this house. Nevertheless, I am just as much concerned about old age pensioners as any other hon. member of this house. On many occasions I have talked about the plight of the old age pensioners. But my good and personal friend this afternoon made a suggestion that he thought might require an amendment to the British North America Act, to provide additional benefits for the old age pensioners. He suggested that the municipality might bear 25 per cent of the cost of it, if I am correct. I think that is what he suggested, and that the province should bear 25 per cent of the cost and the federal authorities the additional 50 per cent.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Or 5 per cent.

Mr. Ross (Souris): He did not use the expression "5 per cent" when he was talking. It is the principle that I want to deal with right here, because we have been through it. Again I come back to the Minister of Justice. When he was premier of Manitoba in 1948 I presume he had an idea that he was coming to Ottawa, but we ordinary citizens of Manitoba had no idea about it at all. As the premier of Manitoba he was concerned about the plight of the old age pensioners, and on behalf of the provincial government he made an offer to the executive of the Manitoba municipal union that until such time as the British North America Act was amended, or appropriate arrangements were made in the future, the provincial government would bring in enabling legislation by which they could increase the payment for the old age pensioners by $10 a month, and it would be split two ways, $5 by municipalities and $5 by the provincial government, and the municipality would be responsible for the administration and for seeing who should receive it. I think that was the suggestion made by my hon. friend this afternoon.

Well, strange as it may seem—it seemed very strange to me then—the executive of the Manitoba municipal union accepted the offer, which they thought was a fine offer, subject to the approval of the municipal convention, which was to meet in Winnipeg some weeks later. I have never heard anything argued more fully in detail than that proposition was by the then premier of Manitoba to the municipal officials. After several hours' deliberation and detailed discussion a vote was taken on that offer. And do you know, the result of that vote was approximately 650 against and 7 for, by those municipal officials. I was personally quite happy about it because of this, and this is the point that I do not follow my good friend on. Ever since my experience in municipal life I have been very concerned about increasing the mounting burdens of taxation on real estate. That in itself is creating untold problems and perplexities for municipal corporations throughout Canada, both urban and rural.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): I want the federal government to pay some.

Mr. Ross (Souris): They are called upon to provide many services now. I can cite neighbours of my own in my own constituency who, through no fault of their own, have lost a crop or revenue from some of the best land in that constituency for the eighth year now. It is the most highly assessed farm property in that area. They are called upon to pay increasing taxation whether any revenue comes off the property or not. It is that matter of principle that I want to deal with, and take issue with my good friend from Moose Mountain on. As long as I am in public life in any capacity I hope I shall fight to overcome that undue burden which is being imposed on real estate, causing so many difficulties in so many municipalities of this country.

While I am on my feet I want again to reiterate my concern for the welfare of the old age pensioners in this country. I know many of these people personally, and I do not know how they obtain the necessities of life these days under the allowances that they are paid. They do have a great hardship. Rather than the suggestion made by my good friend this afternoon, I think there is a good deal more logic in the resolution placed on the order paper by my colleague the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough). I think there is real meat in that resolution, and I hope it is discussed in the house and that we shall have an opportunity to express our views to the government on that resolution.

I think it is most important that worthwhile measures be taken to assist those old age pensioners and many other pensioners throughout the country who are finding it so very difficult. As I said, I had not intended to discuss this matter, but in municipal life or in the federal picture or anywhere else I have not missed an opportunity to set forth the problems confronting the municipal corporations in this country, both urban and rural; and I hope that no legislation is ever put forward by this federal government or by provincial governments which will add to that unfair proposition, of increasing taxation on real estate, those social services which do not entirely belong to the municipalities. I want to make that point very clear. I shall have much more to say about the international wheat agreement at another time. However, I cite that as one example of controls by the government—and very unfair controls—where the wheat producer has no alternative. He is now subsidizing the consumer in Canada. As I have said, he is subsidizing the consumer to the extent of 35 cents a bushel, right today. His problems are increasing from day to day, because his costs of production are increasing in many respects.

Anyone who lives in the prairie provinces, whether he be a city dweller or not, must realize these facts fully. Therefore I think there must be some system of parity granted in Canada during these difficult days of inflation and increasing living costs. I shall certainly support the amendment. I believe it is most timely, and in the interests of the consumer in this country, especially the parents who find it so difficult, in some instances because of frozen incomes, to provide for their families today.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations on this subject. I know many members are desirous of winding up the debate; but, so far as I am concerned, I am not particularly anxious to wind it up because I think this is unfinished business since 1945. Unless we settle it somewhere it seems to me we will just have a repetition of what is going on now.

One would judge, from the attitude of the government, that they have made up their minds that there are to be no price controls, as such, at this time.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gillis: Someone says "hear, hear". Well, I consider this the most important debate we have had for a long time, because the cost of living is one of the most disturbing factors in the country.

It is all right to talk about defence, and all that kind of thing. We realize it is necessary to make preparations for defence; but do not let us forget that our main weapon of defence is the people who will produce the wherewithal for defence, and pay the taxes that will provide the weapons. That must be considered also.

The representatives of the organized labour movement in Canada represent a large portion of the industrial workers in this country. They have made their wishes known on many occasions. Only very recently joint representations were made by the Trades and Labour Congress, the Canadian Congress of Labour and the Catholic Federation. In their submission to the government they pointed out in no uncertain terms they thought the time had come when the government should take at least some action to give some indication that the cost of living is going to be held somewhere.

The government has not done this. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has made it clear that, so far as he is concerned, he is speaking for the government and that no action to prevent inflation is going to take place at this time in connection with a system of price controls. I say that an answer of that kind to the representatives of the people who work in the mines and the factories which produce the means for defence, and supply a great portion of the taxation to pay for defence equipment, is an unrealistic answer.

While the cost of living statistics may not be as accurate as they could or should be, nevertheless they are an indication of what the cost of living actually is. I say that the figure 179·7, as the over-all cost of living index, does not reflect actually what is being imposed upon the average citizen. We get some idea what the average person maintaining a home is up against when we take the food index figure of 233·9, because 80 per cent of the money spent in the home of the person in the average income group is spent for food. That is the figure that should be used.

People see the cost of living climbing from day to day, and the stand has been taken by the government that nothing is going to be done. This is discouraging. It amuses me to hear hon. members say that they do not want price controls, because if they would stop and think they would realize they have price fixing now, in respect of nearly every commodity entering their homes. However, that price fixing is done by people who are not responsible to the Canadian people generally or to the House of Commons. Large corporations across this country do not ask the permission of anyone when they want to step up a price.

For instance, take a look at the recent price increase in new automobiles. That increase certainly was not warranted by the 5 per cent tax imposed by the government last September. But prices have skyrocketed, whether we like it or not. Then we see overnight an artificial shortage of butter, and overnight 15 or 20 cents per pound is added to the price. Who is fixing that price? It is very definitely fixed.

We see irresponsible price fixing right across the country today in connection with practically every commodity one is compelled to buy.

We are asking for a system of responsible controls, and we are prepared to have the Canadian government institute the machinery which would be responsible to parliament in connection with the fixing of prices in this time of stress and concern. This process of getting all the traffic will bear and supporting the system of price fixing we now have is certainly not my understanding of a proper system of responsible government for the Canadian people.

Let me emphasize that hon. members who say they do not want price controls, that they are hard to administer and all that sort of thing, must balance that argument against the argument that prices are already fixed in practically every commodity. It is a matter of determining whether we will continue that kind of system which can create overnight artificial shortages and bring about a skyrocketing of prices, without consultation with anybody, or whether we want to hand the problem over to the government so that it may be handled as it was handled during the war—and very successfully.

That is what we have to ascertain. Apparently the government has not faced up to the question.

On motion of Mr. Gillis the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: For tomorrow consideration had been given to the possibility of dealing with the estimates of the Department of National Defence—both tomorrow and Friday. But, on considering the matter, it has been found that that would not be convenient for hon. members of the house, and that more than a few hours' notice would be required before opening a discussion on the estimates of the defence department.

In view of that I think it would probably suit the convenience of hon. members if we continued and tried to complete the debate which stands as the first order on the order paper, the present debate on the motion that Mr. Speaker leave the chair, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 28 that on Thursdays and Fridays Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair to go into committee of supply, without question put. If I had the unanimous consent of the house I would move that on Thursday, tomorrow, and Friday, the next day, if necessary, standing order 28 be suspended so that the debate on government order No. 1 on today's order paper may be first concluded and four additional departments called for the first time, not for the purpose of proceeding with them but for the purpose of having them before the committee as would happen on the conclusion of this debate, and then to proceed with the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Green: Thursday and Friday?

Mr. St. Laurent: The first thing we would do would be to try to complete this debate on the motion of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), as leader of the house, to go into committee of supply and the amendment of the leader of the opposition. That debate being concluded, unless there were further discussions before the motion could be put to go into committee of supply, upon that motion being resolved the four additional departments that were mentioned originally for Monday would first be called and the items allowed to stand. Then we would proceed with the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Green: May I ask the Prime Minister whether the transport estimates are to be considered on both Thursday and Friday.

Mr. St. Laurent: If we got along rapidly enough, the idea would be to do something more on Friday, and we would announce Thursday night what it would be. I would imagine that we would take all of tomorrow to conclude this debate and the discussion of the estimates of the Department of Transport. If they were not concluded we would continue with them on Friday, and announce either the estimates of the Department of Fisheries or the Department of Agriculture to follow the completion of the discussion of the estimates of the Department of Transport.

The effect of this motion of course would be spent when the question of going into supply on the motion made on Monday was resolved.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I will support the suggestion of the Prime Minister. In view of the nature of the debate now taking place, it would seem satisfactory to me that it should proceed to a conclusion. Under the circumstances it would seem obvious that adequate notice should be given with respect to the opening of the Department of National Defence in view of the number of hon. members who are anxious to deal with that very important subject. I would hope that unanimous consent would be given to the motion made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment on this proposal. I want to say that I am a reasonable person, and certainly I am ready to agree with respect to a part of what the Prime Minister suggests. As to another part of it, however, he has not yet convinced me. It could be argued that it is desirable that the present debate should be continued tomorrow. The part of the Prime Minister's request that I accept is that unanimous consent be given to suspending the rule so that the debate may be carried on on Thursday and Friday, which is otherwise irregular. Then he goes on and asks that when we get into committee of supply the four departments which were named for last Monday should be opened. I am not just being stubborn about this. The fact of the matter is that this is one of the few but very important provisions in the rules of the house whereby private members of parliament can bring their views as effectively as they can to the attention of the government. We do it not only by our speeches but also by the fact that we hold more or less of a whiphand with respect to getting into committee of supply, where money is voted. Before the Prime Minister rises to his feet, I am going to suggest that we reach a compromise. I will give unanimous consent to the first part of his suggestion but not to the calling of four departments. How about compromising on two?

Mr. St. Laurent: Why should it be only two? The motion was made for the purpose of going into committee of supply and calling four departments. It has been debated, and it will have been as fully debated as any motion to go into committee of supply that I can remember in the several sessions that I have been here. It would seem to me that there would be no serious inconvenience in that because there will not be another opportunity of opening departments next week. We expect the debate on the budget to proceed next week. Of all the departments there are only four that have been placed before the committee of supply up to this time. I do not think that hon. members would be forgoing any right because normally when this motion is disposed of four departments would be called. If it is preferable to dispose of it on Thursday or Friday we would like to do so if it will not prevent it from having the same effect as if it were disposed of on a Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday.

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister says that normally the effect of this motion would have been to get into committee of supply and open four departments. Normally such a motion could not be disposed of except on a Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday. Therefore since the house has debated it up until this time, normally—in other words, without unanimous consent—it cannot be proceeded with again until another Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday. I suggest that, since the Prime Minister is asking us to give unanimous consent to upsetting that part of the rule, he should compromise on the other part. I have met him more than halfway, and some of my friends over here think I have gone too far.

Mr. St. Laurent: Some of my friends think I have gone too far, and that I should not have suggested that we continue this debate. I thought it would be convenient for most members if it were continued. If it is the desire of the house that we abide by the rule, I will not submit the motion. If it cannot have the same effect as if it were disposed of on a Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday, let us wait for a Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday to dispose of it.

Mr. Blackmore: I should like to add that the next time a motion is made to go into committee of supply we should not have in mind four departments. One is quite sufficient.

Mr. St. Laurent: When the hon. member becomes the leader of the house he will determine any announcements of what he will ask the house to do. We announced that we were going to ask to go into committee of supply and open four departments.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, this happens to be one case in which the Prime Minister will bow to the will of the opposition.

Mr. St. Laurent: He will not bow to the will of the opposition but will conform to the rules of the house.

Mr. Blackmore: The Prime Minister has no authority to introduce more than one department unless the opposition says he has.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member would add to my knowledge of the rules if he would cite to me the rule on which he bases that assertion.

Mr. Blackmore: The Prime Minister will add to mine if he will cite the rule under which he is proposing to call four departments. One is quite sufficient.

Mr. St. Laurent: I take it that it is not agreeable to the house that we deal with this matter tomorrow as it would be dealt with on a Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday.

Mr. Knowles: I would agree to two departments but not to four.

Mr. Blackmore: I only agree to one.

Mr. Ross (Souris): What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up the estimates of the Department of Transport, and if we conclude we will take agriculture.

It being ten minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, April 12, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

INDIAN ACT—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West) presented the first report of the special committee appointed to consider Bill No. 79, respecting Indians, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. Fulton: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. Hughes Cleaver (Halton) presented the first report of the special committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. L. A. Mutch (Winnipeg South) presented the first report of the special committee on veterans affairs, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Before the motion is put, I should like to know if members of parliament who have grievances on behalf of returned men will have an opportunity of submitting their cases to the committee in order to try to get some help for these men. It seems that the pension commission is helpless, and I can say the same thing for the commission on allowances. I have every sympathy for the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe). He is an able gentleman, and a personal friend of mine. The members of the pension commission, and the members of the commission for allowances, are procrastinating. It is useless to argue the case of any soldier with them. I have some pitiful cases, and it is impossible to reach the heart of these commission members in discussing these problems which are of vital importance to the soldiers and their families.

Will the members of the house who do not belong to the committee have an opportunity of appearing before the committee with these files? Some of them are voluminous. The pension commission seems to take it for granted that in some cases the soldiers suffered from disabilities before enlistment. I have one case in particular in which I was told the soldier was suffering from heart trouble before his enlistment, and that his five years of active military service had not increased his disability. I wrote to the department that it was absurd, and I was informed a month later that he was not suffering from heart trouble. This was an example.

Another case is that of a soldier, number 597, of the first war. He was in service during the whole of the war. He was overseas for at least four years, if not five. He was a big fellow, with the appearance of a strong man. I could not get anything for him except some treatment at the hospital which did him no good. He enlisted again in the second war, and it is impossible to get a pension for him. There are other cases where soldiers have a small pension, and there is the allowance board, which does nothing to give them an opportunity to live as decent men are supposed to live.

I have many cases which I could cite. The doctors are all fools except perhaps one or two. I keep in reserve some cases of murder which I have already mentioned in the house—murder by the army doctors of the province of Ontario and of the province of Quebec. There was another one who escaped in the province of New Brunswick. He had protection from the high-ranking people in the medical service of the army. Some army doctors are good. Some others are rotten. This is one of the reasons why I object so greatly to a program of health insurance, because those army doctors will have some kind of preference. I think of the district medical officer at Montreal. Who is the district medical officer at Montreal? He is a complete failure with regard to medical qualifications. What is his record as a medical officer? He was overseas on a Cook's tour for a month or two, and he was to come to Ottawa. I strongly protested at the time to the then hon. member for Halifax, Mr. Macdonald—who was the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence—and to Walter Tucker, who helped me a great deal when he was parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

I am fighting the case of the soldiers who cannot expect any justice from the pension commission or from the allowance board. One day I decided to send a motion to the Clerk of the House, but unfortunately it was not signed, and according to the rules it did not appear on the order paper. The motion called for the abolition of the pension commission and the allowance board. So long as the soldiers get no benefits from these boards, what is the use of paying big salaries to these men who give relief by a dropper to the soldier?

I will ask the minister to consider the remarks I have made in the friendliest spirit to him, but I have not the same spirit with regard to these boards and commissions. They are there to earn a big salary and to do nothing. They are all alike, from Melville down. The other day when I saw him, with all his decorations, I thought of the poor devils who have such a great struggle and who cannot get any help. We have to write and write again, but we never receive a decent answer from the silly and selfish bureaucrats. I hope that there will be reform in due course and that the members who sit on the committee will be ready to defend the case of the soldier instead of lying down before such awful bureaucrats.

Mr. Speaker: Is is the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Ross (Souris): On division.

Mr. Speaker: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Is the minister in agreement with the tirade of the hon. member for Temiscouata a few minutes ago against the war veterans allowance board and the Canadian pension commission?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): In answer to my hon. friend's question I may say that I do not subscribe to the remarks made by the hon. member for Temiscouata. I do not subscribe at all to the personal remarks he directed against some members of the commission nor to his remarks as to the work done by the pension commission and the war veterans allowance board.

Mr. Pouliot: I hope the committee will be fairer than the hon. member.

CAPITAL COST ALLOWANCES

STATEMENT AS TO DEFERMENT OF DEPRECIATION FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in his discussion of the budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) stated that the Minister of Trade and Commerce would make a statement on deferred capital cost allowances, and at the conclusion of his budget speech the minister tabled a copy of order in council P.C. 1778, dated April 10, 1951, which altered the regulations affecting capital cost allowances under the Income Tax Act.

The purposes of these changes in the regulations is to defer capital cost allowances for a period of three years beyond the date of acquisition; that is a total of four years, except in certain specified cases. As the Minister of Finance explained:

> What we need is a stiff financial deterrent that will affect particularly the businessman who is considering the kind of investment which is attractive, not because of its long-term soundness but because it can be written off out of the expected high profits of the next few years, at a time when he expects the rate of corporate income tax to be abnormally high.
> To provide this deterrent it is proposed to defer for a period of four years the right to charge depreciation on all capital assets acquired after April 10, 1951, excepting certain classes of assets defined in the regulations and certain additional kinds of assets when certified as eligible by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.
> Under the proposal, the right to charge depreciation as an expense is deferred, not cancelled or even diminished. For example, $10,000 of ineligible assets acquired after April 10, 1951, will earn no depreciation for tax purposes during the next four years; but in 1955 it can be transferred by the depreciable asset account at its full original cost. If it is a type of asset that can be written off in say ten years, it will be written off in 1955 to 1964 instead of in 1951 to 1960.
>
> The deterrent will particularly affect the businessman whose decision to make a capital expenditure is strongly influenced by the expectation that he can write off a large fraction of his cost at a time when both profits and tax rates are abnormally high, particularly if it is a kind of investment with uncertain profit-making possibilities six or eight years hence. In other words it will compel the businessman to give primary attention to the long-term prospects of proposed capital expenditures, and, if outside financial participation is required, lenders will also take this view.
> There will, therefore, be a stiff deterrent on projects of uncertain long-run value and also on capital expenditures on frills, gadgets and generally "dressing up" offices, stores and buildings. This deterrent should reduce the competitive scramble for scarce materials and equipment and thus place less strain on direct controls. Such materials and equipment will tend to go to those who can make the best long-term use of them. Bidders who are anticipating short-run quick profits will tend to withdraw from the market.
>
> One further advantage is that the government will not be telling anyone that he cannot do this or that. What will happen is that a financial penalty will be put, in the short run, on those who go ahead with less essential expenditures.
> These revised depreciation regulations will go into effect immediately and will apply to all capital assets acquired after April 10, 1951.

That is the end of the quotation from the budget speech.

Current capital cost allowances will continue to be available on all property acquired up to and including April 10, 1951. Determination of the date of acquisition will be made by the Department of National Revenue in accordance with its usual practice in such cases.

With respect to property acquired after April 10, 1951, current capital cost allowances will be allowed to individual farmers, fishermen and professional men. Current allowances will also continue to be available to all taxpayers where the property acquired falls into any of the following categories set forth in schedule B of the income tax regulations:

Class 1. This class covers such properties as bridges, canals, culverts, dams, et cetera.

Class 2. This class covers such properties as pipe lines and certain plant connected with the production or distribution of electrical energy, gas and water.

Class 4. This class covers properties of a railway system, a telegraph or telephone system and a tramway or trolley bus system.

Class 9. This class covers such properties as radar equipment and radio transmission equipment.

Class 10. This class covers automotive equipment, gas or oil well equipment, mining machinery equipment and some other items.

Class 12. This class covers certain articles that have a limited life and can be depreciated entirely within a year.

Class 14. This class covers certain patents, franchises, concessions and licences.

As I have said properties which fall into any of the foregoing classes can be depreciated in the normal way and will not be subject to certification by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Similarly, current capital cost allowances will be available without certification with respect to all residential properties, that is, houses and apartment blocks, and with respect to all properties which replace those that have been destroyed by fire, flood, wind, lightning or other act of God.

I now come to those properties acquired after April 10, 1951, which will be eligible for current capital cost allowances only if a certificate is issued by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. These fall into two categories: (1) a property acquired for the fulfilment of a defence contract or subcontract or for a purpose which contributes to the defence of Canada; (2) a property acquired by a taxpayer for carrying on certain businesses.

Let me deal first with properties which are acquired for defence purposes. Hon. members will, I think, readily understand the reason for this provision. The government does not wish to discourage in any way capital expenditures which will enable Canadian industry to build up its productive facilities to meet Canada's defence needs. Moreover in some cases the investment may have a use limited to the defence period, and it would be inequitable to defer capital cost allowances for four years.

Taxpayers who have defence contracts and who find it necessary to acquire properties in order to fulfil defence contracts or subcontracts should apply to the capital cost allowances division of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the necessary forms and information. Before a certificate is granted, it will be necessary for the taxpayer to give evidence that the defence contract cannot be fulfilled unless the property in question is acquired.

Certificates may also be issued with respect to properties acquired by the taxpayer which in the opinion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce contribute to the defence of Canada. This provision is included to enable the minister to give a certificate for projects which, though not undertaken for the fulfilment or specific defence contracts or subcontracts, are nevertheless important as a means of increasing supplies of some basic material or commodity or of supplying some essential service. Such certificates will be issued only in exceptional cases.

In the second category is a group of basic industries listed in the order in council. Broadly, the industries covered include primary industries, industries engaged in the processing, including smelting and refining, of raw materials, and enterprises providing a utility or hospital service.

The policy in this category will be to issue certificates of eligibility for properties acquired by the taxpayer that are necessary to the carrying on of these businesses. Certificates will not be issued, however, if the property acquired is primarily used for the purpose of hotel or office use, commercial service, finance, wholesale trade, retail trade or renting for other than residential habitation.

Taxpayers who fall into the list of businesses included in this second category should apply to the capital cost allowances division of the Department of Trade and Commerce for forms and other information.

Before concluding this statement I should like to add just one comment, and that is that in administering these regulations neither the Department of Trade and Commerce nor any other department of government is making a decision as to whether or not any particular capital expenditure should be made.

That is for the taxpayer to decide. As my colleague the Minister of Finance said, " . . . the government will not be telling anyone that he cannot do this or that."

These regulations are another aspect of the government's policy to combat inflation. They are designed to reduce the competition for scarce materials and equipment, and thus to place less strain on direct controls.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO REPORT IN WINNIPEG "TRIBUNE" ON APRIL 10

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On the front page of the Winnipeg Tribune of April 10 I noticed an article which is headed "Sinnott Spanked." I want to say that I was not spanked, and that I believe the man who wrote this article possibly did not read Hansard in the right way. As reported at page 1768 of Hansard, when I made reference to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), this is what I said:

I see him in his seat now, and I would not do this if he were not here.

Further down on the page Mr. Speaker is reported as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Order. I see that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is in his seat.

What I object to, Mr. Speaker, is this. In the press report we read:

Speaker Macdonald interjected that while Knowles was not in his seat and had not objected to the remark, he himself did not think the words "public enemy" should be applied to a member of the house.

My point of privilege is this. I do not attack an hon. member when he is not in his seat. It is plain enough in Hansard that the hon. member was in his seat when I made this accusation.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I just say that I was in my seat but that I felt no concern about the remarks of the hon. member.

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR REGULATIONS COVERING THE ZONING OF AIRPORTS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 197, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Mr. Graydon: Will the minister explain?

Mr. Chevrier: The object of this bill is to amend the Aeronautics Act so as to permit the minister, with the approval of the governor in council, to make regulations covering the zoning of airports. Because of industrial, commercial and residential construction that has taken place around airports, it has now become necessary to control the height, use and location of buildings and structures in the vicinity.

Mr. Graydon: The minister speaks about the zoning of airports and the properties around them. Would that not be a matter of consultation and arrangement among the dominion government, the provincial governments and the municipalities in the areas concerned?

Mr. Chevrier: This legislation is clearly within dominion jurisdiction. It has first of all been submitted for approval to the government's legal counsel—the Department of Justice—and they have approved the wording as it will eventually come before the house.

Mr. Graydon: Does it apply only to buildings that are on dominion government property? If it does not, then I fancy the minister must be acting outside the jurisdiction of the federal power.

Mr. Chevrier: That will be a matter to discuss, I think, when we come to second reading; but in any event it does go beyond the scope of federal construction. It seeks to provide regulations for the protection of aerial navigation, and it is clearly within the decision of the privy council.

Mr. Drew: Do I understand that it will be within the authority of the bill as it is introduced, if it becomes law, to declare that certain zones, not actually taken over as dominion government property or the property of any agency of the government, can be used only for some particular purpose which would not involve the construction of buildings dangerous to aircraft in and out of the airport in question?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, the control is not over the buildings themselves; the control is over the height and the location. It will not affect property or civil rights, but it will affect obstacles that might impede safe aerial navigation, such as chimneys and other high structures, antennae and the like.

Mr. Graydon: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but may I ask one more question? The matter is one of urgent importance to us in the Malton area. Will this interfere with residential building programs which are in progress in a section such as Malton where there is an acute shortage of housing?

Mr. Chevrier: If they are a sufficient distance away from the airstrips it would not affect them in any way whatsoever.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Coldwell:

1. Is there a veterans housing project situated on McRae and other streets in Niagara Falls, Ontario, which is operated by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED REQUEST OF HOLLINGER COMPANY FOR PERMISSION TO EMPLOY DISPLACED PERSONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give the answer to a question asked yesterday on the orders of the day by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Maltais).

(Translation):

The hon. member inquired whether the Hollinger North Shore Company requested that refugees be admitted to Canada for employment in its plants.

I must inform the hon. member that the Department of Labour received no such request, nor does anything indicate that this company intends to place any request for the admission of non-Canadian workers. If, perchance, any such request were made, it would first, like any other application of this nature, be submitted to the offices of the national employment service in the district concerned, and throughout the country if necessary, to make sure that no workers are available locally to fill the jobs. Only after those usual precautions had been taken could a request of this nature be given attention and favourable consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

471. Departmental administration, $1,199,818.

Mr. Coldwell: I should like to say a few words about the report of the royal commission on transportation, which was discussed to some extent the other evening.

I think that the members of the board, the Hon. W. F. A. Turgeon, Dr. H. F. Angus and Dr. H. A. Innis, did a very fine job indeed for Canada when they made this inquiry and wrote their report. The report to a very large extent vindicates the position taken in this house by those of us who criticized some of the decisions of the board of transport commissioners, and also vindicates the attitude of the seven provinces which objected to those decisions and asked for the establishment of a royal commission of inquiry.

With some opinions in the report I find myself in disagreement, but they are minor considerations compared with the major recommendations of the report. I noted with a good deal of interest that the commission referred to the request which has been made from various quarters in the country for legislation which would prevent a recurrence of the regrettable dispute and the regrettable strike which occurred last summer. I noted with considerable interest that the royal commission recommended that no special legislation should be passed for the handling of railway disputes and the prevention of strikes or lockouts. It went on to say that legislation of that kind would be highly provocative and in practice ineffective —in other words, that we should continue the traditional method enjoyed by labour and management through the years, namely, collective bargaining.

Some of us who took that view last year were subjected to considerable criticism here and there across the country. Indeed, those of us who had the temerity to say that, after the long months of negotiation which ended in failure to achieve a settlement, the railway unions were justified in the regrettable action they then took, can find, I think, both in the report of the royal commission and in the report of the special commissioner or arbitrator who dealt with that railway dispute, some consolation for the, in some respects, abusive remarks directed toward us last August and September.

So as to link the matter up, I wish to place on record a paragraph of some significance in Mr. Justice Kellock's report:

> By September 1, 1950, the wage rate-cost of living relationship of the railway worker had deteriorated from the 1948 level to such an extent that 10·2 cents per hour was then required to restore that relationship.

In other words the seven cents asked for—by the railway unions—was already exceeded by 3·2 cents.

> And this margin, it would appear, will likely continue to be augmented.

That margin of course has continued to be augmented. It is indeed regrettable that strikes have to occur; but at the same time, when we find the justification outlined in the report of the arbitrator in the railway dispute, it can readily be seen why such action becomes necessary. I am glad to note the royal commission states that we should continue to rely upon the traditional methods of collective bargaining and not upon legislation referring particularly to employees of such public services as the railway.

I agree with the commission that it is unfortunate that railway freight rates for quite a number of years now have been a matter of public controversy, and unless action is taken, in some respects along the lines suggested in the report of the royal commission, we shall continue for a long time to come to have these regrettable discussions and disputes, and these feelings of justifiable dissatisfaction in various parts of the country. There will also be the feeling, as there has been in that part of Canada which has been my home for a good many years, including the constituency I represent, that there has been both unjust treatment and unjust discrimination against large sections of the country, both the far east and the far west.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

In justification of the criticism we have made in the house from time to time I would point out that the royal commission indulges in some criticism of the board's decisions since world war II. Those are decisions we have criticized adversely and at times severely in the house. The report says:

> The board seems to have treated the application purely from the revenue point of view and without considering the ability of different commodities to bear the increase.

I think that has very largely been the bone of contention. Incidentally it contrasts the attitude of our board of transport commissioners with that of the interstate commerce commission in the United States, pointing out that the American board, which has similar functions, did take into consideration some factors other than purely revenue factors, and that in their decisions there had been numerous exemptions from the horizontal increase right across the board about which we have complained in this country.

Quite properly in this connection the royal commission points out that special consideration must be given, both by the parliament of Canada and by any authority set up by parliament, to the long haul traffic, and particularly to the traffic in primary commodities. We have long argued in the house that the railways should not be considered purely from the point of view of revenue-producing institutions or organizations. The Canadian Pacific railway in particular was built to cement confederation. Indeed, one of the fundamental factors in the confederation agreement, particularly with British Columbia, was that a railway would be built to unite the far western province of British Columbia with the central and eastern provinces of the new Canada. It was on that consideration that British Columbia entered confederation. In other words, the railway was the bond of steel that joined the country together, considered not from a revenue-producing or economic standpoint only, but also as a political factor in the uniting of this great country we now know as Canada.

One can understand that the railways themselves are loath to approach the problem from the point of view I have just indicated. The royal commissioners pointed out —and I say the House of Commons should see that the suggestion is carried out—that the board of transport commissioners must approach the problem from what, for the want of a better term, I shall describe as the political point of view, or the point of view of the political welfare of the entire Dominion of Canada.

Then in connection with rate structure they say, as we have said in the house on many occasions, that we must have some equalization of treatment in the matter of freight rates. Indeed, it would appear that from the evidence given before the royal commission they came to the conclusion that that point of view was now generally accepted in all parts of Canada. In other words they felt that our friends in eastern Canada now recognize, with the rest of us, that these injustices and discriminations must be removed, and that there must be more equality in the rate structure of our country than we have had up to the present time. Therefore I am much in agreement with that part of the report. I think the recommendation as to the treatment of rates across the country is based on sound reasoning.

The commission point out that British Columbia in some respects enjoys a competitive rate because of the water haul by the Panama canal, but that certain cities in western Canada, particularly Edmonton and Calgary, have been discriminated against. They show that the rate on canned goods from eastern Canada to Vancouver is $1.40 per hundred pounds, because of the competition, as compared with a rate of $2.65 to Calgary or Edmonton. They recommend that a new system of rating should be adopted which would bring the rate to the Alberta cities down to $1.87 per hundred pounds. They recommend that the rates to intermediate points between the east and British Columbia should never be more than one-third greater than the transcontinental rates to or from the Pacific coast. It seems to me that that is one of the wisest and fairest recommendations in this report.

Mr. Low: At least it is closer to reason.

Mr. Coldwell: It is getting closer to what we should have in the way of a rate structure. It does tend to remove at least some of the injustices that are found in the present rate structure. What we need is a rate structure that will treat all citizens of Canada, wherever they may live, as justly as it is possible to do under prevailing conditions.

I am not going into a discussion of competitive rates generally, or the proposals in the report of the commission in regard to them. I have no doubt that soon or later the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier)—at least I hope so—will be bringing down legislation to implement some of the good recommendations in this report.

I notice that the commission does not recommend the public ownership of the Canadian Pacific railway. Some time ago we urged in this house that public ownership of the Canadian Pacific railway should be considered. During the war many of the securities issued by the Canadian Pacific, and indeed many of its shares, were held in the United Kingdom. Under wartime legislation in Great Britain those securities and shares were picked up by the government and marketed in order to get dollar exchange.

We were most anxious, as we are still, that the Canadian Pacific railway shall not pass into the control of the nationals of even the friendliest of foreign countries. That kind of thing has been going on. I still think that when we had the opportunity we would have been wise to ensure to the Canadian people the ownership of this great transportation facility. However, that was not done, and the report of the royal commission does not recommend that it should be done now. Indeed, it rejected the plea that it should be done.

May I just note in passing that the plea for the public ownership of the Canadian Pacific railway came from Prince Edward Island. That province produced some strong arguments as to why this railway should be publicly owned. My own province of Saskatchewan did not make a representation in the same sense as the Liberal government of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Brooks: Prince Edward Island is the only province through which the Canadian Pacific does not run.

Mr. Coldwell: That is right. While I have been criticized for saying it, I repeat that if and when this railway does come under the ownership of the people of Canada, as I believe it will ultimately, personally I would not be in favour of creating a single authority for the operation and amalgamation of the two great railroad systems. I believe that they should be competing in giving service with one another, just as it has been found advisable in the United Kingdom, and in some other countries where industries of the same type are publicly owned, to have separate management and administration, in order that one unit of the industry in one area may become a yardstick for another unit of the same industry in another area. I wanted to refer to that because it is something I have talked about in this house for a very long time.

The commission recommends an amendment to the Railway Act to empower the board and direct it to maintain a revised statistical procedure so designed as to provide the requisite data for the purposes of its duties. During the course of the presentations by the various provinces to the board of transport commissioners I was told that there was a sad lack of statistical material available, and that they had neither the staff nor the facilities to do the job they were expected to do under the legislation. I was told that by counsel who appeared before the commission, and particularly by some of the expert accountants who were engaged in the presentation of the pleas of the various provinces before the board of transport commissioners. I notice that the royal commission directs the attention of the house and the minister to the necessity of an amendment to the Railway Act to empower and direct the board to have the facilities available to enable them to do the kind of statistical job that is necessary in connection with problems of this kind.

It is noteworthy that two of the recommendations in the report are of great interest to two particular parts of Canada, because there is legislation dealing with both of them. No one wishes to disturb the maritime freight rates structure; and by the same token I was pleased indeed to see, in spite of representations by the railways, that the royal commission recommends no interference with the Crowsnest pass rates. We in western Canada regard the Crowsnest pass agreement as one of the agreements vital to the economic welfare of our part of Canada and indeed all Canada. We feel that we have paid in full for the right which is embedded in that agreement and in the validating legislation of this House of Commons. Some of us can remember very distinctly the attempts that were made after world war I to set aside the Crowsnest pass agreement. We remember the long struggle, lasting until 1925, to prevent any interference with that agreement; and we regretted and still regret that we lost some advantages when the legislation was amended, I think in 1925 or thereabouts. But as it remains today it is of such vital importance to western Canada that I am delighted indeed to see that the royal commission recommended that the Crowsnest pass agreement should remain under the control of parliament and not be turned back to the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners, as the railways requested should be done.

I was also pleased to see that the royal commission took up the argument which is sometimes advanced that these Crowsnest rates inflict some burden upon the rest of Canada. The commission did not substantiate that contention. Indeed they pointed out that other parts of the country enjoyed certain advantages which quite offset any advantages given under the Crowsnest agreement. Consequently they recommended that these rates should not be made to bear any part of general freight rate increases. As I say, we are pleased indeed that the royal commission confirmed the point of view many hon. members from western Canada, regardless of political affiliation, have advanced in this house from time to time.

I think one of the most interesting sections in the report is that which deals with the unproductive haul across northern and western Ontario, between Sudbury and Fort William. In that connection they have a proposal which I think this house would be well advised to consider very carefully, because it is the most constructive proposal I have seen along these lines during the years I have been in parliament or since this matter has been under discussion. They propose that this unproductive area from Sudbury to Fort William be considered on exactly the same basis as the canal system of Canada, which joins the great lakes and is the responsibility of all Canada. They propose that this long haul should be considered in exactly the same light, and that the annual maintenance costs—they make it clear that they are not talking about the operating costs—of that part of our railway system should be borne entirely by the federal government. They estimate that this would relieve the freight rate structure to the extent of something like $7 million annually, and they anticipate that this would be an effective measure of relief in the case of westbound traffic passing over this area which they call the bridge between east and west. I think that proposition would be fair to the railways and beneficial to all Canada. I believe it should be carefully considered and, if that consideration is favourable, approved by this house.

As I said before the report does not recommend any other legislation regarding railway disputes, strikes, lockouts, and so on. Another part of the report which I think should be carefully considered deals with the methods suggested for meeting the growing trucking competition. As a matter of fact I think everyone realizes that the truck is here to stay, and that it can perform a very useful function within our transportation system. While local trucking is under provincial control, there is no doubt that the house and the government, through legislation, can exercise some control over interprovincial and international trucking. What seems to be happening is that in many instances the lighter, more profitable traffic that might have been hauled by the railways has been picked up by the trucking and bus companies. As a result the railways have been denied a large and profitable traffic they might otherwise have had. If this continues without consideration and without perhaps some supervision, more and more we are going to find the railways left with coal, lumber, wheat and other heavy commodities, with the lighter and more profitable traffic handled almost exclusively by trucks and busses. I am not suggesting by any means the elimination of the trucking industry. As I said, I believe it performs a very useful function within our transportation system. I am suggesting, however, that the time has come when the minister and this house should consider the best ways and means of treating the trucking industry fairly and at the same time regulating it so it will be supplementary or complementary, whichever expression you like better, to the railway transportation system which must always be, within foreseeable time, the basic transportation system of this country, just as the fathers of confederation regarded it when confederation was achieved.

There are many other important matters dealt with in the report. I notice that the commission recommends the establishment of one central board to supervise our entire transportation system instead of the board of transport commissioners, the air transport board, and the Canadian maritime commission. That is one board instead of three. They say such a board would be able to undertake the kind of co-ordinated control that in these days is essential to the efficiency and welfare of the various groups and interests engaged in transportation, and for the protection of the public of Canada.

There is not a great deal more that I wish to say at this point. I do think that the minister will find he has a considerable amount of support in this house for the main recommendations made by the royal commission. If I may speak personally, I believe that the time has arrived when the recommendation for a national transportation commission, dealing with all forms of transportation which could come properly within the jurisdiction of such a commission, should be carefully considered by the minister and by the government. As the minister knows, I have held that view for a long time. The more I study the railway problem in Canada, the more I have been convinced that if we are going to have the kind of rate structure that will be satisfactory to all Canada, even if we have these changes that are recommended by the royal commission, if we are going to maintain our basic transportation system, then we have to view the transportation problem not from the railways' standpoint, not from the viewpoint of the trucking industry or the aeroplanes or the ships or whatever you have, but from the point of view of the entire industry and the economic effect of that industry on the welfare of Canada. When I say "welfare of Canada", we have now of course to consider also the interests of Newfoundland, as well as the interests of the nine provinces who were interested in this problem when it came before the house so acutely two or three years ago.

I want to say again that I believe the royal commission did a splendid job for Canada. The commission members are to be congratulated. The main recommendations of the report I believe are of such a nature that this house would be well advised to give early consideration to them, and to enacting legislation to bring into effect, as soon as we can, those that we feel are in the interests of Canada.

Mr. Larson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Larson: Would the hon. member care to tell the house exactly how he would propose to manage the railroads, if both railroads were owned by the federal government? Would he cut out duplicate services?

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, you will note that in discussing this several years ago I said that ownership of the Canadian Pacific might come to us if we acquired its securities then held in the United Kingdom instead of allowing them to pass into the hands of citizens of the United States, and that then we would have to consider that problem. I say I believe the day will yet come when the railways will be nationally owned. Economic circumstances will ultimately force that on the people of Canada, because sooner or later the people of Canada will decide that they should not subsidize a private railway company.

I said that when that is done I personally would not be in favour, as I see it now at least, of setting up one great corporation to operate the railways as one great system. The recommendation of the commission is to set up a controlling body over these various phases of transportation. I would say that, at least until that has been tried, no further step might be necessary.

The hon. member asked me how one would administer the two railways. I would say, keep each under an administration somewhat similar to the administration you have today, that is separate administrations answerable, as is the Canadian National, for their operations to a committee of parliament. I have forgotten the last question I was asked.

Mr. Larson: If the two railways were united it would appear that, in the interests of economy, all duplicate services should be discontinued.

Mr. Coldwell: I did not suggest the uniting of the two railways. As a matter of fact, when you speak about duplication of service, let us bear in mind that the parliament of Canada granted charters to these railroads to build where they are today. Along these routes that were granted, the people built towns and villages. I believe that in any consideration of the railway problem the interests of these towns and villages must be of primary consideration to us. To take up lines through certain territories because they are duplicated would create hardship on many hundreds of people. This parliament or provincial legislatures allowed the railways to go there, the duplication occurred, and this encouraged the building of towns and villages along those routes. We must not penalize the people who settled those parts of the country in good faith.

Mr. Johnston: I should like to say a few words on this report, because in the past I have had something to say about transportation. I believe it can be fairly said that the report has covered a large field, and that the members of the commission have done an excellent job. They have spent a good deal of time on it, I think in all about two years. In general the recommendations which the commission have made should commend themselves not only to the members of the house but to the people of Canada as well.

There are some exceptions that I would take to that, however. One of the good things which the report contains, one of the outstanding things, is the recommendation that the government subsidize the bridge between eastern and western Canada. I believe that is designated as the part lying north of the great lakes. We often refer to it as no man's land. I do not see how that problem could be dealt with in any different manner than that recommended by the commission. There is a large area of about four hundred miles between Sudbury and Fort William in which little production is taking place. There has been some improvement in that area due to the building of industries, such as the paper industry, and that will alleviate the distress to some extent. But certainly some assistance must be given to the railways if that large area is not to be considered a hindrance to the progress of western Canada. I believe we can all agree that that is a good recommendation.

The report refers to the amalgamation of the railways, to which the hon. member who preceded me has made some reference. I believe there are not many people in Canada who would support the amalgamation of the railways. The commission definitely recommends against that. My own view is that, while the report says there is not a monopoly existing between the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National Railways, there is what they term a duopoly. I looked for that word in the dictionary, but I could not find it. The solicitors for the railways gave a definition of it, and it is so close to monopoly there is not much room for argument. I believe the condition which exists with regard to those two railways is quite close enough without any further amalgamation. The commission recommended that the Crowsnest pass rates remain the same and for a good reason, I think, namely that the Crowsnest pass agreement was part of the terms of union of the provinces of Canada. That is necessary in order to maintain that long haul for grain. Incidentally, that reference was made at page 274, where the commission states that it was in the terms of union. It is not necessary to read the citation, but it may be found at page 274.

Then the commissioners make reference to the Maritime Freight Rates Act, which reference is also to be found at page 274, and recommended that it be left as it is. With that recommendation I think we all agree. Then on the same page they make reference to the canal system as follows:

> The construction in central Canada of an extensive canal system which became toll free, built at a cost of about $328 million and maintained at government expense.

I think the canal system is necessary to Canada and I am not in disagreement with the report when it suggests that that system be continued. That canal system has been a great advantage to central Canada and I should like to see more rapid progress made with regard to the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway in order to permit ocean-going vessels to go right up to the head of the lakes. That would be a tremendous improvement and advantage having regard to long freight hauls to various parts of this country. But it must not be forgotten that the fact that there was in this country a canal system maintained at the expense of the federal government—and that means maintained at the expense of all of Canada—certainly assisted in the development of central Canada, Ontario and Quebec, in maintaining low rates of transportation.

I have made some reference to that matter at this moment because I want to deal with it at greater length a little later on. I was also interested in and agreed with the recommendation in the report that labour disputes should not be interfered with but that they should be handled under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. I think that is something which should continue to operate as it has in the past. Generally speaking, I think that the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act has functioned satisfactorily.

I want to turn my attention now to the chapter which deals with trucking transportation. With some aspects of this report I do not agree, and I think the minister is quite well aware of that fact. I do not agree with them for obvious reasons. While the commission's report itself does not suggest, in so many words, that the federal government take over the control of trucking transportation in Canada, it does that by inference. The trucking industry in this country seems, to me at least, to be of paramount importance.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I must disagree with the interpretation placed upon the recommendation of the commission. The commission recommends no such thing by inference as the taking over of the trucking industry.

Mr. Johnston: It suggests that the federal government make a further and more extensive investigation into transportation by truck as between provinces. Those are not exactly the words used, but they are so close to it that there is no difference in the meaning at least.

Mr. Chevrier: All the commission does is to recommend the amendment of the Railway Act so as to cover regulation of international and interprovincial trucking.

Mr. Johnston: If I can just lay my hands on the section here, I will read it to the minister. I will find it a little later on. I cannot just lay my hand on it at the moment. I remember quite well that it was the last sentence of one of the paragraphs. I will run across it in just a moment. I will bring it to the minister's attention later on. As he has said, they do not recommend specifically that the federal government take over control of trucking transport but in my view they were coming fairly close to it, by inference anyway.

The canal system in central Canada has the same effect as the trucking industry would have in western Canada. The commission is explicit about that. They say that because of the canal system in central Canada and the trucking system in that same part of the dominion, there have been much lower traffic rates than there would have been otherwise. They say, in fact, that while the highways are under provincial jurisdiction, trucking transportation has an international effect. At page 275 they have this to say:

> Under Canada's constitution, control over highway traffic is, in the main, vested in the legislatures of the provinces. The provincial governments have expended large sums of money on road construction and gradually the country is being provided with a network of good roads. Now the federal government is co-operating with the provincial governments in the construction of the "trans-Canada highway" which will link the provinces of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific with a suitable route for motor transport.

It is true, as the report indicates there, that the provincial governments have spent large sums of money on the construction of proper and decent highways. But that result has come about only in the last few years, and I am going to venture this statement: Had it not been for the financial and the industrial improvement in the province of Alberta, that province would never have developed the remarkable system of highways that it now has and which it is continuing to develop. Because of the provincial government's better standing financially and industrially, we are now beginning to have a greater truck system there, and that is competing materially with railway transportation. That is one of the reasons why today the railway companies and the other vested interests, who are appealing strongly to the government to put transportation under federal control, are greatly concerned because of this competition in trucking. It is remarkable to note in the report that it has been owing largely to the centralization of trucking in central Canada and the competition from the canal rates that Ontario and Quebec have been able to improve their industrial and financial standing to the detriment of the other parts of the country. It is not much wonder, Mr. Chairman, when you read this report over carefully, why the railways and some of the large vested interests of this country have been so bitterly opposed to the free competition of truck transportation. At page 277 of the report they have this to say:

> Special mention was made of the desirability of bringing trucks within the same control and regulation as the railways. And here a great obstacle lies in the way. By far the largest part of truck traffic is intra-provincial, and most of this intra-provincial traffic consists of private trucking, that is trucking done by individuals and commercial firms in the handling of their own articles of merchandise. Only a small percentage is trucking for hire. All this intra-provincial truck traffic, both private and for hire, is beyond the jurisdiction of parliament, and this fact presents a barrier to co-ordination and integration of highway and railway services.

There is one point, Mr. Chairman, where, by reference, the thought is left for the trucking industry to be put under federal control. The minister may not agree with it, but the commission points out very carefully that intra-provincial trucking, that is trucking within the provincial boundaries, comes within the jurisdiction of the provinces without question. But they point out that when it comes to interprovincial trucking there is going to be difficulty to have co-ordination, and they recommend a one board commission to handle all this transportation.

I said a moment ago that the situation in Ontario and Quebec, because of the trucking competition and the canal competition with the railways, has led to prosperity in those central provinces. Therefore the railways and certain vested interests in this country have used a great deal of pressure to bring the trucking transportation under the board of transport commissioners. If we turn to page 286 of the report we find that Dr. Angus gives some views on it. At the bottom of the page in section 10 he says:

> A rate structure, once established, is an important factor in determining the economic location of industry and any change in an established structure is likely in the long run to affect the location of industry by making some enterprises vulnerable to competition.

That is exactly what happened in Ontario and Quebec. Because they had this competition with the rate structure it resulted in a great deal of prosperity for that section of the country. We are not for one moment objecting to prosperity in Ontario and Quebec, but I am pointing out that that was the fact, and the very fact that the board of transport commissioners and the railways worked together held back the progress of western Canada and the maritimes. And they did it knowingly. Let us not misunderstand that. They did it knowingly, and yet throughout these years the people of the maritimes and the people of the western provinces have appealed in this house and outside to get some fair rate structure established across this country, but to no avail. This report is the first evidence we have ever had of any attempt to be fair in the rates as between eastern and western Canada. The report goes on:

> There are, therefore, vested interests—

Notice this. It bears out exactly what I have said in this house for the last two or three years on this question:

> There are, therefore, vested interests opposed to any substantial change and insistent that, as a matter of national policy, it should be avoided or neutralized.

They go on:

> At the present time a substantial change is taking place in the Canadian rate structure. As in other countries, trucks (whether operating as carriers for hire or owned by shippers) have deprived the railways of much of the revenue which they had previously derived from the carriage of commodities of relatively high value for relatively short distances. The loss in revenue has to be made good from traffic which is not vulnerable to truck competition and, therefore, principally from the carriage of relatively low valued commodities for relatively long distances. In Canada, more perhaps than elsewhere, the result has been to impose a serious burden on the economies of outlying regions.

There is no doubt in the suggestions of Dr. Angus that the policy which has been laid down by the board of transport commissioners has resulted in rank discrimination against the western provinces particularly as to the advantage of industrial expansion and finances as well. It was rather noticeable to the commissioners that neither Ontario nor Quebec presented a case before the commission. That is understandable. Whether they did so by intent or not, I am not prepared to say, but they were certainly conspicuous by their absence. They already enjoyed the lowest freight rates of anywhere in this country, and only those who are most concerned and who have been deprived of the benefits of those low rates presented their views before the commission.

Let me again draw your attention to page 296 of the report. They put it in a very concise form here, and I think it should be put on the record:

> The eloquent silence of Ontario and Quebec in rate cases and in the hearings of this commission points to the effectiveness of truck and water competition in keeping down rates in the St. Lawrence region.

That is very definite. I continue:

> More extensive and better highways bring an increase in the density of traffic, greater diversification of industry, lower interest rates on capital . . .

Let me draw to your attention, Mr. Chairman, the fact that that is a very important consideration in the development of industry, which has always been lacking in the western provinces particularly, and I presume in the maritime provinces as well. I continue:

> More extensive and better highways bring an increase in the density of traffic, greater diversification of industry, lower interest rates on capital, and even greater extension and improvement of highways. Ability to escape from the full impact of increases in railway rates accentuates the burden of these increases on other regions and compels these regions to concentrate on highway construction as a means of escaping from the burden of higher short haul rates and long haul rates.

That is one of the conditions that have compelled those outlying regions to go in for greater development of hard-surfaced highways. They did not do it for the fun of it. That is a sure thing. Now that we are getting to the point of getting some decent highways—we hope to get a trans-Canada highway soon—the railways and other vested interests are becoming somewhat concerned about who is to control the transportation on those highways. Mind you, these highways are being built by the provinces, and not by any grant of the dominion government, with the exception of the trans-Canada highway. The commissioners go on in the same paragraph:

> Inability to escape the increased burden of higher rates on long haul rail traffic limits the financial strength and restricts the diversification of industry in these regions.
> The effectiveness of truck competition in the St. Lawrence region by weakening the financial resources of other regions, limits their possibility of escape from the burden of higher railway rates by means of road construction and motor vehicles.

If the railways can control freight rates through the board of transport commissioners by bringing trucks under the control of the board, then Ontario and Quebec can continue to dominate Canada's field of industry and finance. They will continue to use the maritimes and the prairie provinces as a market for their manufactured goods.

I think that statement is fully borne out by what this report says. So it is not fair and it is not honest and it is not according to facts for anyone to say that there has been no discrimination between east and west. Probably I should make it more definite and say between central Canada, that is Ontario and Quebec, and the western part of Canada. I am more mindful of the western provinces because it is that part from which I come. However, those from the maritime provinces can get up and make their views known. I do not think we would differ much from them because they are in exactly the same industrial and financial position as we are. We have contributed substantially to the advancement of central Canada; it is now time they did a little contributing toward other parts of Canada.

When I refer to the construction of the trans-Canada highway may I say that I am glad to see it progressing. I have been endeavouring to keep up with the times in the development of that highway, and I can say that the western provinces are developing their share just as quickly as their finances will permit them to do so. I have seen very little development in Ontario in the region between Sault Ste. Marie and Fort William. It is true that there is a good deal of development between Sudbury and Sault Ste. Marie, and from here to those points. In these regions good roads are being constructed; I was over them no later than last fall.

However, it does not make any difference how good the road is to Sault Ste. Marie; if the link between that point and Fort William is missing, what good is it? Anyone who has travelled over the Canadian Pacific Railway has noted, upon looking out of the window, that sections of well-graded gravel road ten to fifteen miles in length have been constructed, but there has been nothing done to join these sections. This was a terrific waste of money. Do not tell me that was by accident, because I know it was not. That was done years ago to prevent the construction of the trans-Canada highway. Provinces do not build those sections of road at an expense of from $75,000 to $100,000 a mile, and then leave them standing; of course they do not—unless they have very good reasons for doing so.

The provinces concerned are going to have to put up a fight in this field. Some of them are already doing so. I know of only one province that stated before the commission they were prepared to turn the control of trucking over to the federal board, and that was Saskatchewan. I believe they went so far as to say that they would turn over to federal control their internal trucking along the main line. Alberta does not take the same view, nor did any of the other provinces. They can see clearly what has been holding back the progress of those provinces.

Indeed, at page 297 of the report we find this:

> The province of Alberta has intimated that it will not give licences for trucks controlled by the railway.

I have come to that part which a while back I indicated to the minister I would read. It is found in the latter part of the second paragraph on page 297, where it says:

> Higher interprovincial rates are justified in part by necessity for example in purchasing double licence plates but they present obstacles to trade between provinces and favour intraprovincial trade.

And this is the sentence to which I referred:

> It is of concern to the federal government to institute machinery which will collect full information on the extent of interprovincial trucking.

I said by inference that meant they were more or less favouring further investigation into this problem with the hope probably that it would be taken under federal control and co-ordinated under this one board.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the hon. member permit me? He is reading from the memorandum on transportation by one of the commissioners.

Mr. Johnston: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: I, in my interruption a moment ago, was dealing with the recommendations in the report. That, I suggest is the only matter with which we can be concerned, namely what the commissioners recommended. That is in the first part of the report. The hon. member is reading from observations, and they can be taken only as such.

Mr. Johnston: The other quotation I read was from the recommendations of the commission itself.

Mr. Chevrier: But it did not support your view.

Mr. Johnston: That is a matter of interpretation. I think I said a moment ago that I was referring to the submissions of Dr. H. F. Angus and Dr. H. A. Innis. This is from Dr. Innis' submission. One of my colleagues has just asked me to ask the minister if he is in favour of it. I do not think the minister need answer that because he has made it clear on other occasions that he is definitely in favour of having trucking brought under federal control.

I think I should put on record the fact that there are vested interests involved. These vested interests of which I was speaking are referred to at page 278 of the report and they include the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Ship-by-Rail Association, the Dominion Joint Legislative Committee of the Railway Transportation Brotherhood, and the Canadian Congress of Labour. But the International Brotherhood of Teamsters and the Canadian Automotive Transportation Association are opposed to federal control. I should have added the name of the minister to the list of financial interests who were concerned, because he would appear to fall in the same category.

As will be seen, the provinces must meet quite an array of artillery, when we find the minister himself in agreement with the policy of placing trucking under the board of transport commissioners. I certainly hope however that the minister will change his view, and I would suggest that the words of Dr. Angus and Dr. Innis, two members of the commission, should have some influence with the government when deciding policy. I believe when the government examines the report carefully and the remarks made by these two gentlemen, aside from those of the chairman, Mr. Turgeon, it will come to the conclusion that it would not be in the interests of Canada to place truck transportation under the board of transport commissioners.

At the present time we have been operating under what one of the solicitors for the railways said was not a monopoly but a duopoly. If we put through this other thing we will have a triopoly. I do not know how many more "opolies" we will get as a result. But, as one member suggests, we certainly will have a monopoly. As far as transportation rates are concerned, it will be more than that, we will have a dictatorship.

If you have all these transportation systems under the one board it is safe to say that while the board will not be made up of the same personnel as the present board it will be quite similar and we will have similar results. Those results have not been good. They have not been for the benefit of Canada. There should not be a complete monopoly of the transportation systems of this country under any one board.

If the government believes in free enterprise, as it says it does, then we should have free enterprise and free competition.

Mr. Byrne: Would you let the railways set their own rates?

Mr. Johnston: The railways have been setting their own rates, do not make any mistake about that. You have only to refer to the last increases which they asked for and got. The government had something to do with that. That is the objection to having all these transportation systems under the control of one board. Free competition and free enterprise will have no chance to operate. Therefore I am against the suggestion which I think is made in the report of having transportation by truck under the control of any board or commission.

Mr. Darroch: Mr. Chairman, chapter 5 of the report deals with matters which are of national or local concern, and for a few minutes I should like to deal with a matter of local concern to my constituents. On pages 135 and 136 reference is made to the segregation of passenger and freight revenues and expenses. It was suggested to the commission that any deficit in passenger rates should not be charged to freight rates, but at page 137 of the report the commission recommends:

> The freight and passenger services are essential and if the passenger fares cannot be raised to produce sufficient revenue to enable the passenger traffic to pay its own way the freight traffic must bear the burden. The two services are so interrelated that segregation is not practical.

After reading this conclusion by the commission, we in our section of Ontario are rather perplexed. During the last couple of months the management of Canadian National Railways have been interviewing the heads of municipalities and suggesting that certain passenger services which are now in effect in that section of Ontario should be discontinued. They propose taking off two passenger trains that run from the divisional point at Palmerston in my riding to Kincardine and to Southampton. In other words, they propose taking off four trains a day on each of those lines.

It has been proposed to the municipalities that in substitution they will inaugurate three distinct services which will be wholly dependent on gas, rubber and road conditions. They propose to carry express and mail by trucks, and passengers by busses. I feel that those who are making those recommendations overlook a condition peculiar to our section of the country, that is the road conditions which are created by our weather. As I say, these three services will be dependent upon gas and rubber, which commodities may be in short supply before too long, although we hope that will not be so.

However, the greatest obstacle is the road conditions. I know the type of road condition that is created by the weather in that part of the country because I have lived there all my life. I cannot see how they will be able to keep traffic moving under the conditions which we have at times. I noticed an article in the newspapers yesterday under the dateline Palmerston, April 10, which reads:

> Road conditions on local roads have bogged down part of North Wellington district high school buses, and have stalled traffic over a Wellington county road used as a short cut to Harriston from Palmerston.

That is not an isolated instance because the same condition pertains between Palmerston and Southampton, and even more so between Palmerston and Kincardine. The greatest part of the road that it is proposed to use is a county road. I am quite satisfied that other counties are as much concerned with road costs as is the county of Wellington. At the January session of our county council they decided to set aside one mill for road and bridge improvement, but I notice that in the April session last week they decided that in view of heavy taxation they would forgo that charge and this year they will not be spending that mill. Other counties are finding the burden of keeping up county roads just as heavy as the county in which this proposed service will operate. We are to have four express trucks, four mail trucks and four busses using these county roads.

The railroad company does not propose to stop its freight service. In other words, it will still use these two lines for freight and therefore the roadbeds will have to be kept up. I cannot understand why this additional burden should be passed on to the municipalities when the railroad roadbeds are still to remain. That is something that the people in this part of the province find it hard to understand.

Then there is the employment situation which will result if this proposed change takes place. Palmerston is a divisional point and it has a substantial wartime housing project. Ninety per cent of the houses are occupied by veterans who are employed by Canadian National Railways. If the proposed change goes into effect these men will have to change their place of residence—I do not say they will be out of work because no doubt the railroad can give them employment elsewhere—they will have to move to other divisional points in order to continue working. That means that these men will lose their equity in their houses and the municipality of Palmerston will be faced with the necessity of carrying on where they have left off.

This town has been built around the railroad and as there is no other industry this will mean quite a serious burden. I do not think anyone will argue that the railroads in that section of the country have not suffered a loss of considerable passenger traffic. One reason for this is the fact that many people own their own automobiles, but quite a substantial group of people in these communities use a bus line that is operating there. This service is rather uncertain and cannot be considered to be completely dependable by any stretch of the imagination. They run one bus up and one bus down per day on each of the roads I have mentioned.

In his closing remarks the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar referred to the fact that many communities had been built up on the promise of railroad service. I am thinking of a conversation I had last Saturday with an elderly gentleman in my village. We were not talking about the railway; he just happened to come along and speak to me. He told me that if he lived until May 29 he would be 80 years old, the same age, he said, as the railway track. That just shows how long that service has been in operation.

I think quite a substantial amount of this passenger traffic could be regained by the railways if the management and labour would sit down and talk over the matter. From my own observations in and around Palmerston and other places affected I believe that if the service were made more attractive, perhaps by using smaller units of some kind, we could continue to carry on almost as in the past. With the weather we have in that part of the country I do not see how trucks and busses can hope to give the kind of service that has been given by the railways; I do not think it can be done. If I may say so, I believe in the past railways have been rather delinquent in not keeping up with the times. Passing through the villages, towns and cities in our part of the country you will find that one of the most unattractive buildings in the community will be the local railway station. The bus companies dress up their depots. At the moment I am thinking of the two cities in western Ontario with which I am most familiar, Guelph and Kitchener. The bus depots there are bright buildings with individual chairs, cheerful surroundings and lunch counters. If you go into the Canadian National depots in those cities, however, you find them to be dark, dingy places with hard benches and nothing else. I am sure that if the service were made more attractive more people would use the railways.

Then I believe more advertising should be done. On the afternoon of Easter Sunday I noticed a train running on our line, that is the Southampton line. The track runs right past our farm, and I could see how many people were on the train. I did not know there was going to be a train that afternoon, and I do not think ten people in the village, other than those connected with the railway, knew a train was going to be operated. I was in the village that evening and several people said that if they had known a train would be operating they would have been glad to use it.

So I believe it should be suggested to the Canadian National that they do not take this matter to the board of transport commissioners for approval but that the whole matter be reviewed with the idea of improving the present system. I am quite sure it can be done. I feel that the people of this section of the country, which is one of the most prosperous rural districts in Canada, have a right to expect at least a continuation of the present service, if not an improvement in it, from a government owned and operated transportation system.

Mr. Chevrier: I think the hon. member will expect me to comment on the statement he has just made concerning the proposed withdrawal of certain trains on the Palmerston-Kincardine line and perhaps another line which he mentioned. The hon. member has brought up a matter which of necessity concerns the railways from time to time; namely, the unprofitable operation of certain lines. That is evidently what is happening in the area to which the hon. member refers. I am not nearly as familiar with the circumstances as he is, but it may be that the delinquency he charges on the part of the railways arises from the fact that the people are not using the railways. I am reminded of a delegation that came to see me some years ago, not long after I took over responsibility for this department, to protest the withdrawal of certain trains. Upon questioning them it was discovered they had travelled here by bus, not by train. If people in certain areas follow the practice of travelling by bus or in their own cars instead of using the trains, then certainly the people should not be surprised if sooner or later the railway companies make application to the board of transport commissioners for the withdrawal of those trains.

The point here is that the operation is unprofitable because the public are not using the service. The only alternative is for the public to patronize the line. Neither the Canadian National nor any other company can withdraw a service without the approval of the board of transport commissioners, and in this case I understand the application has not been made as yet. I think the Canadian National Railways have followed the obvious policy of attempting to meet the wishes of the people by discussing with certain public bodies and municipal corporations in the area a method of co-ordinating transportation by operating a portion of the service by rail and a portion by truck. Whether or not it is possible to meet the wishes of the people in the area I am unable to say; but I know those people on behalf of whom the hon. member speaks will have a perfect right to protest the withdrawal of these trains before a public board when the application is made, and give reasons why the service should not be curtailed or withdrawn. I can assure the hon. gentleman that these representations will be given careful consideration by the board.

The hon. member also suggested that the position be reviewed by the Canadian National Railways before the application is launched. I understand that review has been or is being made at the moment, and I am hoping that ways and means may be found to co-ordinate the services rather than withdraw them entirely.

Mr. Hatfield: I do not agree with the findings of the commission in regard to the Maritime Freight Rates Act. I do not think the maritime provinces get any advantage at all from that act, though the government is paying the railways some $9 million. The special rate on the Canadian National only applies as far as Diamond Junction or Levis. I do not know how far it goes on the Canadian Pacific. Can the minister say the point on the Canadian Pacific to which the 20 per cent applies?

Mr. Chevrier: The select territory is set out in the definition section of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, which I can get for the hon. member in a moment.

Mr. Hatfield: The select territory is defined in the act. As far as the Canadian National is concerned it is defined as being as far as Diamond Junction. The Canadian Pacific does not go into Diamond Junction. If you are shipping a car of potatoes from New Brunswick to Toronto the increased rates beyond Diamond Junction take away all the benefits we receive from the Maritime Freight Rates Act. Freight rates have been increased so much that the maritime provinces have been almost put out of business. If east and west cannot ship their goods into central Canada, where the markets have been built up, what are the east and west to do?

The royal commission did not seem to do us much good. They turned down all the requests of the people who appeared before them. They turned down a request that the Maritime Freight Rates Act be extended to include movements to Toronto and Windsor. They turned down the request that the amount be increased to 30 per cent instead of 20 per cent. I do not believe the maritimes have had any advantage from that 20 per cent which was given in about 1926, I think it was, when the act was made effective. I believe that has all been taken away from us now, although the government pays about $9 million into the railways. I believe the railways build up the rates beyond Diamond Junction to cover the 20 per cent by which they have had to reduce the rate before Diamond Junction. I should like the minister to look into that situation, because I think the government is paying out money for nothing.

I should like to find out whether the maritime provinces are getting any advantage out of the Maritime Freight Rates Act. When I went into business we were shipping potatoes to Montreal for 17 cents per hundred. The rate is now 41 cents per hundred, with some other charges added. We have been talking about controls. The bag into which we put 75 pounds of potatoes has gone up 20 cents in the last six months. We used to pay 17 cents. You talk about increasing the cost of living. The increase in the freight rates and the increase in the cost of containers for the potatoes means that a bag of potatoes is costing about 50 cents more than it did a few years ago. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was trying to blame the producer for the increase, but it is not the producer; it is the freight rates. You cannot increase the freight rate and increase the cost of the containers while keeping the price to the consumer at the same level. I should like the minister to look into this situation.

At the time of confederation, when the Intercolonial railway was built, the maritime provinces were promised low freight rates into the markets in central Canada. No attention has been paid to that promise. At the time the Maritime Freight Rates Act was put into effect the rate on potatoes from Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick to Montreal was about 28 cents per hundred. It is now 41 or 42 cents per hundred. I believe the rate is built up beyond Diamond Junction. I do not know where Diamond Junction is, but I believe it is near Levis somewhere. I do not know where the point is on the Canadian Pacific, although they get the advantage of this 20 per cent too. I do not know whether it is St. Johns, Quebec, or Sherbrooke, because the Canadian Pacific does not follow the north shore as does the Canadian National. I should like to know from what point the Canadian Pacific is getting paid the 20 per cent. The government is paying the bill and we derive no advantage from it.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I might be allowed to reply to the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton at this stage. It is true that the main representations by the maritime provinces, with reference to the extension of the select territory and the increase in the subsidy, were not received with approval by the commission. But the representations were carefully studied by the commission, and it is also true that they were made by an important and large group of interests in the maritime provinces. The commission felt that it should not, for the reasons given in the report, extend the select territory, nor should it increase the 20 per cent to 30 per cent.

But the commission did accept one of the main requests of the maritime provinces, and that was in regard to the complaint that horizontal rate increases were burdensome on them, and had a detrimental effect upon the Maritime Freight Rates Act itself. After investigation of that complaint, the commission felt that there was a great deal to be said for it, and recommended to the board that hereafter it should not grant horizontal increases across the board, but that the increases should be granted in the manner in which they were granted originally by the board after it was established back in 1903.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the original plan, to increase in districts and areas?

Mr. Chevrier: That was one plan, and there was another plan which was given in detail in the report. Prior to 1914, I believe, the plan was one which increased the rates in western Canada less than in central Canada. I think there was, as well, a basis for a percentage increase in the eastern provinces.

Mr. Hatfield: The railways have not followed the terms of the act. They have not kept separate accounts up to Diamond Junction or any other place. They are supposed to keep those accounts.

Mr. Chevrier: I am telling my hon. friend now that one of the main complaints of the maritime provinces was given effect to. Then, when he asks about a comparable point on the Canadian Pacific to Diamond Junction, if my hon. friend looks at section 4 of the act he will find it sets out a list of the preferred movements affecting the various railways.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I agree with what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said this afternoon, that the Turgeon commission did a particularly good job. I am more than pleased to be able to say that, because for many years the chairman of that board practised law in my own city of Prince Albert, and started his political and judicial career there. I know the member for Rosthern recalls the days when Mr. Turgeon first came to Prince Albert, established himself there and started his record of public service which is continuing.

Mr. Hatfield: He was born in the east.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As the member for Victoria-Carleton says, he really had a good start having been born in New Brunswick.

I intend to make one or two observations about this report. First, I think that it does bear out many of the criticisms that have been made over the years, and in particular during the last two years, respecting horizontal increases in freight rates and the detrimental effect they have in so far as western Canada and the maritime provinces are concerned. I remember when, a little less than a year ago, the debate on this subject took place in this chamber. At that time I pointed out the injustice that was being done by reason of this horizontal increase in freight rates. It struck at western Canada—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. The horizontal increases resulted in the unfair, discriminatory rates of 15 per cent, as they then were, finally being increased to 21·78 per cent. Certainly no one, in reading the report, can do otherwise than conclude that the only hope for the building up of a united Canada is in the removal of the discrimination that has been in effect in respect of freight rates.

I feel that, at the earliest possible date, the government should bring before parliament legislation that will implement many of the recommendations of the commission, in so far as they are generally acceptable to hon. members in all parts of the House of Commons. So often in the past, Mr. Chairman, when royal commissions have made their reports, those reports have been unused and have found their way into the archives. Having regard to the opinions expressed in this chamber last June by the minister, I trust that this is one report that will be implemented at the earliest opportunity, with a view to removing the existing discrimination and the injustice to the maritimes and to the western provinces under which those areas have laboured over the years.

Some mention was made today of the extension of the authority of the board of transport commissioners. My friend the hon. member for Bow River seemed to be under the impression that the report recommended not only that railway, steamship and air transport be placed under the board but trucking transportation as well. I do not read the report in that way. In fact, the majority opinion indicates that there was a full realization by the board that trucking was a matter, generally speaking, of provincial jurisdiction and that it could in no way be controlled by the federal authority.

I feel that it would be to the public interest to extend the power of the board of transport commissioners to cover not only railway transportation, but sea transportation and air transportation. There is no reason why the board, as it is at present constituted, should not be able to discharge those responsibilities. The chairman of the board, Mr. Justice Archibald—and a most distinguished judge he was—is today discharging his responsibility in a judicial and acceptable manner. I feel that the power of the board should be extended.

I mention this phase of the matter, and I hope I shall be pardoned for doing so. On more than one occasion I pointed out that, having regard to radio, it was unjust that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should act in a judicial capacity in matters of dispute as between the private stations and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. In other words, the C.B.C. is in a position of being not only a competitor but also a judge in its own disputes. When and if the authority of the board of transport commissioners is extended to cover the three modes of transportation—railway, sea and air transportation—I think at the same time consideration should be given to giving it authority to supervise the question of jurisdiction and to settle disputes as between public and private authority in connection with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: What about international and interprovincial trucking?

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend mentions international and interprovincial trade.

Mr. Coldwell: Trucking.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I meant trucking. As a matter of fact, the line between what is international trade and what is interprovincial trade is difficult to draw. The courts have endeavoured to do it in the United States. The interstate commerce commission has found it almost impossible to arrive at a common basis upon which to determine what is, in fact, trucking within the state and what is interstate. For that reason I believe that to add to the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners the power to determine rights and to decree responsibility in reference to trucking would cause a great deal of legal argument and result in no final determination, having regard to the difficulties of differentiating between what is provincial and what is federal. Indeed, that consideration I think is pointed out on more than one occasion in the report. At page 277 we find these words:

> Special mention was made of the desirability of bringing trucks within the same control and regulation as the railways. And here a great obstacle lies in the way. By far the largest part of truck traffic is intraprovincial, and most of this intraprovincial traffic consists of private trucking, that is trucking done by individuals and commercial firms in the handling of their own articles of merchandise. Only a small percentage is trucking for hire. All this intraprovincial truck traffic, both private and for hire is beyond the jurisdiction of parliament, and this fact presents a barrier to coordination and integration of highway and railway services.

In answer to my hon. friend, I point out that the opinion of the chairman of this commission is that of a renowned man of judicial experience; and he expressed, as did the commission, the gravest doubts as to the possibility of bringing trucking under the board. Then again at page 278, after reviewing the difficulties that had been experienced with the provinces in agreeing to any change in the constitution to meet that situation, the following appears:

> This attitude of the provinces gives no ground for the hope that central, uniform control and regulation of all transportation, including provincial transportation, is realizable in the near future.
> Notwithstanding the existence of this barrier of provincial opposition, it will be well to state briefly the views expressed on the subject.

Then here are set out the views of various groups, such as the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Congress of Labour, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters and so on.

I feel that if the matter of trucking and the jurisdiction over it were placed in the hands of the transport board, it might be exceedingly difficult for that board properly to discharge its responsibility in view of the question as to the jurisdiction of the board so to do.

I welcome this report, first because it at least recommends the removal of discrimination in freight rates. It does not refer directly to discrimination but it recommends equalization of freight rates which indeed is just another way of saying the removal of discrimination which we in the western provinces, as well as those in the maritimes, have suffered from over the years.

If we are to build up this country and develop our natural resources one of the first things that must be done is to equalize freight rates. In the western provinces we have infinite natural resources that could be developed. Manufacturing industries could be established there. Sites for power development are available in the province of Saskatchewan, but industrialization cannot be achieved until such time as there is an equalization of freight rates. The injustices of the past in this direction have gone a long way to deny industrial development not only to the western provinces but also to the maritimes.

Now, sir, I think that all hon. members—and I say that without regard to party consideration—will appreciate the recommendation for the continuance and the maintenance of the Crowsnest agreement. There never was any demand that I know of for many years for the removal of those advantageous rates in so far as the grain products of the prairie provinces are concerned, but it is well that the matter was discussed and that evidence was given respecting it, and that the authority of this commission is behind the maintenance of those rates.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer. In the introductory paragraph to chapter 17 the commission sets out the broad outlines of Canada's national transportation policy. It set them out as follows. It said that the national transportation policy had its inception in:

> (a) The construction of the Intercolonial railway to enable the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to market their products in central Canada;
> (b) The construction of the Canadian Pacific railway to unite British Columbia with the rest of Canada;
> (c) The agreement to establish and maintain continuous communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland of Canada;
> (d) The terms of union with Newfoundland providing for the taking over of the Newfoundland railway and steamship services and the entrustment thereof to the Canadian National Railways, and the agreement to maintain a freight and passenger steamship service between Port aux Basques and North Sydney.

This matter will be dealt with by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West. Then the chapter goes on to deal with the various steps that have been taken in developing our railway system. Among other things it deals with the construction of the Hudson Bay railway and the development of the port of Churchill. I am going to say a few words now regarding that. I realize that during the past year there has been more extensive use of the Hudson Bay railway than for a period of several years, but there is still lots of room for improvement in that connection. I feel that greater encouragement should be given to the utilization of the facilities at Churchill.

During the last few days many hon. members have visited Churchill and have seen something of the potentialities inherent in the developments that have taken place there during the past year. Churchill harbour has moved 6,700,500 bushels of wheat to overseas markets, and the ships on their voyages to Churchill have brought in 3,400 tons of merchandise. The savings on freight to the western farmer on the wheat shipped by way of Churchill amounted last year to $810,000. Greater use should be made of the facilities there at the present time.

The situation with regard to damp wheat in the western provinces is a serious one. The elevator at Churchill has a capacity of 2,500,000 bushels and a drier capacity of 20,000 bushels a day. These facilities should be used now in order to save millions of bushels of wheat that otherwise is in danger of being destroyed as a result of the condition in which it is.

The use of those facilities can no longer be excused on the ground of dangers to transportation and high insurance rates. The insurance rates have been reduced. The use of those facilities today, if given the encouragement that I should like the Minister of Transport to give to the shipment of wheat in that direction, would mean a very great saving to the western farmer. Certainly, the facilities have not been used to any extent at all since 1935. Last year's shipment of some 6 million bushels is merely a drop in the bucket when compared with the use to which those facilities could be put.

The wheat board is an emanation of the crown. There is no reason why the wheat board, in endeavouring to secure, as it should, the largest possible return for the farmer, should not be utilizing these facilities. I do make an appeal to the minister, as hon. members have on other occasions, for greater encouragement of the use of those facilities; for in that way we in the western provinces will be enabled to overcome some of the handicaps resulting from our geographical position, and will be able to assure to the farmer the greatest possible return for his products.

Just one other matter and I am through. Our position geographically is that we in the western provinces find a gap of five hundred or six hundred miles in northern Ontario, which has the result of greatly increasing the freight rates and the cost of the commodities that are shipped in to the western provinces. That so-called gap is an economic gap between the east and the west. It is one that should not be detrimental to the people of the western provinces. That gap is a part of confederation; it is part of our geographical position. When the time comes to determine the question of freight rates, so far as the western provinces are concerned, the government of Canada should give a subsidy in order to cover the extra cost of transportation in that five hundred or six hundred mile gap to the end that we in the western provinces will not be discriminated against because of our geographical position. The problem is, how to overcome it. It is one that has received the support of the government of Saskatchewan; it is one that has received the support of the leader of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan; it is one that has received the support of the leader of the Progressive Conservative party in Saskatchewan, and I think generally of the western provinces. There is no reason—

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): And of the Liberal members at Ottawa.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes; I was not taking anything away from the Liberal members in Ottawa. There is no doubt that they give it support, and if they will just exercise—I will not say restraint, because sometimes they exercise too much of that—enthusiastic support, both publicly and in caucus for this, I am sure—

Mr. Chevrier: They have.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They have? I am glad to hear that. Enthusiastic support from them up to the present moment has not warmed the heart of the minister sufficiently to bring it into effect. I only hope that they will continue the warming process. I will join with them in it to the end that something be done to remove the injustice that arises in consequence of that gap. We are united on that. There is no political difference between us. The hon. member for Moose Mountain knows that we are united in that. Fairness demands it. I should like to see the minister go further than to say, as he did a moment ago, that representations have been made. I would rather hear him say that every possible support will be given by him to the end that this injustice of geography will not be detrimental to us in the western provinces in future years.

This report is one worthy of a great commission presided over by an outstanding public servant of the western provinces. I sum up what I have endeavoured to say, first, that I am in agreement with the commission that discrimination must end and that equalization of freight rates must take place; and secondly, that the Crowsnest agreement shall not be interfered with. Then, thirdly, I suggest a subsidy from the country as a whole to remove the detrimental effects of the gap in northern Ontario which, up to the present time, have operated most unjustly in connection with the development of the western provinces industrially and have meant higher costs for the commodities our people have to buy. Fourth, I would bespeak the active support of the Department of Transport in the making of representations to the wheat board for the utilization of the Hudson Bay railway to a far greater extent than at present.

One has some realization of the saving there would be to the farmers of the western plains when he realizes that on 6,500,000 bushels there is a saving in freight rates of $810,000. The use of the facilities even to the extent of 35 million bushels, which I am informed is quite possible, and would require very little extension in the facilities now existing at Churchill, would mean a tremendous saving to the farmers of western Canada.

Those, sir, are in general the representations I make to the minister at this time, coupled with my support for adding to the duties of the board of transport commissioners responsibility over maritime and air transportation, and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The board is now semi-judicial, having at its head an outstanding judge and as its deputy chief a member of the bar of more than ten years' standing. My suggestion is that consideration be given by this board, not only in the interests of the assurance of equity and justice as between the broadcasting corporation in its public capacity and the private radio stations, but also with the thought that by bringing these together under one board which is large enough and has the available talent to discharge its responsibilities considerable economy would thereby be effected and we would have as well the assurance of judicial consideration of many of the problems this board is singularly fitted to survey.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I deal with just one or two of the matters brought to my attention by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I was pleased to hear him speak so highly and so eloquently of the chief commissioner, the Hon. Mr. Turgeon, and of the report itself. I think the fact that he speaks in such a vein about the report, rather than in a critical manner, is under all the circumstances most helpful.

However, when he deals with the matter of the gap I am sure he has not read the statement I made in the house the other evening in reply to a question by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, because at that time I did say what the intention was. I said in effect that a committee had been established in the Department of Transport to deal with draft legislation covering the subject of equalization, and that I was hopeful that it would be possible to implement this legislation at the present session of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does that include a subsidy for the gap?

Mr. Chevrier: I said one went with the other; but I made it clear, because I wanted to be fair with the house, that I had to bring before my cabinet colleagues the draft amendments concerning the legislation before final decision could be taken. Because there are not only the eighteen or twenty sections referred to in the first part of the report which one must consider, but there are a number of other sections in the Railway Act as my hon. friend knows, which must be taken into account when one is considering what the relationship of those sections will be to the eighteen or twenty amendments recommended by the commission. So that I think my hon. friend need not have any apprehension, so far as that part of the report is concerned. I have no authority to go any further. But I do say the government is quite sincere in giving effect to the first part of the report at least.

The hon. member did speak also of his concern with respect to the port of Churchill, and asked me to give attention to the greater use of the facilities in that area. I would remind him that it is not the responsibility of the minister to direct traffic to one port rather than to another. It is his responsibility to see that when traffic moves the facilities are available to handle it.

I think the national harbours board and my predecessors in the Department of Transport have always taken the view that it is for the responsible authorities in the various national harbours, municipal or otherwise, to promote trade toward those ports. What we did do in the Department of Transport however, in connection with the port of Churchill, was to extend the season of navigation by seeing that greater aids to navigation were provided, and seeing that more loading and unloading facilities were there in the event of traffic coming to that port. Also there was the not unimportant factor of reducing insurance rates. True, as I said in the house, that is a matter over which we have no direct control. But we did bring to those in the United Kingdom who are responsible for establishing those rates representations which I believe had the effect of reducing them.

I can assure the hon. member that we will continue to give to harbour facilities and railway facilities the best possible attention, and to encourage the movement of wheat outward through Churchill, as well as the movement of other cargo. But unless the shippers in the United Kingdom and elsewhere decide to move commodities through the port, I do not think there is any authority in the Department of Transport which I would have to direct them to use one port rather than another.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What did the minister mean by the use of the word "encourage"?

Mr. Chevrier: We might encourage traffic by bringing to the attention of the Hudson Bay Railway and Canadian National Railways authorities the fact that it is possible to move greater quantities of wheat through Churchill, and the fact that there are elevator facilities there to handle large quantities.

The hon. member referred to the fact that we had moved more than 6 million bushels last year. When one takes into consideration the fact that the movement through Churchill has been more than doubled in the last five or six years, I think it is some indication of our intention to see that these facilities are used to their fullest extent.

I do not want to delay this, but I do want to say I was interested in the attitude taken by the hon. member for Lake Centre and also that of the leader of the C.C.F. party with reference to the co-ordination policy outlined in the report. The position they take is diametrically opposed to that taken by the member of the Social Credit party who spoke this afternoon. I think the interpretation placed by the hon. member for Lake Centre upon the recommendation is the proper one. I think what the chairman and the commissioners had in mind was that there should be control or co-ordination of water, air and railway transport through the board, but not control of trucking, be it interprovincial, international or intraprovincial. I do not think that was in the minds of the commissioners.

I may have been mistaken, but I understood the other evening that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was opposed to the co-ordination policy as recommended in the last part of the report.

Mr. Green: In so far as the Canadian maritime commission was concerned. I am very dubious about the transport board trying to handle the job of that commission.

Mr. Chevrier: There seemed to be some apprehension in his mind with regard to that policy. While the position taken by the hon. member is somewhat different from that taken by the hon. member for Lake Centre, I am glad that these opinions and views are coming out in the house.

I had forgotten to reply to one point raised by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton. I indicated to him that he would find in a certain section the point on the Canadian Pacific opposite to Diamond Junction. That is to be found in section 4 of the act, and the name of the place is Boundary.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Chairman, I should like to add my congratulations to those expressed by other hon. members to Mr. Justice Turgeon and the members of the commission who generally speaking have made a very excellent study of and report upon this complex problem. Congratulations are certainly due to the chairman and the commissioners.

The hon. member for Lake Centre quoted from page 277 of the report which refers to authority to be vested in the commission. At the bottom of the page it is stated:

> The seven provincial governments which united in asking for the appointment of this commission were questioned on this matter. Of the seven, six stated that they would not agree to divest themselves of their exclusive jurisdiction over intra-provincial motor transport.

I think those words are important. I happened to be one of those who were fortunate in being permitted to visit Churchill by air this past week end. It was a most educational and instructional trip from many points of view. We were taken through the elevator there and we saw the modern equipment they have for the drying of damp grain at the rate of some 20,000 bushels a day. After the information I obtained there I find it almost unbelievable that these facilities have not been used to a greater extent.

I have placed a question on the order paper in connection with the amount of damp grain of the 1950 crop that has been moved there for drying and cleaning, and also what has been moved to Fort William. I was told that there had not been any damp grain from the 1950 crop moved into Churchill. I know that this matter is not under the jurisdiction of the minister, but I do want to point out that I think there should be greater co-operation among the departments of government.

If there has been one problem faced by the wheat growers of the prairies that is more difficult than any other, it is the handling of this damp and tough grain. We have this modern equipment at Churchill with only a small part of the storage capacity occupied, and it does not seem to me to be ordinary business sense that more damp grain has not been moved there. I am sure the producers of western Canada will be shocked to learn that this modern equipment which is owned by the government is not being utilized at all.

I have spoken on transportation before and I am vitally concerned in the Crowsnest pass rates. I have asked that they be not interfered with and I am happy to know that a recommendation has been made that they should not be interfered with.

Several speakers have referred to the 400 or 500 mile gap between Sudbury and Fort William, to which reference is made in the report. That is a very barren stretch of country, as all of us who have to travel it to come down here know. Generally speaking, I think the taxpayers should be called upon to subsidize the haul over that stretch. It is essential in the interests of both eastern and western Canada that there be no division in this great nation of ours. It is essential that services are kept operating over this gap of barren country, but the cost of operating these services should not be entirely borne by the producers of either the west or the east.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned for dinner I was discussing the long haul between Sudbury and Fort William, what a dormant section of the country that was, and saying that in my opinion that haul should be subsidized in the interests of both western and eastern Canada as recommended in the report of the royal commission. At page 287 of the report, among the observations by Dr. H. F. Angus, I find this:

> Amalgamation has few friends. Various forms of joint operation have been carefully considered and condemned. It is true that the estimate of the future earning power of the Canadian National Railways made by its officials at the hearings was so low that a weary taxpayer might have wondered if a lease to the Canadian Pacific Railway on mutually advantageous terms would have its attractions. The alternative of state ownership of all railways has merits which have commended it to most modern states. But economy of operation, though physically possible, is not among these merits. As an immediate practical policy in Canada both these alternatives can be dismissed.

Then there is a short paragraph at page 129 of the report itself which I should like to read:

> The majority of the provincial representatives and of the representatives of other bodies who appeared before this commission favoured the continuance of the present system of two large railway organizations, with the necessary corollary that the Canadian Pacific Railway must be allowed to live and to operate as a privately owned railway.

It is rather significant that even in this report the Canadian Pacific Railway was used throughout as the yardstick. There was quite an article in the Winnipeg Free Press of December 29, 1950, entitled "The west and freight rates," part of which reads:

> At the outset of this latest railway campaign for higher freight rates it is in order to state the position of the west. Since October, 1946, when the railways broke a truce of a quarter century by asking for a horizontal increase in rates, there has been a sharp conflict between seven provincial governments and the railways. The provinces concerned are the three maritime and the four western provinces. This dispute, however, has turned upon whether or no the Canadian Pacific Railway which, by common consent of all the railways, the transport board and the federal government, is the yardstick in the fixing of rates, required the increases in freight rates sought from the transport board. The west joined the maritimes in saying "No." But no distinctively western argument was advanced.

Further on the article states:

> Documentary proof of the foregoing will not be required by all who have followed the freight rate cases before the transport board beginning with the western rates case taken by the Winnipeg board of trade in 1911. But as a reminder attention is directed to the following figures, drawn from exhibits filed with the transport board. These figures cover the net earnings of the C.P.R. from 1907 to 1925 and 1936 to 1945 inclusive—29 out of a period of 39 years. Ten years are missing because the transport board refused to issue the necessary order to have them produced. These missing years, however, would only buttress an already impregnable case. In studying the figures, it should be borne in mind that the Canadian Pacific handles more than twice as much freight on its eastern lines as on its western lines:

	Canadian Pacific Railway Net Earnings
	Eastern Lines	Western Lines
1907-11	$43,500,000	$ 91,500,000
1912-16	60,000,000	152,500,000
1917-21	81,000,000	174,500,000
1922-25	56,000,000	101,500,000
1936	5,855,663	17,455,448
1937	10,013,518	13,728,729
1938	3,319,735	17,432,731
1939	5,949,860	22,573,960
1940	14,058,900	21,580,538
1941	16,951,233	29,006,363
1942	20,885,093	27,302,596
1943	19,544,002	29,667,565
1944	11,537,387	31,622,277
1945	13,090,407	22,963,927
	$361,705,798	$753,334,134

So great is the discrimination against western Canada that with half the traffic the C.P.R. has consistently made more than twice the profits in the west than in the east.

In facing this new campaign by the railways for higher freight rates the west must see to it that any further increase in rates is not loaded solely upon western Canada. Yet that is exactly what will happen if the transport board orders horizontal increases in standard rates which because of water, highway and other competition will be meaningless paper increases in the central provinces but will be real hard-cash increases here in the west.

And in taking this position, it should be clear that the west will not be asking state assistance for the railways by way of subventions, bonuses, or subsidies of any kind. The west as the foregoing figures prove has more than paid its way in freight rates and may be forgiven for believing that other sections of Canada should at least pay their way.

Irrespective of any need which may be proved by the railways, there can be no justification for raising freight rates in the west until the effective rates—that is the rates which are actually paid—in Ontario and Quebec have been brought up to the level of the rates in the west.

This question of a horizontal increase in freight rates and the injustice done thereby to western Canada and the maritimes was well covered this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre. Without taking more of the time of the committee, I should just like to sum up what I said before the dinner hour by congratulating Mr. Justice Turgeon and the members of his commission. They certainly put a great deal of work into this investigation and brought in what I think is on the whole a very fair report. I want to repeat what I have advocated in past years, and say that I agree with the commission recommendation that the Crowsnest pass freight rates should be left under the statute. I have already asked that subsidization be provided for this bridge from Sudbury to Fort William. It is a long haul of between four and five hundred miles through an area that does not produce much traffic.

I want to repeat what I said before the recess concerning the Churchill road, and the fact that the government owns a splendid storage grain elevator at the port of Churchill. There are facilities there for storing approximately 2·5 million bushels of grain. This week end I learned that in the port of Churchill there is only a small percentage of the storage space occupied. There is great modern grain drying machinery in that elevator which has not been used at all this year according to the officials there. When you consider that it has a drying capacity of 20,000 bushels per day, I think that could have been a great help with some of this damp grain that is still lying in the open fields in the prairie provinces. Had it been moved to that port, and that equipment utilized, much of it might have been saved.

During the Easter recess I sat in the Manitoba legislature and heard the minister of agriculture for that province state that there was approximately a million bushels of damp grain still in the province of Manitoba. I imagine there is more than that in Saskatchewan which has not been moved yet. You can imagine how important it would have been to utilize that drying equipment at Churchill.

This brings up another matter which was mentioned the other day, and that is the matter of a box car controller. I know the minister rather chastised the member for Assiniboia over the question he put on the order paper.

Mr. Chevrier: No, about a statement he made in the house which was erroneous.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I was going to say that I am not in a position to substantiate or contradict the statement he made or the statement made by the Minister of Transport. It would seem to me, as I have already pointed out, that the facilities and equipment at the port of Churchill, owned by the government, for drying this damp grain, could have been utilized if cars had been provided. This grain may become a loss to the producer, because the chairman of the grain commission has pointed out that if the grain cannot be gathered up and dried before the warm weather, he is fearful it will become a total loss to the producers. It is probable this loss could be avoided if a box car controller were appointed. I do not know how worthy that argument is, because I have not the other facts to buttress it. If there is no other reason for not moving this damp grain to Churchill, a box car controller could have supplied the cars to move it under the supervision of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, under whose supervision the transport of grain rests. I am not blaming the Minister of Transport, because I know it is not his responsibility.

I wish to say once again what a fine job the Turgeon commission has done, and to compliment the members of the commission for their work.

Mr. Ferrie: I should like to say how pleased we are to find that the minister has taken this report to heart and is appointing a committee to consider that portion of the haul that we in western Canada call no man's land. I am not going to prolong this debate by saying anything more about the commission's report.

There are one or two things that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. In 1948 the seven provinces made a lot of representations about freight rates. During that period some remarks were made concerning preferential rates to certain bodies. As a result western Canada lost two very important preferentials. One was a preferential that we had ever since railroading began in western Canada. Even in the old Mackenzie-Mann days, when they were very much in arrears, they gave us that preference because they knew it was a benefit to the railroads to have the farmers sow good seed. We have now lost the preferential rate on the transportation of registered seed and seed grain. I would ask the minister if he would take this into consideration. Last year in western Canada the railroads did not lose any money, they made a profit of approximately $9 million. In eastern Canada they lost around $12 million. In asking for this preferential rate on seed grain, we are not asking for something that is going to be harmful to the railroads, but something that is going to be of benefit to them, as well as to those who are producing the great grain crop. This rate on registered seed will be of benefit to the railroads by reason of the extra bushels that are grown by the producers of that class of grain.

Just leaving that, I should like to mention one other preferential rate which we lost, and that was on the movement of registered livestock. By some means or other that preferential rate was lost last fall. We could not establish it. We have tried, time and time again, to get this preferential back, but we cannot do it. I am appealing to the minister to do something if he possibly can to help the registered livestock industry in Canada. They produce a lot of registered stock, in both eastern and western Canada, and this exchange that goes on is of great benefit, not only to Canada as a whole but to the railroads individually. Will the minister kindly take this into consideration when he is arranging some of the meetings with the railroads.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, in deference to the minister I had intended to reserve my remarks until item No. 491 on the Hudson Bay railroad was called. Since the member for Lake Centre, the member for Souris, and some others have said something about it, I thought I might as well say what I have to say now. I have always, of course, been interested in this railroad and in this port. I was interested in it before I came to parliament, and naturally my interest has increased over the last five years.

In 1945, the first year I came to parliament, my friend and former colleague, Mr. Moore, the member for Churchill, introduced a resolution, one of those useful private resolutions sometimes termed academic but nevertheless at times productive of results, in that they promote the desired cause in the country or bring some pressure to bear on the government which, sometimes after a long period of years, adopts the thing as its own and introduces the legislation we desired in the first place.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knight: My friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says "hear, hear" and with good reason because I understand that for some years before I came to this house he had been introducing private members' bills with regard to income tax exemptions for union dues and certain professional fees. He has continued to introduce them. I had the pleasure of backing him up in that attempt with regard to teachers; and now in the budget announcement the other night we are told that henceforth union dues and teachers' professional fees are exempt.

I think that these private members' resolutions are a good institution. Some of my Liberal friends, referring to my own resolution on education, were shall I say unkind enough to say that these private members' resolutions are a waste of time.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member should make his remarks relevant to the item now before the committee.

Mr. Knight: I accept your rebuke, Mr. Chairman, and shall proceed to talk upon the matter in hand. I was led off my subject, and I shall come back to the exact point. Mr. Moore, the former member for Churchill, introduced into this house in October, 1945, one of those useful private members' resolutions. The resolution asked for the consideration of the federal government to giving all the encouragement that they could muster for that route and for that port. On that particular occasion the resolution was not talked out but was allowed to come to a vote. There was a favourable vote of 105 to 24, as recorded at page 1110 of Hansard of that date. On that occasion the Minister of Trade and Commerce used the following words in regard to the Churchill route, as reported at page 1109 of Hansard of October 15, 1945:

> I feel that in post-war years the port will develop as far as its physical limitations will permit, and I can assure the house that the government will make every effort to see that that development is pressed actively and vigorously.

There are degrees of vigour and there are degrees of activity. I want to say that on the whole I wish to pay tribute to the dominion government, to the minister, to the Department of Transport and to some outside organizations for the interest and the encouragement which they have given to this particular matter. I would include the provincial government of Saskatchewan which has been active in that same good cause. The Hudson bay route association is of course well known for its work in that regard. I think of Mr. Frank Eliason, a man who, I was going to say, has grown weary in well doing, but he will never be that; I will say rather that he is growing old in well doing and is now somewhat broken in health. I think that those of us who come from the province of Saskatchewan, and particularly from its northern part, should pay special tribute to that man who has given his whole life in the cause of co-operation and of agriculture in the province of his adoption. To Mr. Streeton too, who is the chairman of that active organization, one should pay a tribute and to that old-timer, Mr. MacNeill, who has come down here on several occasions. While I mention those delegations, I should like to thank the dominion government for the fine reception that they gave to those western adventurers who came down to follow in the path of other pioneers with somewhat similar names who have brought honour in the opening up of the western part of this country. Then there is Mr. Hansen, the director of trade services at Regina, Mr. Graham Spry, who is trade commissioner in London for the province of Saskatchewan, and who is in England working in the same cause and to whom some tribute should be paid.

As I said, the people of the prairie west are interested in this route, and the people of my own native city are not disinterested. You have to live on the prairies a while before you realize to what extent there is a fascination for prairie dwellers in the sight of water. Some of my friends who have come from the city of Winnipeg will perhaps not agree with me in that regard, but in Saskatchewan we like water, and we like to think that we have in that central part of Canada, a proper port of our own, which may be available to us.

Many have visited that port in the last several years. Many have taken advantage of the excursions which have been arranged. Many have gone up there. The other day many hon. members went up by the invitation, I understand, of the Minister of National Defence. I was not able to take advantage of that opportunity, but I had been there two years before.

To come to the matter of the route and the port itself, as I say, I pay tribute to the encouragement given by, I think, every organization concerned. I think that the route has been an unqualified success over the last year or two. In 1950, twenty ships entered that harbour and in that year some 6,700,000 bushels of wheat were exported and 3,400 tons of merchandise were imported. Those amounts, particularly with regard to imports, are still too small. The smallness of the import is probably due to the lack of knowledge on the part of the British exporting firms as to the savings they could make by using that port. In the matter of British cars—those little cars we see upon our streets—the saving amounts to from $35 on the smaller type to $60 on the larger.

The city of Saskatoon is the main distributing centre for goods in northern Saskatchewan. The wholesalers and distributors there are particularly anxious that the port should succeed in order that they may make available the savings upon the goods, so that those goods may be distributed more cheaply through the area which they serve. There has also been formed a western import and export company, a name which sounds a bit familiar. Its business is to drum up business through that port to the city of Saskatoon and the other northern cities.

The figures that I have given report progress, and I can report progress in other directions also. We are told that the commonwealth shipping committee is nowadays adopting a much more friendly attitude towards the insurance of vessels going into Churchill. The marine insurance rates have been lowered by 35 per cent, and I think that we may look forward to the day—and some of us may see it—when the marine insurance rates into that port will be equal to those into the port of Halifax or the port of Montreal. May I say that there never was any real reason for those high rates except, on the part of those who issued them, a lack of knowledge as to the safety of that particular route.

Down through the years we have had statements as to the safety of that port. I am going to quote from a statement made by a sea captain who used it. In a letter which he had addressed to Mr. Hansen, director of trade services at Regina, he said in part:

> I should like to go on record as stating that the passage from the U.K. to Churchill is every bit as safe as the voyage from Britain to Montreal or any other St. Lawrence port.
> Perhaps indeed it is safer. The weather on the northern route is not any worse than that encountered on the way to the St. Lawrence. While some fog will be met, it usually clears within an hour or so and consists only of patches. It is certainly no worse than the fog often encountered off the Newfoundland banks.

There is another interesting little quotation that throws some light on the same situation, and that is in regard to the length of the season. The length of the season, sir, has always been a sore point with shippers coming into that port. It has always been felt that the insurance companies kept themselves very very safe indeed as to the length of the season which was covered by the insurance rates. This is from a ship's captain who had just come through the strait. He says:

> Regarding the length of the season. As you know, on our first trip to Churchill we lay off Cape Chidley at the eastern end of the strait for 2½ days because our insurance would not allow us to enter the strait before 0001 hours on August 5. The weather during these two days perfect—calm sea and unlimited visibility. The N. B. McLean said we could proceed any time, but because of insurance regulations we could not.

Does it not seem very silly that in beautiful weather, and a calm sea, with no ice in sight, ships have to lie outside for two days simply because there is no flexibility in the insurance season. But in this regard too I have progress to report, because there has been a lengthening of the insurable season, actually by ten days. July 26 instead of August 5 is now the beginning of the season. It is felt by many people that the season could run until the end of October.

As to the port of Churchill itself, some of the people of whom I am speaking saw the place for themselves the other day. There has been an improvement there over the last five years which is almost unbelievable. There has been an improvement in the townsite itself. Those of us who were interested in this throughout the years have been complaining because the Manitoba government was not prepared to sell lots in the port of Churchill. It is not very much encouragement to build a house if one cannot own the lot on which he wants to build. The only way you could do it before was to take a twelve-months lease. Surely that is a very unsatisfactory way to proceed, particularly if you were going to make a substantial investment. Therefore once again I am pleased to report progress and thank the Manitoba government for what they have done in that regard. The Manitoba government has now made it possible for people to own their lots. The military establishments near that town of course have promoted business. Their existence is at least a matter of public knowledge. Their presence there has promoted business and all year round activities. There are churches, schools, and so on. I want to say that from the point of view of the route and the port itself, the building up of permanent residence there is an important part of its promotion, because the people who have handled the wheat cargoes have had to be imported from Montreal or from some other port. They have had to be brought in for this particular work. Surely that was an expensive business. But if in that northern country we could have such developments as would provide a permanent population with a reasonable hope of earning a year round living, then we could take from that permanent population the necessary labour to handle the machinery of the port and assist in the loading of the ships.

The hon. member for Souris has expressed some doubt as to his own figures which he gave a little while ago relating to drying of grain at Churchill. I can assure him that they were quite correct. I asked a question which will be found at page 1266 of Hansard of March 15, 1951, as follows:

> What is the wheat bushel storage capacity of the elevator at Churchill?

We are not interested in that part of the question at the moment, but we are interested in this one:

> What is the drying capacity of that elevator in terms of number of bushels per day?

May I say, sir, that I was startled when I received the answer and was informed that in that plant—and it is a magnificent plant, one of the finest grain elevators in the world—it was possible to dry from 15,000 to 20,000 bushels per day of 24 hours, depending on the moisture content. I almost refused to believe that, but these are the official figures. That, sir, is remarkable, and if that machinery had been operating full blast since the first combines were turned into the fields of Saskatchewan last fall, by this time it would have dried some proportion of the grain which is now lying damp or tough in the farmers' granaries or in elevators in the province of Saskatchewan. That would have been a tremendous help. Who is responsible for that plant and that machinery lying idle I do not know, but I think it should have been in operation since the end of the crop year. What an accumulation of grain we might have had lying in storage in the Churchill elevator, because there is ample room for it there. The capacity is 2,500,000 bushels. According to the answers I received, the number of bushels of wheat in the elevator is something under half a million bushels, in fact, 463,000 bushels. Had other grain been dried and stored there it would be at least in position for shipment. There is not the excuse this year that there was in former years that there was a keen demand for this wheat in Europe, and that it was necessary to have it in position where it could be shipped during the months when Churchill was not in operation. There is no such reason as that now. There is going to be a carry-over of this wheat whether we like it or not, and unfortunately there is going to be a carry-over of wheat which is not going to be in good condition. If it were dried and stored there, at least we would have it in position for the first ship that steamed through the straits the first month of the new shipping year in 1951.

I have pleaded before, and I plead again, for the co-operation of the government, the railroad, the wheat board and the wheat pools in regard to the promotion of shipping through that port. My plea has been, and for five years it has been, that we should give the port a chance. If this thing is worth doing it is worth doing right. And if we would for one year ship 15 million bushels of wheat to that port, a thing which could easily be managed, we would take off the shoulders of the taxpayers of this country any burden which they are carrying at present in regard to the port of Churchill.

I notice that this year the deficit is down by $150,000 according to item 491 of the estimates. That is all to the good. It has been argued by people who know, and I am convinced it is so, that if through that port there could be put 15 million bushels of wheat, the port and the railroad would not cost the taxpayers of this country one single cent, there would be no deficit. There are others who believe that 20 million bushels or 25 million bushels could be shipped through that port. I am not an expert, and I will not say, but I repeat that 15 million bushels would pay the necessary bills, and there is no shortage of wheat in the preferential area. It has been estimated by those who know that in that country, which would be applicable to the preferential rates, 65 million bushels of wheat is the average crop there. If we cannot handle 25 million bushels we can surely ship 15 million or 20 million. I am sure that, now when there is lots of wheat available, this is the time for us to try the experiment and give the route a chance to prove itself. When I speak this way I am not speaking altogether in the interests of Saskatoon. I am not speaking only in the interests of the northern farmer but rather in the interests of the nation; because the present deficit must be paid by the taxpayers of the whole nation.

As I said, the route is of national importance. There is of course the strategic factor into which I shall not go at this time. But I do believe the amount of care the government has given the port in the last year or so is not unconnected with its knowledge that the port of Churchill in certain contingencies might be a very useful place to have, indeed.

There are other things that may be shipped from Churchill as well as wheat. We were greatly disappointed a year or so ago when, after arrangements had been made to ship 10 million feet of spruce out of that port, a rise in freight rates precluded any such shipment. So much for exports.

As to imports, we feel that many more could be handled, if perhaps there were a little better organization so that the loading of wheat and the unloading of imports could go on at the same time. The minister has told us that one of his cares and responsibilities in regard to the port is to see that the proper equipment is there. Here is one thing I suggest he might look into.

Westerners do not like all this talk about dumping duties, when it comes to the matter of encouraging imports to Churchill. When we are told that we may impose dumping duties against, for instance, British motor cars, hundred of which were imported through Churchill last year, we do not like that sort of talk. I have had several complaints in the city of Saskatoon from firms who have told me that they had to cancel orders they had placed for British linoleum, and for that very same reason. The linoleum had been ordered for delivery through the port of Churchill and over the Hudson bay route, but the orders had to be cancelled.

One other point, and I shall have finished. I would refer to the matter of shipping feed grains to the maritime provinces as something in which I have been interested, and particularly in this connection. I shall speak only briefly on the matter, because I do not want to detain the house too long. I do believe however that most of the difficulty in connection with feed grains, particularly in the matter of the poor quality of those grains sent to the maritimes, is a matter of storage.

If the people in the maritimes, through their co-operative institutions, could buy quantities of good clean western grain, ticketed as No. 5 or 6, as the case may be, and all of a certified standard and with a certain weight per bushel, so that they could know what they were getting, and if in the maritimes they had storage elevators built into which that grain could be put and out of which it could go for grinding and distribution by their own organization, they would have grain of standard quality a supply of which they could always be assured.

Under present circumstances it is difficult for the maritime farmer to know what he is getting when he buys feed grain in, shall we say, the city of Halifax. I have always said that if government built or co-operatively built storage facilities were available shiploads of this feed grain, certified according to grade, could be shipped to the maritime provinces by the sea route during the time when the Churchill route is open. I think an intercoastal trade of that sort could be built up for the general benefit of not only the farmers in the west, who would have a market for their grain, but also of the maritimers who would have a source of suitable feed. So much for the subject of feed grains.

I believe this brings me to the conclusion of what I have to say in the matter. Once again let me pay tribute to the effort of the government and to the encouragement it has given us and other people. I am glad to say that this is not a political matter. I am pleased to say, too, that Mr. Moore's resolution was never a political resolution. I believe the hon. members I see before me who represent the Liberal party in Saskatchewan can, and I know they will, join with me and with the hon. member for Lake Centre who spoke this afternoon in support of the route. I believe that so far as we in Saskatchewan are concerned, we will present a united front in this important matter.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak on two matters dealt with definitely in the report. I have given them a good deal of consideration, although I cannot say I have studied other matters as thoroughly.

The representations made to the royal commission by the Newfoundland government and by other bodies from Newfoundland were directed to two paragraphs in the commission, as follows:

(a) To review and report upon the effect, if any, of economic, geographic or other disadvantages under which certain sections of Canada find themselves in relation to the various transportation services therein . . .

(b) To review the Railway Act with respect to such matters as guidance to the board in general freight rate revisions, competitive rates, international rates, etc., and recommend such amendments therein as may appear to them to be advisable.

Amongst other things, the Newfoundland government sought lower freight rates and improved facilities at North Sydney, which is the terminus in Nova Scotia, and Port aux Basques, which is the opposite terminus in Newfoundland, and on the North Sydney to Louisburg Railway. They also wanted absorption of the handling charges for shipments to Louisburg when the port of North Sydney is closed in the wintertime because of ice, and a car ferry to operate between Port aux Basques and North Sydney. They also wanted a free port to be established on the south coast of Newfoundland. Some hon. members may not be familiar with the expression "free port", but it has been mentioned in Newfoundland politics for twenty-five years. The idea of a free port is a port where goods can be exchanged between nations without the collection of any customs duty. It was desired by the government that this should be established at bay d'Espoir on the south coast of Newfoundland which is an ice-free port. It also wanted a military road to be built between Gander airport and bay d'Espoir.

The first question which was brought up has been dealt with by the board of transport commissioners with the pleasing result for Newfoundland that they won their case. The improved facilities are being dealt with to a certain extent under the estimates now before the house. I understand the car ferry is being built at the present time. A large amount of money has been voted for the improvement of the docking facilities at Port aux Basques and at North Sydney.

The other questions with respect to a free port and the military road were not approved. There are certain general considerations in connection with Newfoundland I should like to draw to the attention of the committee. They arise through the transformation of our economy brought about by confederation. Perhaps hon. members are not sufficiently aware of that tremendous transformation. Before 1949, when we had our own government, Newfoundland traded with the whole world. We could impose duties in respect of Canada, the United Kingdom or the United States, or any other country, just the same as Canada does. We were bound only by international agreements such as the empire preference agreements of 1932 and the like.

But with confederation, and becoming part of Canada, we dropped almost all our import trade from other countries, and our trade was switched to the nine provinces of Canada. That meant that the direction in which the trade moved changed as well. St. John's, which had been an international port with shipping from all parts of the world, immediately showed the effects of confederation because ships did not come there in the same numbers. Instead of the traffic coming by water it began to come by land through North Sydney in Nova Scotia, across the narrow strip of water to Port aux Basques, and then around the island in a semi-circle over the Newfoundland railway. The railway could not handle the traffic.

Before confederation trade with Canada consisted of about $55 million of imports into Newfoundland and about $8 million to $10 million of exports to Canada. Since confederation trade with England and the United States has declined greatly. It has been said that trade with the other nine provinces of Canada now amounts to $100 million in the one direction, and $10 million in the other. The great bulk of this trade is being carried by the railway with the result that there have been tie-ups on several occasions. It was necessary to instal new facilities to handle this traffic both at North Sydney and at Port aux Basques.

This seems to me to be a most undesirable state of affairs because the trade used to go to St. John's, the capital of the island with 60,000 population. As this traffic is not coming in now by water many longshoremen are faced with a shortage of employment. It means also that large quantities of goods must be carried 550 miles across the island and then distributed from St. John's. Everyone knows that the cost of moving goods by rail is generally much higher than it is to move goods by water.

During the one day that I sat on the railways and steamship committee last year I brought to the attention of the president of the Canadian National Railways the desirability of operating steamships between Halifax or Montreal and St. John's. The Minister of Transport cleverly guided the discussion into other channels and stated that I was trying to bring up the question of rates. That was only incidental. I notice that one of the representations made to the royal commission by the Newfoundland board of trade dealt with that subject. I should like to draw attention to the representations made, which in some respects coincide with what I said last year. On page 143 of the report the board of trade is quoted as having suggested the following remedies:

That the following alternative steamship or car ferry routes be provided:

(a) From Campbellton, N.B., to Corner Brook for all movements between Corner Brook and Bishop's Falls (necessitating the building of a spur about 300 feet long from the pier at Corner Brook to the railway);

That would eliminate much handling by the railway. The next suggestion was in connection with traffic for the Avalon peninsula. The population of the Avalon peninsula is about 130,000, whereas the population of Newfoundland is 350,000. The area of the Avalon peninsula is about one-sixth of the area of the whole island. It would seem that it would be desirable to have a great deal of the traffic brought to St. John's, which after all is the chief commercial emporium of the island. The second suggestion was as follows:

(b) Traffic for the Avalon peninsula should be moved by water from Montreal, Halifax and North Sydney to St. John's, Newfoundland, and, to accomplish this object, the Canadian National Railways should use the Admiralty property on the north side of the harbour at St. John's and build a spur about 600 feet long from the main line; and

(c) The railway should provide two railway car ferries, able also to carry 30 or 40 automobiles, one on the west coast and the other on the east coast.

I do not know whether the Minister of Transport has given any thought to that sensible suggestion. There is a network of roads running out of St. John's, but at Port aux Basques there is only a very narrow road presently being built which will go up through Stephenville and then on to Corner Brook. The hope of attracting many tourists into that section of the country is extremely small although I admit that the great sporting rivers are located there. The historic and oldest settled part of the country is on the Avalon peninsula and obviously it would be a wise provision to have a car ferry running from Halifax or Montreal to St. John's.

Last year I was unable to have my car carried from Montreal to St. John's because the boat was filled. I had difficulty at Halifax and could get it carried only on deck. There seems to be a great deal of traffic offering at Montreal and Halifax and there would appear to be room for another steamer on the route. If the country is going in for tourist trade it will be necessary to have a boat capable of carrying motor cars between Halifax and St. John's.

Another recommendation was that St. John's be made a national harbour. I am aware that that deserves a great deal of consideration, but certainly the facilities are there for the handling of much more traffic than is presently being handled. It is much more suitable than Port aux Basques, which has only a small harbour that is difficult to approach and besides supports only a small population.

Most of the disabilities from which Newfoundland is suffering, it seems to me, are due to the haste with which the terms of union were settled. The rather obvious things were attended to, but many incidental matters were neglected. As a result they had to be brought to the attention of the royal commission on transportation by the government. The majority of these matters had to be passed on to the Canadian National Railways, the Minister of Transport or the Canadian maritime commission because the royal commission was unable to deal with them. As a result the country was put to a great deal of expense and anxiety.

As I pointed out at the last session, the country has had to pay about $4 million in extra freight rates that should not have been charged. When these matters were brought to the attention of the royal commission they said, "We cannot do anything about these things. The terms of union made provision for the traffic to go through North Sydney and Port aux Basques and we cannot do anything further about it." The same answer was given in connection with many other matters that were raised before the royal commission.

I notice that reference is made to the fact that improvements are going to be made in the railroad. I do not believe there are many refrigerator cars on the island and if agriculture is to be fostered it will be necessary to provided refrigerated space.

There is another matter with which I should like to deal in a way different from any of the speakers who have preceded me. This matter has not been dealt with in the same way by the royal commission. I refer to the question of highway and railway transport. There is an important social principle involved in this question which is not generally apparent and I should like to take a few minutes to discuss it. I would remind hon. members that transportation has developed through the years from the ox-cart travelling over ploughed fields or country lanes and the stage coaches to the point where steam was invented and we had the industrial revolution.

By pooling the resources of a great number of people railroads were built with great rapidity and as a result tremendous industrial progress was made. With the development and invention of the internal combustion engine it became possible to reverse this process. Instead of great companies operating railway systems on fixed lines you can now do almost the same work on the highways. So I say it has become possible to reverse the trend in the capitalistic system and bring about a better distribution of ownership by encouraging the private operation of motor vehicles of various kinds such as busses and trucks.

I notice that the report of the royal commission deals with privately owned trucks, those owned by individual truckers and those owned by large companies who transport their own goods in their own trucks, and finally those trucks which are for hire. The commission reports that the number of trucks for hire is very small in relation to the total number of trucks. It was my information that in the business of transporting goods on a commercial basis there are many truck companies operating at least one hundred or perhaps several hundred trucks, and that is the sort of thing I feel should be regulated. I believe there is a need for someone, whether the federal government or the provinces, to regulate the number of trucks a company may own. It is not very often that we hear any discussion in this house about the restoration of private ownership. Today I was very pleased to hear the leader of the C.C.F. party advise the minister to be very cautious about permitting the railways to go into the trucking business. I think that was wise advice. I would not like to see the railways go into the trucking business, because with their large capital and the government behind the Canadian National, at any rate, it would be possible for them to put a large number of people out of business.

This is a very important principle, although some hon. members may think it ludicrous. It is desirable to have as many owners of trucks and busses as possible, to have men own their trucks and earn a living with them. If you have a company with six hundred trucks operating a trans-Canada transportation business it is possible that within a short time it may become almost as powerful as the railway itself, or at least the most powerful transportation organization in the country other than the railway. That is something I want to bring to the attention of the minister, though it is not necessary that he should do anything about it at the present time. It seems to me that problem looms on the horizon. Looking at the report of the Canadian National Railways and reading the remarks of the president in that report and elsewhere, it seems to me the head of that company is looking with an anxious eye at the competition he is experiencing on the part of truck companies. He seems to be rather afraid that this competition is becoming too much for him, and that he will have to go into that business himself. I do not suppose it would be so bad if it were confined to local transportation near the terminus of a railway; but if the C.N.R. should go into long distance trucking and compete with private truckers I think it would be a bad thing for society.

This is a principle I believe the minister should keep in mind. I am sure in the long run it will be found to be in the best interests of the people of Canada if the railways do not go into highway transportation and if that transportation can be regulated so that no great trucking corporations will be permitted.

Mr. Argue: I am going to direct the main part of my remarks this evening to the report of the royal commission on transportation. With other hon. members who have taken part in this debate I too am pleased with many, in fact almost all, of the findings of that commission. It is certain that railways are vastly important to all parts of Canada. We on the prairies are particularly dependent on railways to move our products to market and to bring in most of the goods we consume.

Before dealing with the report itself I want to deal briefly with one transportation matter I have raised on various occasions in this house. I refer to the many gaps in the railway lines in Saskatchewan. My hope is that while little has been done in the past, a great deal may be done in the near future to bridge these gaps. I would refer to the gaps mentioned in a resolution I placed on the order paper some time ago, between Neptune and Radville, Minton and Big Beaver, Mankota and Val Marie, Neidpath and Swift Current, Willowbunch and Assiniboia, Cardross and Dunkirk. A few years ago, I think about 1946 or 1947, the Minister of Agriculture said in this house it was his understanding that as one of its first branch line projects after the war the C.P.R. intended to complete the gap between Mankota and Val Marie. I only hope that company will finally get around to bridging that gap.

As has been said by other hon. members, when the report of the royal commission was brought down we were pleased to see the recommendation that the Crowsnest pass rates on grain should be left untouched. We on the prairies who depend upon the production of grain for the greater part of our income feel that these rates are important to us, and that the statutory provisions dealing with them should not be changed. I believe the report of the royal commission substantiates the position taken in this house by members from the prairies, from British Columbia and from the maritimes on many occasions in the past when they contended that there was in fact discrimination in freight rates as between various parts of Canada. I am sure it was pleasant to all those hon. members to see that the royal commission recognized that discrimination, by recommending an equalization of freight rates.

We are pleased also to see something in the report dealing with the recapitalization of the Canadian National. It seems to me that sufficient regard has not been given the huge funded debt and the watered stock of the C.N.R., and I believe a further scaling down should have been recommended. Nevertheless these recommendations if put into effect certainly should improve both the financial and the competitive position of our publicly owned railway. This whole report is built around the need of an equalization of freight rates as between all parts of Canada. The present discrimination has existed for many years. There was discrimination in 1948 before the 21 per cent horizontal increase in freight rates. With each of the four horizontal increases in freight rates granted by the board of transport commissioners in 1948, and since there has been a further accentuation of that discrimination. I say it is indeed important that all possible steps be taken to remove discrimination as it exists between various areas.

[Mr. Argue.]

The 45 per cent increase in freight rates, which was the final result of these four separate increases, means that the discrimination now is much greater than it was some three years ago.

I wish at this time to quote from page 61 of the report concerning one of the conclusions in regard to horizontal increases. Paragraph No. 4 reads:

> The remedy does not lie in the prohibition, statutory or other, of horizontal increases, but is in the hands of the railways themselves.

It goes on to say that the railways should bring in proposals for varying percentage increases on different commodities, and flat instead of percentage increases where these are more suitable, and maxima in appropriate cases in cents per hundred pounds or other unit. Special attention should be given to long haul traffic, and rates on basic or primary commodities. Then it says:

> But if the railways do not approach the task in this way, it ought to be the duty of the board to see that they do so.

It is my opinion, Mr. Chairman, that it has been the duty of the board in the past, as well as the duty of the board now, to take all possible steps to get all the necessary information to ensure that whenever an application comes before the board for an increase in freight rates, whatever increase may be granted, it does not further increase the existing discrimination. On the other hand, any increase should be granted in such a way as to decrease discrimination, and eventually remove it.

On page 126, speaking of equalization, the report says this:

> . . . the problem is one peculiarly for the board to resolve finally after the general freight rate investigation and after all parties who may be affected by the proposals have had an opportunity of being heard.

According to the report the problem of the equalization of freight rates is one for the board of transport commissioners after they have completed the general inquiry on freight rates, and after they have heard proposals from all who may be affected. Mr. Chairman, the general freight rate inquiry came about as a result of an order in council passed by the government on April 7, 1948. The royal commission was set up by order in council of January 11, 1949. The point is that the royal commission was set up after the government had instructed the board to undertake a general inquiry into freight rates. The royal commission has completed its work, and its report is published. Do we now have to wait, before we get any concrete action towards the equalization of freight rates, until the board of transport commissioners complete a report that they have already had three years to consider? I hope that something in the legislation to which the minister referred the other night will result in the board of transport commissioners dealing with this question of discrimination at an early date and not two or three years hence. I hope it is dealt with in such a manner as to remove that discrimination.

The report of the royal commission has this to say on page 271, in respect of certain criticisms that have been made regarding the board of transport commissioners. The report says:

> In the main it would seem that the following criticisms of the board are worth recording here, in the expectation that this will lead to an improvement in this procedure for the future, and have been justified by the facts.

I want you to note that according to this statement these criticisms which are outlined have been justified by the facts. Here is criticism No. 1:

> That, in the circumstances of the long delay in disposing of the thirty per cent application made in 1946, the board ought to have granted an interim increase in proper time. On the other hand, however, it must be pointed out, in this regard, that the railways did not ask for such an increase;
> 2. That the board accepted the assumption that all could be justly and reasonably increased by the same large horizontal percentage increase, regardless of length of haul, the nature of the commodity or the ratio of the freight to the value of the article. This is an unwarranted assumption;

It was an unwarranted assumption according to the royal commission for the board to have increased rates on a horizontal percentage basis. Criticism No. 3 reads:

> That the board did not itself obtain, or compel the railways to file with it, proper statistics concerning traffic movements so as to enable it to determine which articles could bear greater or lesser increases in rates;
>
> 4. That the board has not paid sufficient attention to the classification to ascertain 'that articles are properly classified to meet changing conditions;
>
> 5. That the board has not over the years kept close enough supervision over competitive rates. It will be sufficient in this regard to refer to the conclusions on this subject to be found in the section on competitive rates in this report;
>
> 6. That the board has not in the past twenty-three years taken steps to bring about equalization between rates in the west and in the east; and
> 7. That the board has not paid proper attention to the effect of increases in rates on long haul traffic.

Mr. Chairman, those criticisms which the royal commission says have been justified by the facts completely substantiate the contention of western members that the board should not have, in making these four awards, increased the rates in a horizontal manner which further added to the discrimination that existed at that time. The royal commission has suggested certain changes in the set-up of the board of transport commissioners. Those suggestions appeal to me as being reasonable. If they are implemented, I do not know whether they will result in the board becoming competent to the extent it is able to get rid of discrimination, but certainly any changes are worth trying. I would suggest that the change which advocates the appointment of board members on a permanent basis rather than a ten-year basis would seem justified, and perhaps the government should implement it. The whole point, as I see it, is not that the report is not a good one in that it does not deal with the question of equalization and horizontal increases. The report recognizes the injustice of horizontal increases of rates that are already discriminatory. But I hope that we shall not have to wait another two or three years or more for the board of transport commissioners to conclude its general inquiry into freight rates before the actual equalization may be finally accomplished.

The other night the minister, in his statement, could not assure the house that during this session amendments would be brought down. He said that discussion was being had with regard to them by a committee of his department and that he had taken the matter up with certain of his colleagues; but I hope that whatever amendments the government has in mind to deal with the question of discrimination will be brought down during the present session. We on the prairies have waited long enough for the removal of discrimination. We do not want to wait until some future session for these amendments to be brought in.

I was pleased to see in the report the suggestion that a $7 million subsidy should be paid by the government to help the railways to maintain that section of them between Sudbury and the head of the lakes. I hope that such a subsidy will be paid by the government. I trust that it will do a great deal of good in removing discrimination. But I want to point out that $7 million in the budget of the Canadian National Railways or of the Canadian Pacific Railway—and it would have to be apportioned between the two of them—is not a large percentage of the income of either system. It is probably something less than one per cent of the total income of the two railway systems. If all we get out of this report, or if all the action the government will take is the payment of that $7 million, I doubt that that will have any great impact on the matter of discrimination.

I know that this problem of attempting to equalize freight rates across Canada is a difficult one. I am sure it is difficult; otherwise the board of transport commissioners, in making their awards, would have made the freight rates equal. Whenever you get a difference in freight rates because of competitive rates in central Canada and higher rates on the prairies and elsewhere, and then get the railways in a position where they need an increase in revenue, in a situation like that it is extremely difficult to bring the competitive rates up sufficiently to provide for that increase and hence to assist in equalization. Even with all of the good recommendations of the royal commission, I do not think freight rates in themselves can be equalized without exception throughout Canada unless something more is done. Instead of a $7 million subsidy only, I say that the federal government should be prepared to subsidize the financial needs of the Canadian railways—both the C.N.R. and the C.P.R.—to whatever extent is necessary in order to provide equal freight rates throughout all parts of Canada. We on the prairies suffer because of a national policy which meant higher freight rates and tariff walls. I think the time has now arrived when the government should implement a policy which will, in fact, once and for all permanently remove discrimination and that the government should take into consideration the proposal set forth in the submission of the Saskatchewan government to the royal commission, namely, after all other steps have been taken to remove discrimination, to consider whatever subsidy is necessary in order that discrimination may be finally removed.

I notice that while the report does not recommend that the board of transport commissioners acquire the jurisdiction of handling truck traffic in interprovincial trade, nevertheless the royal commission suggests that parliament should consider dealing with the matter of truck competition in interprovincial trade. If the government would equalize freight rates throughout Canada, then I for one am all for the board of transport commissioners or some other government body having control over trucks in interprovincial trade. But until that time comes I shall view with misgiving any acquiring, by the board of transport commissioners or by any other government body, of control over truck rates in interprovincial trade. On the prairies we have no water competition. The truck competition that we have is relatively small, but nevertheless it is a growing competition. I am afraid that in some respects the railway companies are pricing themselves out of the market. Freight rates on automobiles from Oshawa and Windsor to Regina are apparently so high now that fleets of trucks can bring new automobiles into Saskatchewan at a considerable saving. I have here a bulletin put out by the Saskatchewan Motor Dealers' Association; and it refers to one truck dealer in Saskatchewan who saved $4,400 out of a total freight bill of $7,000, by bringing his trucks in saddle-mounted or by a piggy-back type of transportation.

If, in addition to the discrimination which already exists, the government should take control of the trucking industry in interprovincial traffic without first having removed discrimination, then that can only result in further discrimination against the prairies, British Columbia, the maritimes and those areas of Canada outside of the central provinces. Before any move is made to control the trucking industry I say that the first and the most important move is to undertake effective steps to remove discrimination and to bring about implementation of the suggestion in this report that equalization in freight rates should be accomplished. I hope the government will bring in during this session whatever amendments it thinks are necessary. I hope it will take whatever action is necessary to see that the board of transport commissioners conclude their general inquiry into freight rates and deal with this matter of discrimination and equalization which, in the final analysis, even under this report, is left to the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Hatfield: Just before the dinner recess I asked the minister a question in regard to select territory on the Canadian Pacific railway and the Canadian National railway. I understand that the Canadian Pacific railway point is Boundary. Boundary is east of Megantic. That is not a comparable point with Diamond Junction. That is about 125 miles short of the point called Diamond Junction.

In New Brunswick a person shipping over the Canadian Pacific railway has less advantage than a person in New Brunswick shipping over the Canadian National railway. This point of Boundary should be changed to Farnham, Quebec. I see that the only recommendation the commission make is that section 6 of the act should be changed in regard to keeping a separate account so that they will conform to the present practice of breaking the law. I have never heard of a recommendation like that before. At present it seems that the railways pay no attention to section 6 of the act. I cannot find out how the accounts of the Maritime Freight Rates Act are kept. The government knows where the rates are in effect. It looks to me as though the shipper in Nova Scotia gets more advantage than the shipper in New Brunswick. The shipper in Newfoundland would get still more advantage.

In regard to export trade the act refers to shipments between Fredericton and Saint John, and from Fredericton to Liverpool. The act defines freight between Fredericton and Saint John, New Brunswick. All the export freight originates north of Fredericton, New Brunswick, or practically all of it. There is practically no advantage whatever in this part of the act. I do not suppose that half a dozen carloads of freight originates in Fredericton, or between Fredericton and Saint John for export; therefore the shippers north of Fredericton have no advantage, and that is where practically 90 per cent of the export freight in New Brunswick originates.

I should like the minister to look into this. The act should be amended regardless of the recommendation of the commission. They do not do anything but recommend that the act be repealed so that the railways can conform with what they have done. They have broken the law all along since September 26, 1926, and the commission wants them to continue to break the law. That is all they recommend in the report. It is something like the flour milling report.

Now, with regard to trucking competition—

An hon. Member: Combination.

Mr. Hatfield: You are forcing trucking competition. The increase in freight rates is forcing every person into the trucking business. I agree there should be some dominion regulation with regard to trucking, but so long as you go on increasing your freight rates to the east and west, something has to be done. Ontario and Quebec have the advantages of the trucks and of the railways. They have all the advantages. Something has to be done in the east and the west so that they will have a decent rate into the central markets. So long as you maintain the markets in the two provinces of central Canada and you keep building up those provinces under the defence act, and in every other way, something will have to be done between the railways in eastern Canada and the railways in western Canada, and also something will have to be done about the trucks. I know the railways are going to put themselves out of business if they keep on increasing their rates.

There is a very bad trucking arrangement now between the provinces. There should be some uniformity in the regulations between provinces. You can carry so much on a truck in one province and so much in another province. When you get to the border of another province you have to change. In other words, in the province of Quebec you cannot operate a truck on Sunday. If a trucker picks up a load in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick and gets to the Quebec border on Saturday, he has to lay up over Sunday. The railways do not stop for Sunday. They are allowed to operate on Sunday. They go right on. The trucker has to stop and has to wait there until Monday morning before he can start off with his truck again. He has to wait until after twelve o'clock on Sunday night.

This week I had occasion to send a truck to Montreal for a piece of machinery. The piece of machinery could not be carried by freight; it had to be carried very carefully on a truck. We did not think it was advisable to put it in a railway car. That piece of machinery had to be hauled in pieces to the United States border on a small truck, on account of the regulations in the province of Quebec. Then it could be taken with a large truck from the border a distance of some five hundred or six hundred miles to its destination in New Brunswick. There are all kinds of different regulations. They have the same trouble in the United States. You can take a certain load over some state roads, and when you get to the border of another state you have to leave part of your load and come back and get it. There should be some regulation with regard to trucks, a federal regulation. So long as you keep increasing the freight rates you are bound to have trucking, and you are bound to have truck competition, especially east and west.

I should like the minister to take all these things into consideration. With regard to the Maritime Freight Rates Act, as it is now, after you get up to Diamond Junction boundary the rate is built up to take all the advantage of the 20 per cent that the maritime provinces get. Diamond Junction boundary on the Canadian Pacific Railway should be changed to Sherbrooke or Magog or Farnham, a comparable point with the Canadian National railway point. The Canadian Pacific railway shipper from New Brunswick should not be discriminated against.

Mr. Studer: I should like to join with others for a minute in welcoming this report. The west has been waiting for a report of this kind for many, many years. If its object of removing some of the grievances that the west has carried for these many years is fulfilled it will have accomplished what it set out to do.

I should like briefly to refer to two items. One is the recommendation of a federal subsidy to cover a portion of the costs between the east and west from Fort William to Sudbury. I think a tribute is due to the present leader of the opposition in the province of Saskatchewan. So far as my knowledge goes, he is one of the first men in Canada to bring to our attention the need of a subsidy to equalize the rates between the east and west in that area.

Then, the other point to which I should like to refer is a reference to a railway in my constituency of Maple Creek. That reference appears at page 133 of the report, where the Fill-the-Gap association presented its report to the commission regarding the necessity that has existed in that area ever since the country was first settled. The pioneers in that country came there about forty years ago, one of the incentives being that they were promised a railway at that time. At the present time there is a railway, but there is a round-trip backhaul of about 200 miles. These people must suffer because of increased freight rates on their grain, increased rates on their livestock as well as other rates. Then they have to suffer the depreciation in the value of the livestock that has travelled that extra distance over a railway, slow as railways can be on some of the branch lines in western Canada.

It is not overestimating at all to say that hundreds of thousands of dollars have been lost by farmers in those areas because of the increased freight rates, and in my opinion the railway itself has lost large sums of money by this backhaul which could be eliminated by the completion of only thirty-five miles of line up the two branch lines and make it possible to ship livestock and grain direct.

As everyone knows, these people are twenty-five miles from the nearest railway. One can imagine the difficulties they encounter, particularly in wintertime, when they are locked in for months at a time without any access to those services which we in our modern civilization would ordinarily demand. They are long distances from doctors and the other amenities of life. These people have been in that position for so long that they have now adopted the attitude that unless something is done soon it will never be done. This subject has been discussed for so many years that they have abandoned hope of ever having that which was promised them at the beginning.

When one waits all one's life for a train it is as bad as waiting all one's life for those other things for which one has wished since boyhood. I believe the time has come when the people of that area might rightfully demand from the powers who control these railways either that the railway be completed, or that some alternative method be devised to alleviate the desperate situation there. Otherwise they will have to abandon hope absolutely. Therefore I would ask that the government, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the board of transport commissioners use their influence to contribute to some extent to the permanency of the district so as to fulfil, before it is too late, the expectations of the pioneers of that country.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two on the matter of transportation, and the various activities which come under the direction of the Minister of Transport. I shall say nothing whatever about the report of the royal commission on transportation. There have been a good many speeches on that already, and they have covered the field very well. I should like to support the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre.

At this time too I would extend my congratulations to the newly appointed parliamentary assistant to the minister. I had four points in mind with which I should like to deal. Perhaps I should have waited until they were called, but I thought if I dealt with them now we would save time later.

The first of these, one with which I have dealt before, is the discriminatory rate on soybeans from the western Ontario area to Toronto. The soybean growers pay the same rate as is paid on flaxseed. Yet it is just as easy to transport soybeans as to transport wheat or coarse grains. On the other hand I realize that the transportation of flaxseed is a different and more difficult matter. Therefore I would ask the parliamentary assistant to look into that matter.

Then, there is another sore point across the country, and particularly in my area, in connection with the collection of radio licence fees. Since putting a question on the order paper some time ago I have had a number of letters in protest against some of the things that have happened. In one instance a certain man had come to a neighbourhood and sold licence fees through the years. Last year however, either because the man had died or had got a better job, or for some other reason, he did not make the customary call. In consequence the radio inspector who was making a check penalized this man and a good many of his neighbours who, because they had been waiting for the annual call of the man in question, had failed to get their licences. The man had promised that he would come each year. They failed to obtain their licences, not because they were trying to evade the law but because they were trying to do business through their friend. Many people think that a radio licence is more a nuisance than anything else, and I believe much credit would come to the government if it were to abolish the licence altogether, and have done with it.

The next item with which I shall deal has reference to the fund set up for the elimination of dangerous crossings. I doubt whether the crossing to which I shall now refer is in need of a subway or overpass. However it is on highway No. 22 just east of Calamity Corners at London. Some years ago there was a serious accident at that point, upon which occasion the hon. member for Middlesex West approached the department. The superintendent of the Stratford division inspected the crossing and said, "Well, it is clear. There is good vision from all directions, and it would cost $4,000 to instal warning signals". Strange as it may seem several accidents have happened there. There is bush both east and west to the north of the highway, and apparently it is not as easy to see a train at that point as one would imagine.

The result was that on March 31 of this year four American tourists were killed at that crossing. I should think that $4,000 would be a small price to pay when one considers that already four lives have been lost, and that there have been other accidents as well. Now, with the building of the new high school at Arva, twice a day the school busses will have to cross that dangerous crossing. I am hoping, along with the hon. member for Middlesex West, who brought the matter to the minister's attention after another serious accident, that further investigation will be made, and that crossing signals will be installed.

Then there is the question to which I referred about three sessions ago, namely the improvement of the runways at London airport. I said at that time that apparently North Star aircraft could go anywhere in the world but to London. In these days, with the jet fighter aircraft longer runways will be required. I would hope therefore that the minister would take care of this matter, for the benefit of the London area.

Mr. Chevrier: May I comment on the railway grade crossing accident to which the hon. member referred? Not only has this matter been brought to my attention at this time, it was raised also by the hon. member for Middlesex West. It was a serious accident and the board of transport commissioners are conducting an investigation. The question of protection is one for the authorities owning or controlling the highway. If it is a municipal or county road, then the municipality or the county council would have to make application to the board to have some sort of wigwag or signal protection. I am sure that if the municipalities concerned were to do that, in view of the seriousness of the accident the board would give it careful consideration. My experience has been that where the cost is not too high the board as a rule grants the application.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): This is number 22 provincial highway.

Mr. Chevrier: Then the application would be made by the province.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take up much of the time of the committee but I must express my disapproval of one thing that is taking place in my section of the country. This is an old settled farming district populated by people of English, Irish and Scotch descent, although there are also other nationalities. I consider this district to be second to none.

We are informed that our passenger train service is to be cut off completely for a distance of 82 railroad miles, which would be about 100 highway miles.

Mr. Chevrier: Where is this?

Mr. Cardiff: Between Palmerston and Kincardine. Kincardine is on the shores of lake Huron and at the end of the line, while Palmerston is the divisional point where you change to go to different parts of western Ontario. Tenders have been called for to provide a mail service by truck. I am informed that from 157 to 200 bags of mail are sent up this line daily which will give some idea of the number of people being served.

We are located in a snow belt and there have been times in my day and age when even the railroad was tied up with snow for as long as three weeks. It will be realized how difficult it will be to transport mail by truck. I am informed that these trucks will have to move on schedule and be at a certain place at a certain time. If the elements say you are not moving, you just stay in a snowbank and you may be there for days.

Many people will be thrown out of work, not only those employed on the railroad but those who carry mail from the station to the post office. The trucks will now deliver direct to the post office. This change will be rather severe on some of these men. Not long ago the government took over the Temiscouata railroad and I should like to ask the minister what was the operating loss on that road and what population is served by it?

There are at least 100,000 people being served by this line. I do not intend to discuss freight rates but I should like to tell a true story. You sometimes hear of people shooting the bull but last week I bought a bull and shipped him from Montreal to my home town of Brussels. You should have seen the expressions on the faces of the expressmen when they had to lift the bull out of the express car. It will be seen what kind of mess our freight rates are in when I state that I was able to ship that bull cheaper by express than by freight.

This matter of cutting off the passenger train service is not a political issue because the hon. member for Wellington North spoke about this matter this afternoon. I was not in the chamber when he spoke but he must be affected and felt that there was something wrong because he is on the government side of the house. We do not want this service discontinued.

I understand that it is still intended to run one freight train a day, but they intend to take off the two passenger trains per day which are now operating. It will mean that these people will have no passenger train service at all and only one freight train a day. Express and mail will be handled by truck. If this matter was important to the hon. member for Wellington North, it is doubly important to me and even more important to people living farther up the line. We are about 40 miles from the end of the line.

As I say, we are in a snow belt. While the facilities for the removing of snow are much better today than they used to be, the fact remains that when you have a storm lasting nine days, which happens quite often, you just cannot move at all. I would ask the minister to take this change into serious consideration.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the hon. gentleman that the discontinuance of a train or any service is of importance. This matter is so important that parliament decided in 1903 that services could not be discontinued or a service curtailed without a hearing before the board of transport commissioners. When the hon. member for Wellington North brought this matter to my attention this afternoon I indicated to him at some length just what procedure would have to be followed by the railway before it could stop the service.

The hon. member who has just spoken seems to be of the opinion that this matter is settled and decided, but such is not the case. An application will have to be made by the Canadian National Railways to discontinue the train service, and the municipalities affected, or individuals if they so desire, can protest and the board, which is a court of record, will determine the issue. I am sure that the speeches made by the hon. member for Wellington North and the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat will be brought to the attention of the board of transport commissioners.

The hon. member asked some questions about the purchase of the Temiscouata railway by the government. The circumstances there are entirely different. The Temiscouata railway was a continuation of a line which the Canadian National Railways could take over. The population in that area is about 35,000 or 40,000. There were no operating results of the Temiscouata railway available, as I indicated to the house when the bill was brought down. If the hon. gentleman would take the trouble to look at that debate, which is now two years old, I think he will find all the information he wants.

Mr. Green: What profits have been made since the C.N.R. took it over?

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend will ask that question next week when the railways and shipping committee is sitting and the president of the Canadian National Railways is here, I believe that would be the best way to pursue the matter. I think the answer will be that there are no separate accounts kept of the four various regions—prairies, Pacific, maritimes and central—that make up the national system.

Mr. Cardiff: I would draw the minister's attention to the fact that whether or not a decision has been reached they have already asked for tenders for the carriage of mail by truck. They have gone a long way if they do not intend to take off the trains.

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot be responsible for anyone asking for tenders. I can be responsible only for the matters under my jurisdiction, and I am telling my hon. friend that the Canadian National Railways must have the authority of the board of transport commissioners before curtailing the service. That is the practice.

Mr. Hansell: I want to say just one tiny word in respect to the report of the royal commission on transportation, and that word will be confined to one subject in which I am particularly interested. I have not read the report with meticulous care, but I have glanced through it quite thoroughly in an attempt to find whether or not the subject of coal subventions to railways was dealt with; and I have looked in vain. The only reference I can find to the matter is on page 85, where we are given information which of course we already know. I shall take a moment to read it:

Rates on coal were introduced in 1925 by arrangement with the federal government and reduced to $8 a ton in 1934 as an emergency measure to relieve unemployment in Alberta. At present the rate is $8.40 of which the shipper pays $5.90 and the government $2.50. The normal rate from Drumheller to Toronto is $13.10.

That was all the consolation I found as I browsed through this report in an endeavour to find out what might be expected in future in respect to subventions on coal. I know, of course, that the actual payment of coal subventions comes under the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys; nevertheless subventions are paid the railway companies for the movement of coal, and I had rather expected that something would be said about it in the report. I am particularly interested because of the present threat of higher freight rates, and the further threat of the removal of subventions. If this should be done I am afraid the coal mining industry of western Canada will fold up, that its days will be numbered. I am glad to see the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys in his seat. He is one of the Alberta representatives, and I trust that he will view his responsibilities with such seriousness that he will attempt to keep the coal mining industry of Canada on its feet. It will not be kept on its feet if there is an increase in the freight structure affecting coal, or if coal subventions are removed. I say this to him now, and perhaps will have a little more to say when his estimates come before the house.

There is another matter I should like to take up with the minister, departing now from the report of the transportation commission. At times the coal mining industry of western Canada is seriously affected by a shortage of cars. I am sure the minister is aware of that situation, and perhaps it is not an easy matter to deal with. This is a serious thing because when there is a shortage of cars the coal mines close down and several thousand coal miners are out of work for perhaps several days until cars arrive on the scene. That is not a good thing, but it has happened many times over the last few years, to the detriment of the coal mining industry itself. In the first place the coal miners are laid off three or four days a week, although of course not every week. The other point is that even though they are not operating and actually mining coal, the mines have to stay open. The power plants have to be kept running; many of the staff, engineers and so forth, have to be at their posts, and this is an added burden upon the coal mining companies. This all results from the shortage of cars. I wish the minister would reply on this point, because it is serious and I do not want to have to wire or telephone or write to him when that happens. I would have to do it every week or two, and anyway it is not my business to do that. I emphasize the seriousness of the situation and beg the minister to do something to remedy it.

My particular interest in my constituency, of course, lies in the Crowsnest pass. The Canadian Pacific Railway runs through that pass; nevertheless the Minister of Transport, if his title means anything, must use his influence in respect to all transportation problems. There is one other small matter I want to bring up, though it does not affect my constituency and perhaps I should not mention it. Lately it has been my privilege to take a trip or two over the Canadian National between Edmonton and Ottawa. I am amazed at what I would term the deterioration of the roadbed of the Canadian National Railways in that territory. I know that you have to spend a lot of money when you begin reinforcing and repairing roadbeds. I do not know whether the minister has been over that road. I usually travel on the other railway because it is more convenient.

Mr. Chevrier: I go over it every year.

Mr. Hansell: I am pleased to note that the minister is alive to tell the tale. My only consolation as I was going over that railroad recently was that I had taken out three days' insurance at twenty-five cents a day. It was rather slim consolation, because they would only pay my estate $5,000. I thought the train was going to jump those tracks at any moment. The minister has been over the road, and he knows it. He must have eaten a meal on the railroad. I do not know whether the minister drinks—he must drink something. I shall challenge the minister to sit in the club car of that train anywhere between Edmonton and Ottawa, pick up a glass of gingerale and drink it without spilling it on his vest. If he can do that, he is a better conjurer than I am. When he eats his meals he must be careful or he will find he is feeding his ear instead of his mouth. I do not know if that situation can be remedied. I do not suppose a railway is going to spend several million dollars just to help the passengers drink gingerale, but the roadbeds are deteriorating and I believe something should be done.

Mr. Chevrier: May I be allowed to reply to the two points raised by the member for Macleod. I am sorry that I must tell him I have not been advised of any shortage of coal cars in western Canada. Over the last few weeks, months as a matter of fact, I have been advised of a shortage of box cars for the movement of grain. I am prepared to deal with that, but since it has not been raised there is no point in discussing it. I shall ask my officers if they are aware of any threatened shut-down of the mines because of a shortage of cars. My experience over the years has been that we have always had a substantial number of coal cars in Canada, but that at certain times of the year we were short of box cars. Fortunately, at the present time, I believe the box car situation has remedied itself. I shall be glad to bring to the attention of the Canadian National Railways the condition to which the member for Macleod refers.

As I said a moment ago, I go to the western part of Canada and out to the coast once a year. I cannot recollect any experience such as that outlined by the member. However, I am sure he would not bring it up unless he was quite satisfied that the facts were as he alleges. I shall be glad to bring it to the attention of the officers of the railway.

Mr. Shaw: The minister indicated in the course of his remarks that he had not been asked to comment on the subject of grain cars. I would be only too glad to ask him at this moment to do so. Back in the part of Canada whence I come, the situation has been extremely critical. In my own town, for example, there are approximately seven elevators. Two months ago they were packed to the roof with 700,000 bushels of wheat, much of which was damp and tough. It was estimated that in that area there were approximately 500,000 bushels of grain still on the farms, much of it damp and tough.

I am fully aware of the problem with which the board is confronted in connection with not only drying that type of grain, but the sale of it. With the approach of warm weather, the situation is going to become even more critical. On top of that, of course, is the fact that many of these farmers, having been unable to sell their grain, are experiencing certain financial difficulties. I understand that the wheat board did consult with the railroads, urging that there be a better allocation of grain cars for the movement of this grain. This is what I observed in my constituency. Where we had two lines of railroad, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, paralleling each other, both companies were moving in quite a number of grain cars. But on the line between Red Deer and Calgary for example, where we had no comparable competition, the Canadian Pacific appeared just a bit remiss in what I might call its duty in moving in these grain cars. I fully appreciate the problem, but I would ask the minister if there has been any appreciable change within the last month, and if not what these farmers might be able to expect in the way of relief from the current problem.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Chevrier: As I indicated before, the situation, while it was rather serious some weeks ago, has bettered itself substantially, as I shall indicate in a moment. I believe the causes were, first, the switchmen's strike in the United States, and then the blizzard in western Canada which tied up a number of box cars in certain areas. Then again, there is always a heavy movement of paper and other export products from Canada to the United States. This shortage has led to protests from various bodies in western Canada as well as other parts of Canada.

The picture on April 9, as it has been handed to me, is as follows. I should like to put on Hansard the unfavourable position of box cars generally from February 16 to date, because it was at that time the position was the worst. On February 16, Canadian box cars on United States lines numbered 29,989; United States box cars on Canadian lines amounted to 13,544. Therefore, the unfavourable balance to Canadian lines was 16,445. A month later, on March 16, Canadian box cars on United States lines had reached the total of 31,682; United States box cars on Canadian lines numbered 15,530. The unfavourable balance to Canadian lines was 16,152. On March 30, Canadian box cars on United States lines numbered 31,725; United States box cars on Canadian lines amounted to 17,300. The unfavourable balance was 14,425. On April 8, 29,132 Canadian box cars on United States lines; 18,327 United States box cars on Canadian lines. The unfavourable balance was 10,805.

It will be noted from the above statement that there has been a reduction between the earliest date, February 16, and April 8 of some 800 box cars on United States lines. On the other hand there has been a substantial increase of United States box cars on Canadian lines, to the amount of 4,800, making a net improvement in the unfavourable position of Canadian box cars of 5,640 cars. On March 9, which was the peak in the interchange position, the unfavourable balance stood at 18,935. Therefore since that time an improvement of over 10,000 cars has taken place. A moment ago I said that the unfavourable balance as of April 8 was 10,805. The normal position is about 8,000 in Canada. We have therefore almost reached the normal position. That is indicated by a letter which I have in my possession from the chief commissioner of the Canadian wheat board dated April 9. I quote from it. It states:

I am pleased to advise that the improvement in Vancouver loadings is continuing and although we are on demurrage on some of our boats in Vancouver, if the railways will continue to step up their loadings and will move the wheat quickly to Vancouver, we can cut down on prospective demurrage claims.

I am glad to advise also that the over-all car loadings are better. On Friday we had close to 1,000 cars loaded with grain in the whole of the western division, and on Saturday, 870 cars, the break-down by provinces being Manitoba, 121; Saskatchewan, 409; Alberta, 340; and the break-down between railways, C.P.R., 430; C.N.R., 428; N.A.R., 12.

Then he adds:

The following boats are either at Fort William or due at Fort William:

Now at Fort William: Hochelaga, Coverdale, Ashcroft, Lemoyne, Stadacona, Hagarty.

Due Tuesday: Prescott.

Due Wednesday: Westmount.

We expect these boats will load within a day or two, just as soon as they can get into elevators. This early opening is quite encouraging.

I think the position has bettered itself because of the two things which were done by the department officials and which I mentioned before, but more particularly because of the committees which were established among the railways, the shipping companies, the Department of Transport officials and others who were interested in the movement of grain. Those people had preliminary meetings; and because of the action which they took they were, I think, instrumental in bringing about a position which is almost back to normal, I am happy to say.

Mr. Nowlan: There has been a great deal of discussion this afternoon and evening with respect to the report of the royal commission on the freight rates structure. Much of that discussion has come from western members, and it might be expected that those of us from the east would also deal with this problem at some length. Certainly we have both suffered from the same disability with respect to the incidence of freight rates. The fact that possibly those of us in the east may not be quite as vocal as some of the western members in expressing their grievances with respect to this matter would not for one moment suggest that the load is any more easy to bear.

As I think the minister knows, we have in the maritime provinces, representing the various provincial governments and boards of trade, a freight rate commission which has given this matter considerable attention. I am advised by some officers of that commission that they are meeting now and over the week end and are giving further study to the report of this royal commission. Of course their findings or recommendations are not necessarily those which members of this committee generally or any one of them in particular would accept. But we all realize that this is a complicated and involved subject; and certainly, so far as I am concerned, I would prefer to have their analysis of the situation, and their criticisms and suggestions with respect to the report, before attempting to deal adequately with this matter before the house. I simply make that as an explanation for the reason why I at any rate am not attempting to deal with the report of this commission tonight. But I presume that at some time in the near future the minister's estimates will again be before us, and probably on the matter of the Maritime Freight Rates Act or some other item such as that we will then have the opportunity to discuss the report of the commission, having regard to its incidence in the maritime provinces. Certainly we have a tremendous interest in this problem. It is an old one as far as the east is concerned. The matter of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, to which the royal commission referred, has been of tremendous help to the maritimes in the past but that help has decreased, unfortunately, or diminished owing to the lessening of freight rates in Ontario and Quebec because of the competition of motor trucks and the other factors with which we are all familiar.

The hon. member for Cumberland was a member of the government of the province of Nova Scotia which first started the agitation for the old Duncan commission or the maritime rights commission. Out of that maritime rights commission came the Duncan report; and as a result of that report we obtained the Maritime Freight Rates Act. Certainly all of us in the east appreciate the work which was done by that commission and the leadership which was given to it by the hon. member for Cumberland and others. As I said, the effect or the benefit of the act is far less today than we should like to have it. Personally, I think the whole matter will have to be reviewed in the near future. Consideration should be given to amendments to the act. But as I said, I would not attempt to discuss this matter in detail now because I think we should first of all receive the benefit of all the advice we can get on that subject.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer briefly. It is one that is not covered by the royal commission at all but it is one coming under the aegis of the minister, although unfortunately there is no specific item in his department for it. Generally, it would come under marine services. It is the unfortunate fact that we at least in the east have not at this time—and I do not believe those on the west coast have either—a coastguard service to be of assistance to those on the sea.

We had in the east last year a most unfortunate tragedy, and there have been many of them. The one of which I am thinking at the moment occurred last fall, when fishing boats were at sea. A tornado swept up the coast. The weather report had been given at midnight saying the weather was fine; and the men in the little boats largely went to sleep feeling that everything was all right. An hour later hurricane warnings were suddenly issued; but there was no one to tell the crews of those boats that the weather had changed so quickly and so dramatically. In the early hours of the morning the storm swept up and some of those boats were drifting for days. At least one of them was lost, with the loss of five of the crew. For three days one could hear the wireless telephone trying to communicate with someone, trying to get a rescue ship directed to their attention. Appeals were made to private ships. They went out. They in turn appealed to the United States coastguard service; and we owe a tremendous debt to the work of the United States coastguard. That service has always responded whenever we have called upon it for assistance. In this case they answered the call. One cutter was 91 miles away. This was after the boats had been drifting for twenty-four hours. They said, "We will be there in six hours". They came but still they could not find the boat. They called in another United States cutter, and we had two American coastguard cutters patrolling there for two or three days. Finally after a week one of these boats, which was lost, was found, with the bodies of three of the crew afloat in the cabin, partially submerged; they had been alive no one knows how long. But the boat had capsized and they were adrift and floating in the water in the cabin. If an adequate service had been available, that tragedy could have been averted. That is only one of many tragedies of the kind which occur along the coast line of the Atlantic and also, undoubtedly, on the Pacific. The only hope of averting them is to call for the assistance of the United States coastguard. I know that the search and rescue squadron of the R.C.A.F. has done a tremendous amount in connection with searching for missing boats, and we owe to the men of the R.C.A.F. a great debt for the work they have done. But aeroplanes, even Cansos and amphibians, cannot land in rough seas. They cannot find ships in a fog nor can they find small boats such as fishing craft and similar ones.

We have off the Nova Scotia coast today a tremendous tourist industry. We have the swordfishing industry, which is advertised all over the world, bringing tourists there in small boats by the score, going out in rough waters and trusting in time of trouble to the United States coastguard to come to their assistance. The minister might tell us that instructions have been given for co-ordination between the R.C.A.F. and other ships under his control, ships of the department of marine and probably cutters of the R.C.M.P. as well. If there have been instructions for such co-ordination, Mr. Chairman, it does not work, because there were no boats under the Canadian flag available for the episode off Woods Harbour for days after the tragedy occurred. I believe it was four days after the ship was first reported missing before the R.C.M.P. cutter got there, and the Americans had searched during that period of time.

I am not criticizing the men of the R.C.M.P. or others. We just have not got the ships available. It is no good to have co-ordination with a ship on the Northumberland strait if you need it for the Yarmouth light or vice versa. I suggest it is a reflection upon Canada that we are depending upon our United States friends in times such as these. I do think economically it is bad because the loss of life and the loss of property, and the threat of this loss hanging over the heads of the industry, fishing, tourist and otherwise, is an economic liability which could be and should be obviated in the future. I realize the necessity for economy and all the rest of it, but we also realize, sir, that even in times such as these it is necessary not to have too much economy if this country is to prosper as a united nation. We in the east, and probably the same thing is true in the west, think that this is a service which is deficient today. It is a service which we need. I am asking the minister and urging him and this government to give attention to it and that within the reasonably near future a coastguard service be created, which will be of real assistance to us and will help to maintain the traditions of the sea of which we are so proud in Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: The matter of a coastguard service for Canada was debated and discussed in this house at some length on at least two different occasions each year. The result of the discussions was that an interdepartmental committee, consisting of a number of representatives of government departments, was established to consider co-ordination of marine search and rescue services. The committee arrived at certain very definite conclusions, which were outlined later by the Minister of National Defence in the house, since the responsibility was his, and is his hereafter. But since at the time it concerned the department over which I presided I feel that I should make some reply to the statements which my hon. friend has made, and which are not at all accurate.

The decision which was taken by the committee was that the R.C.A.F. be designated as the co-ordinating agency through its centres at Halifax, Trenton and Vancouver, and other government departments concerned were to co-operate fully with the R.C.A.F. That meant that the R.C.A.F. were given the task of co-ordinating the various government ships such as R.C.M.P. patrol boats, Department of Transport ships and Department of National Defence ships, in conjunction too with the air services branch of national defence. The R.C.A.F. is to set up a system of communication, with the other departments co-operating, so that casualties may be reported promptly. Necessary publicity is given to this search and rescue organization so that the public and interested agencies will know the appropriate action to take in the event of a casualty. Copies of this directive have been issued to each of the district marine agencies of the Department of Transport and to all other departmental ships concerned.

I have here a detailed list of those instructions. When the decision was taken and approved of, the Minister of National Defence made a statement in the house outlining the position. At that time he indicated a number of cases where government services had gone to the assistance of United States casualties, United States ships found in distress, and they were far more numerous, if my memory serves me correctly, than the cases where the United States coastguard cutters had come to the assistance of Canadians. I do not mean by that that there is no co-operation between the two. There is. But in case the committee should have the mistaken opinion that it is only the United States coastguard cutters that come to the assistance of our people, may I say that such is not the case.

Another feature of this is that in the Department of Transport at least clear and definite instructions have been given to our ships—and I am sure that obtains in other departments—that the moment they are advised by the R.C.A.F. of a casualty they are to leave their duties and go to the assistance of the ship in distress. I am not familiar with the case to which my hon. friend refers, but I can tell him this, that the committee that dealt with it gave it very careful consideration. They spent many months dealing with the problem. They heard evidence from persons interested on the west coast and from other interested departments, and came to the conclusion that the best method which could be adopted was that of co-ordination under the direction of the R.C.A.F.

Mr. McLure: It was not my intention to take part at any great length in the debate that has been in progress for quite a little while. But since it has been centred around the report of the royal commission on transportation, perhaps the committee might think that Prince Edward Island was a hundred per cent in favour of the report if I did not say something. I should like to draw attention to a few things with which I myself cannot agree.

Royal commissions are always very valuable in obtaining a great deal of information, and they are fact finding; but the unfortunate part of it is that when they present their reports to the government the government still has the right to ignore their findings and not to carry them into effect. I know that is true of a royal commission we had in 1926 which was known as the Andrew Rae Duncan commission. It brought in some excellent recommendations to the government, and I must say that it was a long time before we could get any government to implement those recommendations.

To my province of Prince Edward Island transportation is a vital thing. The union of Canada was formed on transportation. The upper provinces did not have any seaports. Their trade was growing. They looked around and inveigled New Brunswick and Nova Scotia into the union because they saw there two wonderful seaports, namely, that of Saint John and the best seaport on the Atlantic coast, Halifax. After that, in 1873, my province was courted into this union as well. The royal commission, as set out at page 171 of the report, gives the terms of confederation. It says this:

> Efficient steam service for the convenience of mails and passengers to be established and maintained between the island and the mainland of the dominion, winter and summer, thus placing the island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the dominion.

That is only part of the terms of confederation. That, to a certain extent, has been implemented in the last few years, by giving us certain daily communication by the different steamers we have had such as the Prince Edward, the Charlottetown and the Abegweit. But the royal commission should have gone a step further and given a full report of the agreement of 1873. For instance, in addition to what I have already quoted, the following should have been added:

And such other charges as may be incident to and connected with the service which, by the British North America Act of 1867, appertain to the general government and as are or may be allowed to the other provinces.

That agreement was made some seventy years ago. Did the royal commission expect that Prince Edward Island would be satisfied with the conditions that existed seventy years ago, when one of the terms of union was supposed to have been equal transportation as appertains to the other provinces in the light of conditions as they changed from time to time? This is a question which it would take me too long to discuss tonight. However, there may be occasions later on when I can do so.

Another matter to which I should like to refer I have not been able to find in the report, but perhaps I have not been astute enough to get through it and to find the reference to it. The question is: Who has the right to set rates on ferry boats? This has always been a subject of contention and disagreement between myself and the smiling and genial Minister of Transport. However, I should like to find a suggestion from the royal commission as to who has that right.

When the excellent ship the Abegweit was turned over to the subcontractor of transportation, the Canadian National Railways, for purposes of operation, I raised the objection that she should not be turned over unless there was a proper agreement, and that agreement would be that the boat was to be operated under the terms of union of 1873.

This has been ignored entirely. When we joined confederation there were certain terms that have already been quoted. These are ignored by the subcontractors. I think it was still up to the government to see that we had a contract whereby, so far as Prince Edward Island was concerned, the boat would be operated according to the terms of confederation. However, that is another point upon which we can spend some time later.

Another matter with which I should like to deal is the Wood Island-Caribou ferry service. This is a system operated by Northumberland Ferries Limited, and it is one of the best transportation systems Prince Edward Island has. The company started in a small way, and the traffic has grown to the point where, today, they want larger boats for the accommodation of the service. I understand that a few days ago they presented a brief to the Minister of Transport and the government in this connection.

I do not think I should deal with the brief because I have no doubt that in connection with it certain promises, which in a short time will be made public, have been made. I do want to say, however, that the minister should be very careful to fulfil all the recommendations in that brief. The company is deserving of the very best treatment from the government. It has given a good service; and had it not been for the ferry service we would have been entirely isolated from the mainland at the time of the railway strike. As it was we were isolated because, through the mistake of someone—I do not know who it was, nor do I want to blame anyone directly for it, until we have a final report—the car ferry was tied up. Here was a boat operating on the king's highway, as it is known in the terms of confederation. They had no right to go on strike; the government should have ordered them to continue or to get out. Then we would have had communication at least by car and truck.

However, before the strike was over the government, or someone, found out they were in error and the service was opened. Meantime the Wood Island ferry rendered a great service to the province. As I said a moment ago, I hope the Minister of Transport will take into consideration the brief presented to him on behalf of the Wood Island ferry, setting out what the company desires to do to give Prince Edward Island a better service. By doing so he will confer a great benefit on the province.

Then I would refer to another matter, namely another ferry service in the west end of the island. I know if the hon. member for Prince were here he certainly would be agitating for that ferry service. It is another link in our transportation system, if it could be got under way within the next year or so, and would be of great service to the farmers in the western part of the province.

Although my time is limited, there is one other matter I should like to mention. This has to do with the little question that comes up once in a while, namely the matter of maritime freight rates. Generally speaking, those who deal with this subject are led to believe that a subsidy is given to the maritime provinces under the provisions of the Maritime Freight Rates Act. However, when one looks into the matter he will see there is no subsidy. I cannot find where it has been dealt with in the report at all.

For instance, from 1912 to 1926 freight rates in the maritime provinces increased by 92 per cent. During the same time general freight rates across the rest of Canada had increased by only 55 per cent. After the Duncan commission made a study of this freight rate question as it concerned Prince Edward Island and the maritimes they brought in a recommendation that there should be equalization of rates and 20 per cent was granted.

That was not a handout or a subsidy, it was simply a matter of equalizing freight rates with the rest of Canada. When we had been paying a 92 per cent increase as against a 55 per cent increase for the rest of Canada, even the 20 per cent did not give us proper equalization. What we should have is another 20 per cent to give us any preference at all on the importation of grains and our exports of potatoes.

These freight rates have always been referred to by a number of people as a subsidy, whereas, as I have tried to explain, it is not a subsidy at all. It was due us. We were only getting equalization with the rest of Canada.

Mr. Knowles: I do not wish to hold up the item, but there is a point I should like to raise in connection with the Canadian National Railways. If the minister can assure me that I can deal with it on another item, I can wait.

Mr. Chevrier: I will give the hon. member that assurance now.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister indicate the item?

Mr. Chevrier: Any one of the eight or ten Canadian National items.

Mr. Knowles: How about item 490?

Mr. Chevrier: That is all right.

Mr. Low: I was sorely tempted to talk at greater length on the commission report, but inasmuch as we are close to eleven o'clock I shall take only a few minutes to discuss one matter I have in mind. Before the natural resources were turned over to the provinces a number of settlements were established in northern Alberta. One of these was Fort Vermilion, which was located along the Peace river about 200 miles from Peace River town. A little later on another settlement by the name of Carcajou was settled.

The only way these settlers had of getting into the settlements or going out with their products was by river boat. Fairly substantial farms were established and the whole country became quite a producer of grains and livestock, as the minister probably knows. Very early in the history of that northland the Hudson's Bay Company established boat and barge transportation to bring in their own merchandise and to carry out the furs and other products they obtained in their trading activities.

Not long ago a competitor started running boats and barges up and down the river and continued in competition until last spring or summer. Civilization seemed to catch up with these people and then their troubles began. The rather rigid regulations governing river and marine transport were applied and this competitor to the Hudson's Bay Company could not continue operations. The main reason was the requirement that a qualified captain should be on the boats and that there should be proper passenger facilities even on boats that were carrying livestock. The Hudson's Bay Company did not increase their facilities. The result is that as late as August 1 last year close to 100,000 bushels of grain lay on the ground, covered with canvas or tarpaulins or whatever they could get, awaiting some form of transportation.

The situation became rather serious because the people could not market their livestock either. They are faced with an almost insurmountable problem because it takes quite a long time to build a road through that north country. There is no hope of a highway being built in time to serve this area. The new navigation season is about to begin and I was wondering if the minister could not bring to the attention of his departmental officers the necessity of looking into this matter to see if it would not be possible to relax the regulations and allow the private company to operate without having qualified captains and all these other things.

The men who have been operating up and down the river for 20 or 25 years know the river just as well as any captain could know it. They have never had any serious difficulty or any wrecks that resulted in loss of life or extensive property losses. That would seem to give assurance that by relaxing the regulations somewhat there would be no disaster. I ask the minister to look into the matter and see if he cannot help these people temporarily until such time as a better method of dealing with the problem can be found.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I will.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Tomorrow we would like to continue with the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Green: All day?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. If we are successful in disposing of those we will take up Bill No. 196, respecting the Hamilton harbour commissioners, and Bill No. 197, to amend the Aeronautics Act. If we are so fortunate as to dispose of those two bills, for the remainder of the time we will take up the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Green: We have not yet got the bill to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Mr. Chevrier: It will be ready for distribution tomorrow.

Mr. Green: We cannot very well consider it on such short notice.

Mr. Chevrier: If there is any demand for delay in consideration of that bill we can go on with the bill respecting the Hamilton harbour commissioners and then proceed with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following item was passed in committee of supply]:

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the name of Mr. Browne (St. John's West) be substituted for that of Mr. Adamson on the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS

QUESTION AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF BRIDGE NEAR LLOYDMINSTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Bater (The Battlefords): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Have the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan made representations to the federal government for assistance in constructing a bridge on the fourth meridian across the North Saskatchewan river due north of Lloydminster?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): My officials inform me that no such representations have been made.

INCOME TAX

OPENING OF REGIONAL OFFICE IN SUDBURY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. Gauthier (Sudbury): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue, of which I have given him notice. When may we expect the announcement of the opening of the regional income tax office in Sudbury?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the opening of our new income tax office in Sudbury will take place about the middle of the summer, July or August. In any event I want to assure the hon. gentleman that it will be opened in time to collect the taxes which become effective July 1.

BUTTER

REQUEST FOR SETTING OF FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister in a position to say whether the government will meet the request of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to set a floor price of 62 cents under butter in order to stabilize the market?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The government has not yet determined what the floor price for butter will be in the coming year.

POSTAL SERVICE

INQUIRY CONCERNING THE ERECTION OF A POST OFFICE BUILDING IN GRANBY, QUE.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Marcel Boivin (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret), can the parliamentary assistant tell me whether he knows of the numerous representations I have made concerning the new Granby post office and, if so, can he tell me what the minister intends to do about this matter?

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the department has carefully noted the hon. member's representations. The estimates for 1951-52 include an item for $100,000 to be spent on the erection of a public building in Granby at the corner of St. Antoine and Principale streets, on the north side. Plans have been submitted to our department by the Department of Public Works. We have made some suggestions to that department and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) has now received these alterations. It can therefore be presumed that the project will go forward as speedily as possible.

LETTER CARRIER SERVICE TO RECENTLY ANNEXED PARTS OF OTTAWA—DIFFERENCES IN RATES WITHIN THE CITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General. I realize that this will be more in the nature of a notice than a question, but I am bringing the matter up now in the hope that it will be dealt with as soon as possible. Notice of the question has been sent to the Postmaster General. Is it the intention of the Postmaster General to arrange for letter carrier delivery service to those parts of Ottawa which have been recently annexed to the city, and to take such steps as may be necessary to remove the unjust differences in postal rates charged for the handling of mail in different parts of the city?

As I say, I leave that as notice, unless the parliamentary assistant is in a position to answer the question.

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Postmaster General may I say that notice of this question was handed to me as I was coming into the house, and I have just had the opportunity, during the proceedings up to now, to read it. However, if my memory serves me aright, a delegation from the city council met with the Postmaster General some time ago to discuss this matter and was informed that this section of the city did not quite meet the requirements of the department, particularly with regard to street names, proper receptacles for mail, and requirements of this nature. I shall be pleased to take the matter up again with the Postmaster General when he comes back to the city, and will then report to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Drew: Just so that the matter may be dealt with on the broad basis on which I brought it to the attention of the Postmaster General, I would point out that the subject discussed by the parliamentary assistant is only one part of the subject that I brought forward. There are also the differences in postal rates within the city; persons within the city are compelled to pay penalty postage, on the basis of the natural assumption that the ordinary three-cent rate applies throughout the whole area of the city.

STEEL

DEFENCE PRODUCTION—QUESTION AS TO SUPPLY IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. I regret that I did not have time to give him notice of it, and if he is not prepared to answer today, I should be pleased if he would do so on Monday. Has the minister been approached by the Sheet Metal Association of British Columbia complaining of the serious situation created in that province owing to the cutting off of steel supplies and the fact that there has been no defence production in British Columbia so far?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): I know of no such representation, but I shall be glad to make inquiries and answer the question on Monday.

[Mr. Drew.]

DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Has consideration been given to the setting up of a special committee of the house, comparable to the war expenditures committee which served during the war, but this time dealing with defence expenditures?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Consideration has been given to that question, and no final decision has yet been reached.

EXCISE TAX

BUDGET INCREASES ON CIGARETTES—RETAIL PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that many vendors of cigarettes are today charging the new price on cigarettes upon which the extra excise tax provided by the budget has not been paid, will the minister give consideration to the desirability of having stamped on the excise stamp which is affixed to each package the exact amount of the tax that is being paid?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): It has been found that many retailers increase the prices of existing stocks when taxes are raised. They consider what the replacement value of the goods is, knowing that they will have to pay the higher rates on such replacements. They also know that if and when taxes are reduced or removed, they are not allowed any credits for taxes paid on the goods they then have on hand, and they consider that the increase on current stocks offsets the loss they may take later on.

There is the further point that there is in the Excise Tax Act no provision for prohibiting or preventing this practice, which is quite prevalent in the lines of businesses affected, though some large retailers advertise that they will not raise their prices on existing stocks, and they themselves stand the loss on goods on hand when the taxes are reduced or removed; but they consider this to be good advertising.

I may say that we have large stocks of stamps on hand, and that it would probably be an unnecessary expense to change to the method suggested, namely, that of indicating the extent of the tax instead of indicating the number of cigarettes on the package. But it is a matter which will be considered when the present supply of stamps is exhausted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It would show the amount of the hidden tax.

Mr. McCann: I understand what the hon. member means.

Mr. Coldwell: I wish to ask a supplementary question. Has anyone informed any member of the government that the prices of cigarettes per package have been raised from 36 to 40 cents and from 45 to 50 cents? This increase is far in excess of the new tax which is roughly 3 cents and 4 cents.

Mr. McCann: That may be so and is so. But we have no way of regulating the price the merchant asks for his goods.

Mr. Coldwell: That is inflationary.

Mr. Charlton: I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Revenue, in view of his answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). Does the same thing apply to candies?

Mr. McCann: The same answer can be applied to candy. A great many merchants have already announced that they have reduced the prices in accordance with the reduction in tax.

Mr. Abbott: They take whatever loss there is.

Mr. McCann: They take the loss themselves.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Canal services—

473. Operation and maintenance, $4,523,107.

Mr. Gibson: More or less on a question of privilege I should like to make a few remarks. I did not bring this matter up last night because it was getting close to eleven o'clock and I knew the minister was anxious to get the general item through. Can the minister give me an explanation of the anomalies that exist in the railway pass privileges for members of parliament? I understand that the passes of the members from Newfoundland are not affected, but on the other hand members coming, say, from Digby, Nova Scotia, to Saint John, New Brunswick, and from Vancouver to Victoria, or Victoria to Nanaimo, find their passes are not accepted on Canadian Pacific Railway steamships. I am wondering whether the minister himself, when he visits our coast, which he unfortunately does not get an opportunity to do often enough, will get a pass on the Victoria-Nanaimo or Victoria-Vancouver boat. I am also informed that the members of the legislature in Newfoundland have their own privileges. That may or may not be so. Is it true that they get pass privileges on the Canadian National steamship vessels operating to and from Newfoundland? If so, what part of the Railway Act entitles them to it? Are our passes valid on these lines under the same provision? If the minister cannot answer offhand, perhaps he will look into the matter and see how it stands and what changes could possibly be made. Of course there is the question of subsidies involved. Some of the Canadian Pacific steamship lines get substantial subsidies from the government. If that is the basis upon which it is worked, I should like to have it looked into.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The only anomaly that I am aware of is that concerning the movement outside of Canada, and it is on the line of the Canadian Pacific to the maritime provinces, part of which runs through the United States. The Railway Act clearly makes provision for free transportation to members of the House of Commons and of the other place in Canada. I think that goes for the rest of the question that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni raised. The Railway Act gives no authority for free transportation on steamships.

Mr. Gibson: Even if it is part of the transcontinental system?

Mr. Chevrier: Even if it is part of the transcontinental system. That would exclude a car ferry, such as the Prince Edward Island car ferry, which is considered a part of the railway system. If my hon. friend looks at the pertinent section of the Railway Act he will see that the privileges of members in this regard are set out in detail. It certainly does not include transportation on the steamships.

Mr. Gibson: On the other hand, one would think the steamship service from Digby, Nova Scotia, to Saint John, New Brunswick, would be included, because that is the only way in which the maritime members can get to their constituencies. I cannot swim to Vancouver, neither can the hon. member for Nanaimo. It must inevitably be part of our transcontinental system, and has always been recognized as such. The mere fact that it is a wholly-owned subsidiary and called by a different name should not obviate the responsibility of the railway companies to recognize these passes. It is not a matter of great concern, but I am interested.

Mr. Chevrier: I can only be guided by what the act of parliament says. If the act were changed to meet that position, then of course the regulations would be put into effect to meet it; but as it is now, the position to which my hon. friend refers is not covered in the act.

Mr. Gibson: Many amendments are introduced every year. I wonder whether that would not be an excellent amendment to bring down. We might open the Railway Act for one day and introduce the amendment. I am sure the minister will have to do it one of these days.

Mr. Sinclair: Cut out the steamship subsidies.

Mr. Gibson: No; I think these are important. I have always believed that they were based on equity, and I am sure the minister would say that.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): There is just one question I should like to ask. The matter has been brought up before. There are several members here from New Brunswick and several in the other place, who are obliged to go through the state of Maine in order to get to Ottawa. To do otherwise you would be obliged to go around to Moncton on the Canadian National Railway, and it would take an additional day to arrive in the capital city. These members are obliged to pay what is called a fee through Maine. It amounts today to around $10. The minister has said that it is a regulation. There is one thing that I fail to understand. I can send these receipts down to the Canadian Pacific Railway office here in Ottawa and within a few days I will get a cheque for the amount that I have paid. If I have two, three or four receipts they will give me a cheque for the full amount. It looks to me like a lot of bookkeeping for nothing. At one time I lost three or four receipts, and I know other hon. members have done the same thing. I do know of one member from New Brunswick who at one time had a through-Maine pass.

I would ask the minister to look into the matter to see if it is possible to have the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National issue passes to cover such travel. There are only about seven or eight members affected. It is a nuisance. There is no revenue involved so far as the railway is concerned, because the member is reimbursed when he sends the receipts to the Canadian Pacific Railway office.

Mr. Chevrier: I have given this matter careful consideration once before, and I have come to the conclusion that unfortunately this cannot be done, because it is a part of a line over which neither parliament nor the board of transport commissioners have any jurisdiction. Parliament passed an act dealing with railways in Canada only. Similarly, the interstate commerce commission can confer no jurisdiction over United States lines in Canada, and unless there is a willingness on the part of the railways themselves to do it there is unfortunately nothing that can be done from this end.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Just one other question, Mr. Chairman. Is the cheque that is given to me by the Canadian Pacific Railway office a donation by the Canadian Pacific Railway, or a donation by the federal government; or where does it come from? I can send my receipts down and in a few days I get a cheque. It is a Canadian Pacific Railway cheque on the Bank of Montreal. Is it a contribution by the Canadian Pacific Railway to me as a member of parliament, or what is it?

Mr. Chevrier: I would think that it is.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Chevrier: I presume the attitude they take is that since under the terms of the act they cannot grant free transportation, they refund it in that manner.

Mr. Gibson: Under what authority does the Canadian National Railways give Newfoundland members the privilege of riding free on their ships?

Mr. Stick: We do not get it.

Mr. Sinclair: And not the British Columbia members.

Mr. Chevrier: Because of the continuity of operation between Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, in the same manner as there is continuity of operation between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned.

Mr. Gibson: There must be continuity of operation between Saint John and Digby, because, after all, the Dominion Atlantic Railway, which is a wholly owned subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific Railway, meets the train there.

Mr. Chevrier: No; the position is different, because one is a car ferry operated by the government through the Canadian National Railways, and the other service is operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Chairman, I could never understand why it was considered necessary to grant these extraordinary privileges. I sympathize with hon. members who come from remote parts of the country to help us run the affairs of the country, but frankly I am of the opinion that the time has long since passed when his extraordinary right to travel on passes should have been done away with. The other day, for instance, there was reference to hon. members of this house travelling free to Churchill. Travel free, by all means, but let us have vouchers filed with those charged with administration of these matters, so that they may have entries in their bookkeeping system in respect of each and every one of us who exercises this particular privilege. Honour those vouchers by all means; but let us not in this institution, where we enjoy such great privileges and where we are permitted to spend so freely—and not always our own money—let us not spend too freely the money which comes from our taxpayers. Let those vouchers be scrutinized in such a way that those who send us here will feel satisfied that they are receiving true value for the amounts covered by the vouchers passed by those in authority.

Ten years ago I travelled in my hon. friend's part of the country on a train on which only one passenger had paid his fare: all the rest of us were on some sort of free ticket, some sort of pass.

Mr. Cruickshank: The Thursday train to Toronto?

Mr. Harris (Danforth): We carry these tickets in our pocketbooks. I felt ashamed to travel on a pass on that train, because my business at that time was not political. I was not on that particular day saving the nation; rather I was transacting personal business in my hon. friend's part of the world. I like him; he is a very fine gentleman, and I feel proud to be associated with him. But at that time I felt, as indeed I have felt for a decade since, that there was some doubt whether I should be travelling free on one of Canada's trains to do my own business.

Mr. Gibson: It does not bother the hon. member on week ends?

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I see over there one of the members from Vancouver, and I can say that I did the same thing in his part of the country, and felt equally ashamed.

The whole procedure of issuing free passes on a transportation system, whether it be rail to the Pacific coast, or the short-cut from Saint John to Digby, is questionable. One pays a few dollars extra to travel by that short-cut so as to save time. The procedure of issuing passes is something that should be looked into. We should try to find some method by which we can pay our own way to a greater extent, and not take so much for granted or accept so readily the free transportation made available to us by the Railway Act. By the provisions of that act we are permitted to travel hither and yon, often for purposes of statesmanship, but oftener for personal business reasons. We are altogether too free in this practice. I see that the minister is busy consulting his deputies; perhaps it is about something more important than I am saying.

I repeat that the time is ripe for cutting down the number of free rides on the merry-go-round, even though we do get a brass ring. It is not too late to cut down this privilege of free transportation afforded to many of our citizens who, while they are not permitted to ride free on busses or aircraft—and I express the hope that the privilege may not be extended to those means of transportation—do travel free on trains and steamships.

When I say this my remarks are not directed to our tenth province of Newfoundland. I realize they must travel back and forth, and I hope that anything I say will not in any way limit their ingress or egress. I realize that our tenth province is a long distance away. Yet when I sit in a train and see the widows of Brown, Smith and Jones who have free transportation I feel that the time has come when a few dollars should be spent to investigate this high privilege which is given to many people. Most of them deserve it, but about ten per cent of them do not. It is a privilege which we as members of parliament, as well as our wives, sons and daughters, grandsons and granddaughters and sweethearts, enjoy when travelling on trains and steamships, and it is a privilege which should be checked and wherever possible curtailed. It should not be abused.

I have seen the privilege abused for over thirty years—and I shall not go into detail in the matter, although I could if I were asked to.

Mr. McIvor: Would the hon. member be in favour of the cancellation of transportation privileges, so that only our expenses would be paid?

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Yes, and that vouchers should be supplied.

Mr. Sinclair: Turn in your pass.

The Chairman: Order. I would remind hon. members that the item under consideration refers to canal services.

Mr. Catherwood: I thought we were discussing the first item.

The Chairman: No; it was carried yesterday.

Mr. Catherwood: Then I have some observations to make on item 473. I should like to ask the minister a series of questions with regard to some of the canals in Ontario. Has the minister figures of the cost of maintaining and operating the Rideau canal? Are records kept of the number of boats of all descriptions passing through the canal, and if so, how many passed through in 1950 and in 1949?

Mr. Chevrier: The cost for the maintenance of the Rideau canal in these estimates is $368,565. We have a record of the number of boats passing through the canal, and I can get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. Catherwood: My next question concerns the Welland canal, in which I am more or less interested. Can the minister give the revenue derived from the operation of that canal in 1950?

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I shall have to get the figures for the hon. member.

Mr. Catherwood: From what sources is that revenue obtained?

Mr. Chevrier: It is mostly from the lease of lands and from the power development on the Welland canal.

Mr. Catherwood: In the public accounts of last year, $10,000 was provided for the transfer of lands and responsibilities in connection with the Welland feeder canal, and I understand that that amount was not used. Is there provision for a similar amount in the estimates this year?

Mr. Chevrier: The $10,000 was not used because an agreement was not effected between the township concerned and the department. It will be used this year if an agreement is completed.

Mr. Catherwood: What was the total revenue from all canals in Canada in 1950?

Mr. Chevrier: $1,100,000 and some odd.

Item agreed to.

Canal services—

475. To provide for expenses in connection with the St. Lawrence ship canal surveys and investigations, $10,000.

Mr. Green: This item has to do with the St. Lawrence ship canal. Will the minister indicate what effect it is expected the construction of this canal will have upon the transportation system of Canada? Yesterday representations were made by the legislative committee of the railway brotherhoods in connection with this proposed St. Lawrence seaway, and they used these words:

> We regard the value of the proposed seaway to Canada as theoretical, its cost very real, its need very doubtful, and its possible effect must be viewed with concern in so far as transportation is involved.

[The Chairman.]

As the minister knows, last evening I suggested that there should be a commission or other body set up to study this whole question of the effect of the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway upon the transportation system of Canada. It might be possible to set up a committee of this house to consider the question. So far as we know, little thought has been given to the subject; yet it would appear to be of the utmost importance, particularly in view of the fact that with this Turgeon report we are entering upon a new day in transportation. This would seem to be the time to consider the whole transportation picture, of which the St. Lawrence seaway will be a most important part. Can the minister give us a review of the effects upon our transportation system that are expected to follow when the St. Lawrence seaway is built?

Mr. Chevrier: The railway brotherhoods have always opposed the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway, and in their briefs to the government they have set down reasons why it should not be proceeded with. Unfortunately, because of the estimates that concerned the Department of Transport, I was not present yesterday when they made their presentation to the government. But I have read the brief, and it is not at all dissimilar to those which have been presented on previous occasions.

The railways in the United States have carried on quite a militant opposition to the project. At one time the opposition in Canada was perhaps not unlike that in the United States, but I believe it has changed substantially. Notwithstanding the representations made by the brotherhoods, the former president of the Canadian National Railways declared himself to be in favour of the project for a number of reasons, the main one being that the industrial development which would arise would mean far more in the way of traffic to the railways than any loss that might occur.

My hon. friend speaks of the cost, and asks what studies have been made as to the benefits likely to be derived.

Mr. Green: This is all quite interesting, but I did not mention the cost.

Mr. Chevrier: That was in the brief.

Mr. Green: I referred not only to the benefits. What I had in mind was to get the general picture of the effect of the seaway upon our transportation system. I am not taking one side or the other; I simply want to get from the minister an indication of the general effect upon our transportation system of the construction of the seaway.

Mr. Chevrier: I was trying to get to that, perhaps not in a manner which was entirely suitable to my hon. friend. What I intended to say was that, on the economic side, studies were made over a considerable length of time by various groups in the country. These studies were made by boards of engineers, both United States and Canadian; by engineers from Ontario and Quebec, and by other bodies. Following the studies which were made from an engineering and economic standpoint in those years it was felt that the project would be of great benefit to the economy of Canada. That view has been strengthened by the development of natural resources which have taken place since that time.

It was on the basis of those studies, both economic and engineering, that two governments of this country, one headed by a former prime minister, the late Lord Bennett, and the other headed by the former prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, entered into a treaty and an agreement with the United States for the joint development of the power and navigational facilities. I am sure that the studies which have been made clearly indicate that greater trade would flow on the St. Lawrence seaway because of this development—greater trade from the natural resources in certain parts of Canada, such as the iron ore deposits in Labrador and Quebec, and elsewhere—and also because of the great power development which would bring industry in its wake. Those are the main things that come to my mind at the moment.

Mr. Green: Is it expected, for example, that ocean freighters will come right up through the seaway system to Toronto, Windsor, Fort William and Port Arthur, or will there merely be transfers from ocean-going freighters to great lakes cargo vessels? Studies must have been made as to what is apt to happen to our traffic. If ocean-going vessels are to carry the freight right up to Fort William and Port Arthur, then of course that would affect very much the freight carried by the railways across Ontario. What is expected to follow from the construction of the seaway?

Mr. Chevrier: That is a rather difficult question to answer. While the seaway, if developed in accordance with the plan, will thereafter be twenty-seven feet in depth, there are many ocean-going vessels that will not find it profitable to navigate the entire route because of the draft and because of the length of time it would take to go through the lakes. In that respect I do not think a great deal of change will take place. But there are other vessels, such as trampers, that may find it economical to move right through the canal system up into the great lakes area, and if they do they probably will seek trade in that area. The studies which have been made indicated that it might be possible to bring grain in lake carriers right through to Montreal, unload there or at Quebec, Three Rivers, Sorel, places of that kind; then go on empty to the Seven Islands area; there pick up a return cargo of iron ore and come back through the canal systems. Of course ships will have to be built to accommodate that kind of cargo and that kind of trade. I understand that certain companies have plans and specifications in readiness in case the project is proceeded with.

Mr. Green: I presume the iron ore would be carried back to United States ports?

Mr. Chevrier: Or Canadian ports, if the industrial development necessitated that movement on our shores.

Mr. Green: Under present conditions most of the iron ore would go to United States lake ports.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Green: And I presume would be carried in United States bottoms.

Mr. Chevrier: Not necessarily. The companies I had in mind a moment ago were Canadian.

Mr. Green: Iron ore from the Mesabi range is carried in American bottoms.

Mr. Chevrier: It is also carried in Canadian boats, but what I had in mind a moment ago was that certain Canadian steamship companies already have plans in readiness for the movement of that ore.

Mr. Green: What is the estimated cost of the St. Lawrence waterway, and what proportion of that cost is to be paid by Canada?

Mr. Chevrier: The latest estimate I have—and of course I speak from memory—is in the neighbourhood of $860 million, of which Canada would be responsible for about $130 or $140 million. Mind you, that is after giving credit for the amounts we have spent on the Welland canal and the upper reaches of the lakes, and the power development.

Mr. Green: How long would it take to complete the seaway?

Mr. Chevrier: It is estimated it would take about five years.

Mr. Green: Is the Canadian government not having any engineering surveys made, or making any preparations of the kind for this waterway? Apparently Canada is committed to the project, and is merely waiting for agreement by the United States. What steps are being taken by the government by way of preparation?

Mr. Chevrier: First of all, the surveys of which my hon. friend speaks have already been made. The plan is a single-stage control scheme that has been approved by provincial and federal engineers. That is already in existence at the plan stage. In the Department of Transport there has been established a special projects branch which will deal with the expropriation of the necessary lands and with all problems assigned to the federal government under the agreement. Beyond that I can say no more.

Mr. Green: Is there any engineering work being done on the plan at the moment?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Green: Is any engineering firm doing any work on it at the moment?

Mr. Chevrier: No. There could not be any until the scheme had been approved between governments.

Mr. Green: Has there been any arrangement made with any engineering firms for work on the seaway?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Green: The government is just sitting and doing nothing whatever about these plans in the meantime.

Mr. Chevrier: No, the government is not just sitting. The government is holding itself ready, as I stated a moment ago, by the establishment in the department of a special projects division to deal with matters concerning expropriation of the land, and the moment the agreement is approved, if it is, by the United States government, it will have to be approved by this house. It will take some five or six years to complete the project, so there will be plenty of time to appoint engineers and to proceed with the work that concerns the federal government. There are many works concerning provincial governments in connection with the joint project.

Mr. Green: Has the government had any reports from engineering firms on this project?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Green: And has no engineering firms engaged to work on it?

Mr. Chevrier: No, but it has a chief engineer in the department whose business for the last twenty-five years has been to deal specifically with the St. Lawrence waterway. He has kept himself well informed, is in contact with the United States authorities on the other side, and is quite familiar with the project as a whole.

Mr. Gillis: I hate to break up this conversation, but I have been waiting anxiously to find out whether the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is for or against the project.

Mr. Green: I have been trying to keep an open mind and get the facts.

Mr. Gillis: I have not kept an open mind about it, and I definitely want to put that on the record. I also want to make it quite clear that I am speaking for myself on this occasion. Other members of this group may have other opinions. They live in other parts of the country.

The St. Lawrence waterway project is not a new one. During the last twenty-five years I have heard some very active discussions about it. So far as my memory serves me there has always been total opposition to this project on the part of the maritime provinces. The wisdom of those who were opposing it twenty-five years ago has been well demonstrated to me since coming to this house. The government of the United States was never very much interested in completing this project until the development of the iron ore deposits in Labrador and Ungava took place. With that field of raw material available, the United States is in a great rush to have this project completed.

In his brief statement the minister made it quite clear, in so far as Canada is concerned, the thinking on this project, from either a transportation or an economic aspect, ceases completely at Montreal. No thought has been given beyond Montreal at all. The minister clearly stated that once this waterway was opened it would mean that a certain type of ship could land a cargo of grain in Montreal, then the boat could pick up a cargo of iron ore and take it back to the United States or to other parts of Canada. I am not blaming the minister, but that clearly indicates that the minister has taken the advice of his engineers and departmental officials, and he is merely repeating what he has heard in discussing the subject. There is hardly any thought on the subject east of Montreal. I should like to remind the minister that there are four provinces east of Montreal. People live there, work there and pay taxes; and they should be given some consideration.

What does this development mean to the maritime provinces? It means that this mode of transportation will replace transportation by railroad. I am glad to note that the railroad workers are objecting to it in their briefs. They know what will happen. The whole development is designed to make cheaper transportation available, and it is designed to tap the Labrador resources for the benefit of the United States. I also oppose it from that angle, that it is going to mean a curtailment of transportation and the laying off of railroad workers. The most important objection I have to it is that it is tapping resources in Canada, and making them available cheaply to the United States when they should have been developed by Canada.

Then, I am concerned about the coal industry of the maritimes. Twenty or twenty-five years ago I heard that the only reason that we have an economic market for maritime coal in Quebec is because there is no water route into that market from the United States coal fields. The development of the St. Lawrence waterway would mean that United States coal could be shipped in to replace that portion of the Quebec market now supplied by the Nova Scotia industry. The whole trend of thought, so far as the development of Canada is concerned, has been and still is detrimental to the maritime provinces. When the question of decentralization was being discussed, I mentioned the St. Lawrence waterway briefly. The Prime Minister wanted to know whether I was for it or against it. I am very definitely against it, because clearly no thinking is being done east of Montreal. The whole trend is to forget the eastern part of the country. Every economic development that has taken place has been designed, not to promote the welfare of the maritimes but to cripple what is already established there.

This cheap means of transportation means the carrying of iron ore up the St. Lawrence to the United States, when it might have been shipped by rail. This would mean that railroad workers would be laid off east of Montreal, and that would result in a continuation of the centralization of industry in the central part of Canada and the United States. In discussing this project not long ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce publicly stated that if the St. Lawrence waterway is not developed some of the steel plants in the central United States and central Canada might have to shift to the Atlantic seaboard. That is exactly what I have been advocating. With ore available in that part of the country, with about ten per cent of the population unemployed in that area now, with coal available, there should be an expansion of the steel industry in that area. The minister makes it quite clear that that is the thing he is trying to prevent by the development of the St. Lawrence waterway. As a representative of the maritimes, I am not prepared to vote the Canadian taxpayers' money to further a project that has as its only purpose the crippling of that part of the country which I represent. I agree with the member for Vancouver-Quadra when he said that a committee should be appointed, either a committee of this house or a commission of some kind, for the purpose of examining the economic aspect of this particular project, not as to its effect on the Toronto-Montreal area but as to its effect on the area from Vancouver to Newfoundland.

I am afraid that most of the thinking on any of the economic developments of the future, now as in the past, ceases at Montreal. Canada seems to be from Montreal to the other side of the Ontario border. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I want to state emphatically that I think a committee of some kind should be set up to ascertain all the facts in connection with this project, and see that it is developed to the best advantage of the whole of Canada, not just a section of Canada. I am going to continue to oppose it. This afternoon the minister made it quite clear that the thinking stops at Montreal. I believe the time has come when members of this house who represent ridings east of Montreal should be asserting themselves on matters of this kind. If they do not the result will be destruction of the part of the country from which they come.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member would not want to attempt to have me say things that are not on the record, and which I certainly did not say in my opening remarks on this item. In the first place, we are discussing an item that has nothing to do with the St. Lawrence waterway. This is an item of $10,000 covering St. Lawrence ship canal surveys and investigations. When the St. Lawrence waterway is up for discussion in this house, that will be the time for the house to decide whether or not it is advisable to have a committee to discuss the economic, engineering or other aspects of it. If the hon. member is of the opinion that I believe the thinking begins and stops at Montreal, he is entirely mistaken. If he believes that I am echoing the views of the officers of the Department of Transport, he is also entirely mistaken. I was born with this question, and I have discussed it for years. The thinking of the officers in the department has had no influence, in so far as my opinions on the project are concerned. My friend has discussed it from one point of view, that is from the navigational point of view. But that is only a small part of the advantages which are to be derived from this project. Many of the advantages, and perhaps the greatest—although I do not say they are—are the advantages arising out of the power development. Surely it must be the wish of members of parliament to see to it that when power is available in the country it should be developed because of the great benefits and advantages that will be derived not only by the people residing in the immediate area where the power will be developed but by the nation as a whole.

I think that the thinking of my hon. friend is that which existed in this country twenty-five or fifty years ago. But that thinking has changed today. From one part of Canada to the other, where there are power and navigational facilities that can be developed, I believe they should be developed. I do not think, as my hon. friend seems to believe, that this development will have the effect he thinks it will have upon the maritime provinces; because the arguments he used are exactly the same arguments which were used against the 14-foot draft canals on the St. Lawrence many years ago. In those days the railways were drastically opposed to the development of those canals because they said it would take traffic away from them. The point is that it has brought traffic to the railways and today you find both the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway of one mind on this development because unquestionably it cannot do anything else but bring great benefit to Canada.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to ask the minister one question. Can he tell me briefly what benefits the development of the St. Lawrence is going to bring to the maritime provinces, either from a power standpoint or in the development of any section of the maritimes?

Mr. Chevrier: The point my hon. friend was making was that we should not do this in central Canada because it would be detrimental to the maritime provinces. I am not admitting that it is detrimental to the maritime provinces. If my hon. friend states that it is, it would be for him to substantiate that assertion.

Mr. Gillis: The minister has not refuted anything I said.

Mr. Sinclair: It is good for all Canada.

Mr. Nowlan: Without necessarily associating myself completely with the hon. member for Cape Breton South in his statement that all thinking ceases at Montreal, I want to associate myself with him by saying that I believe that the development of the St. Lawrence waterway as a power-plus-navigation project would be extremely detrimental to the maritime provinces. I do not believe that the hon. member for Cape Breton South is speaking in the language of twenty-five years ago when he makes that statement. I think he is speaking in the language of today. I believe that is an opinion that is shared by all people of all parties in the maritimes. There are two phases to this problem. The minister has stressed the necessity for power development. With that I do not think anyone will quarrel. It is true that it will probably add to the industrial expansion of elephantine proportion that the central provinces are enjoying today, and that they will become more and more developed industrially, perhaps at some expense to the rest of Canada. But with that we cannot quarrel. If it is in the nature of events for the industrial development to be centred here because of the development of power, that is one thing. But I think that the situation is confused because, despite the statement of the minister and his emphasis on power, he will agree that the two were taken together and that any surveys which have been made and anything which has been done heretofore have been in contemplation of both navigation and power. If the minister would assure this committee that any development that will take place on the St. Lawrence will be that of power alone, without development of navigation, then at least I do not think we as Canadians can conscientiously oppose it, because what is for the good of part of Canada is probably good for the whole development. But there can be no question in the world that the development of navigation on the St. Lawrence, as contemplated by some of the idealists, would be extremely detrimental to the maritimes. You have the outports there which you used during the time of war—Halifax, Saint John and other eastern Canadian ports—which suffer enough today from lack of traffic and which would be prejudiced still more if this development should take place.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South suggested that there would be a migration of steel. I have here the exact statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He says that the St. Lawrence waterway must be built and that without this development the steel industry now centred on the great lakes will have to migrate to the Atlantic coast.

What a tragedy that would be! Just imagine, Mr. Chairman, the steel industry having to migrate to the Atlantic coast! Why, it would be a terrible thing, would it not? It would be a tragedy apparently beyond compare, in the minds of some people. I do not think it would be so devastating. No one of course suggests or believes that it would migrate to the coast. There still would be plenty of room for development of the steel industry on the great lakes. But certainly a healthy expansion of the steel industry on the Atlantic coast would be extremely desirable. I think any fair-minded Canadian would agree with that statement. I must say that I found people from Ontario, Quebec and all parts of Canada perfectly fair in their attitudes towards this matter, at least in their statements and in their thinking; although when it comes to a practical application of it, sometimes it does not work out in quite the same way. We have on the east coast the ore, the gypsum and the coal and there should be established a steel industry much larger than the one we have today, one which can enjoy export markets, which will provide a market for our agricultural products. We have the Atlantic ports which, as I say, will suffer because of this canal and which today offer us some market.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nowlan: Surely.

Mr. Chevrier: Will he say how the maritime provinces will suffer because of this development?

Mr. Nowlan: How?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Nowlan: Because I am sure it will prejudice shipments going through the ports of Halifax, Saint John, Sydney and other Canadian ports; because railway traffic would diminish. Therefore railway freight rates would be increased and traffic which we ship today in and out would pay heavier costs. It would prejudice the steel industry now situated in Sydney and would prevent the natural and proper expansion of that industry which would take place if it were not for the further development of this canal. As the hon. member for Cape Breton South said, certainly it is a strange coincidence that we have this impetus today on the development of the canal once you find the iron ore in Labrador. There can be little doubt but that there is some association between the two. The emphasis which is placed on that now and the haste with which it is considered has some relationship to the fact that this ore will now be taken to central Canadian points and on the great lakes rather than manufactured on the Atlantic coast.

An hon. Member: And to United States ports.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, and to United States ports, probably on the great lakes.

We have heard suggestions to the effect that this canal is essential to the development of our war effort. Let us not have that, Mr. Chairman. If this canal is essential to the development of the industrial life of Canada, that is one thing. But let us not camouflage it behind statements associating it with essentiality to our war effort. Any war effort that this country may make will be based on the sacrifice of the people and the desire to serve, as it has been in the past two wars, and will have no relationship whatsoever to the development of this canal.

As the minister knows, the transportation problems of the maritimes are extremely serious. We have the fact now that our long, attenuated Canadian National system, built because of apprehended war seventy-five years ago, is casting a heavier burden on transportation in the maritimes than it properly should cast. Certainly any taking away of traffic from it would simply add to that burden. If, as and when proper surveys are made, and it is determined that this project must go ahead, I suggest that there should be a division between the navigation and the power development, that we should be given the information as to what would be the cost of the potential power developments on the river and what would be—and of course this is easily available, I presume—the power development. I am sure that could be proven to be economically feasible. I should also like to know what would be the additional cost of providing navigation facilities necessary for modern traffic and what would be the potential traffic using those facilities. When that information is available, this committee would then be in a position to pass some independent judgment on the matter. It is all right for the minister to say that this is five years in contemplation. It is nothing of the kind. We are voting now an estimate of $10,000 for preliminary surveys and we are at least to some extent approving of the principle of at least investigating it. Let us investigate, Mr. Chairman. Let us have it clearly understood in this house that before any investigations are summarized, before any judgments are passed thereon, the whole matter will be considered by a competent committee of this house and a decision arrived at on the basis of the national benefit to this country, and not of any sectional advantage which may develop therefrom.

Mr. Chevrier: I think perhaps I might again call the attention of the committee and of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken to the fact that he is under an entire misapprehension as to what we are voting at the moment. He seems to be of the opinion that we are voting on the St. Lawrence seaway project. We are not. He has turned his whole argument in that direction.

In so far as the project itself is concerned, if the hon. member wants a breakdown of the cost and the traffic, that is easily available in the department, and I shall be glad to let him have that information if he so desires.

Mr. Nowlan: I would appreciate it.

Mr. Chevrier: But I should like to draw one or two things to his attention. First of all, he has been in this house before and this item has been up for at least five years. The sum of $10,000 has been voted for these surveys, and I have never heard him make any objection to this item, certainly not the vehement objection which he makes to it today.

Mr. Nowlan: If I may interrupt, I was here only once before, and the house dissolved so quickly that we did not vote these items, and that is why I did not have a chance to speak on it.

Mr. Chevrier: I remember that on one occasion during the consideration of my estimates, and at the very time that these items were up for discussion, my hon. friend spoke at great length on the Maritime Freight Rates Act. While he may have been here for a short time, I do know that he has not discussed it before. So that there will be no misunderstanding about it, let me assure him that the party of which he is a member has been strongly in favour of this project, and the government headed by the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett signed a treaty with the United States approving it. We are not discussing the treaty, and neither are we discussing the terms or the project. What we are doing is considering an item of $10,000 for ship canal surveys.

My hon. friend says that it is not essential for defence, and laughs it off as if it were more or less a farce. Well, the joint board of defence, composed of both Americans and Canadians, have decided in their formal meetings that the development of the St. Lawrence waterway is essential for the defence of this country. A former president of the United States has so stated, and so has the present President of the United States. The joint board of defence has declared that not only is it essential for the defence of this continent, but also it is essential from the point of view of the economy, and it is also essential from the point of view of power, because when there is in this country a province whose people state that unless they have power within the next four or five years they will have to close down, or at least curtail power facilities, and by inference industrial advantages to that province, I do not think that any parliament can refuse to take cognizance of that fact. That is the case not only with reference to one province, but it is so with reference to two provinces where power shortage is acute. All of these surveys that have been made indicate clearly that this project is essential from the point of view of defence, from the point of view of economy, and from the point of view of power. But, Mr. Chairman, I should like to get back to the purpose of this vote, which after all is the small amount of $10,000 for the purpose of making surveys and investigations. After all, the United States is spending at least a million dollars for this very matter, for which we have in our estimates the small sum of $10,000. I do not know how it is that we got off on the discussion of a project which is in no way before the committee under this item. If hon. members want to debate the question of the advisability of making the surveys, that is another matter altogether, but that in fact is what the item is about.

Mr. Green: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The minister has mentioned several times that we are not in order in discussing the St. Lawrence seaway, but I would like to point out to him that this item has to do with the St. Lawrence canal system, and I submit that we are perfectly in order in discussing the proposed changes in this system. There is no rule of the house that would prevent us from discussing it on this particular item.

The Chairman: No ruling has been made.

Mr. Coldwell: I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I think the minister would be ill advised to endeavour to get the Chair to rule that this matter should not be discussed now that it has been opened for discussion. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has said, it does provide the small amount of $10,000 for expenses in connection with the St. Lawrence ship canal surveys and investigations. It seems to me that that is what we are discussing.

I think the discussion this afternoon illustrates very clearly how difficult it is sometimes to reconcile various conflicting regional interests in this country. The hon. member for Annapolis-Kings said a few moments ago that if this were purely a power development plan, that would put a different complexion on it. But those of us who come from the prairie provinces are interested in this particular project, not only from the point of view of power, which we recognize as very important to central Canada, but also from the point of view of shipping. We realize that the ports at the head of the lakes would become ocean ports, that ships that carry grain would be able to pass right from the doorstep, almost, of the grain producing areas of Canada across the ocean, without the transshipment of grain that is now essential, and we believe that should be an economic gain to our part of Canada. And so you see that these considerations very largely cross parties and more or less compel consideration of the problem, I hope, not from each of our sectional points of view, but from the economic welfare of the whole of Canada.

I do not think that we can stop the wheels of progress turning and moving forward. I think that a project of this description has to be considered from the point of view of what will ultimately benefit the whole of Canada. It is true that the great Ungava fields now being developed for iron ore may, I regret to say, see most of that ore shipped to the United States. If I read the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce aright the other day, when he spoke of the movement of the steel plants from the great lakes to the maritime coast, I do not think he was thinking of the maritime coast of Canada. I think he was thinking of moving these plants to the maritime coast of the United States.

Mr. Chevrier: Quite.

Mr. Coldwell: As a matter of fact, there are projects I think in New London, Connecticut, and in other places on the maritime coast of the United States for the establishment of huge steel mills there.

To my mind what we should have done years ago was to have laid out a national plan for the development of our economic resources so that our iron ore and other minerals, our gypsum and other resources, could have been fabricated in Canada, rather than exporting much of this raw material, as we have been doing, to the United States for a large number of years. But while governments may be to blame for that to some extent, let us not forget that Canadians who had the money and the power to undertake these projects are also blameworthy. If Canadian capital had been alive to the advantages that could accrue to it from the development of these resources, I do not think we would be discussing some of these problems in the manner in which they have been discussed this afternoon.

I do not think you can stand in the way of progress. I think that while every attempt must be made to assist the maritime region—the whole region, not only Nova Scotia or Cape Breton or New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island or Newfoundland separately—this government should be placing before the house projects and plans for the development of the whole of the maritime area. Then perhaps we should not be thinking in the terms in which the hon. members for Cape Breton South and Annapolis-Kings are bound to think this afternoon.

I do not blame them for thinking the way they were thinking. They think very much as we do in the prairie provinces, that we have not industries there that we should have. I want to see industries established on the prairies; I want to see our water power and irrigation projects developed there. I want to see the Saskatchewan river used, and the waters contained therein. I want to see a larger estimate than we have in the estimates this year for those things. I want to see the Outlook dam proceeded with, not only for irrigation but for power.

But all those projects are projects in the interests of all of Canada; because if we build up the economy of one part of Canada we shall indeed be assisting the economy of all parts of Canada. I agree that before we undertake the vast expenditures which are to be made in connection with this project—and the survey is a small thing—the matter must be gone into thoroughly by the house.

I was here some years ago when the agreement with the United States was discussed. I remember distinctly the discussion that took place at that time. I remember that all parties in the house, including opposition parties, were favourable to the development. Let us not forget that since the canals system of Canada was started many years ago or, shall I say, was developed—the Welland canal for example—we have built a large part of our share of that ship canal system. We have already a very large investment in the project.

While I have every sympathy—and of course this is an easy thing to say—with what has been said by the maritime members, yet from the point of view of the whole country I believe Canada would be wise to consider the pressing of this matter with the United States, so that we may have the power, so that we may have shipping facilities, and so that this country may make great progress as a modern and progressive nation should make progress.

Mr. Fulford: Mr. Chairman, for once I am glad to be able to agree with everything the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said. Representing as I do a constituency on the upper reaches of the St. Lawrence river, this matter of a St. Lawrence seaway has been uppermost in our minds for many years. I remember as a small boy hearing about it.

So when an hon. member from Nova Scotia says that the item today is for a preliminary survey, I wish to bring him up to date. I remember well when in 1927 a complete survey was being made under the Canadian chairmanship of the late General Charles Mitchell, then head of the school of practical science at the university of Toronto. I remember the fact that at that time he was working in closest co-operation with the United States army engineers. I believe it was from those surveys it was decided that the Barnhart island dam should be provided for the international section of the St. Lawrence system.

Nothing could more definitely typify the great waste of a great natural resource God has given Canada than to see the mighty waters of the St. Lawrence river flowing by our doors every second of each day, for 365 days in the year.

Mr. Wylie: We also have water going by our doors, in the South Saskatchewan river, that is going to waste.

Mr. Fulford: Can you produce 1,100,000 horsepower of electrical energy at one place out in western Canada? Can you produce that out west? In the county of Leeds we will not benefit materially from the navigation end of the St. Lawrence seaway, but we will benefit tremendously from power development. We hope we are looking at this matter in a broader sense than that of just looking after our own interests. We realize that in bringing shipping of the world up to the head of the great lakes it would be of great advantage to this great dominion of ours. Every farmer in the west stands to benefit from it through lowered freight rates. The manufacturers in the east will also benefit. There is hardly a class or a community in Canada that will not benefit materially.

I have always believed in the old adage that what is good for the whole is good for any one part. I cannot see how the argument we have just heard from the maritime provinces is valid. They say that they fear they will lose their shipping. They will still get the shipping they get now during four months of the year—and that is a virtual monopoly and will continue to get it anyway, when the ports are closed on the St. Lawrence. No system has been devised of keeping the great lakes ports open twelve months of the year.

Then, the great ore deposits in Labrador and northeastern Quebec cannot be properly developed and utilized until the great smelters along the great lakes are utilized to the full, through the ore that will come from that section. We need only think of the tremendous amount of $360 million invested in a railway to bring ore from the fields to Seven Islands harbour.

If we can believe what geologists tell us, the development in that Labrador and northeastern Quebec section represents the greatest iron ore find of the ages. Certainly Seven Islands harbour is much nearer Glace Bay and other ports of Nova Scotia than it is to any port on the great lakes. Naturally all the ore that will be necessary will find its way there, to Nova Scotia. Then, added to that, this vast ore body will be supplying smelters on the great lakes.

In spite of the evidence being given in the United States congress I am told on reliable authority that good grade iron ore is running out in the United States. We know the end is in sight in the great Minnesota Mesabi range. Is it conceivable that a great plan like this can be held up in Canada? We at present are seeing the actions of certain vested interests in our neighbour to the south of us, and I am afraid that some of the arguments I heard this afternoon in the committee sounded very much like the argument we hear to the south of us, in the capital of the great United States of America.

Mr. McCulloch: The maritime provinces have shipped all the year round from Halifax.

Mr. Fulford: I shall clarify what I meant. I meant to say that there will be four months of the year in which the maritime provinces will have exclusive shipping.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): In British Columbia we would have twelve months.

Mr. Fulford: I do not think British Columbia has anything to fear from the St. Lawrence deep waterways. Indeed, that province has everything to gain from it. I would plead therefore with the minister, in as strong language as I can use, that every conceivable consideration be given immediately, as a result of these surveys, and that through our Department of External Affairs strong representations be made to United States authorities to see that this long-kicked-about football is taken out of the realm of petty politics and placed where it should be placed, for the betterment and well-being of the Dominion of Canada and the United States.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, apparently quite a debate is developing on this item. As some maritime members have made a few remarks, I should like to point out that this proposition is causing considerable worry in the maritime provinces. The hon. member who has just resumed his seat has stated that the St. Lawrence waterway must be completed. I do not take issue with that, but I should like to point out the position in which the maritime provinces are placed.

It has been mentioned during the debate that ore can be carried from Labrador through the St. Lawrence seaway to the head of the lakes. I understand at the present time we are importing considerable steel from the United States. Where steel is manufactured in the central parts of Canada the necessary coal must be imported from the United States. I have always understood that the closer together you can get your ore and coal, the cheaper you can manufacture steel.

We have in the maritime provinces coal of a quality suitable for the manufacture of steel, and the iron ore is available for transportation by water, which transportation can be used twelve months in the year. Our coal cannot find a market any further west than Montreal. It seems logical to the maritime provinces that the ore available there should be manufactured into steel in the maritime provinces. If this ore is taken to the head of the lakes and manufactured into steel in the United States, that steel will be imported back into Canada at a cost 25 per cent greater than it could be manufactured here. It is not easy to explain this issue in the maritime provinces.

Mention has been made of the power development. Any power that has been developed in my province has been developed by the people of New Brunswick, not by the federal government. I do not see how I can go back to the maritime provinces and justify assistance by the federal government for the development of power in the central provinces. I feel that those provinces are in a much better financial position to develop their own power than we are in New Brunswick.

There is a possible power development in my own county, the Passamaquoddy development, which has been under discussion for about twenty years. There does not seem to be the same interest taken in that power development as is taken in the St. Lawrence, and I wonder why. This is a tidal development and there would be no danger of drought or floods, no valuable property would be flooded and therefore no damages would have to be paid. This power development has a potential capacity of over one million horsepower, as great as the potential capacity of the St. Lawrence power development.

When consideration is given to the coal and the facilities for the manufacture of steel that we have, to the population available, which in many cases has had to leave in order to get work in other parts of Canada, I think it will be seen that it is time that serious consideration was given to that part of Canada. I am sure that the arguments that have been used by hon. members from the maritime provinces will meet with the approval of the people down there.

I want to go on record as supporting anything of a general nature that will benefit all Canada, but I do feel that other parts of the country should receive the same consideration. With this ore available I believe that the logical place to manufacture it into steel is the maritime provinces. It is much cheaper to transport a finished product than it is to transport raw material. The materials and the manufacturing know-how are available there and I feel that the maritime provinces are perfectly justified in asking that this industry should be established in that part of Canada.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two on this subject which seems to have caused so much controversy among the members of the house. They appear to be divided according to the part of the country in which they live, and I think that is deplorable. I am in favour of the development of the St. Lawrence project in both its power and transportation aspects.

I do not believe that the government under whose authority this development will take place will allow the development to adversely affect any other part of Canada. Surely that is not the way the development of Canada should be visualized. It is unthinkable that this addition to the wealth of Canada should be allowed to militate against either the maritime provinces or British Columbia. That can not happen if we have a government that is thinking in terms of Canada and not in terms of local areas and certain vested interests in those areas. That is the way in which this great national development must be approached.

I do not think the plight of the maritime provinces could be any worse than it is now no matter what development takes place in other parts of Canada. I think those maritime members who oppose the development of the St. Lawrence project are standing in their own light when they argue that it would be detrimental to the interests of the maritime provinces. The members on the government side who take that position surely must have little faith in the government they support. If I had so little faith in a government I would not support it at all because it would not be worthy of support

It seems to me that that is a fundamental principle. This parliament is dealing with the affairs of Canada and we must have in mind the welfare of the Canadian people, no matter in what part of the country they reside. We should not permit favourable circumstances in one part of the country to improve the position only of those who live in that section of the country. What would one think of parents who would promote the interests of one member of the family in such a way as to hurt the interests of the other members? You would think they were mighty poor parents, would you not? I would say this is a mighty poor government if, by promoting the development of one part of Canada, it would allow another part to be impoverished. I hope that the government will go ahead with this project in conjunction with the government of the United States, and that it does so with all speed. In the same way I hope that the government will see to it that neither the maritime provinces on the east nor the maritime province on the west are any worse off, and not only no worse off but possibly much better because this development has taken place in central Canada and because of this great addition to the wealth of our country.

Mr. Richard (Gloucester): As a member from New Brunswick, one of the maritime provinces, I am not opposed to the St. Lawrence waterway development. I think that the whole of Canada will receive some benefit from it. No doubt it will have some repercussions on our international trade so far as the eastern Canada seaboard ports are concerned. I do not share the same view as some others that the mining development of Labrador should be concentrated so that we might become an exporting country in the finished steel product. I suppose we produce about two-thirds of the steel we consume in Canada today, if I am not mistaken as to my figures. Through the development of Labrador we might reach a point where we could produce sufficient in Canada to satisfy our own needs and become an exporting country, but I wish to point out, following the idea of the last speaker, that when it comes to handing out public funds for the development of these great resources we in New Brunswick would say: Please pass the dish around a little so that we may have a helping too.

Mr. Carroll: I did not know the question of the St. Lawrence waterway was likely to come up under the present item. If I had known, there is a good deal of material that I might have placed before the house on the question of the St. Lawrence waterway. About all I want to say at the present time is that I am not against the St. Lawrence waterway having regard to the conditions under which it has been inaugurated, and the conditions which have been made known to this country in the last four or five years. Twenty years ago, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South said, the mining and steel industries of Nova Scotia were against the inauguration of the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway extending across the United States border. The reason was that they thought their coal could not compete with United States coal. I have had a little experience in this matter.

Some years ago I acted on a commission. At that time the officials of the Dominion Coal Company raised the question of the St. Lawrence waterway. They advanced arguments against the deepening and construction of the St. Lawrence waterway, especially across the United States border. I told them at that time that we would have to give the matter much more consideration, that we did not know enough about it, and that perhaps it was not within the terms of reference. Lo and behold, however, we had meetings with the United States coal operators. The coal that comes into Canada comes mostly from West Virginia and Pennsylvania, and West Virginia and Pennsylvania will not be tapped by the St. Lawrence waterway. The coal operators in the United States came before our commission and were absolutely against the St. Lawrence waterway for the reason that if it were built they could not compete with Nova Scotia coal.

When our friends in the Nova Scotia coal industry heard this argument they changed front and began to see the light as they should have seen it years ago. Coal export from the maritime provinces to the central provinces of Canada takes place in large quantity during the summer months up the St. Lawrence river to Montreal and farther west. With the aid of certain subventions and tariff protection, plus the fact that the rates were very cheap some years ago, they were practically able to compete with coal coming from the United States. Therefore, so far as the coal industry of Nova Scotia is concerned, the St. Lawrence waterway is going to permit them to ship their coal farther west than they do at the present time. The large barges that leave Sydney, Glace bay, Pictou or the other mining places from which coal is shipped, will have a greater opportunity to go farther inland, and therefore will be able to compete with United States coal more successfully than they can at the present time.

With respect to some of the inland mines, the situation may be a little different but they will ship no less coal in the wintertime than they will when the St. Lawrence is open because practically all their shipments of coal are by rail from Springhill and certain other mines. I have nothing to say about the shipment of steel. It has always been thought also that the deepening and extension of the St. Lawrence waterway would injure shipping in the port of Halifax. The other day I put a question on the order paper as to how many bushels or tons of wheat are shipped overseas from Halifax in the summer months when the St. Lawrence is open and how many are shipped in the winter months when it is closed to navigation. The amount of wheat shipped overseas from Halifax at the present time in the summer months is practically negligible. The great bulk is shipped in the winter months when the St. Lawrence is closed. Wheat that is shipped from Halifax in the summer months is mostly taken on as ballast by ships coming in there, and is not generally loaded there by ships coming to this country for wheat.

With regard to the shipment of steel from Sydney, as a matter of fact most of that goes by rail because that is the best way to ship it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member who said that we should approach matters of this kind from the Canadian viewpoint. I am from Cape Breton, and you can call me a maritimer if you like. I agree with everything that gentleman has said, except that we are in a sorry mess down in our part of the country. I want to tell this house that we are as well off in the parts of Nova Scotia with which I am acquainted as the people in any part of this country. We are making as good a living and we are, I hope, living as good lives as most of the other people. We have a good standard of living. I am not saying anything about the maritimes, because I do not know enough about them to ascertain whether or not they are in a sorry plight.

I do not know whether or not this subject should be mentioned now, although I intended mentioning it at some time, but it seems some mention has been made of the iron ore from Labrador. Someone has said that we do not do any thinking in our country east of Montreal. I have been giving this subject of the Labrador iron ore some thought. From the Department of Transport I obtained a map and a plan of that part of the country, including Labrador, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and the St. Lawrence river. I have not that map before me, but I should like to put on the record some facts concerning the distances from the source of this ore to various places in Canada and the United States. The distance between the source of this ore and the strait of Canso is very short. I have a proposition to make, not to the Minister of Transport but to the minister who is looking after the industries of this country today. I would ask him to consider the possibility of establishing a steel industry on the shores of the strait of Canso. We have a harbour to the south which is open in the wintertime, and as good a harbour to the north as there is on the Atlantic coast. The iron ore could be brought in, and we have the finest coal available right there for the making of steel. We have the tremendous deposits of the Dominion Steel Corporation, who are making steel now. It would not interfere one iota with the production of the Dominion Steel Company or any other company we have in this country.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member must realize he is getting rather far afield.

Mr. Carroll: I did say that, but this question was brought up by other hon. members in this house who were allowed to continue. I said that I had not intended going into this question, and as a matter of fact I was going to object when this debate started. I did not think this was the proper place to talk about the St. Lawrence waterway. However, the St. Lawrence waterway and this iron ore in Labrador were tied together. One objection to the St. Lawrence waterway was that we were not going to be able to utilize our own iron ore from Labrador in the province of Nova Scotia.

The Deputy Chairman: Since the hon. member has provided this explanation, he may continue. I thought the discussion of the St. Lawrence waterway had been permitted as incidental to the matter under discussion. When the hon. member began discussing the coal industry generally, I thought he was getting rather far afield.

Mr. Carroll: One objection to the St. Lawrence waterway was that it was going to interfere with our coal industry in the maritime provinces. I am not answering that objection, but I am putting forth my own views. I know something about this subject, because I made some study of it, not yesterday or the day before but some years ago. I hope that the minister in charge of production will read my remarks in Hansard tomorrow. I was going to speak on this subject during the budget debate, but I did not want to let this opportunity pass without showing that the people of this country are thinking about the maritime provinces. They are thinking of ways and means by which the iron ore from Labrador may be utilized right on the island of Cape Breton.

I am not asking that this be a government undertaking, Mr. Chairman. Today there is a large amount of capital in Great Britain and the United States. The steel industry was taken away from the industrialists in Great Britain, and I understand a large amount of that capital would be available for investment in the steel industry in this country. There is something to which the good minister might give his attention. We are not looking to the government to build this industry. Governments have been building too many things in this country. The people have been too lazy to look around, or else they did not have enough vision to look after this industrialization.

Mr. Chairman, when the manufacture of steel was first started in this country by the Steel Company of Canada and the Dominion Steel Company, the government gave them assistance in the form of a bounty on steel rods that were to be used in the manufacture of other products in Canada. This bounty was continued until 1910 when Mr. Fielding eliminated it. The steel companies have received other forms of assistance, but all I would ask is for the minister to put this picture before some of the moneyed people in the United States, Great Britain or Canada.

Again I suppose it is not according to common sense or the rules of the house to say anything here about the strait of Canso. Whether the causeway—and that is what should be built—is built across the strait of Canso or not, this problem about which I am talking is absolutely feasible. If the causeway were built, it would mean a better harbour at that point. I should like to say again that we have free and easy access by water from the strait of Canso to Belle Isle. We have easy transportation from the strait of Canso to any part of the world. Of course I am going to take this matter up further with the good minister but I thought at this stage, when people are saying that there is no thinking about it, and that nothing is being thought about Nova Scotia, I should point out that, whether their ideas are right or not or whether they have any common sense behind them or not, there are in this chamber some people who are thinking about our own people in our own country down there.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not want to add anything to what I have already said on this subject, but I want to make a brief reply to the exception that the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond took to my remarks with regard to economic conditions in the maritimes.

Mr. Carroll: I did not say anything about the maritime provinces. I was referring to the place I know about, the island of Cape Breton.

[Mr. Carroll.]

Mr. MacInnis: I was not quite as parochial as the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond. I included the whole of the maritimes; and I am not speaking from hearsay. As the hon. gentleman may know, I had the honour and the good fortune to be born in the maritime provinces. I left my home in Prince Edward Island, the most beautiful of the maritime provinces, and sought my livelihood in other parts of this great country. If my leaving the maritimes were just an isolated case that would not prove anything. But for the last seventy-five years at least the great majority of the boys and girls born in those provinces have left them and have added their wealth of brain and brawn not only to other parts of this Canada of ours but to the United States as well,—of course to the great advantage of those other parts of Canada and to the United States. There can be no doubt that the maritime provinces have suffered in their economic development because of the concentration of business in the two central provinces.

Mr. Blackmore: I just wish to say that the sooner the St. Lawrence project can be finished, the better we shall be pleased. As to this small item, I hope that we may pass it as soon as we may after giving everyone a chance to express any views that he may wish to express. I believe that what helps one part of Canada must help all of Canada. I have no objection to helping my good friends in Quebec and Ontario to develop their provinces into a more powerful area. I think that is entirely in the best interests of Alberta.

Mr. Wylie: I had not intended taking part in this debate at all, and I would not do so had it not been for one or two remarks made by the hon. member for Leeds. I agree with the minister that this is not the proper place to discuss these waterways. However, the hon. member for Leeds said that he saw a great deal of water going to waste down the St. Lawrence river every day. I wish the hon. member would come out west. We in the southern part of Alberta could show him a great deal of water that has been going to waste for years. We could have used that water. I believe that any water that goes to the sea without being used is a public waste. We could have used plenty of that water around the Medicine Hat area perhaps, as the hon. member for Leeds has said.

Mr. Fulford: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, may I say that if the hon. member had been in the house the other night when I was speaking about the $65 million payment to the western farmers, he would know that I mentioned that very point; I said that money should be used on the development of the waters of the west.

Mr. Wylie: I am glad the hon. member raised that point about the $65 million to the western farmers because he is one member who voted against that and he spoke against it too, if my memory serves me correctly.

Mr. Gibson: That is because it was a handout.

Mr. Wylie: I imagine that if the hon. member for Comox-Alberni who has just interrupted could ship some logs down the St. Lawrence waterways free, he would be quite in agreement with it.

Mr. Gibson: I would pay whatever the tariff was.

Mr. Wylie: That is good. However, I think that the development of this project would assist in the development of all of Canada. I am sure that every western member would want to see the development of this project, and I am sure it will have our support.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister once again whether he will give consideration to having this question studied by the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines?

Mr. Chevrier: What question?

Mr. Green: Particularly just what the effect of the seaway would be on our transportation system. As he will have seen from the discussion this afternoon, there is intense interest in the whole subject. One does not often see a debate flare up as has the debate this afternoon. There is no doubt that one of these days this question will be coming before the house, perhaps in great haste. I think the reasonable thing to do is to have the question considered by the standing committee of the house so that we would at least get a background of information. We could hear representations from the various people who are interested, and in that way it would be far more likely that the house would eventually reach the best conclusion having regard to the interests of Canada. As a matter of fact, in that way we may prevent the hard feelings and controversy that would follow for many years if the scheme were put through in a rush, without consideration of that type being given to it.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know what it is that I could refer to a committee, whether it be the railways and shipping committee or the railways, canals and telegraph lines committee. Certainly it is not anything that is under this item. I would not be disposed to refer to a committee the subject matter of this discussion because it is not before the house. When the subject is before the house, I am sure the house will want to have it studied by a committee such as the one my hon. friend has in mind. If the project is approved by the United States congress, then of necessity it must come before the House of Commons, where it will be submitted to a committee. If it is not approved, then this government will have to indicate what its policy is.

Mr. Green: I had in mind a study of the impact of the St. Lawrence seaway on the transportation system of Canada. I think that sums up the thought I had in mind.

Item agreed to.

Marine services—

476. Marine services administration, including agencies, $513,944.

Mr. Pearkes: May I draw the attention of the minister to a situation which has occurred on the west coast since the introduction of the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act providing additional means for the safety of life at sea. At the time I called attention to the danger of the curtailment of services to some of the smaller islands lying between Vancouver island and the mainland. I regret to say that my forecast has proved to be only too accurate and that there has been a considerable curtailment of the steamship services between Vancouver island and the gulf islands, and between the mainland of British Columbia, from the port of Vancouver, and those same gulf islands, a situation which is causing considerable hardship upon the residents of those small islands. It has been necessary for the Canadian Pacific Railway to take off one of their older ships and to curtail their services because it would not justify that company to go to the expense of remodelling the ship. Actually, the service between the gulf islands and Vancouver island and the mainland is totally inadequate and is less today than it has been for the last sixty years. If this condition has not been brought before the minister's department I would appreciate it very much if it might be looked into to see whether something could be done to assist in the provision of a better service for the gulf islands.

Mr. Chevrier: The subject to which my hon. friend refers was brought to my attention by a delegation from one of the operating companies affected. They had been in communication with the maritime commission on the matter of the service, and they indicated to me, and to the commission I believe, that unless they received a subsidy they would have to curtail their services in the northern part of the run. All I could indicate to them at the time when they did come—the decision of the maritime commission had not yet been handed down—was that I would pass along to the commission their representations, because the commission is charged with the responsibility of deciding whether or not a subsidy is warranted. In view of what my hon. friend has said, if the commission had not yet handed down their decision, I shall see that his observations are brought to their attention.

Mr. Pearkes: Thank you very much.

Item agreed to.

479. Construction or acquisition of vessels, as detailed in the estimates—capital, $2,254,800.

Mr. Pearkes: Can we get a little information about this item? In the past there has been a good deal of discussion regarding the provision of a coastguard service. During the last year we have seen very definite steps taken in the direction of co-ordinating the existing services. I should like to express my appreciation, on behalf of the people of the west coast of British Columbia, for the services which have been rendered during the last year, and which have been more effective owing to the co-ordination which has taken place. I understand that provision is being made to extend the service still further. Is that correct?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. First of all, the matter is no longer under my jurisdiction. Up until last year it was; but now, because of the recommendation of the commission, it is no longer my responsibility. It is the responsibility of the Minister of National Defence.

I am very happy to hear my hon. friend speak thus, because his colleague from Annapolis-Kings spoke very strongly last night about the lack of a coastguard service. I wish the hon. member for Nanaimo would indicate to the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings what the position is on the west coast.

Mr. Pearkes: I do not know anything about the east coast.

Mr. Chevrier: What he does know—and I thank him for having said so—is that because of the co-ordination of services which was instituted last year, a new service has been established under the aegis of the Royal Canadian Air Force, namely, the search and rescue division. That division will co-ordinate all of the ships in all of the departments, together with national defence vessels, and ships privately operated. I have a detailed statement here of the instructions that have gone out to each of the departments and to each of the agencies concerned, so that there will be complete co-operation.

I think my hon. friend deserves some credit for the interest which he has taken in this in the last few years, and we have given careful consideration to the representations which came to us from the west coast, as well as to the statements which he made from time to time in the house. I would be glad to show him this statement. It is rather lengthy to put on record, but it certainly would indicate to him the attention which the interdepartmental committee on search and rescue gave to this very vital problem.

Mr. Catherwood: Just one question on that: does that coastguard service apply to inland lakes as well?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it does, because one of the stations designated in the plan is at Trenton. Therefore it has to do with casualties and ships in distress on the lakes as well. May I answer the questions that my hon. friend asked some time ago in connection with the Rideau canal. He inquired as to the number of boats that passed through the locks of the Rideau canal. I have not the figures for 1950, but the total for 1949 is 18,472. Then he inquired as to the total amount of revenue on the Welland canal. It is $715,402. The total amount of the Rideau canal is $21,690. Then he asked for the breakdown in each case. In the latter it is $8,358 for land; $2,347 for water power; $4,521 for private line service; $2,885 living quarters and $110 for winterizing. Other revenue which is not broken down is $3,467. I think that makes the total.

Mr. Nowlan: Has the minister available there the list of ships to which he made reference this afternoon, and also last night, which would co-ordinate within this service? I am talking about the ships under his department. I know he has that, and possibly he has them for the other departments as well.

Mr. Chevrier: All the ships under my department, and there are some fifty, are subject to call, no matter where they may be, by direction from the R.C.A.F. or the search and rescue co-ordination division, and all of the ships of the other departments of the government, such as those of the mounted police, the fishing vessels of the Department of Fisheries, and I think the hydrographic service, and all naval vessels. They are subject to the same call as are our own vessels. That makes a substantial total which I have not at my fingertips, but it is quite a considerable number.

Mr. Nowlan: Of the fifty, how many are on the east coast? Can the minister give us that information?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. I will get it in a moment. Can we go on, and I shall let the hon. member have it?

Item agreed to.

Aids to navigation—

480. Administration, operation and maintenance, $4,215,904.

Mr. Green: There is quite a substantial increase on this item. Can the minister explain the reason for it?

Mr. Chevrier: This item is now a consolidation of the former item bearing the same name, plus the maintenance and repairs to wharves and the breaking of ice in Thunder bay, in accordance with a new policy in treasury board where a division of capital and maintenance and operation are now given to the house in two votes. That is the reason why one finds these two votes here.

The reason for the increase is that there have been increases in salaries and wages. Of the $199,644 increase, $152,650 is for increases in salaries and wages, and the other main item to make up the $199,000 is one of $36,400, an increase in the cost of materials and supplies.

Mr. Dickey: I should like to say a word on this item about aids to navigation.

Mr. Chevrier: May I be permitted to answer the question of the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings? There are seven ships at the Dartmouth agency, two at the Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, agency, and three at the Saint John, New Brunswick, agency. That makes twelve ships.

Mr. Dickey: This item of aids to navigation is of great interest not only to mariners, properly so-called, but to the fishermen who gain their livelihood by fishing along the shores of the Atlantic coast. From time to time we receive from the fishermen suggestions as to improvements which can be made to the inshore markers, buoys and lights, which they believe are necessary for the safety of their operations.

It has been my experience that the co-operation and interest of the officials of the department who deal with this particular matter have been of the highest order. Apparently they realize the importance of the matter to these fishermen, and in every instance they try to deal in a helpful manner with any suggestions made.

I notice that this item shows a small increase. However, it has been my experience already this year that suggestions which have been made with respect to possible improvements in aids to navigation have been met with the suggestion that the necessity for economy in departmental operations makes it difficult to give consideration to these matters, as has been possible in many instances before.

I know we are all interested in the practising of economy and we would hope that the ordinary expenditure in the Department of Transport and all other departments might be reasonably curtailed. However, I would impress upon the minister and the committee the false economy that would result from any unreasonable cutting down in aids to navigation which are useful to fishermen. The safety of the men who carry out these arduous and dangerous tasks is of great importance, and I hope it will be possible to practise economy without in any way jeopardizing the essential requirements of the fishermen.

I know the minister will give this matter his close attention and I know from past experience that his officials, whose hearts are in the right place, will give every possible consideration to the needs of the men who go down to the sea in ships.

Mr. Pearkes: If this is the item under which we may deal with the operation of wharves it would be the appropriate time to make some observations concerning the Nanaimo assembly wharf.

Mr. Chevrier: There is a later item dealing with wharves.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to subscribe to what has been said by the hon. member for Halifax. I would bring to the minister's attention now a certain matter which would be before him for his consideration. In the bay of Fundy on the Nova Scotia coast extending, so I am told, all the way from Digby up to Spencer island in Minas basin there are no audible warnings or aids to navigation of any kind. In the event of fog it is impossible for shipping or fishing boats to take bearings, and it has been urged upon me that a whistle buoy of some sort should be placed upon those waters along that coast. It has been suggested this could be done most advantageously at Hall harbour, where there is a tidal rip, and where this buoy would be actuated at all times.

I do not know what the cost of such an installation would be, but I do not think it would be a major matter and I know it is something of great importance to all the fishermen who are operating small boats off the coast, as well as to tugboats servicing lumber boats. I would ask the minister to give this matter his attention.

Mr. Chevrier: I have asked my officers to look into it.

Marine services—

483. Operation and maintenance, including grants and contributions, as detailed in the estimates: rewards for saving life from vessels in distress; subsidies to salvage companies, and the payment of expenses, including excepted expenses, incurred in respect of Canadian distressed seamen as defined in section 296 of the Canada Shipping Act, $390,591.

Mr. Green: At the last session there was considerable discussion as to whether there should be a full-time radio operator on ships plying the west coast. At that time the minister said the whole question would be reviewed by his department before the next session of the house. I presume that has been done. We had reports last December of on-the-spot surveys having been made of the whole question. Can the minister tell us the result of those surveys, and whether the department has reached any conclusion?

Mr. Chevrier: A survey has been made, but I have not yet had an opportunity to see the result of it. I have discussed some of the suggestions which came while the survey was in progress, but I have not yet had before me the complete report. Until that time I would rather withhold my comments.

Mr. Green: Could the minister make an announcement in the matter within a reasonably short time?

Mr. Chevrier: I certainly will be able to reach a conclusion before the session ends, and will indicate in some way or other what the decision is.

Mr. Gibson: Is this the item under which we discuss lifeboat services?

Mr. Chevrier: No; there is an item later in the estimates.

Item agreed to.

Marine services—

484. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $21,500.

Mr. Pearkes: I believe this would be the proper item under which to deal with the assembly wharf. I believe it was in 1933 that the wharf in Nanaimo was first built. It was then recommended that it should handle somewhere in the neighbourhood of 7,500,000 feet, but construction was never completed, so that at the present time it can handle only something less than 4 million feet. There are about twenty-two mills in the immediate neighbourhood, and there is at the present time a great demand for the full production of those mills.

The present situation however is that the capacity of the assembly wharf cannot take care of the production in the area. I am informed that if the wharf were extended so that two vessels could berth at the same time the capacity would be increased four or five times the present amount. I know representations have been made to the government respecting the possibility of that extension. I understand however that the wharf is operated by the Johnston National Storage Company, either on lease or on some such terms. Would the minister state what those terms are, and whether the government receives more returns if a greater quantity of lumber is handled over the wharf?

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I cannot help my hon. friend much because in the Department of Transport we have nothing to do with the construction or repair of wharves. The construction and repairs of wharves are carried out by the Department of Public Works. We do have a small item of $5,000 for repairs to wharves of less than $50. The matter has probably been brought to the attention of the Minister of Public Works but if not I shall see that it is.

Mr. Pearkes: Can the minister indicate the terms under which the Johnston National Storage Company operate that wharf?

Mr. Chevrier: When the repairs are done or a wharf is constructed then it becomes part of our job to charge fees and the like. I am not familiar with the terms, but there probably is an agreement with the Johnston people and I will inquire what they are.

Mr. Pearkes: I should like to know whether there will be a greater return to the government if a greater volume is handled?

Mr. Chevrier: I will see that the hon. member gets the information.

Mr. Gibson: I should like to inquire about the number of boatmen employed. I notice the details on page 470 indicate 14 boatmen, but surely there must be other men employed in the lifeboat service. Are these just the ones under the civil service?

Mr. Chevrier: This particular item covers the construction or acquisition of buildings for shore-based lifeboats, one at Bay View, N.S., one at Bamfield, B.C., and the other at Clayoquot, B.C., and also improvements to the life-saving station at Clayoquot.

Mr. Gibson: Are some of the boatmen under the civil service while others are under prevailing rates of pay?

Mr. Chevrier: The coxswains and engineers are under the civil service, and the prevailing rates men are under the department.

Mr. Gibson: I gather that the boatmen are under prevailing rates?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Gibson: Are they listed here?

Mr. Chevrier: There are six in the Clayoquot station and seven in the Bamfield station.

Mr. Gibson: Are the coxswains and engineers under prevailing rates or under the civil service?

Mr. Chevrier: They are under the civil service superannuation fund.

Mr. Gibson: I understand that some change has been made with regard to sick leave credits, that this privilege has been taken away from these men. I understand also that they were not given any intimation at all of this privilege being withdrawn and as a result one man has been billed for $49 for seven days' sick leave. The minister will appreciate that these men must go to town for medical services.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not familiar with the details of the case my hon. friend has in mind, but I understand from an officer of the department that all of the information has been provided to my hon. friend and that the case he has in mind can be remedied.

Item agreed to.

485. Pilotage service, including authority for temporary recoverable advances not exceeding $13,000, $367,363.

Mr. McLure: What pilotage services are rendered in the port of Charlottetown? How many pilots are authorized to operate by the government? What are the qualifications necessary for a pilot's certificate? There has been some dispute among the pilots there and it might be of assistance if I could get that information.

Mr. Chevrier: The pilots of Charlottetown are not under the authority of the Department of Transport. They are under a local authority and operate their own business.

Mr. McLure: They can make any charge they wish?

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot answer that as I do not know the details of their bylaws and constitution.

Mr. Herridge: Does the department permit any person to act as a master of a passenger vessel without having taken an examination and holding a master's certificate?

Mr. Chevrier: While that matter does not come under this item, the answer is no. Those who follow the calling of master or mate must obtain a certificate from the department if they are operating a vessel of over five tons. Of course if it is a rowboat or a small vessel or yacht under five tons there would be no requirement of that kind.

Mr. Catherwood: Have any changes been made in the regulations with regard to fires since the burning of the S.S. Noronic and S.S. Quebec?

Mr. Chevrier: Very substantial changes were made following the report by Mr. Justice Kellock in connection with the S.S. Noronic; in fact practically all the recommendations have been put into effect. The recommendations with regard to the S.S. Quebec have just been received and are being considered now.

Item agreed to.

River St. Lawrence ship channel service—

489. Contract dredging—capital, $2,013,409.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to have the details of the expenditures last year and what is proposed to be spent this year.

Mr. Chevrier: This item is in the estimates by virtue of a contract between the government and Marine Industries Limited for the dredging, widening and deepening of the St. Lawrence ship channel for a distance extending from some forty miles east of Quebec to the foot of the Lachine canal at Montreal. The contract was for some $14 million and was entered into after a board of engineers had gone into the matter carefully and recommended it to the government. This amount is the last payment under the terms of that contract and is divided into some ten items. The first is the work in Montreal harbour amounting to approximately $500,000; in the area of Cap de la Madeleine $412,000 to deepen the channel to 35 feet below extreme low water; an item of $253,000 at Cap a la Roche to deepen the channel to 35 feet below extreme low water; an item of $109,000 at Becancour lower traverse to deepen the channel to 35 feet; and several other small items which bring it to the total mentioned in the expenditure.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): These expenditures were all in the St. Lawrence?

Mr. Chevrier: All in the area extending from 40 miles below Quebec to Montreal.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Is this all new work, widening and deepening the channel, or is it removing debris that has accumulated?

Mr. Chevrier: It is under the terms and specifications of a contract signed some five years ago which was allocated and divided over a period of five years, and this is the last of the work that has to be done.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Is this on a fixed yardage basis, or under what method?

Mr. Chevrier: It is on a yardage basis at unit prices.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Fixed at the beginning of the contract?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): It does not change from year to year?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it was fixed at the beginning.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Does the minister's department have the responsibility for dredging channels in Nova Scotia? There is a case at Parrsboro that I took up with the Minister of Public Works on behalf of the board of trade of that town. It concerns the removal of debris and old material from some wharf or breakwater construction. It was filling up the channel in Parrsboro harbour and interfering with the mooring of lumber barges that gather lumber in the whole area of the upper part of the bay of Fundy for transshipment to steamers that come in there to load. Most of these steamers have to load under anchorage because they are not able to go to wharves. The wharf facilities are not sufficient. This material is filling up the old channels where the lumber barges have been in the habit of mooring, and is making it very difficult for them. Does this come under the minister?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it does not, except with reference to the removal of derelicts or wrecks that might be in the channel.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): This is refuse that came from government property in that area, wharves or breakwaters. Does the minister have responsibility for that?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Why is it that the Department of Transport has the responsibility for keeping the channel open in the St. Lawrence and does not have the responsibility for seeing that the channels are properly cleared in the smaller outport harbours such as Parrsboro?

Mr. Chevrier: Because parliament decided the channel of the St. Lawrence should be deepened to 35 feet low water datum and decided to expend this sum of money. Otherwise there would be no authority for deepening the channel.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I think the minister said that the work has been completed. If the work has been completed of dredging the St. Lawrence river to a depth of 35 feet and to the required width, what is the policy of the department with respect to future work?

Mr. Chevrier: In so far as this particular contract is concerned, I do not think I indicated that the work had been completed. What I indicated was that this amount will complete the five-year contract which was a contract entered into for the purpose of keeping the channel at the required depth of 35 feet, to widen it in certain areas from 500 to 1,000 feet, and to provide for turnaround areas at certain other points. So far as the future is concerned, there is a committee in the department which will give consideration to whether or not it will be necessary to do additional work in the ship channel because of the continual filling and because of the larger ships that are being used in the traffic.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Is the minister in a position to indicate what additional work is projected?

Mr. Chevrier: No, I could not at this time, but when that is decided I will indicate it to the house.

Item agreed to.

Railway and steamship services—

490. Repairs and expenses in connection with the operation and maintenance of official railway cars under the jurisdiction of the department, $52,000.

Mr. Herridge: Before the item carries, I see that there is an amount of $64,000 for repairs and expenses in connection with the operation and maintenance of official railway cars under the jurisdiction of the department. That is an increase of $12,000 over last year.

Mr. Chevrier: It is a decrease of $12,000.

Mr. Herridge: Oh, I did not have my glasses on.

Mr. Chevrier: Fine.

Mr. Herridge: Under the law, who is entitled to the use of a private railway car? What is the average cost per mile of the operation of these cars, and does this item cover the cost of the staff such as the stewards or cooks?

Mr. Chevrier: The answer to the last question is yes, that it does cover that cost. The answer to the first question concerning who is entitled to use these cars is that there are two cars assigned to His Excellency the Governor General, one to the Prime Minister, and one to ministers, and distinguished visitors such as the President of France who was here the other day. He used one of these cars. Car 104 is the one which is assigned to the minister of the department. I am afraid I have not got the answer to the second question but I will get it from my hon. friend.

Mr. Low: How many official cars are there?

Mr. Chevrier: Five.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Under marine services, I understood the minister to say there was a special item providing for the building of lifeboats and similar boats.

Mr. Chevrier: We have passed that one.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What item would that be under?

Mr. Chevrier: Item 484.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Will the minister state what construction is being provided for so far as these boats are concerned?

Mr. Chevrier: I put that information on Hansard.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): That is on Hansard?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I overlooked the item when it was being discussed. I want to point out to the minister that so far as the construction of wooden boats of this kind both large and small is concerned, consideration should be given to their construction in the shipyards of the bay of Fundy. At Port Greville they have a yard that is as well qualified as any now existing in Canada. They have trained workmen and a long record of splendid work in building boats of all sizes. I understand that no construction is going on there this year, although there has been almost every year. I should like the minister to give special consideration to their claims for work of this kind and to see that they get a chance to bid on any boats of wooden construction required by the department.

Mr. Chevrier: I will be glad to bring this matter to the attention of my officers. I should like to put the answer on the record with reference to the query of the hon. member for Nanaimo having to do with the Johnston company. Operating expenses are paid in accordance with an agreement out of gross receipts. The net receipts are split 60 per cent to the department and 40 per cent to the Johnston National Terminal Company, who are also wharfingers.

Mr. Gibson: Do they set the rates?

Mr. Chevrier: No, the rates are set by us.

The Deputy Chairman: I point out that the item before the committee is 490 under railway and steamship services.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

An hon. Member: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

BORDER PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Robinson for the second reading of Bill No. 118, to incorporate Border Pipeline Corporation.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): I should like to say a few words on this bill to incorporate the Border Pipeline Corporation. I notice that this bill was introduced in another place. At page 192 of the Senate report I notice that the Hon. Senator Reid said:

> It is proposed that this pipe line be routed to Seattle, and thence northerly to the city of Vancouver. I point out that this manoeuvre is just a little bait—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member should refer to a debate in the Senate, during the present session in any event.

Mr. Sinnott: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We always like to be put on the right track. However, I am one of those who advocate the building of Canada through the development of our own natural resources before exporting any of those resources.

Mr. Sinclair: Wheat, for example; no export of wheat?

Mr. Sinnott: We are always glad to hear from the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. Perhaps he would like to sponsor a bill that would send gas to the United States before it went to the constituency he represents. I would rather see this pipe line built over an all-Canadian route so that it would serve the various parts of British Columbia, including the riding of the member who just interrupted me, before it went to the United States.

Mr. Sinclair: But if you were prohibiting exports from this country, you would not care to prohibit the export of wheat?

Mr. Sinnott: At the moment, so far as wheat is concerned, we are exporting the surplus that we do not need in Canada. When this bill considers exporting gas before Canadian needs are fulfilled, then we are opposed to it. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, there are many in this house who would like to see the pipe line follow an all-Canadian route. We have been assured by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that such a Canadian line is going to be built some time this year.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member is beyond help.

Mr. Sinnott: Possibly the member for Assiniboia could help me at some other time, but I do not think he can contribute very much now.

Mr. Speaker, I happen to be in the fortunate position of having some knowledge of the building of pipe lines. On my farm I have a couple of pipe lines. One of those pipe lines runs from the house down to a coulee, where it takes the wash water.

Then, I have another pipe line that runs from what used to be a sand pit to the river. That is a six-inch pipe line and runs for possibly three hundred yards.

In my constituency there is a third pipe line, the one which happens to be the tap-off from Gretna to East St. Paul and carries a large portion of the oil down to the refinery at lake Superior. This line cost in the neighbourhood of $10 million to build. With this oil coming from Alberta to East St. Paul, it will enable the people of Springfield, thanks to this all-Canadian route, who are using fuel oil to get their fuel much cheaper just as soon as the refinery is in operation. It has been said, and we should endeavour to see that the promise is kept, that gasoline will be selling in my constituency for four or five cents a gallon less next spring. That is a credit to this all-Canadian pipe line.

There is another pipe line in my constituency, and I believe many members do not know about it. I believe it is one of the cleanest pipe lines that there is in Canada, and it happens to supply all the water for the city of Winnipeg. It runs from Shoal lake to the city of Winnipeg and is about eight feet in diameter. This is an all-Canadian pipe line.

Mr. Argue: It is all-Manitoba.

Mr. Sinnott: Since my friend has not got the proper information, I may tell him there is a small portion in the province of Ontario.

Many times the member for Assiniboia makes statements in the house concerning box cars and everything else—

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member is very young.

Mr. Sinnott: Of course, he is very young, and he will learn in time. I have a few notes here to refresh my memory. When we are talking about pipe lines, let me say there is more to building a pipe line than most people realize. When a line of this type has to be constructed, the best engineers must be available. I would not have believed it myself—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sinnott: It may be a joke to some, but you would never believe that if oil were running downhill through a steel pipe line for a distance of three miles, it would break that pipe. Therefore, in building these lines, it is necessary that previous experience should have a great deal to do with it. There must be certain blocks in these lines in order to keep back the pressure which is so great if these blocks are not in there. Another thing is this. It is quite a difficult job to curve these pipes to pass around the various rocks that are sometimes found in the way, and to go through the various coulees. All these bends must be of the same nature as the land. The parliamentary assistant, the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair), gets a big kick out of it. He is at least learning what I am trying to tell him, and I hope that it may be of some value in the future.

Mr. Cruickshank: It is difficult for him to learn.

Mr. Sinnott: With time, one can learn. I have found that out myself. Pipe line construction today is a job of a different nature from what it used to be in years gone by. Had we had to build a line of this type, we will say twenty years ago, it would have been something beyond the stretch of imagination of any man. But with the modern machinery we have at the present time, I believe it is evident that mankind is getting to receive more and more the benefit of the scientific brains responsible for the construction of this machinery.

If one were to read this pamphlet put out by the Imperial Oil Company, he would find that it gave him an illustration of how the pipe is laid by modern machinery, how pipe is wrapped in order to keep rust away so that the line will therefore last a number of years. It is really magnificent to know how, during the past decade, modern science has at last found some method by means of which Canadians will have an opportunity to get the benefit of this development.

I have not much more to say about this line, except that I am sponsoring an all-Canadian route before any part of a pipe line coming from Canada is built in the United States.

Mr. Herridge: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Sinnott: Surely.

Mr. Herridge: Is grease ever used in wrapping a pipe line in order to avoid rust?

Mr. Sinnott: I am glad that the hon. member has asked that question. Since he has asked me, I would say that the better the grease, the better the job. If my friend wants further information as to the better types of grease, I can give him that too.

I had a few notes here with regard to this line, and I think I have endeavoured to make some little contribution to this debate. If a large number of hon. members take part in this debate, and if they stick together, I think they can tell the board of transport commissioners in no uncertain terms—and that board is now overburdened and has had a terrible responsibility lately—in order to take the burden off their shoulders, that they will not allow any pipe line to be built outside of Canada before Canada's needs are first met.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this house is a good crucible in which to work out national policies. I believe that it has great value for that purpose and, of course, for many others. But here we are able to discuss the pros and cons of various questions; and, generally speaking, a fairly satisfactory solution is worked out by the members of the house.

I believe most sincerely that the question raised by these bills which seek to grant charters for the building of pipe lines is one of the greatest importance to Canada at this time and is perhaps one of the most important ones we have had to solve for many years. As hon. members of the house will know, that great question is whether our natural resources are to be used first for the benefit of Canadians or whether they are to be shipped abroad in the unfinished state simply because, for the time being, that may seem to be the quickest way to make a little bit of money.

The question is so highly important now because of the place of iron, steel, oil and gas in the economy of any nation. No country in the modern world can become one of the leading nations without those particular resources. It so happens that in recent years Canada has found great deposits of iron ore, of oil and of natural gas. If properly used these can help greatly to build this nation into a strong power. Therefore, although this subject has been discussed on numerous previous occasions in the house, I offer no apologies for going over the field again, because we have here before us this evening a bill submitted by a group of men whose purpose admittedly is to build a pipe line by means of which to bring oil from the fields in Alberta down into the states of Washington and Oregon, getting into those states by the shortest route.

It is the second chapter of the story which began two or three years ago. In 1949 a charter was granted to a company to pipe oil from Alberta to the east, the line going down to Superior, Wisconsin, rather than to Fort William and Port Arthur. As Your Honour knows, some of us protested that action. Incidentally, I believe the sponsor of that bill in this house is the same sponsor who is asking for this present charter.

Mr. Robinson: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he not agree that the bill to which he refers, which I sponsored a few years ago, has resulted in great benefits to Canada?

Mr. Green: My answer to that question is this: I believe that had that line been constructed to Fort William and Port Arthur it would have resulted in a great deal more benefit to Canada, not only at the present time but in the years ahead.

In one of the leading United States weeklies at that time—I refer to the U.S. News and World Report—there appeared an article entitled "Canada: oil's new hot spot." With the article there appeared a sketch of Canada showing the proposed pipe line east from Alberta right down into the United States at Superior and another west to the Pacific coast at Seattle, Tacoma and Portland. Tonight we are considering a bill for a group who propose to build the second leg of this particular plan, namely, an oil pipe line to the west coast of the United States.

The company will be known as "Border Pipeline Corporation." The line, as I have said, will run from Alberta down across the southeastern corner of British Columbia, through the Crowsnest pass and then down into the city of Spokane in the state of Washington and to the city of Seattle where refineries are to be built. I presume it will also go to Tacoma, and a branch goes further south to the city of Portland in the state of Oregon. There is to be a branch to the north ending at or near the city of Vancouver. We have of course no way of making certain that this stub line up to Vancouver will ever be built. If this charter is granted and the company gets permission to go ahead, the final result may be that there will be refineries at Seattle and at Portland, while Vancouver and the rest of British Columbia may be getting their Canadian oil by tanker from the United States.

If the plan of this company is followed out the Vancouver area will be the only portion of British Columbia to get this crude oil by pipe line. There will be no chance to have refineries in any of the interior cities of our province, and at all times the oil which eventually may come to Vancouver will be subject to control by the federal authorities of the United States, and also by the state authorities of the state of Washington, because, as I have pointed out, the line would run through the United States before coming to the Canadian west coast. All this would take place although it is Canadian oil from the adjoining province of Alberta. Furthermore, British Columbians, being at the end of the line, will be paying the highest price for this Canadian oil.

Another very important feature is that if this oil pipe line is built through the United States it is practically certain that a natural gas pipe line will go by the same route. A year ago we thought that the gas line would be built first, but now there is a rush to get an oil pipe line to the Pacific coast, and it seems certain that the oil will be there ahead of the gas. Should this oil line go through the United States the result will be to make it cheaper to put a gas line by the same route, and we are very likely to find both our oil and our gas going through the United States, and we will only get what there is to run out at the end of the line.

I oppose this bill just as strongly as I possibly can, because I believe it should be a fundamental policy of this nation that Canadian resources must be made available to Canadians first. There could be no objection whatever to selling our surplus to the other nations, and in particular to our good friends of the United States; but they have built their nation on the very policy that I am advocating this evening, and they would be the last people to criticize us for doing the same thing as they have done since the founding of the republic.

Last year in the discussions on the natural gas bill we were met with the argument that there would be a monopoly; that it was not fair to have only one company incorporated. Incidentally, one very important point that I have omitted is that there will be only one oil pipe line to the coast, and only one gas pipe line. I think that is admitted by everyone interested in the question.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): That is an unfair statement to make.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Green: Perhaps the hon. member for Cariboo is an authority on this question whom I have overlooked. All the rest of the authorities take the position that there will be only one trunk oil pipe line and one trunk gas pipe line to the Pacific, because there is a market there for only one line for each of those commodities. The hon. member may have misunderstood me. I may not have made my statement clear.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): There are other opinions on that subject, and they are very strong opinions. Many experts have other opinions.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Cariboo is the member for the constituency which will benefit the most if my arguments are successful in impressing the house.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear. Give him a chance to speak.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Green: Sit down, now. I am always surprised at the way the hon. member has jumped in from the start of these debates, and is always against those people who are trying to advocate a policy which will benefit his people more than the people of any other portion of British Columbia.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear; why does he not make a speech on the subject.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): We got the pipe line in spite of you.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Green: If the hon. member for Cariboo wants to make a speech, he may do so.

Mr. Cruickshank: Not he.

Mr. Green: I would be delighted to hear him on this question. There are already two other companies incorporated, which have committed themselves to build an oil pipe line to the west coast by an all-Canadian route. I refer first to the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited, which was incorporated in 1949; the other is the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company, which was incorporated just a few days ago. Both these companies are prepared and anxious to build an oil pipe line to the west coast by an all-Canadian route. Their policy of course is to supply British Columbia first and then to sell any surplus to the United States.

Incidentally there is, I believe, a third company seeking incorporation, known as the Champion Pipe Line Corporation Limited. The bill respecting that company has not yet gone through the Senate. However they are planning to build an oil pipe line to the west coast by an all-Canadian route. If any one of those companies or, for that matter, any other company—I am not concerned as to which company gets the right to build—or if, in other words, the Canada-first plan is followed, we shall have the work done in British Columbia and jobs will be given to our people. The highway will be built by that company through the Yellowhead pass, where there is no highway at the present time, with the result that Edmonton would be connected directly by road with Vancouver. There would be great expansion in British Columbia. That would take place not only at the coast but, in due course, I believe there would be refineries in such centres as Prince George, Kamloops and possibly some other interior centres. There might even be a refinery at Chilliwack.

Mr. Sinclair: Why?

Mr. Green: To commemorate the useful work done by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) in these pipe line battles.

Mr. Sinclair: And the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) too; do not forget him.

Mr. Green: It would mean not only the expansion of industry on our Canadian west coast, but also a great impetus to our shipping. We would be in a position to ship oil and other petroleum products to many parts of the world. That is of the greatest importance to us, because Vancouver and New Westminster are two of Canada's greatest seaports. The flow of commerce in and out of those ports means a great deal not only to the people who live in that vicinity but to people in all parts of Canada. Then as I pointed out earlier there would also be a natural gas line by an all-Canadian route, with all the resulting benefits outlined so carefully during the debates of the last session.

There is another special reason why we are in favour of this all-Canadian route for oil—and here I hope the hon member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) will follow me closely. If there is an all-Canadian route there will be an outlet to the west coast from the Peace river country, which is a portion of his own constituency. At present that great area, partly in British Columbia and partly in Alberta, is sealed off. In that area is the greatest oil potential country in British Columbia. Experts report that there may be great finds there of oil. Already there have been substantial discoveries of gas. Yet that whole area is sealed off today from the west coast. There is no highway and no railway. The only way in which the hon. member's constituents can come out from the Peace river district in British Columbia to Prince George, which is also in the hon. member's constituency, is by air or on foot.

Mr. Sinclair: Or the John Hart highway.

Mr. Green: The John Hart highway is not yet completed, as the hon. member for Coast-Capilano knows. A highway would be completed if either a gas or an oil pipe line were to go from the Peace river area to the Canadian west coast.

These facts have been clearly in the minds of the legislators of British Columbia. Mr. Braden, the member for Peace River in the provincial legislature—

Mr. Cruickshank: And a good one.

Mr. Green: —which, again, is a portion of the federal riding of Cariboo, presented a resolution in the British Columbia legislature less than a month ago. It was passed unanimously by that legislature on March 28. And believe me, when any legislation or resolution goes through the British Columbia legislature unanimously in this year of 1951, it has to be good.

Mr. Cruickshank: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Sinclair: Of course.

Mr. Cruickshank: I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is capable of speaking for himself. Has the hon. member ever heard the provincial member for that district express his opinion about the lack of support of the all-Canadian route in Ottawa?

Mr. Green: If I had heard the comments of the provincial member for Peace River, I am sure they would be unparliamentary.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear. I can tell you what he said about it.

Mr. Green: Here is the resolution passed unanimously two weeks ago by the British Columbia legislature:

> Whereas this legislature at its last session unanimously passed a resolution urging adoption of an all-Canadian route through the Yellowknife pass for the proposed transmission of natural gas from the gas fields of Alberta to Vancouver and other British Columbia points;

A year ago that resolution was passed stating that the gas route should come from Edmonton through the Yellowhead pass.

> And whereas important gas discoveries have since been made in the Peace river area of Alberta and British Columbia, which gas can best be marketed via a route through the Pine pass;
>
> And whereas the Alberta Petroleum and Natural Gas Conservation Board has recommended in its interim report of January, 1951 (1) that the only gas available for export is the gas lying beyond economic reach of Alberta consumers, which includes the gas reserves of the Peace river area, and (2) that no gas found in the major gas fields lying in that part of the province from the Edmonton area south to the international border could be allocated to a market outside of the province;

Hon. members who served on the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines will realize that only recently an exception has been made to that rule whereby provision is made to pipe some gas into Montana for war purposes, but only on a temporary basis for a period of five years. Then the resolution goes on:

And whereas the interests of Canada as a whole will best be served if natural gas from the Peace river areas of Alberta and British Columbia is transmitted to its closest markets, namely, British Columbia and the Pacific coast;

And whereas it is vital that the maximum encouragement be given to the discovery and development of the oil and gas resources of this province and to the industrial development of the interior of the province;

And whereas, in view of the foregoing facts, the route which best serves the interests of this province and the dominion as a whole is the aforesaid Pine pass route and such pipe line route having been proposed;

The Westcoast Transmission Company have now switched their gas route from the Yellowhead to the Pine pass route because of the finding of the Alberta petroleum and natural gas conservation board.

And whereas any proposed crude oil pipe line to the Pacific coast should, in the interests of the province, follow an all-Canadian route, and at the same time provide for the marketing of oil found in this province;

And whereas it is proposed to build a crude oil pipe line from northern Alberta to Vancouver via the Yellowhead and Pine routes to provide for marketing such oil.

That is, there would be a main line from Edmonton and a branch line from the Peace river down through the Pine pass. The resolution continues:

Therefore be it resolved, that this legislative assembly urges upon the appropriate authorities, in the interests of both British Columbia and Canada, the adoption of (1) the Pine pass route for natural gas transmission pipe line and (2) the combined Yellowhead and Pine pass route for the crude oil pipe line, which will provide for the marketing of oil discovered in British Columbia.

That resolution sets out the picture at the present time in Canada's western province and I contend that it should be supported by every hon. member from our province, no matter what his political views may be. The Border Pipeline Company advocates a policy which is just the reverse.

Now is the time for foundation laying. It is not too late to work out the best policy and to follow it. As members of this present parliament we have it in our power to see that a proper policy is followed. Oil being sent to the east is being transported through the United States and we cannot do anything about that now. It may be the policy of the oil interests to send oil to the west through the United States also just as they have done with the oil to the east. Hon. members need not be surprised if they find the oil interests issuing statements or propaganda that this oil should go down through the United States; that the best thing for Canada would be to have it go through the United States. We should not forget that they are not controlled in Canada. The oil interests are not working for Canada, they are working for their own profits. That should be remembered at all times when national issues are being decided. If more money is to be received by building this oil pipe line directly to the United States it means that much more money for the oil companies. They may well advocate that oil should be brought to the largest market, which undoubtedly is in the states of Washington and Oregon rather than British Columbia, by the shortest possible route, regardless of national interests. They will plead economic reasons and all that sort of thing, but let the members of the house beware.

I hope that the house will make sure that oil being sent to the Pacific coast goes by a Canada-first route. The picture is very well summed up in an article in the Saturday Night of June 20, 1950, entitled, "Pipe Vancouver the gas—but how?" That is not spelled "Howe". This is an article by Michael Barkway, one of the distinguished members of our press gallery, who sums up the question neatly in these words:

It poses the question that has faced Canada throughout her history; shall we let the forces of geography work out our destiny, or shall we bend them to our national designs?

I suggest to hon. members that it is in the national interest of Canada that this charter should not be granted and that no charter should be granted to any company which proposes to build its main line to the Pacific coast through the United States.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, important as this proposed bill is, there is a matter of parallel importance to my riding of Cariboo, the construction of the Pacific Great Eastern railway north into the Peace river country to bring out, not only oil, but coal, wood, lumber and all the other things to be found in abundance in that valley. I am surprised that so little support comes from these urgent gentlemen who are so willing to deny my participation in the discussion of these pipe lines.

I say that we must build the Pacific Great Eastern railway and we must have the support of hon. gentlemen who come from the deep south of British Columbia, who are interested in gardening, small dairying and so on. The future of British Columbia lies in the Peace river country. If I did not advocate the building of a pipe line from the Peace river country to Vancouver by way of the Cariboo district I would be most unwise indeed.

As a result of efforts put forth in this chamber during the last session we now have a pipe line from Alberta into British Columbia, and as a result houses in the metropolitan area of Dawson Creek are being lighted with gas, and industries have the advantage of this natural fuel from Alberta. It is to the credit of Premier Manning that he gave permission to bring gas across the interprovincial boundary into northern British Columbia.

It happens that the Westcoast Transmission Company is the company which is running that pipe line into British Columbia from Alberta. Their program is to extend it to Prince George and Quesnel and then down to the larger market at Vancouver. It has been stated that there will be only one pipe line, but those who say that are not prepared to look into the future and see the great possibilities of the tremendous oil reservoir to be found, not only in British Columbia and Alberta but in the far north. It may well be that there will be several lines for the transmission of oil as well as other lines for the transmission of gas.

One pipe line was operating in the far north of British Columbia to convey oil from Norman Wells to the Pacific coast. There is a great reservoir of oil at Norman Wells in the Northwest Territories which is waiting to be tapped and carried out to the Pacific coast. Recent explorations have shown that the oil structure extends from the Turner valley north for 1,000 miles, giving the greatest oil reservoir in the world. Yet members say that only one small pipe line will ever be constructed to the Pacific coast. It is ridiculous.

As I say, the building of highways and railways is vital to the district which I represent. If hon. gentlemen will give as much enthusiastic support to the construction of a railway to the Pacific coast I would challenge them to get up in the house—

Mr. Green: On a question of privilege, the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) and myself were advocating a Peace river railway long before the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) ever got here.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Before the royal commission on transportation in 1950 I asked for the building of this railway. There is a lot of information about the oil business that is not given to this house. I am no expert on oil, but I know that for thirty-five years we imported oil from the United States to Burrard inlet at Vancouver, and nobody seemed to be very bitter about that. If we had not got oil from the United States we would not have been able to run our automobiles or diesel engines in British Columbia. For thirty-five years our oil came either from California or from Peru. It was conveyed by tanker to ports on the west coast, and we were very glad to have it. British Columbia is one of the greatest markets for oil that there is.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why send ours out then?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Therefore I say we should not speak of the Americans with bitterness, and I think it is time that we gave fair consideration to all these factors. I can give you a little personal information about something that happened to my advantage in connection with the oil business. When I went to British Columbia from Ontario I naturally saw the possibilities of that new country. I homesteaded crown land some twenty miles outside the city of Vancouver. There were stumps of course and rocks, and it was not very attractive. It was like some of the country we see in Glengarry or up in Pontiac county. The day came when the Imperial Oil Company of Canada, represented by Mr. Victor Ross, came to me and bought 60 acres of that land to form part of the site for the present Ioco refinery on Burrard inlet.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The oil business is a magic business. It is a great thing that we have these supplies in Alberta. It would be well to convey them to the coast of British Columbia, and certainly through Cariboo, but let us view the requests of these various persons with consideration, at least with courtesy, and not impute certain motives simply because companies come before us seeking incorporation.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my opposition to the bill, and I will give my reasons as I proceed. Before doing so, I want to draw the attention of the house to a rather interesting fact in connection with these bills that propose the piping of gas or oil from Canada through the United States, and in some cases back into Canada. It seems impossible for the companies concerned to get a sponsor from British Columbia. This bill is sponsored by an Ontario member. What is the reason for that? It is simply that all hon. members from British Columbia know that it is politically dangerous to sponsor a bill, whether it is for a gas or oil pipe line, that means the piping of gas or oil into the United States and thence to the coastal area without proceeding by an all-Canadian route.

I strongly oppose the bill now before us on two grounds. The first is the fact that the bill proposes to build a pipe line with private capital. We believe that pipe lines, railways and national efforts of this sort should certainly be under public ownership. That sentiment runs across party lines in this house. It is not only the C.C.F. who advocate the public ownership of pipe lines. Liberal members have expressed their support of public ownership.

An hon. Member: Who?

Mr. Herridge: Members of the Conservative party have expressed their support of public ownership. Of course the policy of the C.C.F. is to advocate public ownership of utilities such as these. In this house a year or so ago the leader of the coalition party from British Columbia rose and expressed his support for the public ownership of pipe lines.

Mr. Gibson: Don't tag that name on me.

Mr. Herridge: I refer to the brilliant member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), with whom I do not always agree. Members who were present during the session when the debate on the general pipe lines bill and two or three succeeding pipe lines bills took place will remember that we had a demonstration in the house of how widespread the feeling and support is for the principle of public ownership. In that debate we witnessed the former member for Vancouver Centre, Mr. Rodney Young, and the leader of the coalition party in this house, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, jointly holding aloft the banner of public ownership of pipe lines.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I want to dissociate myself not only from the former member for Vancouver Centre but also from the coalition party in British Columbia.

Mr. Sinclair: What about Tim Buck and Harvey Murphy? They are for public ownership too.

Mr. Herridge: Regardless of the fact that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni dissociates himself on that question, they had an identity of point of view. In addition, he takes objection to the fact that I referred to him as the leader of the coalition party in this house. I was not suggesting that he represented the coalition in British Columbia. He represents the independent coalition party in the federal house.

On motion of Mr. Herridge the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being nine o'clock the house will revert to the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Railway and steamship services—

490. Repairs and expenses in connection with the operation and maintenance of official railway cars under the jurisdiction of the department, $52,000.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, last evening when we were dealing with the first item in the minister's department I indicated that I had a matter about which I should like to speak, having to do with the Canadian National Railways. At that time it was almost eleven o'clock, and there seemed to be a general desire to get the first item through. I suggested I was prepared to let that item pass as long as it was understood that I would have the privilege of raising this matter on another item. The minister agreed that I might raise it on the item now before the house. The matter about which I wish to speak is one concerning which I wrote the minister at some length on March 8 of this year. I note that he is nodding his head, and I hope that means that he recalls this particular letter amongst the many letters he receives from me.

On March 14 the minister acknowledged my letter and told me he would be glad to look into the observations that I put forward in my letter to him of March 8. I do not wish to suggest, by raising the matter in the house only a little over a month after that exchange of correspondence, that I am not satisfied that the minister is studying the matter. Rather I thought that by raising it now, drawing it to his attention, and possibly getting support from some others, it might help to expedite favourable consideration of this particular point.

The matter has to do with the desire of the men employed as supervisors by the Canadian National Railways for the recognition by the company of their association. Their association is known as the railway supervisors' association, and council No. 1 of this association is located in Winnipeg. For the most part the men who belong to this association are employed in the various shops of the Canadian National Railways as foremen. In various other places throughout the country, there are men of comparable rank who are members of this association. By the terms of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigations Act, these employees are denied an automatic claim to recognition and the right of collective bargaining.

May I make this point as clear as I can. The Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigations Act does not prevent the Canadian National Railways from recognizing the railway supervisors' association. Rather the act does not give that right automatically to the men, and that means it is at the discretion of the company. Thus far the company has not exercised that discretion in favour of the men. I might point out that the section of the labour code which governs this matter is section 2, subsection 1, paragraph (i), which reads:

"employee" means a person employed to do skilled or unskilled manual, clerical or technical work, but does not include

(i) a manager or superintendent, or any other person who, in the opinion of the board, exercises management functions or is employed in a confidential capacity in matters relating to labour relations;

(ii) a member of the medical, dental, architectural, engineering or legal profession qualified to practise under the laws of a province and employed in that capacity;

One of the reasons for reading the whole of that paragraph was that I felt it would ring a bell in the minds of some members who will recall that when the labour code was being put through this house in 1948 there was some discussion as to whether or not certain of these groups, architects, engineers and so on, should be included in this excluding clause. Some of us argued that employees working in these capacities should not be excluded from the right of collective bargaining. The then minister of labour, the late Mr. Mitchell, sought to make it clear to us that even though the wording of this section denied to those people an automatic claim to recognition and collective bargaining, still it was left open to the companies for whom these people might work and the men themselves to enter into collective bargaining if both sides wished to do so.

On one or two occasions I introduced a bill, a copy of which I have in my hand, which was given first reading on February 16, 1949. It was a public bill, and it would have had the effect of amending that section of the labour code in such a way as to give to some of these people who were exercising management functions the automatic right to recognition and collective bargaining. We sometimes get private members' bills and resolutions through this house, but not as often as might be desirable. Accordingly, that bill has not yet become law. One could keep trying to get the labour code amended so as to make it automatic in the case of these railway supervisors, but since that seems to be a rather slow process it has occurred to me that it might be better to simply make an appeal through the Minister of Transport to the Canadian National Railways to accord to these men right now the right to recognition and collective bargaining.

It is pointed out to me that the men feel it is unfair to discriminate against them on the basis of the argument that they are exercising management functions, or that they are employed in a confidential capacity in matters relating to labour relations. That is sometimes given as a reason, but the test is whether or not they have the right to hire and fire. These men tell me they do not have that latter right. As for management functions, they suggest to me that they are not as much in control of the shop where they are foremen as is a conductor who is in complete charge of his train. Yet there is nothing against the conductors having their trade union, being recognized and enjoying all the rights of collective bargaining.

The men admit that individually they are permitted to go in to see their superiors at any time that they have grievances they wish to take up. But remember that most of these men are tradesmen of one sort or another who have been in trade unions, and some of them are still members of the union to which they previously belonged. But as foremen they are not covered by the agreement of the union of which they may formerly have been members. With that background, and knowing the better security that is enjoyed collectively, they feel very strongly that they should have the right of recognition and collective bargaining. I may say that I have met these men in Winnipeg on a number of occasions, and I know that although recognition and collective bargaining carries with it other implications, what they most desire is recognition of their association. What they most desire is that when any one of them has a grievance it can be taken up with their superiors, not by one employee going in himself but through their association. They feel, as a matter of fact, that the men working under them have certain rights because of their trade union connections which these foremen or supervisors are denied.

I fully recognize that the Minister of Transport is not the administrative head of the Canadian National Railways. I do not expect him to give a final answer at this time. But I do hope that the study which he told me in his letter of March 14 he was prepared to make of this matter is being pursued, and that it may result in a feeling on his par that he can recommend to the Canadian National Railways that they meet this request. Some hon. members may have felt when I first raised the matter that it was a labour matter rather than a transport matter. As I have already indicated, if one were trying to get the law changed in a general way, it would be a matter to take up under labour. In this instance it seems to me the thing to do is to try to get the Canadian National Railways to meet the request of this particular group of people. I indicated in my letter to the minister that if he wanted to discuss the matter with me after he had studied it, or with any of the rest of us who are interested, we would be glad to go to see him. He might like to have the Minister of Labour there as well. But my hope is that the result of this study, as I have already indicated, will be that he will see the justice of the claim that these men are making and that he will be prepared to recommend approval of their request to the management of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Chevrier: I remember quite well the letter which the hon. gentleman sent me. If my memory does not fail me at the moment, it struck me at the time that there were two or three questions involved. First there was a legal question. And then there was a question of labour relations, and finally there was the interest of the Canadian National Railways. I read his letter carefully and thought the best thing I could do was first of all to ask the Canadian National Railways to let me have their comments on the suggestion put forward by my hon. friend. That I have done, and I have simply acknowledged his letter without comment until I am able to get the reply of the officers of the railways. That has not been forthcoming as yet. I presume they are preoccupied at the moment with the committee on railways and shipping, for which they are getting ready. But just as soon as I am able to get their reply and also to give some consideration to the two aspects that I have mentioned, I shall write to my hon. friend.

Mr. Knowles: I appreciate the position taken by the minister and I shall look forward to hearing from him when he gets that reply from the Canadian National Railways. I am wondering, however, just what the minister meant when he referred to the legal aspect of the matter.

Mr. Chevrier: I would have to have the letter before me. As I said a moment ago, I was speaking from memory. What struck me when I read the letter—and it was a fairly long one, if I remember aright—was that there were two aspects of the question. One was a legal question as to the application of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and the other was as to labour relations.

Mr. Knowles: May I just suggest one other thought. I do this because I presume that, when this matter gets studied by the minister and by the department, today's Hansard will probably be looked at. Therefore if one has a point to make, now is the time to make it. My suggestion is this. I suggest that when the minister or his officials are studying this matter, they look up the debate which took place in this house when the labour code was before us. As a matter of fact, if my memory serves me aright, that debate took place on June 17, 1948. I do not presume to remember every date on which anything takes place, but I have reason for remembering that date very well and the Minister of Transport will remember it too. An extremely important amendment to the labour code went through on that date, one I had fought for for many years. In the debate of that day the minister will find that the then minister of labour discussed the position of these people who, by the terms of the labour code, are excluded from automatic recognition and the automatic right to collective bargaining. The point was that although these people, including the people involved in management functions, are excluded from that automatic right, still there is no law against that right being accorded to them by any employer who wishes to do so. It is that view of the former minister of labour which I wish the Minister of Transport would look at when he is assessing the legal aspects.

Mr. Chevrier: That was the question that was in my mind: whether or not an amendment to the act would be necessary in order to do what my hon. friend requested.

Mr. Knowles: That is exactly the point. I am glad the minister raised it; because when, on June 17, 1948, an attempt was made to amend the act with respect to architects, I believe, that amendment was defeated. The minister of labour said then that even though that amendment was defeated, even though architects were excluded from the automatic right to collective bargaining, there was nothing to prevent them from having it wherever their employers were willing to accord it to them. That is what I am hoping the Canadian National Railways will be prepared to do with regard to these railway supervisors.

Mr. Gibson: This afternoon when I mentioned this question of transportation of members of parliament, the minister did not give me any assurance that he was even going to look into the matter. I am just wondering if he realizes the principle that is involved. It is customary for people to say that they do not care about the money, that it is the principle of the thing. I am not going to use quite that trite observation at this time; but to tell the truth, I cannot quite imagine the former member for Comox-Alberni, with his rather legalistic turn of mind, not making a protest when he got clipped year after year on this particular point. Probably he did. Even so, probably the same thing happened to him as happened to me. The hon. member for Danforth spoke in stentorian tones to the effect that probably more of us should pay our own way. But I can just imagine the squeals that he would make if, every week end when he went home—sometimes perhaps on Thursday night, probably more often late on Friday night—

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, not the hon. member for Danforth.

Mr. Gibson: —if he had to pay some sum of money apart from what every other member of parliament pays. In those circumstances I am certain he would have supported the argument I made this afternoon. I am curious. This is an item for repair, operation and maintenance of official railway cars. Suppose the minister paid us a visit in British Columbia, and that he arrived at Vancouver. Suppose that someone suggested that the salmon was biting over in Campbell river and that he might like to take his car over there. Would he, as a matter of right, get transportation of his car to the island if he so requested? I am quite sure that he probably would not ask for it. But would he not have a right to do that?

Mr. Chevrier: The answer is no.

Mr. Gibson: I am sorry to persist but is the minister correct in that observation that the answer is no? Have you ever looked into it? Have you ever made a study of it?

Mr. Chevrier: I have not made a study of it, but apparently the hon. gentleman is not conversant with the act. As I tried to explain to him this afternoon, the act does not provide free transportation for members of parliament by steamship companies. The act simply provides for transportation on railways, and it provides also for the making of regulations governing the issuance of transportation by the board of transport commissioners. The board of transport commissioners have no jurisdiction over the steamship companies. For that reason I gave the hon. gentleman the answer that I did this afternoon. When he now asks me if I am sure of my answer when I say no to him, may I say that the reason for saying no so quickly arises out of the answer which I gave this afternoon. It is evident that I could not move a private car to the island without paying the cost of transportation on the steamship, unless the railway wanted to come forward and say, "Certainly take your car over; we will look after it."

Mr. Gibson: There are terminal rates from the island, of course.

Mr. Chevrier: Unless the steamship company wants to treat the member in the same way, I do not see how there is any authority; in fact, there is no authority under the act to provide for it.

Mr. Gibson: Of course my point was that probably the act should be amended. Could it be amended?

Mr. Chevrier: I suppose it could.

Mr. Gibson: Would you not think that, in equity to all members of parliament, it should be amended?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think it should; no.

Mr. Sinclair: I should like to join my colleague on this matter mainly because some three or four years ago the two of us placed another issue on transportation before this house. As you will recall, it was the question of whether or not hon. members coming from their ridings to this house could travel by air under the statute in question. We had done some work on the matter and saw that in the House of Commons Act there was this provision for direct transportation. Those who live close to Ottawa felt that the train was good enough; but those coming from far out-of-the-way places felt that the intent of the people who framed the act was that we should have direct passage. I am extremely glad that in the end the Speaker, who was adjudicating on the matter, upheld our contention. I am perhaps in a little bit better position to raise the point which he originally made because in the Railway Act the clause to which he referred makes provision that members of parliament may travel as of right on the railways of Canada. I looked back in Hansard and found out that this was one of the few concessions that the railways gave in return for getting the many concessions that this country gave in the way of land rights, mineral rights and so on, to enable the construction of the railways to go ahead.

I think the intent was pretty clear, namely, that this was a concession to enable a member of parliament to come from his home to Ottawa as often as he wanted on the national railway systems, not the nationally owned system. And today that intent is certainly carried out, because those members from Newfoundland can come from Newfoundland on the Canadian National railway and the Canadian National steamship services and arrive in Ottawa on their House of Commons passes. Those who come from New Brunswick find that they can travel through the United States, but they have to pay their fare when they travel through the United States on the Canadian railways, which is then a United States company, which is as separate from the Canadian railway company as is the Canadian Pacific Railway coast steamships. All you have to do is to send the receipts down to the Canadian Pacific Railway agent here and you get a refund. But there are three members of parliament here, the hon. member for Victoria, the Minister of Fisheries; the hon. member for Nanaimo, and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, who cannot get to parliament unless they pay the Canadian Pacific steamships their fare from Victoria to Vancouver or from Nanaimo to Vancouver. Why the Canadian Pacific Railway should refund the maritime members their fare and not make this concession to the three Vancouver island members I do not know.

This afternoon I raised the matter of subsidy which the Canadian Pacific steamships are not backward about asking for, a subsidy which is given them for their operation on the west coast. I can think of a little steamship line in my riding which does not get subsidies from the Department of Transport but it does extend the courtesy of a pass to the local members of parliament on their steamship lines because they feel that that was the sense of the original provision in the Railway Act.

I know that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni does not need the actual fare between Nanaimo and Vancouver. His predecessor who was also well endowed with this world's goods probably did not either; but it is more than that. It is the principle of the thing. There are three members of parliament who cannot come to parliament on their House of Commons passes, and I think quite frankly that the minister should pay a little attention to it, or perhaps hon. members should pay a little attention to it.

Mr. Gibson: Nova Scotia members are in the same position.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, therefore it rises above sectionalism. I think members of all parties should pay a little more attention to the subsidies we give to these Canadian steamships if the Canadian Pacific feels that it is necessary to adhere so closely to the letter of the law so far as the British Columbia members are concerned and yet be so generous with their cash refunds so far as the New Brunswick members are concerned.

Mr. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): In case there may be a misapprehension so far as the members from Nova Scotia are concerned, those who use the Canadian Pacific steamship Princess Helene pay their fare on that ship and do not get a refund. The refund they get is when they go through the state of Maine by train.

Mr. Sinclair: I was just mentioning New Brunswick.

Mr. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): They do not travel by steamship.

Mr. Gibson: I have just been informed that the Canadian Pacific inland steamships on Arrow lakes honour the passes. The hon. member for Kootenay West tells me that they give him the courtesy there and honour his pass. They do not give him a special pass. I have been told by certain Canadian Pacific Railway officials if I wish to make a submission in conjunction with the Minister of Fisheries—the Minister of Fisheries certainly must have a pass, I do not know. They suggested—

Mr. Winters: I would not think so.

Mr. Gibson: Perhaps he does not have one. He should have one, certainly.

Mr. Winters: The Minister of Resources and Development does not have a pass on the Princess Helene.

Mr. Gibson: He should have one on the Princess Helene. As I was saying, the hon. member for Kootenay West told me that his pass is honoured on the inland steamships of the Canadian Pacific Railway. When it comes to the point of going up the west coast of Vancouver island, $100,000 of a subsidy is paid. I am quite sure that if the hon. member for Nanaimo and I went to the Canadian Pacific steamships and said: Will you please give us a pass? We think probably you should. We did not oppose your subsidy in the house. Then they probably would. As a principle, I do not think that a member of parliament ought to barter his support or otherwise with any steamship or railway company of Canada. Once again, as a matter of principle, I think the minister owes it to us. The fact that we come from these far distances and live on islands should not be a disability to us, so far as members of parliament are concerned.

Mr. Chevrier: Owes what to you? I do not quite understand the hon. member.

Mr. Gibson: The minister can get around his riding without paying any railway fare.

He can go by rail or by road. I have to travel literally hundreds of miles in my riding, and in some sections of it there are only steamship services. That is the only connection that is provided there. In order to get around and see my constituents I must pay. I have never minded that in the past. I think the principle is wrong. If a minister can go to his people by rail for nothing, then I should be able to travel on steamships, particularly on the ones that get very heavy subsidies from this house, for nothing. I should be able to go and visit my people in the same way.

Mr. Coldwell: I think probably some of us who have not this to contend with as members of parliament should rise and say something in support of the principle that is being asked for by the members of parliament who are involved. In fact, I think it might have been better if some of the rest of us who are not involved had known about this and had raised the issue, because I am quite sure that while an interpretation might have been placed upon something that was said by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, it would not make any difference to his attitude on subsidies, or public affairs generally.

What I was going to say was this: If those of us who have not to cross water are able to travel to the House of Commons without let or hindrance in this way, no matter how small the amount—probably it does not amount to a great deal to some members relatively, but the principle is there—

Mr. Gibson: Certainly.

Mr. Coldwell: —I think some consideration might be given to the matter by the minister. I know that we cannot do anything here at the moment, but I think it is only proper that a few of us who are not personally involved in this matter should say that we think that the principle that the hon. gentleman is arguing for is a sound one and should be conceded.

Mr. Chevrier: What I was going to say when I rose a moment ago is this. The difficulty arises because of the fact that there is no body that has jurisdiction over these steamship operations, such as the one having jurisdiction over the railways. The board of transport commissioners provides the regulations governing the issuance of transportation. In this case I suppose it would be possible to meet the position with an amendment, but I certainly would not be prepared to bring down an amendment without more discussion on the matter. I think a question of that kind would have to be discussed with the steamship companies involved. It is my feeling that if it were there would not be very much difficulty about it. Perhaps I can ask the maritime commission to give it some consideration.

While the maritime commission does not have jurisdiction over the operations of these steamship companies, yet it provides the subsidies that have already been mentioned, and I will ask the maritime commission to give it consideration to see if it is not possible, without an amendment of the Railway Act or of some act of parliament, to grant in these specific cases courtesy transportation.

Mr. Drew: I should think that what the minister has said would certainly agree with the views of the members. I am not going to add to what he has already said about his intention to take this up, but I would not wish Hansard at this point to carry the impression that has been left by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in presenting his argument. It was quite unnecessary, and Hansard should not be left with the imputation which was directed to the hon. member for Danforth. In the first place the hon. member for Danforth is in the buildings. He was here today. The remarks to which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has referred were made this Friday afternoon. I think the suggestion that he leaves regularly on Thursday night was gratuitous and unnecessary. But, what is more, I would point out also that the hon. member has not correctly interpreted what was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Danforth. The hon. member for Danforth said that he would be in favour of cancelling all passes, and having the transportation provided by the issue of vouchers. I rise only to correct an impression which should not stand in the way it was placed on Hansard.

Mr. Gibson: If I gave the impression that I was suggesting the hon. member for Danforth has not always been a distinguished member of the House of Commons then, if possible, I would wish my remarks to be deleted from Hansard. I have always had a high regard for the hon. member. However, it seemed to me today unfortunate that, in a case of this kind which probably did not affect him personally, he should have taken the particular view he did take. But, so far as making any derogatory remarks about the hon. member, I shall be very glad indeed to withdraw them.

Mr. Knowles: If the minister is going to take this matter up, there is one word I should like to say. I support the principle that has been raised, but it has been suggested in the discussion that one solution to the problem might be for the Canadian Pacific Railway to make refunds to those who have to cross from Vancouver island to the mainland in the same way that it makes refunds to those who have to cross the state of Maine.

It seems to me what is needed is not a situation where certain hon. members get cash refunds from the Canadian Pacific Railway, but rather a law of this parliament providing that any necessary transportation is a matter of right. I am not suggesting that the law needs to be amended so that any hon. member of parliament can travel on any steamship at any time; but it does seem to me that the law could quite easily be amended to provide steamship transportation as of right wherever that transportation is necessary to make a continuous trip from one part of Canada to another.

This is a matter which has interested me somewhat because of a story well known to many of us in Winnipeg. The first labour member ever to come to the parliament of Canada was Mr. Arthur Puttee, who was elected as the member for Winnipeg in 1900, fifty-one years ago. Mr. Puttee is today well on in years, but he is in good health and still lives in the city of Winnipeg.

At that time members of parliament for the most part made their trips to Ottawa by virtue of passes given to them by the various railways. The gifts of the railways in those days, so we are told, were quite generous in many cases, and hon. members felt they were under obligation to them. When Mr. Arthur Puttee was elected to come to Ottawa, though he was a workingman and it was not easy for him to find the money, he paid his own way, and sat up all the way. He was determined not to be under any obligation to the railway companies. It was not long before other hon. members felt the same way, and the law was amended so as to give transportation as of right, so that no hon. member was under any obligation to a railway company.

I think the situation that now obtains whereby the Canadian Pacific Railway makes refunds to those who cross the state of Maine should be changed, and that travel should be as of right. I would say the same should be the case for those who have to take a steamship at any place so as to make a continuous trip from one part of Canada to another.

Mr. Chevrier: That transportation could not by any stretch of the imagination be as of right, because it is in another country. This parliament has no authority to pass laws affecting other countries.

[Mr. Knowles.]

In so far as the first point raised by the hon. member, although I may be mistaken, I think perhaps the reason for the gratuitous transportation on railways is that parliament has always had jurisdiction over the railways, and provided the moneys voted originally for them. Not so, however, with the steamships, with the exception of steamships receiving subsidies. Many of the steamships which receive subsidies however would be of no use to hon. members. I believe that applies to the mail steamship operating between Vancouver and Victoria, which my hon. friend has in mind, and probably that is the one which would be used by the hon. member for Nanaimo. That perhaps is the reason why parliament, when it enacted legislation in the first instance, dealt with the railways alone, and not with steamships.

Mr. Coldwell: Do they not operate under charters granted by parliament?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. Then, if one pursues it a step further, why not grant transportation on bus lines? After all, these are private corporations over which we certainly have no jurisdiction.

Mr. Coldwell: But we do not grant bus lines charters.

Mr. Chevrier: No, we do not; but sometimes bus lines are the property of railways. I was saying that bus lines often are operated by railways through subsidiary companies. I am just trying to be helpful in finding a reason why there has been a distinction as between railways and steamships.

Mr. Sinclair: And as between members of parliament.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, unfortunately, that is the case. I do not think it will apply to many members of parliament.

Mr. Gibson: About twenty of them.

Mr. Chevrier: As I have said, I am asking the maritime commission to give it their consideration.

Mr. Gibson: Just so that the record may be complete, I think the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River is perhaps under a greater disability than any other member in the house, in having to go from Skagway to Vancouver. I think that is particularly unfair and places an undue burden upon him.

Mr. Fulton: When the minister is looking into this matter, perhaps he might look into the related matter of the status of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway. Passes with which members are furnished say that they are entitled to free transportation, with baggage, upon all railway trains in Canada. I am informed however that does not entitle a member to free transportation upon the Pacific Great Eastern.

Let me make it clear at once that they have never placed the slightest difficulty in my way when travelling on that line on a passenger train, or using their freight facilities, in conformity with the regulations existing in that regard. However I understand that there is some peculiar local position affecting the Pacific Great Eastern to the end that that railway, not having been completed, it is not a railway within the definition of the point we are discussing.

Perhaps when the minister is making a general investigation of the matter he would look into this point, because there are certain portions of my riding I can reach only by using the Pacific Great Eastern.

Mr. Chevrier: I will do that.

Mr. Hansell: Perhaps some word might be added from this corner of the house. I do not think I have been particularly backward at any time in past years in rising to support the rights of members of parliament. Predictions have been made at times that when I did so I would get it in the neck. I never have found that to be so.

It is my personal view that the same privileges granted to members of parliament on railways should be granted to them on steamships plying in Canadian waters between coastal ports. My reason for saying that is that it will be discovered in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms—and I am not raising a point of order—that a member of parliament represents not only his own constituency, but rather that he represents all the people in Canada.

I think that principle is behind the fact that there is written into the Railway Act the matter of transportation over any Canadian railway for members of parliament. How is one to get first-hand knowledge of the country if he cannot go everywhere? How can one get first-hand knowledge of those parts of the country served by steamships? I believe that all members of parliament should be given passes on all steamship lines plying Canadian waters, both inland and coastal.

The railway trains and the steamships are being run anyway, whether a member is travelling on them or not. To take a member on board a railway or a steamship does not mean even an infinitesimal cost because the railroad or steamship do not supply berths and meals and therefore it is impossible for them to lose. I make these remarks because I believe we have a right as members of parliament representing the people of Canada to be able to travel anywhere we desire.

Mr. McLure: I understood the minister was going to have this matter investigated by the commissioners, but I would say that it is not necessary to have any investigation with regard to the Borden-Tormentine car ferry, or any other car ferry, because our passes are good.

Mr. Gibson: If it is subsidized and maintained at a loss by the Canadian government, everybody should travel free. If it is making money, then we cannot travel.

Item agreed to.

Hudson Bay Railway—

491. To provide for the difference between the expenditures for operation and maintenance, and revenue accruing from operation during the year ending March 31, 1952, not exceeding $250,000.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, last night I spoke for some thirty minutes on this particular question, but there is something else I should like to say. It would be better if I could have had both speeches together in the same Hansard. I should like to point out one disadvantage faced by the Hudson Bay railway as compared with other railroads. I refer to the diversion charge made by the elevator companies. I remember I was asked once to give a definition of this diversion charge and I said it was a charge for services not rendered. I think that is an apt definition.

This diversion charge of one and a half cents per bushel on wheat is made by the elevator companies when they are asked by the shipper to send his grain to a port at which that particular elevator company has no terminal. The minister can correct me if that is the wrong definition. Can he show any justification for such a charge?

This amounts to a grievance with the people who ship through Churchill. Would it make any difference in regard to this diversion charge if Churchill was given the same status—I presume it would have to be done by legislation—as other ports like Vancouver or Montreal? People do not mind paying money, but they do not like to pay it when they receive nothing in return.

As the hon. minister knows, for the past five years or so I have interested myself in the Churchill route. I was able to compliment the minister last night as well as the other organizations concerned upon the success that has been achieved in the promotion of this port. We have been able to influence public opinion, perhaps even in this house, in favour of this route. Things are coming along nicely and it would be a tremendous help if we could get rid of this diversion charge.

Mr. Chevrier: This is the first time I have heard of this grievance and for this reason I cannot comment on it. Perhaps the hon. member will permit me to look into it.

Mr. Knight: I shall be pleased if the minister will do that. I am astonished that no one has brought this to his attention.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This matter has been brought up on a number of occasions and representations have been made to the government to have this charge removed. It constitutes a discrimination against those who desire to use the port facilities at Churchill. Even in a normal year this costs the western farmers $50,000 or more and there would seem to be no justification or excuse for it.

Mr. Chevrier: Does my hon. friend know if that is a national harbours board charge?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I cannot say.

Mr. Chevrier: I have never heard of it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was under the impression that the charge was made directly by the elevator company which was requested to divert wheat through the Hudson bay route.

Mr. Chevrier: It is probably a wheat board matter and that is why it has not been brought to my attention. I am informed that it is, and I shall be glad to bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I certainly support my hon. friend. As I say, this matter has been raised on a number of occasions by the association that was set up to encourage traffic over the Hudson bay route. I should like to ask the minister if it is the intention to extend the facilities at Churchill? As the hon. member for Saskatoon city has said, last year the traffic over the Churchill route was something greater than it was during the 1930-34 period when the route was being used so extensively, and today there are the military considerations as well. That is one location so strategically important to the defence not only of the western provinces but of the northern region of our country that I should like the minister to say whether or not consideration has been given by his department to the extension or expansion of the facilities at present available. I was reading an article recently on the question of co-ordinated defence in North America, and the Hudson bay area received very high marks as an area where strategic considerations were of paramount importance. I should like to ask whether or not, between the minister's department and the Department of National Defence, plans are being worked out whereby the facilities there available might be expanded or will be expanded within the next year or so.

Mr. Chevrier: I presume the hon. member refers to port facilities?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: That is a matter which we might discuss under the item for Churchill and the national harbours board.

Mr. Diefenbaker: One never knows under what item to discuss these matters.

Mr. Chevrier: One is a railway matter and the other is a port matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But the minister covers both.

Mr. Chevrier: The matter raised by my friend is clearly discussible under the other item. However, I can tell him this now—and I do not think it would vary when we come to the item later on—that if there is a greater movement of grain or of other traffic through the port of Churchill the national harbours board will make facilities available to meet that situation. The national harbours board informs me—and I have seen these facilities myself—that at the moment there are ample facilities to look after both incoming and outgoing traffic, certainly to look after incoming traffic because that is infinitesimal compared with the other. In so far as outgoing traffic is concerned, I think those who were at Churchill recently will have been impressed by the modern sheds and elevator, and there was even some reference by the hon. member for Souris to the drying facilities available there. I can tell the hon. member that at the moment I know of no item in the estimates to enlarge the facilities from the point of view of traffic.

Then there was the other question raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon and the hon. member for Lake Centre. Representations have been made to the government, particularly to the Canadian wheat board, for the cancellation of unwarranted diversion charges being made by western grain elevators of one and a half to two cents per bushel on grain when it is shipped to the port of Churchill. I presume that is what my hon. friend had in mind. The Department of Trade and Commerce advise that this matter was referred to the House of Commons standing committee when the chairman of the Canadian wheat board stated that no change in these traditional charges could be made at this time, and that statement met with the approval of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is clearly not a matter that concerns the Department of Transport. I am sure my hon. friends brought it up so that it would get the attention of either one or other minister, and through this discussion it will be brought to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Knight: What the minister has said confirms that the charge is applied by the elevator companies. It is the elevator companies that assess the charge.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Wright: I should like to say a few words on this matter. At the present time the difficulty seems to be in getting cars to move this grain over the Hudson Bay railway to the port of Churchill. The elevators there are capable of storing two and a half million bushels of grain. There is in storage at the present time approximately 450,000 bushels. I was with the group who visited Churchill quite recently. In talking to the man in charge of the elevator there he informed me that they have facilities to dry from 15,000 to 20,000 bushels of grain each twenty-four hours. There is a large amount of damp and tough grain in northeastern Saskatchewan that will be spoiling, if it is not already spoiling, because of the high moisture content. Yet we have facilities there for drying this grain. The difficulty seems to be in getting sufficient cars to move the grain into position at the port of Churchill. I am told on reasonably good authority that a number of sales have been made of No. 5 wheat. I have been told that seven cargoes of No. 5 wheat have been sold out of Churchill. With the facilities there to dry wheat, with the wheat available in a favourable freight zone to Churchill, the only difficulty seems to be in obtaining box cars to move the grain into position at Churchill where it may be dried. Has the minister any information as to what cars might be available for moving this grain to Churchill?

Last year we were able to move something over 7 million bushels out of the port of Churchill. This year, unless some of this lower grade grain, grain that is damp or tough, can be moved into position at Churchill before navigation opens so that the boats may come in there and load before the new crop is available for export from that port, the amount of grain shipped through Churchill is going to be considerably reduced. I think the minister should make every effort to see that box cars are diverted into that area. The information I have is that if we could move 15 million bushels of grain through that port we would not have these annual deficits so far as the Hudson Bay railway is concerned, that the railway would be operating at a profit. The hold-up seems to be the availability of box cars to move the grain. Has the minister any information?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, last night I put on the record a very detailed and up to date statement on the present position of box cars in Canada. The fact is that the position is almost back to normal. My hon. friend is probably aware that the movement of grain to Churchill generally starts in June or July and does not start at this time. Furthermore, it is not directed by this department. The movement of wheat is directed by the wheat board.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Before the item carries I should like to ask one question following this discussion of the box car situation. I dealt pretty thoroughly with the Churchill situation last night but again this morning I had some wires from points in my own constituency about the box car situation for the movement of grain. I wonder if the minister would state how these cars are allocated. I know when I came here in January the station agent where I live had received instructions from the chairman of the wheat board at that time placing an embargo against dry grain until further notice. He was only to allow the shipment of damp grain. That was last January. Is the wheat board entirely responsible for the allocation of these cars for the shipment of grain? Have they been responsible since last August for the shipment of grain?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, they have.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The Canadian wheat board officials are entirely responsible?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. Will my hon. friend read the statement which I put on Hansard last night? He will find that the present position is with reference to the box car situation, and also a statement by the chief commissioner of the Canadian wheat board.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Yes, I will do that. I am sorry I was absent and missed that last night. I have not checked Hansard too closely. As I stated last evening, I sat in the Manitoba legislature at Easter and heard their minister of agriculture give many figures as to the amount of damp grain still to be moved in Manitoba if it was not to spoil there. I am quite sure there is a great deal more than that in Saskatchewan. It seems to me that somebody has rather bungled this matter so far as damp grain is concerned when we have this expensive and fine layout at Churchill.

I did not follow the minister when he said that grain does not start to move until the middle of the summer. I think this has been a very exceptional season in the west, one of the worst I have ever experienced. I believe that with the government-owned facilities at Churchill, and the wheat board operating directly under government direction now, somebody has fumbled this thing rather badly. We covered the question fairly well last night. I was not too clear on this box car business. I shall read the minister's statement and check that situation. This morning I received a lot of correspondence from points in my own riding because the people are still alarmed about this damp grain and the shortage of box cars.

Mr. Wright: I cannot accept the minister's statement that the wheat board has all the responsibility with respect to box cars.

Mr. Chevrier: I made no such statement as that. Please do not misquote me to that extent. The Canadian wheat board has no responsibility whatever with reference to box cars. This board has the direction for the movement of wheat, not of box cars.

Mr. Wright: That is the point I was trying to make. Whoever is responsible, and I believe the minister's department has the allocation of box cars to the various commodities, there should be some more box cars allocated to moving this wheat up to the port of Churchill. Certainly if the minister will supply the box cars the wheat board will see that they are used to the best advantage, whether that is in the movement of this grain to Churchill or to some other point. The wheat board will decide according to the quota of box cars that you people make available to them. That is the point I am raising, and I believe that is the point the hon. member for Souris is raising.

Mr. Chevrier: Surely the hon. member is not suggesting that the Department of Transport has jurisdiction over the movement of box cars. It is not as simple as that. The owners of the box cars surely must have something to do with them and with their use. The shippers must have something to do with it. In wartime the government had a transport controller who had something to do with it, but that post has been abolished. As I said the other evening, until a transport controller is appointed in the United States it would be very difficult to control the movement of box cars from one country to the other.

What I did say was that a committee existed, composed of railway, steamship and wheat board representatives, as well as other shippers. This committee is now dealing with the present box car shortage. It is because of the work of this committee I was able to put on Hansard last night a statement showing the present box car position, which has considerably ameliorated in the last few weeks. Had it not been for the work of this committee, I do not think the chairman of the wheat board would have been able to report on April 9 that 1,000 box cars had been made available for the movement of wheat in western Canada.

Mr. Wright: One thousand box cars daily?

Mr. Chevrier: That is daily, yes; and the following day his letter indicated that 800 cars had been made available. He expressed the hope that if the railways carried on with that movement, the position would remedy itself very quickly.

Mr. Knight: I should like to revert for a moment to this matter of the drying capacity. I should like to ask the minister if it is not a fact that the drying capacity has never been used at all? So far as I know there has never been a bushel of grain put through, except as a means of testing the equipment. I recall once asking the Minister of Trade and Commerce why the facilities we have at Saskatoon for the storage of 5·5 million bushels of wheat had at that time only 1,600 bushels. I asked him why those facilities were not used more than they were. He said it was worth the expense to this nation to keep that place as insurance against the day when we might need it. I would suggest that he might have said the same thing about this drying equipment, that it was insurance against the day when we might need it.

As I suggested to you, sir, last night, I think that day has come. We should cash in upon the premium of that particular insurance policy. I do not see why this grain could not have been taken up to Churchill. The capacity of the drying equipment is enormous. It is the finest grain drying equipment in this country. Last night it was revealed that this plant will dry the almost unbelievable quantity of 20,000 bushels in a twenty-four-hour period, or 15,000 to 20,000 bushels in accordance with the percentage of water in the grain. There seems to be some justification for the criticism. In a year when we know there is going to be a carry-over of wheat and it has to be stored somewhere, I do not see why, unless it is as the member for Melfort suggests, the absence of box cars, the grain could not have been taken up to Churchill where it could have been dried at this rather colossal rate and stored in these bins, rather than leave it in this wet condition in the granaries and on the farms in northern Saskatchewan.

When the shipping season opens next year, we hope there will be 2 million bushels of wheat in storage at Churchill ready to move out. I would suggest that now is the time to store it there. It may very well be done by having wheat shipped there in a damp condition, dried in these very fine facilities and stored in bins. It would then be safe until needed for shipment.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I want to support what the member for Saskatoon has said. As I stated last night I had the privilege of visiting Churchill last week end and inspecting the splendid storage facilities there. I asked the official in charge about this drying equipment. He said that to his knowledge—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member—

Mr. Ross (Souris): I was coming to the question I want to ask.

Mr. Chevrier: —but after all I think we must be fair. If I can help it, I am not going to allow a debate on wheat. I am not the minister responsible for wheat, and I do not profess to know anything about wheat. Furthermore, what we are discussing now is a matter concerning the national harbours board and that is not the item on which we are. We are on the Hudson Bay railway, but we have been talking about the port of Churchill for the last half hour. I try to be patient. I do not want to interrupt continually, but I think in fairness to the minister who has these estimates we should keep to the item. I do not mind getting away from the item now and then, but we have spent at least thirty or thirty-five minutes discussing the port of Churchill and matters which do not concern me but which concern the wheat board.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The question I want to ask concerns the Minister of Transport. I was going to lead to it by simply stating that the official at Churchill informed me there had never been two complete carloads of grain dried in that plant. There is certainly a splendid storage capacity there now for over 2 million bushels. I wanted to ask the minister when this committee for the allocation of box cars was set up. As I say, there are people who are still dissatisfied about the allocation of box cars. I received correspondence about that subject today, and I should like to be able to tell these people how long this committee has been functioning.

Mr. Chevrier: The committee has been functioning for two weeks. I have been getting a number of telegrams, just as the hon. member has. I have replied to them along the lines I indicated last evening and again tonight; that is the best information I have available, and I have been giving it to these people.

Mr. Bater: I intend to say only a few words about this box car shortage. I believe there was about as much grain lying out in my constituency this winter as in any constituency in Saskatchewan. I realize that the minister and his department have nothing to do with the box car shortage, but I sincerely hope that after all that has been said they are cognizant of the fact that we want these cars to move not only the grain that has been in the elevators, which has been damp and tough all winter, but also the crop that has yet to be threshed.

Mr. Knight: I wanted to ask the minister about this deficit for 1951 of $400,000. Was that all in respect of the railroad? Then, the deficit seems to have been reduced to $250,000 for last year.

Mr. Chevrier: It was all in respect of the railways.

Mr. Knight: I see that we have a 1951-52 deficit, and that amounted to $250,000, a decrease I am glad to say of $150,000. To what does the minister attribute that decrease? I presume to increased traffic.

Mr. Chevrier: Increased movement of grain.

Mr. Knight: If we follow this thing to its logical conclusion, the conclusion is that if a sufficient quantity of grain were shipped over that route, that deficit of $250,000 would disappear and the railway would be out of the red. In other words, what the railway needs, in order to take it off the back of the taxpayers in this country, is more traffic. Is that the way the minister would interpret the situation, namely, that more traffic would remedy the situation and that the railway would come out of the red.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; as I said, it is due to the increased movement of grain and also to the increased defence traffic up to the port.

Item agreed to.

Railway and steamship services—

Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals—

493. To provide for the payment during the fiscal year 1951-52 to the Canadian National Railway company (hereinafter called the national company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport made from time to time by the national company to the Minister of Finance and to be applied by the national company in payment of the deficit (certified by the auditors of the national company) in the operation of the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals arising in the calendar year 1951, $1,280,000.

Mr. McLure: I am pleased with one thing in connection with this item. It has now found its way under a new heading. It used to appear as a deficit. It is now in with other company and comes under services. I must say that "service" is the correct name for it instead of "deficit", as it has always appeared from time to time heretofore. I notice that the amount payable for this service is $1,280,000 or an increase over last year of $121,000. With all due respect to the auditors in connection with the auditing of the accounts, I think that the committee are entitled to something more than just the bare, bald figures. When you come to the detail, they forget themselves again and they call it a deficit once more. But we will let that matter pass. There is never given to the committee any indication of how this deficit, as they term it, or this service is costing so much. I think this committee should be entitled to get the following information. I think they should be told the gross amount of expenditure for the operation of the ferry. Another thing that we should know is how much was spent on the construction of the terminals or the repairs.

Mr. Chevrier: That is on the next item.

Mr. McLure: Furthermore, I should like to know how much was spent on repairs to the two steamers, the Prince Edward and the Abegweit, during the year in question. What about the revenue? I do not wish to ask for all the details of it, but I think it would be worth while to know what revenue comes in. For instance, there must be considerable earning power there as well as spending power. If you look at page 171 of the commission's report, you will find there the information that some 52,000 carloads of freight were moved over there, and most of that would be long haul freight. The ferry should be entitled to a fairly good earning power from those 52,000 carloads of freight. Furthermore, some 200,000 passengers crossed over on the ferry, and that would be another earning power. Then again, 50,000 automobiles and trucks have gone over there in the year. That is another earning power of the railway. All these added up should make a fairly good revenue. That is what I should like to get at. I want to know the amount of revenue it has actually produced.

I would hope to see included in that amount the credit that the Borden ferry gets on the long haul cars that are beneficial to the Canadian National Railways. I understand that the divisional point at which the long-haul cars of freight originate get an extra amount of the freight rather than a straight haul of their own. As I said, I am not asking for a detailed statement of what any part of the ship or anything else costs or what the restaurant earns and all that; but I should like to have a gross figure, in order to see where this deficit, as it is termed in the detail, or this service has to be provided for.

[Mr. McLure.]

Mr. Chevrier: I should be glad to give the hon. gentleman all the information I have. The total operating expenses for the year 1950 were $1,611,004. The total revenues for the same year were $361,341. The net operating loss for the year was $1,249,663. The total amount of money spent on the terminal facilities at Borden and Tormentine was in the neighbourhood of $7 million. This amount was spent over a period of three years in about the proportion of half on Tormentine and half on Borden.

Mr. McLure: None of that amount is included in this $1,280,000, is it?

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, no.

Mr. McLure: And no repairs to the boat?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. Repairs to the boat are in this, but unfortunately there is no separate amount for them and I am not able to give them from the information I have. I think the hon. gentleman should have that information if he wants it, and I will be glad to give it to him. Perhaps we could get it in the committee when it sits next week.

Mr. McLure: The reason I asked that question was that there were reports that there were repairs to our new boat amounting to over half a million dollars. Having regard to the source from which I gathered that information, I could not really believe it. I should like to find out.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure there is nothing of that nature at all. I have some recollection that last year the repairs to the Abegweit were in the neighbourhood of $60,000 and I presume that this year they would be in much the same amount.

Item stands.

Railway and steamship services—

Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited—

495. To provide for the payment from time to time to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited (hereinafter called "the company") of the amount of the deficit occurring during the year ending December 31, 1951, in the operations of the company and the vessels under the control of the company, as certified by the auditors of the company, and upon applications made by the company to the Minister of Finance and approved by the Minister of Transport, not exceeding $845,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I would ask the minister what provision is to be made for new steamers to replace the ones that have been lost in recent years on the service to the West Indies. Some of these steamers were lost during the war. I refer to the Lady boats. There are only one or two of these boats in existence now. Will the minister make a statement?

Mr. Chevrier: Because of the lack of traffic, no provision is being made to replace the boats that were lost. However, two new diesel cargo vessels were put into operation some few years ago: the Canadian Constructor and the Canadian Cruiser, both of which operate in the West Indies. There are a number of passenger vessels. There are about ten vessels in operation. But there is no provision for new vessels; and until the position with reference to trade alters to indicate a greater movement of trade from the West Indies to Canada, I am afraid that the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships will not be in a position to build, to purchase or to assign new vessels to this route.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I understand then from the minister that the steamers now available are able to handle all the traffic that can be expected between Canada and the West Indies.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, I suggest with deference, that items 493 and 495 should not be carried by this committee at the present time, because they were referred on Wednesday, April 11, by motion introduced by the minister himself, to the sessional committee on railways and shipping. I have just looked up the terms of the resolution which is to be found at page 1991 of Hansard. It reads in part as follows:

> And that the resolution passed by the house on March 12, 1951, referring certain estimates to the committee of supply, be rescinded in so far as the said resolution relates to votes Nos. 493, 495 and 501.

I would imagine the proper procedure would be that you might discuss it but not actually carry it until the sessional committee had completed its work.

Mr. Chevrier: I think the point of order raised by the hon. member is well taken. It is the practice to withdraw these items and refer them to the committee on railways and shipping, and that is what I indicated to the hon. member for Queens a moment ago. I said that the information was not available but I would get it for him when the committee was sitting. The point is well taken.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think we should actually carry them. We should discuss them but not carry them.

The Chairman: Items 493, 495 and 501 will stand.

Items stand.

496. Strait of Canso—transportation improvements and facilities—capital, $1,000,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): This is an interesting item. The sum of $2 million was voted in the previous year, and a million dollars is now being voted for transportation improvements and facilities in Canso strait. Can the minister explain what has been done with the money which was voted in the previous year, and what does he propose to do with the million dollars now being asked for?

Mr. Chevrier: With reference to the $2 million to which my hon. friend refers, none of that was spent. That was put into the estimates last year in order to provide for the construction of the low-level bridge. There is an item of $1 million in the estimates this year to provide for the construction of that bridge should the board of engineers, which has been reconvened, recommend that the project be proceeded with along the lines of the plan submitted by the engineering expert, Dr. Pratley.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Can the minister give us any further information as to when we may expect a report from the engineers who have been reconvened?

Mr. Chevrier: I hope it will be before the session has completed its work.

Mr. Drew: Does it then represent an accumulated $3 million for this work?

Mr. Chevrier: No. The $2 million not having been spent just lapsed, and this is a revote in part of the $2 million. It is $1 million. None of the $3 million has been spent so far.

Item agreed to.

497. Enlargement of dock and terminal facilities at North Sydney, N.S.—capital, $1,660,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): May I have a statement from the minister with respect to what work is being carried on at North Sydney? Was it let by contract? Who are the contractors? What expenditures will be made before the works that have been authorized will be completed?

Mr. Chevrier: This is the terminal and dock facilities at North Sydney which are being built in preparation for the new ferry which is also mentioned in another item. The estimated cost of the enlargement of the docks and terminal facilities at North Sydney will amount to $2,630,000. There is included in these estimates for the construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment for the present fiscal term, $1,660,000. It is impossible to complete the whole of the works during this fiscal year.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Has this work been let at tender?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it has.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): At a fixed amount?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Who are the contractors, and what was the amount of the contract?

Mr. Chevrier: The contractor is T. C. Gorman and the amount of the contract is $1,216,777. It went to the lowest tender.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Will that complete all the new facilities which are required at North Sydney?

Mr. Chevrier: It will not complete all of the new facilities, because the estimated cost of the project is $2,600,000. There are some sheds to be built, some land to be expropriated and some equipment that will be required. The estimate of the cost of the work is $2,600,000, and the contract has been awarded to these people for the amount mentioned.

Mr. Drew: In this instance is the $1,500,000 voted last year still available for this purpose in addition to the amount now being voted?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it is not.

Mr. Drew: So that the only amount that is made available now for this purpose is the $1,660,000?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Drew: Therefore, what is now being voted will not complete the work?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Drew: Is it possible to say when it is expected that this work will be fully completed?

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed it will not be completed until the summer of 1952.

Item agreed to.

498. Construction of new dock and terminal facilities at Port aux Basques, Nfld.—capital, $500,000.

Mr. Drew: This is a provision for the construction or acquisition of buildings, works and land at Port aux Basques. Will the minister explain exactly what is contemplated there, and how far will it go toward completing the facilities required of what I understand is the other end of this transportation arrangement?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, the hon. member is right. This is to provide the facilities at the other extremity of the run between North Sydney and Port aux Basques. The estimated cost of the development there, that is the construction of new dock and terminal facilities, will be $3,500,000. There is provision in this estimate for $500,000, because it is not expected that it will be possible during this fiscal year to have the work in sufficient readiness to ask for tenders and call bids. This money will be used for the construction and acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment.

Mr. Drew: When is it expected that the work contemplated at Port aux Basques will be fully completed?

Mr. Chevrier: I hardly think before 1953.

Mr. Drew: I might explain the purpose of the question. It apparently is expected that the work at North Sydney will be completed by the summer of next year, and then, as I understand, the work that would be required to make the other end equally satisfactory for this new means of transportation will not be completed until the summer of 1953.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Item agreed to.

499. Construction or acquisition of auto-ferry vessels, as detailed in the estimates—capital, $2,550,000.

Mr. Drew: As I understand it this item is connected with the two previous items and provides for the acquisition of an auto-ferry vessel for the service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques. The estimated cost of the vessel is $4,500,000. Will the minister explain why in this case $2,500,000 is asked for and not the total figure of $4,500,000, which the vessel will cost?

Mr. Chevrier: Because in the construction of these vessels it takes generally a period of two, three and sometimes more years. It is not anticipated that we can spend the full amount of the $4,500,000 this fiscal year, because the vessel will not be completed. Detailed plans and specifications are just now being worked out and it is estimated that progress payments during this fiscal year will amount to $2,500,000.

Mr. Drew: Has the contract yet been entered into for the construction of this vessel?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, and the contractor is Canadian Vickers of Montreal.

Mr. Drew: When is it anticipated the ship will be completed?

Mr. Chevrier: In 1953.

Mr. Drew: So that it is anticipated, then, that the completion of the work at Port aux Basques and the availability of the ship will coincide, and that full service with the new ship and with facilities at both ends will be available in 1953?

Mr. Chevrier: That is the present expectation and the present estimate. But very often, because of lack of steel or lack of other materials, our dates are out of line.

But from the information engineers and contractors give us we are hopeful that it will be possible to have the whole ferry service with necessary facilities in operation at that time.

Mr. Drew: I recognize that, under conditions which now exist, many things could interfere with the completion of a contract. But do I understand that, subject to the pressure of events related to the emergency through which we are passing, it is anticipated that the ship and the completion of the facilities would make it possible to open this service at the beginning of the ordinary transport season in 1953?

Mr. Chevrier: I would not like to say that it would be at the beginning of the navigation season, because that means early in the year. But the information we have is that it will be some time in 1953.

Mr. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): I should like to ask about the $50,000 in vote 499 for the proposed ferry between Yarmouth and a port in the New England states.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): We have not passed the previous estimate yet.

Mr. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): The minister will recall that in the estimates last year a million dollars was voted, following an announcement by the Minister of Transport in December of 1949 to the effect that such a ferry would be operated between Yarmouth and the New England states. Two governments were concerned, as well as the two countries. Several boards of trade were interested and there were of course the usual tourist committees, and a multiplicity of other committees concerned.

The people in western Nova Scotia, who had looked forward to a service between Yarmouth and a port in Maine, and were making their plans to establish new businesses and to carry their products of the farm and the sea to the United States by a short and direct route, and who planned to make use of autobus and refrigerator truck services, and who were interested in establishing a new tourist business in western Nova Scotia, were of course greatly disappointed when the announcement was made last fall in the month of November that because of the steel shortage the project would have to be shelved temporarily.

Because of present international conditions, the people of western Nova Scotia have accepted that. They regret it and they also realize that in this coming summer all they can look forward to is three months' service with the present Eastern Steamship Lines. In the winter they have a subsidized service running between Yarmouth and Boston.

Can the minister enlarge upon the statement he made some months ago, when he said that the project was temporarily shelved, owing to the steel shortage?

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I cannot add much to what I said at that time, other than to say that we hope to provide in these estimates the sum of $50,000 for the preparation of plans and specifications. I am pleased however to be able to say that from the information the maritime commission have given me it is my understanding that the Eastern Steamships will continue to operate the service between Yarmouth and Boston. Beyond that I am afraid I cannot go. I would not like to elaborate upon what was said in the statement to which my hon. friend refers. I, too, regret that it has not been found possible to make provision for this. However, a lack of steel, and some other reasons, made it imperative on the part of the government to suspend for the time being the construction of this ferry.

Mr. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): When the minister states the maritime commission had informed him that Eastern Steamships will continue the service, he is referring to the coming summer?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): Nothing more definite than that?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I agree with the hon. member for Digby-Yarmouth. The people of Nova Scotia have been greatly disappointed with the delay, after their hopes were raised to such a high point. This steamer was to be provided to serve the tourist trade of Nova Scotia, and the New England states, more particularly the southern part of Nova Scotia. However the people of Nova Scotia are getting accustomed to these disappointments—I am thinking of the Canso bridge and the trans-Canada highway in addition to this steamer.

I understood the minister to say that designs had been completed and a contract let for a steamer for the North Sydney-Newfoundland service. What is to be the motive power in that new steamer? I take it for granted that it will be operated by coal.

Mr. Chevrier: No, it is a diesel-operated ship.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Does the minister tell this committee that he is going to use oil in a ship which operates out of the very heart of the coal-producing centre of eastern Canada, in fact of all Canada? I would say that that would be a direct slap in the face to the citizens in that part of Canada. I am very much surprised and disappointed to hear the minister say that this new boat is being designed to be driven by oil. I am pleased that these new facilities are being provided, a wharf at North Sydney and another at Port aux Basques, and the provision of a large new ferry steamer. I am sure all hon. members in the house are pleased that this is being done.

We want to have this service operated with the best boat that can be made available. But I would ask the minister why preference has been given to oil. There seems to be a tendency now in Nova Scotia, particularly in connection with the Canadian National Railways, to sidetrack coal and use oil-burning locomotives. Oil is being used even on through trains from Montreal to Halifax, and on the Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island railways. I understand that most of the shunting engines in the maritimes are now diesels, and that they have been authorized for the Gaspe service. I would ask the minister if it is too late to reconsider the motive power to be used in this new steamer.

Mr. Chevrier: This ship will be very much similar to the Abegweit. It will be required to carry freight and passengers and also to break ice at certain seasons of the year. It has been found that diesel electric motors operate more cheaply and more efficiently with oil than with coal.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Does the minister think that he can justify the use of a diesel boat, oil-driven, out of coal-mining centres such as North Sydney, Sydney Mines and Glace Bay, the greatest coal field in Canada? We have these great national resources and yet this boat which is to operate in this territory is to be driven by oil.

Mr. Chevrier: That is what was done with respect to the car ferry Abegweit, and the proposal was put forward by a minister from the maritime provinces.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): That was done after protest by the people of Nova Scotia, especially those in Springhill, where for years they had enjoyed a market for from 25,000 to 40,000 tons of coal per year. There was no justification for the use of oil on the Abegweit, and I am sure there is no justification for the use of oil on this boat we are referring to.

Item agreed to.

500. Ogden Point piers, Victoria, B.C.—construction or acquisition of buildings, works and land—capital, $55,000.

[Mr. Black (Cumberland).]

Mr. Fulton: What is the purpose of this vote?

Mr. Chevrier: It is to enable provision to be made for adequate storage areas for the collection of lumber cargoes made necessary by an increase in lumber movements at Victoria. The asphalt paved areas will be increased.

Mr. Fulton: I notice in the details on page 479 that during the fiscal year 1949-50 there was an expenditure of $165,000, and then last year there was a vote of $43,000 with an actual expenditure of $26,704. Is this vote in connection with the same work?

Mr. Chevrier: It is an entirely different expenditure. The expenditures referred to, if my memory serves me aright, were made following the visit of a departmental committee after protests by the city council and which came to the conclusion that additional repairs were required.

Item agreed to.

Pensions and other benefits—

503. Railway employees provident fund—to supplement pension allowances under the provisions of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act so as to make the minimum payment during the period January 1, 1951, to March 31, 1952, the sum of $30 per month instead of $20 as fixed by the said act, $14,250.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think this is the only item that would permit the bringing up of the general question of railway employees' pensions. There are a few words I should like to say in addition to those I expressed the other day in regard to the pension system of the Canadian National Railways. When the matter was up on the last occasion, because of the circumstances under which it was brought up the minister did not have an opportunity of explaining the present situation. As far back as 1947 I brought up the question of something being done in order to improve the situation of employees of the Canadian National Railways who were on retirement. I brought this matter up again in 1948 and used these words, as reported on page 939 of Hansard of February 6, 1948, which I think are as applicable today as they were then:

—that the time has come for the government to give consideration to a permanent upward revision of the basic pension, with a view to a material increase therein, and in the meantime while consideration is being given to that a cost of living bonus ought to be provided for. The basic pension rate today is woefully inadequate. Equity demands its revision.

That was in 1948 and at that time the $25 per month basic pension had been in effect since 1935. The other day figures were given of the number of Canadian National employees in receipt of $25 pension upon retirement, that being the basic pension. The minister discussed this question on February 11, 1948, as reported on page 1111 of Hansard, as follows:

In reply to the invitation given by the hon. member for Lake Centre to the government to revise upward the basic pension of the Canadian National Railways, all I can say is that, in view of the attitude taken by the government with respect to its own superannuated civil servants, I would not feel disposed to advise the government to interfere in the pension plan of the Canadian National Railways, or to ask the government to tell the officers of the Canadian National Railways that they should revise the basic pension upward.

So the situation has remained throughout the intervening years. The other day the matter came up again and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and myself spoke with regard to the necessity of something being done. In my opinion there is no excuse that can be satisfactorily given for the failure of the government to have acted in this connection. Three years have gone by and the cost of living continues to mount while the basic pension of the Canadian National Railways remains at $25 per month.

Today members of the house received a communication from James Downs, secretary of the Canadian National Railways veterans association, which sets forth the situation in clear and unmistakable language. This bears the date April 12, 1951, and says in part:

At a recent meeting of the above association I was instructed to bring to your attention the following conditions affecting the Canadian National Railways pensioned employees.

That the basic pension minimum, twenty-five dollars a month, is totally inadequate to meet the continual rising cost of living, especially amongst the large number of pensioners who, when employed, were receiving wages which only entitles them to the minimum pension of twenty-five dollars.

It goes on to point out that a large number of pensioners did not have the privilege of contributing to the revised pension plan which was put into operation in 1935, and continues:

The employees of the railways and all industries in Canada have had increases in wages and cost of living bonuses granted to them to meet the cost of living conditions during the past few years.

Then the next paragraph reads:

That many of the pensioners are merely existing under deplorable and extenuating circumstances, also cannot secure the old age pension between the ages of 65 to 70 years.

Then they point out that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Ontario Northland Railway have increased the pension rate for retired employees. I bring this matter again to the attention of the minister. There is not a day goes by without letters being received from ex-employees of the Canadian National Railways pointing out the injustice of the situation. While in the chamber this evening I received a letter from one of these former employees setting out the situation. He points out that he worked for twenty-seven years and eight months straight service but is not of an age to be entitled to the pension. Not being sixty years of age he is not entitled to what is called a gratuitous pension because he had some small savings set aside and had built himself a house during the years he was earning.

I do not want to speak at any length but I feel that the present rate of basic pension cannot be justified in any way. It is inadequate, it is unfair, it is unreasonable. Several thousand ex-employees of Canadian National Railways across this country find themselves today, by reason of the rising cost of living and having only a basic pension of $25 a month, in a position that is unjustifiable and is no credit to one of the public services of this country. In order to give any other hon. member an opportunity to join in this discussion, I simply conclude by asking the minister what is going to be done about this matter. How much longer will action be delayed? Four years have gone by since I first brought the matter up. There is no indication yet that anything is being done to meet the situation.

These ex-employees are not organized. They have no means whereby they can bring their position before parliament except through the media of members of parliament who are prepared to present the argument. In addition to them, there are also of course those who are being retired from time to time on a basic pension which, in so far as the low income employees of the railway are concerned, places them in a position that borders on destitution inasmuch as over the years in their positions as section men, porters and so on these lesser salaried employees of the railway have been unable to contribute to the pension and thereby provide themselves with at least a semi-adequate pension.

Mr. Knowles: There is a good deal I should like to say with respect to this matter even if I have said it before, but I think I will take only a minute to endorse what has been said again by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and to express the hope that in the two or three minutes remaining before eleven o'clock the minister might give us a little more information than he has given thus far on other occasions on which this matter has been raised. It would seem only natural, in view of the number of times the question has been raised, and particularly in view of the number of times the minister has had to get the Canadian National Railways to provide information to answer my questions about these pension amounts, that the railways must have given some attention to this matter. Can the minister tell us whether any consideration is being given by the company to increasing the basic pension of $25, to providing a cost of living bonus of some sort, or to making any other changes in the pension set-up of Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, Mr. Chairman, both the Canadian National Railways and the government have been giving this matter consideration over a period of time. Canadian National Railways have been discussing the matter with their employees, and what the position is at the moment I am unable to say. Through their president Canadian National Railways discussed it with me on several occasions during the course of the year, and on at least two occasions it has received the careful consideration of the government. I have to say that the government thus far has not been able to recommend or direct the Canadian National Railways to increase the basic pension upwards until such time as the matter of its own civil servants receives similar or adequate consideration. Then there is also the question of other groups that are in the same position as that of Canadian National pensioners.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Which are they?

Mr. Chevrier: There are other groups affected by inflation. There are a number of them. There are the pilots, other pension groups, the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway employees, the provident fund group and, as the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs says, the old age pensioners themselves. It appears to me that this question cannot be disposed of piecemeal, and that until such time as it is possible to find a solution for the whole problem the government does not feel disposed thus far to direct the Canadian National Railways to deal with a portion only of the problem.

Mr. Knowles: In this connection do I take it that the minister is talking only about retired employees of Canadian National Railways already on pension, or does that apply to any revision of the pension plan for those who are still employed and paying into the various funds? I gathered from what the minister said that he is thinking of the group whose plight we have pressed most, namely, the retired railway pensioners on low pension. I take it from what he said that their case stands on the same plane as that of the superannuated civil servants and others in similar situations.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: Well, it is time for action for all of them.

Item stands.
