A passage is now made from Eastport to the counties bordering on the Chottahoochee, hundred Sheridan Knowles seconded this resolution, and with all his heart and soul subscribed to the sentiments he had just heard. Nature, the great magician of one's feelings, arose to him.
The majority of the inhabitants of America were the sons of these lands; they possessed the same feelings, were actuated by the same industry, the same chivalry animated them, the latter place, which is at the head of tide and the laws which ruled them were funda- water on this beautiful river, and is rapidly mentally the same (Cheers.) He saw no harm in such a national feeling, and he thought it impossible to avoid asking such questions, when he reflected on the Majestic scenery which every where met the eye. He had glided along their canals and crossed their magnificent lakes—he had mounted their glorious Alleghanies and sailed down the North River, the broad banks of which presented the finest Alpine country he had ever seen, and which it would take the life of an artist to delineate. He had travelled their railroads the shortest of which laughed at the longest of ours-he had seen these things, and every where witnessed the same enward rush to improvement. How could he, then, have mingled with the millions descended with himself from a common country moved by the same feelings, glorying in the same privilege (cheers)-how could be so identified with of liberty, and speaking one vernacular language, and that the language of Shakspeare such a people, bring himself to ridicule the pride of those who claimed property in what he described ?—(Loud cheering.) A greater enemy to this country there could not be than the man who would create enmity and disunion between two countries by detracting from the American character. The Americans generally desired that the connexion be so? Our friends, our sons visited the Americans, were hospitably received, and made fortunes by them. It was gratifying that this feeling should exist, and it should be the honor and pride of the old country to meet that feeling more than half way .- (loud From the Portland Advertiser.)

But is there any thing of the marvellous in it? Who does not believe in the foreknowledge of God, and whe can say hew far it may consist with his will, under some circumstances, to give intimation of approaching events, to his creatures? Many instances are related of individuals feeling and expressing a strong presentiment of evil before it visits them. What instructive lessons may the reflecting mind draw from this fact.

THE ROSE OF SHARON. - Two hours beof the volunteer Troops from this State last night, we learn that a serious battle was fought about twelve miles from Fort Brooke on the 27th April with the Indians.
